PREFACE

Fredrick Aandahl supervised the planning, compilation, and review of this volume. William Z. Slany succeeded him as editor in 1975 and directed the process of declassification and final review. Ralph R. Goodwin assisted in planning and supervision.

Mr. Goodwin prepared the documentation concerning the United Nations; N. Stephen Kane prepared the documentation on the American Republics; and Harriet D. Schwar prepared the documentation relating to Canada. David H. Stauffer arranged for the declassification of the documents, and Ruth M. Worthing and Evans Gerakas provided editorial and technical assistance.

The editors acknowledge with appreciation the assistance provided by the staffs of the Harry S. Truman Library and the United States Mission to the United Nations, which helped in locating various documents and facilitated their declassification and publication. Thanks are also due to those foreign governments that kindly granted permission for publication of certain of their documents in this volume.

The technical editing of this volume was the responsibility of the Publishing and Reproduction Division (Paul Washington, Chief). The Index was prepared by Francis C. Prescott.

PRINCIPLES FOR THE COMPILATION AND EDITING OF "FOREIGN RELATIONS"

The principles which guide the compilation and editing of Foreign Relations are stated in Department of State Regulation 2 FAM 1350 of June 15, 1961, a revision of the order approved on March 26, 1925, by Mr. Frank B. Kellogg, then Secretary of State. The text of the regulation, as further amended, is printed below:

1350 DOCUMENTARY RECORDS OF AMERICAN DIPLOMACY

1351 Scope of Documentation

The publication Foreign Relations of the United States constitutes the official record of the foreign policy of the United States. These volumes include, subject to necessary security considerations, all documents needed to give a comprehensive record of the major foreign policy decisions within the range of the Department of State's responsibilities, together with appropriate materials concerning the facts which contributed to the formulation of policies. When further material is needed to supplement the documentation in the Department's files for a proper understanding of the relevant policies of the United States, such papers should be obtained from other Government agencies.

1352 Editorial Preparation

The basic documentary diplomatic record to be printed in Foreign Relations of the United States is edited by the Historical Office, Bureau of Public Affairs of the Department of State. The editing of the record is guided by the principles of historical objectivity. There may be no alteration of the text, no deletion without indicating where in the text the deletion is made, and no omission of facts which were of major importance in reaching a decision. Nothing may be omitted for the purpose of concealing or glossing over what might be regarded by some as a defect of policy. However, certain omissions of documents are permissible for the following reasons:

a. To avoid publication of matters which would tend to impede current diplomatic negotiations or other business.
b. To condense the record and avoid repetition of needless details.
c. To preserve the confidence reposed in the Department by individuals and by foreign governments.
d. To avoid giving needless offense to other nationalities or individuals.
e. To eliminate personal opinions presented in despatches and not acted upon by the Department. To this consideration there is one qualification—in connection with major decisions it is desirable, where possible, to show the alternative presented to the Department before the decision was made.

1353 Clearance

To obtain appropriate clearances of material to be published in Foreign Relations of the United States, the Historical Office:

a. Refers to the appropriate policy offices of the Department and of other agencies of the Government such papers as appear to require policy clearance.
b. Refers to the appropriate foreign governments requests for permission to print as part of the diplomatic correspondence of the United States those previously unpublished documents which were originated by the foreign governments.

THE UNITED NATIONS

GENERAL UNITED STATES–UNITED NATIONS RELATIONS

I. UNITED STATES FOREIGN POLICY IN THE UNITED NATIONS SETTING[1]

Editorial Note

The same statute that makes provision for United States participation in the United Nations (Public Law 264, December 20, 1945, 59 Stat. 619, as amended) provides also that the President of the United States report to the Congress of the United States on an annual basis regarding such participation. For the year 1951 this report was published as United States Participation in the United Nations: Report by the President to the Congress for the Year 1951 (Department of State Publication 4583, Washington, Government Printing Office, 1952, 320 pages). This short yet comprehensive historical account is one of two convenient official sources of information for an overview of the entire spectrum of United States–United Nations relations in the year 1951.

The Department of State Bulletin, issued on a weekly basis, is the other source. In 1951 the Bulletin contained a useful weekly feature, "The United States in the United Nations." The Bulletin also printed the texts of statements, speeches, and articles by officials at the highest levels in regard to the conduct of United States foreign policy at the United Nations. Among these to be noted for the year 1951 are:

(1) "The United States Faces Aggression", address by Ernest A. Gross, Deputy United States Representative at the United Nations, Washington, D.C., December 29, 1950 (Department of State Bulletin, January 8, 1951, page 57);

(2) "Analysis of Soviet Performance in the United Nations", address also by Gross, New York, N.Y., February 17, 1951 (ibid., March 5, 1951, page 390);

(3) "The Phony 'Peace' Offensive: Soviet Charges Against the United Nations", address by John D. Hickerson, Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs, Milwaukee, Wis., April 27, 1951 (ibid., May 7, 1951, page 731);

(4) "Can the U.N. Become a Collective Security Organization?", article by Harding F. Bancroft, Deputy United States Representative on the Collective Measures Committee of the General Assembly of the United Nations (Department of State Bulletin, May 14, 1951, page 771);

(5) "U.N. Action on Collective Security: What it Means to Americans", address by Assistant Secretary of State Hickerson, Washington, D.C., April 25, 1951 (ibid., May 14, 1951, page 775);

(6) "The United Nations and the United States—July 1951", address by Deputy United States Representative Gross, Charlottesville, Va., July 11, 1951 (ibid., July 30, 1951, page 183);

(7) "U.S. Participation in the United Nations", a Message of the President to the Congress (transmitting annual report for 1950), July 26, 1951 (ibid, August 13, 1951, page 262);

(8) "International Unity Against Shifting Soviet Tactics: U.N. Actions Against Causes of War", address by Warren R. Austin, United States Representative at the United Nations, New York, N.Y., August 27, 1951 (ibid., September 10, 1951, page 425);

(9) "Good Faith Among Nations Needed to Achieve U.N. Goals", General Debate Statement to the General Assembly of the United Nations by Secretary of State Dean Acheson, Paris, France, November 8, 1951 (ibid., November 19, 1951, page 803).

As set forth in the statements, etc., cited above, the general effort of United States policy at the United Nations in 1951 was to formulate an identity of United States and United Nations principles in the establishment of a peaceful world. The specific thrust of United States policy was to organize a collective security system to resist aggression and to counteract spurious Soviet peace propaganda at the United Nations. More often than not, the war in Korea was the occasion for these official United States pronouncements. President Truman on July 26, 1951 described the United States record at the United Nations as one "of decision and action in the face of danger and, at the same time, a record of increasing efforts to promote human progress."

Missions

Mission at the Headquarters of the United Nations

The United States is represented by a permanent mission at the headquarters of the United Nations in New York. Under the direction of the representative of the United States to the United Nations, the mission carries out the instructions of the President, as transmitted by the Secretary of State, in United Nations bodies at the headquarters of the United Nations. It also serves as the channel of communication between the Department of State and the United Nations organs, agencies, and commissions at the headquarters and the delegations of other nations to the United Nations located in New York. It is a base of operations for the United States delegation to the General Assembly when the Assembly meets in New York.

The structure, organization, and functions of the United States mission to the United Nations have been determined in the main by the following factors:

1. The requirements of the United Nations Charter and the resolutions of the organs of the United Nations, the General Assembly in particular.
2. The provisions of the United Nations Participation Act as amended by Public Law 341 of the Eighty-first Congress.
3. Executive Order 10108, which superseded Executive Order 9844.
4. Location of the headquarters of the United Nations in the United States and the consequent need for the United States to assume the responsibilities of "host government."
5. The fact that the United States, in consequence of its leadership role in the United Nations, is represented on all organs and virtually all commissions and committees of the United Nations.

The chief of the mission is the United States representative to the United Nations, who, by statute, is the United States representative in the Security Council. He is assisted by a deputy representative of the United States to the United Nations, who, by statute, is deputy United States representative in the Security Council. There is also a second deputy representative in the Security Council. Other principal officers of the mission are the United States representatives on the Economic and Social Council and the Trusteeship Council.

During 1951 the chief of the mission served, with the assistance of deputies, as United States representative in the Atomic Energy Commission, in the Commission for Conventional Armaments, and in the following Committees of the General Assembly: The Interim Committee, the Collective Measures Committee, and the Committee on Additional Measures. The Disarmament Commission, established under a General Assembly resolution of January 11, 1952, supersedes the Atomic Energy Commission and the Commission for Conventional Armaments. The United States representative and a deputy representative have been designated to serve on this Commission.

The main source of policy guidance and strategical direction for the conduct of the United States participation in the United Nations is necessarily the Department of State. The mission, however, has a staff consisting of a small number of advisers and a secretariat under a secretary-general and a deputy secretary-general. The advisers assist the United States representative in (1) planning the tactical pursuit of United States policy objectives in the light of the political and parliamentary situations in United Nations organs and bodies; (2) consultation, negotiation, and liaison with other delegations and the United Nations Secretariat. The secretariat of the mission assists the United States representative in (1) the coordination of the above activities; (2) the provision of necessary research, reference, reporting, and communications services; (3) the discharge of the responsibilities of the United States as "host government," in particular those arising from the headquarters agreement between the United States and the United Nations (Public Law 357, 80th Cong.) and the International Organizations Immunities Act (Public Law 291, 79th Cong.), which deal inter alia with relations of the United Nations, its officials, and delegation members with Federal, State, and local authorities; and (4) the administration and management of the United States mission.

Other United States Missions

In addition to the United States mission to the United Nations during 1951 the United States maintained several special missions in order to participate effectively in the work of certain bodies of the United Nations which did not have headquarters in the United States.

During 1951 a permanent resident delegation to the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe was maintained at Geneva. It worked with the Commission and its committees in efforts to readjust the production and distribution of coal, electric power, lumber, steel, and other commodities for the purpose of assisting the economic reconstruction of Europe. United States representatives were also sent to the meetings of the United Nations Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East, and the Economic Commission for Latin America.

Special missions also were maintained during 1951 to make possible effective participation in the work of certain field missions and specialized agencies of the United Nations. United States representatives served, for example, with the United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine, the United Nations Commission for Indonesia (until April 1951), the United Nations Special Committee on the Balkans, the Advisory Commission of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, and the United Nations Council for Libya. The work of these bodies is described in the text of this report.

During 1951 there was at Geneva a United States representative for specialized agency affairs, charged with maintaining liaison for the United States with the International Refugee Organization, the International Labor Organization, and the World Health Organization, as well as with various other United Nations bodies in Europe. A special United States mission, the office of the United States representative to the Council of the International Civil Aviation Organization, was maintained at Montreal. Liaison was also maintained with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) through a counselor on UNESCO affairs stationed at the American Embassy at Paris.

Abstract of Office of Intelligence Research Report, "Conflicts Between United States Aims in the UN and Those of Certain Blocs" [1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] September 10, 1951.
No. 5524

The Arab States

Despite dynastic and political rifts among themselves, the Arab states are probably the most cohesive non-Soviet bloc in the UN. However, even the Arab states act as a unit only on issues clearly affecting their common regional interests such as Palestine. This and related issues constitute the major source of Arab resentment against the US, which is prominently identified with the establishment and encouragement of Israel. Wide gaps between US aims in the UN and those of the Arab bloc may be expected to continue with respect to Arab resistance to any final peace with Israel, the disposition of the Palestinian Arab refugees and freedom of transit of Suez. As part of a larger group of former colonies the Arab states will oppose "colonialism" and "imperialism", often embarrassing the US in its efforts to harmonize the conflicting interests of the major colonial powers and the anti-colonial states. Disagreement between the Arab states and the US is likely to arise over the future of North African territories such as Libya, French Morocco and Tunisia where the Arab states support the nationalist demands of the Islamic populations. As underdeveloped countries, they tend to advance exaggerated claims for economic and developmental aid which may be more visionary than realistic. Partly in retaliation against the US role in Palestine and partly as a result of their weak and exposed position, the Arab states also have to a considerable degree manifested "neutralist" tendencies in the East–West conflict and, after the Chinese Communist intervention in the Korean war, they joined with the Asian group in attempting to conciliate between the belligerents. However, such neutralism is largely tactical and opportunistic rather than rooted in principle.

The Asian Group

Unlike the Arab states, there is no formally organized Asian bloc, but rather a group of Asian UN members sharing a broadly common outlook on a number of international issues which permits them to work together on a loose ad hoc basis. Of the nine Asian members of the UN, only five (Afghanistan, Burma, India, Indonesia, Pakistan) seem to fall clearly within the so-called Asian group since the remainder have to a larger degree displayed a pro-Western orientation. Rival ambitions for leadership, differing attitudes vis-à-vis the cold war and the antagonism between India and Pakistan have defeated numerous efforts to establish a formal Asian regional organization. Nevertheless in December 1950, under Indian leadership, a combination of twelve Asian and Arab states interceded vigorously in the UN to seek a Korean cease-fire and peace together with a general settlement of Far Eastern problems including Formosa and Chinese representation in the UN. Although this initiative failed largely on account of Chinese Communist truculence, it afforded the members of the Asian group an opportunity to express their deep rooted neutralism in the East–West conflict. From this neutralist sentiment, shared by all members of the group in varying degrees, and from a closely related distrust of the West, stem sharp disagreement with the US as to the fundamental role and purpose of the UN. All are extremely cautious in supporting the concept of collective security through the UN, and India, Burma and Indonesia in particular, envisage a conciliating function for the UN in handling international disputes and tend to turn away from a more militant role. Thus none of the group contributed military forces to the Korean war. Each recognizes Peiping and they have consistently supported its seating in the UN. They are also likely to oppose the US position respecting Formosa. Since the group consists of underdeveloped countries until recently under Western hegemony, it, like the Arab states, opposes "colonialism" and "imperialism" and is suspicious of the close association of the US with major colonial powers. On any future UN questions arising out of the nationalist aspirations of French North Africa or Indochina, this group would tend to side against France. Although the members may not regard the US as an important colonial nation in the primary sense, they nevertheless fear the "economic imperialism" which they associate with the US, and, while seeking economic aid for their development, they will want to avoid any major limitation on what they conceive as their political and economic freedom.

The Commonwealth

The Commonwealth is merely a loose association of sovereign states which frequently consult on foreign policy matters. At such meetings, although joint policies are rarely adopted, attitudes are explored and the reasons for differences made understandable thereby attenuating centrifugal forces. No formal alliance binds the members, nor is there any obligation to act in concert or even to remain within the Commonwealth. Notwithstanding the flimsy legal ties between the members, a substantial functional unity exists, more pronounced in the case of the older English speaking dominions then in that of the recently admitted Asian dominions. For the first time, important disputes between members have been aired outside the Commonwealth, such as Kashmir case and South Africa's treatment of its Indian minority. On the whole, the historic evolutionary trend in the Empire from British domination to the independence of the major components will continue to favor separate rather than unified action on major international issues. Yet serious as the differences between some of the members may be, it seems likely that the Commonwealth relationship, in some measure, moderates their violence.

In the UN, the Commonwealth is not a voting bloc and follows no agreed line. However, the interaction of the opinions of the members frequently is an important factor in reducing the spread between the different positions. The UK, in its anxiety to maintain the tenuous Commonwealth bonds, often tries as far as possible to avoid taking positions that would alienate the Asian members, especially India, and at times the older dominions support the UK in this effort. Thus at the January 1951 London Conference of Prime Ministers which considered the Chinese Communist intervention in Korea, the Commonwealth as a whole agreed that all possibilities of diplomatic negotiation with Stalin [2] and Mao [3] should be exhausted and that any action tending to provoke further intervention by the PRC should be avoided. The Asian Commonwealth components undoubtedly exerted an important restraining influence even on those members which ordinarily are western oriented. This development contributed to a slowing down of the UN's reaction to Peiping's aggression, although the UK and the older dominions ultimately supported the condemnation of the PRC and the GA's recommendation of a selective embargo. The influence of the Asian members will continue to make itself felt in the attitude of the Commonwealth as a whole on issues involving international security, whenever there is general agreement among the members that the US is acting rashly and pressing too hard for UN action. However, this influence will not separate the UK and the older dominions from the US in the event of a showdown with the USSR. At the same time, the older members of the Commonwealth reciprocally exert some moderating influence on the extremism of the anti-Western views of India and Pakistan, and the Commonwealth itself is a potential medium for presenting the US viewpoint to the Asian dominions through those western oriented spokesmen.

The declining military position of the UK has weakened the once powerful unifying force of common defense objectives in the Commonwealth. At the same time, the older dominions have come to look increasingly to the US as the keystone of collective defense. This development lessens the possibility of any difference between the US and the Commonwealth as a whole on basic issues of collective security. In the economic and social fields, Commonwealth ties are stronger than in the political and military spheres since all members except Canada participate in the sterling bloc and imperial preference draws their economies together. For this reason, the US will frequently find itself at odds with the Commonwealth in the economic and social organs of the UN over such issues as trade restrictions, discrimination against the dollar and allocation of scarce raw materials.

The Latin American States

The twenty Latin American (LA) republics constitute the largest UN bloc numerically and are therefore of commanding importance.

[2] Iosif Vissarionovich Stalin, Chairman of the U.S.S.R. Council of Ministers, and Secretary General of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union.

[3] Mao Tse-tung, Chairman of the Central People's Government Council, People's Republic of China, and Chairman of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China.

These states have given strong and frequently unanimous voting support to the US in the UN on issues involving the East–West conflict. However, tangible support has been limited in implementing UN resolutions. Although the LAs frequently caucus on positions to be taken on major issues, they have not operated as a solid bloc on most questions despite general impressions to the contrary. They ordinarily unite in voting for members of their own group to fill important UN posts. However, on substantive matters they more often divide, particularly when special ideological, national or even personality factors enter into the situation.

The LA states have more often voted with than against the US and even when the majority differed with the US position, this was attributable to their desire to uphold some special interest rather than to support the USSR. Like the Arab and Asian groups, their disagreements with US aims in the UN stem from their status as relatively underdeveloped countries and express themselves in anti-colonialism, dissatisfaction with the amount of economic aid received from the US and fear of the inroads of foreign capital on their natural resources. Religious considerations led the majority of the LA states to differ with the US in favoring the internationalization of Jerusalem.

Editorial Note

In furtherance of a policy formulated in 1950 to conduct broad-gauge discussions and consultations both in scope and extent with other governments on matters coming before the United Nations and particularly the General Assembly, the Department of State despatched several communications (circular airgrams) to the field beginning in June. For the three basic circulars, see infra and pages 16 and 24. Many of the subjects are documented in substantive chapters which appear elsewhere in this volume or in the regional volumes of the Foreign Relations series. For a fourth circular which was sent out on September 12 and which dealt solely with the question of the amount of the United States contribution to the regular (administrative) budget of the United Nations, see page 162. For a fifth circular, dated October 6, which was concerned with the broad problem of financing economic development within the United Nations system, see page 30.

320/6–2751 : Circular airgram

The Secretary of State to Certain Diplomatic Missions [1]

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, June 27, 1951—8:45 a. m.

The Department has begun preparations for the next (sixth) regular session of the United Nations General Assembly to be held in Paris. The date for the convening of the session has been fixed as November 6, with the possibility that it might begin earlier, perhaps October 24.

1. Advance Diplomatic Consultations

For your background information we are planning to consult other friendly governments in advance of the Assembly with respect to (a) the broad program for the session; and (b) our positions on certain significant agenda items. In these consultations, the general program of action in the Assembly will probably be taken up first. In respect of both (a) and (b), however, consultations will be held on the basis of our tentative views in order that we may be able to take the views of other governments into account, insofar as possible, in the formulation of our final positions.

We will, therefore, over the next four months, send several communications relating to the question of the general program for the session, and setting forth appropriate background information and our tentative positions on a number of issues which you will be asked to discuss with the Foreign Office. We will parallel your approaches with consultations here in Washington with various diplomatic representatives and, through the USUN, with members of the permanent United Nations delegations in New York.

2. New Agenda Items

We would, as in previous years, appreciate any information you may receive regarding new agenda items which the government to which you are accredited is likely to raise for inclusion in the Assembly's agenda. In making any appropriate informal inquiries in this connection, however, you should not give any impression that we wish to stimulate the introduction of new items. In fact, in view of the size of the present agenda, the importance and urgency of a number of items, and the lateness of the session, we would be inclined to discourage the introduction of new items not strictly of an important and urgent character.

There is transmitted under separate cover for your background information a list prepared in the Department of items which are expected to be included in the agenda of the sixth Assembly.[2] You will note that bracketed items are not certain to be included in the agenda.

3. Composition of Delegations and Biographic Material

We would appreciate information with respect to the composition of other Delegations to the Assembly and any available information regarding the assignment of delegates to the Main Committees of the Assembly (Committee 1: Political and Security; Ad Hoc Political Committee; Committee 2: Economic and Financial; Committee 3: Social, Humanitarian and Cultural; Committee 4: Trusteeship; Committee 5: Administrative and Budgetary; Committee 6: Legal).

As for previous sessions the Department will prepare biographic sketches of the members of other Delegations for the background information of our Delegation. In this connection it would be appreciated if you would communicate to the Department biographic material on new delegates and any additional information on former delegates which has not previously been reported.

320/9–551: Circular airgram

The Acting Secretary of State to Certain Diplomatic Missions[1]

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, September 5, 1951—1:45 p. m.

As already indicated in Circular Airgram of June 27, 8:45 a.m., the Department hopes to consult widely in advance with other UN Members concerning the major issues which will arise at the Sixth Session of the UN General Assembly, scheduled to convene in Paris on November 6. The US Mission to the UN has already initiated such discussions in general terms with a number of Delegations in New York. Consultations on questions relating to trusteeship and non-self-governing territories are being held separately, some in Washington, some in the field; for this reason these questions are not dealt with in this message.

As a preliminary step to the discussion of our detailed positions on individual subjects which will be set forth in subsequent circulars, you are now requested to discuss with the Foreign Office at as high a level as practicable, general prospects for the Assembly, making such use of the following material as you consider desirable in setting forth

[1] Sent to USUN and 52 diplomatic missions for action; sent to Moscow, Praha, Warsaw, Saigon, Pusan, and Tokyo for information only.

US views. In your discussions you will, of course, wish to indicate that these views are tentative and subject to change in emphasis and substance in the light of any major developments which occur between now and the opening of the Assembly. For example, the Soviet maneuvers at the Japanese Peace Treaty Conference may cause us to alter our program in certain respects. (For your information, the following material is not intended as a summary of the entire US program; additional elements are under consideration and you will be sent any additional information in this connection as soon as decisions are made.)

1. Role of the GA in the Present Situation

This GA session promises to be unusually important. It will be essential to consolidate the gains made by the UN in Korea, and those made by the free world generally in developing its ability to resist aggression. Having inspired and guided the international Cominform policies which led to the present situation, the USSR is now exerting its efforts in a world-wide peace campaign. This campaign, which will presumably come to a climax in the Assembly, is intended to prevent the growing strength and unity of the free world from reaching full realization. With no basic change in objectives, strategy or position, the Soviet method of procedure is to demand adherence by all to a set of slogans or catchwords ostensibly directed toward peace, disarmament, peaceful coexistence, etc., with the implication that those refusing to accept these generalizations at face value are warmongers, reactionaries, imperialists, etc. The purpose of these tactics is to sow disunity among governments and peoples; to the extent that they succeed, the task of building up the defensive strength of the free world is hampered.

The task of moving forward toward the realization of UN and free world objectives does not, at this point, appear to require further major changes or adjustments in UN machinery. The steps already taken by the GA to develop the UN structure and adapt it to current realities are essential and sound. For our part, we will plan to devote our major energies to consolidating and perfecting the existing arrangements.

2. Major Questions in the GA

A. Korea

In view of the uncertainty as to an armistice it is difficult to foresee precisely what action will be required at the sixth Assembly session on the Korean question. If there is no armistice the GA will undoubtedly be asked to consider further measures against the aggressors. If an armistice is concluded we would expect the sixth GA (if such action has not already been taken by the present Assembly session), as a minimum, to take note of the armistice and to reaffirm UN objectives for Korea. It will be necessary for the sixth session to review the question of appropriate UN machinery in Korea. In addition, the Assembly will discuss the problem of rehabilitation, reconstruction and relief in Korea. It will be necessary in this connection for delegations to give increased support to the Korean reconstruction fund.

B. Work of the Collective Measures Committee

The Uniting for Peace resolution adopted by the last GA was designed to embody in UN practice the lessons learned in the Korean operation and to further the development of an effective collective security system. The report of the CMC will, we believe, embody a genuine advance in this field, and will, of course, be fully discussed. The essential aim at the sixth session with respect to this item should be to consolidate the gains of the Uniting for Peace program by appropriate action, including continuance of the CMC in order that it may complete the formative phase of the work assigned to it by the GA.

C. Economic and Social Problems

Adequate emphasis should be given to the varied problems of human welfare, and to the review of the continuing work of the UN on these problems, in the Second (Economic and Financial) and Third (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural) Committees.

In the economic field the general US objective may be simply described as an expanding world economy; most of the economic problems before the sixth session have a bearing on this objective. One of these problems is that of land reform. The UN is serving as a clearing house for information and a source of encouragement for this movement. The report of the Economic and Social Council on this project should warrant special attention in the Second Committee.

In the social field in the Third Committee our general objective is to further the freedom and well-being of the individual. Our proposed positions on many of the individual items in the economic and social fields will be dealt with in later communications.

D. Financial and Administrative Questions

There should in our view be no undue increase in the regular UN budget (i.e., the total budget figure should be in the neighborhood of 40 million dollars), and, within the amount voted, there should be greater concentration on activities of real priority and urgency. Our detailed views on the matter of the budget and other administrative and financial problems which will be considered in the Fifth Committee will be dealt with in subsequent messages.

3. Possible Soviet Themes

The main Soviet propaganda lines in the GA may include:

A. Proposals for a Five-Power Pact. A recent variant of this well-worn propaganda proposal would open the pact—once it was concluded among the Five Powers—to all other Members of the UN.

B. Proposals concerning "peaceful coexistence".

C. Intimations that the Soviet Union may permit some cultural and personal interchange with other countries.
D. Soviet "disarmament" proposals.
E. Attacks on the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

For the most part these are routine themes that have been played repeatedly at previous GA sessions. On those occasions the whole free world joined in exposing them as a fraud, and in declaring its own condemnation of the Soviet offenses against peaceful behavior, in the GA resolutions on "Essentials of Peace" and "Peace Through Deeds". Judged by the standard of these resolutions, Cominform policy is no more peaceful today than it was then, and any sudden protestations of peace should continue to be measured with a skepticism based on the record. For its part the US expects to analyze such proposals strictly on their merits, in the light of well-known and continuing facts of which we shall remind the GA.

We would appreciate the views of other governments as to the nature of probable Soviet proposals and tactics which would be most effective in placing them in proper perspective.

4. Length of Session

The recommendations for improving the methods and procedures of the Assembly, approved in 1949, contemplated sessions of 8 to 10 weeks as most desirable, and sessions have usually been completed in about 12 weeks. Because of the international crisis, it has been necessary for the Fifth Assembly to remain formally in session all this year. While the United States has strongly supported the continuance of the Fifth Session, we believe that this situation should be considered as exceptional.

It should, in our opinion, be possible to complete the essential work of the Sixth Session within the normal time. In view of the greatly increased expense of holding the session in Paris and the budget stringency in many countries, including the US, we assume that all delegations will wish to cooperate in holding the session to the minimum practicable length.

TOP SECRET NEW YORK, September 12, 1951.

DEAR JACK: Since your welcome visit to New York,[1] I have been thinking a great deal about the problems of the forthcoming General

[1] Assistant Secretary Hickerson was at USUN in New York on August 22, consulting with USUN staff on pre-General Assembly matters.

Assembly which we discussed together. I am persuaded by further consideration that the United States will need to project a large and positive theme. The fundamental problem before us has been well stated in the August 24 draft paper prepared in UNP entitled "United States Program in the General Assembly".[2]

All of us, I think, are agreed that we must "formulate a comprehensive United States program for the General Assembly that can meet our expected policy requirements at that time; serve as the main focus of attention in the General Assembly; and be clear and positive enough to enable the United States Delegation to maintain the initiative and to present our position in each Committee as part of a coherent over-all policy".

What I am not yet sure about is whether we have found the answer to this problem. I have considered the draft paper together with the staff here, and set forth our views herein.

I am sure you will agree that the United States theme at the General Assembly should be positive, vital and uplifting. Our greatest asset, it seems to me, is at once our simplest and our grandest concept: the idea of freedom.

Ambassador Sayre[3] has called to my attention a quotation from Abraham Lincoln which expresses beautifully the inter-connection between the free institutions of the United States and the promotion of human freedom everywhere:

"What constitutes the bulwark of our own liberty and independence? It is not our frowning battlements, our bristling sea coasts. Our reliance is in the love of liberty which God has planted in us. Our defense is in the spirit which prizes the liberty of all men, in all lands, everywhere."

It is obviously in our national interest to support and uphold that spirit which prizes the liberty of all men. The General Assembly provides a unique forum for the upholding of that spirit. I should therefore like to see our chief activities at the Assembly converge around the central theme of "the foundations of freedom", or "the promotion of freedom", or whatever form of words you like which embodies this thought.

Much of our work in the Assembly can be related to this theme. Thus, if we are able to advance what the draft position paper calls "a positive and realistic program for the reduction and control of armaments", we will be contributing significantly to freedom by limiting the capacity of aggressors to threaten freedom. The same may be said of our program for advancing the work of the Collective Measures Committee, which protects freedom by helping to build a universal collective security system. The work of the free nations in the economic and social fields can likewise be emphasized as building the economic and social foundations necessary for the establishment and maintenance of human freedom. The United Nations work in the field of trusteeship and non-self-governing territories lends itself obviously to this treatment.

I am sure you will also agree that what the world needs now is deeds more than words. We should therefore not only proclaim the objectives of the free world; we should show what progress the free world is actually making and what forward steps we envisage to make human freedom a worldwide reality.

By seizing the initiative at the outset of the Assembly with such a statement, we can counter the expected Soviet peace offensive through proposing a more realistic and hopeful alternative to the world than the one the Soviets offer. The world situation demands more of us than merely a counterattack against the Russians. Mere negative criticism is not enough. What I am suggesting is that, in addition to showing how and where the Russians are wrong, we should propose a positive and concrete program for the achievement of human freedom throughout the world.

Part of this approach might be historical. We could point to the six years of work of the United Nations in building the foundations of freedom in the political, economic, social and educational fields, and compare with this Soviet achievements during the same period. More important are projects for the future. We should suggest practicable programs for the future building of these same foundations by proposing what the free world should do, not just say. The contrast with what the Russians say will be so obvious that the world will readily draw the moral.

Something of what I have in mind can be achieved by carefully coordinated speeches and public relations activities. Basically, however, its achievement rests on the positive content of our program. As I said above, the world needs deeds more than words. We must therefore decide what we can do, or at least propose doing, that will help build the foundations of freedom. If we feel that we cannot afford the money for any new programs of economic development, for instance, then we should exercise our ingenuity in proposing deeds which will not cost so much money, and in talking about the things we have done and will continue to do in such a way as to carry conviction that we are not merely paying lip service to these great ideas.

On Korea, we think that even if we should decide to "keep the problem of the political settlement of the Korean situation out of the Assembly", we will want to have the Assembly reaffirm the United Nations political objectives in Korea. We feel there might be advantages in the General Assembly appointing after armistice a United Nations representative to assist the General Assembly in effecting a political settlement in Korea. In addition, we imagine that we would want the Assembly to take some action initiating, authorizing or approving whatever steps are taken outside the United Nations towards a political settlement in Korea. On Korean relief, we are considering some proposals designed "to encourage wide participation in relief programs by non-official groups throughout the world". We hope to be able to send something specific on these points to the Department soon.

On the Collective Measures Committee, we think that it would probably be advantageous to have the Assembly adopt a substantive resolution embodying various recommendations to members on steps which they might take to further the development of an effective universal collective security system. We also agree that we should press for continuance of the Collective Measures Committee for another year so that it can finish the formative aspect of the Uniting for Peace Program. We agree that consideration should be given to making the POC more useful and effective, and we hope to send you some specific proposals on that question in the near future.

On the control and reduction of armaments, we agree in the formulation of what is necessary. We would only underscore what the Department has no doubt already thought of: that we will need something more than a reiteration of our previous positions in this field if we are to fill the bill of "a positive and realistic program . . . designed to convince other delegations that we intend to reduce armaments when the necessary conditions have been met."

On the problem of meeting Soviet propaganda suggestions for East–West negotiations and the Five Power Pact, it seems to us that basically this is a question of how the United States establishes an initiative in the General Assembly and retains the momentum of prior resolutions (Essentials of Peace, Peace through Deeds, etc.) The adoption of a broad theme of freedom would be part of our initiative. Relating specific proposals and agenda items to this theme would be another part. In addition, the importance of deeds rather than words can be shown by an outline by the Secretary in his opening statement of the real causes of tension.

On the general economic and social themes, we feel that the United States will not be able to make much progress politically or propagandawise unless proposals of more substance can be made. General advocacy of increased productivity and an expanding economy is not enough. In fact, it may even boomerang if we leave to the rest of the world the task of reconciling our advocacy of expansion with (a) our earlier opposition to the International Development Authority, which many of the underdeveloped countries rightly or wrongly regard as a major method of achieving the recommended expansion, (b) our attitude on East–West trade. It seems clear, therefore, that the expanding economy theme, to be effective, should be accompanied by substantive proposals for making fuller use of the United Nations as an instrumentality for economic and social advance.

We are not in a position here to put forward detailed proposals, but suggest that the following topics, in addition to those mentioned in the Department's draft paper of August 24, might be investigated:

(a) The conditions under which more technical assistance might be channeled through the United Nations, and more nations might be brought to participate more fully in the program;

(b) The presentation of a more affirmative attitude toward the creation of an International Development Authority. If there is need for international development, as we assume there is, and if the United States is meeting that need at least in part, we do not think that many other countries will be profoundly impressed by the United States argument against such an authority on the ground that the United States would be almost the only contributor;

(c) If we cannot indicate in an affirmative way the conditions under which the establishment of an International Development Authority could come about with United States support, we might be able to offer some hopeful suggestions concerning implementation of the ECOSOC recommendation for exploring the establishment of "an International Finance Corporation to promote the financing of productive private enterprise either through loans without government guarantee, through equity investments or by other methods intended for the same purpose";

(d) The Community Development Employment scheme worked out in Greece by a United Nations Technical Assistance expert, and now being tried out also in Ecuador, appears to offer substantial possibilities for capitalizing on local initiative and expediting economic development at minimum cost. Perhaps the United States could encourage Greece or Ecuador to emphasize the potentialities of this scheme in a manner which would underscore the importance of national and local efforts in the development field and correspondingly reduce the pressure for large-scale international action;

(e) The feasibility of international action to stabilize commodity prices should be investigated. The receipts of underdeveloped countries from their exports of copper, rubber, jute, tin, wool, hemp, tobacco, etc. now vary so much from year to year that it is hard for them to make practical long-range plans for economic development. At the same time, the expenditures of the more developed countries in Western Europe for the raw materials they have to import are subject to variations that jeopardize their rearmament and recovery programs. For contrary reasons, therefore, proposals looking toward greater stabilization might evoke wide-scale support. We have no recommendations as to what the United States might propose by way of international action (more International Wheat Agreements, other types of long-term commitments, creation of international buffer stocks, etc.) but we suggest that the problem merits imaginative consideration. If an overall approach is impractical, action with respect to one or two commodities might be suggested.

The foregoing would be in addition to the suggestions in the August 24 paper regarding increased productivity and land reform, which we agree are useful items. In this connection we have also thought about the possibility of Assembly action along the lines of the recent OEEC statement on increased productivity and the prospect of a better life after the needs of rearmament have been met. We were much struck by the exchange of telegrams on this subject and the related subject of a possible NATO initiative in this field between London, The Hague and the Department—more struck by the telegrams, in fact, than by the OEEC product. It seems to us that this sort of thing would be useful and heartening, particularly with the Assembly in Paris; and it occurred to us that the United Nations members of OEEC might conceivably wish to co-sponsor in the Assembly a resolution setting forth these views.

We assume that the sections of the draft paper on human rights will be amended along the lines of the Department's present thinking on Soviet violations of human rights. Our specific comments on this subject are being sent separately to the Department.

In the field of trusteeship and non-self-governing territories, we are attempting to develop a specific proposal which we hope to be able to send to the Department soon.

On all other substantive parts of the Department's paper, we have no comments at present.

Sincerely yours, WARREN R. AUSTIN

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, September 27, 1951—1 : 45 p. m.

Reference is made to the Department's circular airgrams of June 27, 8 : 45 a. m. and September 5, 1 : 45 p. m. There are indicated below the Department's tentative positions on a number of items which will be considered at the sixth session of the General Assembly. You are requested, in your discretion, to outline these views to the Foreign Office and report its reactions as soon as possible. In your discussions you should, of course, indicate that these positions are tentative and that we will wish to take into account the views of other friendly Governments in formulating our final positions. Any significant information you obtain which in the form of an airgram would not reach the Department by October 12 should be cabled.

There is attached for your background information a copy of the provisional agenda of the sixth session of the GA which was communicated by the Secretary General of the UN to Member Governments on September 7.[2] Detailed background information on most of the issues involved may be found in the President's Annual Reports

1. Libya

The UN Commissioner, with the assistance of the UN Advisory Council, has, we believe, painstakingly and constructively carried out the responsibilities assigned to him by the GA. The progress of Libya toward independence has, of course, been made possible chiefly by the efforts of the Libyans themselves, with the advice and guidance of the Commissioner and the cooperation of the Administering Authorities (UK and France).

The Department hopes and expects that all powers previously exercised by the Administering Authorities will, by the date fixed by the GA (i.e., by January 1, 1952) "have been transferred to the duly constituted Libyan Government". Proclamation of independence is expected to follow thereafter, together with the assumption by Emir (Idris Al Senusi) of his position as constitutional monarch of United Libya.

It is likely that certain states in the GA (Egypt, possibly Pakistan and other Arab states) will challenge the legality of the Libyan constitutional development and may even suggest that the General Assembly repudiate all that has been done and adopt some new course providing for temporary UN supervision, such as direct trusteeship. Specifically, these states may make such allegations as the following: (a) the National Assembly (which prepared the constitution) should have been an elected rather than an appointed body (Egypt has contended previously that only an elected National Assembly in which the three parts of Libya (Cyrenaica, Tripolitania and The Fezzan) were represented in proportion to their population could properly represent the people of Libya in the constitution-making process; Tripolitania has by far the largest population and such a scheme would put Tripolitania in a position to dominate the other two parts of Libya.); (b) the form of government should be unitary rather than federal; and (c) the present federation plan is merely a disguised method of maintaining old imperialist control over Libya by the interested great powers.

The Department considers it essential that allegations of this character be decisively repudiated by a large majority. The pertinent background facts are as follows:

(a) The Libyan National Assembly is "duly representative" of the inhabitants of Libya. That it is not an elected body does not alter this fact. The indigenous political leadership of Cyrenaica and The Fezzan would agree to enter a National Assembly with representatives of Tripolitania only on the basis of equal representation for all parts of Libya. Furthermore, the procedure followed in the selection of representatives to the National Assembly was decided upon by the UN Commissioner with the concurrence of the UN Advisory Council and after full consultation with the responsible Libyan political figures and the local French and British administrators.

(b) The idea of federation has not in any way been imposed upon the Libyans. The Libyan National Assembly itself recognized a federal system as the only feasible basis on which unity and independence could be established. Last fall the Ad Hoc Political Committee of the GA in its report to the Assembly stated that . . . "The form of State to be created, and whether it would be a unitary or a federal State, must be left entirely to the representatives of the Libyan people, meeting and consulting in a National Assembly". The federal plan has been freely chosen by the representatives of Libya and any attempt by the GA to impose or demand a tighter unitary form of government would destroy the only basis on which Libyan unity can possibly be achieved.

(c) Each of the three parts of Libya insists upon having a wide measure of control over its own local affairs under the new Libyan Government. Cyrenaica, in particular, has made it clear that it would not voluntarily participate in any government other than one based on a federal system which ensured that Tripolitania would not interfere in purely local Cyrenaican affairs. The Emir of Cyrenaica, who has been invited by the National Assembly to become King of Libya, will obviously not assume that role if under the constitution Tripolitania is placed in a position to dominate the other two parts of Libya and control the National Parliament, as would result from the Egyptian unitary thesis.

All Members of the free world have a vital interest in the rational and stable development of an independent and unified Libya. We are convinced that disruption of the federal plan now agreed upon would plunge Libya into political chaos, destroy all chance of unity, open the way to political agitation and violence, generally prevent the maintenance of stability in the entire area and assist Soviet efforts to penetrate the Middle East.

Accordingly, it is essential that the GA (a) give decisive support to the way in which Libya's independence has evolved, recognizing that independence and unity can be achieved only if the difficult elements in the complex Libyan political picture are reconciled and given due recognition in the constitution; and (b) reject any charges along the lines indicated above.

2. The Greek Question

In its annual report, which was signed on August 15, UNSCOB recommended to the GA that it:

(a) re-assert the importance of maintaining peace in the Balkans, continue its efforts to eliminate the threat to Greece by considering ways and means to achieve peaceful cooperation between Greece and her neighbors from which the threat stems, and to this end re-affirm its recommendations to the appropriate states regarding (1) cessation of assistance and support to the Greek guerrillas; (2) renewal of diplomatic and good-neighborly relations; (3) renewal, revision or establishment of frontier conventions; (4) disarming and disposition of Greek guerrillas; (5) prohibition of sending arms and war materials to Albania and Bulgaria until their unlawful assistance to the guerrillas has ceased; (6) repatriation of Greek military personnel, children and other Greek nationals; and (7) cooperation of the states concerned with the appropriate UN body, particularly as regards the prompt and impartial investigation of their complaints and allegations;

(b) take note of the evidence concerning the existence in Eastern and Central Europe of a network for the training and sending into Greece of guerrilla agents for subversive purposes;

(c) take into account the changed but continuing threat to Greece within the context of the hostile attitude towards Greece of a number of Eastern and Central European states, particularly Bulgaria, and consequent tension in the Balkans; and (d) consider the advisability of maintaining UN vigilance over the Balkans in the light of the present nature of the threat to peace in that area.

In the GA the United States will support the UNSCOB report and will place major emphasis on the Special Committee's recommendations given in (c) and (d) immediately above; these two points are, in our view, the central issues to which the General Assembly should address itself. The Department does not believe that any mention of further conciliation efforts should be included in this year's GA resolution since there has been no evidence of willingness on the part of Albania and Bulgaria to enter in good faith upon genuine conciliation talks. However, we are confident that, if and when there is some genuine basis for conciliation, adequate resources and instrumentalities already exist within the UN to discharge the conciliation function. The Department believes that the present UN machinery may require some re-organization and reduction in size with a view to efficiency and economy and in the interest of better adapting the machinery to the present and foreseeable needs of the Balkan situation. At the last GA some delegations recognized that some such re-organization might well be needed if observation machinery were to continue in 1952. Our tentative view is that a smaller body, of perhaps 3–5 members, functioning under the Peace Observation Commission, might supervise the work of the observer corps, review their reports and submit reports as necessary to a higher UN authority. This matter will be discussed in detail with Greece and the Governments represented on UNSCOB and our final position must necessarily await the outcome of these consultations.

We assume that the Soviet states in the GA will indulge in their usual diversionist maneuvers when the Greek question is considered, i.e., these states can be expected to renew their charges against the Greek Government regarding mass executions of "patriots", etc. The Department assumes that this Soviet tactic is now so shop-worn that all Delegations will cooperate in disposing rapidly of such charges.

3. Report of the Committee of Twelve

In his speech before the GA on October 24, 1950, President Truman suggested that it might be useful to explore ways in which the work of the UN Atomic Energy Commission and Commission for Conventional Armaments could be more closely brought together, and to consider whether there should be a new and consolidated disarmament commission. The GA subsequently (on December 13, 1950) established a Committee of Twelve (SC Members and Canada) and instructed it to report to the forthcoming GA session "on ways and means whereby the work of the AEC and CCA may be coordinated and on the advisability of their functions being merged and placed under a new and consolidated disarmament commission". On August 23, 1951 the Committee of Twelve adopted a resolution recommending to the GA that it establish a new commission (which would be under and report to the SC) to carry forward the tasks presently assigned to the AEC and CCA. The Committee also recommended that the AEC and CCA be dissolved by appropriate action upon the establishment of the new commission.

The United States will support the adoption of a resolution in the GA establishing a new commission and setting forth in detail its organization and functions. In general such a resolution would provide that (a) the new Commission should be composed of Members of the SC plus Canada; (b) it should have as its primary task the preparation of comprehensive and coordinated plans for effective international control of all armaments and armed forces, including atomic energy, these plans to provide for regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armaments and armed forces, including internal security and police forces; (c) it should devote its efforts toward effective international control of atomic energy to the extent necessary to ensure the prohibition of atomic weapons and the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only, using as the basis the UN plan unless and until a better and no less effective system can be devised.

4. Presidency of the GA

We do not know of any candidates for this post except from the Latin American area. From this area there are four announced candidates: Padilla Nervo (Mexico), Henriquez-Urena (Dominican Republic), Costa du Rels (Bolivia), and Belaunde (Peru), and Santa Cruz (Chile) may also be a candidate. On the basis of present indications it is our impression that support for Padilla Nervo is increasing, and FYI the Department believes that he is the most able of the candidates. In connection with the formulation of our position, the Department would appreciate any information you obtain regarding the views of other governments on this matter, particularly information as to commitments made to any of the candidates.

5. Council Slates

Security Council

The United States will support Pakistan to replace India (although we are not yet making a public announcement to this effect), and a Latin American state to replace Ecuador. The announced candidates for the Latin American post are Chile and El Salvador. The Department is interested in ascertaining the views of Latin American and other governments regarding these candidates (but FYI only we favor Chile and may take steps to advance its candidacy). The term of Yugoslavia also expires. We most strongly oppose the election of a Soviet state to this post. Although we have as yet taken no decision as to which state we will support for the post, we would be prepared to support Greece, which is a candidate, if it obtains sufficient support, or some other non-Soviet state (Ethiopia, Thailand, Lebanon or the Philippines might be considered in this connection).

Economic and Social Council

The terms of the following states expire: Belgium, India, China, France, Chile and Peru. The United States will support (a) the re-election of China and France and (b) the election of two Latin American states to replace Chile and Peru, for which there are the following announced candidates: Colombia, Cuba, Argentina and Haiti, and it is probable that Bolivia will also be a candidate. Our decision on this matter will be influenced by the views of the Latin American governments.

The Department has not yet taken any decision as to which states we will support for the other two ECOSOC posts. Belgium and India are seeking re-election and other announced candidates are Egypt, Australia and Burma. We would appreciate any information as to which candidates other governments intend to support for these two posts.

6. Draft Code of Offenses Against the Peace and Security of Mankind

Pursuant to previous GA resolutions, the International Law Commission completed in July and forwarded to the GA a code of offenses against the peace and security of mankind. In the Sixth Committee the United States will take the position that no final action should be taken on this matter at the sixth Assembly session since governments have not had adequate opportunity to study in detail a matter of such importance and seriousness. Specifically, the United States would support a resolution which would (a) thank the ILC for its work; (b) request the Secretary General to transmit the draft code to governments for their comments and to forward the comments of governments to the ILC; and (c) request the ILC to give further study to the draft code with a view to its possible revision in the light of the comments submitted by governments and the debates in the Sixth Committee.

ACHESON

320/10–651 : Circular airgram

The Acting Secretary of State to Certain Diplomatic Missions [1]

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, October 6, 1951—8 : 20 a. m.

Reference is made to the Department's circular airgrams of June 27, September 5, and September 27 regarding the forthcoming session of the General Assembly. There are set forth below essential background material and views of the Department concerning the problem of financing economic development, which will be the most important item on the agenda of the Assembly's second (Economic and Financial) committee. You are requested in your discretion to outline our views to the appropriate officials of the foreign office and report reactions as soon as possible. For your information, it has been apparent in previous UN meetings (particularly ECOSOC) that some delegates speak and vote according to their personal views and not on the basis of a governmental position. In fact delegates have on occasion supported positions that appear to have been contrary to those of the responsible home government. It is, therefore, important in discussing our views with the foreign office that you express the hope that its delegation will be instructed on this issue—preferably in support of the U.S. position.

Financing economic development has been a perennial agenda item of ECOSOC and more recently of the General Assembly. The position of many underdeveloped countries is that international financing facilities, i.e. private foreign investment, International Bank loans, and Eximbank loans, are inadequate to their needs for external capital; since, they say, many essential development projects are of a non-self-liquidating nature and cannot be financed by loan capital or by private investment. Therefore they seek "grant" aid for such projects as roads, irrigation systems and the like. Pressure for international grant aid has been given impetus by recommendations in two recent publications, the Rockefeller Report "Partners in Progress" and the report by a Group of Experts appointed by the SYG of the UN on "Measures for the Economic Development of Underdeveloped Countries". Both of these reports recommend the establishment of an International Development Authority to provide substantial grant aid to governments of underdeveloped countries as a supplement to international loan financing. All governments would be invited to participate in the IDA but in fact the funds that the IDA would make available would have to come largely from the U.S.

The most recent action on the issue of an international agency to provide grant funds for economic development was taken at the 13th session of ECOSOC in a resolution which called for further study of and report on the subject. The U.S. Government agreed to the ECOSOC resolution to continue study of the subject but made clear that it is unprepared at this time to support the establishment of an IDA. The U.S. believes that the resources of existing international financing institutions are adequate to the need, especially when supplemented by the grant aid programs of developed countries. (For fuller exposition of U.S. position on IDA see below.) Notwithstanding known U.S. opposition to the idea, a strong concerted effort to force the issue is likely to be made at the General Assembly. It is, therefore, desirable that you explain the U.S. position to the government to which you are accredited and where politic seek to secure support for that position.

Outlined below are the main elements of the U.S. position on the subject of financing economic development.

U.S. Position on Financing Economic Development

Economic development can be accelerated through a wider application of improved technology and an increasing rate of capital formation, particularly in selected areas of the economy. The primary responsibility for economic development, the planning, the organizing, the executing, and the financing rests with the local government concerned. The international community can help but it can at most do only a fraction of the job. The extraordinary progress that some underdeveloped countries have made in recent years is attributable to domestic effort and energy for which there is no international substitute. In those countries where development has lagged, the problem in largest part has been the failure of the governments concerned to plan development programs, to translate these programs into concrete projects, to mobilize domestic resources for their execution, and to utilize effectively the international capital and technical assistance that is available from existing institutions. At the present time, when the financial position of many underdeveloped countries has improved, it is particularly important that domestic efforts to promote development be intensified.

A. The role of underdeveloped areas.

(1) Realistic planning of their investment programs and the establishment of a system of priorities for the investment of available capital: domestic effort can be supplemented by the technical assistance available through the UN, its regional commissions and specialized agencies, and through bilateral programs.

(2) Improved mobilization of domestic savings: technical assistance is available in this field.

(3) Optimum use of foreign exchange resources for economic development: this must apply not only to such resources obtained through foreign grants and loans but also and primarily to the foreign exchange proceeds from exports. In this regard, it is important to realize that, since 1949, the external financial position of many underdeveloped areas has improved significantly:

(a) Increase in prices and volume of raw material sales has enlarged export receipts of underdeveloped countries.

(b) Terms of trade have moved in favor of underdeveloped countries, i.e. the prices of goods they import have, in general, risen less than the prices of goods they export.

(c) As a result, the reserve position (gold and foreign exchange) of most underdeveloped countries has improved and the volume of their imports, including imports of capital goods from Europe and the U.S., has greatly increased.

(4) Full utilization of existing international financing facilities, both public and private, in order to secure additional resources which the economy can use effectively.

B. U.S. action to promote economic development of underdeveloped areas.

For its part, the U.S. Government, notwithstanding the need to divert resources to the defense effort, has given and will continue to give strong support to the export of both capital and technology to promote economic development. Specifically:

(1) U.S. Government has made and will continue to make loan capital available for economic development through the U.S. Eximbank. (In the period July 1945–June 1951 Eximbank authorized loans to underdeveloped countries in excess of $1 billion.) The present Congress has just authorized an increase in Eximbank lending authority of $1 billion.

(2) U.S. Government has supported and will continue to support economic development activities of IBRD. U.S. Government has made its subscription freely available; has facilitated flotation of Bank bonds in U.S. capital market; has encouraged the Bank to give increased attention to economic development, to enlarge its technical assistance activities, to adopt flexible policies.

(3) U.S. Government has tried to stimulate private capital outflow by such measures as investment treaties, tax treaties, tax credits, and government guaranties against such risks as inconvertibility and expropriation. (At present time, guaranties against extraordinary risks of private foreign investment are made only by ECA. U.S. Executive asked 81st Congress to authorize guaranties by Eximbank to cover new private investments anywhere in free world but Congress did not act on proposal.) The net outflow of U.S. private long-term capital to the underdeveloped countries in the period 1947–1950 has been approximately $2 billion.

(4) U.S. Government has supported ECOSOC proposal that IBRD explore desirability and feasibility of establishing an International Finance Corporation to promote the financing of productive private enterprise through loans without government guarantee, through equity investments, or by other appropriate means.

(5) U.S. Government has supported and will continue support technical assistance program of UN and OAS and will itself provide technical assistance on a bilateral basis where requested.

(6) U.S. Government recognizes that some underdeveloped countries whose internal resources and external borrowing capacity is limited require extraordinary aid to achieve momentum in the development process. Consequently President has requested and U.S. Congress will probably authorize grant aid funds for economic development, including technical assistance, of between $400–$500 million for this fiscal year. (Note that bulk of proposed grant aid is for Asia and Near East. Aid to Latin America will continue in form technical assistance and loans.)

(7) While first priority in the allocation of scarce goods must necessarily go to support the military effort, U.S. Government recognizes that economic development is an essential element in the total concept of "defense" of free world. Therefore the U.S. Government is assisting underdeveloped countries in obtaining priorities for equipment for economic development. One of the important functions of certain U.S. Government departments is to present the requirements of foreign countries to U.S. allocating and production authorities so that the needs of foreign countries both for maintaining essential civilian activities and for economic development can be met.

(8) U.S. mobilization policy is not restrictive but expansionist. We are expanding capacity at home and helping to expand it abroad so that the productive base can be established to support both an adequate defense establishment and the economic development requirements of the free world.

C. U.S. position on non-self-liquidating projects and International Development Authority.

(1) Non-self-liquidating projects. Many projects basic to economic development, such as irrigation and drainage systems, roads, etc., are not in themselves self-liquidating, i.e., they do not yield revenues directly either in domestic or foreign exchange to repay the costs of the investment although they do make an important indirect contribution to national income, productivity, export potential, etc. Underdeveloped countries claim that projects of this character cannot be financed by loans and require grant aid. In fact, both the International Bank and the Export-Import Bank have indicated their interest in and willingness to finance non-self-liquidating projects which contribute indirectly to increased productivity, and both institutions have in fact extended loans on many occasions to finance projects of this character, e.g., IBRD loans for road and telecommunications development in Ethiopia, power development in India, Export-

Import Bank loans for road development in Bolivia, irrigation works in Afghanistan, etc. Moreover, the improved balance of payments position and prospects of most underdeveloped countries has enhanced their ability to finance non-self-liquidating projects with their own resources as well as to assume larger debt obligations in order to accelerate investment in this field.

(2) International Development Authority. The U.S. Government is not prepared at this time to support the establishment of an international agency for the purpose of distributing grants. No organization can be truly international in character unless a sufficient number of countries are able to make effective and significant contributions to it. At the present time it would be unrealistic to assume that substantial contributions would be forthcoming from members of the United Nations generally to an international development authority such as has been proposed. Developed countries which were formerly substantial exporters of capital are not in a position now to provide additional funds for grant aid over and above their present commitments. In fact, many members of the International Bank have found it difficult to permit the Bank to use the funds they subscribed initially to the Bank's capital. Similarly, members of the United Nations have found it difficult to make substantial contributions to other international undertakings, such as the relief and reconstruction of Korea and the settlement of Palestine refugees. But, to be genuinely international should obviously be a prerequisite for any such development authority.

This does not mean that grant assistance will not be made available where needed. Many governments, including that of the U.S., have made available grant assistance for economic development over recent years and will doubtless continue to do so. Metropolitan powers have provided grant assistance for the economic development of their dependent territories. Members of the British Commonwealth have recently announced their intention to make grants-in-aid in support of the Colombo Plan, for the more rapid economic development of countries in the area of South and Southeast Asia. The President of the U.S. has requested and the Congress will shortly authorize the provision of grant funds for investment in such basic fields as agriculture, health, education and transport in underdeveloped countries that need extraordinary assistance.

This does mean that such grant aid as is likely to be made available in the foreseeable future can effectively be made available without creating new international agencies and without establishing grant aid as a normal feature of international cooperation.

Department would appreciate early response from you regarding 1) local government's views on U.S. position, and 2) instructions local government plans to give its delegation to G.A.

It may be helpful in your discussions with officials of the government to have data available which indicate that the country is, in fact, making economic progress and is receiving substantial international aid under established institutions. Department will airgram within next few days data where available and relevant on the specific country to which you are accredited relating to its improved financial and trade position, to the volume of external assistance country has received in postwar period, and other like information.

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, October 8, 1951.

DEAR SENATOR AUSTIN: Thank you for your most thoughtful and helpful letter on the problems of the forthcoming General Assembly. I agree entirely with the thought, which you express so well, that a really positive central theme for all of our chief activities at the Assembly is needed, and it seems clear to me also that the idea of freedom is necessarily a main element in that theme.

As you know, we have given a good deal of thought to a central theme for our work in the Assembly—in fact, we began our consideration of the General Assembly program in that way. We recognize that, although it is possible to relate all our major objectives to a single idea or formula, a fully effective presentation will require considerable stress on at least several major ideas. One of these is certainly freedom; and as you say, our general program is certainly to enlarge freedom everywhere. However, we believe it is evident that much stress needs to be given also to the ideas of national security, of peace and of human welfare, particularly economic welfare. For example, we must not permit the Russians to appear to be the exponents and defenders of peace. In my mind, therefore, each of these ideas needs to receive great stress, according to circumstances, in our major activities in the Assembly.

Of course, a question arises concerning the most effective method of presentation. I agree with you that there is much that we can do in the Secretary's speech and in all our major pronouncements to relate our activities to central themes. Moreover, these central themes can and should be used in the preparation of our statements in the non-political committees so as to relate our positions on individual points to our large objectives. Of course, I agree with you that our emphasis must be on acts, not on mere words, and I take it that the record of the United States has been and is such that we can make this kind of presentation without difficulty. As to the specific comments contained in your letter, I believe members of your staff are now receiving or will receive our position papers which reflect the Department's thinking in some detail.

With respect to the economic and social themes, while we agree that we should, if possible, advance proposals of more substance than those which you have seen, it is nevertheless extremely difficult to do so in the light of the present temper of Congress.

We have, however, found your particular suggestions very useful and, in fact, it is at present contemplated that several of them will be incorporated into the instructions to the delegation.

As to the first suggestion, we are planning to make a strong speech in support of the United Nations and Specialized Agencies' Technical Assistance program and to make several proposals to liberalize and strengthen it. We will call for general support and contributions by all countries.

It is impossible to give United States support to the proposal for the International Development Authority, owing to the present attitude of Congress. We agree that this will be a particularly difficult issue in the Second Committee. We will, however, show our interest in the development of more concrete plans for an International Finance Corporation.

We plan, in connection with our technical assistance speech, to give particular support to schemes such as the Community Development Employment plan to which you refer. We believe that such schemes: (a) are effective as techniques to channel assistance into a country; (b) reach down to the popular level and bring the organizations effectively to the attention of the "Man in the street"; and (c) throw desirable emphasis upon self help.

The Department recognizes the desirability of reconsidering its position on price stabilization. It is possible that a new line may be taken at this Assembly, if the necessary interdepartmental clearances can be obtained in time to do so.

After discussing the ECA productivity proposal briefly with the officers of ECA most familiar with the matter, it appears that the plan is so closely tied up with the industrial countries and with Europe that it would not make a particularly suitable theme of the Assembly.

The Department has noted Mr. Lubin's [1] recent cable from Geneva in which he suggested the undesirability of the United States placing too much emphasis on anti-Soviet propaganda themes and in which he suggested the desirability of examining the subject of food and famine as a possible issue on which the United States might take a positive position. We are giving this matter active consideration and discussing it with other interested agencies.

I am pleased to see the free and active collaboration between your staff and the staff of UNA in the interchange of ideas and in the other preparations for the Assembly. We shall be glad to receive any further papers or ideas on the individual subjects which you or your staff may have in mind.

During these final weeks of preparation, much depends upon the pre-Assembly consultations on the agenda items which your staff has started with other Delegations, particularly the United Kingdom, France, and Canada.[2] I am most anxious that this program of consultations move ahead rapidly and that the consultations broaden out to include a large number of representative delegations. As you know, progress on many of the subjects depends upon securing agreement of other friendly delegations. In this way, your staff is performing a most essential function in our Assembly preparations.

I am looking forward to discussing these matters with you in more detail in person soon.

Sincerely yours, JOHN D. HICKERSON

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy United States Representative on the Security Council and Senior Adviser, United States Delegation to the General Assembly (Ross)

CONFIDENTIAL [PARIS,] November 21, 1951.

Subject: Secretary's Conversation with Mr. Trygve Lie

Participants: Mr. Trygve Lie, Secretary General of the United Nations
The Secretary of State
Mr. John Ross
Mr. Lucius Battle

Mr. Lie called on the Secretary by appointment at the Embassy at 9:30 this morning and stayed for about twenty minutes.

Mr. Lie said that the two major obstacles he encountered in his work were (a) Soviet Communism and (b) American isolationism.

He felt that the United Nations must go at "convoy speed", that is, that the convoy (The United Nations) should not go faster than the slowest ship (the United States).

He said that the Russians had suffered a series of defeats, namely, in Korea, at San Francisco, at Ottawa and at the beginning of this Assembly in Paris. He said he had an idea that the Russians wanted to make "contact" but in a face-saving manner.

Considering his responsibilities as Secretary General, Mr. Lie said he was trying to think of areas where "contact" might be established. In this connection he mentioned the German question and membership.

With regard to the German question the Secretary observed that he did not foresee any possibility of the Russians willingly sacrificing their position in East Germany; on the contrary, their effort was to establish a foothold in West Germany.

On the membership question Mr. Lie, stating his belief in the principle of universality of membership, wondered whether American public opinion would stand for the admission of the Soviet satellites at this time in return for the admission of such countries as Italy, Ireland and Finland. Mr. Lie felt there would be strong public opinion in the United States in favor of admitting the latter three states.

Mr. Ross indicated his belief that American public opinion was very strongly opposed to the admission of the Soviet satellites at this time. He felt that the only key to the membership question at this time was the admission of Italy. Mr. Lie doubted that the Italians would yield on the admission of Italy alone.

Mr. Lie felt that there was no harm in his continuing to try to find possible areas of "contact".

The principal purpose of Mr. Lie's call, as he himself quite frankly indicated, was to be in the position of having seen the Secretary, not having seen him for approximately a year past.

JOHN ROSS

II. PROBLEMS ARISING UNDER THE UNITED STATES–UNITED NATIONS HEADQUARTERS AGREEMENT OF 1947, AND RELATED MATTERS[1]

L/UNA Files,[2] Lot 62 D 205, "Passports; Procedures & Standards"

The Comptroller General of the United States (Warren) to the Secretary of State

WASHINGTON, January 10, 1951.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Reference is made to letter of October 27, 1950[3] (L/A) from the Deputy Under Secretary, requesting a decision as to whether there exists any fiscal impediment to the issuance of a passport visa without charge to a non-immigrant temporary visitor who comes within category 3, (4), or (5) of section 11 of the Headquarters Site Agreement between the United States and the United Nations, and who is not restricted to the Headquarters District and immediate vicinity in accordance with section 13 (e) of that Agreement.

Section 11 of the agreement referred to, as set forth in Joint Resolution of the Congress, Public Law 357, approved August 4, 1947, 61 Stat. 756, entitled "Agreement Between the United Nations and United States of America Regarding the Headquarters of the United Nations" provides in pertinent part as follows:

"The federal, state or local authorities of the United States shall not impose any impediments to transit to or from the headquarters district of . . . (3) representations of the press, or of radio, film or other information agencies, who have been accredited by the United Nations (or by such a specialized agency) in its discretion after consultation with the United States, (4) representatives of nongovernmental organizations recognized by the United Nations for the purpose of consultation under Article 71 of the Charter, or (5) other persons invited to the headquarters district by the United Nations or by such specialized agency on official business. . . ."[4]

Section 13 (a) and 13 (e) provide that:

"(a) Laws and regulations in force in the United States regarding the entry of aliens shall not be applied in such manner as to interfere with the privileges referred to in Section 11. When visas are required for persons referred to in that Section, they shall be granted without charge and as promptly as possible.[5]

[2] The L/UNA files are the working files of the Office of the Assistant Legal Adviser for United Nations Affairs, and are organized on an alphabetical subject basis. Documents in this compilation which carry the sole caption "L/UNA Files" are located in a folder entitled "Hdqtrs Agreement: Immigration (McCarran Act; Int. Sec. Act; Visas), Sec. 11 (secept 11 (4))—Sec. 14."

"(e) The Secretary-General shall, at the request of the appropriate American authorities, enter into discussions with such authorities, with a view to making arrangements for registering the arrival and departure of persons who have been granted visas valid only for transit to and from the headquarters district and sojourn therein and in its immediate vicinity."

As to the instant matter it is stated that it is the opinion of your Department that, under the terms of the Headquarters Agreement, the United States is committed to issue visas without charge to persons coming within the categories listed in section 11, supra, thus enabling such persons to apply to the American Immigration and Naturalization authorities for admission into the United States for the duration of their status with the United Nations.

Section 11 of the Headquarters Site Agreement, quoted above, by its terms is for application to transit from and to the United Nations Headquarters District. Section 13(a) of the Agreement, also quoted above, specifically refers to "the privileges referred to in section 11." This Office concurs in the views expressed in the next to the last paragraph of your letter to the effect that collection of visa fees is not to be made from the persons in categories listed in section 11 who are to be limited in transit to the United Nations Headquarters District and to its immediate vicinity. Likewise, it reasonably may be concluded—from the fact that restrictive visas may, but need not, be issued—that a visa issued for the purpose of transit to the United Nations Headquarters Site, but not restricted as contemplated in section 13(e), would be for the purpose of exercising a privilege referred to in section 11 and would fall within the provision of section 13(a). If the visa is bona fide for the purpose of transit to the United Nations Headquarters District, the question as to whether in a given case a restriction should be incorporated therein is a matter for the decision of your Department.

Accordingly, it may be said that this Office would not be required to object to the issuance without charge of passport visas for transit to the United Nations Headquarters Site to persons in the categories referred to in your letter merely because said visas were not restricted as they might be pursuant to section 13(e) of the Headquarters Site Agreement.

Sincerely yours, LINDSAY C. WARREN

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of International Administration and Conferences (Hall) to the Legal Adviser (Fisher)

[WASHINGTON,] January 17, 1951.

Subject: McCarran Act[1]—Possible Conflict with Headquarters Agreement

In conversation with Abe Feller[2] in New York recently he expressed the view that the regulations which have been issued under the McCarran Act make it fairly clear to him that there is likely to be some conflict between that Act and the way in which it is being interpreted and the Headquarters Agreement. He expressed the view that in the event of such conflict the UN secretariat would be forced to resort to the arbitration procedure under the Agreement. He stated he thought this would be very unfortunate and wondered whether any consideration was being given to a general amendment to the McCarran Act which would waive its provisions so far as it conflicted with international obligations or international agreements. I told him I did not know whether any amendments were under consideration but that I would bring his view to your attention.[3]

Mr. George Ingram[4] informs me that this is an unrealistic proposal and that in his view there is no possibility of conflict because of the national security provision in the Headquarters Agreement.[5] I believe it would be useful at some point for you or Mr. Jack Tate[6] or Mr. Leonard Meeker[7] to have a discussion with Mr. Feller on the subject of the McCarran Act and the Headquarters Agreement in order to avoid future misunderstanding.

Draft Principal Witness Statement For Use Before a Congressional Committee

[WASHINGTON, undated.]

Assistant Secretary McFall [1] has submitted by letter the request of the Department of State for certain changes in S. 716. The majority of those requests are of a technical nature and the representatives of the Visa and Passport Divisions are prepared to testify in detail on them if the Committee wishes to hear them. I am here to present in greater detail, if the Committee wishes to have them, the Department's comments on the first change proposed by Mr. McFall's letter, a change dealing with the law governing the admission of three groups of individuals associated with the United Nations:

representatives of the press, radio and similar information agencies;
representatives of non-governmental organizations associated with the UN; persons invited by the UN or organs of the UN to appear.

The admission of these three groups of people as promptly as possible after their application for visas is important for the following reasons:

1. Failure to so admit them embarrasses the voicing of United States views on the freedom of the press and public information, and also embarrasses the voicing of U.S. views on freedom of movement with individuals in all nations.
2. To carry out the obligations of the U.S. under the Headquarters Site Agreement with the United Nations.
3. To counteract certain Russian policies and propaganda aimed at undermining the efforts of the United States to contribute to making the UN an effective international organization for security.

As the Bill is drafted these three groups of people may be admitted provided the Consul to whom they apply for visas recommends their admission and the Attorney General approves the recommendation. This procedure takes the place of the present Ninth Proviso procedure under which the Secretary of State recommends the admission to the Attorney General.[2] As the procedure envisaged by S. 716 would be more time-consuming than the present Ninth Proviso procedure and as the Department considers that the present Ninth Proviso procedure involves more delays than the Headquarters Agreement contemplated, it is considered desirable from a practical point of view as well as necessary under the provisions of the Headquarters Agreement to exempt these three groups of people from the exclusion and deportation provisions of the Bill to the same extent that representatives of foreign governments to the UN and officials of the UN are exempted from the exclusion and deportation provisions of the Bill.

[1] Jack K. McFall, Assistant Secretary for Congressional Relations.

[2] The "Ninth Proviso" occurs in the Act of February 5, 1917, captioned "An Act to regulate the immigration of aliens to, and the residence of aliens in, the United States." (39 Stat. 874) There were 10 "provisos" to Section 3 of the Act (39 Stat. 877, 878). The ninth of these provided "That the Commissioner General of Immigration with the approval of the Secretary of Labor shall issue rules and prescribe conditions, including exaction of such bonds as may be necessary, to control and regulate the admission and return of otherwise inadmissible aliens applying for temporary admission". For documentation regarding Ninth Proviso practice in 1950, within the concern of the Department of State, see Foreign Relations, 1950, vol. II, pp. 46 ff.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] April 17, 1951.

Subject: Elimination of any requirement of Ninth Proviso action in any case covered by Section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement with the UN

Participants: Mr. Ingram—UNI
Mr. Kerry—UNI
(1) April 3, 1951: Congressman Francis E. Walter (D., Pa.), Chairman, Subcommittee, Immigration and Naturalization;
(2) April 4, 1951: Congressman Clifford P. Case (R., N.J.), Senior Minority Member.

(1) Mr. Ingram gave Mr. Walter a copy of Secretary General Lie's note protesting delays in the admission of the Polish newspaper correspondent Brodski. Mr. Ingram explained that the note in the Brodski case was not strictly responsive to the Committee's request for the views of the SYG on the effect of the Internal Security Act of 1950 on U.S. obligations under the Headquarters Agreement, as the General Assembly had never addressed itself to that question by formal resolution. The U.S. was very anxious to avoid, and heretofore had been successful in avoiding, any such formal action by the UN. Mr. Ingram summarized the adverse effects which delays in admission of persons coming under the Headquarters Agreement had had. Mr. Walter said that certain Committee members and Senator Ferguson, in particular, were disturbed over political activities which some correspondents admitted to attend sessions of the UN had carried on outside the Headquarters District. He assured Mr. Ingram that the Committee was very much concerned with the problem of United States obligations under the Headquarters Agreement and said that the State Department's proposed change to eliminate the necessity of Ninth Proviso action by the Attorney General was at the head of the list of items which the Committee would consider in Executive Session.

(2) Mr. Ingram handed Mr. Case copies of the papers he had given to Mr. Walter the previous day and again explained the nature of the SYG's note in the Brodski case. Mr. Ingram then summarized the difficulties involved when Ninth Proviso action is required. Mr. Case inquired as to what security measures, other than those taken by the Attorney General, were taken in connection with the accreditation and admission of correspondents generally.

Mr. Ingram explained the accreditation procedure as follows: when a correspondent applies to the UN for accreditation the UN requests the comments of the Department before acting on the application, and the Department then makes a review of any security information available in the Government before indicating whether or not it has any objection to the accreditation of the applicant. Upon being accredited by the UN, the correspondent applies for a visa and if the Consul has no information which indicates that the applicant is excludable, the visa is then issued. If, however, either as a result of investigations by the Department or by the Consul, the applicant is found to be inadmissible (by reason only of Section 2 of Section 22 of the Internal Security Act), Ninth Proviso action is then requested of the Attorney General. The Attorney General may then either admit the alien in reliance solely upon the Secretary of State's certification that admission of the alien is in the national interest or may conduct his own security investigation and then determine whether or not to admit the alien.

Mr. Ingram pointed out that this procedure was excessively time consuming in all cases and that the elimination of Ninth Proviso action was only one aspect of the problem of eliminating delay in the accreditation and admission of correspondents. He said that under the consultation agreement pursuant to which the UN requests the comment of the U.S. on applications before accrediting correspondents, the U.S. has two weeks in which to make its comments, but that, because of the great workload now imposed on agencies involved in making security checks, the accreditation procedure now took from six weeks to three months. Despite this delay the UN, to date, has not accredited any correspondents before receiving the comments of the U.S. In view of the delays which were involved it was, however, now giving consideration to accrediting correspondents at the end of two weeks consultation period whether or not U.S. comment had been made. He said that the Department was studying various possible means of eliminating these delays without reducing security standards and that revision of the entire accreditation procedure was under consideration. Mr. Case inquired under what circumstances correspondents were admitted subject to their being restricted to the Headquarters District. Mr. Ingram replied that all of the correspondents who had been admitted by Ninth Proviso action had been restricted. Mr. Case then inquired whether it would be feasible to admit all correspondents promptly on a restricted basis and then to deal with the security question by post-audit. He pointed out that it would be necessary to have something like a restriction to provide the same incentive for prompt action in the case of a post-audit as is inherently present in the case of a pre-audit. Mr. Ingram said that the idea of admitting correspondents promptly, if the Consul to whom they applied for a visa did not have any information which would exclude them, was under consideration, but that it would be undesirable to restrict all correspondents even for a short time. Mr. Kerry pointed out that the incentive to promptly complete post-audits would be adequately provided if correspondents were initially accredited only for a period sufficient to complete a security check (about three months) and that under such a procedure it would probably be sufficient to restrict only certain correspondents. Mr. Case inquired as to what restrictions were imposed by Soviet and Iron Curtain countries on the movement of U.S. representatives resident there. Mr. Ingram pointed out the differences in the status of persons accredited to the UN in New York and persons accredited to the U.S. Government in Washington, D.C., and said that Curtain country representatives accredited to the U.S. were being restricted on a basis of reciprocity. Mr. Case concluded the interview by saying that he was very hopeful that the Committee could recommend some provisions which would satisfy the Department and be acceptable to the whole House and to the public.

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson) to the Legal Adviser (Fisher)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] May 10, 1951.

Subject: Attorney General's Proposal with Respect to Admission of Otherwise Excludable Aliens Covered by Section 11(3), (4) and (5) of the Headquarters Agreement with the UN

I understand that you have under consideration a proposal by the Attorney General to establish a procedure for the admission of certain otherwise inadmissable aliens covered by Section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement which would relieve us of the necessity of making a separate application to the Attorney General in each case. It seems to me that it would be highly desirable if some agreement could be reached with the Attorney General for this purpose.

You are, of course, familiar with the Ninth Proviso cases which arose last fall after the enactment of the McCarran Act. The most recent Ninth Proviso case is that of Laura Diaz.

Laura Diaz applied in Rome on or before April 17 for a visa in order to attend meetings of the Social Commission in New York, as a representative of the WIDF, an NGO within the meaning of Section 11(4) of the Headquarters Agreement. The Social Commission convened on Monday, April 30, and is expected to adjourn on Friday, May 11. The Department was advised by the Attorney General shortly after noon, Wednesday, May 9, that the Attorney General had authorized the admission of Miss Diaz. Attached hereto, for your information, is a copy of a New York telegram which may already have come to your attention.[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] May 23, 1951.

Subject: Representatives of UN Non-Members Participating in the General Assembly: Privileges and Immunities, Visas

Privileges and Immunities

Representatives of various non-member governments acting as observers and in similar capacities at the UN have been considered entitled to the privileges and immunities which P. L. 291, 80th Congress,[1] makes available to "persons designated by foreign governments as their representatives in or to international organizations." It may therefore be considered settled that representatives of non-member governments invited by the General Assembly to participate in its proceedings in any manner contemplated in your draft position paper,[2] dated May 14, 1951, would be similarly entitled, provided they represent a government recognized by the U.S. It must be noted, however, that a difference of opinion exists within the Department as to whether representatives of a government not recognized by the U.S. would be thus entitled.

Sec. 7(a) of P. L. 291 provides:

"Persons designated by foreign governments to serve as their representatives in or to international organizations and the officers and employees of such organizations, and members of the immediate families of such representatives, officers, and employees residing with them, other than nationals of the United States, shall, insofar as concerns laws regulating entry into and departure from the United States, alien registration and fingerprinting, and the registration of foreign agents, be entitled to the same privileges, exemptions, and immunities as are accorded under similar circumstances to officers and employees, respectively, of foreign governments, and members of their families."

[1] The International Organizations Immunities Act, enacted December 29, 1945 (59 Stat. 669).

[2] Not found in Department of State files.

This provision has been construed to give to representatives of foreign governments, with respect to the subjects covered by Sec. 7(a), the same privileges and immunities as representatives of foreign governments accredited to the U.S.

It should be noted, however, that the subjects covered by Sec. 7(a) are only: entry, departure, alien registration, finger-printing and registration of foreign agents.

In addition to the foregoing privileges: Sec. 7(b) grants immunity from suits and legal process with respect to acts performed by representatives in their official capacities and Sec. 4 exempts salaries of representatives of foreign governments from U.S. income tax.

Diplomatic privileges and immunities are granted pursuant to Section 15 of the Headquarters Agreement and can be extended only to resident representatives of Members and certain resident members of their staffs. Among privileges and immunities of representatives of Members which would not be available to representatives of non-members would be general immunity from legal process and immunity from arrest, exemption from personal property taxes, exemption from fees for driver licenses and automobile license plates, exemption from federal excise taxes and exemption from the New York city sales tax and the New York state fuel tax.

The representatives of non-members would be exempt from custom duties only on things brought with them at the time of original entry. They would therefore not have a continuing right to receive liquor and other items free of U.S. taxes.

I am informed that the exemption from the New York city hotel tax applies to all officials of all governments.

The foregoing does not attempt to deal in any respect with questions of rank and precedence and similar matters of Protocol.

Visas 3(7)

Sec. 7(c) of P.L. 291 amends Section 3 of the Immigration Act, approved May 26, 1924,[3] by providing for the entry into the U.S. of representatives of foreign governments in or to international organizations covered by P.L. 291.[4] Representatives of non-member governments, which the U.S. recognizes, would be entitled to entry under that provision and, consequently, would not be excludable by Section 2(2) of the Immigration Act of Oct. 16, 1918,[5] as amended. In the opinion of VD representatives of governments not recognized by the U.S. would not be entitled to 3(7) visas. If this opinion were to prevail, the obligation to admit such representatives would have to be found in Sec. 11(5) of the Headquarters Agreement and they would have to make their entry under Sec. 3(3) of the 1924 Act. As such, they could, if excludable under Sec. 2(2) of the 1918 Act, be admitted only under the Ninth Proviso. As a practical matter, it would therefore follow that the representative of any non-member, which the U.S. does not recognize as a government, would not be admitted as promptly as other representatives of non-members.

[4] Section 3 of the 1924 Act undertook to define the term "immigrant". It also listed six categories of exceptions, that is, aliens who because of a certain status, occupation, etc., would not be defined as an immigrant within the meaning of the Act. The Act of 1945, in Section 7, as noted here, provided for another excepted category, representatives of foreign governments concerned with the activities of international organizations; persons in this group were issued what came to be known as 3(7) visas.

1. VD is not interested in accreditation cases unless a visa question is involved.

2. UNA may, so far as VD is concerned, inform USUN in all consultation–accreditation cases that if the applicant for accreditation is lawfully in the United States VD is not concerned with accreditation. INS (New York) can inform USUN if alien is in United States in lawful status.

[1] This memorandum was drafted to provide the views of the Office of Consular Affairs on a memorandum of May 17 written by Joseph S. Henderson of the Division of International Administration and which dealt with recommendations that were being formulated for the revision of procedure for the accreditation by the United Nations of newspaper correspondents (May 17 memorandum, 314.1/5–1751). On May 25 the two memoranda were forwarded to the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson) by the Director of the Office of International Administration and Conferences (Hall), with the comment that the Office of Consular Affairs had approved the Henderson memorandum "provided there is nothing therein inconsistent with a memorandum dated May 24, 1951 [instant] which he [Ailshie] has made a part of the file." (A/MS Files, Lot 53 D 291 (V), "Ninth Proviso")

3. If applicant for accreditation must apply for visa the case will be referred Department by consular officer for advisory opinion, as provided in outstanding instructions.

4. When advisory opinion requested by consular officer SY will make usual security check with FBI and CIA and Department's files.

5. SY will inform VD of results of security check.

6. VD will consult appropriate officers of Department and formulate advisory opinion, which will be routed through SY, CON and UNA.

7. UNA may then advise USUN regarding prospects visa issuance and whether there is any objection to accreditation.

8. USUN may then inform UN regarding prospects visa issuance, and whether there is any objection to accreditation.

9. When consular officer receives advisory opinion from Department he may act.

10. If advisory opinion favorable consular officer, in issuing visa, will charge usual visa fee, if any, unless evidence of accreditation by UN is presented by applicant.

11. If advisory opinion unfavorable visa will be withheld regardless of any accreditation action by UN.

12. If ninth proviso necessary before advisory opinion can be rendered VD will draft letter to Attorney General for ninth proviso authorization, provided responsible officers of Department agree to recommend ninth proviso action by Attorney General, routing through UNA.

13. UNA may inform USUN when ninth proviso request is made and USUN may then appropriately inform UN.

14. If responsible officers of Department decide that ninth proviso action will not be recommended UNA will be informed and may so inform USUN, which will register US objection to accreditation with UN.

CONFIDENTIAL [NEW YORK,] May 28, 1951.

Subject: Recommended Revision of Procedure on Accreditation by UN of Correspondents

I wish to refer to my telephone conversations with you and Bill Hall of May 25 concerning the above-mentioned proposed revision of the accreditation procedure.

In my conversation with you I advised that the Mission was prepared to concur in the recommendations contained in your memorandum of May 17 entitled as above, subject to the comments contained in my memorandum to you of May 24 (which you said could be handled without difficulty),[1] and subject further to a clarification of certain items contained in Mr. Ailshie's memorandum of May 24. With reference to Ailshie's memorandum, I was particularly concerned about paragraph 4 which provided "When advisory opinion requested by consular officer SY will make usual security check with FBI, CIA and Department files." I stated that I believed it essential that we be informed concerning:

a. The number of cases in which it could be anticipated that advisory opinions might be requested by consular officers, in the light of past experience, and in view of the language contained in paragraph 13 of the Department's Circular Airgram of October 11, 1950 dealing with the Internal Security Act.

b. Whether it was anticipated that a complete security check would be made in the case of all requests for advisory opinions.

c. Why complete security checks should be made with respect to correspondents in cases in which consuls requested advisory opinions when such checks were not made when advisory opinions were asked concerning representatives of foreign Governments coming from the Soviet Union.

I was further concerned with the question of visa fees raised by paragraph 10 of Ailshie's memorandum, and believe that we should have a clarification as to whether or not visa fees would be demanded of correspondents coming to the U.S. for UN accreditation who had received visas prior to accreditation. In this connection I suggested that we ought ascertain whether or not it was possible to obtain a waiver of the visa fee if it were indicated that a correspondent was seeking UN accreditation or, if not, a refund of the fee after the correspondent had become accredited.

As I understood it, it was your opinion that USUN should not concern itself with Ailshie's memorandum, and should limit itself to concurrence or non-concurrence with your memorandum. I was unable to agree with this position.

In my subsequent conversation with Bill Hall he stated, I believe with your concurrence, that in the past advisory opinions had been requested by consuls in only about 10 percent of the cases of correspondents applying for visas and for accreditation by UN, and that about half of these cases had been handled without the necessity of a full security check. This would mean that in only about 5 percent of all correspondent cases had a full security check been necessary. Hall said that he had received assurance from Ailshie that present practices would remain unchanged, but pointed out of course that the percentage of cases requiring security checks might rise should there be an increase in the number of correspondents of dubious reputation who might seek UN accreditation. I advised Hall that this was the clarification which I had sought concerning paragraph 4 of Ailshie's memorandum.

I mentioned to Hall the matter of visa fees. He said he believed that there was a procedure for refunding visa fees, and that an inquiry would be made to establish whether or not this procedure could be applied to correspondents who received their UN accreditation after they had paid a fee to obtain a visa.

I also discussed with Hall the difference between the procedure with respect to a full security check adopted by the Department with reference to correspondents and that applied to alien governmental representatives to UN and Secretariat personnel. I pointed out that it had been my understanding that, in seeking to amend the new codification of the immigration laws to place the admission of persons covered by Sections 11(3), (4) and (5) of the Headquarters Agreement upon the same basis as persons covered by Sections 11(1) and (2), it had been the Department's position that there was no basis for discrimination among these categories of persons since all were covered by Section 11. Hall said that he felt that alien correspondents presented a greater source of danger to the U.S. than governmental representatives and Secretariat personnel and that, even if the proposed amendments to the immigration laws were adopted, the Department would be warranted in applying more stringent procedures with reference to the issuance of visas to correspondents than were applied to governmental representatives and Secretariat personnel. I said that I was somewhat dubious about this position.

I advised Hall, however, that in view of the foregoing clarification, USUN concurred in the recommendations contained in their memorandum of May 17. I pointed out nevertheless that, in order to secure UN's acquiescence in the revised accreditation procedure, we must be in a position to assure the UN that the percentage of cases in which the U.S. failed to give a final comment within 21 days would be kept to the barest minimum. I said I believed that, if UN were advised that the percentage would amount to as much as 10 percent of the cases, we would have great difficulty in selling the revised procedure.

Memorandum by Mr. Albert F. Bender, Jr., of the United States Mission to the United Nations to Mr. Richard J. Kerry, Administrative Attorney, Division of International Administration

CONFIDENTIAL [NEW YORK,] May 29, 1951.

Subject: Recommended Revision of Procedure on Accreditation by UN of Correspondents

I would like to suggest the following with reference to the proposed revision of the accreditation procedure.

Assuming that the Department will require a full security check before commenting concerning certain accreditation applications, I believe that every effort should be made to have such security checks made on the highest priority basis. I believe that this should be done in view of the obligation assumed by the U.S. in entering into the Headquarters Agreement. A further reason is the fact that the accreditation procedure involves a most sensitive area, and experience has demonstrated that delays with respect to even a few correspondents creates ill will among practically all members of the UN Correspondents Association, even though the vast majority are not directly affected. (In this connection you are of course familiar with action taken by the UN Correspondents Association in the past.) Such a situation seriously embarrasses the best interest of the U.S. by antagonizing those on whom we must rely for a sympathetic presentation of our case in a critical period.

With respect to action by the Department of Justice in cases requiring use of the 9th Proviso, I understand that the Department is continuing its efforts to reinstate the "blanket 9th Proviso" procedure which existed formerly. Unless and until this is accomplished, I believe that representations should be made to the Department of Justice requesting that the highest priority should be given to handling 9th Proviso cases for the reasons mentioned in the preceding paragraph.

I assume of course that every effort will be made to streamline the handling of correspondent cases within the Department.

I would suggest further that, in any instructions the Department may send to USUN concerning the negotiation of a revised accreditation procedure with UN, there might be included for our use with UN officials a statement of the Department's position concerning the responsibility that UN is expected to assume with respect to establishing the bona fides of applicants for accreditation. We have discussed this responsibility with UN from time to time, but I feel that it would be helpful for the Department to restate the criteria with which it expects UN to comply in the light of the provisions of the Headquarters Agreement. I have a feeling that the exertion of some pressure on UN in this respect may result in our being faced with fewer problem cases in the future.

Subject: Picketing in Front of Offices of Soviet Delegation to UN on August 2, 1951.

Enclosed herewith is a copy [1] of the official report of the New York City Police Authorities concerning an incident which occurred on August 2, 1951 in the course of picketing by the American-Hungarian Federation in front of the offices of the Delegation of USSR to UN at 680 Park Avenue. This is the incident referred to in the communication of August 6 from Nikolai Shvernik, President of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR, to President Truman. I understand that the Department has also received from the Soviet Embassy a note protesting this incident.[2]

The enclosed report was furnished by the New York City Police Department in response to a request by the Mission for an investigation and a report concerning the incident. You will note that the report states that members of the police force present at the time of the incident failed to observe any evidence of assault or breach of the peace. With specific reference to a woman, Vilma P. Soos who was held temporarily by the police after the occurrence of the incident, the report states that "She had not, however, been observed by any witnesses or members of the department committing any violation of law." This portion of the report is in conflict with the account carried in the New York Herald Tribune of August 3 which states that "one of the Russians was hit on the back by an unidentified woman who apparently swung at him with a closed fist."

I have been advised by a UN Protocol Officer (Rodzianko) that, on August 7, Mr. Abram S. Shakhnazarov, Counselor of the USSR Delegation, described the incident to him. According to Shakhnazarov, the Soviet First Secretary, Polianski, was hit on the head with a "board", and was bleeding when he re-entered the Delegation building after the occurrence of the incident. Further, according to Shakhnazarov, in the course of the picketing, the persons acting as pickets directed obscene epithets in the Russian language at members of the Soviet Delegation who appeared outside the Delegation building. According to Shakhnazarov, the Delegation was extremely upset at the picketing and he stated that nothing similar ever occurred in the vicinity of Embassies and Legations in Moscow. He conceded that the members of the Soviet Delegation used strong language with respect to Americans in the course of UN meetings, but said that that was all part of the game and bore no relationship to the treatment to which Soviet Delegation members were subjected in the course of the picketing.

MEMORANDUM ON PICKETING OF FOREIGN DELEGATIONS

1. The specific issue which gives rise to this memorandum is the extent of the obligation, if any, of the United States to protect the New York Headquarters of foreign delegations to the United Nations against disturbance by group demonstrations, specifically against picketing.

2. The problem has arisen out of complaints by the USSR Mission to the United Nations concerning incidents in front of the Mission's building at 680 Park Avenue, New York, on June 30, July 7, July 14, July 28, August 2 and August 4, 1951. The facts of these incidents appear as follows:

Undisputed facts: (Sources: Exchange of notes and New York Times)

Picketing of the USSR Mission at the above address was organized by the American-Hungarian Federation to protest against deportation of Hungarians to Russia. The New York police had been informed of the plans to picket the Mission and had apparently indicated no objection thereto but had sent additional personnel to the scene. The first few demonstrations involved no personal violence, although the Mission complained of noise, hostile shouts and damage to Mission limousines. The number of individuals participating in the demonstrations on the different dates seems to have varied from about 20 to 100. On the earlier occasions the Mission directed its objections to Amb. Austin. The present exchange of notes between the Embassy of the USSR and the State Department concerns the incident of August 2.[2]

---

[1] Apparently this memorandum was drafted in three sections, on November 9, 14, and 15, respectively. An attached "Note on Possible Constitutional Limitations on Control of Picketing", not printed, was drafted on November 14. The memorandum was sent to USUN (Bender) under cover of an L/UNA memorandum of December 6, not printed.

[2] The notes hereunder reference are not printed.

Disputed facts:

As to this incident the two Soviet notes allege that two employees leaving the Mission were subjected to insults and threats from the pickets; that Mr. Polyanski, a First Secretary of the Mission, who followed them, was surrounded, insulted and threatened by about 10 demonstrators, three of whom hit him on the head with sticks, injuring him "in the region of his parietal bone"; that the police did nothing to protect Mr. Polyanski; that immediately after the incident a plainclothes officer, who came to the Mission, asked for—and was given—the name of the injured Russian and stated that the attacker was known to the police.

The Department's answer, based upon a report of the New York police, states that access to the building was adequately maintained by the police; that "the delay experienced by Mr. Polyanski in reaching his automobile" was due to his effort to force himself through the picket line; that no claim of injury to anyone was made when the plainclothes officer visited the Mission; and that the instructions given the New York police to keep a clear path from the building entrance to the curb constituted adequate measures for the protection of the Delegation.

There was also some disagreement by the Soviet and US notes on proximity of the pickets to the building entrance and whether, and from what date, the police undertook to keep the sidewalk clear.

The New York Times reported the incident of August 2 as follows:

"A Russian was thumped on the back last night by a woman marcher in an American-Hungarian Federation picket line in front of the office of the Soviet Union's United Nations delegation at 680 Park Avenue. Among the slogans on signs carried by the pickets was 'Rather hooligans than Communists'.

"The incident occurred during a two-hour demonstration when three Russians came out of the building at 7:15 p. m. and attempted to enter a car parked at the curb. Seven of the 150 pickets crowded the trio, booing, hissing and shouting: 'Stop the deportations', 'Stalin, you dirty dog', 'Gangsters' and 'Hooey'.

"Policemen rescued the Russians, two of whom departed in the car while the one who was hit turned back into the building.

"It was the first violence in six demonstrations by the group . . ."

3. The obligations of the United States towards delegations to the UN Headquarters in New York are governed by the Headquarters Agreement rather than by the customary international law concerning foreign representatives accredited to the United States Government. However, the applicable provision of the Headquarters Agreement, Section 15, entitles delegations to the United Nations ". . . in the territory of the United States to the same privileges and immunities, subject to corresponding conditions and obligations, as it accords to diplomatic envoys accredited to it." By that Agreement United States practice as to ordinary diplomatic privileges and immunities has thus been made the measure of United States obligations towards UN delegations.* With reference to the present problem, then, it is necessary to establish the prior US position on picketing of buildings occupied by "diplomatic envoys accredited to it".

4. In general expositions of international law, picketing, which in the form familiar in the United States is a fairly recent phenomenon, has received little attention. It is mentioned, if at all, in connection with the security of the person and effects of envoys, or sometimes with the question of the privilege of foreign sovereigns and national ambassadors to be protected from insult and defamation. With the abandonment of common law rules of criminal libel and an increasing respect for freedom of speech, press and other expressions of popular opinion, the latter privilege retains only doubtful validity (but see E. D. Dickinson in 22 AJIL 840); but the former principle is unquestionably recognized. (A representative selection of discussions, with edition citations includes: Oppenheim, 7th Edit., Vol. I, p. 707; Hyde, 2d Edit., Vol. II, pp. 1249, 1252; Hackworth, Vol. IV, p. 511; Harvard Research in International Law, 26 AJIL Supp., p. 90; 31 AJIL 705.)

The Draft Convention on Diplomatic Privileges and Immunities of the Harvard Research, Art. 3(2), provides "A receiving state shall protect the premises occupied or used by a mission, or occupied by a member of a mission, against any invasion or other act tending to disturb the peace or dignity of the mission or of the member of a mission; provided that notification of such occupation or use has been previously given to the receiving state." (26 AJIL Supp. P. 50) On the specific application of this rule to picketing, the Comment states: "The special duty of protection of premises would include protection against crowds or mobs collected in the vicinity of the premises for the purpose of expressing abuse, contempt or even disapprobation of the sending state or of its mission, or of the members of the mission. A similar duty would seem to exist to protect such premises against so-called 'picketing,' this being an act tending to disturb the peace and dignity of the mission." (P. 56)

5. While this work, published in 1932 gives no authority for its propositions, the other sources quoted above cite as evidence of adoption of this view of picketing a 1937 United States statute which specifically prohibits the picketing of foreign missions in the District of Columbia: "It shall be unlawful to display any flag, banner, placard, or device designed or adapted to intimidate, coerce, or bring into public odium any foreign government, party, or organization, or any officer or officers thereof, or to bring into public disrepute political, social, or economic acts, views, or purposes of any foreign government, party, or organization, or to intimidate, coerce, harass, or bring into public disrepute any officer or officers or diplomatic or consular representatives of any foreign government, or to interfere with the free and safe pursuit of the duties of any diplomatic or consular representatives of any foreign government, within five hundred feet of any building or premises within the District of Columbia used or occupied by any foreign government or its representative or representatives as an embassy, legation, consulate, or for other official purposes, except by, and in accordance with, a permit issued by the superintendent of police of the said District; or to congregate within five hundred feet of any such building or premises, and refuse to disperse after having been ordered so to do by the police authorities of the said District. (Feb. 15, 1938, 52 Stat. 30, Ch. 29, Title 1.)

"The police court of the District of Columbia shall have jurisdiction of offenses committed in violation of sections 22–1115, 22–1116; and any person convicted of violating any of the provisions of said section shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $100 or by imprisonment not exceeding sixty days, or both: Provided, however, that nothing contained in said section shall be construed to prohibit picketing, as a result of bona fide labor disputes regarding the alteration, repair or construction of either buildings or premises occupied for business purposes, wholly or in part, by representatives of foreign governments." (Feb. 15, 1938, 52 Stat. 30, Ch. 29, Title 2.) These sections are now in Title 22–1115 and Title 22–1116 of the District of Columbia Code.

It may be argued that this statute, of itself, makes protection from picketing one of the "privileges and immunities which the United States accords to diplomatic envoys accredited to it" and to which the Missions in New York are, therefore, also entitled. On the other hand, the Statute is on its face only a local regulation of the District of Columbia. Consideration of collateral materials is relevant to determine whether and to what extent the Statute represents a recognition in United States practice of international privileges and immunities of foreign envoys.

6. The legislative history and judicial application of the Statute are sparse. There were no hearings before its adoption by Congress, and favorable committee reports in both Houses (S.R. No. 1072, H.R. 1516, 75th Cong., 1st Sess.) consist solely of reprints of a letter by Secretary of State Hull, urging passage for the following reasons:

"If we are to obtain for our representatives in foreign countries that degree of protection to which they are entitled, we should be in a position to show a like consideration for representatives of other governments in this country. Unless we extend such reasonable protection to representatives of other governments, we cannot hope to receive protection for our representatives abroad.

"It is extremely embarrassing to the Department to be reminded by representatives of foreign governments in the United States that their missions are being interfered with by individuals or groups, particularly when existing domestic law does not seem to cover the situations of which complaint is made. By the comity of nations, representatives of foreign governments in countries where law and order are supposed to prevail are entitled to freedom from any attempted intimidation or coercion."

During debate on the floor of the Senate, the Statute (then S.J. Res. 191) was in the hands of Senator Pittman. His statements elaborate the objectives stated in Secretary Hull's letter and indicate that the law was thought to be appropriate in execution of an international obligation toward foreign diplomats; but that the motive for its adoption at that time was the desire, not to live up to international law, but to assure the security from mob demonstrations of Americans abroad (Congress. Record Vol. 81, Pt. 8, pp. 8586 to 8593).

The purposes of the Statute were also considered in sustaining its constitutionality in the only case to bring it to an appellate court, Frend v. United States, 100 F. 2d 691 (CA D.C. 1938), cert. den. 306 US 640. (See separate note on First Amendment protection of the right to picket.) The Court found Congressional power both in the Constitutional provision for the Government of the District of Columbia, Art. 1, Sect. 8, Cl. 17, and in Cl. 10, which authorizes Congress to "define and punish . . . Offenses against the Law of Nations." In Judge Groner's opinion, the Statute is squarely founded in the Law of Nations.

7. There is other evidence that the ban on picketing represents an American view of the rights of foreign representatives in the United States. When the British Embassy was picketed by Irish sympathizers April 2, 1920, an opinion of the Solicitor of the Department of State (by J. R. Baker, 1920 Vol. I, p. 395) concluded that the British Chargé had been insulted "in violation of the Law of Nations" and recommended prosecution under Sect. 4062 R.S., which applied only to assaults in violation of that law. (Now 18 U.S.C. 112)

In 1937 the Secretary of State, in answer to an inquiry from a group proposing to picket the Japanese Embassy, asked them to refrain from doing so; he did not refer to international law (Press Release of August 26, 1937). When in the same year Congress, in response to the increasing practice of picketing Axis Missions here, passed the Statute discussed above, a commentator in the American Journal of International Law welcomed the law as a fulfilment of American obligations under international law. E. C. Stowell: "It is to be regretted that the application of this remedial legislation is limited to the District of Columbia. The responsibility of the Federal Government is as broad as our national jurisdiction. . . . In an effort to escape responsibility, it will not avail to plead lack of legislative sanction, since Congress might well have enlarged the scope of the anti-picketing resolution."—Art. I, Sect. 8, Cl. 10, of the Constitution. (32 AJIL 344.)

8. It has been pointed out that, in view of the recent development of picketing, it is doubtful that there has developed a rule which obligates a receiving government to prevent picketing as such (Preuss, "Protection of Foreign Diplomatic and Consular Premises against Picketing", 31 AJIL 705). But, in the absence of such a general rule it may still be concluded that in United States law and practice protection from picketing has been recognized as a privilege to be accorded envoys accredited to this Government. If so, it remains to establish the extent of the privilege for the purpose of its application, under the Headquarters Agreement, to foreign United Nations missions in New York.

9. Suggested Conclusions: On the basis of the foregoing facts and the additional note on constitutionality,[3] the following conclusions are suggested:

The Headquarters Agreement does not entitle U. N. Missions in New York to the exact equivalent of the District of Columbia's anti-picketing statute. As Sec. 15 of the Agreement guarantees missions certain rights, not in New York City, but "in the territory of the United States", it is reasonable to assume that the section means "the same privileges and immunities . . . as it accords to diplomatic envoys accredited to it" in the territory of the United States. The anti-picketing statute, of course, only applies in the District of Columbia.

The specific provisions of that statute go beyond the extent of an established United States recognition of an international diplomatic "privilege against picketing". The evidence examined above, including the statute, nevertheless indicate some such recognition in United States practice. Application of this practice in the present situation requires the development of more particular standards based on considerations of law and policy.

On the one hand, in this country the "right to picket" has won both legal and ideological recognition. The Department should naturally be slow to seek restrictions on a privilege so closely related to our basic democratic premises. In view of the constitutional question, recourse to formal legislation should certainly be avoided.

On the other hand, the privileged position of picketing is a consequence of its function as an agency of public information. The right should be thought of as one of demonstrating the viewpoint of a segment of American public opinion rather than of badgering an "adversary". Neither law nor policy extends its favors to picketing by unreasonably large numbers or attended by shouting or other noise and the physical annoyance of mission personnel. The constitutionality of narrowly formulated police standards governing the number of pickets permitted in a given area, the required distance from the building, and orderly conduct is virtually certain. Ideologically, the right of Americans to express to representatives of foreign governments their opinions of the policies of those governments must be balanced by recognition of the fact that the missions in New York are there to represent their nations, not in the United States, but in the United Nations; that the position of the American people in this instance is that of a privileged host, not of a party to normal international intercourse.

The standards to be applied in New York should probably be stricter than those appearing from the police and press reports, though not as stringent as those in the D.C. Code. Specifically, the group picketing at any time should, with due regard to the size of the premises, be limited to a reasonable number—certainly considerably less than the maximum of over 100 reported from New York. Shouting or noise of any kind should be avoided in consideration of working conditions in the mission buildings. Finally, there should be no "name-calling" posters which communicate nothing but abusive epithets. Enforcement of such standards would demonstrate our determination to extend appropriate protection to our U.N. guests without infringing any of our popular liberties.

[WASHINGTON, October 12, 1951.]

PASSPORT LAWS AND THE POSITION OF THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE WITH RESPECT TO THE TRAVEL ABROAD OF UNITED STATES CITIZENS EMPLOYED BY THE UNITED NATIONS

1. AUTHORITY OF THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH TO DENY PASSPORTS

The authority of the President, with respect to the granting, denial or restriction of passports implicit in his power to conduct foreign relations, has been delegated to the Secretary of State by Executive Order 7856, March 31, 1938 (F.R. Doc. 38–953; F.R. Apr. 2, 1938). The right of the Secretary of State, to grant or withhold a passport as the public interest requires, has been recognized by the Attorney General (23 Op. Atty. Gen. 509) and by the Supreme Court (see Perkins v. Elg, 307 U.S. 325 at 349).

2. AUTHORITY OF THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH TO DENY DEPARTURE

The Act of May 22, 1918 (40 Stat. 559) provided that when, in time of war, the President found the restrictions of departure and entry (provided for otherwise by the Act itself) were inadequate, the President could impose additional restrictions by proclamation. Criminal penalties for the violation of restrictions thus proclaimed were provided.

The Act of June 21, 1941 (55 Stat. 252) amended the 1918 Act by broadening the authority of the President to proclaim the restrictions authorized by the 1918 Act, and specifically gave the President authority to issue such a proclamation during the national emergency proclaimed by him on May 27, 1941.

3. LAWS AND REGULATIONS PRESENTLY IN FORCE WITH RESPECT TO THE DEPARTURE OF U.S. CITIZENS

The President, on November 14, 1941 issued the proclamation authorized by the above cited statutory provisions (Proclamation 2523, 55 Stat. 1696).

The 1918 Act provides:

"That after such proclamation as is provided for by the preceding section has been made and published and while said proclamation is in force, it shall, except as otherwise provided by the President, and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President may authorize and prescribe, be unlawful for any citizen of the United States to depart from or enter or attempt to depart from or enter the United States unless he bears a valid passport. (May 22, 1918, ch. 81, § 2, 40 Stat. 559.)"

The Presidential proclamation delegated to the Secretary of State authority to make regulations concerning entry and departure of citizens and aliens in accordance with the rules, regulations and orders prescribed in the proclamation. Subsequently, on November 25, 1941, by Department Order 1103 (F.R. 6069) the Secretary of State published such regulations. These regulations reiterated the general rule that no citizen of the United States shall depart from the United States unless he bears a valid passport, and provided the exceptions authorized by the statute. The only exception relevant to the case of United States citizens employed by the UN, who have been denied passports, is that which provides: "No valid passport shall be required of a citizen of the United States . . . when specifically authorized by the Secretary of State, through appropriate official channels to depart from or enter into the continental United States. . . ." (22 C.F.R. 53.2).

4. THE OBLIGATION OF THE UNITED STATES TO PERMIT DEPARTURE OF UNITED STATES CITIZENS EMPLOYED BY THE UN

In a memorandum, dated August 17, 1948, L gave an opinion, in response to a request from Mr. Sandifer,[1] concerning the obligation of the United States:

(1) to issue passports to U.S. citizens, employed by the UN, proposing to travel abroad on official UN business;
(2) to issue passports to U.S. citizens accredited by the UN as correspondents when proposing to proceed abroad to cover the General Assembly in Paris;
(3) to permit the departure, without passports, of U.S. citizens employed by the UN;
(4) to permit the departure, without passports, of U.S. citizens accredited by the UN as journalists.

With respect to U.S. citizens employed by the UN, it was the opinion of L that the U.S. was obliged to permit them to depart by virtue of the provisions of Art. 105 of the UN Charter, and that "the United States is obligated to issue a passport to such an official for travel unless the United States amends the laws and regulations, referred to above, so as to permit the official's departure without a passport."

L took the view that, although Sec. 11 of the Headquarters Agreement was drafted primarily with reference to aliens, that it in fact covered U.S. nationals as well. With respect to the departure of U.S. citizens employed by the UN, the question, however, was treated as moot since L had previously, in the same opinion, found an obligation, to permit the departure of U.S. nationals, in Article 105 of the UN Charter. Section 11 was the only basis upon which, in the case of journalists, an affirmative answer could have been based on legal grounds. The opinion of L recommended that, with respect to journalists, the legal issues involved be avoided by permitting the journalists to depart as a matter of policy.

The provisions of Art. 105 of the UN Charter clearly apply to aliens as well as to U.S. nationals. Neither the Charter nor Article 105 of the Charter is subject to any express right of the U.S. to safeguard its security. Mr. Meeker, L/UNA, has indicated, however that he considers it clear that Art. 105 of the UN Charter is subject to an implied right of the U.S. to safeguard its security. If this view is accepted, it may be possible to consider the Headquarters Agreement, despite reservation 6, as a partial implementation, in the manner contemplated by Art. 105, of the privileges and immunities therein provided for.[2] The only effect then in relying exclusively on Art. 105, in the case of UN employees, and in not invoking Sec. 11 of the Headquarters Agreement, is that the case of UN employees is not a precedent in the case of journalists, and the case of journalists and others not covered by Art. 105 remains undecided for the time being.

5. THE EFFECT OF THE INTERNAL SECURITY ACT OF 1950 ON PASSPORT POLICIES OF THE DEPARTMENT

Sec. 6(b) of the Internal Security Act of 1950 provides:

"When an organization has registered, or there is in effect final order of the Board requiring an organization to register as a Communist action organization, it shall be unlawful for any officer or employee of the United States to issue a passport to, or renew the passport of, any individual knowing or having reason to believe that such individual is a member of such organization."

The foregoing provision was apparently drafted with reference to the premise stated in Section 2 of the Act under the heading: "Necessity for Legislation" that "travel of Communist members, representatives and agents from country to country facilitates communication and is a prerequisite for the carrying on of activities to further the purposes of the Communist movement." The registration procedure contemplated by the Act has not yet come into existence. Mrs. Shipley,[3] however, inquired through Mr. McFall as to the desirability of giving these provisions interim effect through an exercise of the discretion of the Secretary of State to deny passports. Upon being advised of the desirability of such action, Mrs. Shipley inquired of L, by memorandum dated November 16, 1950,[4] concerning the denial of passports to certain United States citizens who were journalists. In an opinion, dated February 5, 1951,[5] L noted that it had been the policy of the Department, for some time, to refuse passports to Communists, but that an exception had been made in the case of journalists in order to avoid criticism. L pointed out that this exception existed as a matter of policy only and was not a legal requirement.

After stating: "Obviously if the Secretary of State had authority in the exercise of his discretion to refuse passports to Communist newspaper correspondents before the enactment of the Internal Security Act, that authority has not been diminished by the enactment of the Act." L concluded that the policy underlying the McCarran Act would justify a reversal in the Department's policy with respect to journalists.

6. EFFECT OF THE INTERNAL SECURITY ACT OF 1950 ON PRACTICES IN CONNECTION WITH THE DEPARTURE OF UNITED STATES CITIZENS EMPLOYED BY THE UN TO WHOM PASSPORTS HAVE BEEN DENIED

Early in July, 1951, Dimitri Varley, a UN employee, was denied a passport for which he had applied in order to proceed abroad on UN business. The question was then raised as to whether Varley would be permitted to proceed abroad without a passport. The Act of May 22, 1918 (40 Stat. 559), as amended by the Act of June 22, 1941 (55 Stat. 252), provides that it shall be unlawful "for any person to transport or to attempt to transport from or into the United States another person with the knowledge or reasonable cause to believe that the departure or entry of such other person is forbidden by this section . . .", establishes criminal penalties for the violation of any of its provisions, and provides for the forfeiture of any vehicle, vessel or aircraft used in such unlawful transportation. Under the provisions of law and regulations now in force, the absence of a passport, in the case of any person destined outside the Western Hemisphere, seems to be reasonable cause to believe that departure is forbidden. Transportation companies will therefore not give passage to a United States citizen seeking to depart from the United States for such a destination without a passport unless Mrs. Shipley has expressly indicated to them that the departure is authorized. In view of the fact that the intent of the McCarran Act is to restrict movement rather than merely to cause the denial of passports, Mrs. Shipley was most reluctant to indicate to any transportation company that they could give passage to Varley. She was advised by L, however, that she was obliged, in view of the obligations of Article 105 of the UN Charter, to indicate to the transportation company that the travel was authorized. She declined, however, to give any such indication to Varley himself or to permit the Department to communicate anything more to the UN than the fact that such a message would be transmitted to the transportation company. The UN took but did not maintain the position that, in view of the fact that an individual who departs from the United States at the present time without a passport or other authorization is subject to the criminal penalties of the Act of May 22, 1918, as amended, Varley should be given such authorization as would make his departure lawful within the provisions of that Act. It is difficult to see how any authorization which is sufficient to bar criminal prosecution of a transportation company is not also sufficient to bar criminal prosecution of the individual. It is therefore questionable whether any real distinction between communicating such authorization to a transportation company and to the individual really exists.

CONCLUSIONS

1. Contrary to the view expressed by L in the opinion of Aug. 17, 1948, no change in the current regulations appears to be necessary in order to enable the U.S. to comply with its obligation to permit the departure of U.S. citizens employed by the UN.

2. Under the present regulations, it would appear that the U.S. is obligated to specifically authorize the departure of any U.S. citizen, employed by the UN, to whom it denies a passport, unless there are overriding security considerations.

3. It is doubtful whether any distinction between the giving of such authorization to a transportation company and to the individual is tenable.

4. It remains to be determined what security standards apply in the case of persons desiring to depart on UN business without passports, and whether security considerations sufficient to warrant the denial of a passport are also sufficient to warrant denial of departure.

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. That no action be taken on the issue of whether or not we are obligated to give any authorization to the individual unless the UN forces the issue.

2. That the security question involved in the departure without passports of U.S. citizens employed by the UN be treated on a case by case basis.

Memorandum by the Chief of the Division of International Administration (Ingram) to the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson)[1]

[WASHINGTON,] October 31, 1951.

Subject: Abuse of Privilege of Residence and Deportation

The contention of VD is that any activity by any person covered by the Headquarters Agreement other than activity in their official capacity and for the purpose for which they were admitted to the United States deprives them of status under the Headquarters Agreement at our option. Under this view, deportation would not depend upon whether or not the activity which we consider the abuse of privilege of residence was grounds for deportation, but simply upon whether or not they were deportable under the immigration laws when deprived of the protection of the Headquarters Agreement.

It is our view that it was the intention of the Headquarters Agreement to provide that, in any case in which a person abused his privilege of residence, he could be deported for that reason. The history of the negotiations involved in the drafting of the Headquarters Agreement supports this view, i.e., it was the intention of the parties who entered into the Agreement that this should be so. The intention of the parties has significance similar to the intention of Congress in determining the meaning and obligations of the Agreement.

The history of the negotiations also seems to show that the principal reason why it was not specifically spelled out in the Agreement that only "unlawful activities" would amount to abuse of privilege of residence was that it was desired to preserve the discretion of the Secretary of State where it might be desirable to subject a person to deportation because of his lack of bona fides or for subversive activities where no provable crime was involved.

The view advanced by VD does not even make all communist correspondents deportable. It would affect only those admitted by the 9th Proviso. Activity which would render Hitschmannova [2] deportable would not render a Tass [3] correspondent deportable.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] November 2, 1951.

1. It has not been in the past the position of the Department and is not a reasonable construction of the Headquarters Agreement that a person who has qualified under section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement can lose such privileged status on the sole ground that he is engaged in an activity which is not performed strictly in his official capacity.

[1] Probably in the Division of International Administration, possibly in the Office of the Assistant Legal Adviser for United Nations Affairs.

(a) Telegram of April 6, 1950 to Prague discussed possibilities of retaliating against Czech correspondents in US. Referring to Srych, who it appears had an accredited status under section 11(3), it was pointed out that he could be restricted to the Headquarters Area but that such action would not interfere with his freedom to report on developments in UN or New York.

(b) The Rapporteur of the subcommittee of the Sixth Committee of the Second General Assembly summarized the view of the subcommittee on section (b) as follows:

> "The provisions of section 13(b) and (c) fall, however, into a different category. They deal with a matter which had not been dealt with in detail either in the draft agreement or in the General Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations Organization. These provisions give the right to the Government of the United States to require an official of the United Nations Organization or the representative of a Member Government or a member of a representative's staff to leave the territory of the United States in the case of abuses or of serious infractions committed in the United States in matters outside his official duties. This right of the United States Government is surrounded by a number of safeguards and, in particular, where the individual concerned possesses diplomatic immunity, it is specified that he shall not be required to leave the United States 'otherwise than in accordance with the customary procedure applicable to diplomatic envoys accredited to the United States.' "

The Sixth Committee unanimously approved this report. (UN Doc. A/C.6/172,2d Gen Ass., 1947, underscoring supplied.[2])

It will be noted that the assumption is made that a correspondent will be involved "in matters outside his official duties" and that to revoke protection there must be "abuses" or "serious infractions" in such matters.

(c) The Congress apparently shared in the view that one must look for an abuse of privileges in activities outside official capacity and does not find an abuse of privileges by activities outside official capacity:

> ". . . Two important protections are, however, provided in section 13: (1) the United States may require such persons to have visas and may limit the visas which it issues so as to be valid only for transit to the headquarters district and sojourn in its immediate vicinity; (2) in case any such persons abuse their privileges in activities outside their official capacity, they become subject to deportation." (Senate Report 559, Committee on Foreign Relations, 80th Congress, 1st session, July 15, 1947, p. 6)

2. As used in 13(b), abuse of privilege in activities outside an accredited correspondent's official capacity must at least involve an activity which would of itself constitute sufficient grounds for deportation, such as violiation of the espionage laws.

> "There is a provision here that the proceedings shall not be instituted without the approval of the Secretary of State, which has to do with the administration of the laws in connection with the United Nations.

The Secretary of State to the Attorney General of the United States (McGrath)

WASHINGTON, November 8, 1951.

MY DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: Reference is made to a letter, dated August 3, 1951, from the Commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, regarding Marcelle C. V. B. Hitschmannova.[1]

In that letter it was stated that Marcelle Hitschmannova has been in an illegal status so far as the immigration laws are concerned since January, 1950.

At the time of receipt of the letter, Miss Hitschmannova had not been formally and regularly reaccredited by the United Nations, since this Government had not yet forwarded its comments to the United Nations concerning her reaccreditation. The United Nations Secretariat has considered that Miss Hitschmannova continued in an accredited status after March 17, 1951 pending action on her application for renewal of accreditation. Upon being informed, by letter dated October 2, 1951, that the United Nations would find it necessary to proceed with the regular reaccrediting of Miss Hitschmannova in the absence of comment from this Government, the Department notified the United Nations on October 8, 1951 that, if she were reaccredited, it might be necessary to deport her. On October 9, 1951, the United Nations reaccredited Miss Hitschmannova for a period of one year.

The letter of August 3, 1951 also stated:

"The files of this Service indicate that the continued presence in the United States of this alien may be a threat to the national security. In this connection you are referred to reports received from the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which I assume were also received by your Department. Inasmuch as subject's reaccreditation by the United Nations expired on March 17, 1951, it will be appreciated if you will promptly inform me as to whether the Department of State has any objection to this Service requiring subject alien to depart from the United States."

It is not apparent from the letter whether, in view of the fact that Miss Hitschmannova has been continuously accredited by the United Nations as a correspondent within the meaning of Sec. 11(3) of the Headquarters Agreement between the United States and the United Nations, Public Law 357, 80th Congress, you would propose to deport her exclusively on security grounds.

In this connection, your attention is invited to Section 13 of the Agreement which provides, in part:

"(b) Laws and regulations in force in the United States regarding the residence of aliens shall not be applied in such manner as to interfere with the privileges referred to in Section 11 and, specifically, shall not be applied in such manner as to require any such person to leave the United States on account of any activities performed by him in his official capacity. In case of abuse of such privileges of residence by any such person in activities in the United States outside his official capacity, it is understood that the privileges referred to in Section 11 shall not be construed to grant his exemption from the laws and regulations of the United States regarding the continued residence of aliens, provided that:

"(1) No proceedings shall be instituted under such laws or regulations to require any such person to leave the United States except with the prior approval of the Secretary of State of the United States. Such approval shall be given only after consultation with the appropriate Member in the case of a representative of a Member (or a member of his family) or with the Secretary-General or the principal executive officer of the appropriate specialized agency in the case of any other person referred to in Section 11;"

In the light of the foregoing, and since you have not stated that the continued presence of Miss Hitschmannova is a threat to the national security or that she has violated the conditions under which she was granted her present status, the Department is not in a position to determine whether it should or should not object to the institution of deportation proceedings until it receives from your Department the evidence, material allegations and the legal basis upon which you would require Miss Hitschmannova to depart from the United States.

Sincerely yours, For the Secretary of State:

CARLISLE H. HUMELSINE [2]

Memorandum by Mr. B. Fensterwald of the Office of the Assistant Legal Adviser for United Nations Affairs to the Chief of the Division of International Administration (Ingram)

[WASHINGTON,] December 14, 1951.

Subject: Definition of "Immediate Vicinity", UN Headquarters

Reference: Your Memorandum of November 26, 1951 [1]

This Office concurs in your opinion that a further approach to the UN should be made at this time to negotiate an agreed definition of "immediate vicinity".

In regard to the specific questions posed, nothing has been found to alter the plain meaning of Section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement whereby the U.S. can restrict visas for persons covered by that section to the Headquarters district and its immediate vicinity.

The second question (e.g., "as to what rights of the U.S. to so restrict persons covered by Sections 11(1) and (2) would be if the U.S. had acceded to the General Convention without pertinent reservation") is more difficult. Sections 11(d) and 18(d) of the General Convention certainly would put definite limitations upon the U.S. in regard to issuing visas restricted to certain areas. However, we feel that the obligations in the Convention would not necessarily prevent the U.S. from issuing such visas in all cases.

This conclusion is based in part on the necessity of interpreting the exact meaning of the words "immigration restrictions" in Sections 11(d) and 18(d). There was probably no intent to prevent states parties to the Convention from applying any or all immigration restrictions. For example, States parties would probably not be prohibited from applying immigration restrictions, of a health or sanitary nature. The purpose of the Sections was to guarantee free access to and egress from areas in which UN functions were being performed. It would seem doubtful if this would necessarily imply in all cases that visas be issued for travel throughout the entirety of a country.

This idea is strengthened by the Preamble to the Convention:

> Whereas Article 105 of the Charter of the United Nations provides . . . that representatives of the Members of the United Nations and officials of the Organization shall . . . enjoy such privileges and immunities as are necessary for the independent exercise of the functions in connection with the Organization.

It is our view that the U.S. could restrict visas in necessary cases even if the U.S. adhered to the General Convention as long as such restriction in each particular case did not interfere with the reasonably independent functioning of the person in question.

I. THE ELECTION TO FILL THE SECURITY COUNCIL SEAT BEING VACATED BY YUGOSLAVIA

Memorandum by Mr. Harry N. Howard, United Nations Adviser, Bureau of Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs, to the Acting Director of the Office of United Nations Political and Security Affairs (Wainhouse)

[WASHINGTON,] April 16, 1951.

Subject: Possible Greek Candidacy for the Security Council

At the NEA staff meeting on Thursday, April 12, I made note of Mr. Kyrou's [2] recent statement that Greece might be a candidate to succeed Yugoslavia as a member of the Security Council, indicating that Mr. Kyrou had referred to the possible Greek candidacy in discussing the matter with me last November. I also indicated in the staff meeting the Greek view that Greece could hardly be expected to be a successful candidate in 1952 to succeed Turkey since the Arab States would have a strong case in 1952 for that seat, in view of the successful Turkish candidacy in 1950.

Mr. McGhee,[3] Mr. Rountree,[4] and I felt that Greece was entitled to support from the United States in this matter, although there has been no formal request as yet for such support, in view of the strong Greek stand in the Korean situation, the support which Greece has always given to the United States in the United Nations, and the position which Greece occupies in the Eastern Mediterranean.

We were all aware that such a candidacy would also raise some problems since Greece is a neighbor of Turkey, already on the Security Council, and since the Soviet Union and its satellites will, no doubt, put up a strong case for the election of another Soviet satellite.

In response to a previous request as to an indication to [of] UK views on this matter, Mr. Boyd reported that UK position as approved by Mr. Morrison [2] is that this SC seat should be reserved for a State acceptable to the USSR (a) in order to "preserve the UN as a world forum" and (b) to maintain the 1946 "Gentlemen's Agreement" on the distribution of SC seats so as not to endanger the Commonwealth representation. Moreover the UK is not disposed to support Greece for this seat because of the inbalance that would be created by having both Greece and Turkey (both by then admitted to NATO) on the Council at the same time. However, Mr. Morrison suggests that Greece be supported for the seat which the Netherlands will vacate in 1952, although the UK realizes that this would depend upon the willingness of the Benelux and Scandinavian Governments to give up that seat.

Mr. Boyd referred to information from the UK Embassy in Athens that the Greek press had published reports of US intentions to support Greece's candidacy, and asked where our thinking now stood on this matter. We replied that, although the Department had not reached a final decision on supporting Greece, we are at present strongly inclined to do so and in any event would be unable to vote for a satellite. However, so far as we knew no indication of our thinking had been conveyed to the Greek Government and the only reply that we had given to their request for our support was that the matter would be seriously considered. The press reports were therefore not correct.

As to the UK reasoning we expressed some doubt that failure to elect a satellite would be any more offensive to the USSR and thus endanger the UN as a world forum, than the original election of Yugoslavia in 1948 [1949].[3] As to the 1946 "Gentlemen's Agreement" we stated that as the UK knew the US interpreted that as binding only for the elections of that year and not necessarily a commitment for the indefinite future. It might also be argued that the general geographic balance might be as much upset by Mr. Morrison's suggestion of replacing the Netherlands with Greece in 1952. While it is true that both Greece and Turkey would be on the Council concurrently, the terms would overlap for only one year.

Mr. Boyd indicated that if the US held very strongly a point of view contrary to that of the British they would of course reexamine their position although the above represents their fairly well considered views at the present time. We stated that we would of course consider the UK views within the Department and discuss the matter further at a future date.

Subject: Election to Fill Yugoslavia's seat on the Security Council and Secretary Generalship of the Caribbean Commission.

Miss Barbara Salt, First Secretary, British Embassy
Mr. Michael Wenner, British Embassy
Mr. John D. Hickerson, UNA
Mr. Ward Allen, EUR
Mr. J. Jefferson Jones, UND
Mr. Paul W. Jones, UNP

Mr. Meade called on me to explain the UK views on the election to fill Yugoslavia's seat on the Security Council and to discuss the Secretary Generalship of the Caribbean Commission.

Mr. Meade stated that the Foreign Office had communicated to the Embassy its strong belief that the Yugoslav seat should be given to a Slav state, which, it was assumed, would be Czechoslovakia. In support of this view, the Foreign Office maintained that it was generally accepted that a Slav state should have one of the non-permanent seats, and expressed apprehension that the denial of a seat to the Slavs might be considered by the Soviet Union as a highly provocative act which, on top of other past actions, might conceivably lead to a Soviet walk-out.

I told Mr. Meade that the United States was absolutely opposed to a Soviet satellite and would do all it could to elect a non-Soviet candidate. I explained that the 1946 "gentleman's agreement" applied to 1946 only. We did not believe that the denial of one of the non-permanent seats to a Slav would jeopardize the safety of the Commonwealth seat. The degree of representation of the Commonwealth group, or of the Latin American states, as agreed upon in 1946, could still be justified on the basis of numbers, contributions, or support for UN activities, but the election of a Soviet satellite could not be justified on any grounds. While we would not wish to take any action deliberately to force a Soviet walk-out, we also would not want to make any unusual concessions. I said that it was, of course, impossible to predict how the Soviet Union would react to the defeat of a Soviet satellite, but I expressed personal doubts that this in itself would produce a Soviet walk-out. Many past acts, including the election of Yugoslavia rather than Czechoslovakia in 1949, were probably considered much more serious in the eyes of the Soviet Union. I also pointed out that our voting margin could be jeopardized by giving the satellites one of the non-permanent seats. Finally, I stated that public opinion in this country would tolerate no other position than opposition to the election of a Soviet satellite.

Mr. Meade said that if the American people would be any more amenable to the election of a member of the Soviet bloc other than Czechoslovakia, a hint might be thrown out for the candidacy of another satellite. I assured him that while the American public would be unmanageable if Czechoslovakia was elected, it would positively oppose the election of any satellite.

I told Mr. Meade that we had not taken any position on which of the non-Soviet candidates to support. We would favor Greece if it had sufficient support, but realized the difficulties in connection with its election and were considering other possibilities such as Thailand, the Philippines, Lebanon and Ethiopia. I stated frankly that our final position would be determined on the basis of which country would most likely win.

Mr. Meade personally thought that Greece was not supportable in view of its proximity to Turkey and the invitations to these countries to participate in NATO. He feared that Ethiopian representatives would be unsatisfactory and believed that the Philippines would be considered a mouthpiece for United States views. He also thought Lebanon should not be elected, although he later acknowledged that the election of Lebanon this year would facilitate the election of Greece next year to succeed Turkey. He personally believed that Thailand would be the most satisfactory of the non-Soviet possibilities. I told Mr. Meade that we would be glad to support Thailand if the UK could agree.

Mr. Meade asked Mr. Allen to explain our position to the UK Foreign Office when he was in London and to point out particularly the point I had made on our voting margin and our belief that the Commonwealth seat is not in jeopardy. He also asked whether he could inform the Foreign Office that the position which I had presented represented the view of the Secretary of State. I replied that I felt certain the Secretary agreed with this position but would be happy to clear it with him and inform Mr. Meade later.

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson) to the Secretary of State

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] October 10, 1951.

Subject: Election to Fill Yugoslav Security Council Seat

Discussion:

The General Assembly, at its Sixth Session, will elect a Member to the Security Council to fill the seat being vacated by Yugoslavia. Greece has announced its candidacy for this seat, and Ethiopia, Lebanon, Thailand and the Philippines have been mentioned as other non-Soviet possibilities. The Soviet Union will undoubtedly put forward a satellite candidate, probably Czechoslovakia, on the theory that the Yugoslav seat belongs to a Slav state.

The United Kingdom Foreign Office strongly believes that a Slav state should be elected to succeed Yugoslavia. They have explained this position on the grounds that under a 1946 "gentleman's agreement", followed in succeeding years, one of the non-permanent seats was allotted to the Slavs; that the election of a Slav would help to preserve the United Nations as a world forum; and that to deny the Soviets this seat might be considered an unduly provocative act which, on top of other actions, might conceivably lead to a Soviet walk-out.

We have taken the position, and so informed the United Kingdom and others, that the United States would oppose strongly the election of a Soviet satellite and support the non-Soviet candidate which is most likely to win. We believe that the election of a Soviet satellite is unwarranted on any grounds, and maintain that the 1946 "gentleman's agreement" was meant to apply for one year only. Further, with the USSR permanently on the Council, the seating of a Soviet satellite could jeopardize our voting margin. While it is impossible to predict what might induce a Soviet walk-out, the election of a non-Soviet candidate would not appear to be as serious an action in the eyes of the Soviet Union as past acts, such as the election of Yugoslavia rather than Czechoslovakia in 1949. We are convinced that public opinion demands a strong position against a Soviet satellite.

British Embassy officials have asked whether they may inform the Foreign Office that the above views represent your position on this matter.

Recommendation:

It is recommended that you authorize us to inform the British Embassy that the above views do represent your position.[1]

UNP—Mr. David W. Wainhouse [1]
Mr. Paul B. Taylor

Mr. Moodie called at his request to present the views of the Department of External Affairs on the Yugoslav seat on the Security Council. He read extensively from a carefully written document expressing the Australian concern lest the Soviets be led to withdraw from the United Nations and making the point that the non-Soviet members should be careful not to take any action which would lead to Soviet withdrawal except in a matter of real importance to themselves. The Australians believe, therefore, that we should not oppose the election of some satellite to Yugoslavia's seat in the Security Council. They realize that we could not support Czechoslovakia and Mr. Moodie asked whether a "compromise" could be reached on Byelorussia or Poland. He further pointed out that even if we are committed to opposition to a satellite there were still various degrees of intensity of such opposition. He asked how strong our opposition would be.

We said that in our view the U.S. would have to oppose very actively the election of any Soviet satellite to Yugoslavia's seat. We mentioned the attitude of American public opinion on that point and mentioned also the possibility that the working majority of the free nations in the Security Council would be cut down to a dangerous point. Mr. Wainhouse suggested that the mere defeat of a satellite for this SC seat would not in itself lead the Soviets to withdraw from the [1] Wainhouse was Director of the Office of United Nations Political and Security Affairs.

United Nations—that such a decision would probably be taken only if they considered that United Nations membership was no longer helpful to them and that they probably had not reached that conclusion.

Mr. Moodie said that if we were to push actively our opposition to a satellite this would alter to that extent the geographic pattern heretofore followed on the Security Council and that this would have very interesting possibilities for Australia. Australia, he said, does not agree to the existing geographic distribution under which only one member of the Commonwealth may be on the Security Council at one time and he rather jokingly said that if Australia were to run for the Security Council next year he would make it embarrassing for us if we opposed him on the basis of geographic allocation. Mr. Wainhouse said that obviously to cut down the Eastern European representation would not mean abandonment of the whole geographic principle.

Mr. Moodie said that elimination of a satellite from the Security Council would look worse if it were merely one of a series of anti-Soviet measures such as (1) increasing the Soviet financial contribution, (2) opposing the Soviet nominee for the ICJ and (3) freezing the USSR out of the General Committee. We said that, while we are not familiar with the details of the budget problem, we understand that the increase in Soviet contribution is a perfectly sound thing on its merits and is not anti-Soviet. As to the ICJ, while our position has not yet been determined, tentative working level opinion is that we will probably support Golunsky. As to the General Committee our tentative position is to support a Soviet bloc chairman for one of the committees, and we see a possibility of a Soviet chairman doing harm in every committee but the Sixth. Mr. Moodie agreed that this total position did not involve the complete freezing out of the Soviet bloc which the Department of External Affairs seemed to feel.

Mr. Moodie ended by indicating that on the Security Council seat his Government might have to differ with us.

I advised Mr. Meade that we had practically decided to announce our support of Greece for the Yugo SC seat, and would undoubtedly do so shortly. Mr. Meade felt certain that even if the UK should change its decision to support a Soviet satellite, they would not feel able to support Greece. I suggested that therefore the only way in which we might avoid a US–UK split on this issue would be for the UK to come up in the next two or three days with the name of another non-satellite candidate whom they would agree to support and whom we could seriously consider as a compromise.

We discussed the proposed Yugo case at some length [1] and I indicated that the French as well as ourselves had taken an affirmative attitude toward it in response to Yugoslavia's request for our views and that only the UK had sought to discourage them. I asked Mr. Meade to urge his government, now that Yugoslavia has decided to go forward with its case, to take a more affirmative attitude, to lend its support, and participate wholeheartedly in the debate. Mr. Meade indicated his personal agreement and stated he would strongly urge this course upon the UK Foreign Office.

There seems to be agreement in the Department that we should oppose the election of a Soviet-sponsored candidate, which will probably be Czechoslovakia. There is some difference of view on (a) what non-Communist country we should support; and (b) the degree of political pressure we should apply.

It is my personal recommendation that we should state clearly and consistently our opposition to the election of a Soviet-sponsored country; that we should clearly and consistently support the election of the non-Communist country which has the best chance of election (at the present time this seems to be Greece); that we do not engage in political arm-twisting in order to bring about the election of any particular candidate.[1]

Gadel 8. Re election to fill Yugoslav seat: Dept has clearly and consistently stated that it opposes election of a Sov-sponsored country to fill Yugo seat, and that it will support election of non-Sov country which has best chance of election. Secy has personally approved this policy. We have stated US wld be prepared support Greece, provided it obtained sufficient support other UN members, or some other non-Sov state. FYI, in order not to jeopardize our overall objective of defeating a Sov candidate we do not wish to engage in special polit pressure to bring about election of any particular non-Sov candidate.

On basis available info, Greece appears have best chance of election. Accordingly, in conversations other Dels, you shld continue stress our opposition to election Sov candidate and state that US disposed to support Greece as long as it is candidate on which there is reasonable prospect of securing widest agreement in UN. You shld not, of course, inflexibly commit US to Greece so as to make it impossible for us ultimately to vote for another non-Sov candidate which might receive greater support in the end.

It is particularly important that Greece, and also countries which appear undecided this matter, including Benelux countries, know our views soonest. Dept is informing Phil which has requested US support its candidacy.[2] Posts to which this rptd for info pls inform FonOffs.

611. Fol info obtained from FonOff re certain UNGA issues. FonOff has up to now been reluctant to discuss Belgian position on various agenda items, preferring to await results of mtg Brussels pact powers at London Oct 25–26. Apparent now that this meeting had been influential in establishing Belgian policies, and FonOff has promised provide Emb with Belgian views additional issues not covered here.

1. Vice President GA. London mtg unanimously favored Yugoslavia.

2. SC seat being vacated by Yugoslavia. At London mtg Belgium alone favored our position of keeping seat in hands of country outside Commie orbit. Strongest stand taken by Dutch who favor Czechs getting seat. In discussion this subject, Dutch claimed Yugoslavia got seat while still within Soviet orbit (sic) and Belgian proof to contrary did nothing to shake Dutch stand that Yugoslavia seat must be returned to Soviet orbit. This principle supported by French, who favored Poles for seat, and by British, who made reservation that UK FonOff attitude might be altered if govt changed by election. Luxembourg rep said little and sided with majority on this and most other questions. Result of discussion this question was that Dutch, French and Luxembourg expressed desire to see seat returned to Soviet orbit. British held same view subject to decision new govt, and Belgians wld decide their attitude after consideration within FonOff. Not yet clear whether Belgium will change original position, but Delhayes, Belgium FonOff head of UN section, who was Belgian rep at London mtg, said that he had argued there that it must be anticipated that eventually Red China will obtain UN seat, and that for Commies to control two permanent and one other seat in UN SC was too much. Attitude of British, French and Dutch was that returning to Soviets the SC seat which had been taken from orbit in 1949 was cheap method promoting better relations and might stimulate Commies to adopt more reasonable attitudes on controversial matters. (Note: Info on strong Dutch stand was obtained from Delhayes assistance in FonOff; Delhayes carefully avoided identifying Dutch as leading advocate for return of seats to Soviet orbit.)

3. London meeting unanimously favored Lange[1] of Norway for chairman first comite.

4. While London meeting favored Padilla Nervo for GA presidency, it was noted that there was as yet no decision by Latin American states as to which candidate wld receive united support, and London mtg decided to wait and see if there are further developments among Latin Americans themselves. Santa Cruz[2] also considered well qualified for job.

5. Belgian FonOff anticipates long GA session.

601. Fol are comments on reasons advanced by FonOff to justify present Neth inclination support Sov satel for election SC (urtel 432 Nov 1).

Gentlemen's agreement with USSR re SC seats was not made at Yalta or Frisco 1945 but in London and it was in our view clearly limited to allocation SC seats in first 1946 election.

While same representation other areas as that which applied for 1946 can still be justified on basis support UN activities, numbers, or contributions, allocation of one non-permanent seat to Sov bloc of five, already represented by USSR, cannot now be justified on any these grounds.

We do not believe support for non-Cominform candidate to succeed Yugo wld be as provocative as election Yugo 1949. In last two yrs Cominform states have done nothing justify increase their representation.

Pls stress to FonOff that we regard maintenance satis majority SC highly important for free world in troubled yrs which lie ahead.

SECRET [PARIS,] November 3, 1951.

YUGOSLAV SEAT IN THE SECURITY COUNCIL

London's 907, October 31,[2] states that the Foreign Office believes it probable that Eden will take up with the Secretary the question of the succession to Yugoslavia's seat on the Security Council.

1. U.K. Attitude.

The United Kingdom is taking a strong position in favor of the election of a satellite to the seat being vacated by Yugoslavia. It takes this position chiefly on the ground that failure to give this seat to the Soviets would irritate the U.S.S.R. and give the impression that we wish to drive them out of the United Nations. Moreover, the United Kingdom is interested in a strict application of the geographic quotas followed in the past in which the Soviet group had one seat in addition to the U.S.S.R.

2. U.S. Position.

As set forth in the attached telegram,[3] the Department's position is that it is opposed to the election of a Soviet satellite and will support the election of that non-Soviet country which has the best chance of election. We consider this necessary in order to maintain public support for the United Nations in the United States. Moreover, under present international conditions the maintenance of a working majority in the Security Council is essential to the free world. On the basis of the information now available, Greece appears to have the best chance of election. We are informing other delegations of the United States position.

Fact that Yugo not member of Sov bloc candidate wld further greatly increase East West tension development which Neth as country in geographic proximity to Russia most anxious to avoid. This connection Boon said he understood UK intends support Sov bloc candidate.

Boon expressed personal hope if US after canvass dels in UNGA found majority wld not back its position—and he considered this likely—US wld not persist in opposition. To do so he felt might really precipitate showdown which wld not only create bitterness among non Commie friends of US but also might be construed as lending force Sov charges US encirclement.

At conclusion conversation Boon said Neth del wld naturally wish exchange views on subject with USDel. He assured me if US cld obtain majority, instructions Neth del wld be changed since Dutch wld not want be associated with minority in such question. Delga 237. Subject: SC elections. Memorandum of Conversation, by Ambassador Philip C. Jessup of the United States Delegation to the General Assembly

CONFIDENTIAL

[PARIS,] November 22, 1951.

Subject: Security Council Slate

Participants: Ambassador Jacob A. Malik,[1] USSR Delegation
Ambassador Philip C. Jessup, United States Delegation

Mr. Malik, USSR, approached me before Committee I began this morning and said he wished to talk to me about the seats on the Security Council. He said that he hoped we could now return to the provisions of the Charter in selecting states for the SC. He said that the agreement reached in 1946 had worked very well until we broke it by putting in Yugoslavia. I told him that we had not broken any agreement and asked him what provision of the Charter he referred to. He said the Charter requires geographical distribution. I said we recognized the principle of geographic distribution but he seemed to be referring rather to political distribution. He insisted that you could not follow the principle of geographic distribution without the agreement of the states in the geographic area. He repeated his reference to the agreement of 1946. I told him that we did not share his view but that this was a question which I was not handling personally.

[1] Ambassador Malik was Permanent Representative of the Soviet Union to the United Nations.

I asked him if he would like to talk to Ambassador Austin or Ambassador Gross. He replied that he wished to talk to me about it and would wait two or three days for my reply. He said he wished me to consider this as an official approach. He then added laughingly that he understood that Mr. Romulo was now holding himself out as a new Slavonic state which should succeed to this seat and said that while they would be glad to include the Philippines, he did not think that the qualifications had yet been demonstrated. I told him I would talk with him again later about this.

Subject: Security Council Slate

Participants: Minister of State Lloyd [1]—U.K. Delegation
Ambassador Philip C. Jessup—U.S. Delegation

At the meeting of Committee I this afternoon, I told Lloyd that Malik had approached me this morning on the question of filling the Yugoslav seat in the Security Council. I said that I noticed he was talking to Lloyd later and wondered if he had raised the same point. Lloyd said that he had. I did not get from him a clear impression of just what reply he made to Malik except that it was probably somewhat evasive. Lloyd said to me that, if we were going to do business with the Soviets, we had to consider agreeing on something. He said the trouble is to determine whether any other particular opening represents a change in attitude or whether it was merely horse trading on a particular issue. He agreed with me that it was quite probable that the Soviets were merely trying in this instance to get back their seat on the Security Council. I told him that we had told a good many people that we were supporting Greece for the Yugoslav seat and that this was among the reasons why any change would probably be impossible. He said they had also told people they were supporting Greece. I also pointed out the difficulty we had all experienced in maintaining even a 7-vote majority in the SC. Although Lloyd said nothing definite to this effect, I got the impression that this was a matter which he would take up with Mr. Eden, and which he was by no means dismissing out of hand.

Minutes of Seventeenth Meeting of the United States Delegation to the General Assembly, Paris, November 23, 1951

SECRET
US/A/M(Chr)/204

2. Security Council Slate. Mr. Taylor explained that of the three seats to be vacated, that of Ecuador had only one possible candidate, Chile, which was the choice of the LA caucus. For the seat of India, only Pakistan was a candidate. The Yugoslav seat offered the only difficulty. The candidacy of the Philippines had in effect been withdrawn, leaving only Greece and Byelo-Russia. The US position had been and continued to be to oppose any satellite for this seat. The so-called "gentleman's agreement" of 1946 was only applicable for that session and for the elections of that time. There was no justification for a second Soviet bloc seat on the Council on the basis of proportional representation within the UN or from the point of view of contribution to the work of the UN or support for its actions on behalf of international peace and security. Furthermore, the functioning of the SC would be disrupted considerably if an additional Soviet bloc member were sitting thereon. Another extremely important reason was, of course, that American public opinion would never understand how the US could allow such a development. In view of these considerations, the US position had been to support in the final analysis the candidate which had the best chance of defeating the Soviet candidate.

With this in mind, the US had been faced with the candidacies of Thailand, the Philippines (as latecomers) and Greece. The first two had withdrawn, and the Greeks had been out garnering considerable support. The last estimate available indicated that Greece had about 20 certain votes and some 16 possible votes already. The chief opponents of Greece for this seat had been the UK, the Commonwealth following the UK lead, and certain Western European countries. Now, however, the UK had come around, bringing most of the Commonwealth with her, as well as some of the Western European countries. The Scandinavians were not yet certain, but it appeared from all impressions available that Greece would fall just short of the necessary 2/3rds vote on the first ballot. In view of this considerable support for Greece, the staff recommended that the Delegation decide to support and vote for Greece.

[1] For information regarding the composition and organization of the United States Delegation, see pp. 2–10 and 37–44.

Mr. Ross added that the Byelo-Russians were certain to obtain six votes, i.e., the five of the Soviet bloc plus Sweden. Miss Gough stated that she had no information on the voting intentions of India or Pakistan; she added that perhaps the Norwegians and Danes would vote for Byelo-Russia on the first ballot, but there were indications that they might switch to Greece on the second ballot.

Ambassador Austin asked the Delegation which Soviet member had approached the US Delegation. Ambassador Jessup answered that Malik had approached him officially, to seek US support for the Byelo-Russian. He noted that Lloyd of the UK had had a similar approach. The appeal to both had been made on the basis of returning to what Malik called the 1946 agreement. Mr. Hyde mentioned that France had been approached in a like manner. (See Daily Secret Summary of 23 Nov., Delga 312, page 3.)[2] In this connection, Ambassador Austin said he had heard that the Russians were calling for a return to "principles" if peace was the real objective. Ambassador Jessup said that his conversation with Malik was undoubtedly the source of this idea, and that in addition, he had the impression from his talk with Lloyd regarding the Soviet approach, that the UK was far from "solid" in their support of Greece, as had been reported earlier.

Ambassador Gross also recalled his talk with Tsarapkin[3] in a similar vein, but in connection with Committee chairmen rather than Council slates. Ambassador Austin remarked that of course at some time in the future, however distant that might be, the US would have to consult with the USSR on such matters, but he added that there was no use of dignifying such talks now with the hope of agreement, since that did not exist. He did think, however, that we ought to consider the possibility of disarming the Soviets of a weapon which would be their ability to say that the US did not even wish to talk with them. Ambassador Jessup reminded the Delegation that an answer to Malik's official approach was called for. Mr. Sandifer said that it would be the Department's view that readiness to talk should not mean that we would relax our position. Such a course would be a serious mistake. To return a satellite to the SC would go a long way to establishing a precedent for the future. The US was certainly not convinced of the validity of any claims for such a seat or for such a precedent. The proportional representation in the GA and the weight of their contributions to the organization were certainly not such as to entitle them to a seat in addition to the USSR's.

Ambassador Austin felt that it was highly important that Mr. Sandifer had made those remarks. There were, in his opinion, two questions for the Delegation to consider. The first one concerned whether the Delegation would adhere to the position taken by the Department. The second had to do with whether we would attempt to disarm the Soviets so that they could not say that the US refused even to consult with them.

[3] S. K. Tsarapkin, Deputy Representative of the Soviet Union to the United Nations and Member of the Soviet Delegation to the General Assembly.

Senator Cooper asked what the status of the so-called "gentleman's agreement" was. Mr. Sandifer replied that the Soviet contention was that in London in 1945 and 1946 during the work of the Preparatory Commission of the United Nations, an agreement had been reached by which one Eastern European seat would be reserved on the Security Council in addition to that of the USSR. He [re]called, however, that when the Yugoslavs had broken with the Soviets and had campaigned for the seat they were now vacating on the Security Council, this same argument had been raised. At that time the record had been gone into very carefully. The US representative on the Preparatory Commission, Mr. Adlai Stevenson, now Governor of the State of Illinois, had also been consulted. Mr. Stevenson had been certain that no binding agreement had been made. The purpose of the arrangement was to determine the composition of the Council for its first term. No agreement in perpetuity could have been contemplated by the makers of that agreement.

In view of this explanation, Senator Cooper said that he liked very much the ideas expressed by Ambassador Austin. Ambassador Austin said that he wondered about having Ambassador Jessup go back to Malik, saying that the Delegation had consulted among itself and found no reason which would allow it to give support to the Soviet candidate. At this point Ambassador Dreier expressed concern lest the Latin Americans hear that the US was telling the Russians that we would not adhere to the patterns established for the Security Council. They would, without doubt, imagine that the US felt the same about their representation. Ambassador Austin asked whether there was supposed to be a pattern or agreement on composition which included the Latin Americans also. Mr. Sandifer said the understanding had been that there would be two seats on the Security Council for the Latin American countries. Although this was not a binding contractual agreement, it nevertheless represented a long-time understanding, based on geographical distribution considerations.

Ambassador Jessup suggested that the key to the situation lay in the fact that the extent of contribution to the organization and geographical distribution were the criteria which made it possible for the US to continue to support two Latin American seats on the Security Council. No factor of political domination was involved. It was the latter factor for which the USSR was arguing, and on that basis they were clearly in the wrong. Mr. Maffitt cautioned that if the US were to adhere rigidly even to this formula, it would run the danger of inadequate representation of the countries in the Far East. New members in the future from that area would thus be excluded from representation on the SC. Mr. Ross agreed with both Ambassador Jessup and Mr. Maffitt. As for Ambassador Jessup's point, the important factor was that the Russians could not claim another Council seat on the basis of political domination, or sympathy. As far as Mr. Maffitt's point was concerned, Mr. Ross urged that a fair degree, at least, of flexibility ought to be reserved in view of the necessity to treat future members of the UN with due respect in seeing that their interests were represented on the Council.

Ambassador Austin apologized for having perhaps misled Ambassador Dreier by the way he had formulated his question. In reformulating it, he asked whether the Delegation agreed that Ambassador Jessup should go to Malik and state that the US position was to favor the candidacy of Greece and consequently against the opponents of Greece, giving our reasons therefor. On the general problem of talking with the USSR, Ambassador Gross said that it might be desirable to consult with the UK and France so that the three powers in responding to Malik's inquiry would not express divergent viewpoints. He recalled in this connection that the UK, which now was "unsolidly" supporting the Greeks, had, in New York earlier, followed a different interpretation of the "gentlemen's agreement". It would be quite unfortunate for two or three western interpretations of this agreement to be made by the west to the USSR. For this reason, he urged advance consultations with the UK and France on exactly what we would say to the Russians.

Mrs. Roosevelt cautioned the delegation on a possible change of attitude by Prime Minister Churchill since the elections were over. She felt it very important that we find out where he now stood, since he was always capable of changing, and quite suddenly. Ambassador Jessup felt that Churchill would maintain a flexible position at least until he went to America to see President Truman at the end of the year. All this matter would be settled before then. Ambassador Jessup did refer, however, to a position that Trygve Lie might be taking. Lie apparently wanted to avoid exacerbating the Russians further for the duration of his extended term of office, and although not known to be campaigning for Byelo-Russia was nevertheless known to favor electing a satellite to the Yugoslav seat.

Mr. Mansfield commented that it was quite apparent from the discussion that there were two sides to this question. He also felt that an eventual coming together of the US and USSR would be necessary. However, it was not urgent that Ambassador Jessup see Malik and it would be best to await Vyshinsky's [4] speech on Saturday in response to the Secretary's speech on disarmament.[5] If Vyshinsky were adamant, we could then tell him we were planning on supporting Greece. If something more than a ray of hope came from the speech, we could change our answer to the extent of telling him we were sorry they came out so late with their candidacy for Byelo-Russia, and that we had already made a commitment to Greece. In the interests of peace, he said, the US must not fail to explore any avenue leading in that direction. This, however, did not mean we would be any less firm. Ambassador Austin thanked Mr. Mansfield for his remarks and said that it seemed to be a very logical application of the original US position.

Mr. Cory warned that the US was pretty thoroughly committed to opposing a satellite. As Mr. Sandifer added, our statement to other delegations in New York and in Paris had all been to the effect that we would support that candidate which stood the best chance of defeating a satellite. Mr. Sandifer also referred to the seven-vote majority necessary for passing resolutions in the Security Council, and added that it was oftentimes difficult enough with the present composition (without a satellite) to obtain a majority. There were no prospects of any change in Soviet policy which indicated that the work of the Security Council would be any easier, or on which we could rely with any degree of certainty. There would be nothing to gain, and much to lose, by waiting before taking the next proposed step in favoring the Greek candidacy, while talking to the UK and France and then going to Malik. He did not think the Department would be able to agree to a change in its commitment against a satellite.

Mr. Mansfield said in explanation of his suggestion that the thing which had impressed him most so far at this session of the UN General Assembly was the Secretary's speech in Committee One on disarmament, and the reaction it had evoked. It had been a presentation of cold facts on a vital topic, essential to ultimate peace. It had been a statement of what the US was prepared to do. We must now wait to hear what the important Russian reply would be. He said there would be no harm in waiting to see what they said before Ambassador Jessup gave Malik an appropriate answer.

Ambassador Austin suggested that since Delegation meetings were frequent, this matter could easily be handled within the Delegation, and it would not do any harm to follow the suggestion of Mr. Mansfield to hold off on talking to Malik for a few days. Since there was no objection to this course of action, and since the elections were not immediate, any decision on Security Council slates would be postponed. Mr. Mansfield added to this that the suggestion made by him did not change the Department position and that all that was needed before giving a reply to Malik would be to await the Vyshinsky reply to the Secretary. Mrs. Roosevelt related her problems in her Committee to the conversation with Malik and the possible character of the reply of Vyshinsky. From what she gathered, there would be little cause for hope in the Vyshinsky statement. With this, the meeting adjourned, after Mr. Taylor had cautioned that Secretariat action might conceivably put Council elections ahead a few days, necessitating an early Delegation meeting on this subject again.[6]

CHARLES D. COOK

[6] The following is recorded at the end of the minutes of the 20th meeting of the Delegation on November 27: "Mr. Taylor noted, with respect to the SC slate, that in view of the nature of Mr. Vyshinsky's statement last Saturday [November 24], Ambassador Jessup would now inform Mr. Malik that the US intended fully to support Greece for this seat. Other members of the Delegation would take the same position with other Delegations." (Doc. US/A/M(Chr)/207)

Memorandum of Conversation, by Ambassador Philip C. Jessup of the United States Delegation to the General Assembly

SECRET PARIS, November 27, 1951.

US/A/3395

Subject: Slate in Security Council—Disarmament

Participants: Ambassador Y. Malik—USSR Delegation
Ambassador Philip C. Jessup—US Delegation

In accordance with the decision of the Delegation, I arranged with Mr. Vishinsky at the close of the Committee I session this morning to meet Mr. Malik at the Palais at 5:45 before the meeting of the General Committee.

Mr. Malik was accompanied by the young interpreter. I told him that I wished to answer his question and to ask a question. I said I would give him our answer and give him the reasons for our answer, but that I did not expect that we would reach agreement today on our position.

I then told him that we had considered the question of seats in the Security Council and had decided to vote for Greece, and that we had announced that decision. Malik started to interrupt, but I told him that I wished to state our reasons. I said that we did not admit the existence of an agreement made in 1946 along the lines which the Soviets claimed. I said there had been a discussion in regard to the original composition of the Council but no permanent arrangements. I said that, in regard to the Charter, there were both the provision about geographical distribution and the principle of contribution to the UN. I said we thought that Greece could make a better contribution. I reminded him that Vishinsky in his speech in the First Committee on Saturday had said that the views of a regional group should be followed except when there were special ethical or political reasons. Perhaps our view about Byelorussia in the Security Council was due to what Vishinsky called ethical or political reasons.

Malik then started to repeat the usual arguments. We had turned geography all around with our formation of the Atlantic bloc. We were trying to fill up the SC with seven members of the Atlantic bloc. We were unwilling to follow the provisions of the Charter. We were violating the agreement of 1946. They had checked this agreement, and there was nothing about limiting it to one year and it was in fact applied until we put Yugoslavia in. These arguments were advanced without any particular vigor and more or less as if he were reciting his lesson. I said that, as I had told him at the outset, I did not expect him to agree with me but I had stated the situation and our reasons. He said he was sorry we had made such a decision.

CONFIDENTIAL PRIORITY PARIS, November 30, 1951— 9 p. m.

Delga 448. Re ICJ elections.[1] LA caucus last night decided unanimously to press vigorously for retention four seats on ICJ. Comite appointed to work on tactics and solicit support other dels. Gonzalez,

[1] Elections to the International Court of Justice (ICJ) as well as to the Security Council were pending at this time. The specific problem posed for the U.S. Delegation was how to harmonize the U.S. position as between the two elections, in view of a decision made in the Department of State in October to support an Asian instead of a Latin American for one of five regular vacancies then occurring on the Court. Considerable documentation exists in file 320 on the question of the ICJ elections in 1951. The basic Department of State instruction to the U.S. Delegation is in telegram Gadel 100 to Paris, November 7 (320/11–751) ; the principal U.S. Delegation working paper on the matter, Doc. US/A/3389, November 25, 1951, in turn was based on Gadel 100.

The basis of the U.S. position was that three general principles should apply to the election of judges: (a) the Big Five should be represented; (b) incumbents who had served well and wished to be reelected should generally be supported; and (c) depending upon (b), posts occupied by nationals of small states should be rotated. In effect, in terms of the specific ICJ situation at this time, U.S. policymakers formulated a fourth principle, namely that geographic representation on the Court should be more balanced. This was reflected in the October decision in the Department of State to support Sir Benegal Rau of India for a vacancy being created by the retirement of a Latin American incumbent, that is, to increase the representation of Asia on the ICJ.

The U.S. Delegation to the General Assembly considered the ICJ question at meetings on November 13, November 28, December 3, and December 6. The November 28 meeting was devoted entirely to this problem (Doc. US/A/M(Chr)/280, IO Files).

chairman caucus, told US Del that caucus wished to inform us that we shld not now count on Latin American support Greece's candidacy for SC. Gonzalez and others indicated that caucus tended towards position that it wld accept US stand on principle with reference US vote for judges but in return LA's wld take stand on principle of particular importance to them, namely retention London understanding on geographic distribution of seats and right of each region to select their own candidates. This wld lead them to vote for Byelorussia. Final decision on Latin American votes for Greece or Byelorussia has not been reached however.

Re developments Latin Amer caucus as result our ICJ position reported Delga 448, USGADel staff recommends circular instruction to Latin Amer capitals reiterating importance we attach to rejection of Sov satellite Byelorussian candidacy for SC. This shld be stated in affirmative form of reaffirmation of reasons for this position and of our support for Greece as principal candidate for this seat. Circular shld express hope dels will be instructed to take similar position in SC elections next week.

Strong conviction of USGADel staff that we must maintain our position re SC election and this will be recommended USGADel in reporting present sitn on Mon morning.

Holmes[1] at our request has talked to officer in charge of FonOff today, Dixon,[2] and indicated our serious concern over this sitn. These views will be communicated to Eden who is away from London for weekend. Dixon thought Jebb might have instructions by tomorrow night.

At our suggestion Bonsal[3] talked this morning with De La Tournelle[4] and found Fr surprisingly categorical on supporting Byelorussia. He admitted they thought they had probably "corrupted" Brit on this score. Bonsal reiterated importance we attach to supporting Greece and rejecting Sov satellite Byelorussia.

CONFIDENTIAL NIACT WASHINGTON, December 2, 1951—1:45 p. m.

500. UNGA will hold elections this week, probably Dec 5, to fill seats on Security Council being vacated by India, Ecuador and Yugo. Elections fill first two seats (US supporting Pakistan and Chile respectively) present no particular difficulties but election fill seat now held by Yugo and formerly by members Sov bloc is special problem. USSR has put forward candidacy of Byelorussia, claiming Sov bloc entitled to one nonpermanent seat on basis a 1946 gentleman's agreement that Eastern Eur, Western Eur, British Commonwealth, and Near East and Africa shld each have one seat and LAs two seats.

Dept strongly opposes election of Sov sponsored country fill Yugo seat for fol reasons:

1. Apart from consideration that gentleman's agreement, although followed in succeeding years, was in our view meant to apply for 1946 only, allocation one non-permanent seat to Sov bloc of 5, already represented on SC by USSR, cannot now be justified on any grounds. On other hand, same representation other areas as that which applied for 1946 (such as two seats for LAs) can still be justified on basis numbers, support for UN activities or contributions.
2. Election of Sov candidate wld make functioning of SC, already obstructed by USSR tactics, all the more difficult. Further, maintenance safe voting margin in SC is highly important for free world in difficult years which lie ahead.
3. GA already decided in 1949 against election Sov candidate when it elected Yugo over Czech and events past two years make it even more inappropriate that Sov candidate shld be elected. We do not believe election non-Sov candidate to succeed Yugo wld be as provocative as election Yugo in 1949.

Greece is principal non-Sov candidate for Yugo seat and US strongly supports its election. Greece has been one of main supporters UN programs, including Korea. Art 23 of Charter provides that in SC elections due regard shld be specially paid in first instance to contribution UN Members maintenance intl peace and security and other purposes of Organization. Further, Greece borders on area from which Eastern Eur seat hitherto filled and has deep interest that area.

Unless you perceive strong objection, pls stress soonest above US position to FonOff and express hope its GADel will be instructed take or continue take this position. [2] Of answers received before the voting began on December 6, somewhat less than half assured that categoric instructions were being sent to Paris to vote for Greece. The remainder were noncommittal but strongly pointed in the direction of voting with the "Latin American bloc." Only one government specifically linked the Security Council and ICJ elections, suggesting a settlement of issues on a quid pro quo basis. Ecuador was the object of particular interest to the U.S. Delegation as the incumbent Security Council president was an Ecuadoran (Antonio Quevedo), but the Delegation seems not to have known the direction of the Ecuadoran vote. The reaction in Montevideo to the U.S. démarche was, that "Uruguay would not consider voting against Greece unless obliged to do so to maintain faith and confidence of Latin block which [Foreign Minister] insisted Uruguay can not let down." At lunch with Sir Gladwyn Jebb today, he informed me that although he had not yet received instructions from London to vote for Byelorussia for the Yugoslav vacancy in the Security Council, he believed the decision would be made shortly. . . . Accordingly, after talking with Mr. Sandifer, I gave this message to Mr. Julius Holmes, in the London Embassy, and told him of Circular Telegram No. 500 (Control 214, Dec 2) and which I thereafter asked our Code Room to repeat to him.

Mr. Holmes said that Ambassador Gifford had an appointment to talk with Mr. Eden on Wednesday and doubted whether he could see him before then. I therefore suggested to Holmes that he communicate at once with the Foreign Office to endeavor to have the decision put off until Ambassador Gifford has had a chance to talk with Mr. Eden on Wednesday. Mr. Holmes said he would do what he can.

During the afternoon I went with Mr. Bonsal to discuss the subject with Mr. Maurice Schumann and explained our position at length along the general lines of Circular 500. Schumann professed to be greatly surprised when I told him that the Charter provided that in the election of non-permanent members to the Security Council due regard should be paid to the contribution of members of the UN to the maintenance of international peace and security. He also said that he had been unaware of the intense importance which we attached to the election of a non-Cominform State to the Security Council.

In response to his inquiry concerning the British position, I said that although I could not of course speak for the British, it was my understanding that the British Government had not yet made a final decision and I hoped that they would carry out their commitment which they had made some time ago to support Greece. Mr. Schumann appeared to be sufficiently impressed by the exposition of our point of view to indicate that if the decision were up to him, he would vote for Greece, but that although he would undoubtedly be in the French seat and would therefore have to cast the vote in the Assembly, it was a matter of sufficient importance for him to discuss fully with "the other Schuman".[4]

In order to derive optimum benefit from the approach which Mr. Bonsal and I made to the Quai d'Orsay, Mr. Bonsal suggested that he would inform Mr. de la Tournelle during the afternoon of the substance of our conversation with Maurice Schumann.

Amb. Jean Chauvel, French Delegation
Mr. Julius Holmes, Amer Embassy, London [1]
Amb. Ernest A. Gross, U.S. Delegation

Last evening Maurice Schumann phoned to inform me of developments on this subject. He said that following his meeting with Mr. Bonsal and myself, he had talked to Robert Schuman and he indicated to me that a decision had been taken to support Greece, subject to further word regarding the British position. Speaking very frankly, Maurice Schumann told me they had subsequently received word of the British decision to vote for Byelorussia and thereupon reverted to the previous French position, which was to support Byelorussia.

I expressed grave disappointment and told him that we also had been informed to our regret of the British decision, but that Ambassador Gifford was to raise the question with Mr. Eden today, and I therefore hoped the French would keep their position as flexible as possible pending further developments. Mr. Schumann made no commitment, but expressed interest in the information that we were still pursuing the matter with the British.

Later in the evening Amb. Chauvel told me that the French decision had been based not so much on "principle" as on their fear lest the election of Greece this year might create a very confused situation next year when the term of Turkey expires.

During the course of the evening I had an opportunity for a long talk with Selwyn Lloyd at dinner. He opened the conversation on this subject in a somewhat defensive manner, saying half-jokingly that he supposed they were "very unpopular with us now." I outlined our views as persuasively as I was able. I said that one of the most puzzling aspects of the matter was the fact that the United Kingdom had made a commitment to Greece. Lloyd admitted this was so. I also expressed disappointment that the Foreign Office had not acceded to the request of our Embassy to delay the decision until Ambassador Gifford had had an opportunity to talk with Mr. Eden. I told Mr. Lloyd I had this information from Julius Holmes. Lloyd, who did not know of the discussions between our Embassy and the Foreign Office on this matter, said, "That is most regrettable."

Lloyd tried earnestly to justify Mr. Eden's decision. He said that latter had been swayed by consideration of the fact that in 1949 the British Government had publicly affirmed its intention to adhere to the so-called "Gentlemen's Agreement of 1946" regarding the distribution of seats in the Security Council. Lloyd said Mr. Eden felt it could not now take the position there was no such agreement. I repeated to Lloyd, as I had done on previous occasions, our view that there was no agreement going beyond a composition of the first Council.

Lloyd, speaking very frankly, made the significant comment that another factor in Mr. Eden's mind was a desire to indicate that the present British Government "could move toward the Soviet Union." Lloyd said it was easier for the new Government to do so because they would not so readily incur our suspicion since the unshakeable and solid ties between us were beyond doubting. On the other hand, the Labor Government, he said, was always under the pressure of "forty or fifty Bevanites" [2] and any moves which the Labor Government might make toward the Soviet Union were always likely to be played up in such a way as to cause deep distrust and resentment in American public opinion.

[2] A reference to the Labor Party group in the House of Commons led by Aneurin Bevan, Minister of Labor and National Service in the Attlee Cabinet. They constituted a radical wing of the Labor Party.

Reverting to the subject of the elections to the Security Council, I said that under the circumstances the question was what the British would do after the first ballot, assuming that neither Greece nor Byelorussia were elected. I expressed the earnest hope that the British would feel that they had honored their so-called obligation after the first ballot and would then vote for Greece. Lloyd said he would discuss this matter further with his Government.

I made this same point to Chauvel and told him I wished to follow it up with him as well as the British.

I phoned Julius Holmes this morning to advise him of my discussion with Mr. Lloyd and suggested that Ambassador Gifford urge upon Mr. Eden the importance of the British (assuming they do not reverse their present instructions to the UK Delegation) switching to Greece after the first ballot in the event that neither Greece nor Byelorussia wins on the first ballot. Mr. Holmes said he would advise Amb. Gifford and have a go at it with Mr. Eden.

Minutes of Twenty-seventh Meeting of the United States Delegation to the General Assembly, Paris, December 6, 1951

SECRET

Mr. Taylor outlined the agenda for the plenary meetings scheduled for December 6 and 7 and the positions which would be taken by the US on the various items. The first item was the formal installation of the Assistant Secretary-General for Social Affairs. The second item was the election of the three non-permament members of the Security Council. The Delegation, in accordance with its previous decisions, would vote for Chile, Pakistan and Greece. Our present tally indicated that Greece ought to come fairly close to the necessary two-thirds vote on the first ballot. There should be switches to Greece on the second ballot. The Scandinavians, for example, had indicated they would switch to Greece after the first ballot. Developments with respect to the British position on this matter were important. Mr. Taylor asked Ambassador Gross to indicate the results of his conversations with the British. Ambassador Gross stated that the UK position still remained to vote for Byelorussia. The French, influenced by the UK position, had decided to vote for Byelorussia, too. The important question was, how soon after the first ballot would the UK and France switch to Greece. Every effort had been made to try to persuade them to change their position, but without success. Ambassador Gifford had seen Mr. Eden in London about this, but also in vain. Ambassador Sunde of Norway had stated that the Scandinavians would be under pressure to change after the first ballot. Since indications were that the tide would change, it was important to avoid giving an impression of US acquiescence in States voting for Byelorussia on the first ballot, since this might tend to freeze the situation. In talking with Ambassador Gifford, in the presence of Mrs. Roosevelt and Mr. Harriman, Ambassador Gross had said that the present British attitude was not a good prelude to the forthcoming talks between Mr. Churchill and President Truman in Washington.[1]

Ambassador Gross thought that there were indications that other western Europeans would also vote for Byelorussia. Luxembourg and Belgium would, however, vote for Greece. A conversation with Mr. Pearson had shown that the Canadians were waivering but would probably vote for Greece without saying much about it. A primary factor in the British position appeared to stem from the UK interpretation of the so-called "Gentlemen's Agreement" of 1946. The US was certain that this arrangement was not intended to apply beyond the first SC elections in London in 1946. Governor Stevenson of Illinois had represented the US on those early meetings and had specifically confirmed this. The USSR, of course, was claiming that the US had broken this agreement. Ambassador Gross felt that the UK attitude was important not only for the present but for its effect upon the future institutional development of the UN. It had appeared that the present UK Government wanted to make some kind of overture to the Soviet Union and thought that this was a good way to do it. They also were slightly concerned lest a vote against the Soviet candidate might precipitate a Soviet walkout. The principal reason, however, remained the British interpretation of the 1946 agreement. The British stated that in 1949, on the occasion of the election of Yugoslavia to the Council, they had publicly reaffirmed their interpretation of the 1946 agreement.

Mrs. Roosevelt said she would reverse the explanation by Ambassador Gross of the UK reasoning to read that their interpretation of the 1946 agreement was motivated by their desires. Ambassador Gross said he could not disagree. He added that he also could see no possibility of a Soviet walkout. Mr. Sandifer noted that the Russians were not even threatening so to act.

Mr. Cohen commented on the effect on public relations of this situation. He felt that so long as the hostilities continued in Korea there could be no question of supporting a state which had indicated its opposition to UN action there. Ambassador Jessup agreed with this statement, adding, however, that we should make every effort to avoid having the present situation characterized as a "big split" among the Western Powers.

Ambassador Gross commented that the British instructions were to inform only the US, France, Greece, the Dominions and the Russians of their position. Otherwise it was to be kept a "dark secret".

Mr. Taylor stated that the third item on the plenary agenda was the ECOSOC election. Mr. Taylor recalled that the Delegation had decided to vote for China, France, Argentina, Cuba, Belgium and Australia. The situation was much less acute in these elections. The dynamic factor involved in them came from their relationship to the ICJ elections. He pointed out that whatever our tally showed as to relative voting strength, it would be subject to variation depending upon the degree of Latin American activity. He recalled that our instructions would allow us to vote for Burma only in case it was certain that Egypt would not be elected and Australia showed no prospects of winning. Mr. Lubin asked whether the US would not be in a better position vis-à-vis the Latin Americans if the ICJ elections were held first. Mr. Taylor stated that the agenda was set and it would be very difficult to change it.

The fourth item would be the ICJ elections. The Security Council would meet in Conference Room 4, with Ambassador Gross sitting for the US. In the special election to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Azevedo (Brazil), the US would vote for Carneiro, also a Brazilian. It seemed certain that Carneiro would be elected by a large majority.

In the regular elections for the five expired terms, the US would vote for Rau, Klaestad, Hackworth, Golunsky and DeVisscher. Our tally showed that Ugon of Uruguay would obtain 9 or 10 votes in the Security Council. Mr. Taylor was not certain whether Klaestad or DeVisscher would be defeated by Ugon's apparent success. The result would depend on which of those two the Latin Americans decided to oppose to assure Ugon's election. The US vote, in accordance with instructions and the decision of the Delegation, would remain as presently determined unless it appeared that Klaestad or DeVisscher had no chance of being elected. In this case the Delegation would reconsider and probably vote with the majority for Ugon.[2]

[Here follows a discussion of the remaining items on the agenda of the forthcoming plenary meetings, which consisted of reports from the Credentials Committee, the Ad Hoc Political Committee, and the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Committees.]

[2] For the record of voting on December 6 for the three nonpermanent seats of the Security Council, see United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, Sixth Session, Plenary Meetings, pp. 203 ff. (hereafter cited as GA (VI), Plenary). Chile and Pakistan were elected on the first ballot. None of the others received the necessary two-thirds majority, but Greece and Byelorussia were at the head of the list. There followed three "restricted" ballots as between Greece and Byelorussia, with inconclusive results. In three "unrestricted" ballots (any eligible Member qualifying), the deadlock continued, with two other states reappearing. In further pursuance of the rules of the General Assembly governing such procedure (Rule 94), the president ordered one more restricted ballot (Greece and Byelorussia alone), which was inconclusive. The president then declared the election postponed "in order to give us all time for reflection." (ibid., p. 205)

The elections for the seats on the International Court of Justice proceeded on the same day, and concurrently in the General Assembly and in the Security Council. Messrs. Golunsky (Soviet Union), Hackworth (United States), Klaestad (Norway), Ugon (Uruguay), and Sir Benegal Rau (India) were elected. 559. Re SC elections. GADel staff has attempted analyse voting situation and herewith presents recommendations concerning preparation for election now scheduled for Thursday Dec 13. It is clear that only through major effort can necessary 40 votes for Greece be secured. Accordingly, we strongly recommend action be taken immediately by Dept along lines suggested numbered paras below. We noted today some tendency turn toward dark horse as substitute for Greece. We have resisted this in strongest terms and believe issue must be presented sharply as simply Greece vs. Byelo. Importance of earliest possible switch to Greece shld be emphasized, since first two ballots restricted to Greece and Byelo, after which in fol three ballots votes may be cast for any state. Moreover, since switch by some dels will probably be possible only when Greece develops clear lead crux of problem in securing substantial gain first ballot.

Fol is our analysis last ballot yesterday (restricted to Byelo and Greece alone) in which 32 voted for Byelo, 27 for Greece and one abstention. According best calculations we can make fol probably among those who voted for Byelo: 5 Soviets, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, UK, Fr, Neth, Iran, Yemen, Saudi Arabia, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Burma, Afghanistan, Yugoslavia, Israel, Iran, and 8 or 9 LA states (see immediately fol tel).[1] Number dels such as Scandinavian and Neth had informed us they wld switch from Byelo to Greece, on assumption that Greece wld show clear lead. When this lead failed materialize they continued vote for Byelo.

1. UK and Europe.

Key problem is UK. UK position must have been taken by Churchill[2] himself and involved failure to follow through on commitment given Greece. UK del here said wld switch to Greece after strong lead obtained; we note however, from Athens 2605, Dec 5, rptd info Paris 64, Eden's personal note stating that if Slav state did not secure necessary vote on first ballot British wld then switch to Greece. In view previous efforts London and here, we recommend strongest representations at highest level including possibility of personal note from Secy to Eden, making clear the genuine seriousness this issue to them. Recommend same steps be taken re France. Re other states Eur area, recommend representations to three Scandinavian Govts and Neth either at Washn or their capitals, urging instructions that their dels switch to Greece on first or second ballot next Thursday. Background is that Scandinavian dels agreed vote on first ballot for Byelo, each member being free to switch vote for Greece thereafter. We were informed by Nor that they intended to switch but Sweden and Danes appeared to prefer continued support for Byelo. Dutch informed us their instructions were vote Byelo first ballot with discretion switch to Greece thereafter. Thors[3] (Iceland) informed us in greatest confidence that he had consistently voted for Greece and would continue to do so but asked that this not be disclosed to anyone especially Scandinavian countries.

2. NE states if not inconsistent with Dept's overall objectives in area, we suggest circular tel be sent Jidda, Baghdad, Tehran, Tel Aviv and Kabul, instructing chiefs mission raise matter those govts. Suggest no approach be made Leb (which appears firm in any event) since FonMin here [4] might resent action. Also suggest no action Damascus as del here apparently acting own initiative in view unsettled conditions and has apparently been firm for Greece. Delga 560. See immediately preceding Delga [559]. Re: Latin American voting on successor to Yugo in SC. Last restricted vote yesterday, 32 for Byelo (Byelorussia), 27 for Greece and one abstention, according to best calculations we can make, wld seem to have included 8 or 9 LA's for Byelo and 11 for Greece. We have reason believe Argentina, Chile, El Salvador, Guatemala, Mexico, Paraguay and Uruguay were among Byelo supporters. Bolivia, Brazil, Colombia, Costa Rico, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Haiti, Honduras, Nicaragua, Panama and Peru have told us they voted for Greece. Venezuela before vote told us wld not support Byelo but did not indicate how it wld vote. Perhaps it was the abstention.

During successive ballots it became obvious some LA's were voting for Byelo as tactic to deadlock and adjourn vote until after ICJ elections, as method of pressure for Ugon.

Conversations subsequent to ICJ election indicate Mexico and Paraguay may switch to Greece. On pure speculation we expect El Salvador, Uruguay and Venezuela also to switch. Election of Ugon might be determining factor in these cases. Argentina, Chile, Ecuador and Guatemala are, in their several ways, special cases.

We have it from one LA colleague that Argentina and Ecuador, greatly influenced by possibility that SC, in Iranian or some other case, may in future again be confronted by question of right of a govt take over commercial claims of a national. Ecuador's position in recent Iranian case will be recalled. It may be that these two countries will figure that Byelo can be relied upon more than Greece to sustain thesis that a state may not take on claim of one of its nationals.

Chile wld seem to have no logical reason for supporting Byelo, but in gen seems to be thought by its colleagues inclined do so. Perhaps resentment at US ICJ position influences it. Guatemala during this assembly has rather consistently been on Sov side, as was forecast by some at outset.

Some resentment has been noted over our recent démarches in LA capitals, which in one case was interpreted as protest and in others were made, or at least reported to their delegations here by FonOffs involved, so soon before vote as to appear to LA's to represent open pressure. It occurs to us that without in any way seeming acknowledge efficacy of LA action or eat crow, Dept might usefully send another circular asking chiefs of missions to inform govts to which accredited that momentary incident in Paris arising over ICJ is in our opinion closed, that outcome was happy for LA candidate whom circumstances permitted US to support in Security Council showdown vote (US helping break deadlock by voting for Ugon) and that we give no credit to rumors that our failure to support Ugon at outset has created lasting differences between US and LA brethren. It is recommended that no further pressure be put on any LA govt including those believe are likely to vote for Byelo.

Such a friendly gesture as this démarche when learned of by LA's here might well have favorable effect on dels which for final vote next week have been given discretion. Atmosphere has eased considerably in recent days, especially since Ugon's election, but there is evidence that resentment still exists in some quarters and cld unfavorably influence voting.

Delga 567. Re: SC elections. Discussions with UK del subsequent to events reported Delga 559, December 7, emphasize importance of representations to highest levels London. UK del has frankly disclosed to Gross doubt whether UK del wld switch to Greece even if on first ballot on Thurs, December 13, Greece shows lead over Byelo.

Maximum commitment obtainable from UK del here is that they wld "feel free to switch" in event Greece took lead. This obviously not commitment at all.

We are keeping Harriman closely advised and he feels just as strongly as does GADel that continuance of present UK position wld not only create friction and misunderstanding between US and UK people but wld make more difficult MSA program. Harriman feels and we agree that election Byelo to SC wld weaken free world posit vis-à-vis USSR and, therefore, it wld be against highest interests UK as well as ourselves to permit this to happen if it can be avoided. We believe Brit analysis of sitn is wrong and that course which they have been following on this matter does not constitute a constructive "approach" toward Sov Union, despite apparent Brit feeling that their support Byelo somehow brings UK and Sov Govt closer together.

We suggest US approach to London shld avoid "whip-cracking" and shld stress our sincere belief that we are right in principle and that higher common interests of both of us wld be served by supporting Greece.

not agree to support Greece as Brit felt bound by agreement of 1946 to include a "Slav state" in SC under the concept of geographic distribution. This was telephoned US del GA Paris. I urged that Brit support Greece on second ballot. He said same principle applied to second ballot as first but I urged he give further consideration to second ballot. To this he commented that understood Greece would in all probability win without Brit vote. He also turned down my suggestion that UK might abstain. Harriman telephoned me evening of December 5 while I was dining with Eden. I raised matter again with him then. Delga 581. Re SC elections. At his request, Politis (Greece) [1] called on Gross at evening in considerable state of agitation concerning the developments of the past week on the Grk candidacy for the SC. He affirmed in strongest terms the understanding of the Grk Govt that both UK and Fr had made firm commitments to support Greece and repeatedly characterized their default as "treason". With respect to Fr commitment, he described circumstantially discussion he had held with Maurice Schumann about ten days ago in which latter had raised with him question of Grk attitude toward placing the Moroccan item on GA agenda.[2] Politis said he had explained to Schumann the predicament of the Grk del, which desired to bring up the Cyprus question and which, therefore, cld not vote against putting the Moroccan item on the agenda since in certain respects there was a parallel between the two questions.

However, according to Politis, this discussion with Maurice Schumann concluded on the basis that the Fr wld support the Grk candidacy for the SC in return for which the Grk del wld abstain on the Moroccan question. Politis said he had also discussed the matter with Robert Schuman and indicated that the same understanding has been reached. The Grk Govt was, therefore, at a complete loss to understand why the Fr had reneged. Politis said he had reason to believe the Fr had sought to persuade Belgium and Luxembourg to vote for Byelo.

With regard to Brit position, not only had Greece recd a commitment of support from the Brit Govt, which commitment in addition to our own had induced the Grk Govt to enter the race, but the Grk Govt had later recd a note from Mr. Eden advising them that although the Brit wld vote for Byelo on the first ballot, it wld switch to Greece thereafter. Despite this note, it was clear that the Brit had continued to vote for Byelo up to and including the last ballot taken before the voting was adjourned.

Moreover, said Politis, a Grk correspondent had raised the question with a press officer of the Brit del, who had made the comment that if the Greeks recd 35 or so votes on a subsequent ballot, they shld "feel that their prestige and honor had been maintained" and shld then withdraw from the race.

Politis requested our views. Gross replied that there shld be no question in the mind of the Grk Govt concerning our firm intention to see this matter through. Without characterizing the Brit and Fr action, Gross said we were in strong disagreement with them and intended to maintain the strongest effort at the necessary high levels to persuade both the Brit and Fr Govts that the election of Greece to the SC wld serve the highest interests of the free world.

Gross expressed emphatic disagreement with the reported comment to the Brit press officer and added that there had been some talk of a substitute candidate in the event that subsequent balloting remained indecisive, but that we had taken a firm position against this and that we were actively discouraging to the best of our ability any thoughts along this line.

Gross told Politis he cld take what he had said as the official point of view of the US Govt and make his report accordingly.

SECRET PRIORITY WASHINGTON, December 11, 1951—7:35 p. m.

Gadel 417. 1. We have been seriously concerned re developments Greece–Byelorussia contest SC seat, especially since LA defection became apparent because of unfortunate ICJ slates problem. Since last week's deadlock we have been considering how far we cld usefully go to assist Greeks and what tactics wld be most appropriate, bearing in mind Delgas 559 and 560.

2. We appreciate fact Greece has been innocent victim circumstances. We trust Del's estimate that Greeks will gain five votes from LA states when voting resumed Dec 13 correct, but we realize LA shift alone cannot at best bring about Greece's election.

3. Key to situation, in our opinion, therefore remains UK together with WE states which are strongly influenced by UK position. Like Greeks, we were misled into belief UK wld shift support to Greece after first ballot. We have approved strong and repeated representations made by Gifford to Eden, but recognize there is only very slight chance these or any others will be effective.

4. Given these unexpected difficulties, problem is whether to engage US prestige beyond point already reached in effort secure election Greece. Our thinking on this point is colored by several factors:

(a) We have made honest effort bring about defeat Sov satellite and, as Greece emerged as principal anti-satellite candidate, to bring about its election. USDel cannot be reproached for failing in any way meet its commitments.

(b) We foresee little prospect that extraordinary measures which might be undertaken by Dept—i.e., representations to Ambs or circulars to field suggested Delga 559—will have decisive impact on recipients. All of them already know what our position is and why we hold it. We have considered various further approaches to LAs including suggestion Delga 560 and have concluded there is nothing further that cld usefully be done.

(d) Moreover, other states will be unable understand why we make extraordinary efforts gain their support on an issue which does not seem to them of first rank substantive importance. In their view, presence or absence of Sov satellite to echo its master's voice will not markedly affect functioning of SC. As we have observed, it is difficult convince others that presence of a satellite may on occasion rob us of crucial seventh vote on closely contested issues.

(e) Failing to understand basis our anxiety, other states may regard our efforts as indication we do not feel secure in our leadership. This may affect their confidence in our judgment and, in some cases, may lead to attempts trade off support for Greece in exchange concessions from us on unrelated subjects. This we cld not permit.

5. Our conclusion is that we shld not make further extraordinary efforts pressure other states into support of Greece. We do not mean by this to imply you shld not follow line set forth in Delga 581, Dec 10, maintaining Dels strong support for Greece. However, if impasse continues through next balloting, we doubt desirability completely foreclosing possibility compromise candidate. We continue strongly to desire defeat of satellite and election of Greece, but are convinced that undue pressure tactics will at this stage push us past point of diminishing returns, considering our position in the largest sense.

From ensuing discussion it became clear UK del still without instrs to switch to Gr on subsequent ballots. Gross took opportunity to set forth in strongest terms US position along lines Delga 567, Dec 8. On basis Chauvel's comments, it is clear, as we had suspected, that Fr position entirely dependent upon Brit and if UK switches to Gr, Fr will unquestionably do likewise. Jebb told Gross UK del wld seek firm instrs re position future ballots.

We have seen London's 2669, Dec 10. We are struck by omission of ref on part of Eden to UK commitments to Gr and in particular Eden's letter to Plastiras, text of which we have not seen but which is obviously interpreted by Gr Govt in Athens (Athens No. 2650 and No. 2668, Dec 8) as well as by Gr del here (Delga 581, Dec 10) as a UK commitment to switch to Gr after first ballot. Both Lloyd and Jebb have confirmed to Gross fact of earlier UK commitment to support Gr but neither has sought to explain repudiation of commitment. Re Eden's comment to Gifford that Gr wld in all probability win without Brit vote, our canvass here shows that Gr may have difficulty even with Brit vote and it shld accordingly be brought home to Eden that votes of UK and those which like Fr are fol the UK lead will probably be decisive factor in outcome of election.

We also have reason to believe from discussions with Fr del that Maurice Schumann did in fact commit Fr to support of Gr as Politis had previously informed us (Delga 581, Dec 10). Altho absence of both Schumanns from Paris makes impossible requisite high-level discussions here, we still regard UK position as key (Delga 559, Dec 7).

Gross without success pressed for UK shifting to Greece on first ballot or in any event UK shifting to Greece on second ballot irrespective of outcome of first ballot.

Chauvel also revealed that Fr FonOff recd info from Massigli [1] to effect Brit FonOff had authorized Jebb to concert with Chauvel. In light of foregoing, it wld be most useful to us if we cld obtain firmer info concerning nature of UK instruction to Jebb this matter. 2724. Acting FonMin Averoff confides that after consultation yesterday afternoon with Rendis and Varvoutis he instructed Politis provisionally to withdraw from contest for SC seat if Greece did not obtain ⅔ majority next ballot. Averoff said this instruction sent with some reluctance as Politis had telegraphed that USDel anxious Greeks remain in race. However Averoff said, govt concerned by rising tide of anti-Brit sentiment here which it feared might result in Britain's refusal to purchase this year's currant crop now ready for market.

In view of much greater irritation to Brit through Greek Govt's increasing agitation Cyprus question and current indications that Greek FonOff may recognize Farouk as King of Sudan, alleged fears of split with Brit over SC seat seem rather far-fetched. More likely reasons wld appear criticism of govt's bungling in opposition press and Parl, native timidity, and Averoff's long-time personal opposition to putting Greece in SC where it might be forced to take open stand against Egypt.

Obviously aforesaid three Greek Mins acted without consultation with PriMin and without knowledge of fact that PriMin had requested US views before making decision re withdrawal. Consequently now attempting coordinate situation.

Minutes of Thirty-second Meeting of the United States Delegation to the General Assembly, Paris, December 13, 1951

SECRET

1. Mr. Taylor called attention to Gadel 417, received the night before, in the last paragraph of which the Department's views were set forth on the question of the election to the Yugoslav seat in the Security Council. The Department indicated that the Delegation should not drop all consideration of the possibility of a compromise candidate in the event that Greece's chances seemed to be waning. Pointing out that this telegram would have been more helpful had it been received a week earlier, Mr. Taylor referred to a new complication in the situation as a result of new instructions being sent Dr. Politis from Athens (see niact 2728 Athens to Washington, repeated info to Paris niact 77). Although not completely clear, it seemed that Politis might withdraw the Greek candidacy for this seat if after the third ballot Greece no longer stood chance of getting the necessary two-thirds vote. If the word were to get around that Politis had instructions to this effect Greece's chances would be completely scuttled. Ambassador Gross had not been able to contact Politis the night before when we received word of this development. Mrs. Roosevelt thought the Delegation could not now shift its vote to a compromise candidate since there would be no time to reach agreement with enough delegations to assure success. She felt that the Department should have decided some time ago if it wished the Delegation to pursue the indicated course. Now the Delegation would have to vote for Greece and let the latter decide what it wished to do in the light of the new instructions.

Mr. Sandifer said that we should at least keep Greece in the running for three ballots. Much would depend on how Politis interpreted his instructions. Ambassador Gross thought there was too much defeatism since Greece stood excellent chances of winning. The voting situation had incidated a sizeable majority of votes were going to go to Greece. He noted that when the news arrived at the South African reception the night before that the South African Delegation was being instructed to withdraw from the General Assembly, he had tried to persuade Messrs. Donges [1] and Jooste to stay in the plenary until they could cast their vote for Greece.

Mr. Cory reported that Kyrou had called him this morning saying that there was a rumor that the Philippines was a strong darkhorse candidate, and asking that the US talk to the Philippines and dissuade them from entering the race. Mr. Cohen suggested that we could contact Elizalde, since he had always been amenable to sound suggestions. Mr. Lubin agreed that this would be feasible. Miss Bacon asked why we wanted to persuade the Philippines to stay out of the race. Mr. Cohen suggested that we should avoid a snap judgment on this matter but that keeping the Philippines out would be avoiding the inevitable victory that Byelorussia would obtain if another candidate entered the race, and Greece were to drop out in favor of them.

Ambassador Gross was very disturbed about talk of withdrawal of the Greek candidacy. The prestige of the US was very deeply engaged in Greece's candidacy. To give up without a strenuous effort to obtain the three or four extra votes necessary to assure a victory for Greece would be very undesirable.

Mrs. Roosevelt interpreted the final paragraph of Gadel 417 as meaning that the US would not begin looking around for compromise candidates until Greece withdrew. Mr. Sandifer did not think this telegram gave the Delegation an absolute instruction to that effect. He agreed with Ambassador Gross that we must stick with Greece, and should avoid any indications from us or from the Greeks that we were considering a compromise candidate. There would be no time to develop a strong alternative candidate. The UK position, furthermore, would not allow it to switch to a compromise candidate, and they would probably return to supporting Byelorussia, if they did switch to Greece, in preference to any compromise candidate. This corresponded to their position with regard to the so-called gentlemen's agreement.

Ambassador Key reported a rumor he had picked up from the Chinese that the US was planning to withdraw its support for Greece.

[1] T. E. Donges, Chairman of the Delegation of the Union of South Africa to the General Assembly.

Having "stepped on" that rumor, he had attempted to have it killed in other quarters as well.

Mr. Cohen thought a considerable amount would depend on how the balloting stood when Greece withdrew, if it did, as to whether a compromise candidate would be possible.

Mrs. Roosevelt said that the consensus of opinion seemed to be that the US Delegation would stand firmly for Greece. If they did not come close to the necessary two-thirds majority, we would try to obtain a postponement in order to consider further the possibility of a compromise candidate, or whether to continue to support Greece and try to obtain the few more votes needed to ensure its election.

Ambassador Gross summarized the voting strength as follows: on the first ballot Greece should get about 32 votes. On the second, if the UK and others switched as they had indicated they would, Greece would get 37 votes. What happened on the third ballot would be extremely important. If the result were the same as on the second, the fourth would be even more important. He added that the instruction to Politis, as reported by Peurifoy from Athens, was not entirely clear as to what Politis would or could do.

Mr. Plitt suggested that all the political officers attempt to "knock in the head" all rumors to the effect that the US might withdraw its support from Greece. Mrs. Roosevelt and Mr. McKeever agreed with this. Similar rumors had been circulating among the press people, too, and every effort had been made to squelch them.

CONFIDENTIAL [PARIS,] December 19, 1951.

Subject: Security Council Election

Participants: Sir Gladwyn Jebb (UK)
Mr. Osten Unden [1] (Sweden) (Separately)
Ambassador Philip C. Jessup (US)

Sir Gladwyn Jebb told me last night that "everybody" was going to vote for Greece on the next ballot. He specifically mentioned Norway and Denmark. I told him that Sunde had seemed a little uncertain because he did not know definitely what the UK would do. Jebb said that the Norwegians now had been fully informed about the British attitude and that they were all right.

I spoke to Unden and asked if it was going to be possible for Sweden to abstain. Unden, who is leaving for home today, said that they had not yet definitely decided. He thought there should be a change in the rules so that the election would be decided by a simple plurality. He agreed that the continuation of the balloting was very unsatisfactory and that the matter ought to be wound up.

2. Review of the Security Council Elections Situation.

Mr. Taylor recalled that on the last ballot, the fifteenth,[1] Greece had had 36 votes to Byelorussia's 23. There would be one more restricted ballot and then if a two-thirds' majority were not obtained, the balloting would again become unrestricted. He estimated that the situation from the US point of view was somewhat better than it had been at the end of the balloting the week before. A "precision campaign" had been undertaken with a view to obtaining the necessary extra votes or abstentions to secure the election of Greece.

[1] This occurred on December 13; see Delga 645 and Delga 659, December 13, pp. 127 and 128.

Mr. Taylor mentioned that Mrs. Roosevelt had talked with Mr. Sharett of Israel about this matter. The Israeli Foreign Minister indicated that he might ask the Greek delegation what its attitude was with regard to the Palestine problem, in order to determine whether it might be possible to switch to Greece.

From Djakarta had come word that the Indonesian delegate would receive instructions to vote for Greece. Ambassador Jessup had approached the Swedish Foreign Minister with a view to securing an abstention on the part of Sweden but Mr. Unden had not made any commitment on the matter. Mr. Cohen had talked with the Uruguayans, who agreed to switch to Greece.

Approaches in Oslo and Copenhagen indicated that at least in Denmark the preference was still for Byelorussia, but that if a stalemate continued, they might switch to Greece. In conversations with the South Africans nothing had been heard which indicated they would return to the Plenary to cast their vote for Greece. If they did return it would be for that purpose, however.

Ambassador Gross felt that the deadlock must be resolved at the plenary meeting of that day, inasmuch as it would be the last time an election could be held before the Christmas recess and before the year's end. It would be highly undesirable to allow the year to end without a legally constituted Security Council to take up its duties in January. He offered to indicate to both Padilla Nervo and Lie the US concern over such a situation, and its willingness to remain all night if need be to solve this problem on the sole basis that the Council could not do business with only ten elected members.

Mr. Maffitt reported that on the last ballot Mexico, Guatemala and Uruguay had voted for Byelorussia. Now Uruguay had switched to Greece. In view of the change in attitude of Guatemala in Committee One, perhaps they would switch to Greece. Chile would definitely vote for Greece.

Mr. Utter reported that the Danes and Norwegians were waiting on each other to switch to Greece before themselves changing. Iceland was trying to persuade both of them to change. The result ought to be known before long.

Ambassador Gross reiterated his belief that the deadlock must be broken. Small states, it could be pointed out, had the greatest stake in a properly constituted and functioning Security Council. The clock and the calendar were pressing for a solution. Mrs. Roosevelt noted that this was the only effective argument that she had been able to use with Mr. Sharett. Mr. Cohen wondered whether Israel knew the Greeks were not indebted to the Arabs for any measure of support. Mrs. Roosevelt pointed out that the basis of the Israeli position was that there were many Greeks in Egypt with whom Greece carried on trade. This, they felt, would make it necessary for Greece to be amenable to the Arabs. Then when a successor to Turkey from the Arab bloc would be elected next year, the Council would be stacked against Israel.

Mr. Plitt had just talked with Kyrou, who had found out only recently that three Arabs had voted for Greece. Apparently the Arabs were now trying to forge a common front for Greece.

Ambassador Key was surprised at the Indonesian instructions reported in the telegram from Djakarta. He proposed to approach India and Burma with this news and try to persuade them to reconsider their positions.

We gratified note from Paris Embtel 2102 Oct 9 Fr Del will make complete statement before GA showing Fr carrying out provisions Art 73 UN Charter.[2] Above view re tactics in GA supported by fol reasons:

1. In light of past practice of GA under which no item proposed for insertion in Agenda has ever been rejected by vote of GA it is most unlikely that General Comite or GA wld vote to reject item even if US shld fully support Fr. In our view Fr case wld suffer by defeat on agenda issue and our own capabilities of helping Fr out in later stages might be adversely affected. Moreover, in such event result wld be adding debate in General Comite to debate in main Comite.

[2] Not printed. The Embassy reported the French news organs Figaro and Monde had published officially inspired articles to the effect that the United Nations was not competent to examine questions relating to Morocco. When questioned by the Embassy, a French Foreign Office spokesman had stated that this essentially was the line the French Government contemplated taking regarding the Moroccan case submitted to the General Assembly by Egypt. The Embassy was told that "French would not only declare UN incompetent this question but refuse carry out any UN resolution thereon. French delegation would make complete statement before General Assembly showing France was carrying out provisions Article 23 [73] UN charter. [Official] stated Embassy Washington had been asked convey Department French attitude as above." (320/10–951)

2. Under established GA practice placing item on GA agenda does not prejudice question of jurisdiction of GA to deal with it. US has taken this position consistently in GA and in SC, most recently in SC proceeding on Iran. Discussion fol placing matter on agenda wld clarify jurisdictional issue.

3. US itself has never opposed placing of any consequential matter on agenda. This is essential part of our philosophy that GA is "town meeting of world", in sense that all matters which appear of serious concern to any Member of UN can at least be raised for discussion in GA. We are most anxious avoid abandoning this firmly established US position.

4. Explanatory memo forwarded by Egypt to SYG alleges (a) conflict between Fr and Morocco reaching "highly critical phase" with incidents; (b) violation of Treaty of 1911 [1912]; (c) violation of principles and provisions of Charter and Declaration of Human Rights. It will be argued in GA that protectorate relationship rests upon Treaty of Fez concluded between sovereign states of Morocco and France; that issues involving treaty relationships are of international concern and no single party to treaty may claim exclusive control of its effect by invoking Art 2 para 7 of its Charter. It will be pointed out claim made by Fr in 1921 that dispute with Great Britain arising out of nationality decrees in Morocco was by international law solely within its domestic jurisdiction was held invalid by Permanent Court of Justice; Court based its opinion on fact that resolution of dispute wld have involved interpretation of treaties. Moreover, it will be argued that even if Art 2 para 7 shld be applicable in this matter, GA under Arts 10 and 14 has competence consider the matter under these Arts because such consideration does not constitute intervention within meaning of Art 2 para 7. Precedents will be cited of GA action in cases of Indians in South Africa, observance of human rights in satellite states, Chilean wives, etc., where GA passed condemnatory resolutions. We anticipate force of these arguments will be such as to rally substantial majority for inclusion of item on agenda and possibly for proposition that GA has jurisdiction to consider matter. By attempting to fight these arguments particularly prior to the inclusion on agenda Fr will weaken their case.

It has been consistent US position avoid wherever possible jurisdictional issue.

Regardless of jurisdictional problem we believe GA may place matter on agenda. Again regardless of jurisdictional problem, we strongly believe it wld be most inadvisable and inappropriate for GA to pass condemnatory res in Moroccan matter or establish commission of investigation. In line with Secy's assurances to Bonnet we intend strongly oppose such action stressing that it wld not be warranted in light of statement Fr Del will make in GA.

We also believe every effort shld be made by Fr to induce Egyptians withdraw or agree to postponement of their item. You shld follow up with FonOff Secy's suggestion to Bonnet that if negotiations with Egyptians on defense matters went well it might be possible to persuade them withdraw their request for debate on Morocco.

If withdrawal of item shld appear impossible Fr shld make every effort obtain postponement of consideration of question in GA. We shall support appropriate Fr proposal that question be placed at bottom of agenda in Comite with view to ensuring adequate time for negotiations for possible agreement on withdrawal of item or indefinite postponement.

USUN pass above to Lacoste [3] in response to his approach reported in urtel 434 Oct 8.[4]

FYI Oct 11 Bonnet asked Asst Secy Hickerson specifically whether US will support Fr Del in Gen Comite to keep Moroccan item off agenda and whether US will oppose any res other than one which wld drop item from agenda on ground GA lacks jurisdiction. Hickerson explained our traditional attitude toward placing matters on agenda along lines of para nr 3 above. He told Bonnet his two specific questions will be taken up with Secy.

SECRET [PARIS,] October 15, 1951.

Subject: Moroccan Case in the GA

Participants: M. Maurice Schumann, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs;
M. Pignon, French Delegate to Trusteeship Council;
M. Broustra, Director of Conference Section (UN);
M. Naudy, Conference Section (UN);
M. Wolfrom, Assistant Director, Conference Section (UN);
Mr. William Sanders, Department of State;
Mr. Benjamin Gerig, Department of State;
Mr. John Utter, U.S. Embassy, Paris;
Mr. Ward P. Allen, Department of State.

M. Schumann took the occasion of an informal conversation with the above group to raise the question and reiterated the French position as follows:

1. As soon as the question of admitting the item to the agenda arises in the General Committee, the French will make a major stand on the question of jurisdiction under Article 2, paragraph 7, claiming that the Assembly is completely incompetent to deal with the matter. They will, however (and M. Schumann gave us to understand this would be in the General Committee) take advantage of the opportunity to explain in some detail the French record in Morocco. However, they will force the question to a vote on the jurisdictional issue.

2. M. Schumann seemed quite optimistic that the matter can be kept off the agenda, provided the US, UK and French present "a solid front". He stated that several of the Arab States themselves (specifically Iraq and Saudi-Arabia) had previously informed the French that they were opposed to submitting the item, and were highly unenthusiastic about any GA consideration, realizing that there is really no constructive action the GA could take. They did, however, state that if the matter did arise, they would, of course, have to go along. As to the Latin Americans, M. Schumann referred to Brazil's recent refusal of Egypt's request to mediate in the matter as indicative of Latin indifference and he therefore felt confident that there would be general support among the Latin American Delegations for opposing admission of the item.

We sought to temper somewhat this optimism on the question of admission to the agenda, pointing out the traditional attitude of the Latin Americans both towards freedom of discussion in the GA and towards colonial problems generally, as well as the fact that the reaction of Brazil is not always an accurate barometer of that of the other 19. Making clear we were not prepared to comment on the U.S. position, we nevertheless gave no ground for belief that the U.S. would be able to join the French in opposing admission of the item.

3. If, nevertheless, the item should be admitted, M. Schumann initially stated that the French would probably not participate in any discussion in Committee I. In response to a direct question on this point, however, he replied that at that time, the French Government (which had not yet reached a decision) would "have to consider the question of their participation in the discussion".

There was general agreement among those present that, if admitted, it would be desirable to place the item as low on the Committee agenda as possible.

4. In the course of the discussion it was noted that Egypt in its complaint placed great emphasis on the violation of Human Rights in Morocco. On this aspect the French freely admitted the right of Committee IV to consider the matter, in view of the fact that under Chapter 11 of the Charter France has accepted the responsibility for promoting human rights in Morocco as a non-self-governing-territory and reports upon this problem regularly to the UN. M. Schumann nevertheless maintained that Committee I has no right to discuss even this aspect of the Moroccan question since it would then be placed in a political context. The U.S. representatives mentioned that, legal position aside, from a practical point of view, Committee I or the Ad Hoc Committee[2] might be a more favorable forum than Committee IV for this type of discussion since the Heads of Delegations who sit in Committee I are apt to be more responsive to over-all political factors and less likely to take positions without instructions from or consultations with their governments. It was generally agreed that the raising of the specific case of violation of human rights in Morocco in Committee IV might introduce a new precent [precedent] which might create future difficulties.

5. Throughout the discussion the French representative sought to place the problem of Morocco in the context of its importance as part of the problem of defense of the NATO area. He pointed out the vulnerability of U.S. to attack in the course of any discussion because of the existence of U.S. bases there, and thus emphasized the desirability of a completely united front on this whole question between the U.S. and France.

SECRET [PARIS,] October 17, 1951.

Subject: Moroccan Case in GA.

Participants: M. Jean Chauvel, French Representative to UN.[1]
Mr. Ward P. Allen, Department of State.

In the course of a conversation on other problems arising in the GA, M. Chauvel brought up the question of Morocco and elaborated the French position in more detail and with slightly different emphasis than had M. Maurice Schumann in a conversation separately reported.

M. Chauvel explained the strong initial reaction of many persons in the French Foreign Office that France should walk out of the GA if the matter were considered. He stated that he had disagreed with this view and had helped discourage it, but that it had nevertheless been seriously considered and might well have prevailed, considering the depth of feeling on the problem both in the French Government and the French people. I agreed with M. Chauvel that it would be wiser to leave the practice of "walk-outs" to the Soviets.

According to Chauvel, the present planned line in the GA is as follows: The French will, of course, make a strong point of the GA's lack of competence in the General Committee. What is not yet decided is whether at that time the French Delegate will go further and "draw the consequences" of that conclusion by stating flatly that France will not accept or recognize any resolution the GA may pass on the matter. Those who argue for stating this view initially (which I gathered Chauvel was somewhat inclined to share) point out that any resolution which does emerge will probably be unacceptable and it would be easier for France to say that they do not accept it because the GA has no competence than because on its merits it is a bad resolution. I suggested that if the French Delegate did not "draw the consequences" in the initial statement, it might put them in a better tactical position and leave them more freedom and flexibility of maneuver.

In response to my question Chauvel said that the French would probably not make their explanation of their Moroccan policy in the General Committee. He is quite aware of the fact that whatever the French do, the item will be admitted, and therefore says the French would make their substantive statement either in the Plenary session or in Committee I (or the Ad Hoc) when the item is reached. Following that detailed explanation, the French would not participate actively, but merely listen, to any discussion. At the close they might, if circumstances warrant, speak again to correct with calm, objective proof, any misstatements of fact or wrong impressions the Egyptians or others may have made.

When he asked me what the U.S. position would be on the matter in the GA, I stated that I could not say because the subject was being discussed both with the French Embassy in Washington and our Embassy here directly. He also expressed some of M. Schumann's optimism as to Latin support, stating that while he was meeting with the Foreign Minister this morning, the latter had been called out to receive the Chilean Ambassador who had assured him officially of the support of the Chilean Government in opposing the admission of the item.

1943. In conv with Allen[1] today we enquired re UK attitude Moroccan question. Allen replied FonOff feels it must support French in their efforts keep item off GA agenda and has assured Fr of UK support in this effort.

[1] Roger Allen, Head of African Department, British Foreign Office.

We outlined US views as contained Deptel 2010 Oct 13,[2] stressing our doubts re desirability and likelihood success preventing inclusion item on agenda. Allen indicated that UK was not as gloomy as we are re prospects preventing consideration of question. He thought in all probability Fr cld obtain considerable support from LA states and that this together with western European votes cld carry day. He recognized, however, that this was type of question on which it was very hard anticipate how LA states wld vote. He then went on to say that he felt the question of whether or not item included on agenda was of secondary importance to that of assuring that US, UK and Fr spoke with one voice on this question. UK hoped very much sitn wld not develop which wld result in any split among us. He felt sure that if US cld persuade Fr to inclusion item on agenda UK wld have no objection and wld be glad follow suit.

Allen said foregoing was as far as UK thinking has gone at present and that it has not made up its mind as to what its position will be on substantive problems in event item is placed on agenda.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] October 24, 1951.

Subject: Egyptian Complaint in UN on Moroccan Question

Participants: Secretary of State;
M. Bonnet, French Ambassador;
UNA—Mr. Hickerson
EUR—Mr. Bonbright
Mr. van Laethem, French Embassy

Mr. Bonnet stated that he appreciated how busy the Secretary was preparatory to his departure for the GA tomorrow but he had been instructed by Mr. Schuman to see the Secretary once again on the Moroccan question. He said that in Paris they had looked at this problem from every angle and had reached certain conclusions as to their line of action whether or not they lost their fight to prevent the Moroccan question from being placed on the agenda. He said that in the first place the French Government was determined to fight against the placing of this question on the agenda even if they became convinced that they would lose the fight. However, they had recently received encouraging news on this score. Under the leadership of Mr. Maurice Schumann, all French Chiefs of Mission in Latin America have been meeting in Rio and it is the consensus of opinion of this group that there is a reasonable hope of having many of the Latin American countries support the French thesis provided they do not feel that the United States will be on the other side. The Ambassador felt that the Latin countries were deeply disturbed by recent events in the Near East. They fear a further split between the West and the Arab countries; they appreciate the strategic importance of North Africa; and they are worried over any tendency of the UN to intervene in matters of domestic concern to member states. The French hope is that if there is a chance of winning this fight on procedural grounds, the United States will side with France. On the other hand, if it should become clear that they could not win this fight, the French would understand if some of their friends abstained on this procedural point.

If the French lose the procedural battle, they attach the greatest importance to obtaining active U.S. support at the Committee stage and in the Assembly. The French will say that they will not accept any resolution which the Assembly may pass and they would like us also to oppose any resolution no matter how mildly worded. They feel that unless the question is defeated on jurisdictional grounds, the Arab States will be encouraged to raise the question again next year and in succeeding years. Mr. Bonnet stated, however, that the French will make a positive statement on their work in Morocco which they will maintain as in full conformity with Chapter XI. Following the statement of the French case, the French delegation will abstain from further discussion reserving the right at the end of the proceedings to answer any attacks which may develop in the course of the debate. The French want the U.S. delegation to support the French statement regarding their achievements in Morocco.

The Secretary interrupted at this point to say that he unfortunately had another engagement, but before terminating the interview, he wished to state briefly the U.S. position: He said that on the procedural question the U.S. will abstain, a course which we have never taken before in such a situation. If the matter is placed on the agenda, the Secretary stated that we will support the French on the merits of the case. He said that he personally could not conceive of any resolution to which the United States would give its support. In any event, the U.S. would vote against any condemnatory resolution or a resolution setting up a committee of investigation.

The Ambassador returned to the charge and pointed out that while the Secretary's statement about abstaining would meet the French point in the event that the procedural question was lost, it would not meet the French hopes in the event that there was a chance of winning the procedural fight. He urged the Secretary to reconsider our position in that event. The Secretary said that he would think the matter over but that it would not do any good, since we could not go any further on this point.

We then left the Secretary's office and continued the discussion briefly in EUR where we were joined by Mr. Wainhouse of UNA.[2] Nothing new of importance developed except that the Ambassador returned to the question of the Latin American vote and urged us to send a circular to our people in the area giving them our position. Mr. Hickerson and I said that we saw no reason why this could not be done.

THE MOROCCAN QUESTION

THE PROBLEM

To determine the United States position in the General Assembly on the question entitled "Violation of the Principles of the Charter and of the Declaration of Human Rights by France in Morocco" submitted by the Arab States.

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. The Delegation should support, at any stage of the discussion, postponement of the question, preferably for an indefinite period of time, if such a move appears to have adequate support and is at least tacitly acquiesced in by the Arab States.

2. If postponement cannot be achieved, the Delegation should continue to make every effort to persuade the French not to oppose the inclusion of the matter on the agenda.

3. The Delegation should abstain in the vote on the inclusion of the matter in the agenda in the General Committee.

4. The Delegation should continue its efforts to impress upon the French the necessity of undertaking discussions with Arab delegates and leaders in order to avoid, if at all possible, a situation in which a majority of the United Nations Members would vote against the French. The Delegation should also continue to urge the French to state in the General Assembly their policy and objectives in Morocco as thoroughly and effectively as possible. The Delegation should consult closely with the French on every aspect of this matter.

5. The Delegation should endeavor to moderate the Arab-Asian action in the Assembly.

6. The Delegation should oppose any condemnatory resolution or the setting up of a commission of investigation and should consult the Department on any proposals offered by other Delegations.

Discussion of the Moroccan item was then initiated with a background survey of the Moroccan question since World War II and a résumé of the development of the United States position with respect to the United Nations aspect of the problem.]

The Secretary added a note explaining the explosive nature of this whole question for the French, describing it as the biggest thorn in the side of Franco-American relations. France was seriously worried about our attitude and thought we might be attempting to undermine France's position in Morocco. We had made great efforts to point out the erroneous nature of this conception, stating that none of the rights granted to the US by France in Morocco would be used against France.[2] Nevertheless, France still remained uneasy. The Secretary referred to the attitude of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and to their feeling that this was a matter of supreme importance. Their advice might well be to support France fully on this matter. The Secretary reported that last night Eden [3] had sought to obtain full US support for the joint UK-French stand.[4] The Secretary had said we could not give such support. He did not want to split jurisdictional hairs with Eden, but we would depart in principle from our traditional position to the extent of abstaining procedurally, and going 80% of the way in support of the French substantively. Why, therefore, he had asked Eden, was the latter quibbling with the US over the last 20%? Eden had answered that the Iran and Egypt precedents made this a point of disunity vis-à-vis the Arabs. The Secretary had offered to show the world the French were not so bad in Morocco, and Eden came around somewhat. It was further pointed out to Eden that there would be a big battle over the agenda issue which might well be lost. This would be particularly unfortunate in that there would then be two battles, the first one of which the French would already have lost. The Secretary therefore recommended to the Delegation that the US take the position of trying to keep this matter off the agenda by an abstention or postponement; i.e., to do as much to help France as we can, consistent with our own interests, without ourselves voting against the item. The extremely vital nature of this matter is such that it requires the US to back up slightly.

[Here follows further discussion of the Moroccan question, at which the individual point of view of other United States representatives was expressed. The Delegation then took up another agenda item.]

NOVT M–1

[Here follows list of persons present: France (10), United Kingdom (8), United States (9). The Foreign Ministers headed each group. The Secretary of State was supported at the top level by David K. E. Bruce, U.S. Ambassador to France; Walter S. Gifford, U.S. Ambassador to the United Kingdom; Philip C. Jessup, U.S. Ambassador at Large and member of the U.S. Delegation to the General Assembly; and George W. Perkins, Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs. Assistant Secretary Perkins was accompanied by G. Hayden Raynor, Director of the Office of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs and formerly United Nations Adviser for the Bureau of European Affairs.[1]

It was agreed at the outset that the meeting "was not a conference, but an informal meeting for a frank exchange of views." Morocco was the fourth item on the agenda.[2]]

Morocco

M. Schuman indicated his concern about this matter being raised in the Assembly not because the French felt they would be embarrassed but because of the emotional way it would be handled in the Assembly and because of the deteriorating effect this might have on the situation in Morocco. He said he thought we were all in agreement that the Assembly was not competent to act on this matter in the sense of taking a decision or making recommendations. Hence, he felt it was too bad to have a debate which was bound to be fruitless and which could only be harmful in Morocco. He said he thought it was of great importance for the three great Powers to take a common stand, as in Morocco all of our actions are very closely watched and any difference between us would be quickly spotted and exploited.

M. Schuman added that he knew this was the first time we had attempted to keep an important item off the agenda and that we had been extremely liberal in this respect in the past. He questioned, however, whether this had been a wise policy, inquiring as to whether the South African case had really had any beneficial effect on anyone. He felt that discussing questions of this type merely leads to an increase of tension rather than the reverse. He urged that we all take a stronger stand and refuse to place the item on the agenda.

Mr. Acheson said that he would speak first in reply inasmuch as it was our position which was obviously worrying M. Schuman. He said that as he had explained to Ambassador Bonnet in Washington we are anxious to support the French on this question. We agreed as to the importance of Morocco to France and to the West because of the need for stability in the area in view of its military importance. He said that in every substantive way we will support the French on this in the Assembly, but that we could not vote against placing the question on the agenda. We will abstain on this action. We will, however, work with other Delegations in an effort to obtain abstentions or negative votes.

Mr. Acheson added that in the General Assembly when the report of the General Committee comes up for action we will abstain if the report includes the item, but that we would support the report if the General Committee recommends rejecting the item.

Mr. Acheson said that he thought we should also explore possible new procedures which might be applied to this case. He said that the general practice in the past had been to refer all questions to the substantive Committees of the Assembly and to have resolutions passed on all matters. He inquired if this is really necessary. He repeated that we will support the French in the debate. He also said that we will do all we can to persuade the Arabs not to press the matter. He suggested to M. Schuman that perhaps he could say something in his opening speech which would assist with the Arabs. Mr. Acheson also said that even if he were himself personally convinced on the agenda question that he would have a serious problem on this with his own Delegation. He pointed out that several members of the Delegation had attended most of the meetings of the General Assembly and were fully committed to the policy of regarding the Assembly as the Town Meeting of the World and they would be most reluctant to support rejecting the items for the agenda.

M. Schuman, responding to the Secretary's suggestion about reference to a Committee, said that if we wanted to avoid Committee reference we would have to decide this today as the matter might come up in the General Committee tomorrow. He then said that in considering between necessary evils he thought he would prefer a reference to Committee rather than directly to Plenary.

Mr. Eden intervened at this point to say that although the UK would vote with France on the agenda question, he was finding that a number of Delegations shared some of the US difficulties on the point, not so much on the merits of the question but because of the angle of precedents. He expressed the view that he felt it would be difficult for the French to obtain support on the agenda question and inquired how M. Schuman evaluated this situation.

M. Schuman observed that we were faced with a situation resembling a showdown, and that there was a campaign to divide us. He felt the situation was extremely serious.

Mr. Acheson then said that we might explore the possibility of getting the General Committee to decide to postpone action on putting the question on the agenda.

Mr. Eden said he thought this procedure would have a chance of getting more support than the proposed French course of action. Mr. Acheson said he had two additional suggestions to make: (a) That the French consider carefully in connection with selecting the Chairmen of the Committees what their attitude would be on this Moroccan issue; (b) When we are shortly talking with the Arabs on the Middle East Command that we point out to them how disruptive their action on Morocco is.

M. Schuman picked up the thought with respect to postponement and said that if this were to be tried we would have to reach a decision on this now. He thought if this were done, the postponement would have to be on a provisional basis without a date being specified as otherwise the action would amount to rejection.

Mr. Eden commented that an argument for postponement is that none of the various steps outlined in the Charter which should take place before action is taken in the UN itself had occurred.

It was agreed that as soon as the Arab request was submitted an effort will be made in the General Committee to arrange to postpone "the inscription" of the item on the agenda. Each Delegation was asked to designate one man to make this job his top priority activity. The Secretary designated Ambassador Gross for the US.

Pursuant to general agreement reached by the three Secretaries during the morning, we discussed details of the procedure for handling the Moroccan Case in the General Committee. We agreed that after presentation of the item by the Egyptian Delegate, a friendly member (to be determined after the General Committee has been established) will move under Rule 78 to adjourn the debate on the item. The French Representative will support the motion, followed by the U.S. Delegate. Chauvel is to discuss with Schuman whether the latter wishes to make a brief policy speech in the General Committee, generally maintaining that the French policy in Morocco has been in conformity with Article 73 of the Charter and indicating in general terms French plans with respect to the political, economic and social evolution of Morocco.

Although it was recognized that the General Committee is technically not an appropriate forum for a substantive debate, it was considered inevitable that the Egyptian in presenting the item and the Russian in opposing a motion to postpone will both make policy arguments and it would be wrong to leave the record of the General Committee free of even a brief policy rebuttal.

Chauvel agreed that if Schuman decides that the French Representative will make a policy speech in the General Committee, Chauvel will give me a draft before the Committee meeting. Chauvel is to advise me of the decision as soon as it is possible for him to talk with Schuman, which he hopes will be sometime before Wednesday morning, November 7.

I referred to information received that Maurice Schumann was supposed to have indicated recently that the French would be prepared to answer questions in the Fourth Committee on the observance of human rights in Morocco. (This information had been given to me by Wallner and Stein).[4] I expressed the hope that the information was correct and that we attached great importance to the French being able to handle the anticipated attacks in the Fourth Committee by the nonadministering powers. However, Chauvel and Lacoste vehemently denied the accuracy of the information and said that if it were true, "Maurice Schumann would be afraid to admit to them that he had said anything like this." The French considered this completely outside the competence of the United Nations.

Jebb climbed aboard, strongly supporting the French position.

1. Mr. Stein continued his presentation on the Moroccan question. The Sec'y had been in consultation with Schumann [sic] [1] about this matter and had told him that the US would abstain, itself, on a vote on putting the matter on the agenda, in line with our previous commitment to the French. In addition he had told Schumann that the US would work as much as was consistent with our not taking the lead to convince other delegations of the wisdom of not putting the matter on the agenda at the present time, either by seeking to obtain abstentions or negative votes on the Arab proposal. The US would support a negative report of the General Committee on this matter, and abstain on a positive one. We would work to get the General Committee to postpone inscribing this matter on the GA's agenda.

In talks with Chauvel and Jebb, Ambassador Gross had rehearsed the agreed strategy of having a friendly member of the General Committee move postponement after the Egyptians had made their charges. Under Rule 75 this would allow only two speakers in favor and two against the proposition. France and the US would speak against inscribing the item on the agenda. Chauvel was to consult with Schumann as to whether he (Chauvel) would make any reference in his speech to the effect that France was living up to her obligations under Article 73(e) of the Charter and carrying out plans for the social, economic, and political evolution of Morocco. Although the French were not likely to agree to make such a statement, the US should point out to them that political statements would be made by the Arabs and the Russians, and it would be unwise for the record to remain silent on the French side.

Ambassador Gross found the draft of the French statement, which they had not discussed with the US, to be unsatisfactory in that it did not address itself to the issue of postponement and was not in conformity with the agreement we had worked out with the French. In regard to the argument that the French were providing for the proper evolution of Morocco, the draft statement quoted all of Article 73, vehemently denied the applicability of the Charter to this matter, and in a very offhand manner mentioned French compliance with this part of the Charter. It ended with a statement that the General Assembly could not investigate the status of human rights in Morocco.

Ambassador Gross would contact Chauvel and try to get him to adhere to the agreed procedure for postponement and discuss with him the statement. He recommended that the US not make any statement if the French give one equally as bad as the draft he had seen.

Mr. Cohen said that unless a French policy statement showed a bona fide desire to reach a settlement with the Arabs, the accusation would undoubtedly be made that the US had imposed a trick upon the General Assembly by opposing its consideration of the Moroccan matter. Mrs. Roosevelt referred to a considerable undercurrent against the French on this reversal in the US position. The Secretary agreed to speak again to Schumann to get him to be sensible, adding, in response to a request for a clarification of the US position by Ambassador Austin, that the US wanted itself, the UK and France in the same corner on this matter, the only feasible one being that of a postponement. He would try to obtain Schumann's agreement to be reasonable on this and admit of the necessity of postponing. Only thus would the US be able to go along easily with France and oppose the Arabs.

Mr. Cohen questioned whether the motion in the General Committee to postpone referred to postponement of General Committee consideration or postponement of General Assembly consideration. The Secretary said that even if Mr. Cohen was right in thinking it referred to postponement in the General Committee, the matter would be questioned when the report of the Committee came up for discussion in the Plenary. Ambassador Gross said that he had previously assumed that there would be discussion in the GA on the question of postponement. A working group of Messrs. Cohen, Gross and Fisher would discuss this matter further. Mr. Taylor had been given information to the effect that when the question of Tibet had come up in the General Committee during the last GA, and the General Committee had agreed on postponement, and the General Assembly did not consider this action by the General Committee.

2. Ambassador Gross reviewed the General Committee developments on Morocco.[1] He said that confusion had reigned since the Canadian had not presented the motion he was supposed to have made. Instead of moving that the General Committee recommend to the General Assembly that the General Assembly postpone consideration of the question whether the Moroccan item should be placed on the agenda he had moved that the General Committee itself adjourn debate on the matter in order that he could have time to study the matter further. This precipitated considerable discussion. Ambassador Austin had explained why the US favored postponement.[2] Jebb had tried to bring the matter around to where it was supposed to have been.[3] Tsiang [4] moved adjournment of the meeting without coming to a vote on the matter—a wise move in Ambassador Gross' view.[5] Today the matter would arise on the basis of a written proposal, but the most important question was what exactly that proposal would say.

Ambassador Gross pointed out that by agreement with Mr. Schuman France had been left the diplomatic initiative on the matter which prevented the US from doing its usual liaison work as it was accustomed to do in the Security Council. France seemed to be doing a particularly inept job of carrying the initiative and would not stand too good a chance of persuading the General Committee members to adopt its view. Padilla Nervo,[6] for instance, would vote against any move calculated to keep this matter from being discussed.

Ambassador Gross speculated on what the situation would be following a sine die postponement; the very next day, he thought, someone might rise in the Assembly and propose that the General Assembly on its own decision take up the matter of Morocco. This would precipitate the large debate we sought to avoid. There would be no assurance that the debate would not ensue if our formula of having the General Committee recommend to the General Assembly that the latter not put the matter on the agenda were followed. It would, however, give a little more weight to the French side. Ambassador Gross wondered whether we ought not approach the French and ask them to release us from our commitment to them. We would honor the commitment if not released, but if we were freed, we might conceivably accomplish more on our own initiative.

[2] Senator Austin covered considerable ground in his relatively brief statement to the General Committee: (1) The United States favored a General Committee recommendation to the General Assembly (for postponement) regarding the Moroccan item: The item dealt with a complicated situation that warranted careful study and there was insufficient time for such study as the item had been submitted by Egypt only one month previously; (2) The United States had confidence in the French administration of Morocco; (3) The United States felt that a detailed discussion of the Moroccan question "would not be in the interests of the Moroccan people"; (4) The United States considered that "Efforts should be made, in the spirit of the Charter, outside the United Nations to settle such matters before submitting them to the Organization." (GA (VI), General Committee, pp. 4 and 5)

[3] That is, to effect an interpretation of the Canadian resolution that would have the General Committee actually recommend to the General Assembly that discussion of the Moroccan question be postponed (ibid., p. 5).

[4] Tsingfu F. Tsiang, Permanent Representative of China to the United Nations, Chairman of the Chinese Delegation to the General Assembly.

[5] Tsiang's proposal was that the Canadian motion should be submitted in writing "so that members could fully appreciate the implication of their vote." (GA (VI), General Committee, p. 7)

[6] Luis Padilla Nervo, President of the Sixth Regular Session of the General Assembly.

Ambassador Austin gave his understanding of the situation to be that we advocated putting the matter on the agenda, but with a notation, in effect, that the discussion of the matter would be postponed. Mr. Sandifer [7] did not understand this to be what the US had agreed to. First, we had said that we would abstain on the question of putting the matter on the agenda. Secondly, on the substance of the matter, if it came up for discussion in the Assembly, we would support the French to the extent of not voting for any investigation or other action by the General Assembly against France in Morocco. The wording of a motion in the General Committee would be to the effect that the General Committee decides to recommend to the General Assembly that it (the GA) postpone the question of whether to include the matter on the agenda.

Ambassador Jessup said that what the General Committee did in a case like this was to send to the General Assembly a proposal either to include or not to include a certain matter on the agenda. Mr. Bonsal read from a letter from the French to the US Delegation the language they thought had been agreed upon, namely, that the General Committee should recommend to the Assembly that it postpone the question of whether to retain the item for inclusion on the agenda.[8]

Ambassador Gross summarized the situation by saying that the Arabs wanted the item on the agenda even if it did not come up for debate. The French objected even to putting it on, even if there should be no debate on the matter. The US compromise was to have the General Committee itself recommend postponement of the consideration of the item. In response to this, Ambassador Austin wondered what the status of our preferred resolution would be if the General Committee took no action and its report contained no reference to the Moroccan item. Ambassador Gross said that in such a case the General Committee report would have to show what the General Committee had recommended and the General Assembly would have, by its approval, implicitly accepted the sine die postponement of the question of whether to put the Moroccan item on the agenda. The trouble, of course, with such a result, would be that the sine die postponement meant that the matter could be brought up at any time thereafter. This, at least, was the understanding of Padilla Nervo, who felt that the General Assembly had the inherent power to add items on its own motion. Mr. Fisher cautioned that Padilla Nervo might state his interpretation that the effect of our resolution was to reject the Moroccan item. Ambassador Austin said the Delegation

M. Maurice Schumann opened this discussion expressing thanks to both the UK and the US for their warm and firm support yesterday. He reviewed the difficulty caused by the Canadian Delegate's unfamiliarity with UN procedures. He said that today a revised and clarified Resolution would be submitted by the Canadian Delegation and that it was important to have this approved. He said the importance in his view was increased by the alacrity with which the Soviets were exploiting this situation. He said he thought the three Western Powers had been able yesterday to avoid statements which would worsen their relations with the Arab States. He said that he thought our objective should be to affirm and retain the solidarity of the Western Powers on this question.

Foreign Minister Schuman then said that we should now agree on tactics for this afternoon. If we can obtain the required majority for the passage of the Resolution, we are in satisfactory shape, although we might have to debate and vote on it again in Plenary.

Mr. Eden questioned the desirability, should the Canadian Resolution fail, of voting on a second Resolution as Western solidarity would then be lost, and because the chances of prevailing on the second Resolution would be less than on the first.

Mr. Acheson indicated that our canvass of the situation indicated a very close Parliamentary situation. We estimated at the moment five votes for, six against, 1 abstention and 2 doubtful (Dominican Republic and Thailand). Our information, contrary to that of the French, is that Chile will vote against the Canadian Resolution. The Secretary suggested that our efforts should be concentrated on the two doubtful members of the Committee and that perhaps efforts should be made to persuade Yugoslavia to abstain rather than to vote against.

Foreign Minister Schuman inquired as to the position of China and Ambassador Gross replied that we understand it to be abstention. In reply to a further inquiry, he indicated that the Mexican Delegate had received instructions which he interpreted to mean that he must vote against any Resolution tending in the direction of keeping the item off the agenda. M. Maurice Schumann indicated that our information changed somewhat the calculations which the French had made.

Foreign Minister Schuman then said that we must consider what to do in the event that the Canadian Resolution fails to pass.

Mr. Acheson said that he felt we should all follow Mr. Eden's suggestion and abstain. He said if we lose out on the Canadian Resolution, we could clearly do no better on the second and that it was therefore pointless to attempt to block the second. On the other hand, if the three Western Powers abstain, they would maintain solidarity on this question.

Foreign Minister Schuman replied that if a vote on the second Resolution was called for, the French Delegation would be compelled to vote against it. He said the domestic Parliamentary situation gave them no possible alternative. He then questioned whether it would be feasible to avoid voting on a second Resolution by means of an interpretation by the President that the first negative vote automatically placed the item on the agenda. This, he explained, would permit us to maintain our solid front. It was agreed that this matter should be taken up with the Chairman of the Committee, but that he should not be approached unless and until the first Resolution failed because such an approach might have an adverse effect on the chances of passing the first Resolution. It was thought that this could be done by arranging a short recess after the vote on the first Resolution, if that Resolution failed.

Mr. Eden commented that he was pleased by this suggested procedure because he could visualize a situation under which only France and the UK would be voting against the second Resolution placing the item on the agenda, and he thought this would be unfortunate.[1]

[1] When the General Committee convened at 5:45 p. m. that evening, it addressed itself to the following Canadian draft resolution:

"'The General Committee Recommends to the General Assembly that consideration of the question of placing provisional item 62 [the Moroccan item] (A/BUR/126) on the final agenda of the General Assembly be postponed for the time being'."

After a parliamentary wrangle over the scope of the authority of the General Committee to make recommendations to the General Assembly regarding agenda items, the Committee adopted the Canadian resolution 6–4–4. For the proceedings of the General Committee at this meeting, see GA (VI), General Committee, pp. 9 ff.

Editorial Note

The General Assembly considered the recommendation of the General Committee regarding the Moroccan item, which was incorporated into the Report of the General Committee to the General Assembly (A/1950), in two phases.

The first phase occurred on November 13, and was marked initially by general discussion of the powers of the General Committee to act in this case as it did (in terms of the Canadian resolution). The character of the statements then assumed a substantive content, that is discussion of French policy in Morocco, first on the part of the Soviet Representative (Arutiunian), and then by the French Representative (Robert Schuman). Immediately following the Schuman statement, the Egyptian Representative (Salah-el-din-Pasha) rose and requested a postponement of further debate so that all could study "thoroughly" the French statement which was of "particular importance". As described by Ambassador Gross to the United States Delegation at its meeting on November 14, "Schuman had been faced with a quick decision as to whether to acquiesce in or oppose this request, and apparently decided on the former course." (IO Files: US/A/M(Chr)/198) The debate on item 62 was then temporarily suspended. For the proceedings of the General Assembly on this matter on November 13, see United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, Sixth Session, Plenary Meetings, pages 96 ff. (hereafter cited as GA (VI), Plenary).

The second phase of General Assembly consideration of the Moroccan item occurred in two meetings on December 13. (For documentation on an interlude that supervened in the Fourth Committee in late November, in which France walked out of the Fourth Committee, see pages 655 ff.) Following lengthy debate on both the procedural and substantive aspects of the Moroccan question, the General Assembly adopted the recommendation of the General Committee that consideration of the Moroccan item be postponed "for the time being" (28–23–7). For the proceedings of the General Assembly on this matter on December 13, see ibid., pages 236 ff.

The telegraphic text of a statement made to the General Assembly by Ambassador Gross at its second meeting on December 13 (official text in ibid., pages 258 and 259) is printed infra.

The Acting Chairman of the United States Delegation to the General Assembly (Roosevelt) to the Secretary of State

Delga 679. For release on delivery. Fol is text Gross statement on Moroccan case in plenary December 13th.

Statement by Ambassador Ernest A. Gross, United States represenative, in plenary session of the General Assembly on the question of placing the Moroccan item on the final agenda of the General Assembly.

The General Committee has recommended that consideration of the question of placing the Moroccan item on the final agenda of the General Assembly should be postponed for the time being. This is a recommendation which the United States delegation supported in the General Committee and supports here.

I think that the distinguished delegate of the Soviet Union, if he was translated correctly, referred to the recommendation of the general committee as a postponement for some time. I think the precise recommendation was in fact, postponement for the time being of the question of placing the Moroccan item on the agenda.

The foreign minister and representative of France has stated that France has accepted as a sacred trust under Article 73 of Chapter XI, the obligation to promote, within the system of international peace and security established by the charter, the well being of the peoples of Morocco, to ensure their advancement and to assist them in the progressive development of their free political institutions. The representative of France has told the General Assembly that these freely undertaken obligations have been and continue to be performed by France. We feel that France should not be hindered in its opportunity to put reforms into effect under conditions favorable to their successful execution.

The United States has given careful attention to the views expressed by the representatives of the six states which have proposed this item. We are aware of their common bonds with the peoples of Morocco and the position they, as members of the United Nations, have taken on their duties and responsibilities under the charter. We share their concern for human rights and fundamental freedoms. The United States has approached the question before us today from the point of view of its considered estimation of the highest interests of the peoples of Morocco.

The powers and responsibilities of the General Assembly shld be discharged with regard to the principle of the charter that persons concerned with problems and controversies shld in good faith exhaust efforts for their solution by less formal means than debate in the General Assembly. The representative of Brazil in opening the general debate was, I think, developing this principle. He put this thought in felicitous language when he said:

"At the present time it is urgent that peoples which aspire to total liberation and emancipation should act with prudence and serenity necessary to safeguard the structure of security that has been built up so slowly and painfully, and which represents the best guarantee of their own aspirations. It is, therefore, indispensable to seek compensatory agreements through friendly negotiations. To bring any dispute to the United Nations without having previously exhausted all other methods of peaceful settlement would be to run counter to the spirit of the Charter of San Francisco. It would, furthermore, be causing considerable harm to that spirit."

The question, then, is whether the best interest of the peoples of Morocco will be promoted by debates now in the General Assembly on the complaint made by the six states. We do not believe their interests would best be served by this course. Indeed, the Government of France has recently renewed the expression of its desire and intention to follow the course of finding a solution of mutual problems by less formal means. The distinguished foreign minister of France in the General Assembly on November 15 referred to conversations under way which are designed to hasten the democratic reforms proposed by France in Morocco. He has with great statesmanship expressed his desire for rapid action upon reforms, the study of which would be the responsibility of a joint France-Moroccan commission.

So also, His Majesty the Sultan of Morocco has reaffirmed his desire for negotiations with a view to reaching agreement with the Government of France.

Under these circumstances, is it not entirely in accordance with the highest objective of the charter to leave to those intimately concerned to pursue their own avenues of settlement?

The tradition and policies of the United States demonstrate our friendship for the peoples of Morocco and our interest in their aspirations. All members here know this, except for that small minority whose views are based upon dogma and autocratic decree.

The representative of Syria proved his awareness of this great tradition by his eloquent references to the first President of the United States. The distinguished foreign minister of Egypt spoke of President Roosevelt [1] and Senator Vandenberg.[2]

[1] Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, 1933–1945.

[2] Arthur H. Vandenberg, ranking Senator of the Republican Party on the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate and foremost Republican exponent of "bipartisanship" in United States foreign policy.

It is in the light of this proud history that we believe, upon careful consideration, that our position on this matter is sound, logical and forward-looking.

My government feels that the general committee correctly concluded that this is an item in which debate at this time within the United Nations would not serve the best interests of the peoples directly concerned. It would in no way detract from the dignity and prestige of the Assembly to recognize that it is highly expedient to postpone this item as recommended by the general committee.

III. THE QUESTION OF THE SCALE OF NATIONAL ASSESSMENTS FOR THE APPORTIONMENT OF THE EXPENSES OF THE REGULAR (ADMINISTRATIVE) BUDGET OF THE UNITED NATIONS[1]

320/9–1251 : Circular airgram

The Secretary of State to Certain Diplomatic Offices[2]

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, September 12, 1951—8:45 a. m.

Reference paragraph 2D of Circular airgram 1:45 pm, September 5, 1951.[3]

Recent action of House of Representatives reduced appropriation for U.S. contributions to international organizations approximately $3,000,000 below U.S. commitments for this year. In addition it added an amendment stating that the U.S. could not pay more than 33⅓% of the expenses of these organizations, although the U.S. is at present assessed more than 33⅓% in 7 organizations. Senate has approved full appropriation asked by President, but has added provision that

"No representative of the United States Government in any international organization hereafter shall make any commitment requiring the appropriation of funds for a contribution by the United States in excess of 33⅓ per centum of the budget of any international organization for which the appropriation for the United States contribution

> "Governments to which you are accredited have in the past sent representatives well qualified in these matters to the United Nations, and while not always supporting the U.S. have generally voted for economy and sound administrative practice. is contained in this act: Provided, That in exceptional circumstances necessitating a contribution by the United States in excess of 33⅓ per centum of the budget, a commitment requiring a United States appropriation of a larger proportion may be made after consultation by United States representatives in the organization or other appropriate officials of the Department of State with the Committees on Appropriations of the Senate and House of Representatives: Provided, however, That this section shall not apply to the United States representatives to the Inter-American organizations."

Action indicates the general trend of temper of Congress in this connection. U.K. and Australian representatives have also indicated apprehension of their Governments re increasing budgets and Member costs for international organizations.

Past efforts of the U.S. to eliminate unnecessary expenditures, and insure defensible administrative and program policies among UN and the specialized agencies have oftentimes been handicapped by absence of representatives of other countries who were both familiar with and instructed on their government's budgetary and financial policies.

For example and for your information, the Department is quite concerned over the fact that the Fourth Health Assembly recently voted a 1952 WHO budget which is more than 20% larger than its 1951 budget. This precipitate increase, which USDel strongly opposed, was voted primarily as a result of the efforts of uninstructed delegations, among which were representatives of countries who have urged economy when discussing specialized agency budgets in the United Nations.

Focal opportunity for intensified effort to control budgetary costs is the forthcoming sixth session of the General Assembly. In conversations with the Foreign Office, the Department requests you express U.S. concern along above lines, (1) indicating our hope that its Delegation will be instructed generally to support efforts to keep the total budget figure within reasonable proportions and to ensure that all expenditures make maximum contribution to the achievement of UN objectives; and (2) if appropriate, urging representation on the Fifth Committee along the lines indicated above. As related these discussions, note should also be made of the continuing need for similar representation at governing body meetings of specialized agencies. Department recognizes difficulty making specific suggestions re delegation representation on any one Committee and suggests it be done only if informal, personal relationships make it possible. Stress on problems of international organization's expense and possibility of budget control through action of General Assembly delegations without specific mention of character of delegation membership may in some cases accomplish ends. Department intends to forward additional information on positions on administrative and financial questions as soon as documents are available.

In conversations about this matter, you should make clear that the Department's concern over undesirable and unnecessary budget increases does not imply any diminution of its support of the principles, purposes, and activities of the many international organizations to which the U.S. belongs. Participation in these organizations is, and will continue to be, an essential and important aspect of American foreign policy. Our participation may be easily jeopardized, however, if the budgets of these organizations increase at too rapid a rate.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Chief of the Division of International Administration (Henderson)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] October 18, 1951.

Subject: Contributions to the United Nations

Participants: Mr. Christelow, British Embassy [1]
Miss Salt, British Embassy [2]
Mr. Ketain, BNA [3]
Mr. Ingram, UNI [4]
Mr. Henderson, UNI

At the request of the British Embassy, Mr. Hamilton,[5] BNA, arranged a meeting of the above listed participants on October 17, at 10:30 A. M. in Mr. Ingram's office.

Mr. Christelow opened the discussion by stating that his government was generally sympathetic to the desire of the United States to reach the one-third "ceiling", set by the UN on contributions to regular expenses by any one member.[6] He hoped, however, that this might be done gradually, and stated that the UK was disposed to support the recommendations of the UN Committee on Contributions on the scale of assessments for calendar year 1952.[7] He wondered what the position of the U.S. would be in this respect.

[1] A. Christelow, British Counselor of Embassy.
[2] B. Salt, British First Secretary of Embassy.
[3] Mr. Ketain of the Office of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs.
[4] George M. Ingram, Chief of the Division of International Administration.
[5] William L. Hamilton, Jr., of the Office of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs.
[6] Information as to Foreign Office agreement with the U.S. position outlined in the circular airgram of September 12, supra, had been cabled to the Department of State by the Embassy in its telegram 1430, September 19, 6 p. m. (320/9–1951).
[7] The Report of the Committee on Contributions (UN Doc. A/1859) is printed in United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, Sixth Session, Supplement No. 10.

Mr. Ingram replied by explaining the necessity for consultation with the Appropriation Committees of the Congress, prior to the adoption of a firm U.S. position. He stated that it was possible that the U.S. would also be in a position to support the recommendations of the Committee on Contributions, and assured Mr. Christelow that when the consultation had been completed, he would be pleased to discuss the U.S. position further.

Mr. Christelow then stated his hope that General Assembly debate on this question could be confined to the scale of assessments for 1952. Mr. Ingram responded that it would be necessary for the U.S. spokesman to express the determination of his government to press for early achievement of the 33⅓% goal, if it did not insist upon such achievement this year. Mr. Christelow commented that he could understand the reason for this.

Mr. Christelow expressed, as a matter of secondary concern, his hope that we would not press for immediate increase in USSR and satellite contributions in any dimensions which would prompt arrearages on their part. He hoped that the U.S. would go along with the recommendations of the Contributions Committee re these governments for the coming year. Mr. Ingram replied that, if we could accept the Contribution Committee Report, this would be no problem.

Mr. Christelow then added that although the UK was reluctant to do so, except as a matter of last resort, he had been instructed to inform the Department that his government was prepared to forego something of the reduction recommended for the UK, for next year if such action would be of assistance to the U.S. in supporting the report of the Committee. Mr. Ingram said that while this was welcome news, he could not comment further until the previously referred to consultation with the Congress had been completed.

The scale of assessments situation in the UN specialized agencies was generally discussed, with Mr. Christelow making specific inquiry as to U.S. attitude re an increase in its percentage of assessment in the case of FAO. Mr. Ingram replied that since the U.S. assessment in WHO and UNESCO had now been reduced to one-third, and since a significant reduction was anticipated in the UN, he believed that the U.S. would be prepared to see its assessment in FAO moderately increased. He stressed that it was the hope of the U.S. that a satisfactory overall scale of assessments could be negotiated at the November Conference of the FAO, which would not be subject to any modification until the following Conference two years thereafter. Mr. Christelow agreed to the desirability of this.

The meeting concluded with a brief discussion of the status of the U.S. contribution to UNKRA. Miss Salt wondered about the significance of the recent limited appropriation action by the Congress, and was assured by Mr. Henderson that apparently such action only reflected Congressional doubt as to the ability of UNKRA to effectively use the entire amount of the U.S. pledge at this time. It was emphasized that no serious question as to the amount of the pledge, as such, had been raised. Miss Salt went on to inquire whether the U.S. considered its contribution to cover a period of one year from the time that full payment was made, or whether it was for the U.S. fiscal year 1952. Mr. Henderson replied that the contribution was intended to provide for the period required to carry out the initial UNKRA program, as approved by the GA, and that it was presumed that approximately one year from the time that UNKRA began full operations would be required to do this.

SCALE OF ASSESSMENTS FOR THE APPORTIONMENT OF THE EXPENSES OF THE UN REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON CONTRIBUTIONS

THE PROBLEM

The United Nations Committee on Contributions has recommended a reduction for the United States of 2.02 percentage points (from 38.92% for 1951 to 36.90% for 1952). The Committee recommends adjustments, upward or downward, for 33 countries including an increase of 2.87 percentage points for the USSR (from 6.98% to 9.85%). The Soviet member voted against the proposed scale in the Committee and has publicly attacked the reduction proposed for the United States.

Under the terms of the Congressional appropriation act for fiscal year 1952 the Department is directed to consult with the two appropriations committees before committing the United States to a contribution to an international organization in excess of 33⅓ percent. The Department is proceeding with such consultations in regard to the United States contribution to the United Nations. What position should the United States Delegation take on the United Nations contribution scale for 1952?

RECOMMENDATIONS

Contingent upon Congressional consultations, the Delegation should support adoption of the Committee Report. In doing so it should:

1. State that the US is seriously disappointed that the Report does not recommend a much more substantial reduction in the US contribution.

2. Note that its acceptance of the Report is motivated by a desire to avoid an insistence upon changes in the scale which might appear to the smaller and more populous states to require more rapid upward adjustments in their contributions than they may be prepared for, and in recognition of the fact that Soviet obstruction to the accession of new members has denied to the membership an opportunity to soften the impact on other members of U.S. reductions.

3. State that its acceptance of a Committee report which does not recommend a reduction of the U.S. assessment to 33⅓% at this time is based on the assumption that a continuation along the course now firmly set by the Committee will achieve the goal of a 33⅓% assessment for the U.S. in not more than two further annual steps.

COMMENT

The scale of contributions for 1952 recommended by the United Nations Committee on Contributions embodies the most extensive adjustments of any scale to date, both in the number of Members affected (33 against 23 last year), and in the extent of the changes for some members (for the United States, a reduction of 2.02 percentage points against 0.87 last year, and for the U.S.S.R., an increase of 2.87 percentage points against 0.64 last year). However, the Committee again emphasizes its policy of moving "step by step in making adjustments, satisfying itself that the changes recommended are fully supported . . . [etc.]". The Committee reports that available statistical information continues to improve but that it is by no means adequate for all countries and that there is room for differences of opinion as to the appropriate method of converting estimates of national income into a common currency.

As to the largest (U.S.) share, the Committee considers that the General Assembly intended a further step to be taken at this time toward the goal of a ceiling of 33⅓%. In recommending a reduction for 1952 for the United States of approximately one-third of the remaining distance to 33⅓%, the Committee states it had in mind its policy of moving gradually and systematically toward the removal of maladjustments in the scale of whatever sort, with adjustment of the United States share taking place at the same pace as adjustments elsewhere in the scale. Although the Committee is not explicit on the point, it is known to have had in mind particularly the progressive withdrawal of the adjustment for war damage that has kept assessments low, particularly for the Iron Curtain countries. The Committee notes in its report that its recommendation for limiting the changes in assessments in 1952 to one-third of the indicated amounts was arrived at after careful consideration during which some members favored a faster rate, and some favored a slower adjustment. Mr. Stuart Rice (U.S.) is recorded as proposing a full adjustment at once. Mr. Soldatov (USSR) objected both to the increases for the Iron Curtain countries, and to decreases for the U.S., the U.K., and France.

In its recommendations, the Contributions Committee has come a very long way from the position previously taken which produced such small results in terms of the U.S. objective. Previously, the Contributions Committee had limited itself to annual changes of not more than 10% in the assessment of any one country. In contrast, the scale recommended for 1952 results in an increase of over 41% in the assessments of the three Soviet states, and of about 30% in the case of Poland. On the basis of the present level of expenditure, the reduction of 2.02% in the case of the U.S. will mean a saving to the U.S. of some $800,000 and a credit from the Working Capital Fund account of some $400,000 additional. In observing that it has taken account of about one-third of the maladjustments in the previously existing scale, the Committee has established a strong presumption that the U.S. objective of 33⅓% will be achievable in not more than two additional annual steps.

The Soviet member of the Contributions Committee has made strong public objection to the recommended scale, and has made his vote against it a matter of record. He has specifically stated that there should be no reduction in the U.S. assessment—that in fact the U.S. should contribute approximately 50% of the budget. It is expected that the U.S.S.R. will make a strong and bitter attack on the recommendations of the Committee when the General Assembly convenes.

The position of the U.S. in the General Assembly would be greatly weakened if it should join the Soviet Union in opposition to the recommendations of the Contributions Committee. It is anticipated that the Soviet Union's attack on the recommendations will be in the nature of an assault upon the expertness and objectiveness of the Committee, the integrity of its members and its freedom from U.S. domination. An attack of this character should of itself redound to the benefit of the U.S. through the resentment which it will arouse in other delegations.

Since the recommendations of the Contributions Committee which produce this 2.02% reduction in the U.S. assessment are based on general considerations of improvement in the economic conditions of all member states showing improvement, the reductions accorded the U.S. and certain other members are equated by increases in the assessments not only of states in the Soviet group, but in other states as well. The new scale results in increases for ten states other than the five Soviet states, namely: Afghanistan, Canada, Cuba, Ethiopia, India, Israel, Mexico, Pakistan, Venezuela, and Yugoslavia.

If the U.S. should reject the Contributions Committee report and insist that a further reduction be accorded, it might attempt to make this claim without upsetting the non-political basis for the Committee's recommendations by urging that Committee Five go further in correcting acknowledged maladjustments than the Contributions Committee felt inclined to recommend. However, this would mean that the ten states listed would all have reason to feel that the U.S. was pressing for very sudden and sizeable increases in their contributions in a completely unreasonable manner—to the detriment of U.S. attempts to secure support from these same states on matters of great political importance. Further, it would be difficult to avoid the U.S. attack on the Contributions Committee Report being misrepresented as a political attack of the same character as that expected from the Soviet Union.

On the other hand, a U.S. challenge to the Contributions Committee Report which openly brushed aside the objectivity which has been the historical foundation of the General Assembly deliberations on the contribution scale would have a serious unsettling effect on all non-Soviet or satellite states. It is this presumption of objectivity which has permitted all delegations to convince their governments of the integrity of Committee Five recommendations on the sharing of the cost burden. Any attack from the U.S. which seriously damages this presumption would throw into turmoil the entire contribution scale proceedings and would both place in question the early achievement of the U.S. goal of 33⅓% and seriously endanger general support for U.S. political objectives.

WASHINGTON, October 31, 1951.

MY DEAR SENATOR MCKELLAR: I am writing for the purpose of consulting with the Senate Committee on Appropriations with respect to the position to be taken by the United States delegation to the Sixth Regular Session of the General Assembly of the United Nations on the subject of the scale of assessments for the calendar year 1952. A similar letter is being sent to the Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives.

At this fortcoming session of the General Assembly which convenes in Paris on November 4 [6], 1951, a prominent item in the agenda, as in past years, will be the question of the scale of assessments for the ensuing financial year. Originally, it had been hoped that a permanent scale of assessments might be adopted by this time, and the rules of procedure of the General Assembly in fact stipulate that general revisions in the scale of assessments not be made more frequently than once in every three years. However, this rule has been set aside each year, a procedure strongly supported by United States delegations in order that there might be annual progress toward the goal of a 33⅓ percent assessment for the United States.

The goal of an assessment of 33⅓ percent for the United States was set by the General Assembly at its Third Session, held in New York in the fall of 1948, when the organization had under consideration its scale of assessments for the calendar year 1949. This accomplishment was due in large measure to the unremitting efforts of United States representatives, in the Committee on Administration and Finance of the General Assembly, and in particular of the late Senator Vandenberg in 1946. It represented a substantial concession to the United States, which was thereby to be exempted from the full application of the "capacity to pay" standard upon which the scale is based. This same goal of a 33⅓ percent contribution for the United States was later adopted by the World Health Organization and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, the two specialized agencies whose scales of assessment are directly modeled after that of the United Nations.

In the case of WHO and UNESCO, the United States assessment has been gradually reduced until it now stands at the target figure of 33⅓ percent of assessments against all members in support of their budgets for the calendar year 1952. For WHO, this represents progress downward from an assessment of 38.77 percent in 1948, and for UNESCO from an assessment of 44.03 percent in 1947. In both instances, the successive reductions in the United States assessment percentage were made easier by the accession, each year, of new members who took up their share of the burden of contributions. At the same time, these reductions have represented the determination of the other members, most of whom are also members of the United Nations, to relieve the United States of some of the weight of its contribution responsibility.

Following up the decision in 1948 to reduce the United States assessment to 33⅓ percent, the Fourth Session of the General Assembly reduced the United States assessment from 39.89 percent to 39.79 percent. Last year, the Fifth Session of the General Assembly voted a further reduction to 38.92 percent. The smallness of these reductions to date in the United Nations, as compared with WHO and UNESCO, is largely attributable to the fact that the accession of new members in any significant number has been blocked by the Soviet veto. Under the terms of the resolution of the Third Session, one of the principal means through which changes were to be brought about was an increase in membership.

Nevertheless, the United States has pressed strongly for substantial reductions which, it believed, could be achieved through a fuller recognition of the increased capacity to pay of certain other members. This position was advanced in 1949 by Mr. John Sherman Cooper, United States representative in the Committee on Administration and Finance and, last year, by Senator John Sparkman while serving in the same capacity.

This year, for the first time, the General Assembly will have before it a report of its Committee on Contributions which recommends a substantial reduction for the United States. This Committee, consisting of ten experts drawn from Member countries and serving in a private capacity, is one of the principal standing committees advisory to the General Assembly. The confidence placed in its expertness and judgment by Member governments has been such that its recommendations have been accepted each year without exception. Mr. James E. Webb, now Under Secretary of State and Mr. Frank Pace, now Secretary of the Army, have previously served as United States members of the Committee at a time when each was Director of the Budget. Mr. Elmer B. Staats, Assistant Director of the Bureau of the Budget, was the United States member of the Committee this year with Mr. Stuart A. Rice, Assistant Director for Statistical Standards, acting as his alternate.

In its current report the Committee on Contributions has recommended, for calendar 1952, a reduction in the United States contribution of 2.02 percentage points (from 38.92% to 36.90%). This is approximately one-third of the remaining distance downwards to 33⅓%, and the Committee indicates that it has in mind a three-year progression both for the United States reduction and for certain upward revisions elsewhere in the scale of contributions.

The proposed reduction of 2.02 percentage points for 1952 would be the largest the United States has yet received, and compares with a reduction for 1951 of 0.87%. Based upon the 1951 level of expenditure, a reduction of 2.02 percentage points would amount to a saving of some $800,000, and in addition there would be a credit to the United States in respect of its Working Capital Fund account of $400,000.

At the same time that it recommends this reduction for the United States, the Committee on Contributions also proposes adjustments, upwards or downwards, of the quotas of thirty-two other Member states. Among these states for whom increases are proposed is the Soviet Union with an increase of 2.87 percentage points, from 6.98% to 9.85%. Proposed increases for Byelorussia and the Ukraine are in the same proportion; the increase for Poland is slightly smaller, and there is a minor increase for Czechoslovakia. The United States has been a strong advocate of increased assessments for the Iron Curtain countries since their original quotas were heavily adjusted for war damage which has now been overcome. Although members of the Committee on Contributions sit in their individual capacity as experts, the Soviet member in the Committee discussions made a vigorous attack on the Committee's conclusions and voted against the proposed scale.

It is the Department's proposal that the United States support the adoption of the report of the Contributions Committee as the best available basis for the 1952 scale, and as the course most consistent with our national interest. The Delegation would make clear the continuing determination of the United States to realize at the earliest possible date the objective that no one member of the United Nations Organization should pay more than 33⅓% of its regular expenses. The Delegation would further indicate that it supports the quota assigned the United States in the 1952 scale only because the report of the Contributions Committee gives promise of a systematic reduction to 33⅓% in not more than two annual steps after 1952.

The Department stands ready to provide any further information which the Appropriations Committee may require in this matter and to meet with the Committee if it so desires.

Sincerely yours, CARLISLE H. HUMELSINE

Memorandum by Representative John M. Vorys of the United States Delegation to the General Assembly

US/A/C.5/166 [PARIS,] November 21, 1951.

[Subject:] Memorandum on niact (Gadel 201, 11/20/51)

This requires consideration of (a) the present legal situation, (b) the Congressional situation next year.

(a) Note that the law prohibits any representative of the U.S. from committing the U.S. to any contribution in excess of 33⅓ percent of the budget of any international organization, provided that in "exceptional circumstances" such commitment can be made after "consultation with the" Appropriation Committees of the House and Senate. Every one in Congress knows that it is practically impossible to have a consultation with a Congressional Committee while both houses are in adjournment. No one in Congress would consider that a letter to Committee Chairmen constituted consultation, and "consultation" is required, not "reasonable endeavor", as stated in Webb's niact.

The law provides for commitment above 33⅓ percent only under "exceptional circumstances". Routine contribution to the regular budget of the UN is certainly not an exceptional circumstance, particularly when the Congress knew of the 1948 UN resolution making 33⅓ percent the normal, knew of the gradual reduction, knew that more than 33⅓ percent, however, would probably be recommended by the Contribution Committee for next year.

Since there has been no consultation and the circumstances are not exceptional, representatives of the Government are prohibited by law from committing the U.S. to a contribution over 33⅓ percent.

(b) Regardless of legal technicalities, it is perfectly clear that Congress is not going to appropriate more than 33⅓ percent for the regular budget of the UN in 1952. The U.S. Delegation should bear this in mind in determining its position.

Note that Webb's niact is strictly personal—"my strong personal feeling . . . my own judgment. My judgment . . ."

PRIORITY WASHINGTON, November 28, 1951—6:11 p. m.

Gadel 277. For Fisher [1] from Tate.[2] Following are views Legal Adviser's office here re Article 17 UN Charter: [3]

Language Paragraph 2 that "expenses of the Organization shall be borne by the Members as apportioned by the General Assembly" clearly mandatory and imposes treaty obligation upon US to pay contribution as apportioned by GA. (In this connection note that if US is in arrears in its financial contribution it loses vote in GA under Article 19 UN Charter. Under Article 19 Member in arrears may vote only if GA satisfied failure pay due conditions beyond Members' control.)

Check of history US ratification UN Charter shows no controversy or discussion Article 17 in Senate hearings or debate. Senate Foreign Relations Committee report recommending ratification UN Charter noted GA will have function to approve budgets and concluded on page 15:

"The question of our membership in an international organization to preserve peace has been debated throughout our country and in this Congress as fully as any public issue in our history has ever been discussed. The committee feels that the people and the members of the Senate understand clearly the consequences and the requirements of our membership in the United Nations and that they are prepared to undertake the responsibilities of membership in order to enjoy the privileges which that membership may ultimately bring in the form of world security. The committee is convinced that participation in the United Nations is in accordance with our national interests, and that our contributions to the United Nations will be repaid many times."

Clear support found in legislative history Charter that Article 17(2) imposes obligation. Committee One of Commission Two of UNCIO [4] in recommending sanction appearing Article 19 stated pur-

[3] Article 17 of the Charter of the United Nations reads:

"1. The General Assembly shall consider and approve the budget of the Organization.

"2. The expenses of the Organization shall be borne by the Members as apportioned by the General Assembly.

"3. The General Assembly shall consider and approve any financial and budgetary arrangements with specialized agencies referred to in Article 57 and shall examine the administrative budgets of such specialized agencies with a view to making recommendations to the agencies concerned."

pose was "to impose a penalty of loss of voting rights in the General Assembly in the event that member states fail to fulfill their financial obligation (underscore added) to the International Organization." (Eight UNCIO Doc. 364.)

We feel therefore that UN Charter imposes clear treaty obligation upon US to pay its contribution to UN as fixed by GA. Failure to do so would not only subject US to loss of vote under Article 19 but would be contrary to American tradition of respect for treaties since earliest days of republic. In 1796 Supreme Court in case of Ware v. Hylton enforcing Treaty of Peace with Great Britain enunciated principle respect for treaties. In 1931 Chief Justice Hughes in opinion enforcing Consular Convention with Italy reaffirmed principle. Santovincenzo v. Egan, 284 U.S. 30. Hughes said in that case "As treaties are contracts between independent nations their words are to be taken in their ordinary meaning 'as understood in the public law of nations'."

Internationally in North Atlantic Fisheries Arbitration between Great Britain and US in 1910 arbitral tribunal said "every State has to execute the obligations incurred by treaty."

Distinguished American authorities have consistently upheld principle of respect for treaties, including international legal obligation of US to pay money if so required by treaty.

In 1833 Secretary of State Livingston observed "The Government of the United States presumes that whenever a treaty has been duly concluded and ratified by the acknowledged authorities competent for that purpose, an obligation is thereby imposed upon each and every department of the government to carry it into complete effect, according to its terms, and that on the performance of this obligation consists the due observance of good faith among nations. (2 Wharton, International Law Digest, 1887, p. 67.)"

Professor Hyde also comments "It is not unreasonable to assert that when, for example, the United States concludes a treaty contemplating payment by it for the cession to itself of territory, the nation incurs a legal obligation to make payment, and incidentally agrees that the Congress will not fail to make the requisite appropriation." 2. Scale of Assessments

Mr. Hall called atention to the documents that had been placed before the Delegation. Among them were the following: the Report of the Committee on Contributions of the UN which had set forth the assessment recommendations for the coming calendar year. There was an excerpt from Public Law 188 enacted near the end of the last Session of Congress and which stated the conditions under which the US contributions to international organizations were to be made. Only in exceptional circumstances, in which case consultation with the Appropriations Committees of both House and Senate was required, could the US contribution to an international organization be in excess of 33⅓% of the total contributions. Also included among the document was a letter to Congressman Cannon, Chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, similar to a letter which had been sent to Senator McKellar of the Senate Appropriations Committee. The Department's position paper, SD/A/C.5/170, together with recommendations from the Delegation staff to amend it, Delga 260, and the Department's comments thereon, Gadel 201, were also included. A memorandum prepared by Congressman Vorys regarding Gadel 201 was also appended. Finally, there was enclosed Section A of General Assembly resolution 238(III), in which the aim had been expressed of limiting the maximum assessment of any one contributor to the UN during normal times to one third of the total.

Mr. Hall briefly reviewed the history of the scale of assessments problem. He pointed out that the high level at which the US contribution had originally been set was based primarily on the principle of ability to pay. After strenuous efforts, the US in 1948 had secured adoption by the Assembly of resolution 238(III) in which the principle was enunciated that in normal times the contribution of the highest contributor should be kept at a ceiling of 33⅓%.

The 1949 reduction in the US assessment for 1950 had been 0.10%, 0.89% for 1951, and 2.02% reduction was being proposed for 1952. At the same time the Committee on Contributions had increased the Soviet percentage by 2.87 points. The Committee had agreed that this large decrease in the US contribution over previous years was in line with the principle stated in the GA resolution of 1948, and that in two more years, the US contribution would be down to one third of the total contributions.

Mr. Hall next took up the position of the Delegation in relation to the legislation applicable to the situation. He pointed out that it had been impossible for the Department, and would now be for the Delegation as well, to consult with the Appropriations Committees of the House and Senate, since Congress had adjourned. He also referred to the opinion of the Department that the letters written to Congressman Cannon and Senator McKellar constituted a reasonable attempt to consult in view of the situation. He referred to the telegram to Mr. Hickerson (Delga 260), in which it had been stated that the US Delegation staff felt that a 33⅓% position would probably lose out in the GA voting, in that the Contributions Committee Report would probably be supported. In listing the factors unfavorable to achievement of a 33⅓% goal in 1952, Mr. Hall pointed out that other delegations felt that the US profited from having the Headquarters in US, and that the US had not yet acted in the matter of tax exemption for US Nationals in the Secretariat. Should the US go into the Assembly prepared to insist that its contribution assessment be reduced to one third, other delegations might tack onto such a resolution a condition that the US reciprocally provide some form of tax relief for US Nationals so as to eliminate the necessity for reimbursing to the US Treasury the taxes of US Nationals. On the side of achieving 33⅓%, the US could go into the Assembly and argue that on the basis of sovereign equality, its contributions to the Korean fighting, and the possibility of diminished support for the UN within the US, it would have to insist on the reduction.

But as he had pointed out earlier, the USSR and others would certainly take advantage of this position. In addition, the USSR might well attack the objectivity of the Contributions Committee, and seek to have the full Fifth Committee determine contributions. The US had previously backed the objectivity and "expertness" of this Committee and in terms of US interests this concept should be preserved. Mr. Hall pointed out that on the Contributions Committee the developed countries outweighed the underdeveloped ones. If the assessments matter were to be opened in the Fifth Committee the balance would be completely reversed.

On the question of whether the US was legally or morally obligated to make its contribution, in accordance with the amount fixed by the GA, Mr. Hall said that both the Department and Ambassador Austin had felt that there was a treaty obligation by which the US would be legally bound. A moral obligation was also present. What Mr. Hall was asking the Delegation to consider was the recommendations for a change in position to the extent indicated in Delga 260.

Mr. Cohen commented that he was not connected with either the Legislative or Executive branches of government in between the sessions of the GA and therefore approached this matter as a private US citizen. He wondered how serious it would be for the US to upset the Report of the Committee on Contributions. He felt that there was a great need for the United Nations to succeed, and that the "exceptional circumstances" referred to in the legislation applicable to the present situation needed something other than a fine legal interpretation. He said that if Congress had intended to make an exception in any particular case, it could not have intended the executive branch to be bereft of the authority to take such an exception on its own when it was impossible to consult with the Appropriations Committees of the House and Senate. Fair compliance with the Act, in view of its passage late in the session and the reasonable efforts made to consult with the Committees, had been achieved. He suggested that rather than voting against the Report of the Committee on Contributions, the US could at least abstain and remain consistent with its legal obligations. He felt that voting for it might be contravening the terms of the Appropriation Act, but abstaining would not constitute such a contravention.

Senator Cooper said that he followed in part the line of reasoning put forward by Mr. Cohen. He thought that there were exceptional circumstances involved, and that the US contribution was very small in comparison with the value received, and in view of the amounts the US was spending on other things. However, he could not vote for the Report of the Committee on Contributions since it was absolutely essential to have consultation with the Congressional Committees if exceptional circumstances presented themselves. That was the crucial point and those consultations had not been held. In his interpretation of the situation the US should vote against the Report, although he hoped a way could be found for the US to pay its full assessment.

Miss Strauss said that she felt this matter was of such great importance that it would be unwise to seek a Delegation decision that day.

Mr. Vorys said that there were three questions involved. First in importance was the meaning of the law itself. Secondly, he thought, the meaning of "consultation" should be defined. And thirdly, he felt that it should be decided whether the US would be committed to a course of action because it voted for a particular report. He did not think there had been consultation within the meaning of the law. He was not personally convinced that the US would be committed to a course of action simply because an international body passed a resolution. Nothing could supplant the Congress' authority over money bills. He had taken up the question of Congressional intent with the Senators and Representatives who had been at Strassbourg. They had all agreed that the Congress would not appropriate more than ⅓ of the total of UN contributions for the next year. Mr. Mansfield referred to the opinions of Senators McMahon and Benton on this matter, and said he understood them to have felt that while it was not proper for the Congress so to limit the US contribution, they agreed that the temper of Congress was such that it would probably not appropriate more than 33⅓%. Mr. Mansfield agreed with Mr. Vorys that the US should vote against the report.

Mr. Hall re-explained his views in regard to the Contributions Committee. His only point had been intended to be that the ratio of underdeveloped countries to developed ones was much safer from the US point of view in the smaller Contributions Committee than in the full Assembly. Other states would vote against the Report of this Committee since their own assessments were being increased. They were behaving on the basis of their own immediate short-range interest, and ignoring what would be to their better interests in the long run. Mr. Sandifer added that of course the Contributions Committee had no ability to bind the Assembly, but could only make recommendations. The Assembly had full power to decide whether or not to accept these recommendations.

Mr. McKeever addressed himself to the political-propaganda aspects of this matter. He felt that the UN was the best ideological weapon in the US arsenal. It would be a great mistake for the US, by voting against the Assessment Scale, to help the Russians, who were at this very moment building up a substitute for the UN in their World Peace Council.

No decision was taken at the meeting on the US position on this matter, and it was understood that the matter would be brought up again.

Minutes of Twenty-third Meeting of the United States Delegation to the General Assembly, Paris, November 30, 1951

SECRET
US/A/M(Chr)/210

The Delegation continued the discussion, begun the day before, on the scale of assessments for the apportionment of expenses of the United Nations. Mr. Hall stated that he had nothing to add to what he had said previously in his presentation. Mr. Vorys recommended that the position of the Delegation be that it seek an adjustment in the assessments scale in order to achieve the 33⅓% ceiling for the U.S. contribution. He took this position not so much on the basis of domestic U.S. law as from a feeling that a time of relatively full adjustment in terms of ability to contribute was at hand (a position he knew would be attacked by other Delegations) and that the U.S. should seek to have its contribution confined to what the General Assembly has previously agreed was just; namely, a maximum contribution of one third of the total. He felt that when General Eisenhower [1] and Foreign Minister Schumann [2] [sic] had said that the present situation was likely to continue for ten years, the world had come as near to a condition of "normalcy" as was possible. Therefore, it would be wise to seek, on the basis of principle, a reduction in the U.S. assessment. The U.S. should not say that it would not pay the difference between one third and the present assessment, for in fact one third of the forthcoming budget might be larger than we had paid in the past. The sole basis should be that the General Assembly itself had agreed that one third was a normal maximum contribution.

Mrs. Roosevelt asked Mr. Vorys if he felt that the U.S. could achieve acceptance of that position in the Committee. He answered that he had been reluctant to talk too much with other delegations about the matter in the absence of a clear decision by the U.S. Delegation. He added that he and Mr. Hall had however talked with a few Committee 5 delegates about the matter. Stone of Canada [3] had seemed sympathetic to the U.S. view. In a talk with the Mexicans and Brazilians, during which they brought the matter up, the Brazilian had said that he saw merit in the U.S. position and would be willing to forego the proposed decrease in his country's contribution in order to offset in part a reduction in that of the U.S. Byron Price [4] of the Secretariat had mentioned that Secretary-General Lie had heard of the U.S. desire to reduce its contribution to the one third ceiling and had said he was thinking about the matter. Price himself had stated that he did not think the time propitious for advancing such an idea.

Dr. Tobias indicated that he had been present at the Non-Governmental Organization luncheon at which Mr. Vorys had discussed this matter, and had noted in particular their reactions. He said there had been disappointment that the U.S. might have to contemplate such a step at this time. The Non-Governmental Organization representatives recognized that the Act of Congress was on the books and that the normal United Nations expectancy of a one third maximum was logical. The general feeling had been, however, that some way should be found to indicate to the Non-Governmental Organizations and others what would result from a decision of this sort in terms of cutting important services rendered by the United Nations, especially since the actual difference in money was relatively small. They indicated they would be willing to work toward asking Congress to appropriate the difference. They realized also that taking a position of this kind might tend to damage the strength of domestic U.S. law if they were to argue against the mandate of Congress. The seriousness of the situation, nevertheless, seemed to be an overriding consideration, and made it very desirable for the U.S. Delegation to try to give every indication of its awareness of the dilemma in which it found itself. For example, they had suggested an abstaining vote, or an indication that partial payment of the total assessment would be followed by attempts to have Congress appropriate the remainder at its next session. Dr. Tobias felt we were faced with a situation where we could not adhere only to the letter of the law. Quoting the Scriptures, he said "The letter killeth", and especially here the letter of the law might well kill. The best way of summing up the situation seemed to be that the U.S. would be "penny wise and pound foolish" in view of the great amounts of financial aid it was giving to individual countries, when it decided to reduce its United Nations contribution by such a small amount. For the reasons he had expressed, he hoped the Delegation would decide to abstain in the voting and then explain its position to the public at home.

Mrs. Roosevelt thought that there were two possibilities from which the Delegation could choose. It could authorize an abstention, or a negative vote with an explanation of the reasons therefor. She called the Delegation's attention to the legal position the Department had taken as expressed in Gadel 277, and suggested that it should also be considered by the Delegation in determining its position. In this connection, Mr. Fisher remarked that he felt there were two decisions the Delegation had to make. The first was what the Delegation should try for, and how much effort it ought to make on behalf of whatever it decided to pursue. The second decision should be what the Delegation would do in case its efforts under the first decision did not succeed. He thought a sincere and honest effort was called for, in seeking to obtain a reduction in the U.S. assessment. If the Delegation members who would be making this effort felt, however, that pushing this position to the extreme would cost infinitely more in other areas, then the existence of "exceptional circumstances" might be indicated. The attempt should be made, in other words, but if it were found to prejudice the overall national interest, we should consult to the fullest degree with Congress. Our constitutional duty required us to use every legal method to protect the overall national interest. It would be very unfortunate if the U.S. were to be voted down on its demand to reduce its contribution to one third and then hinted that perhaps it would not pay. The implications in this for other states would be extremely dangerous. It was up to the Delegation to make a "college try", to obtain a reduction.

Ambassador Gross [5] said he had been on Committee 5 in 1948 when the General Assembly resolution had been adopted which recognized that the maximum contribution should be one third. He was troubled by several problems in addition to those mentioned by Dr. Tobias and Mr. Fisher. The law itself, he felt, was a "good cog" but it was fashioned for a "slightly different kind of machine". He thought it was fairly well understood that the "commitments" in the United Nations only arose out of the Charter. So said the lawyers. He asked Mr. Vorys whether, if the 33⅓% contribution position were adhered to, this would mean taking matters out of the hands of the Contributions Committee and putting it into the full Fifth Committee.

He referred to paragraph 17 of the Contributions Committee Report in which it was apparent that a decision on the matter of the U.S. contribution could not be made in a vacuum. Other states would be affected by whatever action we insisted upon. Whose contribution would rise if ours went down? Where would the re-adjustment be made, and would there be time for whatever group was to do this to accomplish their task? Ambassador Gross expressed the view that it would be dangerous to open the question of the assessments scale in the Fifth Committee where we might be swamped by the "have not" states; it might be better to adhere to the recommendations of the Contributions Committee where there was a fair balance between the "have" and "have not" states. Ambassador Gross also pointed out that in paragraph 12 of its Report, the "policy of the Contributions Committee", as stated there, was one most accurately reflecting that of the General Assembly as a whole and as favorable as possible to the U.S.

Lastly, Ambassador Gross thoroughly agreed with Mr. Fisher that a "commitment" as foreseen in the legislation did not generate an "obligation". It was the apportionment as agreed upon by the General Assembly which generated the obligation. He felt for the reasons stated that there was room for arguing that the US ought to vote against the Contributions Committee Report. The members of the United States Delegation might be criticized for not voting against it. In analyzing the "apparent spirit" of Public Law 188, he said that when Congress had considered enacting it, someone must have known that a United States vote by itself did not commit the United States, but that only the apportionment by the General Assembly could do that. The law, then, might have been an effort on the part of Congress to offset any additional moral obligation on its part. If the Delegation were to decide and vote against the Report of the Contribution Committee, this would leave the question in Congress' hands as to whether to comply with the decision of the Assembly. For these reasons he felt the United States Delegation should vote against the Report and not go any further by way of explanation which could rivet the situation so that Congress could not comply even if it wished to do so.

Senator Cooper said that his position was that legally the individual members of the Delegation were directed by law not to vote for anything over a one-third contribution for the US. This did not mean, however, that the United States Delegation should stop working to make it possible for the Congress to give more. He hoped that it might be possible to postpone General Assembly action for a while in order to work along those lines.

Mr. Vorys thought that the Delegation should make every effort to persuade the United Nations members to apply the 33⅓% principle this year. The Delegation should try this out on other Delegations now. He said in answer to Ambassador Gross' previous remarks that of course he realized this would mean an upward adjustment in the Contributions of other countries. He felt that foremost among these upward adjustments should be those of the Soviet bloc countries.

Mr. Vorys said that if the law prohibited the United States Delegation from committing the United States to anything more than a one-third contribution, that bound the members of the Delegation. In regard to the question of Charter obligations, he said that some people had pressed the view that a levy by the General Assembly acting under the Charter constituted a legal obligation. He had taken an opposite view. He felt that any such doctrine would be extremely unfortunate. He also expressed the view that the Delegation should not be so concerned with trying to get the Congress to change its views. What the legislation required was that the United States Delegation should try to get the UN views changed. If not successful in that undertaking, then the Delegation would have to decide how to cast its vote in such a situation.

Ambassador Sayre[6] was much impressed by the need for trying to get the United States contribution down to one-third. But he felt it should also be considered that the Delegation was under a duty to try to effectuate the will of Congress in the best way possible. The United States could adopt a "take it or leave it" attitude, or it could try to work for the reduction to one-third in a year or two. The latter would seem to him to be the better way if the law could be construed to permit such an endeavor. He thought that with the general world situation and the disillusionment with the United Nations in many quarters it might endanger matters considerably if the United States refused to pay more than the one-third this year. Similar attempts to restrict contributions might well begin all around the world.

Looking at the law, he felt that a "commitment" could not come from the casting of a United States vote in one way or another. The law provided for exceptional circumstances, and should the Delegation take the view that there was some degree of flexibility provided for in the law, it could abstain on the present report of the Contributions Committee and seek to obtain a promise from the United Nations that in the next two years the United States contribution would be reduced to the one-third maximum. He hoped that the Delegation would agree that "exceptional circumstances" did exist and that the Delegation should not be held too rigidly by the law before them.

Mr. Mansfield joined with Mr. Vorys in complimenting the advisers of the Delegation for their talents in ironing out differences in viewpoints. He felt those talents should be applied to the present situation. He pointed out that he and Mr. Vorys were in the position of having to go back and explain their actions before Congress. In regard to a suggestion by Mrs. Roosevelt that the Delegation meet with a group of Congressmen arriving for the weekend, he thought it a very good idea. He felt it necessary to point out however that they were all Democrats and might not reflect the views that Congress as a whole would take. He added that Senators Benton and McMahon had expressed the view at Strassbourg that the Congress would not appropriate more than the one third. Since time was not too pressing on this matter he suggested meeting with the Congressmen of the group referred to by Mrs. Roosevelt, and also with the members of the Appropriations Committee who would be in Paris shortly.

Mr. Sandifer [7] said that in regard to the question of whether or not there had been "consultation" in connection with the "exceptional circumstances" proviso of the law, those who felt that every reasonable effort had been made to consult were acting from a very conscientious viewpoint. They too would have to face Congress, and the Appropriations Committees. He felt that the leeway provided for in the law through the existence of "exceptional circumstances" indicated that Congress did not intend to tie the hands of the Executive branch. When every reasonable attempt had been made to achieve consultation, the law had been satisfied. This was not an isolated problem. It related to the overall complex of United States obligations in the world. He felt that it would be very difficult to convince other delegations that these were normal times in the sense of the 1948 General Assembly resolution. He referred to the fact that within the Specialized Agencies a one-third contribution by the US had been achieved only because the membership of those agencies had been increased. The USSR had successfully blocked the expansion of the United Nations membership and so the problem was not one of normal times. In view of these considerations, Mr. Sandifer suggested that the Delegation approach the problem on the basis of what was politically feasible in the General Assembly without undermining the basic position of the United States. This, he felt, was what the Congress must have meant. He thought that it would be feasible to seek to achieve the reduction to one-third in one more year after the present. He mentioned the tremendous effort by Mr. Stuart Rice for the United States in the Contributions Committee to obtain the full reduction. As it was, he had only been able to obtain that of 2.02%. Even this was much more than in previous years. Mr. Sandifer was convinced that regardless of the talents of the political officers, this was a case where no amount of "arm twisting" could get the full reduction this year. It did seem possible to achieve the 33⅓% goal in one more year, however. He therefore suggested as a possible compromise position, which he would be willing to recommend to the Department, that the US agree to accept the scale recommended by the Contributions Committee if the General Assembly would adopt a clear-cut mandate to the Contributions Committee to reduce the United States contribution to 33⅓% next year. This was, of course, on the assumption that the Congressional Committees did not state that the Delegation must insist upon the reduction to 33⅓% this year.

On the question of the existence of "exceptional circumstances", Miss Strauss felt that the repercussions of a negative vote from the US would be so dangerous to the UN itself that this matter should be made the basis of an appeal to the people of the United States. She felt sure that if the public were fully presented with the situation, they would indicate to Congress their desire that the United States should pay this year what the Contributions Committee had recommended. The hands of Congress were tied, too, and only through a groundswell of public opinion could the position be changed.

Ambassador Jessup [8] asked if, in view of the time element, the Delegation ought not to authorize Mr. Vorys to make the effort he had suggested. He understood that Mr. Fisher and Ambassador Gross agreed with this approach.

Mrs. Roosevelt agreed that the United States should go "all out" to ascertain the chances of success for a United States move of this sort.

[8] Philip C. Jessup, Ambassador at Large, member of the U.S. Delegation.

Mr. Vorys said he thought the matter so vital that the full weekend should be used to ascertain the views of the other delegations.

Mr. Sandifer wondered whether the decision of the Delegation would be to announce that the United States position was to work for the reduction, or simply to seek information as to whether a possible move by the United States would be successful. Mr. Hall felt that a United States effort to change the recommendations of the Contributions Committee would be a matter of such importance that the Department should take it up on the highest governmental level. Mr. Vorys said that the answer to Mr. Sandifer's question would be that the decision was only to explore. He could, of course, refer to the existence of Public Law 188, but not state that the Delegation had decided to vote against the report and seek the reduction to one third.

Mr. Ross [9] said that the Delegation must be sure that the United States was working as a team on this matter. He wanted the political officers to be sure that the approach to be taken was one of "reconnaissance in depth" in a first démarche. Mrs. Roosevelt said that the approach would be to clarify the dilemma with which the Delegation was faced. Mr. Ross felt that it would be bad politics in the United Nations to expose our internal difficulties. We should argue on the merits for a one-third reduction, a policy the United States Delegation had followed since the beginning of the United Nations. He added that the political officers could get from Mr. Hall the appropriate points to make in such an argument.

Mr. Cohen was disturbed at the way this matter was being approached. All would agree with Mr. Vorys, he said, in making the "college try" for obtaining a reduction. But at the same time the United States should be careful not to prejudice its other positions by trying to obtain information as to what the situation would be if the United States sought to open up the Report of the Contributions Committee. He only wanted to be sure what kind of action the Delegation was authorizing, and was not certain how far the exploration could go without prejudicing our other interests. As it was a matter of great importance to all countries, we might be opening a Pandora's Box.

Mr. McKeever cautioned that regardless of what the exploration consisted, the Delegation should be extremely careful not to let this develop into a public debate. The damage that could be done to the interests of the United States would far outweigh the differences in amounts of the assessments.

Ambassador Dreier [10] suggested that in view of the present state of mind of the Latin Americans over the ICJ slate, it would be unwise to approach them at all. Mrs. Roosevelt thoroughly agreed with him on this point. When Mr. Nolting asked whether the United States would also explain that reducing the United States contribution would constitute a raising of the contributions of other countries, Mrs. Roosevelt said that this was understood to be the case, but since this matter had to be handled with the utmost delicacy, it would not be wise to bring that point up.

Mr. Vorys said that he had mentioned confidentially to the members of some delegations the problems facing the United States Delegation. Mr. Hall added that this had been only to our best friends. To India and Pakistan and countries similarly situated we would have to argue on principle. So far, he admitted, there had been no bad reactions. He advocated adoption to Mr. Ross' suggestion.

Ambassador Gross said he was very impressed with the suggestion of Mr. Sandifer, and of course agreed with Ambassador Jessup that he favored giving the matter a try. Mrs. Roosevelt agreed too, saying that Messrs. Mansfield and Vorys would continue as in the past to express themselves as Congressional members of the Delegation. The staff would seek what it could get on the basis of its regular consultations. Mr. Ross could not agree that this was a "try". We would only be "raising the question" with other delegations and getting them to come out of the Committee Five atmosphere into the broader plane of political considerations, and would ask them whether we could not get on with the previous intentions of the General Assembly to limit the maximum contributions to one-third. We would let only just enough be known to provoke their reactions to this idea.

Mr. Sandifer suggested that any liaison be done only after consultation with Messrs. Ross and Hall.

Mrs. Roosevelt remarked that Mr. McKeever was right in stating that this should not be made a matter of public debate, and that it would do great damage to our political efforts. However, she said, this had not been taken into consideration when Congress had enacted the law.

[Here follows a short statement about a matter not on the agenda.]

United States Delegation Working Paper

CONFIDENTIAL [PARIS,] November 30, 1951.

US/A/C.5/167

Subject: Contributions to the UN

Some of the points which might be useful in the exploratory conversations requested in this morning's Delegation meeting are as follows:

1. The United States has consistently held, since the first General Assembly, that the sovereign equality principle which underlies the Charter of the United Nations requires the more equal sharing of the expenses of the Organization than is reflected in the present contributions scale. The Delegation stated at the first General Assembly that in its view a contribution ceiling of one-third would not violate that principle. There is a relationship between the one-third ceiling and the two-thirds voting principle in the Assembly, and also in most corporations and business enterprises one-third is not considered as constituting a majority control of the enterprise.

2. This principle was recognized in 1948 by the General Assembly in the resolution of principle. The implementation of this resolution has been delayed from year to year in spite of the protests of the United States. The people of the United States have been unable to understand this long delay and are becoming increasingly impatient with the failure of the UN to reduce the United States contribution to 33⅓%.

3. This impatience has been greatly increased over the past year during which the United States has spent many hundreds of millions of dollars and thousands of lives in defending the interest of the United Nations in Korea. The United States people are even more perplexed when they examine the Report of the Committee of Contributions which continues in effect the preferential treatment of Eastern European countries as a result of war damages of the second World War, a principle which was established in 1946 and which it was assumed would have been put aside by 1951. This is particularly apparent when one considers the statements of Eastern European states at this session of the Assembly and at the last session of ECOSOC which claim complete recovery from war damages and even boast that the pre-war levels of production in the Soviet Union and its satellite states are being far exceeded.

As a result of all these factors the United States Delegation holds strongly the opinion that this General Assembly should consider very seriously the revision of the Report of the Contributions Committee with a view to the immediate application of the ceiling principle, the upward adjustment of contributions of states presently under-assessed and in cognizance of increased national production.

4. The United States recognizes the economic difficulties faced by many countries of the world, but it should be clear that the question of contributions to the UN is a political and not an economic matter and that the question of economic assistance is one which can best be handled through bilateral relationships between nations. The recognition of this principle by the people of the United States is reflected in the very large economic assistance program contained in the Mutual Security Act. In addition the United States has shown its understanding of the humanitarian problems and economic needs of underdeveloped countries by its large contribution to the Palestine Refugee Program and the Korean Program and its leadership in making contributions to the Technical Assistance Program.

You should generally avoid the question of the law unless it is brought up to you, but if you are questioned about the Congressional action which limits the ability of the United States Representatives to commit the United States Government to any contribution beyond 33⅓%, it would be desirable to state that this action in itself, while important, is primarily reflective of the attitude of the United States people indicated in the first paragraphs above. The Act does not indicate definitively what the attitude of the Congress would be in handling any requests for appropriations which may come from the United Nations in excess of 33⅓%.

If the person to whom you are talking desires a more definitive opinion, you might suggest that you will be glad to arrange for them to talk with Congressmen Mansfield or Vorys who should be able to speak more defintively since they are Members of Congress.

Memorandum of a Staff Meeting of the United States Delegation to the General Assembly, Paris, December 1, 1951

US/A/C.5/171

[Here follows list of persons (25) present. Congressmen Mansfield and Vorys were present for the representatives of the Delegation. The two Senior Advisers of the Advisory Staff, Messrs. Ross and Sandifer, were present. The sole agenda item was the question of the scale of assessments for national contributions to the United Nations.]

Mr. Ross indicated that the purpose of the meeting would be to examine the soundings made thus far in regard to the contributions matter, and thereafter to consider the memorandum (doc. US/A/C.5/167)[1] prepared by Mr. Hall as a basis for continuing these soundings. In view of the revolt of the Latin Americans over the ICJ and SC slates in the past 24 hours,[2] it had been practicable to approach any of the Latin American delegations on the contributions matter. Mr. Hall reported that the Soviets seemed to be making the rounds to gain support against the increase in their assessment as recommended by the Contributions Committee.

[2] For documentation regarding these matters, see pp. 78 ff.

Mr. Taylor [3] read Mr. Hall's memorandum. The discussion resulted in deleting the second half of the last sentence in paragraph one, to omit reference to the practices of business enterprises and corporations. There was some discussion as to the appropriateness of relating the matter of voting to that of contribution percentages. Mr. Vorys felt that there was more than a coincidental relationship between the one-third maximum contribution and the two-thirds majority required in the voting.

Mr. Ross suggested that the tone of the second paragraph should be changed to indicate the emphasis on principle which the United States was stressing. If the United Nations expressed itself on principle, the implementation thereof ought to follow without undue delay. This had not been true in the contributions case. Mr. Hall noted the reference to "normal times" in the 1948 General Assembly resolution recommending one-third as the maximum contribution. Many states would argue these were not normal times. He felt the United States should define normal times as a period of stability; such a period existed at the present time.

Mr. Ross suggested broadening the scope of the first sentence in paragraph three to include all international contributions to relief and aid funds, among which that of the United States to Korea, both in lives and money, was by far the greatest. Mr. Lubin also suggested adding an annex containing a few short excerpts from Soviet bloc speeches in ECOSOC on their economic recovery as evidence that preferential treatment of these states in matters of assessment should end.[4] Mr. Vorys added that recitals of adherence to United Nations principles in all United States appropriations for foreign aid, together with a willingness to end these programs whenever the United Nations felt them no longer necessary, were indications of United States good faith on this matter. Mr. Hall agreed with Mr. Nolting's observation that this matter was being cast in terms of the East–West struggle, and that such a development was not strictly desirable. However, he pointed out that in talking with states like India and Pakistan, the argument could be used that their assessments need not be so high if the inequities resulting from preferential treatment to the Soviet bloc for war damages were eliminated as a result of the admitted economic recovery of those states.

Commenting on the second paragraph under number 3, Mr. Ross warned that the United States Delegation had not yet decided to advocate a revision of the Contributions Committee Report and call for immediate application of the 33-⅓ per cent ceiling principle.

[3] Paul B. Taylor, Principal Executive Officer of the Delegation.
[4] This information was incorporated into a Delegation Working Paper, Doc. US/A/C.5/170, December 4, 1951, not printed.

In regard to paragraph 4, Mr. Fisher challenged the naked use of a power-political argument. After some discussion it was agreed to add qualifying words which would clothe the argument in more diplomatic phraseology. The important point contained in the paragraph was that this question should be brought out from the atmosphere of finance-ministries and onto the political plane.

The parliamentary situation applicable to this item was discussed. An element which entered into the formulation of the United States Delegation's decision would be the reactions of other delegations to the soundings taken by the United States over the weekend. For this purpose it would be important that the political officers be thoroughly briefed on the technicalities involved. Since it would be leading from weakness for the Delegation to indicate the indecision of the United States on this matter, Mr. Sandifer suggested a slightly different approach. We would stress the importance the United States attached to the one-third principle, and the disappointment that the United Nations had been so slow in implementing the 1948 Resolution. In view of the increasing domestic pressure to obtain a reduction to the one-third maximum, especially since United States expenditures on a world-wide basis for foreign aid were so high, the United States was beginning to feel it was nearing the point of diminishing returns. For these reasons, the Delegation wondered how far the time schedule for reducing the United States contribution to one-third could be advanced. Mr. Sandifer felt that it would be impossible to evade the fact that behind this pressure stood the United States Congress. What the Delegation would be seeking was an answer to how an approach could be made toward obtaining the necessary reduction. From the point of view of United States participation in the United Nations, what approach would ensure the best arrangement to achieve this end?

It was agreed that the Delegation would be going too far if it asked other delegations to go back to their governments with questions as to their willingness to increase their or other's contributions to offset an American decrease. Mr. Hall estimated that a reduction of the United States contribution to one-third of the total would mean an increase of about 4.77% in the contributions of each of the other members. At the same time he felt on the basis of past experience that it would be unfortunate to indicate what a small amount this would be to each country. A thousand dollar increase for example in the contribution of a small country like Guatemala or Paraguay would be much harder to realize than an increase of several hundred thousand in that of the United Kingdom.

After it had been brought out that a reduction of the United States contribution to one-third of the total would only involve about $2 million, various suggestions were offered on how the United States amount in the Working Capital Fund could be charged to the United States contribution to the United Nations itself.

It was generally agreed that only a fair sampling of the opinions and reactions of other delegations was necessary. For this purpose it would be better to spend more time with fewer delegations in order to assure that the United States position was understood. Mr. Ross wanted the political officers to understand that the making of this approach, was just like that for any other matter. Above all, they should not be apologetic and give the impression that talking about money was unpleasant business and that wealthy countries should not be talking to poor ones about cutting down their contributions.

Delga 468. For Hickerson UNA, and Ingram, UNI, from Hall. Re contributions scale. Ref telecon. Package deal for consideration follows:

1. US propose adoption Contributions Committee report with reduction US contribution to 33-⅓ percent and secretariat distribution amount of reduction across all other members on basis assessments recommended by Contributions Committee.
2. Resolve to distribute surplus of $1,230,000 for 1950 to membership rather than transferring it to WCF.
3. Call upon all members to endeavor pay ½ their annual contributions on January 1 and balance by July 1 of each year.
4. US propose that reduction to 33-⅓ percent of advance to WCF of member having highest contribution rate should take place only after members contributing at least ⅓ of cost of budget, i.e., US or a group equalling ⅓ have indicated ability contribute ½ of their contribution early in fiscal years.

Vorys suggests in addition US should offer to prove this question matter of principle of offering $1,500,000, conditional to TA if contribution percentage reduced.

This would involve following Congressional action:

1. Approval 18 months appropriation for next fiscal year for UN.
2. Authorization of additional $1,500,000 from TA program for multilateral programs. This could be done by amendment authorization provision and administrative transfer from bilateral to multilateral channels.

USGADel's reaction as follows: [1]

Gross questioned whether such complex scheme preferable to clear cut proposal to accept contributions comite report this year and instruct it to reduce US contribution to 33⅓ percent next year.

Mrs. Roosevelt indicated her understanding financial effect of both substantially same, but proposal outlined Delga 468 would enable USGADel to follow letter PL 188.

Vorys agreed this most important advantage. He and Mansfield expressed conviction this scheme could be sold Congress as only feasible way of achieving 33⅓ percent goal this year. Both recognized and accepted responsibility this imposed on them and pledged themselves to do everything possible secure necessary Congressional action.

Cooper, recalling US failure to deliver on tax exemption, pointed to risk of making promises based on predictions of Congressional attitudes. He stressed importance of making clear to other dels exact nature of plan.

Lubin wondered whether proposal to increase US TA contribution would discourage contributions other countries to $20 million goal.

[1] The lengthy minutes of this meeting are not printed (IO Files: Doc. US/A/M (Chr)/211, December 3, 1951).

Hall replied such additional contribution would be on same matched basis.

Cohen considered it desirable follow course of action for which Executive and legislative support assured. He queried whether it might be more acceptable US provide additional $1,500,000 in form advance to increase US share WCF instead TA fund. Hall felt such unilateral action undesirable from both US and UN standpoint. Vorys concurred.

Ross stated scheme offered concrete and constructive means obtaining political support.

Sandifer, while calling attention necessity for not underestimating hurdles which commitments contained these proposals involved, thought assurances Vorys and Mansfield offered sufficient basis for trying gain acceptance this proposal in GA. He endorsed making recommendation to Dept.

Strauss felt proposed scheme difficult explain but thought it offered best solution.

Jessup agreed with Cohen desirability following course supported by both executive and legislative members of USGADel.

USGADel concluded US position along lines para 1–4, Delga 468 shld be strongly recommended to Dept. Question of strategy for introduction this proposal not considered. Instructions authorizing USGADel proceed on this basis urgently requested.

If this position agreed by Dept, Vorys and Hall believe most desirable submit request for six month appropriation as supplementary estimate for US fiscal 1952. With Vorys, Mansfield and Hall available to push such legislation in January, might be possible pay one-half US contribution for 1952 before GA adjourns.[2]

Minutes of Twenty-eighth Meeting of the United States Delegation to the General Assembly, Paris, December 7, 1951

SECRET

US/A/M(Chr)/215

1. Scale of Assessments of Apportionment of UN Expenses.

Mr. Vorys began a discussion of the latest developments on the contributions problem. He recalled the proposal that had been made at a previous Delegation meeting as a solution to this problem. He, Mrs. Roosevelt and Mr. Mansfield had discussed that proposal with the Congressmen who had been in Paris during the past week. The great majority had felt that this proposal was not possible from a Congressional point of view, especially that aspect of it which would have required the Congress to appropriate for 18 months in advance. Mr. Vorys had been inclined to agree with their estimate of the general temper of Congress. He therefore suggested to the Delegation that its position should be to speak to the members of Committee Five and indicate we wanted to proceed with the plan to reduce the US contribution to one-third of the total budget, in line with the previously expressed intention of the GA. For this purpose the US would indicate that it would probably have to oppose the recommendations of the Committee on Contributions. He and Mr. Hall felt that if this position were made known early enough in the general debate on this subject, other delegations might well come up with some compromise proposal on which the US could abstain rather than cast a negative vote. He did not believe that the US should vote for anything which would cause the US contribution to exceed the one-third, or in any other way commit the US in violation of the present law. On the legal point of what would "commit" the US to a particular course of action, he felt that approval of the Charter originally was what had made this commitment. While the US should not initiate discussion on the matter of its domestic legislative requirements, if the point were raised, the US should say that it would abide by what the UN had said it should pay, under the GA resolution of 1948, limiting the US to the one-third.

In other words, Mr. Vorys advocated the tentative position that the US could not support the report of the Contributions Committee and would try to obtain, by an indication of its opposition, certain compromises which would or might allow it to abstain. If no changes or compromises were forthcoming, we might still wish to abstain, but would have to reconsider our position in the light of future developments. The Committee Five Schedule called for a vote on this matter by the following Monday or Tuesday.

Mr. Sandifer asked whether Mr. Vorys' ideas included the possibility that the US could give indications, in the course of corridor discussions, of encouragement to proposals somewhat along the lines of the plan he had suggested at a previous meeting. This plan had been to approve the report if a proviso were obtained from the GA that the US contribution would be reduced to 33⅓ percent next year. He felt that the US would have to give some encouragement along these lines to obtain, more favorable reception to its proposal. Mr. Vorys said that he and Mr. Hall had agreed to take the position of sticking to the one-third, and that otherwise the US would want to oppose the Report of the Contributions Committee. This should be indicated at an early stage so that compromises would be possible. He had preferred the 18 months' appropriation proposal since it would solve the additional problem of the Working Capital Fund. He did not want to have to accept a compromise proposal which would require the US to give a favorable vote commiting it in excess of one-third. He felt the US should avoid having to debate in Congress whether its affirmative vote on any particular proposal "committed" the US to anything.

Mr. Sandifer wondered what kind of line Mr. Vorys would take both before and after he had made the US statement in Committee 5 as to the kind of compromise proposals the US would accept, as modifications of the report of the Contributions Committee. Mr. Vorys said that he would indicate that the US reduction to one-third would require some four per cent of the budget being spread around among the other countries. Mr. Hall said that the UK had indicated that it would be willing to consider raising its own contribution to take over part of a US reduction, in order to avoid a rupture in the Committee. Mr. Hall felt that other delegations would come up with similar offers. Somewhere along the line we would have to give encouragement to such compromise proposals.

Mr. Vorys was torn between what the UN ought to do and what it was possible to obtain. He disliked having the US forced to pick up the largest portion, of all checks by the blithe action of many small countries in voting for certain programs or recommendations which cost them next to nothing. He therefore advised the delegation to await the reactions of others as indicated by their speeches in Committee. This would give the delegation something concrete to show Congress when and if we were forced to explain the US Delegation position on this subject, and why it had not been possible to obtain exactly what Congress wanted.

Mrs. Roosevelt summarized the discussion as follows: the position of the US Delegation would be to seek reduction of the US Contribution to 33⅓%, to obtain the reactions of other delegations to this position, and to consider the possibilities of abstaining if some compromise formula could be worked out.[1]

Delga 596. Re contributions. For Dept info following proposed USGADel staff tactical position comite 5 Tuesday, based on Monday's developments reported unclassified summary.[1]

[1] Not printed. India and the Soviet Union had each submitted draft resolutions which had the effect of sending the Report of the Committee on Contributions back to the Committee for reconsideration. This was undesirable from the U.S. point of view, because the scale of assessments recommended by the Committee, although it did not put into effect the one-third ceiling for the U.S. contribution, did effect a reduction of 2.02% in the U.S. contribution as against fiscal 1951.

At one of the two meetings of the Fifth Committee on this matter on December 10, the U.S. Representative (Vorys) made a strong statement of some length calling for a reduction of the U.S. contribution to 33⅓%.

For the proceedings of the Fifth Committee on December 10, see United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, Sixth Session, Fifth Committee, pp. 125–136 (hereafter cited as GA (VI), Fifth Committee).

1. Obtain withdrawal or defeat expected Indian proposal as priority number one.
2. Introduce proposal US reduction coupled with automatic over-all budget reduction in amount equivalent burden assumed by other governments.
3. If this proposal defeated, as now seems likely, US indicate support Canadian proposal to apply 33 and ⅓ percent next year and offer abstention contributions comite report if Canadian proposal adopted.
4. If Canadian proposal not adopted, vote against contributions comite report. Political officers will bring above position to attention dels, urge defeat or withdrawal Indian proposal and adoption Canadian proposal to make it possible US abtain on contributions committee report.

1. Scale of Contributions to the United Nations

Mr. Hall began the meeting with a discussion of the situation in Committee Five following the excellent speech given by Mr. Vorys the previous day. He reported that the speech had been very well received. The Soviets had paid their usual compliment at this time to the great productive power of the United States which would enable the United States to contribute heavily to the United Nations budget. They indicated they would not support the report of the Contributions Committee because it recommended a reduction in the United States contribution and an increase in the Soviet contribution. They suggested that the report be referred back to the Contributions Committee. The small states said they appreciated the motives which impelled the United States to seek a reduction to one-third, but unfortunately were not in a position to make up the resulting difference. The Indian representative had apparently been carried away with the sound of his own voice and had spoken at great length about why the United States contribution should not be lowered. In fact, he had said, since the United States obtained such great benefits from having the headquarters on its territory, since the United States had not granted United Nations personnel tax immunity and was receiving taxes from the United States Nationals in the Secretariat, and since the Soviets had suffered such great damage during the last war a subcommittee should be appointed to reconsider the scale and this could only result in the United States contribution being raised. He had cast his argument in terms of the under-developed countries as opposed to the developed ones. The former, being unable to contribute very much should therefore be accorded the right to take more out of the United Nations.

The Canadians had suggested that this year the recommendations of the Contributions Committee be accepted with the understanding that next year the scale would be so adjusted that the United States contribution would be reduced to 33⅓%. After the meeting, Canada, South Africa and Australia had reiterated this suggestion, and had indicated their view that acceptance of this proposal and defeat of the Indian proposal would require a great deal of effort. For this reason they felt we should abandon our position of obtaining the reduction to one-third this year and support the Canadian suggestion.

Referring to Delga 596, Mr. Hall said that this telegram contained proposals by the staff on how to approach the problem in Committee 5. The matter of first priority was to obtain a withdrawal of or defeat for the Indian idea that the whole matter be reconsidered with a view to increasing the United States contribution. He planned to talk with B. K. Nehru and see if the Indians could be persuaded to withdraw their proposal. He was not confident, however, that even if Nehru saw the wisdom of such a course, Adarkar, the alternate Indian representative in Committee Five, would follow Nehru's instructions. The second point in the proposed approach was to introduce a proposal for reduction of the United States contribution to one-third and couple this with an automatic reduction in the overall budget in an amount equivalent to the burden to be assumed by the other governments. Mr. Hall was dubious as to the chances of success of such a proposal but felt it had to be tried as one of the possible alternatives.

If, as he expected, this proposal were defeated, Mr. Hall and the staff recommended that the United States: (a) support the Canadian amendment (which would achieve the reduction to one-third next year); (b) if the Canadian amendment were adopted, abstain on the resolution as a whole which included approval of the report of the Contributions Committee; and (c) if the Canadian amendment were not adopted, vote against the report of the Contributions Committee.

In this connection, Mr. Hall recommended that all the political officers be sure to bring out these points when speaking with other delegations.

Mr. Vorys felt that the second point of this proposal was an improvement over the report of the Committee on Contributions. In addition, he considered that it might be possible, as he had previously suggested, to ask Congress to transfer to the United Nations Technical Assistance program from the bilateral aid program an amount equal to the reduction of the United States contribution. The other delegations all seemed to regard Technical Assistance as a "plum", and if this added attraction would make acceptance of our proposal more certain, it should be undertaken. He thought that the feelings of other delegations would not be hurt by such a proposal, and at the same time our bargaining position between abstention and a negative vote would be somewhat improved.

Ambassador Gross asked whether the second point of the proposed approach, i.e., cutting the budget, would not have a crippling effect upon the United Nations. It was bound to reduce United Nations activities somewhat, and if its crippling effect would be too severe, the United States ought not to propose it. He cautioned that a practice of attacking the United Nations budget itself could thus be developed by overassessing the United States in the Contributions Committee and then cutting the budget by bringing the United States contribution down to one-third and reducing the over-all budget amount. Mr. Vorys said that he disliked the method whereby the budget was considered not in terms of amounts of money but rather by percentages. Many small countries, he feared, would always, under such a system, favor high budgets in which their proportional contribution would be very small.

Ambassador Gross suggested that it would not be inconsistent to combine points two and three. This would have the effect of establishing a policy for the future, which it would be in our interest to do, while accomplishing those results only in this year's budget by the over-all cut. Mr. Hall agreed that Ambassador Gross had put his finger on the "bug" in the whole scheme. However, he could not see any other way that other states could be brought around to accepting a United States contribution reduction to one-third.

[Here follows continued and lengthy discussion of the proposal in numbered paragraph 2 of Delga 596, December 10, that the United States propose a cut in the overall United Nations budget in conjunction with the United States request for immediate application of the ceiling principle. At the end of the discussion it was agreed by the Delegation that it was inexpedient from several points of view for the United States to propose such a reduction in United Nations activities.

After this discussion on contributions, the Delegation proceeded to take up another agenda item.]

[1] Not printed. New draft resolutions had been submitted by Syria and the United Kingdom, accepting the scale of assessments submitted by the Committee on Contributions and calling for a review of that scale the following year; and by Cuba, India, Israel, Mexico, and Pakistan in a joint draft, proposing the appointment of a subcommittee to review (and probably revise) the principles and directive underlying the work of the Committee on Contributions.

The U.S. Representative (Vorys) made another statement to the Fifth Committee on December 11, principally against the Soviet draft resolution and the joint 5-power draft resolution. He reaffirmed the U.S. request that the U.S. contribution be reduced "immediately to 33⅓ per cent." "The United States was seeking not to save money, but solely to defend a principle."

Editorial Note

Proceeding through a complicated parliamentary situation in one meeting on December 12 (on the assessments question), the Fifth Committee successively rejected the Soviet draft resolution, the Indian draft resolution, the joint draft resolution of Cuba–India–Israel–

Mexico–Pakistan, and the United States and Canadian draft amendments to the draft Syria–United Kingdom resolution. The Committee then, in a series of votes, adopted the latter resolution, which inter alia accepted the scale of assessments adopted by the Committee on Contributions together with a recommendation that the Contributions Committee review this scale of contributions in 1952, taking into account views expressed by Members during the Sixth Session of the General Assembly.

The United States voted against the Soviet draft resolution, the Indian draft resolution, and the joint 5-power draft resolution. For its own draft amendment, the United States was joined by one other Member. The United States was one of nine to vote for the Canadian draft amendment. The United States was one of three Members to vote against the joint Syria–United Kingdom resolution.

The United States Representative (Vorys) made two statements during the December 12 meeting. The first was to speak against the Soviet draft resolution. The second, briefly, was in support of the United States position that the ceiling principle should be established "immediately as the best means of strengthening support for all United Nations activities." Representative Vorys described the question as "a vital political matter."

Gadel 468. Re Delga 638. Serious consideration given by Dept to question advisability reintroduction Canadian proposal in plenary leads Dept to doubt success of effort and to fear possible consequences on US effectiveness major polit issues. US unlike Sovs has never taken Comite Five defeat to plenary. Adoption Canad proposal in plenary wld be judged to require ⅔ vote. This wld mean broadly speaking that 15 abstentions Comite 5 wld have to be corrected to affirmative votes and major portion of 26 Comite 5 negative votes wld need to be converted to affirmatives or abstentions. This wld require most weighty and urgent pressure many embassies. Despite all out effort issue wld still be in doubt. In view this and in light developments Internatl Court and Security Council election issues,[1] and having in mind major polit objectives still to be achieved this GA such as Korea, Ger elections, Sov charges re MSA,[2] etc., Dept wld conclude that reserve of US influence shld not be dissipated. Dept also concerned that failure in plenary after all out effort might seriously undermine US position subsequent GA's and make reduction 33⅓ more difficult. Dept therefore wld recommend no attempt in plenary unless Del feels Dept's appraisal over-all considerations unduly pessimistic.

Delga 695. For Hickerson, UNA from Hall. Re contributions: Vorys and I have checked sentiment here and are of opinion we should rest on present contributions position and should not ask Canadians to reintroduce resolution. Advantages this course seem to be:

1. Any action by Canada would result other proposals which might worsen our position.
2. As a result of Stone's speech Friday, December 14, and general reaction, some sentiment exists that US has been unfairly treated in Comite 5 and Comite 2 decisions. Expected growth this view which we are fostering should result in Contributions Comite being able to proceed with recommendation on reduction next year US contribution most of way toward 33⅓ percent.
3. Present resolution very unclear and conflicting which permits Contributions Comite to interpret resolution at its discretion. Present composition Contributions Comite favorable to US and we will review candidacies for election next week with this in mind.
4. Outcome on Canadian res at best uncertain and we are doubtful if the necessary pressure to assure outcome would be justified.[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] January 18, 1951.

Subject: Chinese Communist Representation at UPU Meeting in Cairo.

The Mixed Commission for Study of Air Mail Postal Questions, meeting in Cairo on January 22, will include representatives of the US, Argentina, Brazil, Egypt, France, UK, India, Netherlands, Sweden, Switzerland, Czechoslovakia and perhaps Yugoslavia and the USSR, of whom the last eight countries named recognize the Chinese Communists.

We have circularized (Department's Circular telegram 384, January 15) the above-mentioned countries, with the exception of India, Czechoslovakia, USSR and Yugoslavia, informing them that our Delegate has been instructed to move to postpone consideration of the question of Chinese Communist representation pending UN General Assembly action on the matter, and to seat, in the meantime, representatives of the Chinese National Government with the same rights as other members. We indicated our hope that the Delegates of these countries would be instructed to support our position.

Embassy London (in telegram 3940, January 16, 1951) reports that Parrott of the UK Foreign Office "could not see the UK reversing its position on that question at this time", and on first thought felt the General Assembly resolutions were not sufficiently weighty to change his Government's point of view. It is possible that this position represents Mr. Parrott's personal opinion and may be reversed after Foreign Office consideration. However, if a more satisfactory response is not forthcoming, UNP plans to send another telegram to London more strongly stating our position. There would seem to be no reasonable basis for the UK to insist upon voting for the seating of the Chinese Communists at this time, in view of the GA action.[1]

UK delegation being instructed to vote for resolution along lines USSR resolution provided that it is made clear that UPU is not being bound in perpetuity to seat Chinese Communists and that Cairo conference developments are not logical sequence of Montreux conference last year. Editorial Note

On February 1, 1951, the General Assembly of the United Nations adopted a resolution finding the Chinese Communists to be aggressors in Korea (for documentation on this subject, see volume VII, pages 1 ff.). On February 2 the American Universal Postal Union delegation at Cairo queried the Department of State as to whether the Chinese representation question should be reopened when the full meeting of the Universal Postal Union convened on February 5, in light of this action of the General Assembly on February 1. The Department responded as follows on February 2: "Dept believes that it is up to each Govt to take GA res into account, as it sees fit, in determining its position on Chi representation in UN and specialized agencies. You . . . might, as appropriate, state that so far as US concerned we do not think Commies shd participate UN or specialized agencies while they engaged aggression and will cast our votes accordingly. Suggest you make no further efforts re-open representation matter in circumstances." (Telegram 749 to Cairo, February 2, 7 p. m., 399.10–UPU/2–151)

On the basis of procedural motions, in the course of which no United States motion was brought up, the Universal Postal Union decided on February 5 to proceed with its substantive agenda and not to take up the China issue (Telegram 843 from Cairo, February 5, 6 p. m., 399.10 UPU/2–551).

310.2/1–2551: Circular airgram

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, January 25, 1951—8:25 a. m.

Within the next few months, the question of Chinese representation will undoubtedly arise in various UN and Specialized Agency bodies. In preparations for pending meetings, United States Representatives will be instructed to take the position described below. You are requested in your discretion to outline our views to the Foreign Office at an appropriate time indicating our hope that its delegates to the various UN and specialized agency bodies will be instructed along the same lines.

Except for (a) the GA itself (where the United States will strongly oppose the seating of the Chinese Communists) and (b) certain expert or quasi-expert bodies (where United States Members will take the position that a question of representation is beyond the competence of the body to decide), United States Representatives will be instructed to initiate or support proposals to the following effect: in view of the GA resolution of December 14, 1950 (described below), consideration of and action on any proposals to unseat representatives of the Chinese National Government or seat representatives of the Chinese Communist regime should be postponed until the General Assembly has taken action on the question of Chinese representation. (When the GA has taken further action, this position will be appropriately modified and you will be so informed.)

This position is based on the following considerations:

(1) The General Assembly, on September 19, adopted a Canadian resolution which (a) established a Special Committee of seven Members to consider the question of Chinese representation and report with recommendations to the fifth Assembly session after the Assembly considered a Cuban agenda item regarding recognition by the United Nations of the representation of a Member State; and (b) provided that, pending a decision by the General Assembly on the report of the Special Committee, representatives of the Chinese National Government should be seated with the same rights as other representatives.

2. The agenda item on recognition by the United Nations of the representation of a Member State was exhaustively considered and on December 14, 1950 the General Assembly adopted a resolution recommending that (a) whenever more than one authority claims to be the government entitled to represent a Member State in the United Nations, and this question becomes the subject of controversy in the UN, it should be considered by the General Assembly (or by the Interim Committee if the GA is not in session) in the light of the Purposes and Principles of the Charter and the circumstances of each case; and (b) the attitude adopted by the General Assembly (or the Interim Committee) concerning such questions should be "taken into account" in other organs of the United Nations and in the specialized agencies.

3. The controversy as to the representation of China in the United Nations is still before the Fifth session of the General Assembly; (Although the GA's Special Committee on Chinese representation has held one meeting (on December 15), it has taken no decision.)

4. Pending the Assembly's decision, it would be unwise for other UN Organs or bodies of the specialized agencies to take any decision on the question of Chinese representation; and

5. Consideration of and action on any proposal to unseat representatives of the Chinese National Government or seat representatives of the Chinese Communist regime should therefore be postponed until the General Assembly has taken action.

You should stress in addition our view that representatives of the Chinese Communist regime should not be seated in any UN or specialized agency body while that regime is engaged in hostilities in Korea against the United Nations.

In the event that the procedural position outlined above is not adopted and the substance of the Chinese representation question is voted upon, United States Representatives will, of course, be instructed to oppose actively and vote against any proposal to unseat the representatives of the Chinese National Government or seat representatives of the Chinese Communist regime.

[Note to Missions in Buenos Aires, Rio de Janeiro, Cairo, Paris, London, The Hague, Stockholm: Action under this airgram would, of course, take into account discussions already held pursuant to Depcirgram of January 15 re Chinese representation in the UPU.] [2]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] February 2, 1951.

Subject: ECAFE [1] Meetings in Pakistan

Participants: Dr. Tan Shao-hwa, Minister Plenipotentiary, Chinese Embassy
Mr. Clubb, CA

Dr. Tan Shao-hwa took up today the question of Chinese representation in the ECAFE meetings sheduled to be held shortly in Pakistan. He pointed out that the Seventh Session of ECAFE is scheduled for February 28 with the following members (divided into two columns according to their probable orientation respecting the question of Chinese representation):

Burma	Australia
India	China
Indonesia	France
Netherlands	New Zealand
Pakistan	Philippines
UK	Thailand
USSR	USA

The associate members, divided in the same way, are as follows:

Ceylon	Cambodia
Malay States	Laos Kingdom
British Borneo	Nepal
Hong Kong	Republic of Korea
	Vietnam

[1] United Nations Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East.

The situation was, however, complicated by the circumstance that the third meeting of the Subcommittee on Iron and Steel is scheduled to meet on February 14 and the third meeting of the Subcommittee on Industry and Trade on February 15, that is, before the Seventh Session might have had the opportunity to determine the question of representation. He pointed out that the Chinese Communists have already appointed Dr. Chi Ch'ao-ting to represent the Peiping regime. It was the hope of the National Government that the United States would do everything possible to support the Nationalist representation. He pointed out the narrowness of the margin enjoyed in terms of support for the Nationalist position, and said that it would be very much appreciated if the United States Government prior to the meeting could instruct its missions in the several concerned countries to approach the Governments to which they were accredited and exercise American influence to the end that the Nationalist representation should be maintained in ECAFE.

I confirmed to Dr. Tan that our position had consistently been in support of the Nationalist position as he knew, said that I would bring the matter promptly to the attention of FE and UNP, and assured him that we would do our best in this connection.

He recalled that at tripartite meetings last May, US–UK in view of divergent policies on China had "more or less agreed that each would go its own way".[1] He added that branding Chinese Communists as aggressor [2] had not altered fact that they were in control of China, that British policy was based on reality and it followed that it was consistent to support Chinese Communist representation so long as UK recognized Peking.

Parrott was drafting UK position paper on question at time of Embassy Officer's call and impression was gained that British position on Chinese Communist representation will remain firm so long as there is no reversal present British China policy.

In connection with general question Chinese representation in various UN and specialized agency bodies, Foreign Office states it is generally in agreement with position outlined in Department's circular airgram January 25, 8:25 a. m., with reservation that in case of technical bodies, such as Universal Postal Union, where question of actual control of territory is pertinent, a Chinese Communist representative should be present as observer. Foreign Office further states that in some cases, which would be similar to Universal Postal Union, French Government would like to look at each case separately and decide its position on merits each case.

Foreign Office points out that there appeared to have been insufficient prior consultation between delegates to UPU meeting at Cairo and that, following rejection US resolution, Soviet proposal seat Chinese

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] February 14, 1951.

Subject: British Position on Chinese Representation in ECAFE.

Participants: Mr. Hubert Graves, British Embassy [1]
Mr. Merchant [2]
Miss Bacon

Mr. Graves called to leave the attached message from Mr. Bevin to Sir Oliver Franks giving the British position on the question of Chinese representation in ECAFE.[3] Mr. Graves explained that the message was in response to inquiries made by Mr. Rusk several days ago and by our Embassy in London.

It was agreed that the message clearly implied that the UK Delegation would be instructed to vote against our proposed resolution in ECAFE to postpone consideration of the Chinese representation question until the GA had acted.

Mr. Merchant said that the position taken was disappointingly rigid in view of Chinese Communist aggression in Korea and of the Chinese Communist defiant attitude toward the UN. Referring to the UK vote this morning in the AEC–CCA Committee in support of the American resolution on Chinese representation and to a similar British vote in the Children's Fund, he said that the British Delegation in New York had been able to find a way of working out with our Delegation a solution on a procedural basis which both Delegations could support and he added that it would be helpful if the British Delegation in Lahore could be authorized to take a similar approach. The contrast between the British positions on this question in London and in New York was difficult to understand. Miss Bacon added that the British vote in ECAFE may well be crucial. It was not clear to us why the UK felt unable to go along with a procedure which avoided the substantive issue and was in accord not only with the GA resolution of December 14 but also with ECAFE's desire, expressed at its last meeting, to leave the Chinese representation question for decision by a higher body.[4]

After explaining that he was not fully familiar with the subject, Mr. Graves said that in his view the statement of British position in the message was categorical and that no purpose would be served by the Embassy's going back to London about it. He advised that our best course would be to have our Embassy in London make another and urgent approach to the Foreign Office directed specifically to the ECAFE situation to see if some arrangement could not be worked out on a procedural basis which both Governments could support.

[4] This occurred at the Sixth Session of ECAFE, meeting at Bangkok, Thailand, May 16–20, 1950. The specific action took place on May 16, 1950, on the motion of the Thai delegate, and was incorporated into resolution E/CN.11/247. The question of Chinese representation was referred by the Commission "for decision by a higher body of the United Nations", without reference to the competence of ECAFE to settle the matter itself. For the ECAFE proceedings on this matter, see United Nations document E/CN.11/SR.73 (Department of State Lot File 60 D 463, Box 170). The episode is described in United Nations, *Official Records of the Economic and Social Council, Eleventh Session, Supplement No. 8, Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East. MESSAGE FROM MR. BEVIN TO SIR OLIVER FRANKS
DATED 14TH FEBRUARY 1951

Chinese Representation.

There has been no change in our policy and we propose to vote for the representation of the Peoples Government if the question is raised in Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East.

2. The United States Embassy here had already approached us on this subject. It seems clear from the American attitude in this case and in that of the Universal Postal Union Meeting in Cairo that there is a considerable gulf between our respective views on the effects upon our policy on Chinese representation arising from:

[1] Delivered to the Department of State by the Counselor of the British Embassy (Graves) on February 14. The Department of State transmitted the text of this message to the London Embassy in airgram A–1449, February 17 (340.290/2–1751).

(a) The Assembly Resolution of 14th December (on the Cuban item):[2]

(b) The Assembly Resolution of 1st February condemning the Peoples Government for aggression:[3] and

(c) The discussion of Chinese representation during the Prime Minister's visit to Washington.[4]

3. As regards 2 (a) above, we do not consider that there is anything in this resolution (which incidentally we voted against) which should cause us to change our policy. It does no more than recommend that the Assembly's attitude in any particular case "should be taken into account in other organs". The Assembly's decision cannot bind other organs, nor do we see why its indecision should delay indefinitely consideration of this question by other competent bodies.

4. We do not regard 2 (b) as relevant to the question of representation, which should be based on recognition of facts alone and should not be connected with moral approval or condemnation.

5. As regards 2 (c) above my interpretation of the outcome of the discussion on Chinese representation during the Prime Minister's visit to Washington is that we agreed to differ and not that we should go back on our policy on this question. We were agreed moreover in our determination to prevent this difference of view (in the words of the joint communiqué of December 8th) from interfering with our united effort in support of our common objectives".

6. It is my fear that recent manifestations of the American interpretation of 2 (a), (b), and (c) above can only lead to an unnecessary exaggeration of our difference on this point which may, if unchecked, tend to "interfere with our united effort". I should like you to take an early opportunity to explain fully to the State Department my fears on this score, and the reasons for the attitude which we feel bound to maintain on this question.

2. In connection possible conversation FonOff this matter you might wish use fol points in explaining our position.

(a) Objective GA Res Dec 14, as set forth preamble that Res, is that in the interest of proper functioning of UN there shld be uniformity in procedure applicable when controversies as to representation arise in UN. Res then states that because of its composition GA is organ in which consideration can best be given views all Members re questions affecting functioning Org as a whole. Pursuant these considerations GA then recommends that when controversies as to representation arise they shld be considered by the GA and that its attitude shld be taken into acct in other UN organs and in the Specialized Agencies. We agree that this Res does not bind other competent UN organs or Specialized Agency bodies either to await GA action or to abide by its decision. We do believe, however, that in view objective uniformity expressed in Res, it is wise and appropriate for other UN organs and Specialized Agency bodies to postpone action on Chi representation until the GA has declared its attitude. Moreover, this position seems to us to be a sound procedural basis on which to avoid direct discussion of the substance of the Chi representation question and thus prevent unnecessary highlighting of the differences between UK and ourselves on this issue.

(b) Each Govt must, of course, decide what bearing the GA condemnation of Chi Commie aggression shld have on its position on Chi representation. In our opinion, it wld be highly undesirable, in view GA finding, for other UN organs or bodies affiliated with UN to seat Commies and we will vote accordingly.

(c) As indicated above, our postponement position, grounded on an Assembly recommendation, is designed precisely to avoid exaggeration of our differences on the substance of this issue and we hoped it wld be recd in that spirit.

3874. Pls deliver fol msg from Sec to FonMin. "I have been informed of your views in the ques of Chi representation in the UN as explained to the Dept by the Brit Emb here. I had hoped that you might share our position concerning the weight to be given in this connection to the GA Res of Dec 14 on recognition by the UN of representation of a Memb state and to the Res of Feb 1 on Chi Commie aggression in Korea. In my opinion for the Chi Commies to be seated in UN organs while their forces are engaged against UN forces wld tend to vitiate the good effects which it is hoped that the Feb 1 Res may accomplish and to confuse public opinion in this country and thru out the FE.

I am hopeful, however, that whatever differences we may have on the substance of the issues involved we may be able to find means of avoiding a further and needless public evidence of disunity between the US and UK on this ques.

I am bringing this matter to ur attn personally at this time because ECAFE is about to meet at Lahore. The voting situation in this organ on the Chi representation ques is close and the Brit vote will be crucial. We had intended to support or initiate proposals which wld avoid a confiict on the substantive issue by postponing action on any motion on Chi representation until the GA has acted. If, as it appears, such a procedural proposal wld cause difficulty for ur Del, I am confident that the US and UK Dels can work out some other approach which wld be mutually acceptable. It is my understanding that on two occasions recently the US and UK Dels in NY have been able to find solutions to the Chi representation ques in UN bodies there which both Dels were able to support. Last year, the problem was solved in ECAFE when it expressed its wish and desire that the ques of Chi representation be resolved by a higher body. The UK

Del abstained on this Res at the time. Wld it not be possible for the UK Del to abstain on if not support a similar proposal this year?

I do not wish to suggest the precise nature which the solution might take because details can be more easily worked out by the Dels themselves. It is my hope, however, that you may see ur way clear to give latitude to the UK Del in Lahore to work out some procedural solution to the US Del. With good will on both sides I am sure that our two Dels can find means of preventing our differences on this ques from becoming unfortunately, and I believe unnecessarily, exaggerated at this time.

The problem here presented is, of course, not limited to ECAFE but will arise repeatedly in other bodies in the near future. For this reason, I am venturing to ask your help in laying a basis for a rapprochement between UK and US Dels on this issue and can assure you that I also will work toward this end."

4591. Reference Deptels 3873 and 3874 on Chinese representation at ECAFE. Your message to Bevin (who at present convalescing in Eastbourne) was delivered to his Foreign Office February 22 and today I called on Younger,[1] Minister State, to discuss matter. Along lines of Department's instructions I emphasized to Younger: (1) Importance of avoiding at this time any action which would indicate to USSR and Chinese Commies US–UK divergence, particularly in Far East matters, and (2) Desirability of giving latitude to US–UK delegates in Lahore to work for procedural formula which might prevent UK and US voting against each other.

Younger made following points, after repeating arguments of British Embassy note to Department:

1. ECAFE situation is different from that of recent AEC–CCA meeting since UK is committed to view ECAFE is in fact competent to decide representation question.
2. UK believes that it must continue to vote for Chinese Commie representation on these UN bodies in order to be consistent both with its policy and realities of situation.
3. British view is that December 14 resolution is not sufficiently weighty to prevent British from voting in favor seating Chinese Commie representative.
4. Latest British information is that vote, even with British voting against US, will probably be 8 to 6 in favor US position, possibly 8 to 5 if Pakistan abstains.
5. Younger had consulted Attlee before seeing me and Prime Minister was firm that principle of Chinese Commies right to representation should not be compromised. Also Younger feels that public opinion in UK particularly in Labor Party, strongly behind government on this basic principle.

After considerable discussion, Younger agreed to consider possibility of having US and UK delegates try to work out some procedural maneuver providing it would not compromise British basic position on: (1) Chinese Commie representation and (2) ECAFE's right to decide the question. He added caveat that UK delegate in Lahore was not skilled parliamentarian and that prospect of hitting upon some such maneuver did not appear promising. He did not however, close door completely to idea and Foreign Office will explore to see what sort of procedure might be devised. In sum, Younger gave an impression that if such procedural maneuver could be worked out

[1] Kenneth G. Younger, Minister of State, British Foreign Office.

British might abstain from voting provided that it is clear that on principle British position has not been changed.

In absence specific information as to sort of parliamentary tactics which Department has in mind I do not believe a more satisfactory answer could be obtained at this time. British position has to certain extent become firm on question Chinese Commie representation and without changes in British thinking there is slight chance of their altering their position as this problem recurs in various UN bodies.

4623. Deptel 3921 discussed this morning with Parrott, head UN Department Foreign Office, who promised to raise question with his superiors but doubted whether UK would acquiesce since British look at questions as follows:

1. UK abstention last year was in line with then British policy of abstaining on Chinese representation question as protest against Soviet walkout and similar action this year would not be justified in British view.

2. As technical point, if ECAFE, without raising question of its competence to decide issue, expressed desire that higher body should resolve question, is ECAFE not in effect questioning its own competence? On ECAFE's competence UK is firm.

3. Main British concern is whether, if UK should go along with US in this instance, US would regard this as precedent and urge UK to take similar action in case of various other UN bodies. British do not wish to put themselves in position whereby yielding procedural manoeuvre on ECAFE would result in continued "whittling away" at their basic position on Chinese representation which they believe must be maintained in cases where UN body is competent to decide on this question. In view of continued US insistence UK does not see how it could give way without being repeatedly asked to yield in similar cases.

4. While recognizing special US interest in ECAFE as result of FE situation, UK believes it has stake in keeping its own position clear to FE countries and that any wavering on UK's part would be interpreted by FE countries as alteration of UK's basic position.

Embassy interprets Depcircgram of January 25 to mean that US will in fact continue to press Chinese representation issue at various UN bodies, although those "certain expert or quasi-expert bodies" which are excepted (paragraph 2 reference Circgram) are not defined. However, in case of other UN bodies where situation less crucial than at ECAFE, will US in fact take equally serious view of UK action on Chinese representation question? In conversation with Younger and Parrott we have emphasized special position of ECAFE and attempted to avoid question of future US action in respect to other UN bodies, but British look at problem as a whole of which ECAFE is only a part.

The UK representatives called this morning at their request to deliver the attached message from Mr. Bevin[1] in response to the message sent from Mr. Acheson to Mr. Bevin on this subject contained in Deptel 3874, Feb. 21.

We agreed that the basic point of difference between ourselves and the British on this general question arises in large part from their firm conviction that moral considerations are completely irrelevant in determining whether the Peiping regime should be accorded either diplomatic recognition or China's seat in the UN. In our view, on the other hand, regardless of the considerations which might normally determine recognition, Peiping's aggression in Korea and UN condemnation of it requires that such measures as non-recognition and denial of China's seat in the UN be considered at present more in the nature of diplomatic sanctions, which the Charter clearly envisages, and in that light moral considerations necessarily play a more important role. We expressed regret that it had not proved possible to work out with the UK some procedural device in ECAFE whereby public manifestation of our divergent views could be minimized.

However, we concluded that for the moment it appeared we could do no more than agree amicably to disagree.

COPY OF MESSAGE FROM MR. BEVIN TO SIR OLIVER FRANKS [2]

In my absence Mr. Younger saw the United States Ambassador on 23rd February and explained to him why we felt that it is unlikely that any procedural method can be found to bridge the gap which exists between the United States and the United Kingdom attitudes on the question of Chinese representation.

It should be said at the outset that the latest information which we have received from our representative at Lahore leads us to believe that there will in all probability be a majority in the E.C.A.F.E. in favour of ruling out of order or of postponing a decision on any Soviet resolution directed towards securing the presentation of the Central People's Government. The United Kingdom vote is therefore considered unlikely to be crucial on this occasion.

For a proper appreciation of the reasons which have led us to the conclusion that no procedural method can be found of bridging our differences in the Commission it is essential to know and understand the principles upon which our whole policy towards the question of Chinese representation in the United Nations is based, and it is therefore proposed to restate them briefly here. As Mr. Acheson said in his message, this problem is not limited to the E.C.A.F.E. but will arise repeatedly in other bodies in the near future.

Our attitude on this question is as follows. Although it has political implications the question of Chinese representation remains in our view in essence and in form a question of credentials. Certain organs of the United Nations appear from their constitutions and rules of procedure to be competent to decide for themselves on questions of this sort. These include the General Assembly, Security Council, Economic and Social Council, Trusteeship Council, the Specialized Agencies, the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund and the E.C.A.F.E. Other, subsidiary bodies (committees etc.) do not appear to have this power and should therefore properly await the decision of the appropriate parent body. The Committee on Disarmament is an example of a subsidiary body of this sort and it was for this reason that the United Kingdom representative voted on the same side as the United States representative when the Soviet delegate attempted to raise the question of Chinese representation in this body on 14th February.

It will be clear from the above that we do not consider that there is any legal justification for the view that the decision of the General Assembly in this matter can bind the other competent organs. We made this clear in the course of the debate on the recognition of the representation of a member state and we voted against the Assembly resolution of 14th December because we could not agree with the assumptions upon which it appeared to be based. Even so it will be recalled that resolution does no more than recommend "that the attitude adopted by the General Assembly or its Interim Committee concerning any such question should be taken into account in other organs of the United Nations and in the Specialised Agencies". The weight which any competent organ decides to give to the attitude of the Assembly appears to us to be entirely for that organ to decide in the normal way by a majority vote and the United Kingdom vote is cast in accordance with the view that a competent organ should take its own decision regardless of whether or not the Assembly has taken up an unequivocal attitude for itself. It was for this reason that we would now find it necessary to oppose any move to postpone the decision in E.C.A.F.E. on the lines, for example, of the Thai amendment adopted last year and were therefore unable to fall in with the United States suggestion that we might abstain on such a motion.

Your [3] message referred also to the Assembly resolution of 1st February which, inter alia, condemned the aggressive activities of the Central People's Government in Korea. In adopting that resolution the General Assembly has expressed very properly a moral condemnation upon the action of that government. But that does not in our view alter the fact that that government is in substantial control of China. As you [4] are aware we consider the recognition of a government involves no more than the recognition of a state of fact and it was for this reason that we accorded recognition to the Central People's Government of China when it became clear to us that they were in fact the controlling Government of China. In our view similar considerations should govern the question of representation of member states in the United Nations. The present case is not one of admitting to the United Nations a new member (in which event the qualifications laid down in Article 4 (1) of the Charter would have to be fulfilled). The State of China has always been a member of the United Nations and is moreover specifically mentioned in the Charter as a permanent member of the Security Council. That being so it seems to us that the only relevant consideration in this context is which government is in fact in a position to represent the State of China and to carry out so far as China is concerned the decisions arrived at in the United Nations. Moral considerations seem to us to be irrelevant in this context. After all we regard with abhorrence many of the activities of the Soviet Government, but we do not for that reason attempt to exclude its representatives from the United Nations.

[4] In the March 5 communication the words "As the United States Government" were substituted for the words "as you".

On a purely political plane we feel that there is everything to be gained by our not allowing this question of Chinese representation to be magnified beyond reasonable proportions. If a satisfactory peaceful solution is to be found in Korea it must surely involve an attempt to reach also satisfactory solutions with regard to other outstanding problems foremost among which will be the question of Chinese representation in the United Nations. The more firmly the United Nations commits itself to the line that the representation of the People's Government is a matter in which great moral issues are involved, the greater is the likelihood that the eventual solution of the problem in a sense satisfactory to the People's Government will appear in the eyes of the world to be a concession on the part of the United Nations. Our own attitude would be that no concession is involved since each member state is entitled as of right to be represented in the United Nations by the government which is in a position to speak for it.

It is hoped that the foregoing will make plain the attitude of His Majesty's Government in this matter. This attitude has been publicly announced on several occasions and it receives by and large the support of public opinion in this country, both in Parliament and outside. It is therefore hoped that it will be appreciated why we are led to the conclusion that it would be impossible radically to alter this attitude without compromising principles which we have frequently affirmed. This question was discussed during Mr. Attlee's visit to Washington last year and our two governments agreed to differ. We were also equally determined to prevent these differences of view from interfering with our united effort in support of our common objectives.

It is widely known that a difference of view exists between our two governments on the question of Chinese representation and that this reflects similar differences of opinion honestly held by several member states of the United Nations. The United Nations is itself based on democratic principles and on the respect for majority decisions. We do not complain that a majority has, in most organs of the United Nations, not yet seen fit to endorse our own view on this subject. Similarly the United States representative has, it is understood, announced that his government will abide by any majority decision which may eventually be taken in the Security Council on this question and will not wish to exercise the right of veto. If a similarly dispassionate treatment of this question could be evolved in every organ in which the question is raised it is our belief that the question would cease to provide opportunities for those who would rejoice to see a serious divergence between United States and United Kingdom policies. Treated in this way the question could be raised and disposed of on its merits without engendering excessive political or emotional heat. While the Central People's Government persist in their present deplorable behaviour it is likely that those member states to whom behaviour is a criterion of recognition will maintain their opposition to the change in Chinese representation, and it is therefore unlikely that our view, based on the criterion of effective control, will be shared, in most organs, by the majority of members. We should be prepared to accept this situation while it lasts, provided that we are not ourselves expected to contribute to its prolongation by any action involving a sacrifice of principle. We will certainly abide by the majority view in each competent organ.

It is therefore suggested that our respective delegations might with advantage be instructed to approach the problem in this spirit in an effort to minimize the harm which might otherwise result from this difference of view which we both frankly acknowledge and which we are both determined to render as innocuous as possible.

1. Re ur reference US position on competence expert and quasi-expert UN bodies decide Chi rep issue indicated Depcirgram Jan 25 as opposed our postponement position in other bodies, foll is explanation. Expert bodies are such bodies as ILC, Advisory Comite on Admin and Budgetary Questions, Comite Contributions, etc. which are composed individuals elected by name by major UN organ (in above instances by GA) to serve in expert capacity. Here US will take position that any motion to unseat Member is out of order on ground these bodies are not competent take any decision re their own composition which is determined by GA. Term quasi-expert bodies refers functional Comms ECOSOC (except Narcotics Comm which is composed strictly govt reps). In accordance resolutions estab these Comms, although states are initially elected to Comms by ECOSOC, individuals, nominated by Govts after consultation UNSYG, are confirmed by name by ECOSOC; consequently, we believe any question re right such Members participate in Comms shd be raised in and decided by Council. Hence US will take position that any motion unseat Member is out of order on ground these Comms are not competent decide representation question in view method appt their members.

To supplement the memorandum from Mr. Bevin on this subject which the UK Embassy presented to the Department on February 28th, Mr. Meade, on instructions, handed me the attached additional explanation of the reasons underlying the UK change of position in ECAFE between last year and this. He remarked that as received the message had included an additional paragraph (which he had discreetly omitted) gently chiding the US for having previously declared that it was appropriate and in order for ECAFE to consider the matter and then having voted against the Chairman's ruling to that effect.

CHINESE REPRESENTATION IN THE ECONOMIC COMMISSION FOR ASIA AND THE FAR EAST

When the question of Chinese representation was raised in ECAFE last May it was our general policy in all competent bodies to abstain unless it was clear that there would be a majority in the body concerned in favour of the change-over in representation. This policy was based on our view that it was at that stage premature to raise the question in bodies where the change-over had no chance of securing a majority. We were moreover anxious not to associate ourselves, by voting in a minority with the Soviet representatives, with the high-handed Soviet policy of walking out of each body whenever a majority failed to accept their views. However, by the time the Fifth Session of the General Assembly opened in September it had become clear that our policy of abstention could not be indefinitely adhered to. The Soviet "walk-out" policy had begun to reverse itself and the fact that the People's Government remained firmly in control of China could no longer be ignored. It was therefore decided henceforth to vote openly in competent bodies for the change-over.

At ECAFE last May it was clear that a majority for the change-over would not be forthcoming and we had therefore resolved to abstain if the substantive question was raised. We therefore had no objection to abstaining on the Thai amendment directed to postponing a decision. Indeed, any other action would have been illogical since we were at that time prepared to justify our abstention on the substantive issue on the grounds that it had been raised prematurely.

Our position this year was different. We no longer take the line that consideration of the question of Chinese representation is premature; indeed we consider that the anomalous situation which has now been reached can only be regularised by a decision in favour of the change-over in each competent organ. In the debate on the Cuban Item at the last session of the Assembly we made it clear we did not consider it necessary or even desirable for competent bodies to delay taking this decision while awaiting the decision in the General Assembly. We therefore found it necessary, after the fullest consideration, to adhere to our decision to oppose any proposal on the lines of the Thai amendment the object of which was to postpone a decision being taken in ECAFE.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] March 13, 1951.

Subject: Chinese Representation in the Universal Postal Union

Participants: Mr. Redding, Assistant Postmaster General
Mr. Clubb, CA

Mr. Redding telephoned to say, in respect to the Universal Postal Union Conference in Cairo, that referendum forms were being provided for the definitive vote on the permanent seating of Chinese representatives in the UPU and that the schedule required a return of the referenda by the member Governments with their vote for the National Government, for the Peking regime, or with an abstention. The referenda should be returned to Bern, Switzerland by April 20, current.[1]

Mr. Redding pointed out the significance of the present situation with two meetings (of the UPU?) scheduled for May in Switzerland and said that we should, of course, give consideration as to what steps we would take vis-à-vis other member Governments in the present circumstances.

I said that this was a matter which would, of course, require discussion with UNP, that if he would address the U.S. referendum to me (he suggested that it would be coming over to the Department of State tomorrow), I would promptly communicate with Miss Bacon of FE and with UNP and see what was to be done.

Memorandum of Telephone Conversation, by Mr. David H. Popper of the Office of United Nations Political and Security Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] March 16, 1951.

Subject: UPU Referendum on Chinese Representation

Participants: Mr. Redding, Post Office Department
Mr. Popper, UNP

I telephoned Mr. Redding with respect to this matter. Mr. Redding said that the Post Office Department would mark the US ballot in favor of representation for Nationalist China and return it to Bern. He said that he had informed Mr. Clubb about the referendum so that the Department could decide whether there should be any electioneering on the matter. Bearing in mind the conclusion reached in FE, CA and UNP that we could gain no further advantage through continued pressure on this subject in each minor case where the Chinese representation issue arises, I told Mr. Redding that we did not believe that there should be any electioneering. I explained that positions of states had not changed for some time on the Chinese representation question; we had sent a number of circulars to our posts on this problem and our position was well understood; and, we feared that further representations might be resented. I also noted with respect to the outcome of the referendum that a survey of the UPU membership indicated that there would be a substantial margin of votes in favor of Nationalist China.

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, April 3, 1951—8:45 a. m.

The Executive and Liaison Committee of the Universal Postal Union, composed of 19 members, is the standing organ of the UPU. The UPU Congress at which all Members of the Union are represented meets at intervals not greater than five years.

At its meeting on May 15, 1950 the Executive and Liaison Committee seated a Chinese Communist for the 1950 session and decided to consult the postal administrations of all UPU Members by referendum on the Chinese representation question after the UNGA had acted on this issue or in any event prior to the next meeting of the Committee. Although the UNGA has not yet taken definite action on Chinese representation, the UPU Committee is scheduled to convene in Switzerland on May 21. Therefore, the Director General of the UPU, pursuant to the 1950 decision, is polling the postal administrations of all UPU Members, requesting that they mark an enclosed ballot in favor of representation for National China or for Communist China and return it to Bern by April 20, or indicate their vote by telegram by the same date. The Director General stated further that any postal administration which failed to vote by April 20 would be recorded as having abstained.

The UPU Executive and Liaison Committee is the only body affiliated with the UN which seated a Chinese Communist as the representative of China. The Department hopes that the referendum of the entire UPU membership will result in a large majority in favor of the Chinese Nationalists and that this will bring about the seating of the Nationalists at the May 21 meeting of the Executive and Liaison Committee. Since less than one-third of the UPU Member States recognize the Chinese Communist regime, it would appear that the result we desire will be attained. However, we are concerned that the postal administrations of some states which have not recognized the Communist regime may fail to confer with their Foreign Offices on the UPU referendum and may not return their ballots by April 20, thus being counted as having abstained on the Chinese representation issue. You are therefore requested in your discretion to raise the above matter informally with the Foreign Office on an appropriate occasion in the very near future, indicating our hope that its postal administration will support the seating of representatives of the Chinese National Government and so inform the UPU Director General at Bern by April 20.[2]

At a time when the Chinese Communists are defying the United Nations, fighting its forces on a major scale, and denying the validity of every provision of the Charter, the discussion of their possible admission to the United Nations seems to me to have the most divisive possible effect between us and to give them the greatest encouragement in continuing their present course.

It is difficult everywhere in this country, and in all the countries which are supplying forces in Korea, to keep our peoples constantly alive to the rightness and necessity of the sacrifices which have to be made for a struggle limited in its nature and not susceptible of the conceptions of victory to which people have become accustomed. To add to these difficulties discussion of admitting the enemy to the organization which they are fighting seems to me so utterly confusing to the average man as to imperil the whole United Nations operation in Korea."

TEXT OF A MESSAGE FROM MR. MORRISON TO MR. ACHESON DATED 10TH MAY, 1951

I have given careful thought to the frank and friendly message you conveyed to me through Mr. Gifford.[1] We start, as you say, from the common ground of desiring peace and security in the Pacific, the earliest conclusion of the Korean conflict, and the limitation of the fighting to that country. I share also your determination that the attack in Korea must be repelled. We too have heavy responsibilities in the Pacific and South East Asia area.

[Here follows discussion on Korea; see volume VII.]

You mentioned Chinese representation at the United Nations. Our views have been put on record. As said to Mr. Gifford, they flowed naturally from our conception of the doctrine of recognition. To allow the effective Government of China to occupy the Chinese seat at the United Nations is in no way a measure of weakness, but is inherent in the constitution of the United Nations. I know that many people wonder why we should support a proposal which if accepted would seat a Government at the council tables of the United Nations when that Government is engaged in military operations against United Nations forces which are resisting aggression. I am interested in your suggestion of a 'moratorium' but am not clear what you have in mind. Perhaps you could develop your thought on this a little further. Meanwhile, it seems to me that what matters is that we should both do what we can (the initiative in raising the issue does not of course lie with either of us, but with Russia) to prevent our known differences of view on this point from developing into a source of misunderstanding between us. The legal arguments for seating them there are in our view conclusive, though I should certainly not wish to display any enthusiasm in championing the claims of the Central People's Government of China at the United Nations so long as they are set on their present course. On the other hand, I could not act in such a way as might imply support for the fiction that Chiang Kai-shek's representative in the United Nations speaks for China.

[Here follows further discussion about Korea.]

Mr. Gifford said to me that he thought our differences on Far Eastern policy had been narrowing in recent months. I think that this is true, and I am glad. He went on to say however that he thought we might now be at a cross roads and our paths might begin to diverge again. I hope this is not so; at any rate, if the risk exists, the best way to guard against it is for us to exchange occasional messages. That is why I especially valued the candour and friendliness of your message, and I have tried to reply in the same spirit.

"I wish to say again that I very much appreciate your friendly and constructive reply of May 10 [1] to my earlier message of May 1 [2] on some of our problems in the Far East. I gave my first impressions of your reply to Sir Oliver Franks and have since been giving the entire matter further study.

Although I do not wish now to go into all of the subjects which need further attention, I think it might be necessary for us to have an additional exchange of views on the question of Chinese representation in the United Nations. This matter is particularly acute at this time because Mr. Malik becomes President of the Security Council on June 1 and may take occasion to raise the issue again. We believe it of great importance that we try to find some working understanding with you on this question as soon as possible. We understand that the United Kingdom Delegation would, under its present instructions, have to support the seating of the Chinese Communists if the issue is raised in the Security Council.

In your recent message to me you indicated that your view on Chinese representation flowed naturally from your conception of the doctrine of recognition and you indicated a desire to have something more as to what we have in mind for achieving a 'moratorium'.

Our hope is that you could agree that so long as the aggression continues in Korea, the Chinese representation issue should not be substantively considered by United Nations bodies and that where it appears that the Soviets or others might raise the issue, our two Delegations should consult in advance to concert on procedures which both Delegations could support for avoiding a vote on the substance.

Specifically, this might take the form of a motion to the effect that the body concerned decides not to consider such a proposal so long as the aggression in Korea continues. Alternatively, the motion might be that consideration of and action on the matter be postponed so long as hostilities continue. Such an attitude would parallel the position of Norway as stated by Foreign Minister Lange and reported in the press on April 19 that Norway opposes United Nations representation for Communist China while aggression in Korea continues.

Examples of the way in which our two Delegations could handle this matter occurred in recent meetings of the Peace Observation Commission, the Committee of Twelve on Armaments and the Narcotics Commission. In these cases our two Delegations were able to reach an agreed procedure by which a vote on the substance of the representation issue was avoided. Our two representatives, however, were not able to reach such an agreement for the Executive Board of the Children's Fund which met on May 22.

Our impression is that a majority of the Council would much prefer not to have this matter come up for consideration on its merits and under the present conditions in Korea. We ourselves would be very glad to find a way to avoid a formal registration of our basic difference. Since it appears unlikely that we shall be able to work out that basic difference, we think the best move would be for us to prevent questions being dealt with in such a way as to force a vote on the substance. A procedure for postponement would appear to us to offer a reasonable way out of the difficulty.

I shall be in communication with you further about some of the other points which we have discussed. Needless to say, we are gratified by the recent success in Korea and are giving thought to what might be done to move that matter along to a settlement.

We are looking forward to Mr. Dulles' forthcoming visit to London on the Jap peace treaty [3] and hope that we shall quickly reach full agreement on a subject on which I am sure our purposes and general approach are the same."

The United States Representative at the United Nations (Austin) to the Secretary of State

SECRET NEW YORK, May 25, 1951—7:40 p. m.

1584. USSR Presidency of SC in June.

1. In planning for Malik[1] (USSR) Presidency of SC, we see Chinese representation issue as possibly tying up SC in prolonged procedural wrangle. If UK will support US on a careful adherence to SC rules, likelihood will be reduced. Also, we feel it would be most unfortunate to unity of UN if split develops between US and UK at this time.

Given the present membership in SC we shall probably need a majority of eight votes to challenge rulings of President because Malik may deny validity of Tsiang's[2] vote as rep of China. Of course, if Malik refuses to put his challenged rulings to a vote, and this was his tactic in Aug 1950, he can tie up the SC in debate on procedure, because we assume US will be unwilling to waive challenge to any move of Malik's attempting to deny Tsiang his right to sit, speak or vote in SC.

Malik might deny the validity of the Chinese vote. That wld mean that he wld deny that we had overruled any of his improper rulings as President if our majority does not include seven votes in addition to China. This means we need solid support on questions of a proper application of rules of procedure from Brazil, Ecuador, Turkey, Netherlands, France and UK in addition to our own and China's votes. Support from Yugoslavia wld be desirable but was lacking in Aug 1950. We understand UK is being approached in London on this general question and wonder whether related approach in Paris, Quito, The Hague and Belgrade might not be desirable precaution.

2. On Chinese rep issue.

(a) We cannot see more than four possible votes in support of any clear cut motion for unseating Tsiang and seating pro rep. USSR, Yugoslavia, India and perhaps UK unless its present standing instructions are changed wld support such motion.

(b) If Malik attempts to rule as President, as he did on Aug 1, 1950 that Tsiang does not represent China and therefore shld not sit, we wld challenge this ruling[3] and hope UK wld vote with us as it did last Aug. It takes seven votes to overrule such a ruling.

[2] Tingfu F. Tsiang, Permanent Representative of China to the United Nations.

[3] Marginal notation here reads: "on ground he has no power". The word "Yugo" is also inscribed marginally, in parentheses, in apparent addition of the name of Yugoslavia to that of the United Kingdom in this sentence.

(c) There are other procedural ways in addition to (b) above in which Malik might raise the point. He might as Soviet rep object to Tsiang's credentials and then as SC President put question: "Those in favor of approving Tsiang's credentials"; here the US on a point of order under rule 30 wld challenge the question as a violation of SC rule 17. To have a clear cut overruling of Malik's form of putting the question, we need the UK vote. Otherwise the seven votes, including China but not the UK, might be disregarded by Malik and we wld then be tied up in fighting for Tsiang's right to speak or to vote under rule 17. We conclude that on this point as on Aug 1950 question of seating the ROK and not seating the NKs we shld not waive the question but insist that the SC continue to consider it until we succeeded in preventing a denial of any of Tsiang's rights as rep in the SC.

3. In planning the substantive work of the SC for June we wld recall informal agreement among SC members of last July that if Malik refuses to call a meeting, the President for the fol month, the UK, wld with the consent of all other SC members except USSR act in his stead if necessary to keep SC functioning. Two substantive matters on which attention of SC may be needed during June are Palestine and Kashmir. We assume Dept also has in mind possibility Iranian question might be brought to Council, possibly by USSR. In any of these cases if SC meeting is required this wld be additional reason for urging wide support from UK and others for firm approach to any of Malik's tactics attempting to tie up Council.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] June 1, 1951.

Subject: Chinese Representation in the United Nations

Participants: Mr. C. A. Gerald Meade, Counselor, British Embassy
Mr. F. S. Tomlinson, Counselor, British Embassy
Mr. John D. Hickerson, Assistant Secretary, UNA
Mr. U. Alexis Johnson, Director, NA
Mr. David H. Popper, Deputy Director, UNP

The British Embassy representatives informed us that they were instructed to state that the Foreign Minister greatly appreciated the message from the Secretary of State with regard to Chinese representation [Deptel 5480 to London May 25] [2] and that he shared our desire to avoid our differences in view. The British noted that the details of the reply from London, a summary of which they left with us (attached to this memorandum) dealt primarily with the situation in the Security Council. However, they understood that no Security Council meeting had yet been called by Mr. Malik, the President for the month of June, and that the procedure outlined by the British would therefore first become operative at the Trusteeship Council meeting June 5.

The British thereupon passed to Mr. Hickerson the statement of their new position, which in essence calls for the disposition of the Chinese representation question when raised in the Security Council through a procedural motion calling for simple postponement of discussion of the question and enjoying precedence under the Security Council Rules of Procedure over substantive motions. While the British could not agree to any mention in the motion of Chinese Communist aggression, they would have no objection to reference to that aggression in the statements made by the various representatives. If the United States agreed, the British would follow similar procedures in other competent United Nations bodies.

The British also read to us a draft statement which the Foreign Office had suggested that Sir Gladwyn Jebb [3] might make when the issue arose in the Security Council. The statement took the line that "for a year now" the British had been steadily supporting the representation of the Chinese Communists in United Nations bodies since the United Kingdom had recognized the Communist regime as the government of China and still did so. However, the United Kingdom was compelled to take notice of the fact of Chinese Communist aggression and the refusal of the Chinese Communists to accept a settlement of the Korean dispute on honorable terms. Therefore, the United Kingdom representative would support a postponement of discussion of the representation question "for the time being".

Mr. Hickerson suggested that the British might give consideration to omitting "for the time being", since it might imply that the position was held only on a day-to-day basis. The British agreed that the omission of these words would be an improvement. Mr. Hickerson also suggested that the British consider the accuracy and the advisability of the reference to British support for Chinese Communist representation over a period of a year. The British said they would take this up with Sir Gladwyn Jebb.

The British representatives expressed the view that the change in the British position represented a concession of considerable importance to our views. Mr. Hickerson indicated that we fully appreciated the significance of the Foreign Minister's reply. It would be very helpful to the Secretary and would, he felt, be helpful to the British in this country.

We raised with the British the question whether the change in attitude would cover action in Specialized Agencies, with special reference to the pending meeting of the Technical Transit Committee of the UPU.[4] The British could not say; they agreed to seek London's views on this point.[5] However, they thought that the British line would probably be maintained at the forthcoming UNESCO General Conference.

[4] Documentation in the Department of State central indexed file on this matter is located in file 399.10–UPU. The Technical Transit Committee was to convene at Pontresina, Switzerland on June 6, and the Chinese seating question would arise. The United States position was that the Committee, a subunit of the Universal Postal Union, should not even consider the Chinese representation issue but should follow the example of the UPU's Executive and Liaison Committee and seat the Nationalist representative. This position was communicated on May 29 to the 7 diplomatic missions accredited to the concerned governments (Pretoria, Rome, Lima, Buenos Aires, Copenhagen, The Hague, and Paris) in priority circular telegram 745, May 29, 11 p. m. (399.10–UPU/5–2951)

[5] Subsequent to this meeting with the British Embassy officers, in priority niact telegram 193, June 4, 6 p. m., to the Consulate at Zurich, the Department of State undertook to inform Assistant Postmaster General Redding at Pontresina of the newly emerging British position, as follows:

"UK has agreed support motions postpone discussion Chi representation issue in UN bodies. Although details not yet entirely clear, we assume this position also applies specialized agencies. USDel shld consult in advance with UKRep with view reaching agreed method for dealing with Chi representation issue either on postponement basis or preferably, if UK concurs, on basis that Comite shld not even consider Chi representation issue but shld follow action taken by Exec and Liaison Comite, standing organ UPU. Whatever arrangement is worked out you shld, of course, insist on seating Rep Chi Natl Govt." (399.10–UPU/6–451)

It was agreed that Ambassador Gross[6] would concert with Sir Gladwyn Jebb on the precise arrangements for dealing with this question.

CHINESE REPRESENTATION IN THE UNITED NATIONS

In his message to Mr. Morrison, conveyed under cover of a letter from the United States Ambassador in London dated the 26th May, Mr. Acheson suggested that our two delegations to the United Nations should consult in advance to concert on procedures which both delegations could support for avoiding a vote on this issue. Mr. Acheson went on to suggest that the body concerned decides not to consider such a proposal so long as the aggression in Korea continues.

It is considered that as far as the Security Council is concerned the simplest form of motion to this effect would be a purely procedural one under rule 33 (5) of the Rules of Procedure to postpone discussion of the question for the time being. The motion should not, in our view, employ phraseology like "so long as the aggression in Korea continues", so as to void subsequent attempts to define when the aggression or hostilities had actually ceased. If necessary members of the Security Council could always explain to the Council orally that the action was being taken because of Chinese aggression.

Mr. Morrison is prepared to authorise Sir Gladwyn Jebb to concert the necessary action on the above lines with his appropriate colleagues. Mr. Morrison does not however wish that the United Kingdom Delegation should take the initiative and he hopes that an appropriate motion will be introduced by the United States Delegation.

If the above procedure is adopted for use in the Security Council the United Kingdom Delegation would also follow it in other competent United Nations bodies such as the Trusteeship Council. In any other United Nations bodies where the Rules of Procedure are not strictly analogous the United Kingdom Delegation would be guided as far as possible by the same general considerations.

In view understanding reached with UK on Chinese representation question, if Soviet makes usual proposal at opening TC tomorrow to exclude Chinese rep, Sayre [1] proposes make statement set forth below and pursue course of action indicated therein. Sir Alan Burns [2] in agreement on tactics and states UK will vote affirmatively on motion to postpone discussion.

"The opposition of the US Government to the unseating of the rep of the Chinese Nationalist Govt and to the seating of a rep of the Chinese Communist regime, has been made clear time and time again. I now reaffirm this position of my government. In the view of my govt it is out of the question to discuss the issue in an organ of the UN while the Chinese Communist regime at this very moment is engaged in aggression against the United Nations and while Chinese Communist troops are seeking to destroy the troops of the UN.

For these reasons, I move, pursuant to rule 56, subpara G of the Council's rules of procedure, that the TC postpone further discussion of this question. That motion, as the rule specifies, has precedence over the proposal of the Soviet rep if it is adopted, as my delegation strongly urges, it would result in an indefinite postponement of any further discussion of the Soviet proposal and the continuance of the Chinese Nationalist rep in this council."

[WASHINGTON,] June 7, 1951.

Subject: Chinese Attitude on the Representation Question in the Trusteeship Council.

New York's 1609, June 5 (Daily Unclassified Summary)[1] reports that our motion to postpone further discussion of the Chinese representation question was carried in the Trusteeship Council 11–1 (USSR)–0 on June 5. Because it was a motion for postponement of discussion it was given precedence over the USSR motion to seat the Chinese Communists.

The UK spoke in support of the motion, explaining that the UK continued to recognize Communist China as the Government of China and had hoped that Communist China would recognize the obligations of UN members not to assist aggression and to settle disputes by peaceful means. Unfortunately, the Chinese Communists had launched offensive after offensive and the UN had shown "endless patience". While still hoping that the regime would end the aggression, the UK believed that it would be appropriate to postpone the question of Chinese representation.

The Chinese Delegate (Liu) asked the President (Burns, UK) to rule the USSR motion out of order. The Trusteeship Council President apparently ignored the Chinese proposal and proceeded to put the US motion to a vote.

(Note: UNP reports informally that this mix-up was apparently due to an oversight on the part of our Delegation in New York in not advising the Chinese representative of our proposed tactics which had been worked out with the UK. UNP is sending instructions to our Delegations at other current conferences to make sure that the Chinese Delegation understands the new procedure.)

Subject: Chinese Representation in the United Nations

Participants: Mr. F. S. Tomlinson, British Embassy
Mr. John D. Hickerson, UNA
Mr. David H. Popper, UNP

Calling at his request, Mr. Tomlinson showed us a new draft statement intended to set the tone for remarks to be made by British representatives at pending meetings of United Nations organs with regard to the subject of Chinese representation. Mr. Tomlinson recalled that the statement used by the British over the last few months now seemed somewhat out of date. He noted that the British position in support of postponement of the issue remained unchanged.

The new statement, like the old, explained that the UK recognized the Chinese Communist regime as the Government of China, and, therefore, supported its claim to a seat in United Nations organs. The statement continued to the effect that the British have always hoped that the Chinese Communists would recognize their obligations as a Member of the United Nations to settle disputes by peaceful means, but noted that while the Chinese Communists were attacking United Nations troops in Korea and had been condemned for engaging in aggression there, the British consider it best to postpone consideration of the representation issue.

I made a few comments on some of the wording in the statement which emphasized the temporary character of the British position. In the course of discussion on this point, Mr. Tomlinson indicated that the British did not regard the conclusion of a cease fire as ipso facto ending the aggression. He noted that the general tenor of the draft statement seemed much too optimistic as regards the possibility of concluding an armistice, and assured me that in this respect it would not be delivered exactly as drafted.

Mr. Tomlinson noted with regret that at the UNESCO Conference at Paris our representatives had mentioned the December 14 General Assembly resolution in the resolution postponing action on the Chinese representation question. He hoped we might avoid this in the future, as we knew the British did not regard that resolution as a guide for organs which were competent to make their own decisions on this question.

Ref: Embassy's Telegram No. 410, July 20 to Department, Repeated USUN as No. 3.[1]

Subject: British Attitude Toward Admission of Communist China to the United Nations.

The Embassy's telegram under reference reported the substance of a conversation with the Head of the United Nations (Political) Department [2] of the Foreign Office in which it was stated that the conversations at Kaesong [3] might require a "very slight verbal change" in the position of the United Kingdom with respect to the admission of Communist China into the United Nations.

It is now understood that, shortly after the above-mentioned conversation took place, the Foreign Office asked the British Embassy in Washington and the British delegation to the United Nations for their views as to a desirable change in the British formula for Communist China, and that the British Embassy has communicated its views to the Foreign Office about as follows:

For the past few months, whenever the question of the admission of China to the United Nations or any of its specialized agencies has been considered, British representatives have been instructed to be guided by the following: Once the United States representative has suggested that the question of which government of China should be represented in the United Nations be postponed, the British representative will state (a) the United Kingdom recognizes the Central People's Government, and the CPG should be represented in the United Nations and in the United Nations specialized agencies; (b) however, during the past few months the Chinese Communists have repeatedly attacked UN forces in Korea and have been pronounced by the United Nations as an aggressor; (c) therefore the United Kingdom reluctantly believes it appropriate to postpone consideration of which Chinese government will be seated in the United Nations.

British instructions on the above subject are in a process of modification as follows: (a) In addition to (a), (b), and (c) above, the British representative would now state that whereas the United Kingdom once more supports postponement of the representation issue, it welcomes present indications that considerations which impelled the United Kingdom to take this course will soon be dispelled; and (b) if the United States motion for postponement, seconded by the United Kingdom, is defeated, the United Kingdom will have no recourse but to vote in favor of seating the representative of the Central People's Government.

It is further understood that the above position has the approval of the British Government. It is gathered that the British Embassy has been in close touch with the Department on this question and probably therefore the Department is well aware of this modification of the British position.

The Department's comments would be most useful as background for future discussions with the Foreign Office.

In the course of a conversation on other matters, Miss Salt reported that, following our suggestion of the other day, the Foreign Office has readily agreed that when the question of Chinese representation arises in any UN body between now and the next GA, the UK representative will refrain from making any mention of the GA Resolution on the subject, provided we do likewise. They stated that they had felt forced to mention it in the past only because we had. I made clear that our self-imposed injunction would apply only to the time of the Sixth GA and that we might want to lay some stress upon it in the GA itself.

As to the Chinese representation issue at the International Telecommunications Conference, Miss Salt agreed with the suggestion that if the move for postponement fails the US and UK delegations might wish to concert on the formula we had originally desired in order to avoid a vote on the substance. However, she expressed the view, which I shared, that if the postponement motion failed it would be because of conditions which would make it unlikely that a vote on the substance could be avoided by any other means. She suggested that we leave the matter to be worked out by our respective delegations.

He inquired whether US would modify or soften its position re admission of Chi Coms in event Korean armistice. Gross expressed strongest opinion contrary, commenting that matter of Chi Com admission could not in our view even be seriously considered until and unless Chi Coms radically changed their behavior and attitude toward international obligations.

To Lacoste's comment that end of fighting in Korea might meet objection we had raised to "Communist shooting their way into UN," Gross replied that end of fighting would not in itself end Communist aggression, and, moreover, we felt Chi Com misbehavior precluded serious consideration their claim for seat.[2]

There has been no indication that Fr FonOff wld favor either of these two courses. However, there is such desperate casting around for solution in Indochina that, if Kaesong talks shld end successfully, there wld be considerable support in Fr polit circles for negotiations to settle all FE problems in hope that somehow a solution for the seemingly

We do not find any illusions on this score among FonOff officials but polit pressure among all except Gaullists might well build up along these lines.

The foregoing stems in part from somewhat gloomy reaction toward IC itself. We are reliably informed that Le Tourneau accepted post Min Assoc States in new cabinet with greatest reluctance and only after much pressure, preferring be named Min Overseas France, post he held prior to formation Ministry Assoc States. Explanation is that no one sees solution for IC, where France continues pour out men and money, and that, while De Lattre has done excellent job, he continues ask for more men and money with no end in sight. Informant added for these reasons no one wanted serve as Min Assoc States.

It is our gen impression that not even FonOff officials dealing directly with problems, much less Fr officials in gen, have thought through all of various FE problems which might suddenly confront Fr Govt in event successful conclusion Kaesong talks. This, of course, stems in part from long period of elections and delay in formation new govt. In recent conversations with various FonOff officials, we have encountered little optimism with regard to outcome Korean armistice negotiations. There seems to be gen opinion that enemy may be marking time in preparation for new offensive and has no real desire for genuine armistice. One official points to reports (from Tokyo via Chi Govt sources) of build-up of Commie strength in planes and tanks and says this may presage all-out Commie attack at moment to be decided upon by latter. FonOff officials generally view Kaesong talks as part of Soviet peace offensive and as related to Japanese peace treaty conf. They suggest possibility talks may continue until outcome conf becomes clear and then be broken off with Sov effort maintain maximum propaganda advantage. One official goes so far as to suggest as personal opinion, not based on any specific intelligence, possibility of Sov or Soviet-backed attack on Japan, if peace treaty signed at San Francisco. FonOff officials are not optimistic re possibilities polit settlement in FE, some of them pointing out that US position on Formosa prevents any settlement that problem and that Fr Govt has nothing to offer Commies in return for guarantee against intervention in IC.

Foregoing represents a gen composite of views of FonOff officials with whom we have discussed these questions and tendency on part of FonOff officials is to say that they are expressing their personal views rather than Fr Govt policy. The exception has been with respect to question of recognition Chi-Commie regime and its entry in the UN where Baeyens himself has specifically stated there has been no change in Fr Govt position re these questions and that he knows of no indications of possible change. As stated above, however, possibility must be considered of polit pressure building up for change Fr position in this regard in event Kaesong talks successfully concluded and negotiations begun for over-all FE settlement.

CHINESE REPRESENTATION IN THE UN

PROBLEM

To reach an understanding with the UK and France concerning the handling of the Chinese representation question in the UN, and in particular at the coming session of the GA.[1]

UNITED STATES OBJECTIVE

To obtain UK-French agreement to support postponement of consideration of the Chinese representation issue in the GA and all other UN bodies in order to avoid any change in Chinese representation in UN bodies.

POSITION OF UK AND FRANCE

Under the "moratorium" arrangement agreed upon last May, the U.S. and UK have jointly supported motions to postpone consideration of the Chinese representation issue. The UK bases its support of these motions on the Chinese Communist aggression. It has recently informed us that in the event of an armistice it would not "immediately" abandon the moratorium arrangement. However, UK statements of this position made under instructions at current UN meetings obviously contemplate early abandonment of postponement and support for the seating of the Chinese Communists if an armistice eventuates.

France, which has not recognized the Chinese Communists, has generally supported the U.S. position on the Chinese representation issue. However, this position has not appeared to be very firmly maintained and France might be strongly tempted to vote to admit the Chinese Communists if there were a prospect of a "Kaesong in Indochina".

UNITED STATES POSITION TO BE PRESENTED TO OTHER GOVERNMENTS

1. We consider it imperative that the Chinese Communists should not be seated in the UN and that National Government representatives continue to sit. The following are among the reasons for this position:

a. The UK and France must be aware of the effect which the seating of the Chinese Communists in any UN body would have on the attitude of U.S. public opinion toward the UN and toward cooperation with countries supporting the Chinese Communists.

b. Under the impact of the heavy sacrifices of the Korean war, the American people would find it hard to separate the elements of approval and disapproval from such issues as recognition and seating in the UN whatever the theoretical position. They would not understand any active effort to accommodate Peiping when that regime has required so much from us in resisting a brutal aggression.

c. Willingness to discuss an armistice when the military situation is not favorable is no indication of any fundamental change in Chinese Communist aggressive policies; indications are quite the reverse.

d. Seating the Chinese Communists in the near future would have the appearance of rewarding aggression and would lessen respect for the UN, would reduce the will to resist on the part of Southeast Asian states, and would substitute an unfriendly voice for a friendly one in the UN Councils.

e. The Chinese Communists would hail their seating in the UN not as a means of helping the world community but as a political victory for their regime.

f. Titoism is not necessarily produced by increased contact with the non-Soviet bloc but rather by internal dissensions within the Communist family.

g. Indications are that the Chinese Communists would use their seat in the UN for accentuating tensions, not easing them. UK recognition, for example, has not led to any appreciable easing of Chinese-UK relations. . . .

2. A new public divergence of policy between the US, UK and France on this issue would be a serious development.

3. Because of the basic difference of views between the U.S. and the UK, it is essential that agreement be reached on some procedural device by which a vote on the substance can be avoided. Accordingly, the U.S. suggests that the three governments agree to continue a policy of postponement, leaving the delegates of the three Governments to the GA and other UN bodies to work out the necessary procedural steps to achieve this result.

4. The U.S. would oppose any attempt to link the question of Chinese representation in the UN with discussions regarding Korea.

DISCUSSION

If no armistice is included, the "moratorium" arrangement with the UK will presumably continue in effect. The UK is now apparently paving the way for a termination of it in case an armistice is concluded. An armistice would also lead to increased pressure in the GA by other UN members to seat the Chinese Communists.

In a resolution of December 14, 1950, the GA recommended inter alia that other UN bodies "take into account" the GA's attitude on representation controversies. This resolution is likely to be an obstacle to the gradual acceptance, organ by organ, of the Chinese Communists. The UK has asked us to refrain from citing it in support of the joint postponement policy. We agreed to this up to the time of the GA. At the next GA the US and UK should agree upon the above postponement policy which would leave the representative of the National Government in the Chinese seat. If after such action has been taken by the GA the substance of this issue is put to the vote in other UN bodies, we shall argue strongly on the basis of the December 14 resolution that other bodies should be guided by the attitude of the GA (in which our views are more likely to prevail than in smaller bodies).

Some formula for continuance of the postponement policy is the only means of avoiding a sharp open divergence of attitude between ourselves and the UK. "Postponement" would have to mean, as before, that the representatives of the National Government would be seated.[2]

[2] A "Supplement" to this briefing memorandum incorporated the "Views of the Embassy in London on Probable British Attitudes on Subjects to be Discussed in the Washington Foreign Ministers' Meetings". It read in part: "The Foreign Secretary will probably express the hope that we would be willing to engage in multilateral talks with the Chinese Communists and, if real progress is made, we reaffirm our previous stand that we would not veto their UN membership." Miss Salt informed us that the Foreign Office has sent a telegram to UKUN requesting the Mission to work out with USUN the Chinese representation procedure for the Sixth GA. The highlights of this telegram were as follows: (a) the UK agreed to follow the moratorium procedure for the GA: (b) the Foreign Office thought that the procedural motion might "best be made at the opening session": and (c) the UK preferred that the motion be purely procedural with no reference in the text to the February 1 resolution or continuing aggression.

180. Dept requests you attempt work out with UK, ad referendum, precise procedure for dealing with Chi Rep issue in Sixth GA. When procedure has been agreed Dept will wish you approach other Dels, particularly Canada and Fr.

Fol, in order of preference, are alternative courses which wld be acceptable Dept and which in our opinion fall within scope moratorium arrangement with UK:

(A) Motion to effect that Sixth GA decide take no action on any proposals to exclude Chi Natl Reps or seat Chi Commies in GA;

(B) Motion to postpone consideration any such proposals for duration Sixth Session, along lines discussed below.

In event adoption (b) and possibly (a) we wld seek arrange for another Del make motion and US wld support.

In developing Chi Rep procedure you shd keep in mind fol points:

1. We believe it may be preferable, by pre-arrangement with Temporary Pres, for motion be made at outset session before any substantive proposals are introduced. This wld ensure that motion wld be put vote first and without procedural wrangle. After its adoption we wld hold that no substantive proposals cld be put vote. It is, of course, possible the USSR may nevertheless submit its proposal before procedural motion is made. In this event, in order ensure that substance is not put vote first, we cld put our motion in form adjournment debate under rules 75 and 78, which wld incidentally also limit debate, or alternatively cld simply ask GA under rule 91 to vote on motion before Sov proposal.

2. We are inclined think that action shd be in terms simple motion which cld apply whether or not there is Kor armistice. UK and US, in supporting motion, cld advance such reasons as each sees fit in light prevailing circumstances. FYI we understand from Brit Emb that UK wld prefer simple motion with no reference in text to Feb 1 resolution and continuing aggression.

3. Although we are aware that UK will probably prefer that action be sine die, we believe it most desirable that some time limit be specified in motion in order ensure that Sovs will not be able obstruct proceedings throughout session by repeatedly raising Chi Rep issue. Only time limit which seems feasible us wld be for duration sixth session.

4. Although UK will undoubtedly prefer that seating Chi Natl Reps be implied rather than included in text motion, we believe it highly desirable that specific provision this effect be made in motion in order minimize difficulties which are bound arise later in session and you shld make every effort obtain UK concurrence to this. Less desirable alternative to specific inclusion might be to arrange for temp pres make interpretative statement before passage motion to effect that its adoption wld mean that Chi Natl Reps wld sit for duration session.

Chi Rep issue is bound be raised again in Credentials Comite and in plenary when report Credentials Comite is considered, in form challenge validity Chi Natl credentials or Sov request that Chi Natl credentials be put vote separately. In both instances, in order continue avoid vote on substance, we wld take line that GA decision along above lines had settled Chi Rep issue, and that such Sov maneuvers are therefore out of order. It wld be more difficult take this position if GA has not taken specific action seat Chi Natl Reps, or, at very least, if no interpretative statement has been made by Pres before adoption motion.

6. [sic] It shd be noted that above arrangement excludes re-establishment spec Chi Rep Comite to which we are opposed.[1]

[1] The Special Committee on representation of China ("the Committee of Seven") had been established by the Fifth General Assembly in Resolution 490 (V) of September 19, 1950; for text, see telegram Delga 7, September 19, 1950, Foreign Relations, 1950, vol. II, p. 301. Its membership was elected by secret ballot by the General Assembly on December 12, 1950 and consisted of Canada, Ecuador, India, Iraq, Mexico, the Philippines, and Poland. At its first meeting on December 15, 1950, the committee elected Sir Benegal Rau of India as chairman. It had never held another meeting. The question of its continuance was related to the question of the adjournment of the Fifth General Assembly which was still technically in session, pending the settlement of the several components of the China question: the Chinese Communist intervention in Korea, Formosa, the question of Chinese representation.

From September onwards periodic exchanges took place between the Department of State, the United States Mission at the United Nations (USUN), the Secretary-General of the United Nations, Trygve Lie, and other officials of the United Nations Secretariat, and representatives of other Member States, regarding the "winding-up" of the Fifth General Assembly; and in this context there was continuing discussion of the Chinese representation question. On October 2, in Washington, Ambassador Nasrollah Entezam, the president of the Fifth General Assembly, was informed explicitly by the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson) that the U.S. Government "would not be agreeable" to a prolongation of the life of the Special Committee (memorandum of conversation, October 2, 320/10–251). 477. Re Chinese representation. George (Canada)[1] just telephoned to say that "Special Comite on Representation of China" this morning approved by vote of 5 to 1 (Poland with India abstaining) Canadian formula of which key phrase is "Committee authorizes chairman to inform GA that in present circumstances it has been unable to make any recommendation on the question of representation of China". George observed that this took form not of comite report but of authorization for comite chairman to take action.

George continued that Rau (India) apparently had instructions not to present any draft res of his own but to remain aloof from controversy. Consequently, Pole submitted his draft res first calling for Nats to be unseated and Chi Comms seated. This draft res was defeated 5 to 2 (Poland and India). Lopez (Phil)[2] then made effort to submit substantive draft res of his own to counter Polish res but was dissuaded from this and comite then adopted Canadian formula.

George added that since meeting was closed, comite was able to vote down Polish effort to make press release of defeated Polish draft res for circulation to UN members.

Coulson [2] today. Coulson reacted quickly and powerfully against alternative A. He said this would be in effect substantive decision for UK; he thought under their standing instructions they would have to vote against it. He urged sticking to our established drill as in the past; procedural motion to postpone consideration sine die. Bolte argued advantages of alternative A but Coulson was notably unmoved. He thought UK would have difficulty even with alternative B since sixth GA might conceivably last a year and they would not wish to freeze the position for that long. He said he did not in fact suppose they would raise question themselves even if there were cease-fire in Korea, at least until they were confident of majority support.

On our suggestion that motion be made at outset session before any substantive proposals are introduced, he thought it difficult to raise until Russians introduced proposal to change occupants of Chinese chair. He preferred waiting for question to be raised and then moving postponement of consideration.

He said UK would also find great difficulty with explicit statement that Chinese Nationalist reps would remain seated. He thought this was so clearly effect on motion to postpone changing representation that he could not understand why we wanted specific statement. He thought if Assembly decided to postpone consideration there would be no problem in disposing of additional Soviet motions, as in Credentials Comite and in plenary consideration of its report. He recalled Russians did not in fact raise issue continually once they were defeated in fifth session.[3]

He said he would report our views. Then he would have to consult further in Paris.

2141. Re Deptels 2272 [1] and 2273 Chi representation: Emb approached UN Dept along lines Deptels and stressed urgency and importance US attaches to this question. FonOff said Eden earlier in day had approved tel to Wash and Paris reaffirming UK's earlier objections to US proposals and emphasizing UK's reluctance "even temporarily" to appear to imply Chi nationalists more entitled to seat in UN than Chi Commies.

Eden had added that present moratorium represented laboriously achieved compromise between UK's desire to maintain friendly cooperation with US and "existing commitments" and that UK wished no deviation from or revision of moratorium arrangement. Eden had been informed before approving UK position Emb making high level urgent approach on this question, and been given substance US arguments put foreward to UK UNDel. He will be briefed on question and had already anticipated discussing it with Secy in Paris. We have impression Eden at present approaching matter cautiously because of domestic pol situation.

UK's objections as given Emb by FonOff were along same lines as previously expressed to Dept (circular airgram Oct 24, 1951 [2]). UK is not confident we can prevent prolongation session and does not want to go beyond limits present moratorium arrangement in committing itself to possible prolonged postponement consideration issue. While admitting danger continued Sov obstruction, UK believes situation can be kept under control.

FonOff promised, however, to restudy US proposals before Eden leaves Sunday.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] November 2, 1951.

Subject: The Chinese Representation Question in the Sixth General Assembly.

Participants: Mr. F. S. Tomlinson, UK
Mr. J. D. Hickerson, UNA
Mr. W. P. Allen, EUR
Mr. L. Henkin, UNP [1]

Mr. Tomlinson reported the views of Foreign Minister Eden on this question along the lines reported in our Embassy's telegram 2141.[2] He stressed particularly that his government was reluctant to make any revisions in the moratorium agreement, which had been carefully designed to achieve a delicate balance between UK views on the substance of the question and their desire to accommodate the view of the US. The essence of their view is that they could not support a resolution which recognizes the right of the Chinese Nationalists to represent China in the United Nations but were willing to postpone consideration of the question indefinitely. They were not prepared to agree to postponement for a long period, and the Sixth Session of the General Assembly might last a long time.

I read to Mr. Tomlinson our proposed recommendations to the Secretary on this question as contained in the Department's telegram Delga [Gadel] 49 November 2.[3] I stressed that we were not insisting that the resolution explicitly recognize the right of the Chinese Nationalists to continue to represent China but that as a practical matter it would have to be made clear that this result would follow. The resolution we would like to see would postpone consideration of the question for the duration of the Sixth Session in Paris. As we see it this is the only way of maintaining the moratorium without allowing the Soviet Union to harass and embarrass us by repeatedly raising this question throughout the course of the Assembly. Since Mr. Eden's chief objection to our proposal is his fear that, like the Fifth Session, the Sixth might last all year, we are fully prepared to make clear that postponement of consideration would be only for the duration of a session of normal length in Paris.

Mr. Tomlinson indicated that he did not know how his government would react to our suggestion. He thought that if Mr. Eden was prepared to accept the proposal in principle, the formula "for the dura-

Additional background: Last May US and UK agreed to moratorium on their differences over Chi Rep, thru formula for postponement action on proposals seat Chi Commies or unseat Chi Nats in UN bodies. UK has indicated most it will agree to is motion postpone consideration this question sine die. 2. Chinese Representation

Mr. Taylor said that this matter was certain to arise on Tuesday [2] afternoon either by way of specific proposals or on points of order. The Russians would probably spring the matter just after the speeches by French President Auriol and GA President Entezam. The delegation was checking with Cordier [3] in the SYG's office as to any communications from Chou En-Lai [4] and the Chinese Communists.

Mr. Taylor recalled the short history of the Rau committee on Chinese Representation and how it had died with the fifth GA, the Nationalists having been seated provisionally throughout the course of that session. It was understood that the matter was not to be raised on Monday at the closing meeting of the fifth session, but no guarantee of this could be given.

The moratorium agreement, worked out with the British, to have any proposals sidetracked by postponing consideration of the matter, was outlined by Mr. Taylor. The device was simple and had worked well in some forty-odd separate cases. The US or a friendly power would move postponement. The UK would make a statement in support. The US would then state that the effect of this motion would be to seat the Nationalists. The moratorium had worked well in the past, and permitted the issue to be dealt with and shelved completely for the duration of whatever session of whichever body was considering it.

[4] Premier of the Government Administration Council and Minister of Foreign Affairs, People's Republic of China.

Mr. Taylor reported that it would be hard for Entezam to rule the cloture of the debate after a Russian proposal had been made. Therefore, the US was proposing alternatives to the UK to deal with the matter with the least possible difficulty. The result of both of them would be to take care of the Chinese Representation problem for the duration of the sixth Assembly. The UK, however, objected to the reference in our scheme to talk of "duration" and also to mentioning the effect of the resolution, therein, of seating the Nationalists. They had indicated their dislike of foreclosing this issue once and for all for the sixth session. The implication behind this attitude seemed to be that if an armistice were reached in Korea, they would wish to recondsider their position. The UK seemed to prefer returning to the old simple formula. If we should accept this, it was pointed out, it would be absolutely essential to have it understood that the Nationalists would be seated and that this arrangement would last throughout the whole of the sixth session.

The Secretary said that if, after considering both alternatives, Eden did not like either one of them, it would be necessary to concert on language which would have the effect of seating the Nationalists provisionally, although from a public relations point of view this would be less desirable. Mr. Taylor said that the working arrangements we have had with the UK went farther than the exchange of notes with British Foreign Minister Morrison would seem to indicate. The difficulty for the British in the past with reference to talk of "duration" had been that this beclouded the issue with the ticklish problem of defining when a period of hostilities had ended. Ambassador Austin recalled how easily the old arrangement had worked in the Headquarters Advisory Committee of which he had been chairman since its inception. A simple rule that the matter was out of order had always sufficed. If this had been challenged, it had been put to the vote immediately, and had always been sustained.

Ambassador Gross reported that Entezam had agreed to apply Rule 75 if a USSR motion to seat the Communists or unseat the Nationalists should be followed by a motion by the US or a friendly power to postpone debate thereon. In his opinion this would be a priority motion. Entezam was not so certain, however, that it would be proper if it contained words that this postponement was for a certain duration. He did not consider Rules 75 and 78 applicable to our alternatives A and B, which were, in his opinion, non-procedural motions.

Mr. Sandifer [5] answered Ambassador Austin's question as to what the exact objective of the Department was in this regard by saying that we preferred to settle the matter by one action for the entire session. The UK, on the other hand, wanted to keep it a more open question. If there were to be an armistice, it would be much harder to deal with on a second time around. The Department felt a proper interval should follow an armistice before the General Assembly could appropriately even consider the question of Chinese Representation. If the matter were dealt with by our alternatives A or B, it would take a two-thirds vote to reopen the question, a course which would be very difficult for the proponents of the Chinese Communists.

Ambassador Austin wondered how expedient our approach was. Mr. Sandifer replied that it might be possible to get the UK to agree, and that in any case we should push them very hard on this matter. The Secretary would see Eden and attempt to persuade him of our correctness in the matter. Assuming for the sake of argument that the UK did not agree to A or B, we should try to work out language which would omit the idea that the Assembly's action was only temporary. This would be feasible only to the extent that it was made crystal clear that the Nationalists are to be seated with full rights for the session, so that the Credentials Committee's report to the Plenary would not precipitate another big debate. The Secretary would undertake to use all his persuasive powers with Eden to gain acceptance of A or B, and if that attempt failed, then to get agreement on a postponement formula which would assure seating the Nationalists. This would not give any trouble in the Credentials Committee since it was pretty well understood that the functions of that group were only clerical; that is, to look at the credentials and see that no forgeries were being perpetrated upon the UN.

In suggesting a way to support the Secretary's arguments with Eden, Mr. Nolting offered the idea that when the chips were finally down the UK would only get some seventeen votes. Thus for the UK to insist on their point of view would yield them no advantage. They were certain to lose on the vote, and the only result would be to publicize the split between us. In answer to this Mr. Sandifer said that there would be many Members who would prefer the simple UK formula, in that the acceptance of it really meant taking no position on the substance of the matter. The Secretary was inclined to agree that if the choice were put to the Assembly of a USSR motion, US alternatives A or B, or the UK formula, the last would gain the most adherents. Mr. Sandifer agreed with this estimate of the situation and said it was for this reason that we must try to get our idea accepted in place of the UK's, so that theirs would not be offered to the Assembly. Ambassador Gross said the split would involve more than just the western world. The Arab and Eastern states, too, would be split among themselves, and the issue in many countries would require a cabinet decision to resolve it. The choice was between risking precipitating an inevitable debate, and obtaining the advantage of quick action. In some forty cases the Soviets had subsided on this matter once it had been put out of the way via the moratorium procedure. There would still be the chance that they might harass the Assembly continually on this matter.

The Secretary wondered if the delegation agreed that he should try to get Eden to agree to alternative A or B. Mr. Fisher said that the advantage of either alternative would be to clear the air after the matter was settled, since regardless of how the matter came up the Soviets would pull a big debate by some ruse or other. To settle it finally would serve well the purpose of stopping the flow after the initial onslaught. It was decided that the Secretary would approach Eden on A and B to seek his agreement. It was further decided that, if Eden would not agree to A or B, the US would not attempt to go it alone. As Ambassador Austin put it, the US, in the exercise of its great leadership in the international community today, must have somebody to lead. It can't carry the flag so far ahead of the parade that no parade follows.

In response to various questions, the Secretary said that it was generally believed that a motion to postpone the matter for the duration of the sixth session would obtain sufficient votes. The view was expressed by Ambassadors Austin, Gross, and Sayre that it was unwise to engage the US prestige on this matter, to upset a none-too-steady applecart, or to evoke emotional reactions.

It was decided that if Eden would not accept either alternative, we would seek to get his agreement on a formula something like the moratorium agreement, but with the added assurance that the postponement would last for the sixth session's stay in Paris and would keep the Nationalists in their seat.

Miss Bacon suggested that the reason behind the UK unwillingness as apparently indicated by the discussion could spring from a desire to bring the Communists into the UN for substantive discussions on the armistice terms.

CHINESE REPRESENTATION ISSUE IN THE SIXTH GA

I. In your talk with Mr. Eden on the question of Chinese Representation in the Sixth GA, it is suggested that you seek his support for one of the following alternative procedures (in order of preference) which in our opinion fall within the scope of the moratorium agreement:

A. Motion to effect that the Sixth GA decide to take no action on any proposals to exclude Chinese National Representatives or to seat Chinese Communist Representatives.

B. Motion to postpone consideration of any such proposals for the duration of the Sixth Session.

In connection with alternative B, it would be understood—and you would state in your supporting speech—that the effect of its adoption would be that the Chinese Nationalist Representatives would be seated for this session.

II. If the UK will not support alternative A or B, it is suggested that you should not force the issue to the extent of proposing that we go our separate ways. In these circumstances you might suggest that we await the initiative of the USSR and move adjournment of debate on the issue under Rules 75 and 78.

In presenting alternatives A and B, you may wish to make use of the following arguments:

1. We believe it to be a matter of the highest importance that the Chinese Communists not be seated. Surely the UK, with its forces now actively resisting Chinese Communist aggression in Korea, would not wish to have the Chinese Communists seated.

2. We believe it to be of the highest importance likewise that the US and UK work together on this issue.

3. The question should be disposed of promptly and effectively so that the GA can get on to the important issues before it. Postponement sine die would permit the Soviet bloc to raise the issue of Chinese representation at any time. The question would become an issue also in connection with the Credentials Committee and with its report to the GA.

4. Postponement sine die would be too temporary a device to satisfy American public opinion which, as Mr. Eden must be aware, is deeply concerned with the question of Chinese representation.

[1] Although the date of November 5 is handwritten at the top left-hand corner of the document, inductive evidence indicates that the paper was prepared for use by Acheson at the November 4 bipartite meeting with Eden.

5. As the proposed procedures avoid any questions impinging on the substance of the problem, the UK should be able to accept these procedures without any serious difficulty.

6. If Mr. Eden objects that adoption of the US proposal might result in sealing the issue for an entire year, you might say that no one, of course, can guarantee when the session will terminate. It is our purpose—and we have so informed all friendly governments—that the session should be completed within the minimum possible time. We have been talking in terms of 8 to 10 weeks and we shall bend every effort toward this end. We would be prepared to accept language which makes it clear that the question is postponed only "for the duration of the Sixth GA in Paris."

7. In any case, the UK could certainly not contemplate seating the Chinese Communists within the near future. Even if an armistice should be arrived at, it is inconceivable that the UK would wish to take up the question of seating the Chinese Communists immediately thereafter.

3. I raised the question of Chinese Representation in the United Nations. It appeared that Mr. Eden was not presently familiar with this situation. Mr. Eden said that he thought we should maintain the moratorium agreement. He was under the impression that this was a UN agreement and that by maintaining it no action was required in the General Assembly. It was explained to him that this was merely a United States–United Kingdom understanding to the effect that we would jointly act to postpone decisions in regard to Chinese representation during the pendency of the Korean action and not involve ourselves in the merits of the question.

I then explained to him our proposals (a) and (b) and also the possibility of the third action, which was to allow the Russians to take the initiative and then move to end the debate. I explained why our proposals were more advantageous to the Western position, because they settled the question for the duration of the present Assembly.

Mr. Eden said that in the light of what I had presented to him, he would be in favor of something along the lines of our proposal (b) and also he raised the issue of the duration. I suggested the duration should be the present meeting in Paris. He asked that our officers should get in touch with Mr. Shuckburgh,[2] who would work this out.

I strongly suggest that we do not overplay our hand on this matter of the language of alternative (b) and I would not try to press the duration question upon the present meeting in Paris.

4. The next matter raised was Mr. Eden's suggestion that it would be most helpful to him to have some three-power discussions. He handed me the attached agenda for items for such discussions. He pointed out that some of the items would have been passed before the talks occurred but that a great deal of time could be wasted on general discussions; however, it was clear that he would like to be brought up to date on the views of Mr. Schuman and me on a great many of these matters. It was decided that we would gladly cooperate in arranging a meeting with Mr. Schuman, which might take place sometime on Tuesday or as soon thereafter as convenient.

I said that I understood that it had been arranged that we would meet at three o'clock Monday afternoon, which, he said, was entirely agreeable to him.[3]

[3] In reporting briefly to the United States Delegation on November 5 on his meeting with Eden, Acheson "warned whoever was to deal with the United Kingdom on this [Chinese representation issue] not to over-trade. It appeared that they were extremely ill-informed as to the nature of the moratorium agreement, and other aspects of the problem. Since they would not accept alternative B, we must not over-push them on it. Ambassador Gross, Mr. Fisher, and Mr. Sandifer were to work on this with the UK. It was important to note that the UK were not at all worried about the matter. Thus if we did not make it complicated, the UK would accept our position." SECRET [PARIS,] November 5, 1951.

Subject: Chinese Representation

Pursuant to your wishes, conveyed to us by Mr. Battle,[1] we went to the British Embassy at noon through arrangement made by Mr. Raynor to consult with Mr. Shuckburgh concerning the Chinese Representation question. Mr. Raynor was present for the conversation. As Mr. Shuckburgh was not able to be present, we talked with Mr. Parrott who handles this matter in the Foreign Office and Mr. Dunnett (?) of the British Embassy staff.

We told Mr. Parrott that we understood that the Secretary and Mr. Eden had discussed this question briefly and had reached a tentative measure of agreement on a procedure along the lines of our Alternative B position. After some discussion, at Mr. Parrott's request, we indicated the following language as the sort of thing we had in mind:

Mr. Parrott expressed concern as to whether or not this was the best way to handle the problem or whether it was not preferable to wait until a motion was made by the Soviets in which case a motion to adjourn debate might dispose of the matter quickly. We indicated that from our point of view it was preferable to have affirmative action initiated by us in the form of a procedural motion of the kind set forth above. Mr. Parrott thought that the language suggested met the other two matters that had concerned the British, that is some specific statement relative to continuing the Chinese Nationalists in the Chinese seat, and the question of the duration of the resolution. Mr. Parrott said that while his Government had no thought of changing its position immediately after an armistice, if one should be concluded, they preferred not to have language which tied their hands for an indefinite period of time. He seemed to feel that the phrase "meeting in Paris" would meet their needs on this point although it was made clear that our position would be the same if under any circumstances this session should continue after the Paris meeting. Mr. Parrott said that he was not in a position to definitely agree to the text and that he would take it up with Mr. Jebb before the Secretary's meeting with Mr. Eden at 3 o'clock.

Mr. Parrott agreed to the great urgency of this matter in view of the fact that it will come up for action tomorrow afternoon. We indicated that we would probably have to proceed with conversations with other governments this afternoon.

Chinese Representation

The Secretary read the draft resolution on this question which had been presented to the British on an official level at 12:00 o'clock as follows:

"The General Assembly decides to postpone consideration, for the duration of the sixth regular session meeting in Paris, of any proposals to exclude representatives of the National Government of China from the Assembly or to seat Chinese Communist representatives to represent China in the Assembly."

Mr. Eden inquired about the procedure followed last year, and the Secretary explained how the matter had developed at the Fifth Assembly. The Secretary stressed that the inclusion in the draft resolution of the reference to the Sixth Session Meeting in Paris had been included in an attempt to meet the position of the United Kingdom. Mr. Lloyd inquired if we considered this to be a procedural motion, and the Secretary replied that we did. In response to a further inquiry, the Secretary indicated that if the Russians got the floor first, we could consider it a move to limit debate.

Mr. Eden indicated that the wording of the resolution was agreeable to him, but he questioned whether it was wise for us to take the initiative on the matter. The Secretary replied that he felt it was essential that we take the initiative in order "to put the matter to sleep until February."

Mr. Eden said that he would have to consult the dominions on this matter which he could do tonight as he was dining with them. He thought that our objective of "putting the matter to sleep" was agreeable, and he also felt that if the matter did not come up from time to time, the result would probably be to facilitate the truce negotiations rather than the reverse.

The Secretary agreed that if Vishinsky obtained the floor before he did on this matter, other tactics might have to be followed.

Mr. Eden agreed that we could go ahead in view of the urgency of the matter, as it may come up tomorrow, with discussions on this draft resolution with the French and other friendly delegations, and that we could indicate that, while the United Kingdom had not definitely approved the resolution, they were not adverse to it.

Chinese Representation

Mr. Schuman opened this discussion by suggesting that this matter would probably be raised in the Credentials Committee.

Mr. Acheson countered with the statement that he thought it would arise in the opening plenary session of the Assembly this afternoon. He expressed the view that Mr. Vishinsky probably would attempt to get the floor to raise this question at the very opening of the meeting. Mr. Acheson felt that we should attempt to anticipate this move by taking the initiative in putting in our own resolution. He said he had in mind a resolution which would postpone the question without going into its merits. He said he would ask General Romulo [1] to make this motion, and that he would promptly support it.

Mr. Eden asked Sir Gladwyn Jebb to comment. Jebb said he thought this course of action was a possibility, but that we were confronted by the technical point that the item is not on the agenda. He wondered therefore if it would not be better to let Vishinsky get the floor and then put in our resolution as a procedural motion to end the matter. He added, however, that this was further complicated by President Entezam's feeling that the resolution was not procedural as it contained a specific date and that therefore a Soviet resolution would be voted on first. He concluded by saying that if Entezam was not convinced on this point, there appeared to be two alternatives: (a) the U.S. plan, (b) following the past procedure and adjourning the question sine die.

Secretary Acheson said he thought President Entezam was confused. He would agree that if our resolution followed Vishinsky's, it would not fall under rule 75, and that Entezam then was correct. He said, however, that this would not hold if our resolution was put in first. It would then have priority.

Mr. Eden observed that he did not think that any resolution Mr. Vishinsky would put forward would obtain much support. However he felt that some delegations, even some of the Dominions, would vote against or abstain on our resolution if it should be put first.

Mr. Schuman commented that the only objection to the British plan would be that Vishinsky could repeat the same process every day.

Secretary Acheson confirmed that thought and added that it could be done in each committee each day as well as in the Assembly itself. He said he felt, therefore, that what we had in mind would have to be done sooner or later and he felt it was better to do it today and get it over with, because each time Vishinsky raised the matter, he would attempt to squeeze some propaganda out of it.

Mr. Eden then said that he would agree to the U.S. proposal if both Mr. Acheson and Mr. Schuman felt it was the best thing to do, saying that he did not "mind it very much". The matter was then agreed.

[1] Brig. Gen. Carlos P. Romulo, Philippine Secretary of Foreign Affairs; Permanent Representative to the United Nations; and Chairman, Philippine Delegation to the Sixth Regular Session of the General Assembly.

The U.K. then raised a point about the language "Chinese Communist Representatives" in the resolution, pointing out that in U.N. resolutions in the past, which the U.S. have voted for, the full name of the Chinese Communist government had been used. After some discussion of this point, the Secretary indicated that while we preferred our original wording, he would be willing to tell Romulo that we would accept the inclusion of the full name of the Chinese Commie Government if Romulo agreed to put the resolution in that form.

Editorial Note

At the meeting of the General Committee on November 10 at 2:30 p. m., the substance of the draft resolution agreed upon at the bipartite and tripartite meetings, November 5 and 6, was presented in the form of a motion by the Thai delegate (Prince Wan). After some discussion the Committee adopted the resolution 11–2–1. For the proceedings, see United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, Sixth Session, General Committee, pages 15–17.

On November 13, after some debate, the General Assembly in plenary session adopted the Report of the General Committee (UN Doc. A/1950), which included the recommendation of the Committee that the Chinese representation question be postponed. For the text of the General Committee Report (specifically paragraph 6), see United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, Sixth Session, Annexes, fascicule for agenda item 7. For the proceedings of the General Assembly on this matter, see United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, Sixth Session, Plenary Meetings, pages 99–104.

An attempt by the Soviet bloc to revive the question was rejected by the General Assembly on December 7. The occasion was the consideration and adoption of the Report of the Credentials Committee by the General Assembly. For the proceedings, see ibid., pages 211–214.

Ambassador Tarchiani said that one impression he had received very strongly during his visit to Italy was the concern of public opinion that Italy was tending to be pushed on the sidelines when main issues were discussed. He felt that the Italian people were very much aware of Italy's failure to obtain admission into the United Nations and that there was some impression that Italy's allies had not supported her strongly enough in that connection. He said that if Communist China were to be admitted into the UN and Italy not, the resultant reaction on Italian public opinion would be most unfavorable.[2] I said that as he knew, we were strongly in favor of Italian admission into the UN.

The Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson) to the Ambassador in Italy (Dunn)

SECRET WASHINGTON, January 30, 1951.

DEAR JIMMY: I want to make more detailed comment than was given in the Department's telegram [1] concerning your suggestion that the Italians be encouraged to request permission to participate in discussions, in General Assembly committees, of a wide range of subjects in the political, security, economic and social fields.

As you may know, the question of granting general participation in the General Assembly to non-members has arisen several times in the past in connection with the membership problem. In April 1948, on the occasion of one of the Soviet vetoes of Italy's membership application, Senator Austin [2] referred in general terms to the possibility

[2] Warren R. Austin, United States Representative at the United Nations. In March 1948 the United States initiated and actively promoted an effort to have the Security Council reconsider and favorably act upon Italy's application for membership in the United Nations. This was terminated by a negative vote of that the General Assembly might hear the views of non-members. The Canadians made fairly detailed suggestions to this effect, involving the creation of a status of "associated states" and the modification of some rules of procedure of the General Assembly. Dr. Arce, the Argentine delegate to the United Nations, made a similar suggestion. In discussions in New York, the British were definitely opposed to all these suggestions, and Italy and most non-member states involved showed extreme sensitiveness to the implication that they were being offered "second-class membership". We did not, therefore, pursue the matter further. During the consideration of the membership question in the General Assembly in December 1950, El Salvador proposed a resolution which would, among other things, invite the states which have been excluded from membership as a result of the veto, to send observers to the committees of the General Assembly. This provision was rejected by 27 votes to 11, with 16 abstentions. We voted against it, without in any way campaigning. We understand that Mascia opposed it strongly.

Your suggestion is somewhat different in that it would base Italy's participation on Italy's interest in the particular matter concerned. The General Assembly has proceeded cautiously in dealing with the problem of requests for participation by non-members and, in the absence of specific rules of procedure, has treated each case on an ad hoc basis. It has in practice limited the participation of non-member states to those problems in which they have a special interest. Even in such cases, it has further limited the participation of certain states in specific instances because they wished to utilize the Assembly as a propaganda forum without being willing to assume the Charter obligations of peaceful settlement.

Italy could claim a special interest in some United Nations questions in the discussion of which it has not hitherto participated. For example, since non-members might participate in measures against aggression and might even be asked to do so, Italy might have a special and individual interest in the discussion of such measures. We would accordingly see no objection to Italy's participation in such debate if it so requested. Wherever Italy could make a case for the view that it had a special and individual interest in a matter under discussion, the General Assembly committee concerned would probably grant a hearing readily.

the Soviet Union on April 10 (the question being a substantive matter and the Soviet Union a permanent member of the Security Council whose negative vote constituted a "veto"). For documentation on the United States démarche regarding Italian membership in March and April 1948, see Foreign Relations, 1948, vol. I, Part 1, pp. 173 ff.

A somewhat different question would be raised by a request to participate in the discussion of a matter in which Italy had only a general interest—as a member of the international community. To grant participation in such a case would alter considerably the practice heretofore followed and would probably involve practical difficulties. A general arrangement for Italy's participation in General Assembly discussions on the scale suggested in your telegram would in effect permit any non-member state to join in the discussion of practically any matter. It would, moreover, be obvious that such an arrangement has a bearing on the problem of United Nations membership—a problem in relation to which it does not seem useful for the United States to initiate action at the present time. Accordingly, we are reluctant at this point to take the initiative in encouraging Italy to raise the question of a general arrangement for its participation in General Assembly committees.

We will, however, give further consideration in the Department to this question in the course of our preparations for the next General Assembly. In the meantime, our delegation in New York will of course be glad to consult with Guidotti. We will consider sympathetically any Italian request that may be made, to participate in the discussion of matters in which Italy can show some special interest. Of course, we are seriously concerned over the problem of bringing Italy and other deserving states into full participation in the United Nations as rapidly as possible. For example, as indicative of our desire to increase ad hoc Italian participation whenever feasible our Delegation to the present session of the Trusteeship Council has been instructed to favor having the Council invite the Italian representative to sit regularly in the Council and to participate fully, except for the right to vote, in all deliberations relating both directly and indirectly to Somaliland.

With regards and every good wish,

Sincerely yours, JOHN D. HICKERSON

Item 14 (Table of Contents): Problems Relating to the Somaliland Trusteeship Agreement (Item 23 of Provisional Agenda)

The Problem

The problem is to determine the position which the Delegation should take on certain problems relating to the implementation of the Trusteeship Agreement for Somaliland under Italian administration; namely, the question of Italian representation in the Trusteeship Council, the question of the preparation of the first report on Somaliland by the administering authority, and the question of the sending of a visiting mission to Somaliland.

Recommendations

1. The Delegation should take the position that Italy should be invited to designate a representative to sit regularly in the Trusteeship Council with the right to participate fully, except for the right to vote, in the deliberations of the Council relating directly or indirectly to the administration of Somaliland and the position of Italy as an administering authority. The United States should oppose efforts to limit Italian participation in the Trusteeship Council's deliberations specifically to those occasions when reports or petitions relating to Somaliland are being examined.

2. The Delegation should support the transmission of the provisional questionnaire to Italy as the Administering Authority for Somaliland. In view of the fact that Italy has been administering Somaliland since April 1, 1950 and of the Charter requirement of an annual report by the Administering Authority on each trust territory, the Delegation should urge on the Italian Delegation that Italy agree to submit a report on Somaliland in time for examination by the Trusteeship Council at its ninth session (June–July 1951).

3. If the question arises, the Delegation should support the inclusion of Somaliland among the territories to be visited by the forthcoming visiting mission to the trust territories in East Africa.

Basis of Recommendations

The General Assembly on December 2, 1950 approved the draft Trusteeship Agreement for the Territory of Somaliland under Italian administration. The purpose of this paper is to deal with certain problems which may be expected to arise in the Trusteeship Council as the result of the approval of the Agreement.

Recommendation 1

The trusteeship arrangements for Somaliland are unique in that the administering authority (Italy) is not a Member of the United Nations. Accordingly, Italy cannot be a Member of the Trusteeship Council, since the Council's membership is restricted to "Members of the United Nations" (Article 86 of the Charter). It will be necessary, therefore, for the Council to make the necessary arrangements for participation by Italy in the work of the Council so that the provisions of the Trusteeship Agreement for Somaliland may be effectively carried out.

It is believed that the Delegation should take a broad view of Italian participation in the work of the Council. No purpose would appear to be served by an effort to limit Italian participation to those occasions when the Trust Territory of Somaliland is under examination. While Italy is precluded from exercising a vote by the terms of Articles 86 and 89 of the Charter, the Charter imposes no other restrictions regarding participation of an Italian representative. Recommendation 1 suggests that Italy should be invited to designate a representative to sit regularly in the Trusteeship Council. Except for the right to vote, he would be able to participate fully in all deliberations of the Council relating both directly and indirectly to Somaliland. The nature of the Council's deliberations is such that it is impossible to determine in advance when some matter of general application to all trust territories or of concern to Italy as the administering authority of Somaliland might arise. For example, the Council's consideration of a petition relating to Western Samoa might be of interest and concern to Italy because of analogous circumstances which might exist in Somaliland. Therefore, it is believed desirable for a representative of Italy to sit regularly with the Council with rights of participation as indicated in the recommendation.

It may be noted that the question of Italian participation in the work of the Trusteeship Council would not arise if Italy were a Member of the United Nations and, as a consequence, a Member of the Trusteeship Council. Except for the opposition of the Soviet Union, Italy would no doubt now be a Member of the United Nations. It is believed that the United States, which has consistently supported Italian membership in the United Nations, should oppose any efforts that might be made to narrowly restrict Italian participation in the deliberations of the Trusteeship Council.

[Here follow recommendations regarding the question of the preparation of the first report on Somaliland by Italy, and the question of the sending of a UN visiting mission to Somaliland.]

Subject: Italian Participation in UN Trusteeship Council

Participants: Mr. Felice Catalano, Italian Embassy [1]
Mr. William I. Cargo—UND [2]
Mr. A. E. Wellons—AF

Mr. Catalano came in this afternoon at his request to review the question of Italian participation in the current session of the UN Trusteeship Council in New York. He said that the Italian observer at the United Nations, Mr. Mascia, had received strong instructions from Rome to press for full Italian participation in the Trusteeship Council even though Italy is not a member of the United Nations. He explained that by "full participation" the Italian Government includes the right to vote in spite of the fact that Article 86 of the UN Charter limits membership of the Trusteeship Council to "Members of the United Nations". I expressed doubt that such an arrangement could be made within the terms of the Charter but said I would check with the Office of United Nations Affairs on the matter. (I telephoned Mr. Cargo of UND and asked him to join the discussion.)

Mr. Catalano explained to Mr. Cargo that in the view of the Italian Government a new situation exists regarding Italian participation in the Trusteeship Council which was not contemplated when the UN Charter was adopted. This situation, he explained, is that Italy has been prevented from becoming a member of the UN several times by Soviet vetoes. Although Italy was not a member of the UN, General Assembly granted Italy trusteeship over former Italian Somaliland and Italy had accepted all the obligations of the UN in that regard. Therefore, the Italian Government felt it was justified in asking for the right to vote in meetings of the Trusteeship Council. Mr. Catalano added that the Argentine member of the Council would probably present a resolution proposing that Italy be given the right to vote by amending the UN Charter.

[1] Catalano was a Second Secretary of Embassy.
[2] Cargo was Officer in Charge of Trusteeship Affairs in the Office of Dependent Area Affairs.

Mr. Cargo explained that Article 86 of the UN Charter limited membership in the Council to members of the UN and that, therefore, he did not see how Italy could legally be given the right to vote without an amendment to the UN Charter. Mr. Catalano then said that the Italian Government realized this but felt it would be worthwhile to press for an appropriate amendment under Article 108 of the Charter. Mr. Cargo explained that the procedure outlined in Article 108, even if the amendment received a two-thirds vote in the General Assembly, would probably take several years and would require ratification by two-thirds of the members of the UN, including all the permanent members of the Security Council. If the Soviet Union vetoed Italy's application for membership, he added, it was likely that they would not ratify such an amendment giving Italy the right to vote in the Trusteeship Council. Mr. Catalano said they would not object to such a result because the responsibility would lie clearly with the Soviets.

Mr. Cargo and I also pointed out that under the terms of the Charter it would be necessary for the General Assembly to elect a nonadministering member of the Trusteeship Council if Italy should obtain the right to vote as an administering member. Mr. Catalano said that, of course, they would expect this to be done.

Mr. Cargo emphasized that the present instructions to the US representative on the Trusteeship Council were to support full Italian participation without the right to vote. He added that some members of the Council and the Secretariat desired to limit Italian participation only to matters directly affecting Italian Somaliland. Mr. Cargo and I made it clear that under the terms of the UN Charter as it now stands we did not see how it would be possible for the US to support a proposal permitting Italy to vote in the Trusteeship Council. Mr. Catalano asked if we would review the situation in the light of further discussions in New York after the Argentine proposal is introduced. We readily agreed saying that much would depend, of course, on the wording of the Argentine draft resolution.

Subject: Question of Italian Voting in the Trusteeship Council

Mr. William Cargo, UND

Mr. Catalano telephoned on February 12 to say that he had been informed that Mr. Mascia was still pursuing in New York certain aspects of the question of Italian voting in the Trusteeship Council. In response to my inquiry, Mr. Catalano indicated that he was aware that the Department had sent views to Rome on this question and said that he was generally aware of the nature of those views. He said, however, he wished to inquire most informally what the attitude of the Department would be regarding the possible establishment by the Trusteeship Council of a "Commission of Study" on the question of Italian voting in the Council. (Such a Committee might prepare a report for the next session of the Council). He indicated that such a suggestion was in the effort to have at least something done in the Council on the question of the right of Italy to vote.

I expressed the personal view that it would be preferable not to have the question of a possible vote for Italy in the Trusteeship Council pursued at this time even in that form. I said, however, that I would bring his inquiry to the attention of other interested officers in the Department and communicate with him further on the subject as soon as possible.

After consulting with other officers of the Department concerned with this question, I called Mr. Catalano on February 13 to say that it was felt by the Department that the establishment of a Trusteeship Council Committee to study the question of Italian voting would not be a useful step. I said that we felt that the same difficulties would eventually arise as we foresaw in connection with possible proposals at the present time to raise in the Trusteeship Council the issue of a Charter amendment on the question of Italian voting. Mr. Catalano thanked me for giving him these views. He said that Mr. Mascia in New York would determine whether the possibility of a Council Committee should be pursued further and inquired whether our Delegation to the Trusteeship Council would be able to discuss this question with Mr. Mascia. I said that I felt sure that they would, and that we would inform the Delegation of the informal consideration of the question that had taken place here in Washington.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. Donald Vernon McKay, Adviser, United States Delegation to the Eighth Session of the Trusteeship Council [1]

Subject: Question of Italian Voting in the Trusteeship Council

Participants: Mr. Luciano Mascia, Italian Observer
Ambassador Francis B. Sayre, U.S. Delegation
Mr. Vernon McKay, U.S. Delegation

Mr. Mascia called on Ambassador Sayre this morning to inquire further about United States views regarding Italian participation in the Trusteeship Council. Mr. Mascia opened the conversation by stating that his instructions from Count Sforza [2] remain unchanged. He said that for reasons of internal politics the Italian Government wanted to be able to show the Italian people that the Trusteeship Council was doing everything possible to satisfy Italy's desire for full membership in the Council, including the right to vote. Mr. Mascia wondered what the United States would think of having the Trusteeship Council appoint a small committee to look into the problem and report back in six months at the next session of the Council. Mr. Sayre replied that he felt the Trusteeship Council was not the proper forum in which to raise or discuss this question. He thought that if the question were to be raised, the assembly would be the appropriate forum. Mr. Mascia responded that he did not quite agree. In his view, the Trusteeship Council might very properly call the Assembly's attention to the problem since it was a practical situation which now confronted the Council for the first time. The Italian Government, he said, recognized fully the Charter bar on Italian voting in the Council but was looking for a face saving device for the home front. He believed that the appointment of a committee would suffice for this purpose, even though the committee might be expected to come up with a report stating that nothing could be done to satisfy Italy's request for voting privileges.

Mr. Sayre expressed his doubts regarding the practicability of such a procedure but informed Mr. Mascia that he would talk informally with other members of the Council to get their reactions, and would confer again with Mr. Mascia.

Mr. Catalano called to ask whether we had heard anything from our Embassy at Rome in response to the instructions we had sent them on the Italian desire to obtain a vote in the Trusteeship Council. Apparently Mascia in New York had learned that such instructions had been sent and I confirmed that they had along the lines of our earlier discussions here.

Mr. Catalano said that the Italian Foreign Office has instructed Mascia to press the question or at least to keep it open, and has instructed the Embassy here to solicit the Department's support. Accordingly, Mr. Catalano thought he might come down to make formal representations seeking our support of Mascia's idea that the Trusteeship Council establish a sub-committee to study the question. Mr. Catalano said that he was aware of our opposition to this course; in response to his question, I said that that was our final position. I referred to our views on the timeliness of raising either the membership or Charter amendment issues now; Mr. Catalano said he quite understood those views but that they did not seem to constitute an answer to the question of keeping open for further study. I acknowledged that that might be so and said that speaking entirely personally, because it was not a matter in which the Department can appropriately express official views, my own thought was that since we must assume a sub-committee report would be unfavorable to the Italian thesis, it would be more of a jolt to Italian public opinion in the long run to focus the issue on such a report than quietly to let the matter drop now. Mr. Catalano said he understood the pertinance of this point and that I was expressing it completely personally. He indicated that he would not pursue the matter officially, and we agreed to keep in touch on current developments on this matter.

3611. Department pass USUN. FonOff has expressed to Embassy Government's concern re political repercussions if Italy denied "full

There has already been some adverse press comment on our delegation's statement in TC opposing "full participation"[1] and government anticipates further attacks in Parliament soon. Line of Communist attack characterized by UNITA headlines February 14. "New hostile act of Truman's delegation to UN—America will deny Italy vote on Trusteeship Council—State Department hypocritically affirms decision motivated by necessity not prejudice our country's admission to UN."

While FonOff understands our position as stated in TC and as explained informally by us on basis Deptel 3437, February 8, they still hope we may be able at very least to support deferment final adverse decision through agreement TC refer question to a subgroup for further study and consideration. FonOff believes that if such course followed government would be able reply satisfactorily to opponents.

While it appears to Embassy doubtful that issue poses serious political problem for government, still adverse decision will be widely interpreted as diplomatic defeat at hands of Western Allies. On other hand favorable action, or even deferment final decision would enhance prestige of government and help Sforza in his relations with Parliament.

[1] Ambassador Sayre's only statement in the Trusteeship Council on the Italian participation question before February 20 was on January 31, when he strongly supported the proposal of the president of the Council for the establishment of a committee to revise the Council's rules of procedure to take into account Italy's presence in the Council's work. At that time Ambassador Sayre said (summary record): "Italy's participation in the Council's proceedings was not regulated by the Trusteeship Agreement, and the question would require careful consideration." Editorial Note

The Trusteeship Council took decisive action in two steps on February 23, regarding the question of Italian participation. Concluding work begun in plenary session on February 20 and continued on February 21, the Council adopted new rules of procedure which enabled Italy to participate in the work of the Council without vote in respect of matters relating to the Somaliland trusteeship and general policy questions. Secondly, the Council approved a resolution offered by Argentina which requested the General Assembly at its Sixth Session later in the year to include on the Assembly's agenda "the question of the full participation of Italy in the work of the Trusteeship Council" (Resolution 310 (VIII)). Mr. Catalano called, on instructions from Rome, to inform the Department of the appreciation of the Government of Italy at the outcome of the vote in the Trusteeship Council on the resolution to place on the agenda of the next session of the General Assembly the question of Italian participation in the work of the Trusteeship Council. (This resolution was adopted on February 23 by a vote of 9–1–2, the United States voting in the affirmative, the Soviet Union against, and the United Kingdom and New Zealand abstaining.) Mr. Catalano said that his Government especially appreciated the support of the United States for this resolution. He said that while, on the surface, it might appear to be a small matter, it was of real significance in again demonstrating which countries really favored full Italian participation in the work of the United Nations. I thanked Mr. Catalano and expressed appreciation that the Government of Italy had asked him to approach the Department in this way.

He inquired whether we had as yet any views as to the handling of the question in the General Assembly next Fall. I said that the Department had not yet studied this question, but that it would of course do so in connection with preparations for the Assembly and that we would be happy to consult with Italian representatives here or in New York at a later stage.

Memorandum by the Deputy Director of the Office of United Nations Economic and Social Affairs (Green) to Mr. David H. Popper of the Office of United Nations Political and Security Affairs [1]

[WASHINGTON,] March 12, 1951.

[Subject:] Review of Membership Question.

Confirming my suggestion at the UNA Staff Meeting last week, I should like to propose that the Bureau take a new look at the whole problem of membership and associate membership in international organizations, which has been somewhat neglected over the past year because of our preoccupation with the question of Chinese representation. It would be advisable, I believe, to establish a small working party—representing UND, UNE, UNP, and UNI—to analyze the Department's past policies in this field and to prepare recommendations for the future, to be discussed later with the regional bureaus. I am nominating Mr. Tomlinson [2] to serve on this working body.

Some of the problems which merit review are the following:

1. Participation of Japan and Western Germany in International Meetings.

FE and GER are constantly bringing pressure on UNA, often with rather flimsy arguments about the sovereign powers of the two countries, to arrange for participation of Japan and Western Germany in various international organizations and conferences. So far as Japan is concerned, the basic information has been assembled in the attached despatch No. 1163, dated March 1, 1951, from Tokyo.[3]

2. Participation of the Three States of Indo-China in International Organizations.

UNA is frequently caught in the cross-fire between EUR and FE on this problem.

It would be desirable for the working group to look once more at the Department's policy toward the admission of the Soviet satellites (I have always been strongly opposed to the EUR line on this) and other candidates for membership in the United Nations. It would also be desirable to list the non-self-governing territories which are advancing toward independence and eventual membership in the United Nations and to see what will happen to the voting balance in the United Nations if the present tendency toward fragmentation of empires continues.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] March 29, 1951.

Subject: Possible Congressional Resolution on Participation by Non-Members in General Assembly Proceedings Without Vote

1. Background

In one of your recent appearances on the Hill you indicated that you would think over the question of a possible Congressional resolution on the above subject. Various ideas along that line have, from time to time, been mentioned during United Nations discussions of the membership problem. Most recently, (late in the 5th session of the General Assembly) El Salvador presented a resolution providing in effect that the nine states presently barred from membership by the veto be invited to send observers to sessions of the General Assembly. Such observers would be enabled to express their views and furnish information when so requested by a member state delegation, both in the main committees of the General Assembly and in the Interim Committee. This proposal was rejected by 27 to 11, with 16 abstentions, the United States joining in the negative vote.

Since that time Embassy Rome has raised the question of finding means to afford Italy a wide measure of participation in General Assembly proceedings. In your letter of January 30, 1951 to Ambassador Dunn you stated that we would "consider sympathetically any Italian request that may be made to participate in the discussion of matters in which Italy can show some special interest". Since that time the Trusteeship Council (February 23) has adopted a resolution requesting the General Assembly to consider the "question of the full participation of Italy in the work of the Trusteeship Council".

2. Discussion

Finding some means of bringing non-members, at least those which the Assembly has felt to be qualified for admission, into reasonably broad and regular participation in General Assembly proceedings may prove increasingly desirable the longer the present impasse on the membership problem continues. Indeed, unless the log-jam on membership is soon broken, some such arrangement may well prove necessary if the concept of universality is ever to be approximated within a predictable period. Procedurally, this would be possible through broadening the provisions for non-member participation already applied by the Assembly in special cases such as the Greek case, Palestine and the Italian Colonies. Given the present world situation, it might be desirable for the United States to take the initiative in spurring the Assembly to promote or at least not oppose an arrangement which would bring non-members in some measure into the United Nations fold even if without the full benefits of membership. It might be difficult for the Soviets to oppose such a step, even if they could not claim credit for it. Much would depend, of course, on whether non-members as a group would regard such an arrangement as a form of "second-class membership". It is possible that their regular presence at General Assembly sessions and their consequent identification with the United Nations would tend to diminish political opposition to their admission as members.

In the light of these considerations, the question warrants further study and review prior to the convening of the sixth session of the General Assembly. However, we do not think that encouragement should be given to the House at present to adopt a resolution pointing in that direction. The views of other important and friendly member states would need to be obtained, as well as the reaction of at least those non-members friendly toward the United States. Our position on the membership problem itself will need to be reviewed later this summer. Until we are closer to the next General Assembly it would be wise to retain a flexible attitude both on the membership problem or on any alternative procedures which might in part compensate for the lack of progress on the membership issue. Such flexibility of approach would be compromised if we were to give undue emphasis now to specific procedures which are, in reality, lesser aspects of the larger political problem involved. Should the weight of our thinking by late summer incline toward some broad formula for participation by non-members, suitable proposals for appropriate procedural arrangements can be worked out at that time. Under present conditions, UNP feels that it would be well not to tie our hands by encouraging Congressional proposals of the type described.

3. Conclusions

Any Congressional inquiries on this subject could be answered along the following lines:

(a) A Congressional resolution advocating broad participation by non-members in General Assembly proceedings without vote would not be helpful at this time;

(b) The Department is, however, giving careful study in preparation for the next session of the General Assembly, to possible arrangements for granting to non-member states fuller participation in the proceedings of committees of the General Assembly.

Memorandum by the Acting Director of the Office of United Nations Political and Security Affairs (Wainhouse) to the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] April 13, 1951.

Only a summary of Ambassador Dulles [1] supposedly off-the-record remarks at the Board of Trade luncheon April 3, 1951 in honor of the Latin American Foreign Ministers is available. It was on this occasion that he commented on the problem of membership in the United Nations, with the problem of the admission of Japan as his point of departure. Following is the official summary (Dept. PR242, April 3) of this portion of his remarks:

"Japan undoubtedly will apply as promptly as possible for membership in the United Nations. But their application may be vetoed, as has been the application of Italy and other peace-loving states.

"This is an aspect of the problem which I am sure you will want to consider both as belligerents in the Japanese war and as members of the United Nations. It is becoming increasingly intolerable that the Soviet veto in preventing the realization of the United Nations Charter provision that membership should be open to all peace-loving states which accept the obligations contained in the Charter and which are able and willing to carry out those obligations. Denial of membership to such nations makes it difficult to develop a genuine collective security system, such as is needed in the case of Japan. I believe that the United Nations Assembly should at an early date give consideration to how this problem can be practically resolved."

We have already begun to receive official inquiries concerning any possible U.S. intentions to move in the membership field. As you know, the Italians made inquiries of Mr. Gross [2] last week and were in effect told nothing new. Moodie of the Australian Embassy [3] is coming in to see Ward Allen [4] and, on instructions, will ask whether Mr. Dulles' reference means that we have something in mind.

The line we have taken thus far is that Mr. Dulles' remarks were his own; that he was simply pointing up a frustration in the UN which everyone is aware of and one with which we have been contending for a long time; that we are continuing to study the problem carefully but that we have no concrete suggestions to make at this time; and that we will be glad to keep in touch with the Australians on any develelopments in this field before the GA. We might also mention that one of the possibilities which has been suggested by the Italians and, last fall, by the Salvadorans is that of establishing some general measure of participation in the GA by non-Member states.

A working group from various UNA offices is now preparing positions on various membership problems, particularly in the specialized agencies, and UNP is now working up a basic paper both on the broad aspects of the membership situation and on the narrower question of a possible arrangement of increased participation in the UN by non-Member states.

We will keep you informed of any developments in this field.

PARTICIPATION OF NON-MEMBERS IN THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

PROBLEM

The unlikelihood that the USSR will agree to the admission to United Nations membership of the great majority of States who still remain outside, forces serious consideration of alternative arrangements, not subject to the veto, for securing participation for these states in the United Nations. The obvious possibility, which has frequently been suggested in the past, is some form of participation in the General Assembly. The general support for the drastic step taken in the resolution on Uniting for Peace may have laid a political basis for a similarly strong assertion of authority by the General Assembly to remove what is generally regarded as a scandal in the United Nations.

In its practice, the General Assembly already makes provision for participation of non-members in its proceedings. This participation on a strictly ad hoc basis is, however, limited both in purpose and in scope. In general, its purpose is to hear particular testimony needed in order to settle some problem, or to give a fair hearing to all parties involved. Its scope is limited to the making of statements and answering of questions, each intervention being specifically authorized by the Committee concerned.

The question involved here is, therefore, whether some general arrangement beyond existing practice can be devised which will provide a means for participation by non-members that will be satisfactory from the points of view both of general policy and of General Assembly procedures.

DISCUSSION

1. Non-Member States Which Might be Involved

Fourteen applications for United Nations membership are pending:

(a) The General Assembly has determined that nine states whose admission has been blocked by Soviet use of the veto are qualified for membership:

Austria
Ceylon
Finland
Jordan
Ireland
Italy
Republic of Korea
Nepal
Portugal

Only Italy has shown a strong interest in participation in the General Assembly. However, depending on circumstances, Austria, Ceylon, Jordan, Korea or Nepal might welcome such an opportunity.

(b) Five Soviet membership candidates have not received majority support:

Albania
Bulgaria
Hungary
Rumania
Mongolian Peoples' Republic

If the USSR opposed a plan for participation in the General Assembly, the Soviet applicants would refuse participation; strong Soviet opposition cannot, however, be assumed.

(c) The following may seek United Nations membership in the near future:

Vietnam
Laos
Cambodia
Spain
Japan
Federal Republic of Germany
Libya

Some or all of these would probably desire the privilege of participation in the General Assembly. Although all would at present meet with objection in the General Assembly, these objections will possibly decrease.

(d) Switzerland, whose traditional neutral position bars it from United Nations membership, might be interested in some participation in the General Assembly.

(e) Finally, the diminutive states—Andorra, Liechtenstein, Monaco and San Marino—might wish to participate if they were given any encouragement.

2. Nature and Extent of Participation

(a) In the past any arrangement for participation of non-members in the General Assembly has been made on a strictly ad hoc basis on agenda items in which they were able to demonstrate direct interest. In such cases particular conditions have been attached to their participation, limiting it generally to committee and subcommittee proceedings and to such oral and written statements as the committee may permit, each intervention being specifically authorized.

(b) Possible Types of Participation

(1) Relatively full participation—short of voting—might include a seat in any committees in which all Members have the right to be represented and perhaps even in the plenary meetings of the Assembly itself, with the privilege of making oral statements and submitting proposals and procedural motions.

(2) An intermediate degree might be participation in some or all committees on which all Members have the right to be represented, with privilege of making an oral statement on the substance of each item at a time authorized by the Chairman, and of having written statements circulated to all Members.

(3) The minimal privilege might include participation as an official observer, involving nothing beyond the issuance of tickets for admission to meetings of committees and plenary sessions of the General Assembly, and circulation of documents.

Alternative (1) would be too far-reaching if granted to many non-members. Practice—and a strongly stated United States position in 1947—is against participation of non-members in plenary meetings. If allowed at all it should perhaps be in the general debate; the use of Rule 67 reduced to a formality the plenary debate on most committee reports and it would be undesirable to do anything to add to debate on such questions.

Full participation in procedure—on the analogy of Security Council practice concerning non-members—would probably slow the General Assembly proceedings up unduly, especially if granted to Soviet satellites.

Alternative (2) would seem adequate, with perhaps the additional privilege of making a statement in the general debate of the plenary Assembly.

3. Possible Undertakings to be made by Non-Members as a Condition of Participation

(a) Acceptance of the Principles of the Charter

The non-member might be required to accept formally the relevant parts of Article 2 of the Charter along the following lines which would be written into the basic General Assembly resolution:

"——— accepts the obligations set forth in Article 2 of the Charter of the United Nations, and in particular obligations—

i. to settle its international disputes by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security, and justice, are not endangered (Article 2:3);

ii. to refrain in its international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state or in any other manner inconsistent with the Purposes of the United Nations (Article 2:4);

iii. to give the United Nations every assistance in any action it takes in accordance with the Charter and to refrain from giving assistance to any state against which the United Nations may take preventive or enforcement action (Article 2:5).

(b) A voluntary financial contribution by each non-member to the United Nations budget. This should be small—i.e., less than the minimal contribution of members, which is .04% (ca. $16,000 on the present budget). Such a contribution might in theory be (a) a means of covering the expenses resulting from non-member participation, including documents, and (b) a token contribution to the maintenance of international security.

(c) Undertaking to be bound by United Nations decisions or actions in the consideration of which the non-member has participated, to the same extent as are members of the United Nations.

Such a provision as (a) would furnish a basis for developing the participation of key non-member states in United Nations collective efforts. It is, of course, not certain how many non-member states would accept such conditions. Probably a number of friendly states could be induced to accept. The provision would establish a single standard for all non-members, including Cominform countries, by which the Cominform countries would exclude themselves.

4. Alternative Arrangements for Determining which States may Participate.

A General Assembly resolution might be adopted, offering the type of participation decided upon to

a) any state
b) a list of named states

c) any state whose application for United Nations Membership is pending;

d) any state which accepts specified obligations—perhaps any or all of those outlined under (3) above;

e) a combination of the above alternatives might involve automatic grant of the privilege of participation to certain states or categories of states, such as (b) and (c) above, and ad hoc Assembly action in any requests by other states.

The above alternatives offer a range from individual selection of a single state to a blanket arrangement including the Soviet satellites and anything else that could be called a "state".

Alternative (a) would appear to be too broad—it would make expulsion of even diminutive states difficult.

Alternative (b) might include a long or short list; it seems likely however that the list would become long. Such a list might include all of the states included under, (a), (b) and (c) of paragraph 1 on pages 1 and 2.

The assumption of obligations by the non-Member states as a condition for use of the privilege has certain advantages. However, a broad grant of the privilege, on as non-political a basis as possible, would revive much support in the United Nations and it might be difficult for us to secure an arrangement that would include our friends and exclude the Soviet satellites. This is particularly true since the concessions to the non-Members are not great in any case.

5. Certain Problems of Arrangements for Non-Member Participation

(a) Questions will arise concerning the United States attitude toward admission to this country, and privileges and immunities while in this country, of representatives of non-member States who are seeking to participate in the General Assembly pursuant to a general arrangement. The answers are not clear, and it seems essential to secure the opinion of the Attorney General on these points before moving internationally. UNI is now preparing a communication to the Attorney General.

(c) Non-Member States might regard such arrangements as "second-class membership" and refuse to participate. Obviously, advanced consultations with some of them would be necessary.

6. Recommendation

It is suggested that, if it seems clear that the problems set forth under 5(a) can be solved, we might work out a draft resolution which would in effect invite a long list of States—including the Soviet applicants and some or all of these listed under 1(c) to participate in the main committees (and perhaps the plenary General Assembly) to the extent of making a statement on the substance of each item.

We might inform the UK, France and at least certain Latin American governments that we could vote for a resolution along these lines if the majority of the General Assembly and of the non-member States desired it. It would be preferable for some other States—perhaps El Salvador—to make the formal proposal.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] May 9, 1951.

Participants: Mr. Felice Catalano, Second Secretary, Italian Embassy
Ward P. Allen, EUR

1. Participation in GA VI.

Mr. Catalano, calling at his request for a general discussion of the problem of Italian participation in the UN, remarked that with the major questions of Italian Colonies disposed of there would be few subjects on which Italy could properly participate at the next GA session. He expressed the hope that the Libyan question would not arise and that the Arab States and Pakistan could be persuaded not to raise it. In the present decision for a federated state, the word "federation" seems to have a highly flexible meaning, he remarked. Italy means and desires "true" federation, i.e., "as loose as possible", so that Cyrenaica cannot gain too dominant a position. I pointed out that because of the strong views held by the Moslem States there was, of course, no guarantee that the question would not arise and that in any event the reports of the UN Libyan Commissioner and of the Administering Powers are automatically on the GA agenda. These items, together with the problem of the Egyptian-Libyan frontier and the report of the UN Commissioner for Eritrea, are all items in which Italy will have a real interest at the next GA.

2. Participation in the Trusteeship Council.

When Mr. Catalano referred to the recent decision of the TC to give Italy participation without vote and to have the GA consider the question of voting rights, I reiterated our view that we saw no real substantive benefit from having the matter considered by the GA. The only ways in which Italy could be given a vote in the TC would be (1) by its admission to the UN, for which we continue unsuccessfully to strive, or (2) by amendment of the Charter, equally impossible at the moment. Mr. Catalano stated that his Government is of course aware of this but the Argentine motion in the TC to refer the voting matter to the GA was "necessary at the time" because of its favorable effect on Italian public opinion.

Speculating on what course of action the GA could take on this question, Mr. Catalano suggested the possibility of some resolution that would at least "not close the door" to voting rights in the TC. I responded that, although our position had not yet been formulated for the GA, it would seem more sensible and better even for Italian opinion in the long run, not to keep the question agitated, since there is no possible way for the GA to give Italy a vote in any event. The matter might be handled best by a reiteration of the GA's opinion that Italy is qualified for full UN membership. Although I expressed the view that a reference to the International Court would be useless, Mr. Catalano clung to that as a possibility for GA action. He pointed out that the Italian people did not understand the Charter provisions which make the granting of a vote impossible, but, in response to a question, stated it would not be practical for the Government to try to explain it to them.

3. General UN Participation Without Vote.

Mr. Catalano desired to know whether we were planning to press for GA action to give Italy general participation without vote in various UN organs as an interim substitute for membership. I stated that in our annual review of the perennial membership problem this possibility was being considered. He commented that, so far as he knew, his Government had not changed its position of not favoring that sort of "second-class membership", adding that he personally also felt it would be unwise for Italy thus to be placed in a sort of inferior position. I responded that while there was considerable sentiment in favor of a move in this direction for qualified applicants, in reaching a decision on the matter we would of course attach considerable importance to the wishes of Italy itself.

In the course of the conversation he sought and received confirmation that the UN membership problem had not been specifically discussed in the Four Power discussions in Paris.[1]

Mr. Catalano stated that when he received any further word from his Government on these problems he would advise us.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] May 21, 1951.

Participants: Mr. Gerald Meade, Counselor of the British Embassy
Mr. Michael Wenner [Second Secretary, British Embassy]
Mr. W. P. Allen—EUR

Mr. Meade showed me in confidence a letter dated April 21st from the UK Foreign Office (Sir Pierson Dixon[1]) to Sir Gladwyn Jebb[2] regarding this problem which expressed the view that the Soviet threat of a break with the UN is a new factor which increases the attractiveness of a new approach to universality. The accompanying memorandum recommends that the US, UK, and France give favorable consideration to proposing to the USSR an arrangement for the admission of all pending applicants, that the Western Powers explore together methods of surmounting the technical difficulties raised by the requirements in Article 4 of the Charter. If the Americans and French agree the subject might be raised with the USSR in the Four Power Meeting. The memorandum points out the following advantages of proposing admission of all applicants:

1. It would reduce the risk of losing Asian and Middle Eastern States and of their gravitation to the Soviet orbit in the event of a break with the Soviets.
2. It would make it easier for the UN to survive a Soviet walk-out. As the letter indicates, the British fear that a Soviet break with the UN might induce the neutralists (i.e. India and others) also to leave and that then under US influence the remainder of the UN would become more and more anti-communist and it would be difficult to claim full legitimacy for the Organization.
3. It would place the Western Powers in a tactically strong position as champions of universality, while the Soviets are undertaking a campaign of division and disunity in the UN.

Mr. Meade also permitted me to read Sir Gladwyn's reply which made the following points:

1. Any possible deal involving all pending applicants would run up against the problem of the Republic of Korea. It would be impossible to shift the USSR from its opposition of the last two years to ROK's admission.
2. Thus any arrangement even omitting ROK could only result if in the admission of eight states favorable to the West and five Soviet satellites. The net effect would be of a greater benefit to the Soviet Union than to the West, since the relative increase in strength would be greater and since the new members would undoubtedly be very obstructive and very vociferous in debate.

[2] Sir Gladwyn Jebb, Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom to the United Nations.

3. It is difficult to explain away the objections to the admission of the Soviet satellites under Article 4. The admission of Hungary, Bulgaria, and Rumania would be difficult enough, but it would be even more difficult to admit Albania (in view of the Corfu Channel case) and Outer Mongolia (which is not even recognized as a state).

4. Jebb was not greatly impressed with the argument that an increase in non-Soviet membership of eight would greatly aid the UN to survive a Soviet walk-out, or that their admission after a Soviet break would not be regarded as "legitimate". On the contrary, he suggested that we should continually remind the friendly applicants and others that it is only the Soviet veto that has prevented their admission and if the Soviets should withdraw we should emphasize this point by the immediate admission of friendly applicants.

I commented that Sir Gladwyn's views are much more in accord with ours than those expressed in Dixon's letter and Mr. Meade agreed that Sir Gladwyn was a little more aware of the practical difficulties in the way of any "arrangement". He thought Sir Gladwyn's views would prevail. I stated that as Mr. Meade was quite aware, we had examined the problem from all possible angles and had reached the conclusion that it was impractical and unfeasible to work out or even to propose for the record any arrangement involving the admission of all applicants at the present time. Mr. Meade raised the question about the possibility mentioned in Jebb's letter of working out a limited arrangement for the admission of Italy and perhaps Ceylon in return for one Soviet candidate. I replied that this possibility had not crossed our minds but that offhand this seemed equally unfeasible. It was highly unlikely that the Soviets would agree to this but that even if they did, they could undoubtedly reserve the right to pick their own candidates and I could see no single one which we could possibly accept. Thus any limited "horse trade" of two for one instead of nine for five would in no way overcome the basic objections under Article 4 to the admission of the satellites.

Mr. Meade expressed considerable interest in our tentative ideas for increasing the participation of non-members, and I outlined our thinking on this subject along the lines indicated by Mr. Hickerson in our previous meeting. Emphasizing that this was not to be taken as representing final agreed policy but that we are continuing to explore the matter. In response to his question I indicated that before we made any such proposals in the GA we would, of course, want to consult extensively with them and with the French and would review the matter with the more important of the pending applicants themselves.

We agreed to keep in touch on this subject as the thinking develops both in the Department and in the UK Foreign Office.[3]

[3] No record of this meeting has been found in the Department of State files. A written notation at the end by Allen reads: "Meade asked specifically that we not bother to let USUN know of this for the present. He fears a slip with Jebb that would embarrass him. WPA."

Subject: Attached Paper on UN Membership and Participation of Non-Members in the General Assembly [1]

The attached paper represents the results of our discussions within UNP, and with Mr. Johnson and various others in UNA. Its main purpose is to develop the various alternative positions as to membership and non-member participation in the General Assembly, as a basis for determining our policy. Our preliminary conclusions are that the effort toward a broad solution of the membership problem ought, if possible, to be carried forward even if this involves no more this year than a general statement in favor of a total solution of the membership problem including Japan and other countries that have not yet applied, on the basis of the elimination of the veto. Our preliminary view, further, is that on balance the advantages to be derived from a general arrangement for participation by non-Members are probably not important enough to justify presentation of such a proposal by the U.S.; however, we think the U.S. should support such an arrangement if proposed by some other state. Our preference for putting emphasis on the membership question rather than on some scheme for participation for non-Members receives support from the new British interest in a membership deal, reported by Ward Allen in the attached Memorandum of Conversation.[2]

Since I assume you now wish to have the reactions of the geographic bureaus to these alternatives, I am giving copies of the paper to the membership team,[3] making clear that you wish to have the possibilities with primary responsibility for such matters (then the Office of Special Political Affairs) and the geographic offices; each of the geographic offices appointed representatives to the committee on a permanent basis, and the functional offices (such as the Bureau of Economic Affairs) as necessary. Although the primary function of "the membership team" was considered to be the formulation of policy on the working level regarding the admission of new members to the United Nations, often its focus was directed to questions concerning the U.S. position on elections to various United Nations offices and organs, so it met fairly regularly through the years. Nevertheless there is no systematic record of its meetings and minutes in the Department of State central indexed files.

SECRET [WASHINGTON, June 6, 1951.]

SUMMARY OF PAPER[1] ON UN MEMBERSHIP AND POSSIBLE ARRANGEMENTS FOR THE PARTICIPATION OF NON-MEMBER STATES IN THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

A. MEMBERSHIP

While it is not likely that the membership question will arise soon, it might be raised before the General Assembly through (a) applications from the Indo-Chinese States; (b) an application by Libya (if independence is hastened); or (c) possibly by discussions of the Japanese Peace Treaty. Alternative courses seem to be:

(1) Continuation of support for 9 non-Soviet applicants and of non-support for 5 Soviet applicants.

(2) Above, plus Charter amendment suggestion of last year or, alternatively, Rusk–Hickerson suggestion of clearing all applicants plus Libya, Spain, Associated States, Japan and Federal Republic of Germany through the Security Council, leaving the time of admission to the General Assembly.

(3) Soviet agreement on one or two applicants such as Italy and Austria is a remote possibility.

It is suggested (see topic B, page 15 of long paper) that if politically feasible at least some indication, however general, of support for alternative (2) above as a program be given later on this summer or in the General Assembly.

[1] The source text contains a notation that the "paper" of which this is a summary was dated May 21; see footnote 1, supra. The source text contains a further notation as to the "Summary" itself, saying "typed 6/5/51".

B. NON-MEMBER PARTICIPATION

The practical alternative approaches seem to be:

(1) An arrangement under which the General Assembly would by a separate decision grant to a non-member a broad and general privilege of participating in Committees. If this alternative is adopted, it would presumably be granted to only a few states—perhaps only to Italy—and in any case not to the satellites.
(2) An arrangement for much more limited participation which could be extended to all applicants, including five satellites, and to the non-applicants named under A (2) above.

The question of Italy's participation is likely to be raised in any case. For this reason, we think it would be desirable to discuss the subject with several other governments. However, the following considerations oppose our presenting as a U.S. proposal, a general plan along these lines:

(a) The plan would probably be discussed in the General Assembly as a major "constitutional" device that would raise many Charter and political questions; the results would not be adequate to make it worthwhile to champion the plan;
(b) For the U.S. to put forward either alternative above would raise difficulties:—a number of UN members would consider alternative (1) an anti-Soviet measure, while alternative (2) would not be desired by the non-communist states because it was too limited;
(c) The fact that representatives of non-member countries seeking to participate in the General Assembly would not be accorded the same privileges and immunities as representatives of members might be unfavorably commented upon. However, UNI does not now believe there would be serious risk of difficulty in granting visas to satellite representatives if the plan permitted their participation.

Accordingly, it is suggested that the Department at this stage take the position (provided that the geographic bureaus concur), that we would be able to support alternative (1) above if proposed by some other delegation with the idea that it would be extended to only Italy or others of the 9 non-Soviet applicants which definitely wish it, will ask for it, and will possibly accept some obligations toward the United Nations.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] June 12, 1951.

Subject: Italian Participation in the United Nations

Participants: Mr. Felice Catalano, Second Secretary, Italian Embassy
Mr. Allen—EUR

Mr. Catalano stated that he had still not received from his Government its definitive thinking as to tactics and position at the next General Assembly on the question of granting Italy the right to vote in the Trusteeship Council. However, the first reaction of his Government to his report of our previous conversation was a slight fear that the major powers might adopt too rigid an approach to the Charter and freeze its provisions by restrictive interpretation. Such an attitude on the part of the United Nations could be discouraging to the small members and might result in bringing about a paralysis in the Organization, which was one of the major difficulties of the League of Nations. In response to my question he indicated that this concern about a crystallization of the Charter applied to both interpretation of the present language and willingness to accept amendments.

In response I sought to assure him that the US approach to the Charter has and will continue to be based on the belief that its provisions should be as liberally and flexibly interpreted as possible in order to keep the UN a living, adaptable organization. Indeed, this was the first time I had heard the contrary concern expressed. I thought our attitude was well illustrated by our whole approach to the Uniting for Peace program which we sponsored at the last General Assembly and which was based on such a liberal interpretation of the Charter as to lead some other countries to criticize us for going too far in that direction. As to the matter of amendments, I assured him that we were approaching the problems of revision with the same flexible attitude, both on possible specific Charter amendments and on the problem of general revision which will be considered at the 1955 Conference under Article 109. Nevertheless, in proposing specific amendments it is, of course, necessary to keep in mind that under Article 108 any amendment must be ratified by all permanent members of the SC. Moreover, a flexible approach to the problem of interpretation must still operate within the framework of the clear language of the Charter itself.

As to the specific question of granting Italy a vote in the Trusteeship Council, I stated that we had studied the Charter provisions from every possible angle and were still unable to develop any reasonable theory or rationalization which would justify permitting Italy to have a vote until such time as she became a member of the United Nations. In this respect the language of the Charter is clear and unequivocal.

When Mr. Catalano continued to express the hope that some way might be found to give Italy a vote, I suggested that since we had reached a dead end in our consideration of the legal aspects of the problem it might be useful if the legal experts in the Italian Government who have no doubt been examining this question could indicate to us any plausible theory they might have developed on which to justify such action. We would welcome any ideas they might have and would of course give them serious consideration. Failing that, it seemed to us the question would necessarily have to be disposed of by the next GA by a frank admission that Italy could not be given a vote without Charter amendment and perhaps a reaffirmation of the conclusion that Italy was qualified for full membership.

In response to my question Mr. Catalano indicated that so far as he knew his Government still took the view that it did not desire to have the Assembly grant Italy greater general rights of participation in GA work without vote. I indicated that our thinking was still fluid on this matter and that although we were favorably inclined toward increased Italian participation short of voting, we would not wish to press it on behalf of Italy if the Italian Government itself opposed the idea.

Subject: Possible GA Action to Increase Participation of Non-Members.
Italian Vote in Trusteeship Council.

Participants: Mr. Gerald Meade, Counselor, British Embassy
Ward P. Allen—EUR

Since our current working level thinking on this problem had been previously outlined to Mr. Meade in a general way by both Mr. Hickerson and myself, Mr. Meade called to report the initial, informal reaction of the UN Department of the UK Foreign Office. He stated that they did not feel it would be wise at the next Assembly to propose action to give non-members greater participation. They thought it would look as though we were tinkering with the Charter again and thought it would provoke the Russians just as much as any other move in the membership field. Moreover, they doubted that the pending applicants themselves would like this type of "associate membership" and felt it should not be thrust upon them. I thanked Mr. Meade for these comments and stated that our thinking was still only in a tentative stage; that in our further consideration of the matter we would bear in mind this preliminary indication of probable UK views and would undoubtedly wish to consult with them further when our thinking had developed.

I mentioned in passing Italy's desire to be granted a vote in the Trusteeship Council, reviewing the situation which led up to the Resolution of the Trusteeship Council to place the matter before the GA. I stated that, sympathetic as we were to Italy's participation in the UN, we saw no way by which she could be granted a vote in the TC short of either full admission or Charter amendment. I added that there nevertheless might well be lengthy debate and impractical proposals on this matter at the next GA. Mr. Meade stated he was confident that the UK would feel as we do and indicated that he would suggest that his Government on any suitable occasions seek to persuade both the Italians and Latin American Delegations in the Assembly to play down the problem.

Participants: Mr. J. G. Boyd, First Secretary, British Embassy
Mr. Ward P. Allen, EUR

Following up a previous informal conversation with Mr. Meade of the British Embassy on this subject, Mr. Boyd called to report that since the British Foreign Office shares our view that there is no way to give Italy a vote in the Trusteeship Council under the Charter which would not be subject to the Soviet veto, they had already made this clear to the Italians and will continue to do so if the latter raise it again. They likewise feel that it would be pointless for the General Assembly to refer the question to the ICJ and will make that clear to the Italians if the latter should mention it. Mr. Boyd inquired whether in the light of our identity of views on this matter we still desired to have the subject remain on the tentative agenda for the forthcoming colonial talks. I indicated that it seemed desirable to retain the topic on the agenda, not with the thought of any extensive discussion but merely to provide opportunity to review the situation at that time in the light of any developments or any information then available as to proposals which other countries might be intending to put forward in the General Assembly. Mr. Boyd agreed.

2. Possible Special Provisions for Italian Participation in the United Nations.
3. Participation by Non-Members in the General Assembly.

[1] The following notation, presumably by Mr. Sandifer, appears on the source text: "Mr. Wainhouse: Here are papers for JDH". Reference is to Director of the Office of United Nations Political and Security Affairs Wainhouse and Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs John D. Hickerson.

I will also bring a draft of the telegram, embracing all three, which would be the basis for consultations of the delegation.[2]

These papers have not been cleared by the Membership Team. As to general membership policy, the discussions in the Team have shown a general feeling that this would not be a favorable year for any membership action. As to participation by non-Member states, all the members of the team except FE have no objection to discussing the question with other delegations. FE's objection is partly Miss Bacon's opposition to the measure in general and partly a feeling in FE that it would be undesirable to get into discussions which might involve Indo-China and Japan.[3] I believe that if the question were framed in such general terms that the question of Indo-China would not arise, FE would withdraw its objection. The paper on Italy has been discussed with UND and I will bring any further comments from them at the meeting.

General Membership Policy

MAIN ALTERNATIVE COURSES

(1) Favor reconsideration of applications this year and maintain present position supporting 9 non-Cominform applicants and opposing 5 Cominform applicants.

(2) Proposal of an amendment to Article 4 of the Charter which would (a) remove the veto from voting on membership applications and (b) place UN membership upon a universal basis (probably removing the qualifications of "peace loving" and "willing to carry out the obligations of the Charter").

(3) As another means of accomplishing the objectives of (2), proposal of a general arrangement in which all 14 applicants, plus Libya, Spain, Japan, the Associated States of Vietnam, Cambodia and Laos and the Federal Republic of Germany would be cleared through the SC at the outset and the GA would determine when to admit them to membership.

(4) Agreement to consider a single applicant, or a small number of applicants.

(5) Allow the membership question to remain dormant, without action.

[2] Not attached. UNA apparently decided to set forth the Department of State position in a memorandum from Hickerson to the United States Representative at the United Nations (Austin); see p. 330.

[3] The FE position was set forth in a memorandum by Miss Ruth Bacon, United Nations Adviser, Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs, July 9, not printed (320/7–951).

COMMENT

The present GA resolution on membership, adopted last year, merely requests the SC to keep the pending applications under consideration in accordance with the terms of previous resolutions; annual reconsideration is not necessary and did not, in fact, take place in 1950. Unless the SC considers applications, or proposals on membership are submitted, there will probably be no membership item on the GA agenda.

Alternatives 1 and 5. Our support for the 9 non-Cominform applicants and our opposition to the 5 Soviet applicants would necessarily remain unchanged this year unless a possibility of adopting alternative 2 or 3 should develop. In the absence of such a general arrangement, the question arises whether it would be desirable to reconsider the old applications. The probable result would be rejection of all through Soviet vetoes of non-Soviet candidates and majority rejection of Soviet candidates. However, the USSR might offer some general "deal" similar to that of 1949. While such a Soviet proposal might, according to circumstances, receive more support than before, we could probably defeat it without serious difficulty or serious propaganda disadvantage.

The disadvantages of reconsidering the old applications are that all will be rejected; that the propaganda advantage to us is small if it exists at all; and that it would tend to make a future solution slightly more difficult.

Alternative 2. This would be a step toward the adoption of workable membership provisions in the Charter, and to protect ourselves against charges that our policy does not even look toward the admission of states with differing systems. It might be resorted to in case pressure for admission of the satellites develops. Possible disadvantages are that (a) it might be confusing to American public opinion at the moment, and (b) that it would not meet with real enthusiasm in the UN.

Alternative 3. This would also achieve a total solution of the membership problem, involving far-reaching concessions by the USSR. If the Assembly is inclined toward attempts at East–West compromise on this matter, this proposal will not be popular. However, the proposal might be used in case a Soviet omnibus proposal received support.

The three above alternatives could be combined by stating that the U.S. position is alternative (1); that, however, the U.S. would be willing to give consideration to arrangements whereby the veto would be waived or removed from voting on membership applications and whereby all states (other than diminutive states) would be considered eligible for membership; and that these arrangements could be along the lines of either (2) or (3).

Alternative 4. While it seems unlikely that the admission of any states can be arranged with the USSR, the best possibility of this would appear to lie in a proposal, considered under the agenda item concerning the full participation of Italy in the Trusteeship Council, to admit Italy. This would at least offer the possibility of a new and limited approach to the problem this year. (See paper on special provisions concerning Italy.)

In discussions in the Membership Team there has been general agreement that present conditions are not favorable for any action in the membership field in general, and that the only practical possibilities lie in the fields covered by the other two papers. As to proposals for participation by non-members on the basis discussed, all members of the Membership Team except FE agree that there would be no objection to discussion of the matter with other governments. FE does not at present favor such discussions.

CONFIDENTIAL JULY 13, 1951.

POSSIBLE SPECIAL PROVISIONS FOR ITALIAN PARTICIPATION IN THE UNITED NATIONS

There follows a discussion of three possible steps for increasing Italy's participation in the United Nations, based on its trusteeship responsibilities. They might be proposed in the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly under the item submitted by the Trusteeship Council concerning Italy's full participation in that Council. These steps are as follows:

(a) Separate consideration of Italy's membership application, on the ground that in addition to possessing the full qualifications for admission, the discharge of its trusteeship responsibilities makes UN membership desirable.

(b) A proposal for an amendment of the Charter which would give Italy full voting rights in the Trusteeship Council.

(c) A proposal, on the same grounds, to grant to Italy a broad right of participation in the committees of the Assembly. These could be combined as indicated.

To take these steps, it would be desirable that the Fourth Committee place the item on Italy's full participation in the Trusteeship Council at the head of its agenda. Although some of these suggestions go beyond the province of the Fourth Committee, it would appear desirable to handle all of them in that Committee. All these proposals, along with others, might be submitted when the Committee begins consideration of the item from the Trusteeship Council on Italy's full participation in the work of that Council.

I. CONSIDERATION OF ITALY'S ADMISSION TO MEMBERSHIP AS A SPECIAL CASE

A proposal might be made that, as a means of giving Italy full participation in the Trusteeship Council, steps be taken at once in the Security Council and General Assembly to admit Italy to United Nations membership. It would be argued that, above and beyond the declarations of the General Assembly since 1947 that Italy is fully qualified for admission, the General Assembly has granted and Italy has accepted special United Nations responsibilities in connection with the operation of the trusteeship system. Italy is seriously handicapped in discharging these responsibilities if it does not have full voting participation in the Trusteeship Council, in the General Assembly, under whose general supervision the Trusteeship Council works and perhaps in other United Nations bodies. Obviously, the only completely satisfactory solution is admission to United Nations membership. The resolution would recommend that, as a special case, the application of Italy be reconsidered urgently by the Security Council.

Such a proposal would need to be considered early in the session, in order to precede a possible general membership item and in order that, if and when thwarted by a Soviet veto in the Security Council, other steps might be taken.

While Soviet agreement to Italy's admission would be most unlikely, this approach would be the most plausible basis for considering Italy's application as a special case. If the approach were adopted, it would be necessary to inform the other applicants in advance, making clear that their admission was not affected in any way.

If others move to reconsider all the old membership applications we would not object and the usual rejection of all applicants would take place. However, consideration of the other membership applications might be held to lie outside the scope of the present agenda item and thus take place either in a political committee or in a plenary meeting of the Assembly itself.

II. POSSIBLE CHARTER AMENDMENT TO GRANT ITALY FULL RIGHTS AS A MEMBER OF THE TRUSTEESHIP COUNCIL

Background

Late in February, 1951, the Trusteeship Council (the U.S. concurring) adopted a resolution (T/848) requesting the General Assembly "to include in the agenda of its Sixth Regular Session the question of the full participation of Italy in the work of the Trusteeship Council". Adoption of this resolution followed a Trusteeship Council decision to permit Italian participation, without vote, in Council deliberations relating to the trust territory of Somaliland and "on general questions relating to the operation of the International Trusteeship System". It seems clear that Italy could not obtain "full participation" in the Trusteeship Council, including the right to vote, except (a) as a result of admission to UN membership; or (b) through amendment of Article 86 of the Charter.

Technical Aspects

On purely technical and theoretical grounds, the procedure for amending Article 86 to achieve the end in view would be fairly simple. On taking up (presumably in Committee IV) the Trusteeship Council proposal, the General Assembly could move toward amendment of Article 86 by the method prescribed in the first, unnumbered paragraph of Article 108 of the Charter. Should the Assembly, by a vote of two-thirds of the Members, approve such an amendment it would remain for two-thirds of the Member governments, including all permanent members of the Security Council, to ratify before the amendment could come into force.

Actual amendment of Article 86 could be accomplished by a few changes in the article as it now stands. The first sentence of paragraph 1 could be revised to read: "The Trusteeship Council shall consist of the following states." ("states" being substituted for "Membership of the UN".) Sub-paragraph (a) of paragraph 1 could be changed to read "those states administering trust territories. . . ." ("states" being substituted for "Members".) Probably sub-paragraph (c) would also have to be revised to read: "as many other Members elected for three-year as may be necessary to ensure that the total number of members of the Trusteeship Council is equally divided between those states which administer trust territories and those which do not." (The phrase "Members of the United Nations" being replaced by "states".)

Other Considerations

It is, of course, far from clear that the Charter amendment method described above would hold greater promise of success than further efforts to obtain Italy's admission to UN. The USSR opposed the granting of trusteeship responsibility over former Italian Somaliland to Italy, and has repeatedly criticized Italy's administration since that time, despite the approving stand taken by the rest of the Trusteeship Council. Furthermore, the Soviets have repeatedly denounced Italy's participation in NATO and other important Italian government policies. It seems unlikely that the Soviets would ratify such a proposed Charter amendment, thus letting Italy partially in through the back door of the UN while they continue to keep the front door bolted.

However, the question of according Italy full rights in the Trusteeship Council will be on the Assembly agenda as a result of action taken by the Council where the U.S. supported the proposal. An effort to achieve that purpose (perhaps in conjunction with other steps to give Italy some status in the UN), even if unsuccessful, would be further needed evidence of our support of Italy and should further weaken Soviet stock and communist influence in Italy.

Admittedly a proposal for Charter amendment would be designed to deal with this particular problem. However, it is believed that the principle involved is a correct one, namely that there are states other than those which happen to be members of UN which have a very real part to play in important fields of UN activity, and that this fact should be recognized by appropriate organizational adjustment if membership cannot be obtained.

III. GRANT TO ITALY OF PRIVILEGE OF PARTICIPATING IN GENERAL ASSEMBLY COMMITTEES

A third step would be the grant of a privilege of participation in General Assembly committees on which all members are represented. This step might be taken in case the two steps described above meet with opposition or, preferably as an interim measure pending admission to membership. The resolution, described above, requesting Security Council reconsideration of Italy's application might well provide that, pending Italy's admission to membership, it would be granted a seat in each committee on which all members are represented, with the opportunity to speak and propose motions and resolutions, at least on substantive matters.

There would be some difficulty in basing this measure solely on Italy's trusteeship responsibilities. However, it could be argued that Italy's interests arising from its trusteeship functions ramify into the fields of various committees other than the Fourth. Especially, the work of specialized agencies and proposals in the economic and social fields affect trusteeship territories. Although the connection with the work of the political and budgetary committees would be more tenuous, an argument could also be made in those fields. The general position would be that Italy's interests and responsibilities as an administering power touch so many activities and discussions of the United Nations that the only way of providing adequately for Italy's participation in such activities and discussions is to grant a general privilege of participation.

While there would probably be objection to considering the non-trusteeship aspects of the resolution in that committee, it could be argued that all members are represented there and will be represented in the plenary meeting which would give final consideration to it. Any proposal for giving rights of participation to non-members generally would be referred to another committee.

This suggestion would be a means of giving limited application to the idea of granting participation in the General Assembly to non-Members. It might be more palatable to other members, such as the UK, than a proposal drawn up in general terms.

SECRET

Participation by Non-Members in the General Assembly

PROBLEM

Assuming that it will not be practicable this year to secure any arrangement to admit new members to the UN, what arrangements for participation by non-member States in the GA might the U.S. support?

Possible Alternative Arrangements

(1) The GA might adopt a resolution providing that, upon specific request therefor by a non-member State, the GA might grant the State a general privilege of participating without vote in committees on which all members are represented;

(a) Participation might include speaking under the same rules as members on any matter before the committee, and of making proposals on matters of substance but not of procedure.

(b) More limited participation might involve the presentation of views on the substance of each item when expressly permitted by the committee.

(2) The GA might adopt a general resolution authorizing the committees to grant participation in their proceedings by non-member States, leaving the exact scope of participation to be determined by the committee in each case.

(3) The GA might, under the item on Italy's full participation in the Trusteeship Council, grant to Italy the privilege set forth in (1) (a) above; if other non-member States subsequently requested the same privilege, the GA could decide on these requests (see separate paper on special provisions concerning Italy).

(4) As an alternative to any general arrangement the U.S. might, more liberally than heretofore, support in each committee the grant of participation in that committee to a non-member State in the discussion of particular matters in which the State was interested.

COMMENT

Agenda. Unless the SC considers membership applications, or a member requests inclusion of an item on membership or on participation of non-members, the only occasion for considering proposals in this field would be the item from the Trusteeship Council concerning the question of the full participation of Italy in that Council. In case we wish the general question of non-member participation considered, it would probably be desirable for some member to submit, before September 6, an item on membership or participation by non-members, for inclusion in the provisional agenda. Discussion of a proposal to permit participation by non-members would be likely to lead to consideration of membership applications.

Scope of Participation. It is unlikely that any lesser degree of participation than those mentioned above would be acceptable to non-member States. It has been suggested that, in order to avoid charges of setting up a substitute status to that of membership, the arrangement not involve participation in plenary meetings or the assumption of obligations by non-member States.

Non-Member States to Which Privilege Might be Granted. Any of the above alternatives might be granted to any of the nine non-Soviet applicants and, at some point, to the following countries that have not yet applied: Libya, Spain, the Associated States of Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia, Japan, and the Federal Republic of Germany. Special political problems would arise in the cases of the various non-applicants.

It would probably be impractical at present to support the grant of the above privileges to Soviet satellites. If we initiated discussion of possible arrangements for non-member participation, it would be necessary to make this clear, since this would be a point of primary interest to other members.

Accordingly, the only procedure that would now be acceptable would be one which provided for a separate decision in each case by the GA.

Italy—the outstanding candidate—has thus far indicated no desire for this privilege and has apparently regarded it as "second-class membership". However, no concrete proposal has been suggested to Italy and its attitude might depend on the circumstances in which the offer was made. If the privilege were granted to one state, such as Italy, other non-Soviet countries might request it. It is understood that FE has some concern lest even the discussion of an arrangement for non-member participation give emphasis, prematurely, to the problems of some countries within their area or add to the difficulties that now exist concerning their status. The privilege could be granted to Italy—and restricted, for the time being, to Italy—most easily if considered in connection with the item concerning Italy's full participation in the Trusteeship Council (see separate paper).

The general purpose of an arrangement of this kind for participation by non-members in the GA would be to take a step toward breaking the strangle hold of the USSR on the membership question.

Such a proposal—particularly if so drawn up as to be of general applicability—would arouse controversy. It would be taken as being a measure which, in itself, provides little advantage to non-members and, therefore, as being probably intended as merely the first step toward bringing non-members into much fuller participation in the UN.

If proposals for non-member participation are to be discussed, this might well be as part of the membership problem. Discussion might take place with several delegations from different areas, and subsequently with non-member governments. If an item is to be submitted, this should be before September 6.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] July 18, 1951.

Attached is a memorandum [1] to Ambassador Gross [2] for your signature on the membership question and related matters to serve as a basis for discussions with the UK, French and Canadian delegations.

You will recall that at Monday's meeting [3] we discussed alternative arrangements concerning Italy. At that time it was suggested that one of the alternatives, that which concerned an amendment to the Charter to give Italy membership in the Trusteeship Council, be expanded to give Italy voting rights in the General Assembly on questions affecting Somaliland and on general questions relating to the operation of the trusteeship system which have an effect on Italy's administration of Somaliland. Mr. Gerig at the time of the meeting thought that Italy might have requested such broad participation. However, inasmuch as the observations made by Italy on this matter referred only to her participation in the Trusteeship Council and also since the Trusteeship Council resolution included only the question of the full participation of Italy in the work of that Council, Mr. Gerig thought it would be preferable not to expand the alternative. We have consequently left it in its original form.

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson) to the United States Representative at the United Nations (Austin)[1]

SECRET WASHINGTON, July 18 [19?], 1951.

Subject: Membership Question and Related Matters

Before formulating our position on the membership question and related matters, we should like to have the views of certain other United Nations Members. In view of past exchanges of views on the membership issue with the UK, France and Canada, particularly in connection with the Foreign Ministers meeting in London in 1950, it is requested that you have preliminary discussions with their United Nations delegations concerning the possible approaches to these matters. We would wish that these discussions be kept strictly confidential and that, in particular, no other delegations, including Commonwealth delegations, be informed. There are outlined below various alternative courses of action for your use in such discussions. It should be made clear that the United States has not yet formulated its position on these alternatives. It is also important to avoid creating the impression that these are questions to which the United States attaches particular importance at this time. Rather, they should be regarded as long-standing problems which may arise at the Sixth Session of the General Assembly and which therefore merit consideration.

A. Membership Question

It has been the position of the United States, and generally that of the UK, France and Canada, to support the admission to membership of nine applicants (Austria, Ceylon, Finland, Ireland, Italy, Jordan, the Republic of Korea, Portugal, and Nepal) and to oppose the admission of five (Albania, Bulgaria, Hungary, Mongolian Peoples' Republic and Rumania). All fourteen applications have been rejected in the Security Council through Soviet vetoes of non-Soviet candidates and majority decisions against the Soviet candidates.

The present General Assembly resolution on membership, adopted last year, merely requests the Security Council to keep pending applications under consideration in accordance with the terms of previous resolutions. Annual reconsideration is not necessary and did not, in fact, take place in 1950. Thus the membership question could remain dormant, without any action being taken, or a proposal for reconsideration of applications this year might be submitted.

[1] The source text was attached to the Wainhouse memorandum, July 18, supra, and was dated July 18. Internal evidence based on documentation both in the Department of State and the United States Mission to the United Nations (USUN) files suggests that the letter was sent dated July 19.

There appear to be two other alternative courses:

1. To agree to consider a single applicant, or a small number of applicants (See Section C below on Special Provisions Concerning Italy).
2. To support a general arrangement in which all 14 applicants, plus Libya, Spain, Japan, the Associated States of Vietnam, Cambodia, and Laos, and the Federal Republic of Germany would be cleared through the Security Council at the outset and the General Assembly would determine when to admit them to membership. (For a form of this arrangement, see Department's telegram 281, September 16, 1950.)[2]

In the past the possibility of amending Article 4 of the Charter to eliminate the veto from Security Council voting on membership applications and to establish the principle of United Nations membership as being universal rather than selective has been suggested from time to time. In view of the confusion that such an amendment might raise in the minds of the American people in connection with the Chinese representation issue, this alternative would not be feasible at present.

B. Non-Member Participation in the General Assembly

You will recall that at the Fifth Session, El Salvador submitted a proposal to permit the nine vetoed applicants to participate in General Assembly proceedings. On the assumption that it will not be practicable this year to admit new Members to the United Nations, the question would arise whether some arrangement for participation by non-Member States in the General Assembly would be desirable.

Possible alternative arrangements for participation by non-Members in the General Assembly might include the following:

(1) The General Assembly might adopt a resolution providing that, upon specific request therefor by a non-Member State, the General Assembly would decide whether to grant the State a general privilege of participating without vote in main committees of the Assembly. This participation might for example, include speaking under the same rules as Members on any matter before the committees and of making proposals on matters of substance but not of procedure.

(2) The General Assembly might, under the item on Italy's full participation in the Trusteeship Council, grant the privilege to Italy in the first instance; if other non-Member States subsequently requested the same privilege, the General Assembly could decide on those requests (see Section C below on Special Provisions Concerning Italy).

(3) As an alternative to any general arrangement, the General Assembly committees might, more liberally than heretofore, grant participation in their proceedings to non-Member States in the discussion of particular matters in which such States are interested.

Arrangements for non-Member participation would not, of course, be considered as a substitute for admission to membership. Moreover, such arrangements would be useless unless desired by qualified non-Member States. Italy has thus far indicated no desire for the privilege of participation in the General Assembly without full membership rights. The attitude of non-Members might, however, depend upon the circumstances in which the proposal was made. Questions might also be raised as to consistency with the Charter and as to whether or not the arrangement could be extended to the satellite countries.

[2] Not printed.

C. Special Provisions Concerning Italy

For a variety of reasons, including in particular its trusteeship responsibilities, Italy would appear to have a claim to special consideration. Three possible steps, outlined below, for increasing Italy's participation in the United Nations might be considered by the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly under the item submitted by the Trusteeship Council requesting the General Assembly "to include in the agenda of the Sixth Regular Session the question of the full participation of Italy in the work of the Trusteeship Council."

(1) A General Assembly recommendation that the Security Council reconsider Italy's application as a special case during the session on the special ground that the only satisfactory way to remove Italy's handicap in discharging its trusteeship responsibilities is to have full voting participation in the United Nations.

(2) A proposal for an amendment to Article 86 of the Charter to give Italy membership in the Trusteeship Council. The first sentence of paragraph 1 could be revised to read: "The Trusteeship Council shall consist of the following States." ("States" being substituted for "Members of the United Nations".) Subparagraph (a) of paragraph 1 could be changed to read "those States administering trust territories. . . ." ("States" being substituted for "Members".) Probably subparagraph (c) would also have to be revised to read: "as many other Members elected for three-year terms by the General Assembly as may be necessary to ensure that the total number of members of the Trusteeship Council is equally divided between those states which administer trust territories and those which do not." (The phrase "Members of the United States" being replaced by "States".)

(3) As an interim measure pending admission to membership, an invitation to Italy to participate without vote in main General Assembly Committees.

223. Re membership. Bearing in mind Hickerson's ltr July 19 to me and Ital feeling manifested with insistence recently that US is letting Italy down by not finding way around Sov veto so that she can become member, we are inclined to think there wld be advantage in US, as SC pres, bringing membership question up this month. If nothing else resulted action wld at least show Itals our desire help them. GA res of Dec 4, 1950 and fact SC is seized of item wld be adequate grounds for this action. GA recommendations referred to in ref res cover only countries we wish admitted. We wld contemplate SC consideration of all these applications since it wld be practically out of the question to try to put Italy up alone (UK has commitments to Ceylon, etc.). If USSR presents usual omnibus counter res adding satellites, and result is failure of Sov res to obtain majority and veto by Sov of individual application of our friends, no harm is done and at least we have made gesture to Itals.

Gen Crittenberger [1] recently in Italy reports widespread sensitiveness there to failure Italy be admitted to UN, with tendency to criticize US for not bringing its influence sufficiently to bear to bring about admission.[2] Gov Lodge of Connecticut reported in press this morning to have confirmed Ital interest in admission to UN.

We shld appreciate Dept's views soonest in order work out our SC schedule for rest of month.

CONFIDENTIAL [NEW YORK,] August 17, 1951.

Subject: Membership

Mr. Hickerson telephoned me this morning (Friday) to say that he had noted in the Mission's summary report a statement by Jebb (to Hyde [2]) to the effect that Italy had no better claim than Ceylon to membership in the United Nations. Hickerson then went on to express the Department's view that Italy was in a very special position; that it was felt the United States should probably take the initiative to bring up in the Security Council sometime before the General Assembly the question of Italy's admission, although this would not have to be done necessarily this month.

Mr. Hickerson also said that the Department view at the moment is that the United States should support strongly an initiative that might be taken by the Latin American countries looking toward an amendment of the Charter which would give Italy voting rights in the General Assembly on the ground that Italy is the Administrator of Somaliland, a trust territory.

I told Hickerson that our telegram (USUN 223, August 14) remained cancelled and I summarized for him briefly our discussion of this matter on Wednesday, and suggested that we should put the item on our agenda for Mr. Hickerson when he visits us next week.

Mr. Hickerson agreed to this and, referring to his memorandum of the middle of July,[3] said that the Department wanted us to circulate more widely on the membership question and report to the Department as soon as possible with our views and recommendations.

In view of the explicit nature of our instructions limiting our discussions to the British, French and Canadians, Mr. Hyde has been in touch with Mr. Popper[4] and we should be receiving a telegram of further instruction.

Subject: Greek Candidacy for Security Council and Membership Question

You may wish to take up the following points, particularly the first, in your conversations with USUN.[1]

1. Greek Candidacy

On July 20, we sent a cable to USUN which stated that the Department did not favor the election of a satellite to the Eastern European seat now held by Yugoslavia. We also stated that the Department presently favored the election of Greece provided it could obtain sufficient support from other Members. We requested that the Mission, without indicating a firm US position, ascertain the views of the UK, France, Canada, Brazil and the Philippines on the Greek candidacy. The Mission has now reported the views of the UK in favor of a satellite. We believe that the Mission should state to the British that we are opposed to a Soviet satellite but are still examining the question of the Greek candidacy. Furthermore, in order to stave off a movement for a satellite, the Mission should talk to the other delegations mentioned in the telegram as soon as possible.

[1] Hickerson was in New York on August 22. In a "chit" dated September 10, he informed Wainhouse that he had discussed the subjects herein with Ambassador Austin, Ambassador Gross, and the Deputy United States Representative on the Security Council (Ross), "along the lines set forth." The "chit" was attached to this memorandum.

2. Membership

Your memorandum to Ambassador Austin, dated July 19, 1951, a copy of which is attached, requested that USUN have preliminary consultations with the UK, France and Canada concerning possible approaches to the membership question and related matters. The Mission has reported to the Department the views of Jebb; we understand that Lacoste asked that the question be reserved for later discussion. To our knowledge, the Mission has had no discussion with the Canadians on the matter. We are therefore uncertain whether we have received the definitive views of any of the Governments with which we wished to consult. If Jebb's statements do reflect his Government's considered position, we have in any case yet to hear from Canada and France. Before further steps are taken, the Mission should complete its discussions with the French and Canadian delegations and give the Department a complete report.

The Italian Prime Minister (De Gasperi) to the Secretary of State [1]

AIDE-MÉMOIRE

The Italian Government have always been of opinion that the steps they have undertaken with a view to redressing the international position of the country, when and where it was possible and proper to do so, so as to eliminate the discriminations embodied in a peace treaty which was imposed under political circumstances that no longer prevail, should strive to achieve the three following major aims:

1—A declaration whereby it should be recognized that the Preamble of the Treaty does not take into account the role played by the Italian people and the Italian Government in overthrowing Fascism and in taking part in the struggle against the common foe.

2—The removal of the present limitations to Italian armaments and production of war material. These limitations are inconsistent with the position of the country as a party to the North Atlantic Treaty and bound, as such, to the obligations deriving therefrom.

3—The admission of Italy to the United Nations in accordance with the pledge undertaken by the signatories of the Treaty of Peace.

The three points listed above relate to three different aspects of one problem. It is only by realising these three aspirations as a whole that the Italian Government feel they will have interpreted the deep and unanimous desire of the Italian people.

It is useless to recall at this point that the admission of Italy to the United Nations, as well as the admission of numerous other democratic countries, has been blocked so far by the Soviet veto.

Though there is nothing that would give the Italian Government a greater satisfaction than the simultaneous admission to the United Nations of all the democratic countries which have been so far unjustly excluded from it, they feel however that, from a technical standpoint, Italy's position is different from that of other countries.

The General Assembly, up to now, have shown a tendency to accept an interpretation of Article 4 of the Charter in the sense that a recommendation of the Council is an indispensable requirement for the admission of new members. This interpretation of article 4, whatever one may think of a text which is far from clear, was confirmed by an advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice of the Hague, rendered on the 3rd of March 1950. It should be borne in mind, however, that, as generally admitted, a negative vote can be justified only when specifically and exclusively based on the absence of the conditions set forth in article 4. Any other reason would be invalid. This interpretation has been confirmed by the International Court of Justice of the Hague on the 28th of May 1948.

As far as the Italian position is concerned, the Soviet Delegate has repeatedly admitted that Italy had a right to be a member of the United Nations. While he never said this of any of the other countries, in the case of a number of candidates he stated that, in his opinion, they did not meet the conditions required by article 4. Therefore the veto of the Soviet Delegate is, at least in the case of Italy's admission, null and void. It thus justifies an action on the part of the Assembly.

The precedents of the question, its juridical aspects and a plan to bring about Italy's admission to the United Nations are detailed in the enclosed memorandum.

[Enclosure]

MEMORANDUM ON THE ADMISSION OF ITALY TO THE UNITED NATIONS

The constant opposition of the USSR from 1947 up to the present day within the Security Council has barred Italy's entrance to the United Nations. The reasons they have advanced to justify their attitude were never based on the established non-existence of the three fundamental conditions indicated by article 4 of the Charter, but on political grounds. The Soviet Delegation have in effect conditioned their consent to the admission of Italy and of the other seven non Communist candidates (Finland, Austria, Ireland, Portugal, Jordan, Ceylon and Nepal) on the simultaneous admission of the five communist candidates (Albania, Bulgaria, External Mongolia, Roumania and Hungary).

The Italian case presents itself in a different light from that of other countries. In comparing them, one has to bear in mind the two following main factors: the first is the Soviet veto, and this is common to all states which have so far been excluded from the United Nations; the other is the explanation of the veto and this is peculiar to the Italian case. While according to the current interpretation (confirmed by an advisory opinion of the International Court of the Hague of the 3rd of March 1950) the admission of a new member is subject to the recommendation of the Security Council in conformity with the rules that govern the voting of that body (that is, a majority of seven votes including the concurring votes of the five permanent members), there exists another equally authentic interpretation (also confirmed by a consultative opinion rendered by the same International Court on the 28th of May 1948), namely that a veto can be justified only by the lack of one of the specific conditions indicated in article 4 of the Charter. The opinion of the International Court reads as follows:

"A member of the United Nations which is called upon, in virtue of article 4 of the Charter, to pronounce itself by its vote either in the Security Council or in the General Assembly on the admission of a state to membership in the U.N., is not juridically entitled to make its consent to the admission dependent on conditions not expressly provided by paragraph 1 of the said article."

It further affirms:

"A member of the Organization cannot, while it recognizes the conditions set forth in that provision to be fulfilled by the state concerned, subject its affirmative vote to the additional condition that other states be admitted to membership in the U.N. together with that state."

The Italian position differs from the position of the seven other non Communist candidates in that the Soviet Delegation has either never expressed an opinion about them or has expressed an unfavourable one in regard to the conditions listed in article 4. Whereas, in Italy's case, the Soviet Delegation never contended the (sic) she lacked those conditions to enter the United Nations. On the contrary, the Delegation has repeatedly declared that the Soviet Government was, on principle, favourable to Italy's admission.

During the meeting of the 29th of September 1947 the Soviet Delegate to the Security Council, Mr. Gromyko, declared:

"The Italian people and the Italian Government must know that the USSR supports Italy's request for admission into the U.N. However, my Delegation considers that a favourable decision on the Italian application can be taken only simultaneously with favourable decisions in regard to the application of Bulgaria, Finland, Hungary and Roumania."

The same Mr. Gromyko, in the meeting of the 10th of April 1948 of the Security Council said:

"Undoubtedly the Italians already know the attitude of the USSR towards the question of the admission of Italy to the United Nations. This attitude has been defined several times in the past during the consideration of Italy's application. I consider it essential, however, to state that the Government of the USSR is in favour of the admission of Italy to the United Nations, but that my Government cannot agree that the admission of Italy should be realized to the detriment of the legitimate rights of several other states which are on exactly the same footing as Italy."

Lastly, the Soviet Delegate to the Trusteeship Council, Mr. Soldatov, in the meeting that said organ held on the 23rd of February 1951, and during which it discussed Italy's participation to the Council, declared:

"The United Kingdom Representative was incorrect in attributing the fact that Italy have not been admitted to the United Nations to the USSR veto. . . . This was in no way to be attributed to the USSR, but rather to the Anglo-American Bloc."

The situation afore described should be the basis of an action by the Assembly in the aim of solving the problem of the admission of Italy to the United Nations. The plan could be as follows:

The General Assembly notes that Italy, by unanimous recognition of the five permanent members of the Security Council meets all the requirements specified in Article 4 of the Charter; the same Assembly notes that the Soviet Delegation, by opposing Italy's admission, has violated the rules of the Charter and has not taken into consideration the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice of the Hague of the 28th of May 1948; the same Assembly, being the highest sovereign and deliberative organ of the Organization and being the guardian of the Charter and of the principles of the United Nations, cannot admit that this protracted violation of the rules of the Charter by the USSR in a field of capital and constitutional importance for the Organization (such as the admission of new members) should render inoperative one of the essential principles of the Charter, namely that the Organization should be open to all states possessing the prescribed conditions; the same Assembly, in order to remedy the situation and to bring to an end the violation, by the USSR, of the statutory rules, decides to consider the application of Italy in a plenary meeting with the object of deciding it by a two-third majority vote.

Obviously this action implies the existence, on the part of the three powers, of a political will to surmount the stalemate caused by the Soviet attitude. Indeed such a determination would constitute the primary condition for the success of the plan. That this plan should be feasible, provided the presence of the above condition, is proved by a series of cases that present strong analogies with Italy's case and in which the Soviet veto was circumvented (enclosure A).

From what has been said, it is clear that the two necessary conditions in order to get around the veto have been: on one side the existence of a firm alignment of nations in favour of a free but logical and constructive interpretation of the Charter and, on the other, the clearly established illegal and continued failure of the Security Council in discharging its responsibilities because of the Soviet sabotage.

The second of these elements is obviously present in the case of Italy's admission. The first one certainly exists in a potential stage. It could be reenforced and further extended through the action of Italy's friends in the UN.

Annex A

Previous Circumventions of the Veto

A) Reelection of the Secretary General—As it is well known, according to article 97 of the Charter, the Secretary General has to be elected by the General Assembly upon a recommendation of the Security Council. This election, therefore, follows a very similar procedure to the one provided for the admission of new members to the U.N. This is made quite clear by the following resolution adopted by the General Assembly during its first session:

". . . From the provisions of articles 18 and 27 of the Charter, it is clear that, for the nomination of the Secretary General by the Security Council, an affirmative vote of seven members, including the concurring votes of the permanent members, is required; and that for his appointment by the General Assembly, a simple majority of the members of that body present and voting is sufficient, unless the General Assembly itself decides that a two-third majority is called for. The same rules apply to a renewal of appointment as to an original appointment; this should be made clear when the original appointment is made. . . ."

Notwithstanding the very clear wording of the article of the Charter and the authentic interpretation given to it by the Assembly, this body, being confronted, on the 2nd of November 1950, by a report of the Security Council in which it was stated that the Council had been unable to agree on any name, adopted a resolution by which it reelected for another three years (that is, for a shorter period of time than the one envisaged by the Charter), Mr. Trygve Lie on whose name the Council was unable to agree.[2] It is true that in this case it was a matter of confirming the same person or of extending his term of office. Nevertheless the wording of the proviso of the Charter was clear; it was also identical to the one followed for the admission of new members to the United Nations. It was necessary to make recourse to a liberal interpretation of the Charter. In the case of Italy's admission nothing else than this would be necessary.

B) United action for peace (Acheson Plan)—During last November the General Assembly adopted a resolution (United action for peace) whereby certain functions with regard to the maintenance of peace and international security which the Charter assigns to the Security Council were transferred to the General Assembly.[3] The resolution provides that, should the Security Council fail to discharge its functions, the Plenary Assembly can be convened in extraordinary session upon request of any seven members of the Security Council or of a simple majority of the General Assembly or of the Interim Committee in order to investigate a threat to international peace or an act of aggression, and recognizes to the same Assembly the power of recommending to its members the adoption of collective measures. The communist delegations, who also on this occasion upheld the rigid interpretation of the letter of the Charter, argued that paragraph 2 of article 11 ruled out the possibility of attributing these powers to the General Assembly in so far as said paragraph reads:

"The General Assembly may discuss any questions relating to the maintenance of international peace and security . . . but any such question on which action is necessary shall be referred to the Security Council by the General Assembly either before or after discussion."

The United Kingdom's delegate, in defending the resolution, pointed out that the General Assembly, in accordance with Article 10 of the Charter ("the General Assembly may discuss any questions or any matters within the scope of the present Charter . . ."), has an unlimited power to examine, discuss and make recommendations on all subjects, and affirmed that if the Security Council was not carrying out the functions it is entrusted with in a primary but not exclusive way by article 24 ("the members of the U.N. confer on the Security Council primary responsibility for the maintenance . . ."), the limitation provided for by article 11 paragraph 2 to the powers of the General Assembly should not be applied.

The resolution "United action for peace" has been approved by the General Assembly against the sole opposition of the five communist Delegations.

[3] For documentation regarding this subject, see ibid., pp. 303 ff.

C) Sanctions against China—Similar discussions took place during the month of May on the occasion of the approval by the General Assembly of collective sanctions against communist China and North Korea.[4] This matter also, insofar as it entails action, should have been referred to the Security Council in strict accordance to article 11 paragraph 2 of the Charter.

D) The meaning of abstention or of absence of a permanent member of the Security Council—Again in order to circumvent the veto, the Security Council has followed the praxis of considering the abstention from voting of a permanent member or the absence of the same from the Security Council as insufficient for blocking a decision or a recommendation of the Council; this certainly represents a free interpretation of article 27, which, in paragraph 3, provides that all decisions not having a procedural character, should be made "by a affirmative vote of seven members including the concurring votes of the permanent members."

359. Re Amb Belaunde[1] (Peru) views. Admission of Italy. Belaunde called this morning with the fol idea concerning admission of Italy to the UN which he said he had discussed ten days ago in Lima with the Italian Amb to Peru and yesterday with Trygve Lie and Kerno.

1. The GA on its initiative would advise the SC to revise its rules in order to allow candidates for membership to present proof of their qualifications under Art 4 of the Charter.
2. Such proof of Italy's qualifications would be studied and reported on by a comite or commission appointed by the SC for the purpose.
3. If there were any objection to the report of this comite (threat of Soviet veto) the GA would request the court for an advisory opinion regarding the value of the proof offered and the value of the report.
4. Assuming a favorable opinion by the court, the SC would have to apply strictly the sense of Art 4. The matter would not be vetoable because the Charter leaves no option or choice.

In developing this approach with considerable fervor, Belaunde emphasized strongly the word "judgment" as used in Art 4 which made question a "judicial" one.

We agreed with Belaunde that his suggestion was ingenious and interesting and that we would study it carefully.

366. Re Italian Membership. Guidotti called on Ross and me this afternoon to leave with us copies of aide-mémoire and memorandum concerning admission of Italy to UN which De Gasperi gave to SecState at Ottawa. In our discussion of this matter Guidotti stressed the Italian hope that other peace-loving (non-Cominform) applicants might be admitted. With regard to Belaunde's program, Belaunde had called on Guidotti yesterday after seeing us. We gathered that Guidotti was somewhat cool towards Belaunde's idea, largely because it would involve seeking a further opinion from the court.

I pointed out to Guidotti that in effect the Italian suggestion, which as Guidotti put it would declare the Soviet veto of Italy's application to be null and void, would have the effect of declaring null and void the decision of the Pres of the SC.

I told Guidotti that we would, of course, study very carefully the Italian suggestions.

Memorandum of Comment on the Italian Government Memorandum on the Admission of Italy to the United Nations, by Mr. Paul B. Taylor of the Office of United Nations Political and Security Affairs [1]

[WASHINGTON, undated.]

The Charter difficulties of the Italian suggestion may be summarized as follows:

1. In its 1948 opinion the International Court of Justice interpreted Article 4 of the Charter as setting forth exhaustively the conditions for admission of a state to membership. In essence, the opinion rejected the Soviet contention that Article 4 provides that a Member State may properly oppose an applicant state for any reason whatever, whether or not such reasons are connected with the criteria set forth in Article 4. The Court expressly stated that the General Assembly's request did not involve a judgment on the real reasons which may have entered into a Member's vote (confining itself merely to statements made by Members) and expressly disclaimed an intention to decide whether or not the particular statements made by the USSR in individual instances did or did not lie within the terms of Article 4. It confined itself to the precise, abstract and general question concerning the meaning of Article 4.

2. Working from this, the Italian aide-mémoire states that the Soviet vetoes were given on grounds lying outside Article 4 (with which we agreed); working from this it is suggested that the Soviet vetoes of Italy's application are therefore null and void and that, accordingly, the GA can disregard them and vote to admit Italy to membership.

3. Two difficulties arise from the above. In the first place, the Italian suggestion would treat any deviation from the terms of Article 4 on the part of any Member not casting its vote as rendering the vote ineffective rather than merely improper or wrongful. It has certainly been universally assumed that such a vote, however wrongful, would still be effective and if it were the vote of a Permanent Member would in matters of substance thwart action by the Council. Whether it would ever be possible to subject the actual vote of a Member to judicial or political scrutiny as to its reasons and on that basis to conclude whether or not the vote was effective is a large and serious question which has not been approached at all in this discussion. My own belief is that no such inquiry can be made nor is it known to any parliamentary system. Obviously, if this can be done we have opened the door to a re-hash of earlier votes not only in the GA but in the SC and not only of membership but on many other matters which might be of the gravest consequence. Specifically as applied to the veto, such a step goes far beyond the position which we have taken in agreeing to a procedure in the SC whereby, a vote on a ruling by the President or the Council may be a procedural vote to determine the character of a preceding decision.

The second essential difficulty with the above suggestion concerns who shall make the determination that a given vote is ineffective because cast for improper reasons. The Italian suggestion would have the GA do this. However at this point, one collides with the second membership opinion of the ICJ, which ends with the statement that "it is impossible to admit that the GA has the power to attribute to a vote of the SC the character of a recommendation when the Council itself considers that no such recommendation has been made." It is indisputable that the GA cannot admit a state to membership in the absence of a favorable recommendation by the SC. The Italian suggestion would be to disregard the Soviet veto and thus have the GA conclude that the SC had rendered a favorable recommendation. This is precisely what the GA says the Court cannot do. A quite different question might be whether the SC could in any given circumstance—and by what procedure—declare that a vote cast in its deliberations was illegal and hence without effect.

Memorandum by Mr. Paul B. Taylor of the Office of United Nations Political and Security Affairs to the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] September 24, 1951.

Subject: Briefing Secretary on Membership for his Conversation with De Gasperi [1]

EUR asked me yesterday (Sunday) to inform you that the briefing of the Secretary for his talks with De Gasperi will begin at 10:00 this morning. The subjects to be covered are, a review of the world situation, Italian treaty revision, Trieste and Italian membership in the United Nations. Mr. Perkins [2] asked you to do the briefing on the membership item and to be present for the rest of the briefing.

De Gasperi at Ottawa handed the Secretary an Aide-Mémoire [3] which is attached. The Aide-Mémoire argues that if the three Western Powers really desire Italy's admission they can accomplish it through a liberal interpretation of the Charter. Since the Soviet vetoes of Italy's application are illegal, they are in Italy's view null and void and the GA should simply vote Italy into membership. The attached briefing paper [4] embodies the position agreed upon with Mr. Sandifer on Saturday. We believe it is necessary not to leave De Gasperi to think we will sponsor such a proposal, since the precedents against it in the membership field are so strong. You are familiar with the other recommendations in the paper.

ADMISSION OF ITALY INTO UN

PROBLEM

The Italian Prime Minister would like to know the intentions of the United States concerning the question of Italy's admission into the United Nations.

UNITED STATES OBJECTIVE

That Italy be admitted into the United Nations as soon as possible.

PROBABLE POSITION OF THE ITALIANS

The Italian Government and people are extremely anxious that Italy become a Member of the United Nations. In a number of instances Italian representatives have pressed us on this question, and have indicated their belief that some way could be found to interpret the Charter so as to make Italy's admission possible despite the Soviet veto in the Security Council. In an Aide-Mémoire handed to the Secretary by the Italian Prime Minister at Ottawa, the Italian Government argues that, since the Soviet Union has never questioned Italy's qualifications for membership, its vetoes of Security Council recommendations to admit Italy are null and void; and that the General Assembly should therefore disregard the Soviet vetoes and consider action to admit Italy to membership. In support of the suggestion, the Aide-Mémoire mentions the Uniting for Peace Resolution and the action of the General Assembly in November, 1950 in continuing Secretary General Lie in office as illustrations of how the veto has been circumvented through "liberal interpretation" of the Charter.

Short of membership, the Italians may desire that efforts be made to give Italy, as Administering Authority for the former Italian Somaliland, a vote in the Trusteeship Council. Italy now sits with the Trusteeship Council and participates without voting rights in all relevant work. The question of the full participation of Italy in the Council will arise at the next General Assembly session.

POSITION TO BE PRESENTED

1. The United States has consistently and strongly supported the admission of Italy to the United Nations and will continue to do so. Our efforts, however, have always been blocked by the veto of the Soviet Union.

2. The suggestion in the Italian Aide-Mémoire is at variance with our understanding of the pertinent provisions of the United Nations Charter and we see basic difficulties in putting it into effect. However, we will study the Aide-Mémoire carefully and consult further with Italy and other interested countries, exploring all possible courses of action by which Italy's admission might be achieved.

3. We would be prepared to propose reconsideration of Italy's application by the Security Council provided this was felt to be a practicable step. We are consulting with other Governments on the advisability of such a proposal, notwithstanding the strong possibility that the reconsideration at this time would involve reconsideration of all the 14 pending applications, including the five Cominform applications (Albania, Bulgaria, Hungary, Mongolian People's Republic and Rumania), and result in the usual Soviet vetoes.

4. The United States could not accept any Soviet omnibus proposal under which, in return for the admission of the qualified applicants, we would vote for the Cominform applicants despite our strong objections to their admission based on the Charter.

5. As long as Italy is not a Member of the United Nations, the only legal way of granting Italy a vote in the Trusteeship Council would be to amend Article 86 of the Charter. The United States would be prepared to vote for an amendment giving Italy full voting rights in the Trusteeship Council if desired by the Italians. However, such an amendment seems to us impractical and unsatisfactory from the Italian point of view since the amendment process is cumbersome and is subject to the same disability as Italy's admission because the amendment could not come into effect unless ratified by the Soviet Union.

6. There has also been some discussion of more limited arrangements such as participation by Italy without vote in the main committees of the General Assembly. We would favor such a move if Italy desired it. However, we have been given to understand that Italy is not interested in any such arrangement.

COMMENT

The Aide-Mémoire handed by the Italian Prime Minister to the Secretary is a further indication that Italy's interest lies only in admission to membership and not in some form of participation short of membership.

We see Charter difficulties in the suggestion contained in the Aide-Mémoire that the General Assembly proceed to act on Italy's application despite the Soviet veto in the Security Council, difficulties which have led us to refrain from proposing anything along the lines suggested. In an advisory opinion rendered on March 3, 1950, the International Court of Justice concluded that under the Charter the General Assembly cannot admit a state to membership when the Security Council has made no recommendation for admission either because of the failure of a candidate to obtain the required majority or because of a veto of a permanent member. We agree with the Italians that the Soviet vetoes of Italy's application have not been proper since they have not been based on Charter grounds. However, it does not follow (and despite a citation in the Aide-Mémoire to an earlier opinion of the International Court of Justice, the Court has never suggested) that an improper exercise of the veto right is, because of its impropriety, null and void as is argued in the Aide-Mémoire. Moreover, even if the Italian thesis were accepted, the Soviet Union could easily thwart the procedure suggested merely by raising the question of Italian membership in the Security Council, casting its veto, and this time offering "Charter" grounds as the reason.

The continuation in office of the Secretary General and the Uniting for Peace Resolution are not, in our opinion, analogous to the action suggested. In the first resolution, the General Assembly merely extended the term of Secretary General Lie and did not appoint him; a recommendation of the Security Council being necessary for an appointment but not for an extension of term. In the Uniting for Peace Resolution, the Assembly simply exerted its own powers in the field of the maintenance of international peace and security. Under the Charter, the Assembly can in proper circumstances make recommendations in this field independently even though the Charter gives primary responsibility in this regard to the Security Council.

ADMISSION OF ITALY INTO UNITED NATIONS

AMBASSADOR ZOPPI [2] recalled that the Prime Minister had submitted an Aide-Mémoire to the Secretary at Ottawa on the admission of Italy

[1] Lists of persons present at this and other conversations and other subjects discussed are included in documentation in volume IV. There were 9 Department of State officers present in support of the Secretary of State including the Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs (Perkins), the Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs (Barrett), the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson), and James C. Dunn, U.S. Ambassador to Italy.

into the United Nations and he asked that the United States give favorable consideration to the proposals set forth in the Aide-Mémoire. THE SECRETARY said that the United States is studying the matter and will continue to do so. However, we have grave doubts about the Italian proposals. The World Court has said that an application for membership in the United Nations cannot be voted upon by the General Assembly unless all permanent members of the Security Council have voted in the affirmative on the application. The World Court has also said that a permanent member should not veto an application for membership on extraneous grounds. If the Italian application for membership were to be reconsidered by the Security Council and the Soviet Union, without explaining its position, simply cast a negative vote, it would not have done anything contrary to the opinion of the World Court. However, if the Soviet Union explains the reason for its veto, this would be a different situation, and the Soviet government might be in trouble. THE SECRETARY reiterated that the United States would continue to study the problem. MR. HICKERSON said that after further consideration of the Aide-Mémoire the Department would discuss it with the Italian representatives in Washington and New York, and with other friendly governments. He emphasized that the United States would do everything in its power to secure membership for Italy in the United Nations. He cautioned against expecting too much along the lines of the suggestions set forth in the Aide-Mémoire. He pointed out that Italy is in a unique position since it is the only nation whose application for membership in the United Nations has been vetoed four times and is also in a unique position since Italy, as trust administrator in Somaliland is the only non-member administering authority. THE PRIME MINISTER said that so long as Italy is not in the UN, there is an additional moral restriction upon Italy. The counterbalance to the signature of the Peace Treaty was to have been Italy's admission to the UN. The three-power Declaration on the Peace Treaty [3] is desirable and necessary, but is not sufficient in itself to correct the moral position. THE SECRETARY said that he thought this problem would be alleviated by the support of the great majority of the nations of the world for the action to be taken on the Treaty.

Editorial Note

In a tripartite declaration issued by the United States, the United Kingdom, and France on September 26, indicating their desire for the removal of certain restrictions from the Italian Peace Treaty, the three governments noted, inter alia, that a majority of the United Nations General Assembly had three times voted in favor of admission of Italy to the United Nations but that Italy was "still prevented by an unjustifiable veto from obtaining membership in the United Nations in spite of the provisions of the treaty and the Charter. . . . Each of the three governments hereby reaffirms its determination to make every effort to secure Italy's membership in the United Nations." For text of the declaration, see Department of State Bulletin, October 8, 1951, page 570.

In the meantime, at New York, in a letter dated September 24, Peru submitted a request to the Secretary-General of the United Nations for the inclusion of an additional item in the agenda of the forthcoming session of the General Assembly: "Admission of new Members; right of candidate States to present proof of the conditions required under Article 4 of the Charter" (Doc. A/1887 (Rev. 1)). For text of this document and other relevant documentation in the legislative history of this item in the Sixth Session of the General Assembly, see United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, Sixth Session, Annexes, fascicule for agenda item 60 (hereafter cited as GA (VI), Annexes). The Sixth Regular Session of the General Assembly was scheduled to convene in Paris on November 6, 1951.

SECRET NEW YORK, September 26, 1951—6:48 p. m.

380. Italy—UN membership. Coulson (UK)[1] asked for a meeting with French, Canadian and US dels to continue subject of Italy's membership in UN in light of FonOff instructions just received. He presented them as indicating FonOff desire to put forward Italian application in SC "to see what happens". He requested French to sponsor Italian application, since this wld be difficult for UK considering commitments to Ceylon. Application wld be put forward separately as a special case and thereafter UK wld put forward Ceylon and other candidates.

FonOff legal adviser had suggested as possible tactic that in the light of ICJ advisory opinion that members are not entitled to attach conditions to membership other than those contained in Article 4, it cld be argued that Soviet negative vote in SC is illegal. Coulson commented that the Italians have made the same suggestion. Alternatively, president of SC cld refer case to ICJ to determine whether Soviet negative vote need be regarded as a veto. Coulson frankly stated his doubts about this tactic.

During subsequent discussion no conclusion or consensus was reached. Gross was not aware of nature of current conversations between De Gasperi and Secretary. However, he emphasized our obligation in light of tripartite declaration re peace treaty to make every effort on membership question. He thought it might well be desirable to take Italian application to SC even though a veto results and he did not foreclose further thinking about legal tactic suggested by Italians and FonOff. He realizes that previous precedents wld need to be carefully examined to see how SC president had ruled on Soviet negative votes on Italian application. He thought we might do something with article of Italian peace treaty dealing with membership. However, he recalled Tarchiani's view that a veto might be disadvantageous to Italy as demonstrating Soviet strength and weakness of Italy's friends. On this point Coulson commented that Guidotti feels that any effort is better than none.

An earlier suggestion of Gross that there be consultation with the Russians, preferably at a high level, at beginning of GA was sympathetically received by Lacoste (France),[2] although not by Coulson. It was suggested by Coulson that Soviet objection and basis for new veto of Italian application wld be on theory that Italy is not a peace loving state in the light of current efforts to revise the peace treaty. By changing its position thus the Soviet Union wld avoid charge of illegal condition as a basis for its vote. Gross felt that if USSR were so to shift its position even though there were a veto it wld be propaganda defeat for USSR and a challenge to basic Italian foreign policy.

Lacoste saw the issue as whether we want to work with the USSR, in which case we must pay in some way for its support of application, or whether we want to fight them, in which case we wld be writing Article 4 out of the Charter. He felt that we cannot afford to sacrifice the principle that membership must be based on a recommendation of the SC in order to obtain Italy's admission. For that reason, he liked Gross' earlier suggestion for a consultation with the USSR and thought that it might be by one of us rather than a Big Five consultation. He and Gross agreed that even if consultation failed, it wld lay a better basis for us from propaganda point of view if USSR subsequently vetoed application. Coulson commented that the FonOff feels that such consultation wld not be worthwhile but personally he wld be willing to see French undertake it. Coulson also thought that approaching USSR on heels of tripartite declaration is unfortunate.

George (Canada)[3] quoted Pearson[4] as recently favoring the universality principle by admitting all applicants with possible exception of Outer Mongolia. Canadian approach to UN is more and more to make it the universal organization and bridge between USSR and free world with controversial subjects between two groups handled in NATO. Coulson cld not see how we cld support Soviet candidates in light of Article 4 and Gross commented that really Canadian proposal was to amend Article 4.

Coulson thought taking Italian application to SC wld prevent movement in GA toward "half way house of associate membership" to which UK is much opposed unless possibly Italy wld indicate desire for such status. At the end of the above discussion there was no attempt to summarize or formulate agreed position since only UK had instructions.

SECRET WASHINGTON, October 4, 1951—5 : 03 p. m.

177. Re Italian Membership: Dept believes US, UK and France shld pursue question Italian membership with view to determining what course most likely achieve objective Italian admission or, failing this, demonstrate clearly sincerity our intentions this matter. Pls discuss following Dept views with UK and Fr Dels, and, in your discretion with Canadians.

1. Dept believes best course wld be SC reconsideration of Italy's application as special case. This plan has been under serious consideration in Dept and was recently proposed by UK (urtel 380, Sep 26). While reconsideration Italy's application might cause resentment from other applicants we also consider qualified, separate action in case of Italy can be justified to them in view Italy's special responsibilities re operation trusteeship system which it cannot discharge effectively without full rights including voting in TC and GA. We wld hope UK cld be persuaded not to raise application of Ceylon and others until after Italian application acted upon. Further, although consultations with USSR re Italian application might be unsuccessful and have disadvantage of tipping our own hand in advance, we see no objection if one of Govts principally interested in Ital admission shld undertake such consultations as part effort achieve objective.

We wld be prepared support or sponsor SC reconsideration Italy's application and make strongest possible effort for favorable recommendation. In our view there is outside chance USSR might agree to vote for Italy. USSR wld, however, probably counter with omnibus proposal under which, in return for admission of Italy and possibly other non-Cominform applicants, we wld be required vote for one or more Cominform applicants. We cld not accept such a proposal.

Before deciding definitely in favor reconsideration Italy's application, we wld wish consult with Italy re this matter and question of timing. Re timing, our tentative view is SC reconsideration after GA convenes in Paris wld make it more difficult for USSR to veto and wld have more effective results in Italy.

2. The suggestion contained in Ital Aide-Mémoire that GA disregard veto and take action to admit Italy presents basic Charter difficulties. First, it wld be inconsistent with Para 2 of Art 4 of Charter as interpreted by ICJ in advisory opinion of Mar 3, 1950. In this opinion, ICJ concluded that under Charter, GA cannot admit a state to membership when SC had made no recommendation either because of failure of candidate to obtain required majority or because of veto of permanent member. In same opinion ICJ noted that "nowhere has the GA recd the power to change, to the point of reversing, the meaning of a vote of the SC". Second, even though Sov vetoes have not been on Charter grounds and are not in accordance with ICJ advisory opinion of May 28, 1948, it does not follow, as contended in Ital Aide-Mémoire, that these vetoes are null and void or that GA is in position to take action implying this.

3. We do not see merit in Belaunde suggestion (urtel 359, Sep 20) that ICJ might be requested give opinion on an applicant's qualifications. Since advisory opinion not binding, USSR cld still veto application. Further, we have serious doubts whether ICJ wld consider itself competent to determine whether an applicant is qualified in view Court's statement, in its opinion of May 28, 1948, that of factors to be taken into account in considering conditions in Art 4, "no relevant political factor . . . connected with the conditions of admission is excluded".

Dept has not yet seen details of Peruvian agenda item on rights of candidates to show proof they meet membership requirements. We will, of course, study proposal carefully.[1]

4. We also see basic difficulties in apparent UK FonOff suggestion (urtel 380) that Sov veto Italy's application might be treated by SC, presumably on ruling by Pres, as lacking effect because it was explicitly based on grounds lying outside terms of Art 4. USSR cld easily frustrate such action by vetoing on alleged Charter grounds or by stating no reasons at all. Moreover, we have grave doubts as to propriety under Charter of a proceeding, analogous to that for overriding double veto, under which judgment wld be passed on reason for Member's vote and, if those reasons found to lie outside Charter, SC wld treat negative note [vote] as ineffective. Such a step wld go far beyond anything we or other permanent Members of SC have ever conceived and might open way to practical elimination of veto from subjects to which it has incontestably applied. This is obviously very different matter from procedure already employed by Council to determine whether a particular matter is clearly procedural.

As to UK alternative suggestion, SC Pres cld obviously not himself refer question to ICJ for advisory opinion and SC Res requesting such opinion is probably subject to veto.

5. GA cld request advisory opinion from ICJ as to whether past SC votes on Ital membership constitute SC recommendation for Ital membership despite negative vote USSR. However, we wld have most serious doubts of desirability and propriety of submitting an issue to ICJ so predominantly political in character. Even if Court were willing to give opinion on question, favorable opinion wld seem most unlikely. Further, USSR cld complicate attempt by itself raising question of Ital membership again in SC and casting its veto on alleged Charter grounds.

6. If our efforts obtain Italy's admission fail, US wld be prepared vote for amendment to Art 86 to give Italy membership in TC if Italy desired it. However, we see little likelihood success such an amendment since it wld be subject veto by USSR. Dept wld also favor arrangement for participation by Ital without voting rights in main GA committees if desired by Italians. We understand, however, that Italy not interested in such arrangement.

7. We regret inability to suggest more positive procedure than renewed and energetic effort in SC. We feel, however, that as indicated above, no other suggestion yet made offers prospect of success. We wld be glad to give further consideration to any other proposal which promises to be effective.

8. Dept believes consultations with Italy necessary after above views discussed with UK and Fr Dels. FYI as follow up de Gasperi conversations, we plan give Italy our views on Ital Aide-Mémoire in detail both here and in New York.

459. Italian Membership. Guidotti (Italian observer) called on Ross with Hyde present on October 10. During preliminaries he mentioned his plans to sail for Paris on 29 October. Ross suggested that days immediately preceding opening of GA are likely to be time of many diplomatic exchanges and negotiations. Therefore, he agreed with Guidotti that latter might well sail for Paris on 23 October.[1]

Ross introduced subject of Italian membership, recalling tripartite declaration and fact that we are actively studying and discussing how best to forward Italian application. He mentioned our current thinking about pressing for new SC consideration of Italian application. He added that Dept still saw difficulties in suggestions contained in Italian aide-mémoire.

Guidotti indicated this was the real reason for his calling, that he felt Zoppi had not fully presented the question to the Secretary and recalled Hickerson's suggestion that there be further discussion, which he had come to conduct. At this point, Ross had to leave for a previous engagement and Guidotti continued the conversation with Hyde. Guidotti stated that unless a way is found to bring Italy into the UN the language of the tripartite declaration is meaningless, because

[1] See editorial note, p. 348, regarding the Peruvian item of September 24. In the meantime, new items regarding the admission of new members were submitted on October 6, by El Salvador, Guatemala, and Honduras, jointly (Doc. A/1899), and on October 11 by Nicaragua (Doc. A/1907). For texts, see GA (VI), Annexes, fascicule for agenda item 60.

Italy has always known that the US and UK wld like to have her a member. Belaunde's idea of the supremacy of the GA is an excellent one and the real key to obtaining Italy's admission, although Guidotti cld wish that the Peruvian agenda item had not shown in advance so clearly what the tactic wld be. He feels it wld be a mistake again to bring up the Italian application in SC, because USSR might base its veto on precise language of Article 4 which wld render tactic suggested in aide-mémoire or by Belaunde impractical.

Guidotti restated the argument of the aide-mémoire, stressing the SYG case as a material precedent which shows "the superiority of the GA". He also urged that the Soviet veto is, or in the future wld be, null and void and GA shld courageously recognize this fact.

He added that there are two legal approaches to this: one, to bring about Italy's admission and thus live up to the tripartite declaration, the other, to insist on legal difficulties so that most that cld be attempted wld be reconsideration in SC and inevitable veto.

During ensuing discussion Hyde restated the substance of conversation between Zoppi and the Secretary on September 24, 1951. Hyde formulated the legal issue presented by Italian aide-mémoire as going far in the direction of elimination of the veto from what all permanent members agree is a substantive matter, thus a most serious and dangerous precedent might be created entirely apart from at least some possibility that Soviet withdrawal from UN cld result. He expressed doubt about theory of the supremacy of the GA and observed that ICJ opinions as suggested by Belaunde are not binding, even assuming the court wld consider such an issue. Guidotti felt it cld be framed in a non-political way.

Hyde indicated our serious thought of possibility of early reconsideration of Italian application; the fact that we had discussed this with UK and France and possibility that if very effectively presented from propaganda point of view there is some chance USSR might not veto. He also mentioned as personal idea possibility that USSR might be consulted at high level in Paris on resubmission of application. Guidotti thought these suggestions lead toward dead end, that USSR if given a new chance to vote wld veto on grounds Italy no longer peace-loving on account of its NATO connections. While he had not seriously thought of consultations with USSR, he is very doubtful. In short, this plan contains no new element in his view and only if we will recognize that issue shld be decided by Assembly and not reargued in SC are we likely to get affirmative result to which US is committed in tripartite declaration. Hyde attempted to avoid any further crystallization of views and left it that Guidotti wld talk further with USUN or Hickerson.

7. Handling of Italian Membership Problem:

Fol is UK's suggested tactics for dealing with this matter in both GA and SC:

a. Arrange to have problem arise first in Comite IV in context of item on full participation of Italy in work of TC. Resolution wld be proposed, perhaps by France, by which GA wld request SC to reconsider Italy's application as special case. In comite debate emphasis wld be placed on Italy's special responsibilities under trusteeship agreement for Somaliland. In plenary emphasis wld be given to Italy's special qualifications for membership.

b. Pursuant to this GA resolution question wld then be taken up in SC. If, as a result, Italy shld be admitted, UK would immed propose admission of Ceylon.

c. If these tactics adopted, it would be desirable to have Comite IV action taken before new Peruvian item arises in Comite I or ad hoc.

d. UK sees no merit in Italian scheme for circumventing veto, in any proposal to amend Article 86, or in "associate membership" idea of increased Italian participation in GA but without vote.

SECRET ROME, October 15, 1951.

No. 912

Ref: Department's Document IPM D–5a, September 24, 1951, Conversations with Italian Prime Minister, Admission of Italy into the United Nations

Subject: Problem of the Admission of Italy to Membership in the UN or Alternatively, Fuller Participation as a Non-Member

The Embassy has taken note of the statement in the reference document that it is our objective "that Italy be admitted into the United Nations as soon as possible". However, in the light of the seemingly insurmountable difficulties as set forth in this document, it is apparent that the possibility of the early achievement of our objective is extremely limited. The Embassy would therefore present for the consideration of the Department its views with respect to a possible alternative course of action which might provide for fuller Italian participation in United Nations affairs despite continued exclusion from regular membership.

Under the present circumstances when our Government and most other friendly governments, members of the UN, are disposed to renew their efforts to obtain Italian admission during the forthcoming session of the United Nations General Assembly, it is understandable that the Italian Government should insist on its right to full and equal membership in the Organization. In this situation it is understandable that the Italians are not particularly interested in the consideration of possible formulas for limited participation. However, in the event that all efforts to obtain Italy's admission at the Paris UNGA should fail, it is the Embassy's view that we should be prepared to propose alternative arrangements which would provide for the fullest possible Italian participation, within the limits of the Charter, as a non-member.

While it is possible that the Italian Government might of its own accord modify its views respecting limited participation should all efforts for achievement of full membership fail, it is our view that careful consideration should be given to the possibility of our actively urging Italy to accept limited participation despite the misgivings which some Italian officials may have with respect to such an arrangement. It is understandable that due to considerations of national pride Italy is reluctant to accept an inferior position in the UN. It is also understandable that the Government might feel that acceptance of limited participation would lessen the prospects for early admission to full membership. However, in the larger interest of the UN itself, and in the furtherance of the purposes and principles of the Charter, it might be desirable to attempt to persuade Italy to contribute to the work of the Organization to the fullest extent possible regardless of purely national considerations. The Embassy suggests that the Department might desire to give careful consideration to the adoption of such a position as our own policy with respect to the problem.

The "limited participation" which the Embassy has in mind is a projection of the suggestion in Embassy telegram 3012 of January 12, 1951 regarding Italian membership in main committees of the General Assembly as an "interested party". Through this device, the Italian Government would have a full opportunity to participate in all debates and assist in the formulation of United Nations' decisions.

It might be expected that the voice of the Italian representative will carry great weight with many of the other delegates, and that on the great majority, if not all, of the problems placed before the UN we could count on strong Italian support for the US position.

On many problems the voice of Italy would be taken as reflecting that of the Vatican which has such great weight in the many Catholic countries, members of the UN.

Since only eight of the sixteen countries of Western Europe are members of the UN, Western Europe is grossly under-represented and the addition of the voice of Italy in the councils of the General Assembly would help to correct this unrealistic situation. It might be expected that Italian participation in debates and Italian support of UN decisions and recommendations would increase the prestige and effectiveness of those recommendations, not only in Italy, but throughout the world.

If the present situation is continued indefinitely and Italy, and other qualified applicants, continue unjustly to be excluded from participation in the Organization, it might be expected that Italy, and others, will come to depend more and more on non-UN organizations for the implementation of their international policies, and that the present feeling of need for membership in the UN will be replaced by a dependence on other organizations to the serious detriment of the prestige and influence of the United Nations itself. It is suggested that even limited participation would do much to hold Italy's interest in the Organization and loyalty to the purposes and principles of the Charter despite her legal exclusion from regular membership.

If the above arguments are accepted, the Embassy would suggest the following procedure:

1. All possible steps should be taken, within the limits of the Charter (including the widest possible interpretation of Charter requirements—including "stretching" of certain provisions as has been done on numerous occasions when, for example, the Security Council has acted on substantive questions without the affirmative vote of all five of the permanent members despite the provisions of Paragraph 3 of Article 27 e.g. the admission of Israel, action in Korea, etc.) to obtain Italy's admission to full membership. Thus, even if all such efforts fail, there will be established a clear record of overwhelming support for Italian membership and unquestionably placing of the responsibility for her continued exclusion.

2. The General Assembly might pass a resolution declaring its agreement that Italy is in every way qualified for membership in the Organization and is excluded only by the Soviet veto. The resolution might further express the will of the Assembly that Italy should, despite its technical exclusion from membership, participate to the fullest extent possible in all of the activities of the General Assembly and, as may be determined by such organizations, in all other committees, councils and other subsidiary organizations of the United Nations.

3. The General Assembly might revise its rules of procedure to provide that:

> All applicants for membership in the United Nations whose applications have been supported by two-thirds of the members of the General Assembly, and seven members of the Security Council, but are disqualified for membership in the Organization because of the veto of a permanent member, shall be invited to participate in all of the activities of the General Assembly, including all subsidiary organs thereof. Such participation would be on a basis of full equality with regular members with the sole exception that in Plenary Sessions of the General Assembly such countries' delegates would participate without a vote.

According to this formula, Italy, and other qualified applicants barred from membership by the Soviet veto, would participate as full members in all committees and other subsidiary organizations of the General Assembly, and would, in accordance with the revised rules of procedure of the General Assembly be entitled to vote in all such subsidiary organizations. It is believed that the adoption of such a rule of procedure is fully within the prerogative of the General Assembly, since, in accordance with Article 21 of the Charter, the Assembly itself has the right to determine its rules of procedure including the participation and voting procedure of its own committees and subsidiary organizations. Thus the only limitation to Italy's participation in the General Assembly would be in Plenary Sessions of the General Assembly itself, since Paragraph 1 of Article 18, provides that "each member of the General Assembly shall have one vote". However, there is no reason why an Italian Delegation should not sit in Plenary Sessions and participate fully in all debates (as the Hawaiian and Alaskan Delegates participate in our House of Representatives).

It is realized that this procedure was certainly not envisaged by the drafters of the Charter. However, by the same token, neither was it contemplated that Italy, and other qualified applicants, should be excluded from regular membership of the Organization which was intended to embrace all "peace loving states which accept the obligations contained in the present Charter and, in the judgment of the Organization are able and willing to carry out these obligations".

Not only out of justice to Italy, and other states qualified for membership but unjustly excluded because of Soviet veto, but also in the interest of strengthening the UN, of furthering the purposes and principles of the Charter, and of achieving our national objectives within the framework of the UN, the Embassy strongly recommends the Department's careful consideration of the above proposals.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] October 16, 1951.

Subject: Italian Membership

The following is for your use in conversations with Guidotti on October 16 concerning the question of Italian membership:

1. The Italian application has been vetoed by the Soviet Union four times—on August 26, 1947; October 1, 1947; April 10, 1948; and September 13, 1949. The Soviet Union has given as its reason for vetoing these applications the failure of the Security Council to recommend simultaneous admission of Cominform applicants.

2. The United States has supported and will continue to support strongly the admission of Italy. Together with the UK and France, we have recently reaffirmed our "determination to make every effort to secure Italy's membership in the United Nations." We have given serious consideration to all suggested courses of action by which Italy's admission might be achieved, including the recent proposal of the Government of Italy.

3. The Government of Italy, as pointed out in an Aide-Mémoire handed to the Secretary at Ottawa, maintains that since the Soviet Union had never questioned Italy's qualifications for membership, its vetoes of Security Council recommendations to admit Italy are null and void; and that the General Assembly should therefore disregard the Soviet vetoes and consider action to admit Italy. Aside from the practical consideration that the Soviet Union could again raise the question of Italian membership in the Security Council and advance alleged Charter grounds, we see basic Charter difficulties in the action suggested. In an advisory opinion of March 3, 1950, the International Court of Justice concluded that under the Charter, the General Assembly cannot admit a state to membership when the Security Council has made no recommendation for admission either because of the failure of a candidate to obtain the required majority or because of the negative vote of a permanent member. Further, while we certainly agree that the Soviet vetoes of Italy's application have not been based on Charter grounds, it does not follow, and the International Court of Justice has never suggested, that an improper exercise of the veto right is, because of its impropriety, null and void. Nor does it follow that the General Assembly can take action implying that these vetoes are ineffective.

4. Peru has requested the inclusion on the General Assembly agenda of an item entitled: "Admission of New Members: Rights of States Candidates to Adduce Proof to Show that They Satisfy the Requirements of Article 4 of the Charter." This proposal probably is similar to the plan Belaunde (Peru) has discussed with USUN under which the General Assembly would request that applicants be permitted to present to the Security Council proof of their qualifications for membership. If there was then a threat of a veto, the Assembly would request an advisory opinion from the International Court of Justice as to the value of the proof. Assuming a favorable opinion by the Court, the Security Council, in Belaunde's opinion, would have to apply strictly the sense of Article 4 and no member could veto the application.

We see two basic difficulties in the plan. First, since an advisory opinion is not binding, a permanent member could still veto. Second, we doubt whether the Court would consider itself competent to determine whether an applicant is qualified, since the Court itself has previously stated that of the factors to be taken into account in considering conditions laid down in Article 4, "no relevant political factor . . . connected with the conditions of admission is excluded."

5. The Department of State is inclined to favor reconsideration by the Security Council of Italy's application as a special case while the General Assembly is meeting in Paris, although it would not wish to take this action if Italy opposed it. We would be prepared to support or sponsor reconsideration and believe there may be an outside chance that the USSR would not veto if the case is presented effectively. The USUN is discussing this matter with the UK and France and has explained our views to Guidotti. The latter has expressed the opinion that it would be a mistake to propose reconsideration of Italy's application by the Security Council since the USSR would probably veto on Charter grounds and render the tactic suggested by the Italians or Belaunde even more difficult. He stressed the "superiority" of the Assembly and urged that the Assembly should recognize past Soviet vetoes as null and void. He also expressed doubt as to the advisability of preliminary consultations with the USSR, which Gross had suggested as a personal idea.

6. If our efforts to obtain Italy's admission fail, we would be prepared to vote for an amendment to Article 86 to give Italy voting rights in the Trusteeship Council if Italy desired it. However, such an amendment would probably be vetoed by the Soviet Union. We would also favor an arrangement for participation by Italy without voting rights in the main committees of the General Assembly if desired by the Italians.

7. We recommend that you inform Guidotti that we intend to do all we can to obtain admission for Italy but explain the basic Charter difficulties in the plans proposed by Italy and by Belaunde. We also recommend that you state that we are inclined to believe that the only feasible course is Security Council reconsideration of Italy's application as a special case and that we would be prepared to sponsor or support reconsideration and make the strongest possible effort for a favorable recommendation unless Italy opposed the idea. If our efforts to obtain membership for Italy should fail, we would be prepared to vote for an amendment to Article 86 and would favor an arrangement for participation by Italy without voting rights in the main Committees of the Assembly if these measures should be desired by the Italians. We would appreciate Italy's views on these matters and will, of course, continue to consult closely with Italy in the future.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] October 16, 1951.

Subject: Italy's Membership in United Nations

Participants: Gastone Guidotti, Minister, Italian Embassy
Mario Luciolli, Counselor, Italian Embassy
John D. Hickerson, Assistant Secretary, United Nations Affairs
Joseph N. Greene, WE
Paul B. Taylor—UNP

[1] Drafted by Paul B. Taylor of the Office of United Nations Political and Security Affairs.

When Prime Minister De Gasperi saw the Secretary he undertook to study carefully an aide-mémoire and memorandum which De Gasperi gave the Secretary, even though we had at that time given our preliminary reactions. The present conversation resulted from a message from Zoppi, through our Embassy at Rome, that he felt he had not presented the Italian proposals on membership adequately and would like Guidotti to discuss the matter further with me. Guidotti called last week on Mr. Ross and Mr. Hyde; through USUN I offered to see Guidotti here or in New York.

I began by reviewing the record of consideration of Italy's membership application in the United Nations and I outlined the basic Charter difficulties which we see in the action which is suggested in the Italian aide-mémoire. I pointed out that in the Advisory Opinion of March 3, 1950 the International Court of Justice concluded that under the Charter, the General Assembly cannot admit a state to membership when the Security Council has made no recommendation for admission; and that while we certainly agree that the Soviet vetoes of Italy have not been based on Charter grounds it does not follow that an improper exercise of the veto right is null and void. Nor does it follow that the General Assembly can take action implying that these votes are ineffective—the idea that is at the basis of the Italian plan. I pointed out again that the USSR does not even need to give any reasons whatever for its veto; but the veto nevertheless is effective.

I outlined briefly the difficulties we see in the plan of Belaunde (Peru) to have applicant states submit proof of their qualifications and to provide for an Advisory Opinion by the International Court of Justice on the adequacy of these qualifications.

I then said that, desiring to do everything we possibly could to advance Italy's membership, we were inclining toward consideration of Italy's application by the Security Council as a special case during the period while the General Assembly is meeting in Paris. We would not, I said, take this action if Italy opposed it. I pointed out further that we were prepared to vote for an amendment of Article 86 of the Charter to give Italy voting rights in the Trusteeship Council, and to favor an arrangement for Italy's participation without voting rights in the main committees of the Assembly, if the Italians desired these arrangements.

In the discussion that followed, Count Guidotti first emphasized very strongly his belief that the Soviet reply to the Tripartite Declaration had clearly excluded any possibility of a non-forcible method of securing Italy's admission. He considered that the series of conditions set up by the Soviet Union went far beyond what had been offered before and amounted to blackmail against Italy and against the whole group of free nations. He said he was quite ready to admit that there was no juridical way which could be found to bring Italy in. It was, he said, a matter of "power". Experts had worked on the problem for five years and had found no legal or procedural device to secure Italy's admission. He argued that what was needed was a drastic "political will" which would create a juridical procedure.

Count Guidotti questioned the political desirability of raising the Italian application once more in the Security Council. In this connection and at various points throughout the conversation he argued that the Italian people expect that a substantial change in the situation would be brought about by the Tripartite Declaration. Everyone knows, he said, there is no clear juridical avenue to membership under present circumstances. What the Italians expect is the creation of something new, and the nature of what that new procedure could be is illustrated by our previous actions in the United Nations in the extension of the term of the Secretary General, in the resolution on Uniting for Peace, and in the developments on the veto. He feared that if it were once more demonstrated that the Western Powers were unable to secure Italy's admission and that everything depended on the triumphant Soviet veto, the political effect in Italy would be very bad. However, he would report the matter carefully to his Government and let us know its views.

To Count Guidotti's review of the previous instances in which the Charter had been "stretched" I pointed out—in addition to the usual arguments—that one difficulty about the membership problem is that there has been so much practice in the United Nations, including judicial opinion, during the past five years that a sudden reversal of this constitutional practice would be impossible. In closing I noted that Guidotti had not commented upon the suggestion that Italy be invited to take a seat in the main committees of the General Assembly, and said that I had assumed his omission of this had been intentional. Both he and Luciolli replied that when I mentioned it to Luciolli some months ago the response of the Italian Government on the matter had been negative and they believed it was still "90%" negative.

Re Italian Membership: Italian observer Guidotti on instructions saw Gross this morning and voiced Italian Govt's "keen disappointment" that Guidotti had been told by Hickerson we had no suggestions to offer re Italian membership beyond what Guidotti called, "undoubtedly useless", step of renewed SC discussion membership question. The Italian Prime Minister (De Gasperi) to the Secretary of State [1]

CONFIDENTIAL ROME, October 23, 1951.

MY DEAR SECRETARY OF STATE: I was much distressed at learning that your Government do not see their way to take any action for the admission of Italy to the United Nations in this Session beyond the presentation of a motion in the Security Council which would meet, of course, with the instant and, by now, customary Russian veto.

I have not forgotten that during our conversations in Washington you raised some doubts as to the applicability of the procedure outlined in the Memorandum I had the pleasure of submitting to you. It was however my impression at the time that you intended to pursue, in consultation with other Powers, an extensive exploration of the matter, bearing fully in mind that, as demonstrated by the experience of the last four years, a purely juridical formula to end the deadlock does not exist and that an action on the part of the Assembly or the Security Council to circumvent the veto, such as brought about in similar cases, would be necessary and indeed unavoidable.

This was, at least in my understanding and, I believe, in the understanding of the Italian people and of many friendly Governments, the meaning of the pledge undertaken with the Three Powers Declaration. Failing this, the Declaration would mark no progress on the position assumed by your and other Governments with previous pledges made in concurrence with the USSR, such as the Preamble of the Peace Treaty and the Potsdam Declaration.

In the meantime a Russian note has been received, that puts the revision of the Treaty and the admission of Italy to the United Nations on the same political plane, while making the most unwarrantable demand that Italy leave at once the Atlantic Pact as a condition for the revision and, it is to be presumed, since the two questions are interrelated, for her admission to the U.N. If a Russian veto which is demonstrably null and void in our case, and would be even more palpably illegal after the stand taken by the USSR in their note, were allowed to block once again the membership of Italy without any reaction on the part of the Great Powers beyond verbal protestations, I am most certain that an unfavourable impression would be created. The Russian veto would come as no surprise to anybody in Italy, but what would be much of a shock and a surprise to everybody, I fear, is to apprehend that all the efforts that the Three Powers are prepared to do, on the strength of their recent Declaration, to support Italy's admission would result merely in provoking a fresh veto from Russia.

On the legal side, moreover, the Italian people would fail to understand the cause of the inability of the Three Great Powers at finding a solution for Italy's case as it is generally known that an adequate solution was found in other cases; among which the re-appointment of the Secretary General was perhaps the most striking. May I point out very briefly, in this connection, the similarities between the two positions. The two relevant provisions of the Charter, namely articles 4 and 97, have practically the same wording and require, in both cases, a recommendation of the Security Council. It is true at that time it was not a fresh appointment but a re-appointment of the same person. But a resolution taken by the General Assembly on January 24th, 1946 (doc. A/64) reads explicitly: "The same rules apply to the renewal of appointment as to an original appointment."

In the view of my legal advisers this resolution, which was bypassed in the action taken by the Assembly, appears to have a more binding character than the advice rendered by the International Court of Justice on the case of the admission of new members which, as you know, is purely consultative.

I am afraid that these points, among others, will be made very forcibly both in Parliament and outside, and will put my Government and myself in an extremely embarrassing position.

I trust you realize the seriousness of the issue for my Government. May I add that I would be most obliged for an expression of your views on the matter. Believe me, my dear Secretary of State,

Sincerely, DE GASPERI

ITALIAN MEMBERSHIP IN THE UNITED NATIONS

The Italians are most anxious to secure admission to the United Nations; de Gasperi has said that this is almost more important than the revision of the treaty. De Gasperi has expressed distress that we have been unable to agree to the Italian proposal for circumventing the veto and unable to propose any other course of action which might

[1] A series of bipartite (Acheson–Eden) and tripartite (Acheson–Eden–Schuman) meetings were held at Paris between November 4 and November 9. For documentation on these meetings, see volume III.

This document was one of several briefing memoranda on the Italian membership question that were drafted during this period. Although this memorandum is undated, there is a strong presumption that it was drafted for use at the November 4 meeting between Acheson and Eden. The Italian membership question was not discussed at this meeting, nor indeed at subsequent meetings until the second tripartite meeting on November 9.

achieve success. The Italians have now proposed that the Security Council would pass all applications for membership to the Assembly, the Assembly being free to reject applications from the satellites while admitting Italy. The Italians have not proposed any way of getting Russian acceptance, which we consider most unlikely.

The Department has recommended that the United States Delegation should indicate continued United States support of the nine qualified applicants whose admission has been blocked by the Soviet veto, particularly Italy. The Department thinks that the Delegation should, if the Italian Government agrees and the United Kingdom and France concur, propose that the Assembly request the Security Council to reconsider Italy's application as a special case. We understand that Schuman made a suggestion along these lines to the Secretary yesterday. As indicated above, we of course agree with this and would be inclined to favor consideration of this matter in the Trusteeship Committee, which will consider the question of Italy's full participation in the work of the Trusteeship Council. If this course is not feasible, the Delegation might support special Security Council reconsideration of Italy's application without prior General Assembly consideration. If the Security Council should go on to reconsider other applications, the Department recommends that the United States should support the admission of non-Cominform applicants and oppose admission of the Cominform applicants. As to the tricky plans of Italy and Peru, the Department recommends that we should point out the Charter difficulties involved in them. If these special efforts to get Italy into the United Nations are unsuccessful, the Delegation is authorized to support an amendment to Article 86 to give Italy full membership in the Trusteeship Council if it wishes; and should also consult with the Italians and others on the possibility of making special arrangements to give Italy the right to participate without vote in the main Assembly committees.

SECRET [PARIS,] November 6, 1951.

ITALIAN MEMBERSHIP QUESTION

The Italian Aide-Mémoire

The Plan: A General Assembly decision by two-thirds to admit Italy to membership. All that is necessary is the political will of the [1] With regard to specific assignments given to the U.S. Delegation Advisory Staff, Wainhouse was functioning as Executive Officer for Political and Security Matters in Committee I.

Three Powers to surmount the stalemate caused by the Soviets; the Soviet veto is contrary to the law of the Charter.

The Difficulties With It: A recommendation by Security Council is an indispensable requirement for the admission of new members. This was confirmed by an advisory opinion of the Court (March 3, 1950). To be sure attaching conditions other than those contained in the Charter are invalid, and Court so ruled on May 28, 1948. But Soviets can change reason or give no reason at all. It cannot be argued therefore, as does the Italian Aide-Mémoire, that Soviet vetoes are null and void and that the General Assembly is in position to take action implying this.

II

The Belaunde Initiative

The Plan: (1) General Assembly advise Security Council to revise rules to permit applicants for membership present proof of qualifications under Article 4 of Charter; (2) Such proof of Italy's qualifications would be studied by Commission of Security Council; (3) If there were objection to Commission's report (threat of Soviet veto), General Assembly would ask Court for opinion on value of proof offered; (4) If Court ruled favorably, Security Council would have to apply strictly sense of Article 4; (5) Matter would not be vetoable because Charter leaves no option or choice.

The Difficulties With It:

No merit in asking Court for opinion on applicant's qualifications. Since advisory opinion not binding USSR could still veto application. Furthermore, we have serious doubts whether Court would consider itself competent to determine whether an applicant is qualified in view of Court's statement in its opinion of May 28, 1948 that of the factors to be taken into account in considering conditions in Article "No relevant political factor . . . connected with conditions of admission is excluded."

III

The Schuman[2] Tactic

The Plan: General Assembly might point up the issues in the Italian membership case by requesting Security Council to reconsider Italy's application.

We can go along with this, since it is in line with our position.

The Difficulties With It: The Italians see no merit in this, and feel that another veto would not help. Without Italian approval or acquiescence, we should not press this.

IV

The United States Position

(This is set forth in Gadel 43 of November 1, 1951.)

Special reasons for handling Italy's application in view of its trusteeship responsibilities. USDel should arrange for consideration question of Italy's membership by Fourth Committee under question of full participation of Italy in Trusteeship Council. We are prepared to sponsor or support resolution by which General Assembly would request Security Council reconsideration of Italy's application as special case. If this course not feasible, we can support special Security Council reconsideration without prior General Assembly consideration. (This is also what M. Schuman has in mind.)

Neither of the above courses should be pursued by us unless agreed to by Italy.

We can, if efforts to obtain Italy's admission fail, support an amendment to Article 86 to give Italy full membership in Trusteeship Council if desired by Italy, and should also consult with other Delegates and with Italy regarding possibility of arrangements giving her right to participate, without vote, in General Assembly Committees if she so desires.

Briefing Memorandum for Tripartite Ministerial Meeting, at Paris

SECRET [PARIS,] November 8, 1951.

QUESTION OF ITALY'S APPLICATION FOR MEMBERSHIP IN THE UN

UNITED STATES OBJECTIVES

In consonance with the Declaration of September 26, 1951 by the United States, France and the United Kingdom, and our previous strong support of Italy's application for membership, the Department believes the following objectives should be pursued in the Sixth General Assembly Session, after consultation with the United Kingdom and France and agreement with Italy:

1. The United States should sponsor or support in the Fourth Committee, where the question of full participation of Italy in the work of the Trusteeship Council is to be considered, a resolution by which the General Assembly would request the Security Council to reconsider Italy's application as a special case. The only satisfactory way to remove Italy's handicap in discharging its trusteeship responsibilities is to have full voting participation in the United Nations.
2. If the course outlined in 1 above is not feasible, the United States may support a special Security Council reconsideration of Italy's application without prior General Assembly consideration.

3. If efforts to obtain Italy's admission fail, the United States should support an amendment to Article 86 of the Charter to give Italy full membership in the Trusteeship Council, and consult with other delegates on the possibility of arrangements giving Italy the right to participate in the main General Assembly committees without, presumably, the right to vote.

PROBABLE UNITED KINGDOM AND FRENCH POSITIONS

The discussions in New York have indicated that the United Kingdom and France would probably go along with objectives 1 and 2 and might possibly go along with objective 3.

POINTS WHICH THE SECRETARY MIGHT MAKE

1. The discussions which USUN officers have had in New York indicate that the United Kingdom and France share generally our difficulties with the Italian proposal that the General Assembly admit Italy to membership on a two-thirds vote without a Security Council recommendation. The International Court of Justice in an advisory opinion has held that the admission of a State cannot be effected by a decision of the General Assembly when the Security Council has made no recommendation for admission.

2. The discussions which USUN have had in New York indicate also that the United Kingdom and France share generally our views concerning the *Belaunde Initiative because of the basic Charter difficulties.

3. Our representative on the membership item (Congressman Mansfield)[1] should consult with his British and French counterpart on this matter.

*The Belaunde Initiative is as follows: (1) General Assembly advise Security Council to revise rules to permit applicants for membership present proof of qualifications under Article 4 of the Charter; (2) Such proof of Italy's qualifications would be studied by Commission of Security Council; (3) If there were objection to Commission's report (threat of Soviet veto), General Assembly would ask Court for opinion on value of proof offered; (4) If Court ruled favorably, Security Council would have to apply strictly sense of Article 4; (5) Matter would not be vetoable because Charter leaves no option or choice. [Footnote in the source text.]

[1] Congressman Michael J. Mansfield of the United States Delegation to the General Assembly. Mansfield had been delegated responsibility inter alia for the membership question. Subsequently this responsibility seems to have been transferred to Congressman John N. Vorys, of the Delegation, who was handling matters relating to the revision of the Italian peace treaty.

Here follow brief remarks about projected dates for the forthcoming meeting of the NATO Council, and a discussion of some length on the Moroccan question (see page 157).]

Italian UN Membership

Foreign Minister Schuman said he thought it was essential that action on Italian membership be initiated in the SC. He said the Italian note had failed to convince him that the Assembly could act in the absence of SC action. He said, however, that he felt in the SC all that would happen would be another debate and another veto. He said we should consider what needs to be done if this course of events occurred. He said this would be very serious to Italy and that we also should not "bend to the Soviet veto". He said he thought perhaps the SC could refer the question to the GA with a statement that it has been blocked from action. He thought then the GA could vote favoring Italy. He said the result of this, of course, would be only a moral one, but he thought even so it would help the Italian situation somewhat. He said that in the GA the Trusteeship argument could be used. He said we could argue that it was not in accord with the Constitution or with justice that a country worthy of being given a Trusteeship by the UN should be excluded from membership in the UN. No decision was taken on the matter of GA tactics in the event of another SC veto.

Mr. Acheson said that he wanted to suggest that the Trusteeship Council recommend to the GA that because of the difficulty Italy has in administering a UN Trusteeship without being a Member, something should be done about this situation. Schuman replied that this in effect had been done and was covered by Item 56 of the agenda. Mr. Acheson said that he had not completed his suggestion. He wished to propose that this agenda item be considered in the Fourth Committee and that the Fourth Committee and the Assembly pass a Resolution calling upon the SC to reexamine the Italian application as a special case in view of the trusteeship question.

M. Schuman said he thought this was a good proposal and that Item 56 should be referred to the Fourth Committee rather than the First. He said that if we agreed in principle on this proposal, our experts could work out the details.

Although Mr. Eden did not speak, there appeared to be general agreement, and Mr. Acheson said that Congressman Mansfield, of our Delegation, would be in touch with the other two Delegations to work this out.

[Here follows discussion of other agenda items.]

Memorandum by Mr. David W. Wainhouse, Adviser, United States Delegation to the General Assembly [1]

SECRET [PARIS, November 9, 1951].[2]

Subject: Italian Membership

At the Foreign Ministers meeting in the Quai d'Orsay today (Nov. 9), M. Schuman opened the discussion on the question of Italian membership in the UN by saying that the three Governments (US, Fr, UK) are under an obligation to make efforts to secure the admission of Italy into the UN. M. Schuman referred to the item submitted by the Trusteeship Council for inclusion in the agenda of the General Assembly relating to the participation of Italy in the work of the Trusteeship Council and stated that Italy, as the Administering Authority of the former Italian territory of Somaliland, is entitled to be treated as a special case for membership in the UN. He accordingly suggested that:

1. The three Foreign Ministers agree to have the item included in the General Assembly agenda and assigned to Committee IV for consideration.
2. Committee IV develop a resolution in which the General Assembly would ask the Security Council to reconsider Italy's application as a special case.

The Secretary agreed to the suggestion of M. Schuman and Mr. Eden nodded approval.

[2] This memorandum actually carries the date of November 10, which presumably is the date it was typed. This same memorandum with a November 12 date was sent on November 12 to Congressman Vorys (USUN Files). Wainhouse in drafting the November 12 memorandum to Vorys changed the name "Mansfield" to "Vorys" in the last paragraph.

The position set forth by M. Schuman is in accord with that taken by the Department. There was no consideration given by the Foreign Ministers as to the course we should follow in the event of a veto in the Security Council on the reconsideration of Italy's application.

The Secretary stated to the other Ministers that Congressman Mansfield would handle the membership question for the United States in the General Assembly.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. Joseph N. Greene, Jr., of the Office of Western European Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, November 9, 1951.

Subject: Italian Admission to the United Nations

Participants: Mr. P. Francfort,[1] French Embassy
Mr. Joseph Greene, Jr.—WE

Mr. Francfort had asked whether we had any reply to give him on his Aide-Mémoire proposing a course of action in the United Nations for the admission of Italy to the United Nations. I informed him that our own thinking coincides, in general, with that of the French Government as set forth in the Aide-Mémoire. We had just had word from Paris that the three Foreign Secretaries, Messrs. Acheson, Schuman and Eden had in fact agreed on a course of action substantially as outlined in the Aide-Mémoire. Mr. Francfort thanked me for the information and indicated that it met his requirements for the time being.

CONFIDENTIAL [PARIS,] November 12, 1951.

ADMISSION OF NEW MEMBERS

THE PROBLEM

The question of the admission of new members and related matters will be considered by the General Assembly under several agenda items. The Fourth Committee has on its agenda the question of the full participation of Italy in the work of the Trusteeship Council, an issue which directly involves the question of Italian membership in the United Nations (see position paper SD/A/C.4/90).[1] Furthermore, Peru has submitted an item for the supplementary agenda of the Assembly entitled "Admission of New Members: Right of Candidate States to Present Proof of the Conditions Required under Article 4 of the Charter" (A/1887 Rev. 1) and El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras and Nicaragua have also requested the inclusion on the supplementary agenda of an item called "Admission of New Members" (A/1899). These items will in all probability be taken up by the Ad Hoc Political Committee. In connection with the membership question, arrangements providing for non-member participation in the General Assembly may arise if the present membership stalemate continues.

What should be the position of the United States concerning the question of the admission of new members and possible arrangements for non-member participation in the General Assembly?

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. The United States Delegation should indicate that the United States continues to support strongly the admission of the nine qualified applicants, the admission of which has been blocked by the Soviet veto; and that the United States looks forward to the time when other countries which are qualified for membership but which have not yet applied will also be admitted.

2. At the same time, the Delegation should take the position that there are reasons for handling the question of Italy's admission as a special case in view of Italy's role as a state administering a trust territory under the United Nations. The Delegation should, if practicable, arrange for consideration of the question of Italian membership by the Fourth Committee at the beginning of the session under the question of the full participation of Italy in the work of the Trusteeship Council, and should sponsor or support a resolution in that Committee by which the General Assembly would request the Security Council to reconsider Italy's application as a special case. If this course does not appear feasible, the United States may support Security Council reconsideration of Italy's application as a special case without prior consideration in the Assembly. If one of these courses is decided upon, the Delegation should seek to have the Ad Hoc Political Committee delay consideration of the membership question until separate action is taken on Italy.

Before deciding on either of these steps, the Delegation should consult closely with other United Nations Members, particularly the United Kingdom and France, and with Italy. Neither course should be pursued by the Delegation unless agreed to by the Italian Government.

[1] Doc. SD/A/C.4/90, October 19, 1951 is not printed. See Doc. SD/A/C.4/90/Rev. 1, November 14, p. 383.

3. If Security Council reconsideration of other applications should follow reconsideration of Italy's application, the United States should support the admission of the non-Soviet applicants and oppose the admission of the Soviet applicants to whose admission the United States objects on Charter grounds. The United States should not accept a Soviet omnibus proposal requiring our consent to the admission of one or more Soviet applicants in return for Soviet agreement to admit Italy and possibly other non-Soviet applicants and should consult the Department if such a proposal is made.

4. The United States Delegation should indicate its willingness to consider any proposal to achieve the admission of qualified states which can reasonably be found to be consistent with the Charter. However, the Delegation should point out the basic Charter difficulties in the plans which have recently been proposed by Italy and Peru, and should vote against these plans unless they have the strong support of the majority of United Nations Members, in which case the Delegation should consult the Department.

5. If efforts to obtain the admission of Italy fail, the United States Delegation should support an amendment to Article 86 of the Charter to give Italy full voting rights in the Trusteeship Council provided this course is desired by the Italians (see position paper, SD/A/C.4/90), and should also consult with the Italians and with other United Nations Members with a view to exploring the possibility of giving Italy the right to participate in the main committees of the General Assembly if the Italians want such participation. The present assumption is that such participation in the committees would be without vote. The Delegation may also support such arrangements for other qualified applicants if they are interested.

COMMENT

1. The United States has consistently expressed the view that the objective of a universal United Nations membership should be achieved as rapidly as states meet the qualifications for membership under the Charter. It has supported, and continues to support strongly, the admission of the nine non-Soviet applicants, (Austria, Ceylon, Finland, Ireland, Italy, Jordan, Republic of Korea, Portugal and Nepal), which the overwhelming majority of United Nations Members considers qualified but which have been excluded from membership by the veto of the Soviet Union. It looks forward to the time when other countries qualified for membership will also be admitted. The United States has declared that it does not intend to permit its vote in the Security Council to prevent the admission to membership of any applicant which has received seven affirmative votes in the Security Council and has repeatedly requested the Soviet Union to refrain from exercising its veto over membership applications.

The United States has opposed and continues to oppose the admission of the five Soviet applicants (Albania, Bulgaria, Hungary, "Mongolian People's Republic" and Rumania) because of its strong objections to their admission on Charter grounds. Almost all the members of the Security Council and the General Assembly have likewise been unable to support their admission. These applicants have been giving at least moral support to the aggression in Korea. Some have engaged in aggressive acts in the Balkans. Three of them have flouted the recommendations of the Assembly with respect to peace treaty obligations on human rights and have disregarded the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice on their peaceful settlement obligations under these same treaties. One applicant, Outer Mongolia, has never demonstrated that it has the capacity to play the normal role of a state in the international community.

The Security Council has not reconsidered the pending applications since 1949 because it has been evident that reconsideration would achieve no useful purpose. The United States favors reconsideration of the applications of qualified candidates by the Security Council whenever there is a reasonable chance of favorable action. However, general reconsideration at this time would almost certainly result in the usual Soviet vetoes and perhaps in another Soviet omnibus proposal which the United States could not accept.

2. At the same time, the United States believes that there are reasons for reconsideration of Italy's application as a separate case. In addition to possessing the full qualifications for admission, Italy has trusteeship responsibilities which it cannot effectively discharge without full voting participation in the Trusteeship Council and the General Assembly. The United States, together with the United Kingdom and France, recently reaffirmed "its determination to make every effort to secure Italy's membership in the United Nations," and the President has stated that we "intend to keep on working for the admission of Italy." Although the Soviet Union has indicated that it will agree to Italy's admission only if Bulgaria, Hungary and Rumania are admitted and if Italy withdraws from NATO, conditions unacceptable to the United States, it is believed that there is still an outside chance that the Soviet Union might not veto if the case is handled effectively as a special case. At the same time, it must be realized that, as Italian representatives have pointed out, another Soviet veto might have unfortunate repercussions within Italy in that it would highlight our impotence to obtain its admission.

The Fourth Committee has on its agenda the question of the full participation of Italy in the work of the Trusteeship Council. In the case of Italy, full participation in the Council could be achieved only through membership in the United Nations or through an amendment to Article 86 of the Charter. Since United Nations membership is obviously the only fully satisfactory solution, a proposal could appropriately be made in the Fourth Committee that steps be taken at once in the Security Council to admit Italy to United Nations membership. It could be argued that, above and beyond the declarations of the General Assembly since 1947 that Italy is fully qualified for admission, the General Assembly has granted, and Italy has accepted, special United Nations responsibilities in connection with the operation of the trusteeship system. Italy is seriously handicapped in discharging these responsibilities if it does not have full voting participation in the Trusteeship Council, in the General Assembly, under whose general supervision the Trusteeship Council operates, and perhaps in other United Nations bodies. If this plan does not appear feasible, the Security Council might reconsider Italy's application as a special case without prior General Assembly action. Whichever of the above procedures may be decided upon should be taken early in the session before discussion of the general membership question arises in the Ad Hoc Political Committee, in order not to prejudice efforts to handle Italy as a special case. Early action would also be desirable to permit other steps to be taken if the Soviet Union should block Italy's admission.

Before deciding on one of the above courses, consultation with other United Nations members and with Italy is necessary. Italy may prefer that neither course be taken. If Italy should persist in opposing Security Council reconsideration, the Delegation should not insist upon either of the above courses.

3. If the Italian application should be dealt with separately in the Security Council, it is probable that reconsideration of other applications will follow. In this event, the United States should, of course, give strong support to the admission of the non-Soviet applicants and oppose the admission of the Soviet applicants to whose admission the United States objects on Charter grounds. It should not accept a Soviet omnibus proposal requiring our consent to the admission of one or more Soviet applicants in return for Soviet agreement to admit Italy and possibly other non-Soviet applicants, and should consult the Department in the event that such a proposal is made.

4. Plans to circumvent the Soviet veto of membership applications have recently been proposed by Italy and Peru, and will undobutedly be considered by the Assembly in connection with Italy's application and the general membership question. These plans are likely to receive the strong support of Latin American and other countries. However, in the opinion of the United States, the proposals present basic Charter difficulties, difficulties which have prevented us from making similar proposals in the past. While the United States is in full sympathy with the objectives of these plans and is willing to consider proposals to achieve the admission of the qualified applicants which can reasonably be found to be consistent with the Charter, it is believed that the effect of endorsement of the proposals of Italy or Peru would be to disregard our obligations under the Charter of the United Nations.

The Government of Italy, as pointed out in an Aide-Mémoire handed to the Secretary at Ottawa, maintains that since the Soviet Union has never questioned Italy's qualifications for membership, its vetoes of Security Council recommendations to admit Italy are null and void; and that the General Assembly should therefore disregard the Soviet vetoes and consider action to admit Italy. Aside from the practical consideration that the Soviet Union could again raise the question of Italian membership in the Security Council and advance alleged Charter grounds, we see basic Charter difficulties in the action suggested. In an advisory opinion of March 3, 1950, the International Court of Justice concluded that under the Charter, the General Assembly cannot admit a state to membership when the Security Council has made no recommendation for admission either because of the failure of a candidate to obtain the required majority or because of the negative vote of a permanent member. Further, while there is no doubt that the Soviet vetoes of Italy's application have not been based on Charter grounds and have not been in accordance with the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice of May 28, 1948, it does not follow, and the Court has never suggested, that these vetoes are therefore null and void. Nor does it follow that the General Assembly can take action implying that these vetoes are ineffective.

With respect to the Peruvian agenda item, this probably involves a plan Belaunde (Peru) discussed earlier with USUN under which the General Assembly would request that applicants be permitted to present to the Security Council proof of their qualifications for membership. If there was then a threat of a veto, the Assembly would request an advisory opinion from the International Court of Justice as to the value of the proof. Assuming a favorable opinion by the Court, the Security Council, in Belaunde's opinion, would have to apply strictly the sense of Article 4 and no member could veto the application.

The United States would certainly have no objection to the suggestion that a candidate be permitted to present its own case for admission. Such a procedure would sharpen the issues involved and place the onus squarely on the USSR. However, there are two basic difficulties in the proposal for an advisory opinion of the court. First, since an advisory opinion is not binding, a permanent member could still veto. Second, it is very doubtful that the Court would consider itself competent to determine whether an applicant is qualified, since the Court itself has previously stated that of the factors to be taken into account in considering conditions laid down in Article 4, "no relevant political factor—that is to say, none connected with the conditions of admission—is excluded."

Argentina appears to be studying a proposal under which the General Assembly would request the Security Council to reconsider in a spirit of compromise the various applications and submit them to the General Assembly for the will of the majority of the United Nations Members. Apparently, it is also studying a procedural maneuver analogous to that for overriding a double veto. (See memorandum of conversation US/A/3332.)[2] If this proposal contemplates referral of applications to the Assembly without Security Council recommendations thereon, the plan would be inconsistent with Article 4 of the Charter. With regard to the procedural maneuver, the President of the Security Council could hardly declare that a Security Council decision on a membership application is procedural in view of the fact that a decision on membership has always been assumed to be substantive. This step would go far beyond what the United States or other permanent members have ever conceived and might even open the way to practical elimination of the veto from decisions to which it has incontestably applied, a result which would be unacceptable to any permanent member, including the United States.

5. The question of an amendment to Article 86 to give Italy membership in the Trusteeship Council in the event that it is not admitted to the United Nations is dealt with in detail in the position paper on the question of the full participation of Italy in the work of the Trusteeship Council (SD/A/C.4/90).

If Italy is not admitted to the United Nations, the General Assembly may consider some arrangement for participation by Italy in the General Assembly, presumably without the right to vote, pending its admission to membership. Such an arrangement might also be considered for other interested qualified applicants whose admission has been blocked by the Soviet veto. Italy has thus far indicated no desire for this privilege which it apparently regards as "second class membership." However, it may be that Italy might become interested if efforts to obtain its admission fail and if a concrete proposal is presented.

There are various possible alternatives. Arrangements under which non-member states qualified for admission might be permitted to participate in the committees:

(1) The Assembly might adopt a resolution providing that, upon specific request therefor by a non-member state, the Assembly might grant the state a general privilege of participating, presumably without voting rights, in committees on which all members are represented.

[2] This is a memorandum of a conversation on October 11 between John C. Dreier, U.S. representative on the Council of the Organization of American States, and Rodolfo Muñoz, Acting Permanent Representative of Argentina to the United Nations, at New York, not printed. Dreier went to Paris as a member of the U.S. Delegation Advisory Staff and Muñoz as Vice-Chairman of the Argentine Delegation.

Participation might include speaking under the same rules as members on any matter before the committee, and of making proposals on matters of substance but not of procedure. More limited participation might involve the presentation of views on the substance of each item when expressly permitted by the committee.

(2) The Assembly might adopt a general resolution authorizing the committees to grant participation in their proceedings by non-member states, leaving the exact scope of participation to be determined by the committee in each case.

(3) As an alternative to any general arrangement, the United States might, more liberally than heretofore, support in each committee the grant of participation in that committee to a non-member state in the discussion of particular matters in which the state was interested.

The Delegation will note that representatives or observers participating under such provisions in proceedings taking place in the United States would not be entitled to full diplomatic privileges and immunities, which, under the Headquarters Agreement, are available only to representatives of Members.

Editorial Note

On November 13 the General Assembly approved a recommendation by the General Committee that the Peruvian membership item, the joint membership item submitted by El Salvador, Guatemala, and Honduras, and the Nicaraguan item associating itself with the joint proposal, be included under one title: "Admission of New Members, including the right of candidate States to present proof of the conditions required under Article 4 of the Charter". The General Assembly then referred the item to the First Committee for consideration and report. The First Committee, however, did not address itself to the membership item until January 18, 1952; see pages 425 ff.

In the meantime, in mid-November, the locus of action on the membership question shifted to the Fourth Committee and consideration of the question of the full participation of Italy in the work of the Trusteeship Council.

QUESTION OF THE FULL PARTICIPATION OF ITALY IN THE WORK OF THE TRUSTEESHIP COUNCIL

THE PROBLEM

By resolution 310 (VIII), the Trusteeship Council requested the General Assembly to include in its agenda the question of the full participation of Italy in the work of the Council. The Council has already granted Italy full participation short of the right to vote, a right which is restricted to United Nations Members. What position should the United States take on this question?

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. The Delegation should express the view of the United States that Italy could acquire full participation in the Trusteeship Council (i.e., the right to vote) only through:

(a) admission of Italy to membership in the United Nations; or (b) amendment to Article 86 of the Charter.

2. The Delegation should take the position that the United States will not be fully satisfied with any arrangement short of full membership of Italy in the United Nations.

3. The Delegation should, if practicable, and if agreed to by Italy, sponsor or support in the Fourth Committee action to have the General Assembly request the Security Council to reconsider Italy's application as a special case in view of Italy's responsibilities under the Trusteeship Agreement for Somaliland. In the event that this action is undertaken, the Delegation should endeavor to have the Committee consider the matter at the beginning of the Session and before any general discussion of the membership question arises in the Committee I.

4. However, in the event that full participation of Italy in the Trusteeship Council is not accomplished through its admission to membership in the United Nations, and if an amendment to Article 86 providing for such full participation is proposed and is desired by Italy, the Delegation should vote for it.

COMMENT

Trusteeship Council resolution 310 (VIII), requesting inclusion of this item in the General Assembly agenda, was introduced by Argentina and adopted by the Council by a vote of 9 (US)–1(USSR)–2 (UK–NZ).

547-842—79——26

Italy falls short of full participation in the Trusteeship Council only by lack of the right to vote, a right presently restricted to United Nations Members. Article 89 of the Charter provides that "each Member of the Trusteeship Council shall have one vote"; and Article 86 provides that "the Trusteeship Council shall consist of the following Members of the United Nations: (a) those Members administering Trust Territories" etc. Thus the admission of Italy to membership in the United Nations would automatically make her a member of the Trusteeship Council with, of course, all the rights of Members; including the right to vote. This solution would obviously be preferable from the point of view of Italy to a solution which would limit her participation in the United Nations to full participation in the Trusteeship Council. The United States has supported and will continue to support strongly the admission of Italy to membership in the United Nations, and will not be fully satisfied until this objective is achieved.

Insofar as tactics at the Sixth General Assembly are concerned, there would be considerable merit in having the question of Italian membership raised in the Fourth Committee in connection with "The Question of the Full Participation of Italy in the Work of the Trusteeship Council". A resolution adopted by the Fourth Committee according to which the General Assembly would request the Security Council to reconsider Italy's application in view of its responsibilities under the Trusteeship Agreement should help to strengthen the position that Italy should be considered "as a special case" by the Security Council. It could be argued that, above and beyond the declarations of the General Assembly since 1947 that Italy is fully qualified for admission, the General Assembly has granted and Italy has accepted special United Nations responsibilities in connection with the operation of the trusteeship system. Italy is seriously handicapped in discharging these responsibilities if it does not have full voting participation in the Trusteeship Council, in the General Assembly, under whose general supervision the Trusteeship Council works, and perhaps in other United Nations bodies.

Full participation of Italy in the Trusteeship Council might also be obtained by amending Article 86. The first sentence of paragraph 1 could be revised to read: "The Trusteeship Council shall consist of the following states." ("states" being substituted for "Members of the United Nations"). Sub-paragraph (a) of paragraph 1 could be changed to read: "those states administering trust territories . . ." ("states" being substituted for "Members"). Probably sub-paragraph (c) would also have to be revised to read: "as many other Members elected for three-year terms by the General Assembly as may be necessary to ensure that the total number of members of the Trusteeship Council is equally divided between those states which administer trust territories and those which do not." (The phrase "Members of the United Nations" being replaced by "states".)

As amendments to the Charter must be adopted by a vote of two-thirds of the Members of the General Assembly and ratified in accordance with their respective constitutional processes by two-thirds of the Members of the United Nations, including all the permanent members of the Security Council, amendment to Article 86 would be not only a less satisfactory solution than admission of Italy to the United Nations but also at least as difficult to achieve.

As action to amend Article 86 would be less satisfactory than the admission of Italy to membership in the United Nations and would be unnecessary if Italy had full membership, consideration of any proposal for amendment should be delayed until a decision has been reached on the membership question.

DRAFT RESOLUTION ON THE ITALIAN QUESTION
(French Working Paper)

The General Assembly

In view of Resolution 310 (VIII) of the Trusteeship Council concerning the position of Italy,

Noting that Italy has been charged by the United Nations with the administration of the Trust Territory of Somaliland and that it is at the present time exercising its responsibilities as Administering Power as they are defined in Chapters 12 and 13 of the Charter,

Considering that Italy should be put in a position to exercise these responsibilities with complete efficacy,

Believing it necessary to this end that Italy become a member of the Trusteeship Council and consequently that it be admitted to the United Nations, Recommends to the Security Council that it take urgently under consideration the present resolution with a view to recommending the immediate admission of Italy as member of the United Nations.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. James N. Hyde, Adviser, United States Delegation to the General Assembly

Subject: Italian Membership—4th Committee

Mr. Pignon
Mr. Naudy

Mr. Coulson
Mr. Parrot
Mr. Mathieson
—United Kingdom Delegation

Mr. Gerig
Mr. Sandifer
Mr. Hyde
—United States Delegation

The French called this meeting to consider a draft resolution which they had prepared in the light of a British draft [1] carrying forward the decision of the three Foreign Ministers that the Italian membership item should be moved forward in the 4th Committee at an early stage with a resolution recommending that the SC again consider Italy's application as a matter of urgency.

We made the point that clearly the tactical decision of the three Foreign Ministers are conditioned upon the fact that Italy will approve this course and feel that it forwards her cause. We added that this seemed particularly true in the light of our commitment made in the Tripartite Declaration of September 24 [26], 1951. In the light of these facts, we questioned the wisdom of getting to the point of discussing a draft with the other members. The British had stated that they had shown their working paper to Australia and Canada, as well as Argentina.

Lacoste stated that of course they intended to do nothing without consulting the Italians and they expected to see the Italians today. Naudy added that his general impression from telegrams they had received from Rome is that the draft resolution is along the general lines of what the Italians understand they are going to get.

The operative paragraph of the draft simply recommends to the SC that it should urgently consider the views of the Assembly that Italy should be recommended for immediate admission to membership in the UN.

Lacoste stated that they would seek out the Italian Ambassador to France today and be certain about what his views are. He added that after all this was only the first act, or beginning, of what we plan to do on the Italian membership application. Coulson made substantially the same comment. We replied that this underlined the importance of talking to the Italians before we set in motion a course of action without any clear idea of what the later steps would be. We added that it might well be, in the light of what the Italians have said to us, that they would consider SC action, and particularly a veto, as prejudicing the position which they and some of their other friends will want to urge in the First Committee.

We also underlined the fact that the Italians seemed to read the Tripartite Declaration as indicating some support for the aide-mémoire which they had presented our three governments, although the US has indicated its difficulties with the solution proposed in the aide-mémoire.

Lacoste stated that he thought that the later moves might really boil down to some sort of participation of Italy in Assembly committees, possibly with a vote in the committee, provided of course that Italy wanted this. However, Naudy later stated to Hyde that he could not see from a legal point of view how Italy would possibly be given a vote in Assembly committees wthout membership in the organization.

In the light of the above discussion, it was decided that we needed more time to have an agreed position and to talk to the Italians, and that we would not be prepared to proceed in the 4th Committee before Monday, November 19. Tactical steps were thereupon discussed for reaching this result. We left it that we three would consult during the course of tomorrow, November 15.

During this discussion we mentioned the fact that strong representations had been made to us, although we did not identify de Gasperi's letter to the Secretary. Neither the French nor the British indicated that they had received any representations similar to these. We did not discuss how to handle the Peruvian and Italian aide-mémoires in the First Committee. However, at one point Coulson commented that perhaps there would be some way of having the International Court of Justice pass on Italy's qualifications for membership.

J. N. HYDE

IO Files

Minutes of Twelfth Meeting of the United States Delegation to the General Assembly, Paris, November 15, 1951

SECRET

US/A/M(Chr)/199

[Here follows list of persons present (53).] [1]

With the Secretary [of State] in the chair, Mr. Taylor asked Mr. Hyde to make his presentation of the question of Italian participation in the Trusteeship Council (TC). He said this was only one of the membership problems for this Assembly. Mr. Hyde would be the adviser for Mr. Vorys, who would handle this problem in Committee.

Mr. Hyde began by stating that he would address himself to the Trusteeship Council aspirations of Italy as being only a part of Italy's general desire for UN membership. He recalled that Italy was only one of the nine candidates which in the opinion of the US were qualified for admission as members. The test set forth in the Charter in Article 4, paragraph 1, was that applicants, to be qualified for membership, must be peace-loving states, willing to accept the obligations of the Charter. In this case, the US felt that Italy was entitled to special consideration in that she had been made an administering power by the TC over her former colony of Somaliland.

Mr. Hyde recalled that at Ottawa the Secretary had been given an Aide-Mémoire by the Italians, stating that if the US and others were willing to try to surmount the previous difficulties in regard to Italian membership, the Italians would like to present a plan. (In this connection, Mr. Hyde pointed out the additional provision in the Charter, Article 4, paragraph 2, in which the procedure for admission of new members was set out. This could only be accomplished by the General Assembly upon a recommendation by the Security Council.) The essence of the Italian plan was that the GA by a two-thirds vote should admit Italy since the previous Soviet vetoes of her application had been legally unjustified in terms of the Charter requirements. The lack of legal justification lay in the fact that the Soviets would agree to vote for Italy's admission only if at the same time certain of the USSR satellites would be admitted.

Mr. Hyde then referred to the Tri-Partite declaration made in Washington by the US, UK, and France, to the effect that they would use every effort to obtain membership in the UN for Italy. Since the time that that declaration had been made, there had been many talks with the Italians. Much of the time had been spent in pointing out to the Italians the difficulties involved in disregarding the Soviet veto.

[1] For the composition and organization of the United States Delegation to the General Assembly, see pp. 37 ff.

Just as the Delegation was sailing on the America, Premier de Gasperi had written the Secretary urging a political will by the United States to circumvent the veto and resulting juridical difficulties. Mr. Hyde added that undoubtedly the Italian Ambassador would want to discuss this letter and its ideas with the Secretary during their appointment that afternoon.

On the problem of membership in general, and the question of the Italian problem in connection therewith, Mr. Hyde said that the position of the Department had been that the US should accept any plan which would achieve the results of admitting qualified applicants so long as such a plan were consistent with the Charter.

The Belaunde plan the Department did not think was consistent with the Charter. Thus unless strong support developed for it, the US would vote against it. Such sentiment favoring the plan would involve consultation with the Department. It involved admission of Italy by a ⅔ vote of the Assembly, on the theory that it was the supreme UN authority, and a request to the Court to find that the Soviet negative vote was without juridical basis.

There was another possibility in this matter. It could be characterized either as a deal with the Soviets or a delegation of power by the Security Council to the General Assembly. This involved having the US vote for or abstain on all European candidates, satellites included, in the Security Council. When the question came up in the General Assembly, we would have to trust in the hope that a two-thirds majority would only vote for the desirable candidates and reject the satellites. In this connection, he recalled the recent speech by Beria [2] on the occasion of the Soviet anniversary of the October Revolution. Beria had said that the USSR attitude had been, and continued to be, to let Italy in the UN if the Eastern European states were also admitted. This forecast a traditional Soviet attitude.

In regard to tactics for Italian participation in the Trusteeship Council, the Department position was to get quick action in C.4 for the Security Council to consider Italy's application as a special and urgent case. In addition we would want to hold off on C.1 debate on the Belaunde plan until this approach had been taken. Mr. Hyde added that Italian agreement would be necessary before this approach would be taken. We would not want to follow this tactic unless Italy felt it would help her. We and they were fairly well aware that a Soviet veto was a 99% certainty. Vyshinsky had intimated in the general debate that the USSR veto would be based on Charter grounds, i.e., that the Soviet Union opposed Italian membership because, it was claimed, Italian membership in NATO prevented Italy from being a peace-loving state.

[2] Lavrentiy Pavlovich Beriya, Deputy Chairman, U.S.S.R. Council of Ministers, Politburo, Communist Party of the Soviet Union.

Mr. Ross had talked with the Italians last night and found them agreeable to our approach being followed. However, it would seem that the Italians would then say we had tried our way and when it failed they would like to try their way. Assuming the Italians would agree to our approach, we would begin it in C.4 very soon. We had been working with the UK and France along these lines.

Should the matter come up in C.1 on the basis of the Belaunde plan, the suggested position would be to seek amendment of Article 86 in order to allow the Italians to participate in the Trusteeship Council with full voting rights. Granted that this would be a propaganda move, since the amendment process would be subject to a Soviet veto just as Security Council matters were, the next step would be to seek to give Italy the right to be represented in all the main committees, but without a vote. This would seem to be about the extent to which we could go in helping the Italians under the tri-partite statement.

The Secretary wondered if consideration had been given to the chances of submitting the results of a Soviet veto to the ICJ. Mr. Fisher thought that it would be very wise to consider ways of getting around the veto, perhaps in some such way. He recalled that an Advisory Opinion of the ICJ had held that a Security Council recommendation was essential before General Assembly action was possible. Some way would have to be found to get a Security Council recommendation which the Soviets could not veto. The other advisory opinion on membership which said that members of the Security Council could not attach to their votes conditions extraneous to those listed in the Charter had been vitiated in Mr. Fisher's opinion by the statement at the end that of course if a Security Council member simply voted against such a recommendation, without attaching reasons, there would be nothing the Court could do. Mr. Cohen suggested breaking the Gordian knot and proposing that Italy be allowed to sit in all General Assembly Plenary and Committee meetings and to express its ideas and how it would vote if it were allowed to. This would be on the assumption that we did not change our ideas on membership as expressed earlier.

Mr. Ross recalled the attitude of the Italian observers in New York which had consistently been against any glorified observership. This of course had been due in part to their bargaining position. If they had indicated they could agree to anything less than full membership, their chances of achieving it, no matter how small, would have been reduced to zero. The night before, the Italians in Paris had told him that they agreed to our approach in the following sense. It was like a frame into which the Belaunde plan or a similar scheme would properly fit.

Ambassador Kirk said that the more we did along the lines suggested the more we tipped our hand that we might be willing to reach a quid pro quo arrangement. The Russian bargaining position on this matter was fairly unassailable.

Mr. Taylor said that in Washington the Italian attitude had been the same as that described by Mr. Ross. He conceded that they might change when they found how difficult the chances of surmounting a Soviet veto really were. In connection with Mr. Cohen's suggestion, he said that Mr. Dulles had been thinking of something along those lines for Japan.

Ambassador Gross wondered whether the US would only take the proposed Committee 4 approach if the Italians agreed. Mr. Hyde said that the UK and French working-level people had agreed that it would not be wise to try this approach if the Italians themselves thought it would kill their chances of getting in. It was true, however, that this had never actually been mentioned in the talks of the Secretary with De Gasperi in Washington.

Mr. Maffitt wondered if the Delegation had complete information on how much domestic harm would be done to the Italian government should our membership tactic fail. The Italians had left dark insinuations as to the calamities which would befall them. Mr. Sandifer said this aspect had been considered in Washington, but no black and white answer was possible. Mr. Vorys wondered about this aspect too. Mr. Nolting offered the information that a telegram from Ambassador Dunn placed this matter on the same level of vital importance as the revision of the Italian Peace Treaty, as far as the Italians were concerned. . . .

On the basis of his talks in New York with Count Guidotti, the Italian observer at the UN, Ambassador Gross felt that another exercise to get the Italians admitted, should it fail, would lead them to believe their destiny was really controlled by the Kremlin. Thus it would be unwise in the extreme to embark on some course from which there was no retreat, should things not go exactly as we wished.

Mr. Fisher considered what courses were available. We could go to the SC again and seek to have the Italians evince proof of their qualifications. If the USSR vetoed such a course of action, then we could ask the ICJ for an advisory opinion on the validity of such a veto. We should not ignore the fact that the chances of a negative reaction from the Court were very great. This, of course, would not be a bad result per se. It could be argued that it was better to litigate and lose than to lose only in a political arena. Perhaps a variant of the Belaunde plan might be better than going around the same vicious circle again.

Going back to Mr. Cohen's idea, Ambassador Kirk wondered if it might not backfire to the extent of the Russians trying to get glorified observership for their satellites. To this, Mr. Cohen answered that we had won so far on this matter, and indications were that we could continue to do so. Mr. Fisher thought any objective test applied to giving this type of membership would assure our favored candidates of winning and the satellites losing.

Mr. Vorys wondered how accommodating the USSR would be in voting in the SC again as they had in the past. Might they not rather veto on Charter grounds this time, thereby preventing our gambit. Mr. Fisher was inclined to agree that the ICJ in any case could only go so far as to point out that extraneous considerations had been attached, a course of action not allowed by the Charter. It would not go to the extent of deciding such political questions as whether Italy or any other state were peace-loving.

Mr. Gerig warned the Delegation that Committee 4 action on this item would come up no later than the following Monday. Mr. Sandifer added that since negotiating had already been begun on the basis of the position as described, USGADel's decision should be a clear one. The Secretary gathered that there were no differences with the basic position. All that had occurred at the meeting was to have the difficulties pointed out for the Delegation's benefit. Mr. Hyde recommended that, after the Secretary saw the Italian Ambassador that afternoon, Mr. Vorys should talk with the Italian observer on this matter. The Secretary agreed that all he himself could do would be to say that we were very willing to talk these matters over with the Italians. Mr. Ross added the information that the chief reason the Italian Ambassador would be coming to see the Secretary concerned migration. The Secretary suggested that Mr. Fisher look into the chances of coming up with a variant on the Belaunde plan acceptable to us.

[Here follows brief discussion of other matters.]

CONFIDENTIAL PRIORITY

PARIS, November 17, 1951—1 a. m.

Delga 225. Subj: Italy's views on migration problem and Ital membership in UN. Ital Amb to France, Pietro Quaroni, called on Secy Nov 15 and first brought up migration ques. He said his govt fully understood US position this subj at recent Naples conf, and wanted only to stress Italy's interest in continuing work on migration and to urge US participation and leadership therein. He said that Italy is not developing grandiose schemes, but is very eager that Brussels mtg produce concrete results in form of continuation of present flow of migration.

Secy told Amb that US is in agreement with Ital Govt on this ques; that we were under certain limitations at Naples conf which Ital Govt understood; that we intended to work at Brussels for arrangements which would keep fleet of ships in operation with purpose of continuing flow of emigration for another year, and that we had appropriated funds for this purpose.

Amb Quaroni then raised ques of Ital membership in UN, addressing himself principally to res proposed by Fr in Comite 4. When asked whether this res was considered helpful by Ital Govt, Amb Quaroni replied that it would be so considered only if US, UK and Fr have plans which go beyond expected Russian veto in SC; that is to say, the matter would not be allowed to die in SC, but would be revived in some form in the GA after expected veto. Amb Quaroni was not clear as to what form a renewed effort in the SC, after expected veto, might take. He finally said that his govt would be satisfied with some "demonstration" which could be interpreted by Ital people as indicating that Assembly would not rest content with a veto of Italy's membership application.

Secy said to Amb that each time we take a sounding of Ital Govts attitude with respect to a suggested procedure in this matter, we get a different result. He said that we are not inclined to attempt to override the Charter in this matter, altho we are sincerely desirous of finding a formula which would be helpful to the De Gasperi govt. He asked whether the Ital Govt had considered possibility of being voted into most of the organs of the UN with the right to participate in every respect except voting. Amb replied that this had been suggested before and that his govt did not consider it a satis solution.

Subsequent conversation between Rep Vorys, USGADel staff and Guidotti [1] showed clearly that Guidotti thinks Ital Govt would not be satisfied with result of Comite 4 res as now envisaged by US, UK and French but expect much more than that as consequence of tripartite statement. Matter now stands with Itals as follows: They will check with Rome on whether or not Ital Govt desires three govts to proceed with res in Comite 4 and will communicate Ital Govt's views on Mon.

USGADel's action this matter has been based on premise that it is better to be forthright with Itals at outset than to embark on course of action, the conclusion of which they and we regard differently.

CONFIDENTIAL [PARIS,] November 15, 1951.

Subject: Italian Membership

Present: Count Guidotti, Italian Observer
Messrs. Vorys, Fisher, Nolting, Hyde—US Delegation

Guidotti called at our request and went over all the familiar ground in arguing Italy's case along the lines of the Italian aide-mémoire and de Gasperi letter.

He denied, although none of us had suggested it that Italy feels that the tripartite declaration commits us to an illegal course. In restating the entire argument of the Italian aide-mémoire, he stressed the fact that no "juridical way" can be found to obtain Italy's admission, that action to circumvent the veto is necessary and he thought that such action had been agreed to in the light of the fact the last Soviet veto was illegal.

He went on to say that all that is necessary is a political decision and a political will on the part of the US, UK and France and from this will flow the necessary legal maneuvers which the Legal Advisers would then be instructed by the Foreign Ministers to provide. He thought his reading of the tripartite declaration was correct that it committed us to something more than the dead end of another veto or a propaganda debate in the Assembly.

Mr. Vorys commented that of course he understood that Italy wanted to come into the UN by any legal method we could discover but he felt Italy would not want to enter by the exercise of a power play in disregard of the very Charter under which Italy wanted to undertake obligations. Mr. Fisher commented that there is probably not so sharp a distinction between the legal and political aspects in that some political courses are not possible unless legal ways to accomplish them can be discovered. In other words, as Mr. Vorys added, it does not follow that where there is a will there is a way.

Guidotti went on to say that of course he was aware of what he termed the Anglo-French draft resolution. He had told Broustra that Italy would approve it and that he thought it was very good as far as it went in providing the frame into which a picture would later be placed. As Guidotti put it, after the application again goes to the SC, is vetoed and returned to the GA, he expected that the Assembly would then itself take action on the application. He had been surprised and disturbed when the French had told him on Nov 15 for the first time that the idea of a resolution taking the case to the SC is all that was intended. This put the procedure in a very different light. He had telegraphed his government for instructions. He had recommended Italy's acceptance none the less of such a resolution, because he felt that Italy would have freedom of action in considering next steps. He expects a reply by Monday, November 19.

Mr. Vorys commented that he thought our thinking about a resolution sending the application to the SC was that it was the picture itself and not merely the frame. He added that it was rather a question of whether this course is what Italy wants and would help her, not a question of whether Italy would object or agree to it.

In response to our questions, Guidotti reacted strongly that of and by itself another trip to the SC would be extremely bad from the Italian point of view in that it is bound to result in a veto, probably based on the claim Italy is not peace loving because of her membership in NATO. He felt this would depress the just hopes of the Italian people which have been fed by the optimism of current newspaper articles. For his part, unless his government thought that a lot of noise was useful, he would prefer to see nothing done other than a general laudatory debate on Italy in the Assembly rather than undertaking this useless action.

Assuming, however, that we were to persist in this course, he pointed out that in the SC it would be possible for the President to rule that this is a procedural issue and in so doing he would act in accordance with the findings of the Interim Committee and thus avoid a Soviet veto. Hyde pointed out that neither the IC nor the GA had ever taken the position that a SC vote on membership is procedural. Guidotti also felt that the double veto technique might be used to support this tactic in the Council.

Then he went on to state the Italian thesis that since the 1949 Soviet veto is illegal, the GA might by a ⅔ vote take Italy into the UN on the ground that there exists a recommendation of the SC, the Soviet negative vote being illegal. Mr. Vorys commented that he had very great difficulty with the concept of overlooking the need for a SC recommendation in the light of the two advisory opinions of the Court, particularly the 1950 one. He suggested that Italy would not want to put herself in the position of coming into the UN by a device which might be challenged as sound Charter interpretation. He asserted that we all have the strongest political will to see Italy a member. In this connection, speaking personally, Mr. Vorys wondered whether the Assembly might put to the ICJ for an advisory opinion the question of whether the Soviet vote in 1949 is a veto or an illegal vote in violation of the rule contained in the 1948 opinion of the Court. He thought this possibly might lay a foundation for improving Italy's position and even a negative decision by the Court would not do any particular harm. Guidotti replied that he had never thought of this idea but off hand he was opposed to it and thought that it would be the final nail in the coffin.

Having pursued this line to the end, Guidotti then suggested that the SC might recommend every present and future applicant in sight and by a selective process let each applicant argue its case before the Assembly on the theory that the satellites could not possibly get a ⅔ vote. He added that he could see no moral difficulty with this, because some UN members are just as bad as some of the applicants. He had advised his government against urging this course, however, because he thought it would be politically impossible for the US. Mr. Vorys was glad Guidotti had urged his government against this course, because he could not see how we could possibly agree and it was hard for him to understand how Italy could want to enter the UN in the same category as various gangster states.

We then raised the possibility of participation without a vote in all the main committees and subcommittees of the GA. Mr. Nolting recalled that this question had been mentioned by the Secretary to Ambassador Quaroni earlier in the day. Guidotti's reaction was definite and negative. He stated he could reject the idea without consulting his government further; it involved second class citizenship in the UN; it had been thoroughly discussed in Washington and his own experience in the Trusteeship Council showed that a state could have no prestige without a vote. He saw no useful purpose in preparing the suggestion in writing to be transmitted to the Foreign Office as Quaroni had suggested.

That brought him to the conclusion that he was very disappointed in what we had to offer, considering the language of the tripartite declaration and the statement in the acknowledgment of de Gasperi's letter that the State Department appreciates the political problem present and the necessity for finding a solution. He added that he felt he saw strong sentiment in the GA not to allow the situation of "veto, veto, veto" to continue. Is it right, he inquired, for an ally in NATO to be separated from the majority of the other NATO members and prevented in the foreseeable future from any hope of UN admission? He had stated that the realization of this would be very difficult for his government but when Mr. Vorys asked a few questions about what the Italian domestic political problem was on this issue, Guidotti did not go into detail. As he left he said that he would be more discouraged but for the fact that the Italian position had been thoroughly rejected previously. We made it clear that our own thinking is all in the direction of trying to find a way to solve the problem, acting within the Charter and in accordance with Italy's views.

SECRET PRIORITY PARIS, November 17, 1951—8 p. m.

Delga 239. Subject: Italian membership. As consequence of conflicting info re Italian position on membership item in Comite 4 and also apparently conflicting approaches in French del, Vorys together with Gross, Fisher and Hyde met with Broustra, Chauvel and others (France); Coulson and Vallat (UK) and Guidotti and Quaroni (Italy). From this meeting there emerged the fol agreed minute which in its original draft was prepared by US. This and earlier conversations will be separately reported:

"1. The item on Ital membership in the Fourth Comite of the GA, involving as it does the participation of Italy in the TC, presents a basis upon which the Fourth Comite and the GA can ask the SC to act urgently on Italy's application and as a special case.

2. It is most likely that the reconsideration of the Italian application in the SC will lead to a veto there. This course of action will provide an occasion for statements in support of Italy and in sympathy with her just claim for membership, but will probably not result in the necessary favorable recommendation by the SC.

3. The Ital reps, in spite of this fact, stated that, in the view of their govt, this course, being the only one which is open under the present circumstances, will be helpful if undertaken in the interest of Italy by France with the support of the UK and the US, and therefore recommend it to the three govts. The Ital observer will make known to friendly members of the UN his govt's support for this course of action.

4. It is understood that a Sov veto of Italy's application in the SC will not commit any of the three govts to the position that a foundation has thereby been laid for action by the GA or the SC which they might consider in violation of the Charter. However, the three govts are prepared to discuss any course of action they consider consistent with the procedures of the action Charter and with the national policies of all the govts concerned."

The Italian Observer at the United Nations (Guidotti) to the Deputy United States Representative at the United Nations (Gross)[1]

PARIS, November 20, 1951.

DEAR AMBASSADOR GROSS: I have sent to Rome the summary record of the conference held at the Quai d'Orsay on Saturday last, November 17, 1951.

Meanwhile, as I have already communicated to Congressman Vorys and to Mr. Hyde, as well as to your English and French colleagues, a telegramme from Rome has arrived, in reply to the one I sent to my Ministry on November 15 following Ambassador Quaroni's conversation with the Secretary of State, expressing the view that in the present circumstances the French proposal should be accepted as the only alternative open to us.

[1] Notation: "Copy sent to Lacoste Nov 22."

I am now carrying out the pledge I have undertaken to represent to our common Latin-American friends the advisability of giving their full support to the French resolution.

I note that some misapprehension seems to have [been] aroused as to the attitude of the Italian Government or their Representatives here. I think the explanation lies in the fact that we were confronted with successive situations and, consequently, had to take successive positions.

May I resumé here briefly what happened. On my arrival here on November 1, I was informed of the French plan, which I communicated to my Government. Their reaction was that the plan was excellent as a procedure, provided that further consultations should take place as to what action to take if and when the application for the admission of Italy had been blocked by a fifth Russian veto. This may be described as a conditional acceptance. I communicated as much to M. Broustra, Chef de Conférences at the Quai d'Orsay.

On November 15, Ambassador Quaroni saw Mr. Acheson who intimated that he did not see the way for any further development if, as was to be expected, the proposed course of action should lead to a Russian veto in the Security Council. I immediately reported this to my Government, asking, in view of this situation, whether I could drop the reservation formerly attached to the Italian acceptance.

Such was the Italian position when, on Thursday night November 15, I had a very exhaustive conversation with Congressman Vorys, who was assisted by several other gentlemen, and I had the opportunity of stating it as clearly as I could.

On the morning of Saturday 17, M. Chauvel called Ambassador Quaroni by telephone, saying that the postponement of the debate on the French resolution in the 4th Committee would present some difficulty, and asking that a reply as to the Italian position be possibly given before 3 p. m. of the same day. There was no time to elicit a direct reply from Rome; therefore, as I hope to have made clear the other evening at the Quai d'Orsay, I asked for authority to accept the French proposal from M. Taviani, Italian Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who was in Paris on that day. Having received the authorization, I communicated it to M. Chauvel at 3 p. m.

The press of circumstances was such that I did not think, at the moment, and I regret it sincerely, to make a similar communication to the United States and British Representatives. It was my impression that Ambassador Chauvel's request was made in the name of the three Great Powers and that my communication would therefore be instantly circulated to the other Representatives.[2]

Yours most sincerely, GASTONE GUIDOTTI

Memorandum by Mr. James N. Hyde, Adviser, United States Delegation to the General Assembly, to the Secretary of State

CONFIDENTIAL [PARIS,] November 22, 1951.

Subject: Present Status of Italy's Application for Membership in the United Nations

As a result of some uncertainty about what the Government of Italy really wanted from the United States, United Kingdom and France in connection with our offer again to take Italy's membership application to the Security Council, representatives of the four governments met at the Quai d'Orsay on November 17. The United States was represented by Representative Vorys and Ambassador Gross.

From this meeting there evolved an agreed minute [1] accepted by the Italian Ambassador to France, Quaroni, and the Ambassador who is a United Nations observer, Guidotti. This minute states that we are willing as a matter of urgency to take Italy's case once more to the Security Council and that we think a Soviet veto there is most likely. However, this course will provide an occasion for statements in support of Italy.

The Italian representatives stated that in the view of their government this course being the only one which is open under the circumstances will be helpful if undertaken in the interest of Italy, and Guidotti agreed to make known to the Latin American delegations his government's support for this course of action which Italy recommends to the United States, United Kingdom and France.

The minute also indicated that a Soviet veto would not commit us to the position that a foundation had been laid for other United Nations action which we might consider in violation of the Charter.

The Italians have confirmed this agreement to us in writing and Guidotti tells us he is carrying out the pledge to represent to the Latin Americans the advisability of giving full support to this course. The French have also confirmed through their Embassy in Rome that our minute expresses the view of the Italian Government.

We shall, therefore, proceed on the basis of the French resolution recommending that Italy's application go to the Security Council as soon as the Italians tell us they have finished their diplomatic preparation. We expect to open debate in the Fourth Committee on November 26.[2]

[2] Fourth Committee discussion occurred on November 27 and 28. U.S. Representative Vorys made a statement on November 27. The French draft resolution (Doc. A/C.4/L.142) was adopted on November 28, after a Polish draft resolution, arguing against Fourth Committee competence to handle the matter, was defeated. The resolution adopted was substantially the same as the draft of November 14, p. 385, but amplified and refined somewhat that text. For the proceedings in the Fourth Committee, see United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, Sixth Session, Fourth Committee, pp. 71 ff.

Subject: Italian Membership Question in the Security Council

Participants: Amb. Antonio Quevedo, Delegation of Ecuador
Amb. Ernest Gross, U.S. Delegation

Following the Security Council dinner last night, Amb. Quevedo raised with me the Italian Membership problem with which he expects to be faced in December while he is in the chair. He is clearly under great pressures from his Latin American colleagues to do what he can to assist Italian aspirations for admission to the United Nations. He asked what our attitude would be if, as President of the Security Council, he should rule that a Soviet vote against the Italian application did not constitute a "legal veto" in the event the Soviet Representative should rest his negative vote on grounds which the International Court of Justice in its advisory opinion had declared improper.

Quevedo recalled that in the Fourth Committee the Soviet Representative had explained his negative attitude on the basis of "discrimination against other States" which were also applicants for membership.

Quevedo expressed the fear that if he should make such a ruling, the Soviet Union "might walk out of the Security Council" or even leave the United Nations. I expressed grave doubts that any such consequence would follow, but added that the question he raised deserved careful consideration and that we were now considering the matter and I did not think it fair or wise to express even a preliminary reaction at this time.

Quevedo then asked what I thought the situation would be if he did not make such a ruling, but left it to the Council to decide whether the Soviet negative vote was or was not a veto under the circumstances envisaged. I pointed out this would unquestionably lead the Council at once into a double veto problem and would undoubtedly precipitate a suggestion that the question be sent to the International Court of Justice.

We agreed to resume discussion of the foregoing suggestions, which I repeated were matters to which we wanted to give careful attention and that we were not now prepared to discuss them.

Quevedo concluded the discussion by saying that he was afraid that if he did not make such a ruling or if the Security Council did not pass upon the question of the legal effect of the Soviet negative vote, the General Assembly itself might vote to admit Italy to membership on the basis that Security Council action constituted a compliance with Article 4, despite the Soviet negative vote. Quevedo thought there would be strong sentiment in the Assembly for such action, the best counter to which probably would be General Assembly reference of the matter to the International Court of Justice.

CONFIDENTIAL [PARIS,] December 5, 1951.

US/A/3407

QUESTION OF THE FULL PARTICIPATION OF ITALY IN THE WORK OF THE TRUSTEESHIP COUNCIL: REPORT OF THE FOURTH COMMITTEE (A/1990)

1. UNITED STATES POSITION

The United States should vote in favor of the resolution recommended by the Fourth Committee which (a) notes that Italy has been charged by the UN with the administration of the Trust Territory of Somaliland; (b) considers that Italy should be enabled to exercise those responsibilities with complete effectiveness; (c) expresses the opinion that it is necessary, therefore, for Italy to become a member of the Trusteeship Council and for that purpose to be admitted to the UN and takes account of the fact that Italy satisfies Charter requirements for membership; and (d) recommends that the Security Council give urgent consideration to this resolution with a view to recommending the immediate admission of Italy to the UN.

The President, in accordance with rule 67, will ask the Assembly whether there should be plenary discussion of the Fourth Committee report; the United States should vote against plenary discussion.

2. HISTORY IN COMMITTEE

The above resolution was introduced by France. An amendment, proposed by Guatemala, adding the consideration that Italy satisfies Charter requirements for membership, was accepted by the sponsor. The amended resolution was adopted by 50 votes to 5, with 0 abstentions. Prior to the vote on this resolution, a draft resolution, introduced by Poland, was rejected by 48 votes to 5, with 1 abstention. Under the Polish resolution the Fourth Committee would have decided not to vote on the French resolution on the ground that the question of recommending the admission of Italy to the UN was outside the Committee's competence.

3. POSSIBLE DEVELOPMENTS IN PLENARY

Since the delegations primarily interested in this item have indicated that they do not desire debate of the Fourth Committee report, it is likely that there will be no debate. It is probable, however, that the Soviet delegations, in explanations of vote, will vigorously oppose the resolution on the grounds that (a) it discriminates against other (Soviet) applicants for membership; and (b) it is illegal on the ground that the Fourth Committee was not competent to deal with the membership issue. Depending upon the nature of the Soviet remarks, it may be desirable for the United States, also on an explanation of vote, to make a short statement.[1]

[1] The resolution recommended by the Fourth Committee was adopted by the General Assembly in a plenary meeting on December 7 (54–5–1). For the proceedings in the General Assembly, see United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, Sixth Session, Plenary Meetings, pp. 220 ff. No statement was made by the United States Representative. There is a text of a comprehensive draft statement prepared for the use of the United States Representative, in the event of a number of contingencies, in the UNP Files, Lot 59 D 237, "Italian Membership".

Delga 526. Re: Italian Membership—Tactics in SC. Further Delga 463,[1] Quevedo (Ecuador)[2] has raised with Gross question US attitude if as SC pres he shld rule that Sov negative vote on Ital membership application is not a legal veto, assuming that USSR rep rested his negative vote on grounds ICJ declared improper in 1948 opinion.

[1] December 1, not printed.

[2] Antonio Quevedo of Ecuador was President of the Security Council during the month of December.

If Pres shld so rule, USSR might walk out of SC, which we do not consider likely, might challenge the ruling, or might declare ruling illegal. If there was a challenge, on legal grounds it wld be difficult for US not to vote with USSR to support it. Politically this wld be considered a vote against Italy and it is not certain that seven votes to over-rule the chair wld be forthcoming. Sitn has been tentatively discussed with Coulson (UK) who personally is sympathetic to fol analysis:

1. Itals regard GA action on Fourth Comite Res as "only the beginning". Wide Latin Amer support exists for this view, led by Colombia, Peru, Argentina, Venezuela and Uruguay. This is basis pressure on Quevedo as SC Pres.

2. When application is put to vote in SC:

(a). USSR might vote in favor or abstain. We discount either possibility as most unlikely. Either wld lead to desirable result of Italy's admission.

(b). USSR might vote against application giving no reason. Krylov [3] in '48 ICJ dissent stated USSR might do this and that such a negative vote is not "subj to control". It wld be most difficult for SC Pres to rule that Sov negative vote is illegal and not a veto if no reasons were given by USSR, which after the vote cld use device of explanation. We feel that if Pres attempts to rule such a vote with no previous explanation illegal, US shld not support it.

(c). USSR might cast negative vote on specific ground of art four (1) that Italy is not peace loving on account of NATO membership. Again it wld be difficult for Pres to rule this negative vote is not a veto and it wld be difficult for US to support such presidential ruling.

(d). Real problem wld be created for US by Sov negative vote in the language of Sov note of October 11 in reply to Tri declaration. This language was restated by USSR Rep in Fourth Comite debates, i.e., that it voted against Italy because of discrimination against Bulgaria, Hungary and Finland.

3. Possibility (d), and to a less degree (c), cld present US with a sitn where a presidential ruling that a Sov vote is illegal wld create serious and dangerous precedent.

(a). It has always been the position of US that vote on membership applications is a substantive matter. This was agreed among permanent members and by San Francisco Conf.[4] Vandenberg res of June 11, 1948,[5] in para 1, is based on this conclusion. Also 14 Sov negative votes treated by SC president as vetoes.

IC and GA consideration of veto recognized this fact with Argentina and several others dissenting.

(b). We have all recognized, however, that abuse of veto by USSR can be limited and have agreed to do so through double veto procedure in certain cases where the vote is on a question which the Charter of Part I of San Fran statement [6] indicate is procedural in character. In doing so the risk was recognized of allowing a device which USSR unwittingly invoked in Czech case, of challenge of President's ruling under SC rule 32, to be invoked to decide whether a question is substantive or procedural.[7]

(c). Quevedo's suggestion, shared by Argentina and Peru, pushes this procedure a long step further by suggesting that on a vote admittedly on a substantive question the Chairman shall be given the power to determine the legality or illegality of the vote. The consequence of this is that any seven members of SC can decide on the legal consequences of a negative vote of a permanent member, i.e., whether or not it is a veto. It goes far beyond any step US has previously taken. In the present case, there is ICJ opinion of 1948 clearly relevant which wld give added color of legality to SC president's position. It opens an entirely new approach to limitation of the veto.

(d). These legal considerations wld lead US to oppose such ruling by the chair. If made, we wld be in dilemma of having to vote to challenge it, thus admitting that it can stand unless challenged, or of denying right of Pres to rule and see decision stand. Also, we wld have polit opprobrium of having contributed by it to prevent Italy's admission to UN.

In this connection, we do not attempt to evaluate possibility of Sov withdrawal from SC or UN on this issue, but we wld feel Sov attitude is more likely to be conditioned on over-all strategic considerations.

4. In the light of these considerations, we feel it important not to find ourselves in position described in two (c) and (d). Considering Latin Amer coolness toward our views and zeal for Ital membership, we recommend that US be prepared with proposal directly after SC vote and before ruling of Pres to refer to ICJ ques of legality of Sov vote and suspend ruling of Pres until advisory opinion is obtained on the question whether Ital application has or has not been recommended. There is likelihood that ICJ wld not entertain request regardless of how framed on grounds there is pending polit issue involved. On the other hand, we wld buy time by this tactic and also have some more legal basis for eventual action by SC. Of course, if USSR vetoed res to go to the court, GA cld request opinion.

Gadel 406. Re Ital membership (Delga 526, Dec 6, 590, Dec 10). This tel deals with suggested SC tactics only in event USSR casts negative vote on Italy's application giving as sole reason grounds declared improper by ICJ, i.e., only Alternative (d) Delga 526. Dept understands Quevedo will not raise question legality Sov vote if USSR shld veto, alleging any Charter grounds for its action or giving no reasons at all. Is this correct?

According US/S/1863, Quevedo has suggested alternative possibilities of (1) Pres ruling that Sov vote does not, in light ICJ opinion, constitute a legal veto, and SC recommendation has thus carried or

(2) submittal by Pres to SC of question whether Sov vote is illegal and void. Dept has great difficulties both alternatives and hopes Quevedo can be dissuaded from invoking either. Dept strongly of view first alternative highly objectionable. It establishes new far-reaching precedent that Pres SC has right to rule that a Member's vote illegal and void. To allow Pres make such ruling in this particular case subject only to rule 30 wld mean Pres can nullify Member's vote and vote will be void unless seven members agree override him. Thus legality any Member's vote left in hands Pres and 4 other members. In addition far-reaching Charter implications involved this procedure, dangers of abuse cannot be minimized. If, e.g. on such precedent Sov chairman SC ruled Chi Nationalist's vote illegal, it might not be possible get seven votes to overrule.

Second alternative less objectionable since it wld require in effect seven votes to declare member vote illegal. Nevertheless, as indicated, entire concept declaring member vote illegal highly questionable and troublesome. There is no clear authority for concept in Charter or in past SC practice, unlike double veto procedure which has not only precedent but is also problem inherent in Charter and contemplated San Francisco statement. Also, in vote under second alternative, serious difficulty remains since vote wld appear to be subject to veto under Charter and San Francisco statement. Justification of overruling double veto when question is "substance or procedure" is that where a particular question is defined as procedural in Charter or San Francisco statement, or is otherwise indubitably procedural. Part II, para 2 San Francisco statement does not apply. Nowhere, however, is question legality member's vote defined as procedural question nor can it be said that such question is clearly procedural. This question wld seem therefore subject to veto within Part II, para 2 San Francisco statement.

ICJ suggestion does not present above difficulties but, as indicated Deptel 177 Oct 4 to USUN, has difficulties its own.

Before firming up final views this matter, Dept wld be interested in any info Del may be able obtain other friendly SC members, particularly Ecuador, Braz, UK, Fr and Neth re most desirable SC tactics.

Memorandum by Mr. James N. Hyde, Adviser, United States Delegation to the General Assembly [1]

SECRET [PARIS,] December 11, 1951.

Subject: Italian Membership Application

We have raised with the State Department the question of whether we should not step in with a request for an advisory opinion in the Security Council should Quevedo be inclined to rule that a Soviet negative vote on Italy's application is not a veto.

Vallat (UK Legal Adviser) and I feel that the question to the Court should be very carefully formulated. We are putting to the Court the question of interpreting Article 27 of the Charter and, therefore, interpreting the scope of the veto. In general, we will therefore want to phrase the question narrowly to avoid any attacks by individual judges on what we think to be the proper scope of the veto. Also, we want to phrase the question in such a way as to get favorable replies from our own point of view from a majority of the Court. In this connection, we can probably expect the Latin American judges to take a pretty strong line on limiting the veto. Of course, Judges Ugon and Rau may well disqualify themselves in this case.

From the point of view of narrowing the question down, it is of course better to frame the question in terms of the exact issue before the Court on the question of Italian membership. This is done in alternative a. On the other hand, there might be some tendency in the Court not to render an opinion on what would thus seem to be a purely political question.

Alternative b attempts to state the question precisely but in general terms, although not specifically mentioning Italy's application. This is in line with the 1948 majority opinion of the Court which stated that an abstract statement of the question precludes a purely political interpretation of it so that the Court might properly render an opinion. The Court cited this language of the 1948 opinion at page 7 of its 1950 opinion, stating that when framed in abstract terms a request to the Court to undertake the interpretation of a Charter provision is essentially a judicial task to which one should not attribute a political character.

Both formulations of the question recognize that in the 1950 opinion the Court specifically pointed out that it was not deciding what the effect of a negative vote in the Security Council is. It was proceeding on the theory that the Security Council had decided that such a negative vote constitutes a veto. That very question which the Court purposely avoided is the precise one we wish to put before it here.

A separate tactical question in the Security Council arises about whether we would want to request an advisory opinion even if Quevedo assured us that he would rule a negative vote to be a veto. To request an advisory opinion in this situation would be to keep the question in suspense in the General Assembly in order to prevent the Latin Americans attempting to vote Italy in. However, before deciding this we would need to evaluate what the practical chances are of a two-thirds vote on such a proposition.

Editorial Note

On December 18 the Security Council became seized of the Italian membership question, upon receiving the General Assembly's resolution of December 7 (transmitted by the Secretary-General in letter of December 10 (UN Doc. S/2435, December 10)). At the same time, the Security Council adopted the provisional agenda submitted by the Council President (Quevedo), which included the general membership question. On December 19, the French Representative (Chauvel) submitted a short draft resolution, recommending the admission of Italy to membership in the United Nations. After much discussion, the Soviet Representative (Malik), following a long speech on his part, submitted a draft resolution recommending a general admission of all states which had applications pending at that time (see Paris telegram Delga 794, December 22, infra). Immediately following, the United States Representative (Gross) made a long statement, examining all aspects of the complicated situation that had arisen. Thereupon the Representative of France (Chauvel) moved an adjournment. The Security Council President (Quevedo) declared that it was not parliamentarily necessary to put the motion to a vote, and in the absence of any comment, took it to be the intention and the wish of the Council to postpone discussion of the question "indefinitely".

ITALIAN MEMBERSHIP

POSSIBLE COURSES OF ACTION IN PREPARATION FOR DECEMBER 21 MEETING WITH ITALIANS

The Italian observers have asked Thompson, Sale and Hyde for a frank exploratory discussion of possibilities on the basis of the facts as they now exist concerning Italy's membership application. As Guidotti put it, we must decide whether to agree or disagree.

The tripartite declaration is a commitment by the US, UK and France to make every effort to secure Italy's membership in the UN. This declaration was formulated after the Italian aide-mémoire was presented to the Secretary of State at Ottawa. The basic premise of this aide-mémoire is that the US must have the political will to admit Italy and then it can find the necessary legal formula to carry out that will.

After conversations in New York, Washington and Paris, there was agreement in writing between the three parties on the one hand and Italy (Delga 239, Nov. 17) that we should take Italy's application to the SC, and Italy recommended this course to us, it being understood that a Soviet veto would not commit us to the position that a foundation had been laid for action by either the Assembly or the Council which we ourselves might consider in violation of the Charter. We agreed, however, to continue our discussions of any possible courses of action which we feel consistent with the Charter.

With French leadership, we took a resolution recommending Italian membership through the GA and into the SC. At the Dec. 19 meeting of the Council it became clear that the Soviet Union would veto the Italian application if considered alone. However, Malik put in a resolution recommending the admission of 13 applicants for membership, the 5 satellites, plus the 8 applicants whom we favor including Italy. However, he excluded one current applicant, the Republic of Korea. Also, on the day that the SC was considering this, Vietnam filed an application.

In the GA the First Committee will reach at some time, it being the next to the last item, the general membership question. There are several suggestions that will then come up with leadership from Peru, Argentina and Colombia. The general lines of the debate will probably be an attack on the veto and a recommendation to have the GA by a ⅔ vote admit Italy to membership on the theory that the Soviet Union's 1949 veto, or its 1950 veto if we put it to a vote, are illegal. This might or might not involve the variant of requesting an opinion on this point from the International Court.

Within the past week the Italians asked us not to put their application to a vote in the SC. The resulting tactical situation would be that we will be faced with a GA move to vote Italy in or, as an alternative, that the SC consider the Soviet negative vote not a veto. The US would oppose both of these courses under our current instructions as threatening very seriously the existence of the veto.

In the light of the above facts, the following possibilities occur to me:

1. An arrangement for admitting some or all current applicants, or perhaps admitting future ones as well, by a blanket vote of the SC.

(a) As soon as the Dec. 19 SC meeting was over, Castro of Brazil and Guidotti suggested that the Soviet resolution might pass with a US abstention and the GA would then admit such applicants as it wanted. This would not involve any agreement by the US to vote for the satellite either in the Assembly or the SC. By putting in this resolution the USSR has committed itself and cannot seek commitments on the side, because its resolution must be put to the vote.

(b) Another possibility would be to amend the Soviet resolution or attempt to get them to agree to amend it to include all applicants plus Libya, Spain, Japan, the Associated States and Germany, letting the GA screen the applications.

The US has uniformly indicated that it will not agree to a deal involving the admission of satellites in return for the admission of Italy (Control 2468, Dec. 15).[1] While it could be argued that there is in no sense agreement between the US and USSR if we were to abstain on the Soviet resolution, yet we would at least be acquiescing in a tactic which is contrary to the principle which we have stated time and again that each application should be considered on its merits. The Soviet Union has twice tried exactly the same stunt and each time we have refused to agree to it. On June 21, 1949, Senator Austin rejected this idea, referring to its earlier rejection by Herschel Johnson[2] on September 25, 1947. Under the SC rules, if we did nothing the Soviet resolution could come to a vote without being divided into parts, because the sponsor can refuse to divide it. Thus, in the past we have made a procedural motion to vote on each application one at a time. If neither we nor anyone else made such a motion, then we would have to vote on the resolution as a whole. It may be an open question whether or not this suggestion involves a deal in the sense of an agreement with the Soviet Union or anyone else as to how we would conduct ourselves in the GA. However, when the Italians made a somewhat similar suggestion to Congressman Vorys on Nov. 15, 1951, that the SC might recommend every present and future applicant, Mr. Vorys commented that he did not see how we could possibly agree and it was hard for him to understand how Italy could want to enter the UN in the same category as "various gangster states".

[1] Refers presumably to Department telegram Gadel 473, December 15, p. 410.
[2] The Deputy United States Representative on the Securtiy Council, in 1947.

There is the serious political problem for us that the Soviet resolution presents in that it includes all present applicants except Vietnam and the Republic of Korea. On the eve of the consideration of the Korean case it would be a serious thing to leave the ROK in the cold. Furthermore, looking ahead to the problems of Japan and Germany, we would be in a very poor bargaining position with all the satellites in and more of our candidates knocking at the door.

We have argued so strongly as late as Dec. 19 that the 1948 opinion of the Court entitles each applicant to a separate hearing and pointing out the illegality of the Soviet approach, that if any member of the SC wanted to raise the question, he might claim that the Soviet resolution is out of order in that it is illegal and contrary to the Charter.

As far as attempting to change the Soviet resolution to include the Korean, or to include Korea plus the future applicants in whom we are interested, the likelihood of the USSR agreeing to this seems to me extremely slight. The question is whether there are any controlling reasons in the light of our commitment to Italy to approach the Soviet Union's resolution differently from the way we have approached the identical problem in the past. In reaching a decision on this question, we must consider how we will handle a very strong movement in the GA to bring Italy in by Assembly action if the SC frustrates the will of 50-odd members of the Assembly.

2. GA Action: The Belaunde and Italian suggestions are based on the theory that the GA is the supreme organ of the UN and can characterize the negative vote of a permanent member of the SC as a veto or as an illegal negative vote. This is a very serious constitutional doctrine in that it would make it possible for the Assembly with or without the assistance of the Court to decide on the scope of the veto. The position of the State Dept. is that we should oppose them unless they have strong support of the majority of UN members, in which case, the Dept. wishes to be consulted further. Any decision that the Dept. takes on going along with action solely by the GA to admit a state to membership must necessarily be based on an analysis of how important the US regards the veto from the point of view of its security.

3. There are at least two ways that occur to me by which we can avoid the dilemma of having to oppose the Latin American and Italian theories in the Assembly, which would put us in the position of opposing Italy, and the dilemma of having to oppose an attempt in the SC to have a majority vote to determine that the negative vote of a permanent member is not a veto.

The first method is by recourse to the ICJ. Without analyzing in detail what that would involve and the chances of success, it is clear that the Court has never passed on the question of when a negative vote is and when it is not a veto, and that question was left open in the 1950 opinion. Assuming there is strong sentiment in the GA for the Belaunde theory, or in the SC for having a majority decide that a Soviet negative vote is illegal, it would clearly be better to try first of all to get the opinion of the Court in support of our position. Then, although we would be admitting members without the affirmative vote of the USSR in the SC, we would have the support not only of the Assembly but also of the Court.

The State Dept. would be willing to adopt this course, if we are faced with it (Gadel 474, Dec. 15).[3] This would involve a request for an advisory opinion, preferably by the GA, the President of the SC making no ruling on the question of whether the vote on the Italian application does or does not constitute a recommendation. The present thinking of the Dept. is that an early vote in the SC and then a request for an opinion by the GA is the best hope for the admission of Italy to membership. Of course, this would be hope deferred, which Zafrullah Khan [4] has characterized as making the heart sick, because an opinion would probably not be forthcoming in time for this session of the Assembly. We have drafted a form of question to be put to the ICJ, if this course is decided upon.

4. The idea of an observership or participation without vote has been put forward to the Italians upon various occasions and they have naturally rejected it, because presumably they would prefer a whole loaf to a half. It has certain clear advantages in that it would give them something now and in no way prejudice giving them more later, and would take the pressure off us to do something for Italy even at the expense of violating what we consider a correct interpretation of the Charter. It could be put forward as an important and attractive interim measure, not only applying to Italy but also to all other applicants, including the future ones in whom we are interested.

Specifically, the GA might have a two part resolution. The first would recommend the amending of the Charter and provide simply that membership in the UN shall be open to [peace loving][5] states upon the decision of the GA by a ⅔ vote. This part of the resolution would recite that this is a democratization of the Charter since the will of the UN has been frustrated by a number of Soviet vetos.

[3] Not printed.

[4] Sir Mohammad Zafrulla Khan, Pakistani Minister of Foreign Affairs and Commonwealth Relations; Chairman, Pakistani Delegation to the Sixth Regular Session of the General Assembly.

[5] Brackets in the source text.

The second part of the resolution would point out that under Article 108 such an amendment of the Charter can come into force only when adopted by ⅔ of the members of the GA and ratified with the concurrence of the permanent members. Therefore, as an interim measure and so as no longer to delay the contributions of states whom the GA considers worthy of UN membership, the Assembly would provide in conjunction with a revision of its rules of procedure for interim or associate membership in the GA by all states upon a ⅔ vote of the Assembly and, perhaps, with a concurring vote of 7 or more members of the SC. Such participation might or might not be conditioned on a veto.

The question arises as to how broad this participation should be. The State Dept. has suggested the right of Italy to participate in main committees, presumably without vote. Of course, the vote in committee would be a very attractive thing from the Italian point of view, although it is clear that a vote in the plenary would not be possible. However, associate members would be entitled to speak in the general debate in the plenary, participate in the general discussion, propose resolutions and raise points of order.

In committees or other subsidiary bodies, the question would arise whether they should have exactly the same rights of members, including a vote and the right to be chairman of such committee and other subsidiary body.

As a separate resolution, the UN would then not invite but rather request Italy to come forward and make its contribution under such an organizational arrangement, and in private conversations we could point out both to the Italians and to others that our concept of this device is broader than the Italian case and foresees similar participation by other applicants who have been vetoed and those in whom we have a considerable interest, such as Germany and Japan.

The above plan is illustrative and not entirely in accordance with the current position paper. This paper indicates that the Dept. might support an arrangement for other qualified candidates if they are interested.

A variant of the above is the suggestion of amending Article 86 to give Italy membership in the Trusteeship Council.

As the position paper points out, representatives or observers participating without membership in the UN would not be entitled to full diplomatic privileges and immunities.

Given such full participation in the work of the GA, it seems only logical that a financial arrangement should be worked out whereby states so participating would contribute financially to the support of the organization. In this connection, it would probably be well for the Advisory Committee to suggest the amount which each participant electing to come into the UN should contribute.

SECRET [PARIS, December 20, 1951.]

Subject: Italian Membership

Reference: Mr. Hyde's Memorandum "Possible Courses of Action in Preparation for December 21 meeting with Italians"

In connection with the reference memorandum I would like to submit the following comments concerning the problem of Italy's membership.

The Italians' objective is to make every possible effort to obtain full membership during the present session and I am convinced that they will not be interested in giving serious consideration to any scheme for any arrangement for participation short of full membership until they are completely convinced that a real effort has been made to obtain their primary objective.

On the basis of a brief conversation with Guidotti after the SC meeting I am of the opinion that he considers the new Soviet resolution recommending the admission of thirteen applicants as a real possibility. He envisages a procedure along the following lines and has asked me informally how we could object to it, especially in light of our commitment to make every possible effort to secure their admission.

Guidotti has suggested that if the United States would abstain the Soviet resolution would pass in the Council. He has suggested that our abstention would be consistent with our policy of refusing to exercise the veto on a membership application. We might make a statement explaining our abstention on that basis. There would be no commitment on our part to support a deal to obtain General Assembly approval of any of the applicants since the Soviet resolution appears to be unconditional agreement on their part to vote favorably on all thirteen applicants before the Council. Guidotti has expressed the view that none of the Soviet applicants would obtain the approval of ⅔ of the assembly and, if we were concerned lest they might, he suggested that through our combined lobbying powers we could certainly obtain twenty votes to block favorable General Assembly action.

With respect to the consideration of the problem of Korea and Vietnam as well as future applicants whose admission would be of interest to us; after the completion of the above procedure the eight

"good" applicants would be in the UN and the Soviet candidates would still be out, so that our bargaining position in connection with any possible future deal to admit additional candidates whom we favor would be as good or better than it is now.

I believe that in our discussions with the Italians on Friday we should be prepared, if possible, to have a frank exchange of views on the possibilities presented by the Russian resolution. If we cannot go along with something like the above procedure, we should be prepared to present convincing reasons why it is impossible for us to do so.

Delga 799. Re Italian membership. Against background SC discussion Ital membership (Delga 733, December 18),[1] Hyde of USGADel with Thompson and Sale of Emb Rome had frank and thorough discussion with Guidotti and his staff of present impasse and future possibilities membership question. Guidotti had requested mtg as means clarify respective positions and if possible agree on future tactics most likely achieve positive results. Agreed that discussions informal and exploratory and not necessarily representative respective govt positions.

First possibility discussed was that Sov submission new blanket res recommending admission thirteen applicants (all pending applications excepting Korea and Vietnam, latter having not been circulated at time SC mtg) offered possible solution worthy careful consideration. Essential prerequisites wld be (1) abstention US, (2) affirmative vote or abstention all other permanent members, (3) seven affirmative votes. Re (1) we pointed out this presents great difficulties in view our past strong position re separate consideration each applicant on own merits as well as US internal political considerations connection condemnation most recent actions Sov satellite applicants. However, we did not exclude possibility Dept might reconcile position and make strong statement clarifying policy in explanation vote after favorable SC action. We said possibility wld be given most careful consideration by USGADel and Dept. Re (2) above, we pointed out that though apparently Sovs wld undoubtedly have to vote favorably on own res or suffer serious psychological defeat their whole membership thesis, position of UK and France not clear and position China presents real difficulties connection Outer Mongolia whose membership China so strongly opposes. It might not be possible persuade China refrain veto whole res for this reason. Re (3), position new council members difficult to assess and it by no means certain that seven affirmative votes cld be mustered agreed most careful planning and preparatory work required.

Above solution wld involve something along fol tactics:

(a) Passage Sov res, presumably after Sov veto of French res on Italy alone. Comment: It is assumed that Sovs wld accept no amendment whatsoever (including any attempt to add Korea and Vietnam or delete Outer Mongolia or any other Sov candidate).

(b) Statements of explanation of votes (after SC action) to clarify respective members policies and set stage for assembly action.

(c) Assembly action on SC recommendation to be on individual applicants separately. It wld be hoped that GA wld approve those applicants previously recommended by GA and that Sov candidates wld fail to receive necessary votes. Comment: It is recognized that there wld be strong tendency in GA to accept all candidates (1) on moral grounds that SC action represented a "deal" and that GA morally committed to pass on all applicants as "package"; also, (2) those members favoring universal membership wld be expected vote favorably on at least some Sov applicants; and (3) some, as suggested by Quevedo in last SC mtg, might believe that even non-qualified states shld be brought into UN in hope that by participation in organization their future conduct might improve. Thus there is some danger that undesirable applicants might conceivable receive two-thirds approval, and on other hand that applicants already approved by GA wld not pass unless others also admitted at same time. In recognizing these difficulties it was agreed that if the Dept were to go ahead with this scheme, and made necessary preparation, there was still a good chance of success in obtaining admittance desirable applicants and at same time exclude unqualified Sov candidates.

Other possibilities discussed, such as action by GA (with or without prior further ICJ rulings) despite "illegal" Sov veto. Guidotti felt that action under Sov res presented best possibilities. Both sides will continue consult on all possibilities and Itals agreed wld not proceed with any particular program without prior consultation with us.

ship. You will be familiar with the matter on the basis of the telegrams sent by the delegation in Paris and also, I understand, from consultations with Ernest Gross.

It appears that the Russians have given us a good opportunity to secure the membership of Italy and a number of other friendly states, if we allow the Russian resolution to be adopted by the Security Council through our abstention. By explaining our abstention after the vote is taken, we could prepare the way for our active opposition to the satellite candidates in the General Assembly.

I am of course unable to judge what the possibilities are of defeating the satellite candidates in the General Assembly and personally would not want to advocate any procedure which would give them membership. I should think that a requisite number of votes to defeat them could be obtained without too much difficulty, but you and the delegation in Paris would have to be the judge of this.

The purpose of this letter is to underscore what great importance the Italian Government attaches to UN membership and to emphasize the political importance which this subject has in Italy. Now that this opportunity has arisen, the Italians will be resentful if, through U.S. opposition, no attempt is made to exploit it.

I am sending a copy of this letter to Philip Jessup in Paris who, I understand, will be handling the question in the General Assembly from now on. If there is any way in which the Embassy can be helpful, I hope that either or both of you will let us know.

All best regards,

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] January 5, 1952.

I had a talk with Mr. Hickerson this morning about the UN membership question. He feels as I do that there are too many hooks in the proposal which has been suggested in Paris. For your information, however, he privately agreed with me that we would have to do something to try to prevent the Libyans from being admitted since this would be disastrous in Italy. He felt that we might take the line that while we favor Libyan membership in the long run, it would be inappropriate for a former Italian colony, which has only just achieved independence, to be admitted to the UN until Italy herself is a Member. Mr. Hickerson seemed to feel that we could get the Latinos to go along with this position, and that if we could get the French and British and a few more we ought to be able to make it stick. Needless to say, there will be violent opposition from NEA and the Arab countries. I suggest that you keep this under your hat.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. Ward P. Allen, Adviser, United States Delegation to the General Assembly

SECRET [PARIS,] January 11, 1952.

Subject: Membership Question

Participants: Mr. C. C. Parrott, UK Delegation
Ward P. Allen, US Delegation

Mr. Parrott told me in confidence of a long conversation he had with Guidotti on this problem. Guidotti is making efforts among the other members of the Security Council to get them to vote in favor of the Soviet resolution proposing the admission of all pending applicants except ROK. According to Guidotti, this is with US blessing or at least acquiescence. Guidotti has the impression that the US will itself abstain on the resolution. He asked the UK to consult with the French in an effort to persuade the latter to vote for the resolution. Mr. Parrott said the UK did not think much of that idea. Parrott raised with Guidotti the problem of the probable Chinese veto because of the inclusion of the application of the Outer Mongolian People's Republic. According to Parrott, Guidotti said that China would continue in strong opposition until the Chinese saw that the Italians had rounded up sufficient votes for the resolution, at which time they, the Chinese, "would be turned around". Parrott's interpretation of this was that Guidotti expected the US would probably urge China not to exercise its veto. (Parrott urged that the above information be treated in the utmost confidence and nothing be said to Guidotti from which he might receive the impression that Parrott had told us or that we were aware of it).

Present UK instructions are to oppose the Soviet resolution, short of actually vetoing it. So far as the UK Delegation knows, the matter has not been discussed between the US and UK during the Acheson-Eden talks.

I stated that so far as I was aware, we had not yet received instructions from the Department on this matter and I did not know what conversations, if any, had been held with Guidotti. I did not know, therefore, any basis for Guidotti's apparent belief that the US "blessed" his efforts to obtain votes for the Soviet resolution or that the US would abstain on it rather than vote negatively. I promised to get in touch with Mr. Parrott further on this as soon as we had received firm instructions from the Department.

SECRET [PARIS,] January 12, 1952.

DEAR JIMMY: I have delayed my reply to your letter of December 27th[1] because the various developments here were changing the scene daily, and I have been too much engrossed in other topics to keep abreast of all details of the membership problem. One or the other of us has had frequent talks with Guidotti and the other Italian representatives here.

[1] Ambassador Dunn sent a copy of his letter to Assistant Secretary of State Hickerson, p. 419, to Ambassador Jessup.

In regard to the specific plan which you discuss in your letter to Jack Hickerson, it now seems that it would not be feasible even assuming that we could go along. In the first place, there is a real possibility of a Chinese veto because Outer Mongolia is included in the Soviet group of candidates. In the second place, it seems unlikely that all seven of the non-permanent members would vote for the Soviet proposal for various reasons. Actually, we have not yet had firm instructions from the Depatment so that we have had to play a somewhat noncommittal role. We are sending off another telegram today giving the Department the latest line-up on the total membership situation and asking for instructions on a number of specific points. Of course, we are eager to do anything we can to further the Italian application and you can be sure that we will continue to work very closely with their representatives here.

Sincerely yours, PHILIP C. JESSUP

Delga 992. Re: Membership. Three elements of question need integration in course next few days and have been discussed by Jessup, Cooper, Gross and staff.

1. Re Ital applications in SC: Absent further instrs, we have expressed no further opinion re tactics and US attitude on vote on SC res other than that reported in Delga 799. Result is Itals are campaigning for seven votes in SC and proceeding on theory Sov res is their best hope. We have told them our active or passive position depends on further views Dept, but they are giving other dels impression we provide benevolent abstention. In this connection, they have approached UK, Turks, Neth and Greece (Delga 983).[1]

Balluseck stated Netherlands is very disinclined support omnibus res. Guidotti says Greece firmly opposed, so he taking no further soundings until US position known.

If, as Gadel 624 suggests, we shall actively oppose Sov res, we shld in fairness to Itals so inform them immediately omnibus SC res. PriMin[2] realizes Libyan draft res being tabled wld not necessarily result in its being debated or taken up ahead of Fr draft res for Italy and Sov omnibus res. We can with Fr SC Pres probably control when it is brought up for debate or vote in SC.

[1] Not printed.

[2] Mahmud Bey Muntasser, Libyan Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs.

We see two possible tactical situations in SC. (a) Possibility Itals see they lack seven votes for Sov res and acquiesce in vote promptly on two res. Then situation wld be clear for going ahead with Libyan res. (b) Other possibility is Itals may later ask Fr res and Sov res be held in suspense. In this case Libyan res now will be basis highlighting their application as separate case. We recognize that so long as Sov omnibus res is before SC and unvoted there is risk their amending to include Libya at any time, but in that event it wld still be better have separate res on table for Libya.

In actual calling up Libyan application for debate and handling in SC, it wld be important play it to win possible Sov support. If USSR will support to confirming instrs, we raised question US sponsoring such res to get our support on record and prevent USSR from recording its support ahead of US. Pol activity here had indicated serious risk Russians, Arabs or other taking initiative away from US.

Libyans feel such draft res in SC desirable but much prefer Pakistan sponsor, otherwise Brazil. We suggested US as co-sponsor. They politely declined, arguing they wanted Arab sponsor and to keep application out of East–West conflict. They most appreciative our offer and stated they knew [garble] true friends are. PriMin made courtesy call on Vishinsky last night. Latter stated 13 UN applications ahead of Libya and implied Libya must take its turn. PriMin did not get drawn further into discussion this issue.

PriMin requested Clark[3] to join him in seeking Pakistan sponsorship SC res which he feels can quickly be obtained. We pointed out quick action may be important to get in draft res before Sov initiative which might be in form amendment its omnibus immediately. Until SC aspect of case determined for time being, either by SC vote or decision vote shld be postponed on Ital application and Sov res, it difficult to move along other two aspects membership. Guidotti states he has asked instructions but feels that lacking seven votes for omnibus res, it and Fr res might as well be voted. He felt veto of Fr res plus four or five votes for omnibus res wld help Italy propaganda-wise. He hoped we might abstain even if seven votes lacking on Sov res and that we wld not press to vote each applicant named in it separately.

2. Re Libya: Further Delga 867,[4] it equally important have Dept views on handling and timing this application and relationship to Ital one. Itals urge this be delayed until their situation determined. See also Rome's 3115[4] to Dept.

Consistently with our commitment for strong support for Libya,[5] we raised with Libyan PriMin desirability submitting immediately to SC res proposing Libyan admission to UN. Subject to confirming if USSR will support, it will be matter of few minutes to consider it separately in SC toward end of month. SC rule re reference to membership comite can be waived on precedent Indonesian case. Forthcoming ad hoc comite debate may result in various approaches to USSR on behalf Libya. In voting on Libyan res in comite, putting para on UN participation separately to vote might cause fuller disclosure USSR position on application.

3. Belaunde proposed draft res will apparently cover only first element this plan, i.e. to afford states opportunity present own case for admission. Position paper indicates we cld support such res. This device with such other possible elements as request for ICJ opinion and study of pol aspects membership may provide formula for keeping question open for Italy and others and wind up consideration at this session, also avoiding more extreme summary measures. We shld recognize our support will commence chain of events looking toward eventual pol settlement this issue in GA.

3. Membership

Mr. Hyde recalled the prior decisions of the Delegation on this matter and mentioned the developments that have occurred since then. In the Security Council the Italian application rested after a Soviet resolution had been tabled which would, as usual, condition the admission of Italy on the admission of all other pending applicants except the Republic of Korea. This created a dilemma. The Soviets insisted that all applicants should be admitted together whereas the Latin Americans would interpret the Charter to allow the Assembly to decide irrespective of Security Council action. Belaunde's draft resolution was, Mr. Hyde suggested, a solution for this session. It recommended that applicants for membership should be invited to come forward with evidence that they meet the conditions of Article 4 of the Charter. This they can do now under the rule of the Security Council in its Membership Committee. We had redrafted Belaunde's resolution to limit it to this point and we could support it under our instructions. However, we must recognize that, in Belaunde's view, this is the first stage of a plan to have the General Assembly alone decide on Membership applications. His draft resolution would only solve the matter for this session. The Soviets were already reportedly offering or thinking about a new "package deal", which would admit Italy, Austria, Eire and Portugal in return for the admission of certain satellites. The Central Americans were alleged to be coming up with new ideas. Mr. Hyde suggested that what the Delegation could do at present was to support the proposed approach contained in Delga 1064—the draft Belaunde resolution.[1]

Gadel 755. Re Membership (Delga 992, Jan 12) : and Hyde–Popper telecon Jan 18.[2]

1. We have had difficulty in reaching firm position on attitude toward Sov Res on membership [in the Security Council] because of complex of interests and factors involved. On one hand, we strongly desire admission of Italy and other qualified applicants and we realize Sov Res appears offer only present hope their admission. On other hand, if we were to give benevolent abstention to Sov Res, we wld create new problems arising from fol considerations (over and above our insistence since 1946 on treating each application separately on merits) :

a. We cld not adequately explain to Amer public why we gave tacit approval proposal involving admission Sov satellites, including Hungary, especially at this time.

b. Sov omnibus Res omits ROK. How cld we give tacit approval to Res which includes MPR, shadowy "state" whose independent existence cannot be demonstrated, while Res omits state (ROK) functioning as independent entity under UN Comm Observation and fighting together with UN repel aggression against it? Failure include ROK wld have most serious effect in Korea.

c. We attach great importance Japan's admittance. Adoption Sov Res and SC approval Sov applicants wld deprive us future bargaining power re Japan and others we favor.

d. If Sov Res approved by SC, there is risk some or all Sov applicants wld be admitted by GA either this or future sessions.

2. Conclusion we reach is that US must oppose Sov Res although we wld not cast veto but wld abstain if res obtained seven affirmative votes. Problem is to minimize adverse Ital reaction while opposing

[1] Repeated for information to Rome as 3268.

Res in way which cannot be misunderstood. Recent Del reports Neth, Greece, UK either opposed or disinclined support when coupled with expected Chi opposition and our own, indicate Res will not receive seven votes.

3. Del shld therefore inform other SC members US intends speak in SC in opposition Sov Res and plans vote against; in unlikely event Res receives seven votes we will abstain; US statement will make it clear in SC that if any such Res shld pass we wld insist in GA on case-by-case consideration in which we wld oppose applicants we believed unqualified.

4. UK and Fr shld be approached first for their reactions. Del shld then in frank explanation to Guidotti explain as appropriate reasons we are opposed to Sov Res. On basis Del's best info re position other members SC, Del shld express view Guidotti that admission by means Sov Res is not feasible and that further consideration this possibility not worthwhile. Del shld make clear to Guidotti we have given most sympathetic consideration his views (Delga 799, Dec 22) but that for reasons he will understand we cannot give our tacit approval to proposition. Del shld leave no doubt in Guidotti's mind that (1) we are opposed to Sov Res and (2) if as we anticipate Sov Res wld not obtain seven affirmative votes we wld cast negative vote.

5. Consult UK, Fr, Italy and others re desirability disposing of Sov Res by demanding separate vote on each applicant. If it appears desirable and feasible Del shld in its discretion seek to apply this procedure.

6. Re Fr Res we believe best tactic wld be favor early vote in SC on Fr Res unless Itals prefer latter not be put to vote. If USSR shld veto Fr Res solely on non-Charter grounds SC or GA cld request ICJ for opinion of effect of Sov negative vote (Gadel 473). If Belaunde insists presentation to GA also desirable, additional para inviting presentation to GA and revising rules of procedure if revision considered necessary cld be included.

Also regretted impossible US refrain from speaking vs res in SC until after vote taken.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. Ward P. Allen, Adviser, United States Delegation to the General Assembly

SECRET [PARIS,] January 21, 1952.

Subject: Membership Question

Participants: Count Guidotti, Italian Observer to the UN
Mr. Francisci, Italian Observer to the UN
Ward P. Allen, US Delegation

Following the discussion with Ambassador Gross and myself on Saturday, Count Guidotti gave me this morning confidentially a draft private letter which he is considering sending to the other Members of the Security Council, pertinent parts of which read: "I am informed that, should the seven votes be available (i.e., for the Soviet omnibus Security Council resolution), the US Delegation, though it remains opposed in principle to the idea embodied in the Soviet draft resolution, would abstain. It is, therefore, necessary to ascertain whether the indispensable majority can be found in the Security Council." It ends up with a request for a favorable vote. Count Guidotti asked me to discuss it with Ambassador Gross and to give them any views we may have.

I promised to do so but stated that I was confident that our position must be that we cannot advise the Italian Delegation as to whether they should or should not transmit the letter or whether the letter does or does not accurately state the US position. Fearing that Guidotti might still remain under some illusions as to US views, I read him pertinent portions of Gadel 755, seeking to reinforce what Ambassador Gross had already advised him. I stated that under our instructions we would make known this position to the other members of the Security Council and, in spite of his hope to the contrary, I stated we were obliged under the instructions to lay greater stress on the negative aspects of opposition to the Soviet resolution than on the affirmative aspect of our abstention in the unlikely event it obtained seven votes.

Turning to the Membership item in Committee One, Guidotti expressed the strong view that the draft resolution submitted by Peru is very unwise and can only do harm.[1] I stated the reasons which had led us to agree to support it. In response to my question he indicated that the Argentine Delegation had shown him some ideas which they intended to submit either as a separate resolution or as an amendment to Belaunde's resolution by which the General Assembly would declare Italy to be admitted to the UN without further reference to the Security Council, because the last Soviet veto was illegal and hence void. I responded that, as I was sure Guidotti was aware, the US considered such a resolution extremely unwise and the procedure both illegal under the Charter and from a practical point of view unworkable since the Soviets could, by the simple expedient of another veto, giving no reasons, block the success of the procedure. I said that the US would oppose and vote against the Argentine resolution if it were introduced and urged Guidotti, in the best interests of Italy, to use his influence with the Argentine Delegation to dissuade them from putting it forward. He then said that he thought the Argentinians were also thinking as a possible alternative along some lines of asking Security Council reconsideration of Italy's application and wondered if that would not be less objectionable to the US. I stated that it was, of course, less objectionable, but it seemed to me at best useless since the General Assembly has already done this and the Security Council is now in the process of reconsidering the application.

After checking with Messrs. Gross and Wainhouse, I confirmed the above stated position to Messrs. Roberti and Francisci. Mr. Roberti, who seemed increasingly pessimistic about the entire situation, stated that if Italy does not succeed in obtaining admission this time, then he thought there was a good chance that Italy would withdraw its application. He felt that as a matter of dignity his country could not continue indefinitely knocking on the doors of the UN and being constantly denied admission.

Memorandum of Conversations, by Mr. Ward P. Allen, Adviser, United States Delegation to the General Assembly

CONFIDENTIAL [PARIS,] January 22, 1952.

Subject: Membership Question

Participants: (Separate conversations)
Ambassador Arne Sunde, Norwegian Delegation
Mr. Pierre Pescatore, Luxembourg Delegation
Ward P. Allen, US Delegation

Ambassador Sunde stated that Norway will vote for the Chilean amendment [1] which deletes paragraphs 2 through 6 of the Peruvian resolution and for paragraph 7 which merely substitutes a recommendation that the Security Council reconsider the pending applications. He believes those amendments will be approved, but if they should not pass, the Norwegian Delegation is still uncertain as to whether it will vote against or abstain on the Peruvian draft.

After I had explained to Mr. Pescatore our position on the Peruvian resolution, he stated that the Luxembourg Delegation is opposed to it and will probably vote against, but may abstain. Their objections are that the resolution destroys by over-emphasis the legal aspects of the qualifications; disregards the necessary subjective judgement of each Member necessarily involved in their determination of whether a state is "peace loving" etc., violates the right of each state not to reveal the reasons which leads it to a vote and disregards the political imponderables which necessarily go to make up the decision of each member in a given case.

He agreed with my view that the Argentine amendment [2] calling for a special session of the General Assembly to consider the problem would not be advisable and could produce no productive results and similarly that the Argentine amendment calling for Security Council reconsideration and report to the present session of the General Assembly was equally undesirable. As to the Chilean amendment, I indicated, of course, that we would oppose the proposal for the deletion of paragraphs 2 through 6 and with respect to the Chilean substitute for paragraph 1 pointed out the lack of clarity and the technical omission of the Libyan and Vietnam applications.

Delga 1148. For Hickerson (UNA) from Gross. Re: Membership. After frank and sympathetic explanation to Guidotti re US position on Sov SC res on membership (pursuant Gadel 755, Jan 18), I explained our position to Brit, French, and, following that, to Muniz (Braz), Santa Cruz (Chile), Balluseck (Neth), Kyrou (Greece) and Sarper (Turk). I have now recd letter from Guidotti (transmitted Delga 1149, Jan 23).[1]

Obviously Dept's position re Sov res is most displeasing to Itals, as Dept understood. I have understood that our task is to "minimize adverse Ital reaction while opposing res in a way which cannot be misunderstood". But Guidotti's task is to do all he can to get seven SC votes for Sov res, and anything we do which interferes with formation of a seven-vote majority is deeply resented.

Muniz, who asked for our views, told me he had previously advised Guidotti he wld recommend his govt vote for SC res only if US "acquiesced" in Sov res. Accordingly, when I told him we did not acquiesce but opposed, he told me he wld recommend Braz either abstain or vote against Sov res since any other course he wld consider "unfriendly to US".

I am certain we can now anticipate that Ital Govt will with great excitement complain to Amer Embassy Rome that I am sabotaging and scuttling Ital aspirations. I have been most frank and friendly with Guidotti, and he has no reason whatever to say he has misunderstood our position, which both Allen and I explained to him fully. I made it a point to tell him precisely what we were going to say to our colleagues on council.

In addition I made clear in Comite I debate yesterday our opposition to Sov packages res tabled in comite,[2] and Guidotti, I understand, is very upset about our attack upon this res. The line I took yesterday now confirmed by instructions in Gadel 793, Jan 22.

Under these circumstances I am sure both Dept and Emb will realize that US GADel's position here vis-à-vis Guidotti is not too comfortable and that latter may well feel he must cover himself with his govt because of his previous over-optimistic reports to his govt.

"The Brazilian Amb, M. Muniz, has related to me a conversation he had with you today. Following this conversation, Amb Muniz, who had previously told me he wld advise his govt to vote in favor of the Russian draft res, declared that he wld now have to vote against.

"This makes me realize that, in spite of various exchanges of views I had honor to have with you in these days, I was still labouring under most serious misunderstanding. I had impression that your del, although strongly opposed on principle to Russian proposal, wld do nothing that wld interfere with formation of possible majority of seven votes in its favor, in SC. In fact it seemed to me that it was only on this condition that the possibility of your del abstaining in presence of seven favorable votes cld have a meaning. The result of your conversation with Amb Muniz clearly shows that I was wrong in my assumption.

"In these circumstances, not only wld the formation of the indispensable majority of seven votes which was, of course the preliminary condition for abstention of your del and consequently for ultimate success of such an action, be utterly impossible, but I feel very strongly that any further effort in that direction wld place both my govt and myself in a most unpleasant predicament.

"You will, therefore, understand that I am compelled to report this state of affairs to my govt and, pending their instructions, abstain from undertaking any further efforts which, under these circumstances, would prove to be both undignified and pointless."

I stated to Mr. Roberti that I was very sorry that, as Mr. Guidotti stated in his letter to Ambassador Gross, there had been, despite our best efforts, some apparent misunderstanding in Guidotti's mind as to the US position on this matter. I said that I was frankly at a complete loss to understand it since Ambassador Gross had stated very fully and completely to Mr. Guidotti the exact position and since I had on subsequent occasions read to Mr. Guidotti and to Mr. Roberti and to Mr. Francisci the exact text of pertinent portions of our instructions including a paragraph which instructed us to make known our views to the other Members of the Security Council. I recalled that Mr. Francisci had said that under the circumstances it would be best for us to do so immediately. Mr. Roberti recalled my having read the instructions and stated that they had been distressed principally because Brazil had been one of their surest affirmative votes and with lightening rapidity Ambassador Muniz had reversed himself. I assured Mr. Roberti that in talking to Muniz Ambassador Gross had not urged Muniz to change any position he might have taken, but simply had informed him of our instructions exactly as we had previously advised the Italians.

Subject: Membership

Participants: Ole Bjorn Kraft, Danish Foreign Minister
Ward P. Allen, US Delegation

All of the Scandinavian Delegations intend to vote for the Soviet resolution on the admission of thirteen pending applicants [in the First Committee], making clear that they do not regard the list as inclusive. The principal reason which impells them to this position is the basic consideration that Europe is very under-represented in the UN and if the UN is to succeed it must have the full participation of Europe. The European peoples and countries are still interested in the UN and have a certain faith in it, but as they see problem after problem arise in the UN and be dealt with by what they regard as the irresponsible and uninformed majority of Latin Americans, Arabs and Asians they will gradually lose their interest and conviction that the UN can be even as valuable as the late League of Nations. Moreover, on specific issues a larger European membership would be of assistance to the US in its increasingly difficult task to cope with the irresponsible actions of others. In short, the advantages of blanket admissions lie all with the west.

The Foreign Minister expressed the view that even though the US found itself unable to permit the admission of all pending applicants at the present time, nevertheless this is one of the easiest of the questions on which the East and West are at odds and as soon as there is any relaxation of international tension this should be perhaps the first question in the UN on which the US should seek accomodation with the USSR. It would cost nothing or very little and would help redress the present inbalance which is harmful to Europe, the UN and the US itself.

Mr. Hans Engen, Norwegian Delegation
Mr. Boyesen, Norwegian Delegation

Minister Thors stated that his Delegation will vote for the first part of the Argentine resolution, against the second part, and for the Soviet resolution with the qualification that the list of candidates named is not inclusive.

Messrs. Engen and Boyesen were very disturbed at the latest Latin move introducing a new resolution on reference to the Court.[1] Although they suspect that the Italians are behind the move since the Italians have not liked the Belaunde resolution, they strongly deplore what seems to be the complete irresponsibility and free-wheeling characteristics of most of the Latin delegations. It tends to bring the General Assembly into disrepute. They will not vote for the Belaunde resolution and think the idea of reference to the Court is probably a dangerous one.

On the general subject of membership they indicated that Norway of course favors universality. From the moral and legal point of view they see no objections to a deal to admit all pending applicants since, after all, the original membership of the UN was the result of several political deals and the present membership of the UN bears little relations to the real ability or willingness of governments to carry out their obligations. On the other hand, since voting for admission is based on purely subjective judgment and is largely a political decision, Norway can understand the fact that we and other great powers cannot now vote for wholesale admission.

"The General Assembly,

Considering that the International Court of Justice, in its advisory opinion of 3 March, 1950, concerning the admission of new members, held that it was not the object of the request for an advisory opinion, contained in the resolution adopted by the General Assembly on 22 November 1949, to determine how the Security Council should apply the rules governing its voting procedure in regard to admissions or, in particular, that the court should examine whether the negative vote of a permanent member is effective to defeat a recommendation which has obtained seven or more votes, since, in the opinion of the court, the question, as it had been formulated, assumed in such a case the nonexistence of a recommendation; and that, in view of these circumstances, the court considered solely whether the General Assembly can make a decision to admit a state when the Security Council has transmitted no recommendation to it.

Considering that in the course of the debates on the item entitled "Admission of new members, including the right of candidate states to present proof of the conditions required under Article 4 of the Charter" during the 6th session of the Assembly, a number of delegations have repeatedly expressed doubt whether in this matter, which is governed by article 4 of the Charter (which speaks of a "recommendation" by the Security Council and of a "decision" by the General Assembly) the voting procedure which under article 27 applies to "decisions" of the Security Council is applicable.

[2] On January 25 the First Committee took favorable action on the Peruvian and Soviet draft resolutions, but delayed action on this item (until January 29). For the proceedings of January 25 in which are set forth the complicated parliamentary situation and the voting on the various amendments to the Peruvian and Soviet resolutions, see GA (VI), First Committee, pp. 255 ff.

Subsequently the Central American states prepared for submission to the next First Committee meeting on membership a joint draft resolution which: (1) requested the Security Council to report to the General Assembly at its Seventh Session on the status of applications for membership then pending; (2) directed that an item on admission of new members be included in the agenda of the Seventh Session of the General Assembly; and (3) referred the first joint draft resolution submitted by the same states (text above) to the General Assembly at its Seventh Session for consideration under the membership item. For text of this second joint draft resolution proposed by Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, and Nicaragua (UN Doc. A/C.1/716) (and submitted to the First Committee on January 29), see GA (VI), Annexes, fascicule for agenda item 60.

Gadel 850. Re Membership (Delga 1179 and 1180). While not enthusiastic re referral to ICJ, Dept willing support referral if Itals desire and if there is general sentiment in favor.

If matter to be referred to ICJ, Dept believes question submitted shld be calculated to assure ICJ will consider question and increase likelihood desirable decision. Dept therefore does not favor LA proposal Delga 1180. Preamble confuses issues, and at least first question calls for general exposition on SC voting which is difficult and unfruitful to give, and which ICJ may well refuse undertake.

Dept believes, if question submitted, it shld be along lines Nisot proposal Delga 1179. Dept prepared accept question as there drafted, although we have some difficulty with word "recognizing". It is not clear whether an explicit statement that applicant is qualified is contemplated, or whether recognition of qualification can be inferred indirectly, e.g., from Sov willingness include Italy in omnibus Res.

Dept has taken position membership application is subject to veto. We are reluctant to go to ICJ on question the answer to which in our opinion is clear. However, if LA states and others insist, we wld support Res which submits two questions to ICJ: (1) Question contained in final Para LA proposal Delga 1180 and (2) Nisot question.

Suggest you consult with LAs, Itals and others re this matter, but it is desirable others take lead this aspect membership question and Del shld not cosponsor without prior consultation Dept.

On January 29 the First Committee completed action on the membership item by adopting the second joint draft resolution of the Central American states (see footnote 2, page 447), with minor modifications. This became Resolution III of a three-part omnibus resolution then submitted by the First Committee to the General Assembly for adoption. Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] January 30, 1952.[1]

Subject: United Nations Membership

Participants: H.E. Alberto Tarchiani—Italian Ambassador
Mr. Hickerson—UNA
Mr. Sale—EUR
Mr. Popper—UNP

The Ambassador called at his request to discuss the situation with regard to the membership question in the General Assembly and the Security Council. He indicated that he knew that we were fully aware of the Italian position, and stated that he merely wished to reiterate certain points which he summarized in an informal memorandum he handed to us (copy attached). He elaborated upon the memorandum, and he expressed some fear as to the consequences of our position upon the results of the forthcoming municipal elections in south Italy, where the Communists were strong. He also stated that the Soviets, by linking the Libyan application with the idea of a blanket deal, had gained the support of the Arab bloc for the blanket thesis. He intimated that on this basis possibly the General Assembly would pass the Soviet membership resolution.

I told the Ambassador that our latest information from Paris was to the effect that there was no prospect of a two-thirds majority for the Soviet resolution on membership in the General Assembly, and similarly no prospect that the Soviet resolution would receive seven votes in the Security Council. I explained to the Ambassador in some detail the difficulties we encountered here in attempting to reach a position on the membership question which would take into account Italy's aspirations without running counter to the terms of the Charter. I assured him that we would not lightly disregard the Italian position.

The Ambassador on his part stated that he appreciated fully our problem: that he realized that our action was motivated by moral considerations as well as political factors in this country.

The Ambassador indicated that the Italians were dubious about the merit of the Central American proposal to refer certain aspects of the membership question to the International Court of Justice. He felt that it might result in putting the Court on record more explicitly than heretofore in favor of the view that membership applications are subject to veto in the Security Council, and should be considered on their merits.

[1] Dictated on February 1.

Reverting to the Ambassador's reference to the municipal elections, I told him I was sure that the Italian Government would be able to convince all reasonable Italians that it was the Soviet Union which was responsible for their exclusion from the United Nations. I stressed the insult involved in making Italian admission subject to that, say, of Outer Mongolia, or Albania—as the Soviets were doing. I told the Ambassador that we would not cease to search for legitimate means by which the Italians might be admitted to membership and that we hoped to work together with the Italians to this end. The Ambassador accepted my remarks in a spirit of cordial and emotional understanding.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON, January 30, 1952.]

The question of the failure of admitting Italy to the UNO entails, in the opinion of the Italian Government, among others, the following consequences of internal and international character:

In the internal field, it is to be expected that the communistic propaganda, according to which it is the United States that by their attitude practically prevent Italy's entrance into the UNO, will finally take hold.

Internationally, it is to be expected that the deadlock will finally play in the hands of the Soviets. For instance, if the Arab states wish to obtain the admission of Lybia into the UNO, they must adhere to the Soviet thesis of the contemporaneous admission of the satellite States. The day may come, therefore, when the United States may be compelled either to oppose its veto to the Soviet motion, or surrender, in view of the increasing popularity of the universality thesis, appearing as having been defeated.

Editorial Note

In two meetings on February 1, the General Assembly took up the three membership resolutions recommended by the First Committee, adopting Resolution I and Resolution III (the Peruvian resolution and the joint resolution of the five Central American states, respectively), and rejecting Resolution II (the Soviet resolution). In the voting on Resolution II, the United States successfully invoked the "important question" two-thirds majority rule.

The Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson) to the Ambassador in Italy (Dunn)

SECRET WASHINGTON, February 12, 1952.

DEAR JIMMY: I have been waiting to answer your letter of December 27, 1951, concerning the Soviet resolution on membership, until the Security Council acted on this resolution. Since you have the telegram setting forth our position on the Soviet proposal and you have undoubtedly read a number of our statements on this matter, I will not go into too many details here. I would, nevertheless, like to review with you some of the considerations which led to our decision to oppose the Soviet "package deal".

First, I would like to say that all of us constantly had in mind the importance, both to Italy and to ourselves, of Italian membership in the United Nations and the political significance of this matter within Italy. We fully realized, moreover, that the Soviet resolution offered the only present hope for Italy's early admission, and that our opposition to the Soviet resolution might have unfortunate political repercussions in Italy.

At the same time, as you well know, there were other considerations which we had to weigh carefully. Since 1946 we have consistently taken the position that under the Charter each membership application should be considered separately on its merits. It has also been our position that in present circumstances the Soviet applicants are unqualified for membership. We believed that at this time the American people would support no other view, and I felt confident that failure on our part to oppose the Soviet resolution recommending the admission of the Soviet as well as non-Soviet candidates would be utterly incomprehensible to the American public, especially in view of the recent incident involving our fliers in Hungary.

We also had to take into account the possible outcome in the General Assembly if the Soviet resolution were approved by the Security Council. We were not certain that the General Assembly would refuse to admit the Soviet applicants, especially if the United States were to give its tacit approval to the Soviet resolution in the Security Council. Another real problem that we had to consider was the fact that the Soviet proposal omitted the Republic of Korea while including the Mongolian People's Republic. Further, we realized that Security Council approval of the Soviet resolution would decrease our bargaining power regarding future applicants, like Japan, to whose admission we attach great importance.

Some members of the Department contended that the arguments against the Soviet resolution were so overriding that we should vote against it in any event, even if our negative vote constituted a veto. Those who supported this view believed that the policy we have reiterated in the past not to veto membership applications should apply to a vote on single applications only. At the same time, there were others who felt that the United States, if it opposed the Soviet proposal, might bear responsibility for killing the best hope for achieving Italy's admission, and urge that we use no influence against the resolution and abstain if it should receive seven affirmative votes, explaining after the vote that we abstained because of our policy not to veto membership applications and stating clearly that we would oppose, in the General Assembly, the admission of applicants we consider unqualified.

The position which we finally decided upon—to oppose the resolution in the Security Council but not to veto—represented a middle course between these two positions. I myself believed that we had no other alternative than to oppose the Soviet resolution and to cast a negative vote if it received less than seven votes. However, I also thought that it would be most unfortunate if we should use our first veto to block a membership resolution, and while I was confident there was little or no likelihood the resolution would receive seven votes as long as we opposed, I agreed that we should abstain in the event we were faced with the veto problem.

Looking back at the situation now that the Security Council debate and vote has taken place, it would seem that regardless of our position, there was never too much likelihood that the resolution would receive seven votes. Furthermore, I think there is also the possibility that if there had been a chance that the resolution would pass, the Soviet Union might have itself blocked approval in the absence of a commitment from ourselves and others to agree to the admission of the Soviet candidates in the Assembly.

We all, of course, deeply regret the continued exclusion of Italy from the United Nations, and can well understand the bitter disappointment of the Italians over the failure of the Security Council to make a favorable recommendation. However, I hope their disappointment will not obscure the fact that the real blame for Italy's exclusion lies in the arbitrary use of the veto by the Soviet Union rather than in the opposition of the United States and other Security Council members to the Soviet "package deal".

My warmest regards to Mary and yourself.

[3] From 1949, Soviet propaganda mounted a steadily expanding "peace" campaign representing the Soviet Union as the champion of peace and accusing the Western nations led by the United States of plotting another war. The principal vehicle of this Soviet campaign was the so-called "World Peace Council", established by the Warsaw "Peace Conference" in October 1950, but which had its origins in the "Partisans of Peace" established in Paris in April 1949. In March 1950 the World Congress of the Partisans of Peace had adopted the Stockholm Appeal demanding the prohibition of atomic weapons, strict international control of the atomic bomb, and condemnation as a war criminal of the first government to use atomic weapons. A major effort of both the Partisans of Peace and subsequently the World Peace Council was to launch a large-scale signature drive calling for a Big Five "Peace Pact." At the very time of the despatch of this circular airgram, a session of the World Peace Council was being held in East Berlin, which was to intensify the drive for a Big Five "Peace Pact"; and to exert pressure on the United Nations by sending an international delegation thereto to demand that the United Nations should return to its "assigned role" and "serve as the area of agreement between governments and not as the instrument of any dominant group".

fulfill the role that has been entrusted to it by the people. The ordinary people of the whole world are insistent upon this, as it is clear to everyone that the United Nations is unable to resist the instigators of a new war." The Izvestiya statement reflected the general militancy of the current Soviet propaganda line. The creation of the World Peace Council was in itself a militant action since it was clearly designed to intimidate the UN, discredit decisions opposed by the USSR, and ultimately serve as an alternative agency if and when Moscow felt withdrawal from the UN to be expedient. At the very least, therefore, the current intensification of efforts to discredit the UN represents extreme intimidation designed perhaps to force favorable action by UN members particularly on Soviet disarmament proposals scheduled to be pressed by the World Peace Council.

Editorial Note

The contents of an interview of Soviet Premier I. V. Stalin by the official Soviet news organ, Pravda, became known in Western countries on February 17. According to a text printed in the New York Times on that date (the interview itself occurred on February 17), Stalin made the following comments about the United Nations, in partial response to the lead-off question of the interview: "How do you estimate the decision of the United Nations Organization which proclaimed the Chinese People's Republic an aggressor?" (a reference to the Resolution of February 1, 1951 of the General Assembly of the United Nations; documentation on this matter is in volume VII).

"The United Nations Organization, created as the bulwark for preserving peace, is being turned into an instrument of war, into a means for unleashing a new world war. . . . The United Nations Organization is at the same time ceasing to be a world organization of nations enjoying equal rights. . . . The United Nations Organization is now not so much a world organization as an organization for the Americans, an organization acting on behalf of the requirements of the American aggressors. . . . The United Nations Organization is therefore taking the inglorious road of the League of Nations. In this way it is burying its moral prestige and dooming itself to disintegration." (New York Times, February 17, 1951, page 3)

Stalin identified the "aggressive core" of the United Nations to be the ten North Atlantic Treaty Organization countries and the twenty Latin American countries.

For immediate official United States comment on the Stalin interview, see Department of State Bulletin, March 5, 1951, pages 367 and 368. It was pointed out that the Voice of America and the Wireless Bulletin of the Department of State were emphasizing "the fact that, whereas the Soviet state has heretofore used its puppet rulers and stooges to propagandize the world with the fake charges and claims of the Kremlin, the Chief of the Soviet Union, himself, has now put himself on record and on trial before the world by lending his own name to the Soviet deception on an international scale."

Memorandum by the Deputy United States Representative at the United Nations (Gross) to the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Sandifer)

CONFIDENTIAL [NEW YORK,] March 1, 1951.

Subject: Discussions with Malik and Zinchenko [1]

For "straw collectors division", following summary of talks with Malik and Zinchenko may be of interest.

After Security Council Dinner, February 27,[2] I found Malik in talkative mood. After giving him message from Dulles [3] (reported by phone to latter 28 February), Malik smilingly commented that he and Dulles were on "two different paths." When I asked what he meant, he replied, "Only one of us is taking the path to peace." I said this was an unfair comment, and that our course of action, both within and outside the UN, was based on the conviction that a peaceful solution of all issues could be found if Soviet policies were changed so as to eliminate fear of her intentions. Malik said that only the Soviet Union had cause to fear, and that we were using fear as an excuse. We talked about "defense", but through history his country had always been attacked by people who insisted they were "defending themselves." Napoleon marched on Moscow, saying he was defending France, and Hitler attacked his country for "self-defense."

[1] Y. A. Malik, Permanent Representative of the Soviet Union at the United Nations, and Constantin E. Zinchenko, United Nations Assistant Secretary-General for Security Council Affairs.

[2] The Security Council is organized to function continuously, but it had had only two meetings in 1951 as of this date (January 31, February 21). The Fifth Regular Session of the General Assembly was still in session, but the only main committee of the fifth session that met in 1951 was the First Committee (Political and Security Questions); the Committee had been active in January in addressing itself to the Korean question and matters concerning China; documentation on these questions is found in volume VII.

On February 21 and throughout the months of March and April the Security Council was seized of the India–Pakistan dispute (the Kashmir question); for documentation on this subject, see volume VI, Part 2, pp. 1699 ff. Thereafter the Council was seized of the complaint of the failure by the Iranian Government to comply with provisional measures indicated by the International Court of Justice in the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company case; for documentation on this matter, see volume V.

[3] John Foster Dulles, Consultant to the Secretary of State (for negotiation of the Japanese peace treaty).

At this time Jebb [4] and Lacoste [5] joined us. The latter, who heard Malik's comment concerning Napoleon and Hitler, said he could not believe the Russians really feared that armies were preparing to march against the Soviet Union.

Malik replied, "No, not marching." But American officials were talking every day about dropping bombs on Moscow and many Senators made speeches saying we should attack the Soviet Union. No one heard any Soviet official talk about marching against Detroit or Chicago, or bombing American cities. Lacoste said this was true, but there was a fear in Western European countries that the large armies the Soviet Union had maintained might be used against them.

This precipitated a long, somewhat dialectical, argument by Malik that people were lying about the size of the Soviet armies. He repeated Stalin's [6] thesis that it was impossible for the Soviet Union to have a large military establishment because of her use of manpower to rebuild cities and factories which Hitlerite armies had destroyed. Malik brushed off attempts by Lacoste to develop the point that it was a fact that fear of Soviet intentions was widespread.

I brought the discussion around to the UN by saying that many people were "misinterpreting" Stalin's Pravda interview to mean that the Soviet Union was considering leaving the UN. I thought this was seriously affecting the prestige of the Soviet Union in the UN, and that it might be desirable for the Soviet Government to correct these "misinterpretations."

As I anticipated, the unexpected direct mention of Stalin caused Malik to consider his reply quite deliberately. He thought for a moment and then said that what we had done during this Assembly was making the UN a different kind of organization than had been agreed upon at San Francisco.[7] The General Assembly was not a substitute for the Security Council. We knew we could always rely on the "twenty and ten" votes in the Assembly. (Obvious reference to the Latin Americans and the Atlantic Pact countries.) Any additional necessary votes could be found by using pressure. We had "our rope around the necks of many countries" and that was how we managed to get Trygve Lie [8] elected again. He had been told this by one Delegate who was "not a friend of the Soviet Union", but who admitted to Malik that his Government had voted for Lie "because the US had tightened the rope." [9] Malik accompanied this comment with a gesture at his throat.

Jebb, who had been silent up to this moment, said it was "obvious the UN could not succeed unless the Four Powers agreed among themselves." When Malik failed to reply to this comment, Jebb repeated it. I commented that the UN might help to bring about such agreement eventually.

Malik, who appeared determined to concentrate on the US, said that the US was trying to keep the peace by pointing a pistol at the Soviet Union. He referred to a recent editorial he had read in the New York Times which was entitled "Shotgun Wedding". The US insisted on a "shotgun wedding."

We were afraid of a business depression and wanted a large arms program. We also thought we could intimidate the Soviet Union with our atom bombs and air force.[10]

I said I had frequently observed that Soviet representatives in discussing these matters refused to accept the facts, and the facts were clear that, as Lacoste had said, there was great fear of the Soviet Union. It was this fear which accounted for the decision of the rest of the world to make itself so strong that it could not be attacked.

Malik replied this was exactly the theory expressed by Secretary Acheson a year ago. The Secretary talked about "situations of strength".[11] This was only an excuse to bring pressure, and that was what was causing tension.

The conversation ended more or less on this note. Malik was as intransigent as I have ever heard him, but was not grim. At frequent intervals he smiled, or put his hand on my arm in a friendly fashion. He gave me the impression of pointedly confining his remarks to the US and, while not rude to Jebb or Lacoste, paid little or no attention to their comments.

Later in the evening, I approached Zinchenko, to compare his attitude with that of Malik.

I tried the same heavy-handed approach of saying that Stalin's Pravda interview was being "wrongly interpreted" by many as indicating that the Soviet Union intended to leave the UN. It seemed to me this was doing the Soviet Union more harm than it was doing the UN.

Without hesitation, Zinchenko replied that Stalin meant no such thing. The significant thing to notice, said Zinchenko, was that whereas before Stalin had referred to the UN as a useful "instrument of peace", a great deal had happened since then. Decisions had been made "by a certain majority" which "did not always take into account the interests of the minority." But this was not at all the same thing as saying the Soviet Union would leave the UN.

(At this point I left Zinchenko to join Jebb for a discussion with Rau [12] on Kashmir, separately reported).

On March 1, after the Security Council meeting, I found Malik in the Delegates' Lounge, and in passing remarked I had just been told his Government had agreed to a meeting of the Deputies in Paris.[13] He took hold of my arm and said he had heard that the Americans "were going to the meeting without any enthusiasm" and wanted to know if this were true.

I replied I could not imagine where he had heard this, since we hoped that the meeting would be useful. He said he had just heard from a reporter that Gromyko would head the Soviet Delegation and asked who would represent the US. I told him I believed Jessup [14] would be our Deputy. I said it seemed obvious to me the Soviet Union had it within its power to make the conference a success because it had created the causes of tension in Europe and could remove them by changing its policies.

Malik asked what I meant by "causes of tension", adding the "cause of tension is Germany." I said that the notes which we had sent to his Government set out the problems quite clearly. He repeated that Germany is the "real problem", and said somewhat sarcastically that we talked about the Austrian question, "as if Austria and Germany had the same importance."

I said I was without authority to discuss the matter, but, speaking personally, it seemed clear there are many causes of tension in Europe and they could not be ignored as if they did not exist. The military establishments in Eastern Europe are an obvious example.

Malik said that he could only "judge facts as he knew them." The US had 100,000 troops in Germany and another 100,000 in England and other places in Europe. This is "not consistent with peaceful intentions." I asked whether he seriously believed that US troops in Europe were there as part of an aggressive plan against the Soviet Union. I added that it was disturbing to hear him talk as if he expected such absurd conclusions to be taken seriously. In reply, he repeated much of what he had said in our previous conversation, reported above, about American industrialists fearing depression, "warmongering" by political leaders, etc.

I said I thought it was almost a tragic thing that he appeared to be unable or unwilling to believe the simple truth—We had demobilized after the war, we much preferred to make things our people could use in their daily lives, we had been driven reluctantly to set up a large military budget in order to be strong enough to defend ourselves. He asked me to explain the word "reluctantly", which he did not understand. When I did so, he replied with some warmth, "What can we do to convince you that we do not want war and that we do not want to conquer the world?" I said I thought they could demonstrate this most clearly by their actions, both at the meetings of Ministers and after.

Moscow Warns of Possible Withdrawal from UN. Following the decision of the World Peace Council to send a delegation to the UN to demand that it "return to the role assigned it by the Charter," a leading Soviet propagandist is reported to have stated in a public lecture in Moscow on February 27 that if the UN did not "respond to the representations" of the World Peace Council delegation, the USSR "would have no alternative but to leave the United Nations." A Pravda editorial broadcast March 3 implied the same when it asserted that the UN had the choice "either to fulfill the demands of the World Peace Council . . . or to doom itself to disintegration." This heightened Soviet campaign against the UN appears at present designed primarily to intimidate the UN into adopting a more positive attitude toward Soviet demands, rather than as a firm indication of an intention to withdraw from the UN. In this connection, Soviet UN delegates have recently stated positively that no such intention was to be inferred from Stalin's recent remarks on the shortcomings of the UN. Nevertheless, the appearance of a frank prediction of withdrawal if this effort fails, when considered in conjunction with Soviet moves to create parallel organizations and the systematic drive to discredit the UN, must be considered as increasing the chances of an actual withdrawal.

Oleschuk then reported as stating that aggressive bloc (in UN) of 30 powers had obstructed every proposal for preserving peace. Therefore, on initiative of USSR, the World Peace Movement had been formed. Peace Council appeal constitutes a second warning to UN to carry out her chief function—preserving peace. If warning has no results, and UN continues to serve cause of US aggression, then peace loving countries would have to leave it, since they could not uphold its authority by participation. Oleschuk also quoted as remarking that USSR no longer stands alone, but enjoys support of 10 democratic countries and also of World Wide Peace Partisans.

Inference foregoing somewhat different from that of Deptel 559, in that Oleschuk portrays Council appeal as second warning, which UN must heed or face secession (rather than making Soviet bloc action contingent on actual reception accorded by UN to specific Peace Council delegation). Thus, CP SU will judge whether UN is heeding warning and ceasing to support US aggression.

Since creation Peace Council last November, Embassy has felt that body would be and was being developed as potential rival UN, to be used only when and if USSR deems desirable. "The second Congress of Peace approved an appeal addressed to the United Nations containing proposals with a view to maintaining the peace of the world. The text of this appeal was sent to you by telegram and your secretariat acknowledged receipt under date of December 5, 1950. The World Council for Peace, which is an outgrowth of the Congress, held its first meeting in Berlin between 21 and 26 February. It was decided to send a delegation to the UN to deal with the different points of this appeal and the decisions of the council with regard to this appeal. This delegation will be composed of the following people: Sr. Nenni (Italy), Mme. Isabel Blume (Belgium), Mrs. S. O. Davies (Great Britain), Mrs. Jesse Street (Australia), M. d'Astier de la Vigerie (France), Mr. Tikhonov (USSR), Mr. Yao Tsung-wu (CPR), Mr. Hromadka (Czechoslovakia), Mr. d'Arboussier (Black Africa), Sr. Neruda (Chile), Gen. "The gravity of the international situation and the absolute necessity to put forth all our efforts to avoid new conflict compels me to ask you to receive this delegation without delay, and I beg of you to let me know what date will be convenient."

Lie via Cordier replied briefly by letter dated March 15, as follows:

"The Secretary-General has asked me to state in response to your letter of March 8 he hopes to meet your delegation at some point in Europe—perhaps Paris, Geneva, Rome—in the course of the trip he plans to take in the near future. CONFIDENTIAL Moscow, March 31, 1951.

No. 576

Reference: Embassy despatch 301, December 18, 1950.[1]

Subject: The First Session of the World Peace Council and Subsequent Developments

This despatch contains Embassy comments on the activities of the World Peace Council session in Berlin, and on subsequent related developments, as they were reported in the Moscow press, as well as on probable Soviet-Peace Partisan tactics in the future. The World Peace Council proceedings have not been reported in complete detail, since the Embassy's main reference source was the Moscow press and since it is assumed that those proceedings have already been fully covered elsewhere.

Summary

The Soviet propaganda machine gave tremendous publicity to the activities of the Peace Council. The opening day, February 21, was marked by unusually heavy attacks on the UN in the Soviet press. Stalin's February 17 interview in Pravda obviously exerted a great influence on the Council proceedings. This influence was so apparent that it should increase Peace Partisan vulnerability to attack as Communist inspired and controlled.

[1] Not printed.

The course of events since the Second World Peace Congress (November, 1950) was reflected in the sharper and more aggressive tone of the Council speeches, as compared with those of the Congress. As was to be expected, the Council's activities in no way deviated from the regular Party line. The Appeal for a Peace Pact, which one speech described as an even more important document than the Stockholm Appeal, has received the greatest publicity thus far. Among the other Council decisions, the resolutions on the United Nations and on German remilitarization also received considerable comment.

Although they received much less notice, the Council's discussion and decisions concerning ways and means of expanding the Peace Partisan movement and obtaining new allies were of great importance, for to a large extent the future success of that movement will be contingent on the possibility of attracting new supporters, particularly those who are respected and not considered pro-Communist, but who are politically naive and susceptible to manipulation. Specific reference was made to the possibility of contacting religious groups and adherents of world government, as well as those who favor pacifism or neutrality (in other words, those who may serve to help widen the split in non-Communist ranks).

Particularly alarming was the Council's reference to the possibility of joint action with the Quakers, for such an event would undoubtedly constitute a major achievement for the Partisans (page 10). It was clear from the Council speeches that the Partisans had worded their program in such a way as to attract the greatest possible number of people.

A large number of conferences were planned or discussed, most of which will obviously do much to give the World Peace Council the appearance of a world organization engaged in solving all sorts of problems. This aspect of the program is apparently calculated to build-up the World Peace Council still further as a rival to the UN. The International Economic Conference, scheduled for this summer, in Moscow, appears particularly suitable for Soviet propaganda purposes (page 12). The fact that some of these conferences have been scheduled for this summer (and one in Moscow) will probably not be overlooked by many on both sides of the Iron Curtain who are concerned regarding the possibility of war this year.

The Soviet Peace Defense Act and the European Workers' Conference Against Remilitarization of Germany, in Berlin, were two further developments in the peace campaign which received great publicity in the Soviet Union. On the other hand, the recent exchange of messages between the UN and the World Peace Council (concerning the desire of the WPC delegation to visit the UN) was only briefly reported in the local press and has not been played up editorially.

The World Peace Council is undoubtedly scheduled for further development as a rival to the UN. However, ultimate Soviet action will probably be influenced by the results of the present Paris talks and the Council of Foreign Ministers meeting, and the possibility of obtaining a Peace Pact. The Soviet Union could find both advantages and disadvantages to seceding from the UN. In the future, its decision may well be determined to a large extent by its estimate of the probable effect of secession on the important neutral countries (page 18). Meanwhile, anti-UN propaganda continues and the World Peace Council is being rapidly developed for future use, either as a threat or as an actual rival.

[Here follow 14 pages of detailed discussion under the subheadings of "World Peace Council", "Council Activities", and "Some Subsequent Events".]

III—Possible Future Developments

The World Peace Council session and its decisions appear to bring the Soviet Union and the Peace Partisans closer to a showdown with the UN. Undoubtedly, strenuous efforts will be made in the future to justify the portrayal of the Council as the most representative international organization. At the same time, Soviet-Peace Partisan attacks on the UN will probably continue, unless Soviet power and influence in the UN is greatly increased by some drastic change in the international scene.*

Soviet action vis-à-vis the UN will probably be influenced by several factors, including, among others: the possibility of securing a Five Power Peace Pact; the results of the present Paris discussions and, possibly, of a future Council of Foreign Ministers meeting; and the likely repercussions of secession from the U.N.

If the USSR were to achieve a Five Power Peace Pact it would presumably prefer to remain in the UN and continue to exercise its influence in that organization and to use it as a forum for its propaganda.

If the Soviet Union were to obtain what it considered to be outstanding diplomatic successes at a meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers,[2] it might well decide against seceding from the UN, on the grounds that such action would probably arouse fresh alarm and provoke new energetic measures among the principal anti-Soviet governments which would undo or nullify the previous Soviet gains. In the absence of any substantial gains for the Soviet Union at the Council of Foreign Ministers meeting, such considerations would not, of course, exert an influence on Soviet thinking regarding secession.

*One noteworthy forecast of future international developments was made by Nenni, in his speech at the Council, in which he stated that the most likely result of the "American war policy" was a "prolonged period of neither peace nor war", which will create a particularly favorable soil for every sort of adventure, including those of a facist and Nazi type". [Footnote in the source text.]

No matter what the results of the Council of Foreign Ministers meeting, the Soviet Union might well try to utilize that meeting to minimize, at least indirectly, the influence and prestige of the UN, by arguing that the most important problems are, perforce, settled by direct negotiation among the Great Powers and outside the UN.

Secession by the Soviet bloc would tend to increase, at least on paper, the importance of the World Peace Council. The latter now "represents", in its own peculiar way, the "peace-loving peoples" of 81 countries. Following secession, on the other hand, the UN would appear to be less of a world organization than it is today. To dramatize its charges that the UN is not truly representative of the people of any country, whatever, the Soviet bloc might well seize on the inability of the Peace Council delegation to obtain satisfaction from the UN as the most appropriate occasion for leaving that organization, should other developments seem to make such action advisable at that time.

Secession, however, would not be without drawbacks for the Soviet Union. For one thing, it would leave the non-Soviet countries in a single organization and free from Communist vetoes. Moreover, in addition to the above mentioned repercussions on the major anti-Soviet governments, secession might well have the effect of reducing sympathy for the USSR among the countries which are not consistently anti-Soviet, and among various groups which favor pacifism or neutrality. Undoubtedy, the USSR hopes to manipulate those countries and groups so as to widen the split in non-Soviet ranks, and it would, presumably, prefer to avoid any action which would reduce the opportunity for such manipulation. Therefore, the ultimate Soviet decision with regard to secession eventually may be determined by Soviet thinking regarding the effect such action would have on the important neutral countries.

At any rate, whether the Soviet bloc will ever actually secede from the UN or not, the Peace Council can be, and is being, developed as a useful club which the Soviets can either wield for intimidation or actually use at the most propitious moment.

WORLD PEACE COUNCIL

Department considers it essential that spurious Soviet peace propaganda, now in high gear, under the imprimatur of the recently established "World Peace Council," and likely to mount for some time, be combatted with imagination and vigor. Accordingly Department currently engaged in preparation of materials for use in serious campaign to counter phony peace propaganda. These will be made available in the form of guidances and backgrounders. The following, for such use as you deem appropriate, is Department thinking re current anti-UN phase of the Soviet-sponsored WPC program:

Sov-commie propaganda has for some time engaged in systematic efforts to undermine confidence in the UN. Simultaneously it has been trying to build up the "World Peace Council" as a possible heir presumptive to the UN. The following events appear significant:

The Warsaw "Peace Congress," November 1950, described the UN as a new Holy Alliance, called for a "return to the true UN Charter" and addressed a communication to the UN to consider the terms of the Warsaw Appeal.

Stalin in his Pravda interview of February 15 attacked the UN as unrepresentative, as a failure in its task of achieving peace and as a tool used by the US to bring about World War III. Stalin claimed ten NATO countries and twenty Latin American countries form aggressive core of UN and added that "UNO is taking the inglorious road of the League of Nations. In this way it is burying its moral prestige and dooming itself to disintegration."

The Berlin meeting (February 21–26) of the Soviet sponsored WPC demanded that the UN consider the resolutions of WPC and that it return to the role assigned it by the Charter, namely to serve as an area of agreement between the governments and not as the instrument of any dominant group. WPC also announced its decision to send a delegation to the UN to present its demands.

Romanian paper Scanteia, declared February 23, "Turning UN into instrument of aggression has disappointed people and this disappointment has led to setting up WPC." Other commie journals began refer to WPC as "new world power."

On February 27, Soviet propagandist Oleshchuk stated Moscow in public lecture that the WPC appeal constituted a second warning to the UN to carry out its chief function—preserving peace, and that if warning had no results and the UN continued to serve the cause of US aggression, the peace loving countries would have to leave the UN.

Pravda editorial, March 3, echoing Stalin line, asserted: "The UN has the choice either to fulfil the demands of the WPC or share the inglorious fate of the League of Nations and doom itself to distintegration." Pravda added: "In making its demands to the UN the WPC is acting as the most representative organ of all nations. . . . The demands of the WPC are the demands of hundreds of millions of people of good will of the whole world."

The latest North Korean communication to the UN is apparently based on the WPC resolution re Korea.

While the possibility cannot be disregarded that the present campaign may have the object of preparing Soviet withdrawal, there are no indications that the USSR has reached such a decision. Current Department thinking that USSR would have no compunction about withdrawing from the UN if it should decide that continued membership no longer serves Soviet ends. WPC resolutions and Sov statements indicate, however, that the USSR plans for the present to continue its efforts to make the UN more responsive to Soviet pressure and that the USSR is now using the threat of withdrawal and of the establishment of a rival organization as a means toward this end.

In view proportions and significance this Sov campaign it is important that we counter with appropriate information. Following points should be stressed:

1. WPC is a Soviet controlled group representing no serious body of opinion in free world. It exists only to advance Soviet purposes. Comparison of Soviet policy statements of past year with demands of WPC reveals remarkable identity.

2. Analysis of political creeds of 85% of the 225 original members of the council reveals that all are either communists or fellow-travellers. Data on the remaining 15% is unavailable. Members of the Council were selected by 2nd Congress Peace Partisans from lists drawn up by the Bureau and Secretariat on the basis of nominations made by various national delegations. These delegations, for most part, nominally chosen by national "peace" officials and other commie-front organizations but as matter of practice delegates often self-appointed or selected by executive members of organizations or the communist parties. Actual control wielded by the Bureau and Secretariat of Peace Partisans—a staff of 27 persons of whom all but two are either communists or fellow-travellers.

3. The WPC claim to represent public opinion is based on signatures to the "Stockholm Appeal." Those signatures never authenticated. Moreover, overwhelming majority obtained in USSR and the Sov satellite states.

4. Soviet "peace" protestations and the Stockholm Appeal relating to atomic weapoins, fell with dull thud last summer when communist forces invaded ROK and world opinion recognized that Stalin could have prevented aggression in Korea had he desired.

5. Had UN failed to oppose communist aggression in Korea UN might have been reduced to status of the League of Nations, following League failure to take effective action in the Corfu, Manchuria and Ethiopian cases. However, the UN did act, supplying an impressive example of the vindication of the rule of law in international affairs. Fifty-three member nations indicated in communications to the SYG of UN that they supported the action of the UN pursuant to the SC resolution. Any subsequent differences among UN members as to conduct of the UN Korean campaign only confirm that the UN is a genuinely democratic organization and is not dominated by any one member.

6. Well known that the USSR has obstructed UN efforts to establish just and enduring peace. Despite Soviet obstruction, UN has important achievements to its credit: withdrawal of Soviet troops from Iran, establishment of independent Indonesia, cease-fire in Palestine and Kashmir, role in maintenance of Greek independence, defense of ROK: this in addition to valuable work done by the specialized agencies in fields of health, agriculture, food, relief, economic progress, education and advancement of non-self-governing people.

7. Fundamental UN political and security decisions of General Assembly were supported by a vast majority including not only the NATO countries and the Latin American Republics, but also the Middle East and Asian states. This is true of such decisions as resolutions on atomic energy, disarmament and Essentials of Peace.

8. USSR failed in its efforts to impose its own will on the United Nations. Soviet threat of withdrawal is a threat that unless majority capitulates to Soviet plans, the Soviets will repudiate their Charter obligations. The United States wants the Soviets to stay in the United Nations and is willing to cooperate with them as with any other Member. However, continued membership of any Member, large or small, cannot be bought at a price of a compromise with Charter principles.

9. Exchange of correspondence between UN SYG Trygve Lie and President of Soviet-sponsored WPC Joliot-Curie, reveals that whereas Lie expressed willingness to receive WPC deputation in Paris and notified Joliot-Curie to this effect 10 days in advance of his arrival in Paris, WPC officials declined to keep the appointment. By declining Lie's offer and insisting that its deputation go to New York the WPC has manifested greater interest in obtaining propaganda advantages connected with their appearance at UN headquarters than in peace itself.

10. UN SYG Lie in excellent statement (which merits heavy emphasis) enclosed with his letter to Joliot-Curie (Wireless Bulletin 90) set forth these themes:

a. The UN offers best hope to all people everywhere who are genuinely interested in peace.

b. Those whose actions tend to weaken the UN, to undermine its authority, to sharpen the discords that are inevitably present in a world organization—they are no true friends of peace no matter what they profess to be.

c. Support the UN with understanding and loyalty and you shall have peace.

FYI: Brit FonOff has instructed its missions along similar lines requesting that where appropriate they bring UK views on this matter to attention of other governments and seek to obtain recognition by press and public of the fantastic and impudent nature of the claims advanced on behalf of the WPC. Department suggests you discuss the above with your British colleague and other interested colleagues in your discretion.

Department interested in obtaining detailed reports concerning a. appeal and impact of Soviet "peace" propaganda on local population and manner of selection of local representatives to the WPC.

b. nature and scope of local efforts to combat fraudulent peace movement.

c. suggestions and recommendations re action required to deflate Soviet "peace" campaign, discourage signatures, etc.

Editorial Note

An official United States statement regarding Soviet propaganda about leaving the United Nations was included in a speech made at Milwaukee, Wisconsin on April 27 by John D. Hickerson, Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs. For text, see Department of State Bulletin, May 7, 1951, pages 731 ff. The speech was entitled "The 'Phony' Peace Offensive" and the remarks regarding the United Nations were incorporated under a subheading entitled "Answering Soviet Charges Against U.N.".

Assistant Secretary Hickerson said in part:

"The Soviets charge that the United Nations has failed because it has turned into a docile instrument of United States policy. This is nothing but an absurd way of saying that the majority of free nations of the world have been alert to Soviet subversion. . . .

"The United States cannot honestly be blamed because other nations find their interests at odd with those of the Soviet Union. The Soviets are themselves responsible. Their unreasonable and uncompromising positions have engendered a real fear among the majority of the members of the United Nations. . . .

"In organizing its phony 'peace' campaign, what has the Kremlin in mind concerning the future of the United Nations? That is anybody's guess on this side of the iron curtain. This 'peace' campaign professes a wish to bring the United Nations back to its original purposes. In this manner the World Peace Council seeks to discredit the United Nations and thus lessen the stigma of the United Nations' denunciation of the North Korean and Chinese Communist aggression.

"By building up their World Peace Council, the Soviets seek to exert propaganda pressure against the United Nations—a sort of blackmail. . . .

". . . We are not, however, blind to Soviet aims and tactics, and we must not allow them to subvert the United Nations to their ends. We have fought their attempts to do this since 1945 and will continue our efforts to strengthen the United Nations as an effective organization on world peace. . . .

"If they insist on slandering the United Nations, we must lay the blame for the inadequacies of that organization squarely where it belongs—on the Soviet Union and its policies of obstruction and subversion. We must block the Kremlin's efforts to deceive and divide."

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, April 28, 1951—4: 05 p. m.

WORLD PEACE COUNCIL #2

Major efforts of Commie controlled World Peace Council are devoted to obtaining signatures in all countries for vaguely worded Five Power Peace Pact appeal.

Circular Airgram of April 21, 1951, dealt with WPC organization and implied Soviet threat of blackmail toward UN. Subsequent instructions will deal with other aspects of combatting WPC "peace" campaign.

Department considers it essential that World Peace Pact signature drive be exposed vigorously through the use of all media and other suitable means including, where appropriate, approach to foreign governments.

Peace appeal as adopted by Commie-picked WPC February 1951 in Berlin declares:

"To fulfill the hopes cherished by millions of people throughout the world, whatever may be their views of the causes that have brought about the danger of a world war;

"To strengthen peace and safeguard international security;

"We demand the conclusion of a pact of peace among the Five Great Powers: the United States of America, the Soviet Union, the Chinese People's Republic, Great Britain and France.

"We would consider a refusal to meet to conclude such a pact, by the government of any of the Great Powers, no matter what it might be, as evidence of aggressive design on the part of the government in question.

"We call upon all peace-loving nations to support the demand for this pact of peace, which should be open to all countries.

"We set our names to this appeal and we invite all men and women of good will, all organizations that hope for peace, to add their names in its support."

Pact is designed to appeal to illusion that present world problems can be solved if big five sit down together and cooperate. However, it is apparent from long and patent efforts of US, UK and France to negotiate with Soviets in CFM and other bodies, that "cooperation" in Soviet terms means submission to Soviet demands.

Provision of appeal that aggressive intent evidenced by refusal to conclude a pact clearly attempts to create propaganda basis to stigmatize other major powers for declining "peaceful" international settlements on Kremlin terms.

Soviets have never specified in detail what provisions "peace pact" would contain. Vagueness of WPC resolution and its emotional appeal may deceive well meaning uninformed people.

Agitation for signatures now under way on a world-wide basis. Appeal for Peace Pact is combined with regional appeals such as opposition to rearming Japan and Germany, for settlement of Korea war and opposition to commie-defined Colonialism. Peace drive is conceived as grass roots campaign aimed at exploiting: 1—Individual and national fear of rearmament, war and increased taxation; 2—Economic dissatisfaction; 3—Social and political unrest and anti-colonalism; 4—Pacifist and neutrality sentiment; and 5—What Communists call "initiative of churches" on behalf of peace.

WPC drive appears to have short range propaganda purpose of underscoring myth that Kremlin is the power for peace while other great powers are for war, and to prevent or delay anti-communist defenses. Long range purpose is to weaken unity and strength of free world against Soviet aggression, to further Kremlin's dynamic program for achieving world domination and to prepare naive and uninformed masses, now outside of party or front organizations innocently to accept part in revolutionary expansion of Communism.

Five power peace pact proposal is largely similar to earlier USSR proposals in UN General Assembly and confirms Kremlin control of WPC as a propaganda pressure vehicle for USSR ends. Following recent history may clarify Soviet intent:

1—Pact proposal referred to by Stalin in interview with Kingsbury Smith January, 1949 and formally placed on UN General Assembly agenda September 1949. It was overwhelmingly rejected by GA which adopted as counter-measure "Essentials of Peace" resolution which offered a plan of action for real peace. Soviets again introduced proposal in GA September, 1950 and again it was overwhelmingly rejected by GA which adopted as a counter measure the "Peace through Deeds" resolution. Soviets voted against both UN resolutions.

Sole vague reference to the contents of a peace pact which Soviets were considering was made by Vishinsky November 23, 1949 in GA political committee. Vishinsky declared that the pact was "intended to ensure the peaceful settlement of all differences; to curb the preparations for a new war; to reduce military budgets and lighten the burden of taxation; to eliminate foreign military and air bases; and to bring an end to aggressive blocs such as the one resulting from the North Atlantic Treaty."

2—World Peace Congress in Rome, October 1949, adopted three point appeal to all parliaments which included provision for peace pact within the framework of UN. Expanded version given rubber-stamp approval by Eastern European parliaments in February 1950 while Western governments were offered a simpler formula, excluding provision for a peace pact. Periodic references to peace pact made in Soviet and communist propaganda throughout 1950.

3—Warsaw Peace Congress in November, 1950, called on UN to convoke meeting of Big Five to discuss differences. In December 1950, Polish delegate to UN asked SYG to circulate to all members memorandum adopted by Warsaw Congress which called, among others, for a meeting of Big Five. The memorandum contained single-package version of all Communist propaganda themes, including proposal of so-called Stockholm Peace Appeal of 1950 which demanded banning of atomic weapons.

4—New World Peace Council, composed of 262 Communist or party line members reverted to peace pact proposal in Berlin, February 1951 and made it the main theme of signature drive.

Vigor and imagination required to combat spurious peace appeal which, if successful, could only lead to a peace of MVD policed slave labor camp. All techniques perfected by Communists in Stockholm Peace Appeal are certain to be used again and new methods attempted. Soviet propaganda now devoting unusually large proportion of time to peace theme.

Following points should be stressed against peace pact appeal:

1—UN Charter constitutes solemn peace pact to which all member countries, including Five Great Powers, have subscribed. All members have assumed obligation to settle their differences peacefully and to refrain from the use or threat of force. If these basic obligations were honored by all members, including Soviet Union, true peace would be insured. Need exists for fulfillment of UN charter and other obligations, which Kremlin attempts to sabotage, rather than new pact of Great Powers.

2—Kremlin has violated existing obligations to such extent that world has lost confidence in its respect for treaties. There is no sense in a—Enslavement of Eastern European countries by Kremlin controlled Communists.

Soviets assuming new treaty obligations until they have restored confidence of world in their word by honoring existing obligations. Emphasize Soviet violations of war time agreement, UN charter and examples of lack of cooperation such as:

b—Sealing off, as Soviet reservation, of Eastern Germany and Northern Korea.

c—Fomenting civil strife and aggression against Greece; Berlin blockade.

d—Militarization of East German Police.

e—Soviet stripping of machinery and factories in Manchuria; detachment of large land areas from China.

f—Soviet supported aggression against South Korea.

g—Communist support of Communist rebels and bandits in Indochina and Malaya.

h—Threat of force against Yugoslavia and Turkey.

i—Support of re-militarization of Hungary, Bulgaria and Rumania in violation of peace treaties.

j—Soviet maintenance of disproportionately high armaments at a time when Germany and Japan were demilitarized and all other powers rapidly and radically reduced their armaments below level where they could constitute threat to Soviet Union.

k—Persistent Soviet refusal to cooperate in UN majority approved plans for control of atomic energy and regulation of armament.

l—Imperialist extinction of Baltic nations and vast extension of Soviet power by threats and force against smaller states.

m—Refusal to conclude treaty on Austria after five years of negotiations.

n—Conspiracy and constant incitement by Kremlin-instructed communists to overthrow governments and weaken peaceful countries by civil war.

o—Persistent refusal of Soviet Union to cooperate in efforts of UN specialized agencies for social and economic improvement.

p—Use of police terror, slave labor and erection of iron curtain to prevent relations between people of the Soviet block and outside world.

3—Big Five pact could mean control of world by great powers without a voice by smaller nations in their own fate.

4—Soviet hopes that peace pact will provide instrument more amenable to their will than United Nations, and that pact will wreck or impair efforts to build up General Assembly and NATO to cope with aggression. Soviet veto in UN Security Council has not proved as effective an instrument for Soviets as they hoped. To meet Soviet obstruction in Security Council, importance of General Assembly increased and NATO developed.

5—Fifth Power in proposed pact, Communist China, already stands condemned by free world through UN as aggressor in Korea and is openly and actively supporting aggression.

6—Machinery exists in Council of Foreign Ministers for settlement of issues appropriate to major power discussions. Efforts to achieve agreement in CFM at six conferences from 1945 to 1949 thwarted by obstructionism of Kremlin which considers agreements only as assent of others for Soviet proposals. However, we are willing to try again as in present Paris talks.

7—Growing strength and determination of free world deters Kremlin from imposing its imperialist will and objectives on world. When Soviets recognize their inability to impose their will on free nations by force, threats or subversion, means and methods will be found for negotiating differences with due regard for legitimate Soviet national interests.

8—Methods for achieving true peace for which free world strives contained in "Essentials of Peace" resolution adopted by 1949 General Assembly by 53 members of UN and opposed only by Soviets and satellites. This resolution reaffirmed urgent necessity for members to act in accordance with UN charter principles; called on all nations to refrain from threatening or using force or fomenting civil strife, to carry out international agreements in good faith, to cooperate with UN bodies, to promote respect for basic human rights, to promote higher living standards, remove obstacles to free exchange of information and ideas, to settle disputes peacefully, to cooperate to attain effective regulation of conventional armaments and international control of atomic energy.

"(b) All foreign troops, and also foreign volunteer forces, should be withdrawn from Korea within a period of three months.

"3. The General Assembly calls upon the governments of all States, both those which are Members of the United Nations and those which are not at present in the United Nations, to consider at a World Conference the question of a substantial reduction of armed forces and armaments and also the question of practical measures for prohibiting the atomic weapon and establishing international control over the observance of such prohibition.

"The General Assembly recommends that the above-mentioned World Conference should be convened at the earliest possible date and in any case not later than 1 June 1952.

1. On 10 October 1951 Mr. Truman, the President of the United States of America, signed the "Mutual Security Act of 1951",[2] which provides for special appropriations to the amount of 100 million dollars for the financing, as stated in the act, of "any selected persons who are residing in or escapees from the Soviet Union, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Romania, Bulgaria, Albania . . . either to form such persons into elements of the military forces supporting the North Atlantic Treaty organization or for other purposes . . ."

the Soviet Union and a number of other states for the purpose of carrying out subversive and diversionary activities within those states.

The act provides for the financing of traitors to their native lands and of war criminals who have fled from their countries and are hiding in the territory of the United States and a number of other states, for the financing of armed groups for the purpose of fighting against the Soviet Union.

The financing by the United States of America—as provided by the act passed in the United States—of subversive organizations and diversionist groups, both in the territory of the Soviet Union and other peace-loving democratic countries and beyond the frontiers of their territory, for the purpose of fighting against those countries constitutes an act of aggression towards the Soviet Union and the states of the peoples democracies.

Such action by the United States of America constitutes an unprecedented interference by the United States in the internal affairs of the said states.

2. This direct interference by the United States of America in the internal affairs of other states is a violation both of generally-recognized rules of international law and of the principles on which the charter of the United Nations is based.

3. Moreover, the adoption of the "Mutual Security Act of 1951," is a flagrant violation by the United States of America of the Soviet-American agreement of 16 November 1933 concluded by Mr. M. M. Litvinov, Peoples Commissar for Foreign Affairs of the USSR, and Mr. F. D. Roosevelt, President of the United States of America, at the time of the establishment of diplomatic relations between the Soviet Union and the United States of America. By that agreement the parties entered into a mutual obligation to refrain from subsidizing and supporting military and other organizations having as an aim the bringing about by force of a change in the political or social order of the contracting parties.[3]

4. By reason of the foregoing, the delegation of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics proposes for inclusion in the agenda of the sixth regular session of the General Assembly of the United Nations the important and urgent matter of the "aggressive acts of the United States of America and its interference in the domestic affairs of other countries, as instanced by the appropriation of 100 million dollars to pay for the recruitment of persons and the organization of armed groups in the Soviet Union, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Romania, Bulgaria, Albania, and a number of other democratic countries, and outside the territory of those countries."

EXCERPT FROM MUTUAL SECURITY ACT OF 1951
Public Law 165—82d Congress
Chapter 479—1st Session
H. R. 5113

AN ACT

To maintain the security and promote the foreign policy and provide for the general welfare of the United States by furnishing assistance to friendly nations in the interest of international peace and security.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Mutual Security Act of 1951".

Sec. 2. The Congress declares it to be the purpose of this Act to maintain the security and to promote the foreign policy of the United States by authorizing military, economic, and technical assistance to friendly countries to strengthen the mutual security and individual and collective defenses of the free world, to develop their resources in the interest of their security and independence and the national interest of the United States and to facilitate the effective participation of those countries in the United Nations system for collective security. The purposes of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended (22 U.S.C. 1571–1604), the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended (22 U.S.C. 1501–1522), and the Act for International Development (22 U.S.C. 1557) shall hereafter be deemed to include this purpose.

Title I—Europe

Sec. 101. (a) In order to support the freedom of Europe through assistance which will further the carrying out of the plans for defense of the North Atlantic area, while at the same time maintaining the economic stability of the countries of the area so that they may meet their responsibilities for defense, and to further encourage the economic unification and the political federation of Europe, there are hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year 1952 for carrying out the provisions and accomplishing the policies and purposes of this Act—

(1) not to exceed $5,028,000,000 for assistance pursuant to the provisions of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended (22 U.S.C. 1571–1604), for countries which are parties to the North Atlantic Treaty and for any country of Europe (other than a country covered by another title of this Act), which the President determines to be of direct importance to the defense of the North Atlantic area and whose increased ability to defend itself the President determines is important to the preservation of the peace and security of the North Atlantic area and to the security of the United States (any such determination to be reported forthwith to the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, and the Committee on Armed Services of the Senate and of the House of Representatives), and not to exceed $100,000,000 of such appropriation for any selected persons who are residing in or escapees from the Soviet Union, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Rumania, Bulgaria, Albania, Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia, or the Communist dominated or Communist occupied areas of Germany and Austria, and any other countries absorbed by the Soviet Union either to form such persons into elements of the military forces supporting the North Atlantic Treaty Organization or for other purposes, when it is similarly determined by the President that such assistance will contribute to the defense of the North Atlantic area and to the security of the United States. In addition, unexpected balances of appropriations heretofore made for carrying out the purposes of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended, through assistance to any of the countries covered by this paragraph are hereby authorized to be continued available through June 30, 1952, and to be consolidated with the appropriation authorized by this paragraph. Section 408 (c) of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended (22 U.S.C. 1579), is hereby repealed.

(2) not to exceed $1,022,000,000 for assistance pursuant to the provisions of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended (22 U.S.C. 1501–1522) (including assistance for further European military production), for any country of Europe covered by paragraph (1) of this subsection and for any other country covered by section 103 (a) of the said Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended. In addition, unexpected balances of appropriations heretofore made for carrying out the purposes of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended, are hereby authorized to be continued available through June 30, 1952, and to be consolidated with the appropriation authorized by this paragraph: Provided, That not to exceed $10,000,000 of the funds made available pursuant to this paragraph may be utilized to effectuate the principles set forth in section 115 (e) of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended.

(b) Not to exceed 10 per centum of the total of the appropriations granted pursuant to this section may be transferred, when determined by the President to be necessary for the purpose of this Act, between appropriations granted pursuant to either paragraph of subsection (a): Provided, That the amount herein authorized to be transferred shall be determined without reference to any balances of prior appropriations continued available pursuant to this section: Provided further, That, whenever the President makes any such determination, he shall forthwith notify the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, and the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and of the House of Representatives.

Editorial Note

In an exchange of messages between the United States Delegation at Paris and the Department of State, on November 23, that crossed one another, the Delegation and the Department concluded independently that the United States should not oppose inclusion of the new Soviet item on the agenda of the General Assembly. (Paris telegram 334, November 23, midnight; Department telegram Gadel 231, November 23, 6:25 p. m., 320/11–2351 and 320/11–2251, respectively) The Paris telegram was the result of a meeting of the Delegation advisory staff and the Deputy United States Representative at the United Nations (Gross) on the evening of November 23. The full United States Delegation meeting on November 24, under the chairmanship of Ambassador Austin, United States Representative at the United Nations, confirmed the preliminary action taken on November 23 (IO Files, Doc. US/A/M(Chr)/205). A subsequent staff meeting with certain members of the Delegation on November 24, made the decision to have a joint statement on the Soviet charges issued by the two Members of Congress who were members of the Delegation and who had participated in the legislative process with respect to the passage of the Mutual Security Act, Representatives Michael J. Mansfield and John M. Vorys (IO Files, Doc. US/A/C.1/2508). For text of the joint statement of the two Congressmen, issued to the press at Paris on November 27, see Department of State Bulletin, December 24, 1951, pages 1010 and 1011; the statement was captioned in the Bulletin as "Soviet Distortion of Mutual Security Act".

Later exchanges between the Delegation at Paris and the Department occurred December 3–18, culminating in a Department of State telegraphic instruction on December 18 (Department telegram Gadel 493, December 18, 12:10 p. m., 320/12–1851). The substance of this instruction and an earlier one of December 3, Gadel 326, is incorporated in Doc. US/A/C.1/2516, December 19, infra.

In the legislative history of the item, the General Committee on November 27 recommended inclusion of the item on the General Assembly's agenda. The United States supported this move with a strong statement by Ambassador Gross, Deputy United States Representative at the United Nations (GA (VI), General Committee, pages 21 and 22). A statement by Ambassador Gross in plenary meeting of the General Assembly on December 14, when that body considered adoption of the agenda, suggested that the new Soviet item be considered directly by the General Assembly in plenary meeting rather than first be referred by the Assembly to committee. The General Assembly however referred the item to the First Committee (GA (VI), Plenary, pages 271–273).

United States Delegation Working Paper

CONFIDENTIAL [PARIS,] December 19, 1951.

US/A/C.1/2516

Subject: New Soviet item, on Mutual Security Act

This memorandum is intended to summarize briefly the main points concerning the Kersten amendment in the MSA and the line which the US will take in Committee I in replying to the Soviet charges.

The MSA

1. The MSA authorizes appropriations totaling about 7.5 billion dollars for the fiscal year 1952, the purpose of which is to support and strengthen the security of the free world.

2. The assistance provided by the MSA will go to a number of countries, including a large amount for the countries participating in NATO.

3. The Kersten amendment, which became Section 101(a), authorizes the appropriation of "not to exceed $100,000,000 . . . for any selected persons who are residing in or escapees from the Soviet Union, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Rumania, Bulgaria, Albania, Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia, or the Communist-dominated or Communist-occupied areas of Germany or Austria, and any other countries absorbed by the Soviet Union either to form such persons into elements of the military forces supporting the NATO or for other purposes, when it is . . . determined by the President that such assistance will contribute to the defense of the NA area and to the security of the US".

Line to be taken by US in Committee

1. The US denies flatly the Soviet charges.

2. The authorization of the $100,000,000 in the Kersten amendment is permissive, as shown by the legislative history of the MSA, and is not mandatory upon the President.

3. The Soviet complaint relates to the mere enactment of legislation, and not to any concrete action taken under the legislation. The true meaning and character of the legislation in question is to be determined from the action taken under it.

4. Prior to action under the Kersten amendment, the meaning of that amendment can be judged by reference to its context and to the purposes of the amendment as disclosed in the legislative history. The context of the Kersten amendment is the whole of the MSA. The purposes of the Act are stated to be "to maintain the security and promote the foreign policy and provide for the general welfare of the US by furnishing assistance to friendly nations in the interests of international peace and security," and "to strengthen the individual and collective defenses of the free world; to develop their resources in the interests of their security and independence and the national interest of the US; and to facilitate the effective participation of those countries in the UN system for collective security". The history of the Kersten amendment shows that it was intended to apply to persons who have escaped from behind the Iron Curtain, or who may in the future so escape, after they have come over to this side.

5. Present conditions behind the Iron Curtain make it clear why inhabitants of the Eastern European countries desire to escape and come over to the free world.

6. The Roosevelt–Litvinov agreement, cited by the USSR in its complaint, was violated from the beginning by the Soviet Union, which itself has consistently engaged in interference in the affairs of other countries and more recently in open aggression.

7. The US is confident that the GA will reject quickly and decisively the groundless charges contained in the new Soviet item so that the UN can return to its great constructive tasks in the field of disarmament, raised living standards, extension of human rights to all peoples, and the establishment of a firm peace based on justice and tolerance and mutual understanding.

8. Whether or not the USSR introduces a resolution or resolutions under its item concerning the MSA, we do not believe any counterproposals or substitute resolutions by the Western powers are called for or desirable.

In a statement at the beginning of the debate on December 19, the United States representative handling this item in committee, Congressman Mansfield, declared that the United States Government "denied, without reservation, the USSR allegation that the United States was interfering in the domestic affairs of the USSR or the States responsive to the USSR's control" (ibid., p. 103). At the end of the debate, on December 21, Congressman Mansfield spoke again, noting that "The sole purpose of the [Kersten] amendment in question [section 101 (a)] was to permit refugees to join the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. The act would be administered by the President of the United States for that purpose. The United States Government and people had no apologies to make for giving that opportunity to refugees from USSR tyranny or for the arrangement to defend the North Atlantic area . . . a defensive, not an aggressive, arrangement" (ibid., p. 119).

Dept believes continued emphasis shld be placed significance Mutual Security Act entire free world. Wording of Sov draft Res affords one such opportunity. Del might point out that while Sov complaint addressed to only one of many sections MSA, Sovs reveal true motives in Res calling for abrogation entire Act. Point out this wld mean abrogation aid Greece and Turkey, econ and technical assistance Africa and Near East, aid Far East including UN Korean Reconstruction Agency, appropriations for technical assistance Amer Republics, for UN Relief and Works Agency Palestine, for refugee relief and resettlement in Israel, and UN technical assistance program in addition funds for defense and development free Europe. US/A/3429

1. UNITED STATES POSITION

The First Committee has not recommended any resolution to the GA for adoption. The Assembly will have before it, however, a Soviet resolution which was rejected by the First Committee and has been reintroduced in the plenary (A/2031).[1] The United States should vote against this resolution which (a) condemns the United States Mutual Security Act as an act of aggression and as interference in the internal affairs of other states; and (b) recommends that the United States Government take steps to repeal this Act.

The United States should abstain on the question whether there should be plenary debate of the First Committee report (Rule 67). If there is debate the United States should make a statement along the lines of Annex A attached; if there is no debate the United States, in explanation of vote, should make a statement along the lines of Annex B attached.[2]

2. HISTORY IN COMMITTEE

After 4 meetings of debate the First Committee rejected Soviet resolution (identical to that indicated above) by 39 votes to 5, with 11 abstentions (Afghanistan, Burma, Egypt, Guatemala, India, Indonesia, Iran, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Syria, and Yemen). Since the Soviet resolution was the only proposal introduced under this agenda item, the First Committee did not recommend any resolution to the Assembly for adoption.

3. POSSIBLE DEVELOPMENTS IN PLENARY

It is unlikely that the required number of states (one-third) will desire plenary debate of the First Committee report. In this event, however, the Soviet states can be expected, in explanations of vote, to renew their attacks against the United States. As indicated above, the United States, in explanation of vote, should make a statement along the lines of Annex B attached.[3]

[2] Neither Annex is printed, but see footnote 3, below.

[3] On January 11 the General Assembly considered the new Soviet item and after some discussion rejected the Soviet draft resolution 42–5–11 (Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Yemen, Afghanistan, Burma, Egypt, Guatemala, India, Indonesia, Iran). For the proceedings, see GA (VI), Plenary, pp. 306 ff.

Congressman Mansfield made a lengthy statement in explanation of the United States position, describing the Soviet charges as propaganda aimed not just at the Mutual Security Act, but as "part of a general assault launched by the delegation of the Soviet Union at the beginning of this session against the United Nations collective security system and the regional collective security systems which strengthen it." (Ibid., p. 309)

Editorial Note

On January 12, 1952 the First Committee began consideration of agenda item 67, "the old Soviet item"; see Doc. A/1944, November 8, page 477. This matter had been displaced in the legislative process by "the new Soviet item", which the Soviet Union had submitted on November 22, 1951 and on which the General Assembly had completed final action on January 11, 1952 (agenda item 69). The documents that follow reconstruct the chronological development of the United States Delegation involvement with agenda item 67.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy United States Representative at the United Nations (Gross)

CONFIDENTIAL [PARIS,] December 12, 1951.

US/A/C.1/2512

Subject: Soviet Resolution on NATO

Participants: General Dwight Eisenhower, SHAPE
Amb. Ernest A. Gross, U.S. Delegation

At dinner on December 11 I had the opportunity to discuss informally with General Eisenhower the problem of how best to meet the Soviet attack on NATO which we anticipated in connection with the Soviet resolution. I said we had been considering alternatives such as making our case and letting the General Assembly vote down the Soviet resolution, or having the General Assembly determine affirmatively that NATO participation is consistent with UN membership.

General Eisenhower's tentative reaction was that a more convincing response might be a resolution dealing with Soviet prohibitions and restrictions on freedom of movement and communication. The Soviet Union is aware their attack upon NATO was hollow and they merely seek propaganda advantage. General Eisenhower felt we would accomplish more by making a frontal attack upon issues which would put the Soviet Union on the defensive, in addition to meeting their NATO charges.

Of course, he was not committing himself to this view nor did he have all relevant considerations placed before him. However, it seems to me that his suggestion might fit into the general concept of "Peace with Freedom." Our Working Group should draft a resolution along these lines for the consideration of the Delegation. Such a resolution might be sponsored and presented under the initiative of small Powers.

SECRET PARIS, December 14, 1951—8 p. m.

Delga 664. For the Secretary. Re old Soviet item. As Dept has long anticipated, it seems likely that Soviets in connection their omnibus item [1] will launch major attack on NATO. US and other NATO countries will wish to respond with vigorous offensive showing reasons for creation of NATO and in giving our idea of NATO's proper relationship to UN. USDel here in Paris has been considering how best to conduct this offensive when Soviet item is reached.

One idea that has been put forward is that political comite, in course of debate on Soviet item, might invite or request NATO to send a rep to make a statement before comite. Such statement might be made by General Eisenhower, as the single individual who most genuinely symbolizes and represents NATO as an organization. Such an appearance by General Eisenhower before comite would need to be concurred by appropriate agreement among the 12 govts concerned, after prior consultation with General. Contemplated Eisenhower statement wld be most broadly conceived, to place NATO in true perspective, to state reasons for its existence, and to state its purposes in world situation where San Francisco expectations of great-power cooperation are not a reality today.

Del has discussed above suggestion, and a number of considerations have emerged as favoring suggestion, while at same time certain difficulties have been seen.

Fol are some of difficulties: Appearance of General Eisenhower before UN wld dramatize debate on Soviet item and perhaps lend additional magnitude to Soviet charges directed against NATO. Western Eur countries and certain Asian countries might resent appearance of General Eisenhower as indirect pressure by US to compel greater sacrifices by them for achievement of current NATO goals. There might be unfavorable reaction to appearance of high military figure in UN deliberations. Such appearance by NATO reps in political comite might imply a degree of answerability and even subordination of NATO to UN which countries such as UK and Fr might object to. Some question has been raised as to possible adverse effect on US domestic political situation of appearance by Gen Eisenhower before UN at Paris session.

On other side of ledger, fol considerations have been advanced: Appearance by General before UN wld actually serve to emphasize bipartisan character of US foreign policy in regard to NATO, and tend to withdraw this issue from 1952 campaign. Magnitude of UN debate on Soviet attack against NATO may in any event be determined by USSR rather than West. Appearance of General Eisenhower in political comite wld serve as dramatic counterweight to role Vyshinsky has played at this session, where for some time he has been single most dominating figure on scene. Positive and broadly philosophical statement by General Eisenhower before UN wld help free world in disposing decisively of Soviet charges. It could show that

[1] That is, agenda item 67. See Doc. A/1944, November 8, p. 477.

NATO is not rival or alternative to UN, but that existence of NATO accords with UN and is in support of UN purposes and principles. US statement on behalf of NATO powers would serve as reassurance to Western European countries as well as Middle East countries concerning US intentions in current East-West conflict.

In light of del discussions and above considerations, del believes question of Eisenhower appearance before UN shld be weighted carefully in Wash. In preliminary discussion Dec 13 Congressman Mansfield and Vorys and Amb Gross expressed strong doubts as to wisdom of suggestion, while Mrs. Roosevelt and Cohen warmly supported it. Cooper, Strauss and Tobias also support. Jessup absent from mtg but opposes.[2]

SECRET PARIS, December 14, 1951—8 p. m.

Delga 665. For President and Secretary of State from Mrs. Roosevelt and Cohen. Limited distribution. We shld like you to have our personal views on the matter covered in Delga 664.

This Assembly is probably proceeding as well as might be expected in light of troubled world conditions. If the Assembly did not reflect the strife and malaise existing in the world it wld be remote from realities. But nonetheless if we wish to retain popular faith in UN and prevent disillusionment, it seems to some of us that it is important that we try to find some way of dramatizing the importance of the Assembly in world affairs and at the same time to allay the unreasoning but genuine fears prevalent in Europe and the east as to how the US may exercise the military power it is creating—fears which may increasingly handicap the operations of NATO as well as other efforts of ours to unify and strengthen free Europe and the free world.

The Sov item attacking NATO as incompatible with UN membership may give us this opportunity if we seize it boldly. We have already met the Sov attack with calm and rational explanations here and elsewhere. But something more is required to allay widespread emotional apprehension, particularly among our friends and allies.

It had seemed to some of us that if a way cld be found to have NATO, either at its own request or on the suggestion of some friendly states, invited by the Assembly's President or the pol comite, to send a representative to explain the purposes of NATO and its relations to UN, and if General Eisenhower cld be chosen to act as NATO rep before the Assembly for this purpose, we cld most dramatically demonstrate to world opinion that NATO exists to uphold the principles of UN and not to undermine them, to preserve the peace and not to threaten it. In such event the General wld of course appear with due humility in civilian garb, and solemnly affirm the devotion of NATO and its members to the principles of the charter, pointing out that under the North Atlantic Treaty the parties have expressly undertaken not to use force in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the charter. Such an appearance wld not in our judgment be regarded as an intrusion of a military leader into UN but the recognition by a military leader of the supremacy of the rule of law. It cld have a profound effect upon public opinion throughout the world.

We cannot believe that such an appearance wld have any adverse effect on the political situation at home. It wld, if anything, only emphasize our bipartisan foreign policy and tend to prevent any backwash from next year's political campaign adversely affecting that policy. [Mrs. Roosevelt and Cohen.]

SECRET WASHINGTON, December 22, 1951—2:06 p. m.

Gadel 541. Re old Sov item (Delgas 664 and 665). Irrespective of any domestic pol considerations, gen view in Dept is that, on balance, arguments against Eisenhower appearance in First Comite outweigh those in favor. Fol points seem to us especially important:

1. We question whether Eisenhower appearance before UN Comite wld have as great a psychological effect as those supporting it believe. Wld it not have only a limited and temporary effect?

2. No matter how invitation and statement are phrased, we will not be able to avoid fact that NATO is being defended in UN by a mil man and an American, with all that that connotes in terms of alleged US domination of NATO and imagined domination of US policy by mil arm.

3. Sov propaganda to above effect wld be especially difficult to refute because Gen Eisenhower does not, properly speaking, represent NATO in its totality as distinct from SHAPE as a mil org in one area of NATO. If we wished to have a NATO spokesman appear in UN, we shld think it more appropriate for that spokesman to be a pol rep—say Pearson as Pres of NATO Council. As you know, we are endeavoring to refute charges that NATO is no more than a mil alliance.

4. We believe that sound relationships between NATO and UN are being gradually worked out over period of time, and that comprehensive statement of UN–NATO relationships such as Gen Eisenhower wld have to make wld be premature at this stage. In fact, we wld foresee greatest difficulty in obtaining consent all NATO members to Eisenhower statement if it went beyond broadest generalities. Indeed, it seems to us preferable UN Reps of NATO countries themselves defend NATO in GA, coordinating their activities.

5. Moreover, we wld rather not use our heavy ammunition for anything less than a major crisis. Sov attack on NATO is after all only one portion of a typical Sov agenda item composed of diverse charges against the US and the West. The substance of most of these charges (e.g. disarmament and Korea) will have already been dealt with when Comite 1 begins discussion of old Sov item. We wld anticipate that there will be very little difficulty in these circumstances in disposing of Sov item with same scale of effort we applied last yr, or, if needed, by counter Res along lines position paper SD/A/249 [1] with sponsorship suggested by Lie as indicated Delga 589 Dec 11.[2]

6. We are also concerned re possibility of establishing precedent under which regional grps wld be answerable in the UN for their activities and wld be required appear before UN organ to explain or justify those activities beyond specific Charter requirements. This wld imply a degree of intimacy of regional orgs to UN which we wld not now desire.

7. If, notwithstanding the considerations mentioned in Paras 4, 5, and 6 Del believes appearance some NATO Rep desirable, suggest Del discuss with Can Del and Dels other NATO countries possibility appearance by Pearson.

United States Delegation Working Paper[1]

SECRET [PARIS,] January 7, 1952.

US/A/C.1/2526

Subject: The Old Soviet Item

The Soviet draft resolution on "Measures to Combat the Threat of a New World War and to Strengthen Peace and Friendship Among Nations" consists of four principal parts:

1. An attack on NATO and on United States bases.
2. A proposal for settlement of the Korean war which would involve withdrawal of forces from the 38th parallel within ten days and withdrawal of all foreign troops and foreign volunteer units within three months.
3. A series of paragraphs (three through seven) on prohibition of atomic weapons and reduction of armaments and armed forces.
4. A proposal for the conclusion of a five-power peace pact and a call upon other states to join it.

If we are successful in our argument that the Assembly should not consider Korea while the armistice talks continue at Panmunjom, we can dispose of the second item quickly.

The paragraphs on prohibition and disarmament have already been disposed of in the Committee; they were embodied in the Soviet amendments to the three-power proposal on disarmament. It is unlikely that many members of the Committee will wish to discuss these proposals again so soon.

The attack on NATO is met in part by the resolution the Committee is expected to adopt this afternoon on the CMC. The 8th paragraph of the preamble and the 6th operative paragraph applaud regional and collective self-defense arrangements and urge members to seek support for United Nations collective measures in such bodies.

The proposal for a five-power peace pact was considered and rejected by the Assembly in 1949 and 1950.

[1] Addressed by David W. Wainhouse, Executive Office for United States Delegation matters relating to political and security affairs, to all Political Officers of the Advisory Staff of the Delegation.

This analysis suggests that the Soviet item can be disposed of this year by simply voting it down. The resolutions on disarmament and the CMC are positive contributions towards peace in which the United States is taking the lead. Vyshinsky has already said five or six times in the debate on these two items anything he could be expected to say in the debate on his own resolution. We believe committee members are bored with this performance and that repetition of the same old succotash will not make much new impression on world opinion. In these circumstances, the effort needed to prepare and put across a counter-resolution would seem to dignify beyond its deserts the Soviet resolution; and it is unlikely that we could produce anything whose effect on public opinion would be sufficient to warrant this effort.

We should try to get other states to speak before us in rebuttal to Vyshinsky, since it is only the United States which is attacked by name in this resolution and since the United States has taken the lead so far in the First Committee. A particular effort should be made to get representative of the Organization of American States and of the Arab League to support the principle of regional and collective self-defense arrangements: it should be pointed out to members of these other organizations that, although NATO is named, the OAS and the Arab League operate on the same principle and can likewise expect to be attacked when it serves the purposes of Soviet policy to do so. It might also be possible to get some of the smaller states to attack the provision of the five-power peace pact, even though they are as an after-thought invited to subscribe to it, on the grounds that they don't want the big five dividing up the world and settling questions of interest to themselves.

There is much useful material in the background book on "Possible Soviet Propaganda Tactics in the General Assembly",[2] in particular three papers analyzing the five-power pact, the attack on NATO, and the United States bases abroad (SD/A/245, 249, and 252). It would also be useful to refer to what we and others have said in previous years, in order to help demonstrate that this is a tired old item which the Assembly need not take too seriously. (There is useful material in the President's Reports to Congress for 1950—pages 109 through 112—and for 1949—pages 24 through 28. Statements by United States representatives in committee and plenary for these years are contained in United States Delegation press releases Nos. 735 of November 11, 1949, 760 of November 29, 1949, 1033 of October 26, 1950, and 1035 of October 28, 1950.)

Political officers should take this line immediately with other delegations in the hope that the item can be disposed of with the minimum of fuss compatible with the maximum of exposure.

[2] Regarding this background book, see the editorial note, p. 476.

Text of United Nations Document A/C.1/698, Paris, January 12, 1952 (a revised draft resolution submitted by the Soviet Union)[1]

1. The General Assembly declares participation in the aggressive Atlantic bloc and the creation by certain States, and primarily by the United States of America, of military, naval and air bases in foreign territories incompatible with membership in the United Nations.

2. The General Assembly recognizes it to be essential that:

(a) The countries taking part in the Korean war should immediately end military operations, conclude an armistice and withdraw their forces from the 38th parallel within a period of ten days;

(b) All foreign troops and also foreign volunteer units should be withdrawn from Korea within a period of three months.

3. The General Assembly, considering the use of atomic weapons as weapons of aggression and of the mass destruction of people, to be at variance with the conscience and honour of peoples and incompatible with membership in the United Nations, proclaims the unconditional prohibition of atomic weapons and the establishment of strict international control over the enforcement of this prohibition, it being understood that the prohibition of atomic weapons and the institution of international control shall be put into effect simultaneously.

The General Assembly instructs the Disarmament Commission to prepare and submit to the Security Council, not later than 1 June 1952, for its consideration, a draft convention providing measures to ensure the implementation of the General Assembly decision on the prohibition of atomic weapons, the cessation of their production, the use of already-manufactured atomic bombs exclusively for civilian purposes, and the establishment of strict international control over the observance of the above-mentioned convention.

4. The General Assembly recommends the permanent members of the Security Council—the United States, the United Kingdom, France, China and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics—to reduce the armaments and armed forces in their possession at the time of the adoption of this recommendation by one-third during a period of one year from the date of its adoption.

5. The General Assembly recommends that forthwith, and in any case not later than one month after the adoption by the General Assembly of the decisions on the prohibition of atomic weapons and the reduction by one-third of the armaments and armed forces of the five Powers, all States should submit complete official data on the situation of their armaments and armed forces, including data on atomic weapons and military bases in foreign territories. These data shall be submitted with reference to the situation obtaining at the time when the above-mentioned decisions are adopted by the General Assembly.

6. The General Assembly recommends the establishment within the framework of the Security Council of an international control organ, the functions of which shall be to supervise the implementation of the decisions on the prohibition of atomic weapons and the reduction of armaments and armed forces, and to verify the data submitted by States regarding the situation of their armaments and armed forces.

With a view to the establishment of an appropriate system of guarantees for the observance of the General Assembly's decisions on the prohibition of atomic weapons and the reduction of armaments, the international control organ shall have the right to conduct inspection on a continuing basis; but it shall not be entitled to interfere in the domestic affairs of States.

7. The General Assembly calls upon the Governments of all States, both Members of the United Nations and those not at present in the Organization, to consider at a world conference the question of the substantial reduction of armed forces and armaments and also the question of practical measures for prohibiting the atomic weapon and establishing international control over the observance of such prohibition.

The General Assembly recommends that the above-mentioned world conference should be convened at the earliest possible date and, in any case, not later than 15 July 1952.

8. The General Assembly calls upon the United States, the United Kingdom, France, China and the Soviet Union to conclude a peace pact, and to combine their efforts for the achievement of this high and noble aim.

The General Assembly also calls upon all other peace-loving States to join in the peace pact.

Editorial Note

For the proceedings in the First Committee on January 12–17, 1952, when that committee considered agenda item 67, see GA (VI), First Committee, pages 179 ff. A summary version is contained in the Report of the First Committee, Doc. A/2067, January 18, 1952; see GA (VI), Annexes, fascicule for agenda item 67, pages 3 and 4.

The First Committee on January 17 adopted a substitute resolution offered by France, the United Kingdom, and the United States, which referred the proposals in paragraphs 3 to 7 of the Soviet draft resolution to the Disarmament Commission. Before adoption of this tripartite draft resolution the First Committee rejected paragraphs 1, 2, and 8 of the Soviet draft resolution.

In the General Assembly consideration of agenda item 67 on January 19, 1952, that body immediately approved the three-power draft resolution recommended in the Report of the First Committee. The General Assembly then debated and rejected a draft resolution introduced into plenary by the Soviet Union (Doc. A/2068), which had the same text as the Soviet draft resolution of January 12, 1952 (see Doc. A/C.1/698, supra). For the proceedings of January 19, see GA (VI), Plenary, pages 379 ff.

III. THE COMPLAINT BY YUGOSLAVIA OF HOSTILE ACTIVITIES ON THE PART OF THE SOVIET UNION AND OTHER COUNTRIES OF EASTERN EUROPE

320/9–2651

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] September 26, 1951.

Subject: Action Which Yugoslavia Proposes To Take at Forthcoming General Assembly Session

Dr. Mirko Bruner, First Secretary, Yugoslav Embassy
Mr. John D. Hickerson, Assistant Secretary (UNA)
Mr. Ward P. Allen, EUR [1]
Mr. David H. Popper, UNP [2]

Pursuant to remarks which he had made in a conversation with the Secretary on September 25, the Yugoslav Ambassador called on Mr. Hickerson to apprise us of three steps which the Yugoslav Government has in mind in connection with the forthcoming General Assembly.[3]

1. Agenda Item on Soviet Aggression Against Yugoslavia

The Ambassador said that his government desired to put on the agenda an item relating to the aggressive policies of the USSR and [2] Deputy Director of the Office of United Nations Political and Security Affairs.

[3] The Sixth Regular Session of the General Assembly was scheduled to convene at Paris on November 6.

the satellites against Yugoslavia. Under the item the Yugoslavs would seek Assembly condemnation of the Soviet aggressive policy, including frontier violations, hostile speeches and statements, the treatment of Yugoslav minorities in satellite states, the treatment of Yugoslav diplomats, the economic warfare of the Soviet bloc—in fact, the whole range of hostile Soviet activities vis-à-vis Yugoslavia. The Ambassador stated that the form in which the item would be presented was not yet clear, and that his government would welcome our view on this question as well as on the matter of whether this was an appropriate time to introduce such an item. It appeared that the Yugoslav objective would be an Assembly resolution of condemnation calling upon the Soviets to halt their aggressive procedures. In answer to my questions, the Ambassador indicated that the Yugoslav attitude on possible use of the Peace Observation Commission or other fact-finding machinery was not yet fixed and might depend on the results of consultations with friendly states. He took the line that a Yugoslav initiative of the type proposed would be useful regardless of whether or not a Soviet peace offensive developed at the General Assembly.

Although Mr. Popovic pressed for an indication that I regarded the idea favorably, I told him that I would prefer not to give him an offhand opinion but would consult urgently with my colleagues in the Department and give him more definite word within a few days.

1. Proposed Yugoslav Item on Soviet Bloc Aggressive Policies Against Yugoslavia

I explained to the Ambassador that we had given very careful consideration to the Yugoslav request of our views on the advisability of submitting for the Sixth General Assembly an item on the aggressive policies of the Soviet bloc directed against Yugoslavia. Noting that our comments were solely in the nature of advice, and that the Yugoslav Government must of course make its own decision in the matter, I read to the Ambassador the attached memorandum. The Ambassador expressed his appreciation for the thorough consideration which we had given to the matter and indicated that his government would take our views into account in whatever action it might now take.

JOHN D. HICKERSON

[Annex]

MEMORANDUM

1. It would appear desirable for Yugoslavia to bring the threats to its security to the attention of the General Assembly at the Sixth Session, provided

a. the case presented by Yugoslavia is carefully documented and will convince the Members of the United Nations and world opinion, and

b. the measures proposed by Yugoslavia in the General Assembly command the general support of the members.

2. Obviously the Yugoslav Government wishes to proceed in the Assembly in such a way as to produce the most striking and effective results. For this purpose it would be important that the Yugoslavs should not press for the hasty adoption of a resolution phrased in drastic condemnatory terms, before it has been possible to persuade the greatest possible number of non-Soviet delegations of the strength and justice of their case. Indeed, it would be in the interest of Yugoslavia to extend the proceedings over a considerable period of time, reaping the utmost advantage in moral pressure upon the Soviet bloc and in propaganda effect.

Accordingly, it might be desirable for the Yugoslavs to present initially a strong case, backed by full evidence, and to seek, not an immediate condemnation of the Soviet bloc, but an expression of the Assembly's concern with the situation disclosed by Yugoslavia and a sober and unbiased inquiry into the facts. This would involve the establishment by the General Assembly of machinery which would examine the facts carefully and impartially. Yugoslavia would, of course, cooperate in every way to make such an inquiry possible. This would make it easier to obtain subsequent findings by the Assembly that the Cominform States have threatened and are threatening Yugoslavia and would also give much greater weight to these findings.

Perhaps the most important objective of General Assembly action and of the machinery which it would establish should be to enhance the security of Yugoslavia by deterring the Cominform States from aggression against it.

If aggression should occur there would be available to the United Nations and to the judgment of the world impartial and authoritative reports which could be the basis of prompt and effective United Nations action.

The most desirable and most acceptable action by the General Assembly, and one which could command the full and active support of leading delegations, would be a resolution which would:

a. Note with grave concern the serious charges brought and the evidence adduced by the Government of Yugoslavia against the Governments of the Soviet Union, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Rumania and Bulgaria.

b. Request the Peace Observation Commission to despatch a subcommittee and/or observers, who, with the consent of the states concerned, should observe on a continuing basis the situation charged by the Yugoslav Government, and to report to the General Assembly as appropriate.

Observers designated by the Peace Observation Commission would be carefully chosen to assure that pro-Cominform personnel are excluded.

The effectiveness of this plan would be far greater if Yugoslavia were to indicate that it is prepared to admit such observers even if the Cominform States do not. If Yugoslavia is reluctant at the outset to declare its willingness to admit observers unconditionally, it can postpone the decision and minimize the political disadvantages by indicating consent conditional on the consent of the other States involved.

4. Other courses of action which would meet the objectives of the Yugoslav Government and might receive the necessary support, depending on the strength of the Yugoslav case, are:

a. The Assembly, in addition to expressing its grave concern, could appoint a special committee to receive and consider the evidence offered by Yugoslavia and any defensive material which the Cominform States may offer. This Committee could report back to the Assembly when its studies are completed.

b. One of the main political committees of the Assembly, perhaps by a sub-committee, might consider the case on its merits, on the basis of statements before the Committee and documentary evidence circulated to all the delegations. While this might make possible findings by the Assembly during the Sixth Session, it is less likely to bring about a careful examination of the facts which would satisfy the various governments and world opinion. Also this program would not provide machinery for keeping the case under continued surveillance by the Assembly.

Either of these two courses would be more acceptable if, in addition, the General Assembly were to despatch a sub-commission or observers from the Peace Observation Commission to observe the situation on a continuing basis.

5. The Yugoslav Government should present a new item for the agenda of the Sixth Session, if possible before October 6 when the supplemental list closes. To put the case on the agenda later would, under the Assembly's Rules, require the Yugoslav Government to satisfy other countries that the case is of "an important and urgent character," although most of the evidence has been available for many months.

The agenda item might be entitled "Threats and Hostile Acts against Yugoslavia by the Soviet Union and other States". The explanatory memorandum supporting the inclusion of the item should be brief, factual and as dispassionate as possible. There is no need to prove the case or even to state it in detail in this memorandum.

6. The Yugoslav Government should lay the groundwork for Assembly action in the Sixth Session by discussion with key delegations of the free world. It should be careful to emphasize that its purpose is not merely propaganda but that it is seriously concerned for its security; and that it will present a full case and expect a thorough consideration of this matter which seriously affects the security of Yugoslavia and relations with the Cominform States and, therefore, falls within the jurisdiction of the Assembly under Articles 10, 11 and 14 of the Charter.

320/10–851

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. Ward P. Allen, Special Assistant on United Nations Affairs, Bureau of European Affairs

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] October 8, 1951

Subject: Possible Yugoslav Case

Participants: Dr. Bruner, Yugoslav Embassy
Mr. Ward P. Allen—EUR

Dr. Bruner called at his request to state that the Yugoslav Government has definitely decided to submit a separate agenda item on its case against the USSR, and to give us their views on the suggestions we had previously made to them on this matter. The item is to be titled "Threats and Hostile Acts of the Government of the USSR and Eastern European Countries Against the Independence and Sovereignty of the FPRY". The documentation and evidence presented will be along the line of the Yugoslav White Book, to which will be added all the information accumulated since its publication in order to bring the case up to date. The Yugoslav Government has accepted our guidance and assures that for their part they will do their utmost to keep discussion as dispassionate, sober, unprovocative, and objective as possible. They intend to seek by all possible means to force the USSR to give concrete anwers to concrete questions, and to respond specifically to specific evidence against them.

The Yugoslav Government desires that the GA pass a resolution along the following lines: "The GA, having heard the discussion on the relationships of the USSR and other Eastern European countries, through the FPRY, expresses its serious concern regarding the existing situation and its possible continuation, and accordingly invites the countries concerned to take concrete measures which would make possible the improvement of their relations by removing the causes of the present situation." These measures should include:

1) The creation of mixed commissions for the examination of frontier incidents;
2) The discontinuance of aggressive, war-inciting propaganda (this is not intended to exclude the continuation of legitimate criticism of different regimes);
3) The observance of the provisions of the Peace Treaty (i.e., limitation of Hungarian and Bulgarian armaments);
4) Full respect for all international obligations. The GA invites the countries concerned to regulate and maintain their international relations in the spirit of international cooperation in accordance with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations.

Regarding the POC, Dr. Bruner reported that the Yugoslav stand had not changed. They are willing to accept the POC provided the satellite countries will do so. They do not desire to accept it unilaterally and promote it in Yugoslavia unless it goes behind the iron curtain. They are prepared to make this statement in the GA and point out that unless it is received on both sides of the frontier it cannot fulfill its purposes. They are more favorably disposed, although they have not reached a final decision, to our alternative suggestion of a special committee to examine the evidence submitted or a subcommittee of the Political Committee to report back to this session. They will let us know their attitude shortly.

As to the time of submission of the item, there was in any event no time to submit it before the October 6 deadline. However, they are inclined to think that it might be better to wait until very shortly before the GA convenes. They fear that if the USSR knows about it in detail too far in advance this will give the USSR an opportunity to put diplomatic pressure of one sort or another on such delegations as the Indians and others who might be reluctant in order to seek to prevent strong GA action. They might for example threaten to leave the UN or pretend to be highly provoked if the matter is taken up and action is taken by the GA.

Dr. Bruner asked for our reactions to the foregoing, which I promised shortly. I did not seek to discuss them in detail with him except to express our keen disappointment that they had not seen fit to accept the POC even tho the satellites did not. (I think it would be useful for the reason that this step is desirable from the Yugoslav point of view to have it pointed out again and in some detail to the Yugoslavs). Dr. Bruner asked whether his information was correct that the US intended to submit a separate case on violation of human rights in the Soviet orbit. I stated that we were considering such a case and had consulted with the UK, French, and Canadians on it; that they were not inclined to take a favorable view. We are still, however, considering the advisability of such a move. In any event, we appreciate the relationship between that possible case and the Yugoslav case, and even if we should decide not to go ahead we would make full use of the material in the course of the discussion on the Yugoslav case. Dr. Bruner asked to be advised if we decide to go ahead with a separate case.

[Here follows discussion of another matter.]

Subject: Yugoslav Item and Possible Use of Peace Observation Commission in the Balkans

Participants: Dr. Ales Bebler,[2] Yugoslav Delegation
Dr. Sava Kosanovic,[3] Yugoslav Delegation
Mr. Benjamin Cohen,[4] US Delegation
Mr. Eric Stein,[5] US Delegation
Mr. Thomas Cory,[6] US Delegation

At lunch today the two Yugoslav officials gave the following information concerning the item their delegation has proposed for the agenda of the General Assembly:

They expect to lead off with a hard speech along the lines of their explanatory memorandum. Simultaneously, or shortly thereafter, they will submit a draft resolution which will be considerably more mild than the speech itself. The general purpose of the draft resolution, as the Yugoslavs see it, will be to create an atmosphere of "general solidarity" in the General Assembly in respect to the Cominform pressures against Yugoslavia. They promised to hand the US Delegation a copy of their draft resolution tomorrow.

[4] Benjamin V. Cohen was a member of the United States Delegation to the General Assembly.

[5] Stein was a Department of State specialist in international security affairs and a member of the advisory staff of the United States Delegation to the General Assembly.

According to the two Yugoslav officials, the draft resolution will express the serious concern of the General Assembly over the situation. It then will invite the Cominform countries to reduce their aggressive propaganda against Yugoslavia. (The Yugoslavs seemed to welcome the US suggestion that the language of this provision could well be based on General Assembly Resolution 110 (II), against war mongering). Another provision of the draft resolution will call for the creation of mixed frontier commissions to examine border incidents along the various Yugoslav satellite frontiers. (The two Yugoslav officials agreed that there is little likelihood of the Cominform countries accepting membership in these commissions, particularly if they are to operate also in satellite territory). Another provision of the draft resolution will, according to the Yugoslavs, call for an improvement in the status of the diplomatic missions maintained by Yugoslavia in the Cominform countries and vice versa.

The Yugoslavs seemed to view General Assembly consideration of their item as a short term operation. They said they had not considered the possibility of the Ad Hoc Committee setting up a fact-finding subcommittee to examine evidence adduced in connection with the Yugoslav item. They, however, agreed to discuss this suggestion in their delegation. The two Yugoslavs manifested a particular interest in having a large number of delegates speak in support of their item. They indicated that so far they had spoken only to the US, UK and France but that they plan also to speak at least with Uruguay, Egypt and India with a view to persuading these last three delegations also to take part in the committee discussions and give them support. They said that although the UK initially was opposed to Yugoslavia raising the item, nevertheless, it now appears that the UK is more interested but that the Yugoslav Delegation still would appreciate the US using its influence to the end of persuading the UK to take a fuller interest.

Within the Committee, the Yugoslavs agreed that it would be preferable if their own speech is followed by a few speeches of other smaller powers, with the UK, France and the US coming in later with major statements. The Yugoslavs would expect each of the five Soviet satellites to speak on the subject after which the Yugoslavs themselves would deliver a second major speech and then hope for a committee vote on their draft resolution.

The two Yugoslavs confirmed that they have a large amount of very good material on the violation of human rights in the satellite countries. They explained that there are now in Yugoslavia some 8,500 refugees from Cominform countries and that these refugees have prepared statements, copies of which now fill a large case in the premises of the Yugoslav Delegation. The Yugoslavs said they also have some material from their own intelligence sources on the degree and form of rearmament of the satellites in violation of their respective Peace Treaties. They agreed on the desirability of making some of this material, particularly on human rights, available to other delegations which normally possess little knowledge or data concerning the Balkans.

Dr. Bebler seemed surprised that the present order of items in the Ad Hoc Committee calls first for discussion of the UNSCOB report, then for the Yugoslav item and thirdly for the item on creation of a UN Commission to examine the possibility of free elections in Germany. They had assumed from a talk with Mr. Cordier several days ago that the order of the first three items would be reversed. Due to their desire for time to prepare their own item, they raised no objection to the UNSCOB item being considered first.

Mr. Cohen outlined current US views regarding future UN machinery for the Balkans. He explained that the United States would hope for the termination of the UNSCOB and its replacement by a small sub-committee of the Peace Observation Commission. He added that we see some advantages in establishing the POC sub-committee under the Yugoslav item rather than under the UNSCOB item. Mr. Cohen explained that perhaps the sub-committee could be established to sit in New York and remain on call for use in either Greece or Yugoslavia at the request of either or both of those governments.

The two Yugoslavs made no substantive comment concerning the use of the POC but undertook to consult within their delegation and to inform the US of any instructions they receive. Their general attitude seemed to indicate a decided preference for the establishment of the POC sub-committee for the Balkans under the Greek item rather than the Yugoslav item. The representatives of the two delegations agreed to meet again as soon as they receive further instructions from their respective governments.

Minutes of Sixteenth Meeting of the United States Delegation to the General Assembly, Paris, November 21, 1951 [1]

US/A/M(Chr)/203

[Here follows list of persons (46) present. Ambassador Warren R. Austin, Permanent Representative of the United States to the United Nations and Chairman of the United States Delegation, was in the chair.]

Ambassador Austin called upon Mr. Stein to present the Yugoslav item to the Delegation. Mr. Stein began by recalling the rise to power of Marshal Tito [2] during and after World War II; the expulsion of Tito from the Cominform in 1948, and the consequent open call for revolution within Yugoslavia by the Cominform states. The White Book published by Yuogslavia documented the campaign which had been waged against Yugoslavia by the Soviet Union and its satellites ever since. The Yugoslavs had now placed on the agenda the charge against the satellites and the Soviet Union of a system of aggressive pressures being directed against Yugoslavia.

The Yugoslav memorandum on the item sets out the various counts being alleged: economic blockade, a compaign of incitement "unequalled in international relations", terroristic activities, deportation of Yugoslav minorities along the satellite borders, withdrawal of Soviet and Satellite Ambassadors from Yugoslavia, isolation of diplomatic practices, abrogation of some 46 commercial and other agreements, and violation of the peace-treaty limits on armaments of the ex-enemy satellite-states. The Defense Department had verified the last count above: Rumanian and Bulgarian forces were three times the limits set out in the peace-treaties, Hungarian forces twice the limit.

Yugoslavia charged that these actions were violations of the Charter, and asked the General Assembly to note them and seek to ameliorate conditions. The Yugoslav Ambassador in Washington had asked for the Department's views on bringing this matter before the United Nations and had received encouragement from the Department. Later in Paris, the Yugoslav Delegation had talked with the United States Delegation about this matter. The Yugoslavs hoped to realize various aims in making this charge. Since they were members of no bloc within the United Nations, and since they were about to lose their Security Council seat, they felt the need of an expression of solidarity from the United Nations for their position vis-a-vis the Soviet Union and its satellites. This expression of solidarity, it was hoped, would come through speeches and votes on the Yugoslav item. They themselves planned to deliver a very tough speech, to be followed by General Assembly adoption of a mild resolution. They proposed this as a one-shot operation, not to be followed up as a recurring matter for General Assembly consideration.

The position proposed by the Department was generally to give support to the Yugoslavs. There were good reasons for the Department's suggested position. First, the Yugoslav army was the best in that part of Europe outside of the Iron Curtain countries. Every effort should be made by the United States, acting in its own security interests, to prevent the reabsorption of this army behind the Iron Curtain. Yugoslavia's strategic location was also important. Secondly, furthering the split among the Communist governments of Yugoslavia and the Soviet Union would give added incentive to a possible extension of "Titoism". Thirdly, the debate on this item should demonstrate that it was not enough for a country to have a Communist system in order to get along with the Soviet Union; absolute subservience was required by the Soviets. Fourthly, support of this item would assist in showing up Soviet "peace" propaganda in general for the spurious thing that it was. We must, however, avoid a position of all-out backing of all Yugoslav charges in every detail since it would be unwise to support charges which might be shown later to be false. We must also avoid any impression of taking sides in a family fight between two Communist factions. The U.S. support for Yugoslavia should be based on the proposition that Yugoslavia, as any other state, was entitled under the Charter of the United Nations, to be free from aggressive pressures.

Mr. Stein then turned to the draft resolution offered by the Yugoslavs, as set out in Delga 190. He pointed out that in the preamble they sought a finding that the situation had been created by the Soviets and satellites. It made reference to Charter provisions. The General Assembly would note the willingness of the Yugoslavs to make all efforts to end the state of tension. It would recommend that the hostile attitude be modified, that relations be normalized, and that mixed border commissions be established to regulate the border regimes and settle border disputes. It also had a somewhat meaningless clause asking that all other means of settling disputes peacefully be used. Messrs. Cooper and Cohen had suggested to the Yugoslavs that it was up to them to present a factually convincing case. The answer to this had been a reference to the White Book which, they said, had been given to other delegations. The Yugoslavs did not want any fact-finding body established and were opposed to using the Peace Observation Commission. In consequence, Messrs. Cooper and Cohen had told the Yugoslavs that the resolution should not speak in terms of findings or conclusions of fact. They also suggested that the recommendations be addressed both to Yugoslavia and the Soviet group. It was suggested that the resolution indicate that the situation constituted danger to international peace and security. Bebler (Yugoslavia) was not impressed with either of these suggestions, but said he would take matters up with his Foreign Minister. It had been made clear to the Yugoslavs that this item was their own, and they would be responsible for full presentation of facts and for the initiative on it. (See Delga 264, Daily Classified Summary # 15, of 21 November, page 1.)[3]

Senator Cooper said there would be some differences between the U.S. and the Yugoslavs on the manner of handling this item. With regard to the hostile acts alleged, and the threats to Yugoslav independence charged, the U.S. would want to show great concern. A suggestion that the General Assembly be asked to condemn the Soviets and satellites for this aspect of their behaviour, however, had received a negative response. The Yugoslavs feared untoward provocation from such a course. Thus, their approach was to have the General Assembly adopt a weak resolution. Other parts of the Yugoslav charges and portions of the resolution referred to the abnormal condition of diplomatic relations, and made proposals that these be regularized. With such matters, Senator Cooper felt, the U.S. should not be so concerned. Asked by Ambassador Austin as to what these terms really meant, Senator Cooper and Mr. Cohen both said that it was better not to talk in such vague terms, and rather to speak of the general standards of international relations.

Ambassador Kirk remarked that Mr. Stein's presentation of the charges made by Yugoslavia had been borne out by the actual events of the last few years. He added that many people thought this was a personal feud between Stalin[4] and Tito which could never be resolved by a return to normal diplomatic relations. "Regularization" in such a case would be very difficult. As for the question of troop concentrations, verification of such allegations would also be difficult. But the charges of treaty violations of a commercial nature were a clear matter of record.

Admiral Badger spoke briefly on the views of the military on this question.

Mr. Cory said that talks would be had with various delegations about the mass deportations involved in the Yugoslav charges, as being perhaps the only chance of a discussion of Human Rights violations by the Soviets during this Assembly Session. He alluded to the fact that the Department had earlier given consideration to the possibility of sending a POC team to Yugoslavia to keep an eye on the situation there. This idea had been dropped when the Yugoslav reaction had been received as a firm negative. He referred to the violent reaction the Soviets had shown to Yugoslav charges in the General Committee and predicted that there would be an equally violent one in the Ad Hoc Committee. Mr. Cory's final point was that the draft resolution contained in Delga 190 was still in a fluid condition and would be the subject of further consultations.

Mrs. Roosevelt commented on a conversation she had had with Mr. Dedijer [5] of the Yugoslav delegation in regard to the Zagreb conference. She warned him that although the United States would support the Yugoslavs in many things, they should not forget that as a whole the people of the United States still thought of Yugoslavia as fundamentally a Communist state. He had answered that the U.S. must not forget that the Yugoslavs are moving toward a greater democracy. Mrs. Roosevelt felt that when, in the draft resolution or in other places, the Yugoslavs referred to regularization of their relations with other states, it came from a feeling of need on their part to establish closer ties both with East and West, neither of which could be foregone. She felt that we ought not to overlook the changes within Yugoslavia that are occurring, and that, perhaps faced with the necessity of living with some Communist states in the world, Yugoslavia was one of them with which we could more easily live.

Mr. Lubin asked whether the Delegation had available any information on the truth of the Yugoslav charges of commercial treaty violations by the Soviets and Satellites. He recalled that in ECOSOC, the Poles had come up with the statement that the Yugoslavs had been the ones to break the treaties. Mr. Cory answered that we lacked any real information thereon.

Ambassador Austin called for a statement on the relationship between this item and the Greek case. Mr. Cohen said in this connection that the POC subcommission on the Balkans to be set up in the Greek case would be available, according to present plans, to go anywhere in the Balkans where requested. This of course would include Yugoslavia. The Yugoslavs did not want them to come in now, but were not against the idea in principle, and might well support the creation of this POC subcommission in the General Assembly.

In commenting on the Yugoslav draft resolution, Mr. Hyde saw an implicit admission therein of all the Yugoslav charges. He further feared that it could be a two-edged sword, one that could be turned against Yugoslavia and the West by the Russians, either by amendment or by a companion resolution which would call upon the Western countries to regularize their diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union, and other countries of similar persuasion. Senator Cooper said Bebler had explained what this referred to. Yugoslavia in the past had participated in "mixed border commissions" with good results and hoped for equal success in this case.

Ambassador Kirk expressed agreement with Mr. Cory's estimate of the violence of Soviet reaction to be expected in the Ad Hoc Committee on this item.

Mr. Nolting wondered whether this draft resolution was supposed to have a deterrent effect upon the Soviets and satellites in their plans for military aggression, or whether it was intended as an aid to domestic consolidation within Yugoslavia. Senator Cooper said that it was hoped the resolution would have a deterrent effect. He also thought it would help the internal situation. He added that the U.S. should decide whether to keep its attitude of support for the Yugoslavs in this matter on the broad basis of opposing aggression and hostile activities, or whether to support the Yugoslavs in smaller detailed parts of their particular case, especially with reference to economic matters.

Ambassador Jessup returned to the point made by Mr. Nolting. He said that the USSR was our chief antagonist in the world today. In our relations vis-à-vis the USSR we often behaved differently in different places, as a result of strategic considerations. Thus we were seeking to make peace in Korea. In another place we would be hitting them very hard. Our general strategy throughout the world should be coordinated, even if for various reasons we followed different tactics. He had no concrete ideas to offer on this particular problem, but was merely suggesting that this need for global coordination of strategy must be taken into account.

Ambassador Austin suggested that, if there were no objection, the Delegation not take final action on the matter under discussion, but rather postpone a decision till a later date. Ambassador Gross asked how the matter would be presented again for Delegation consideration, and specifically, whether it would come up in the form of a new resolution negotiated with other delegations and the Yugoslavs. On reconsidering, Ambassador Austin suggested adding this matter to the next day's agenda for the Delegation meeting.

Mr. Winslow cautioned the Delegation that a French Communist demonstration on the Champs Elysees was scheduled for 6 P. M. that night, in alleged protest against the rearming of Germany. The police, he said, were fully alerted, and would doubtless have matters well in hand.

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, November 21, 1951—7 : 12 p. m.

Gadel 216. Re Yugo draft Res Delga 190 Nov 14, Dept notes with approval moderation its terms, in belief such Res likely attract maximum support. At same time Res has sufficient substance avoid anticlimactic effect when introduced after strong speeches. Focus Res upon "attitude" rather than alleged acts Sov bloc seems advantageous in that it minimizes need for detailed investigation as prerequisite for passage since alleged attitude indisputable, and can be easily proven in addresses Ad Hoc comite by quotation Cominform sources.

While recognizing terms Res primarily up to Yugos, Dept offers fol specific comments:

1. Yugos may wish to move Para beginning "Takes note, etc." to end of Res.

2. We assume omission of reference mistreatment Yugo minorities indicates this not intended to be a substantial part Yugo case. If Yugos shld introduce this element USDel may find appropriate opportunity to use data on human rights violation in speeches.

3. Recommendation in Para 3 re estab mixed border commissions might properly be addressed to Yugo Govt as well as satellites. Dept does not consider border comms inconsistent with, or adequate substitute for, impartial UN observing machinery. In view terms draft Res Delga 222,[2] re POC sub-comite under Greek case, suggest discussing Yugo Del question additional para recommending that Yugo and satellite govts request POC Balkan sub-comite established under previous Res send observers to area. Assuming Yugos continue oppose unilateral admission POC observers, inclusion indicated provision wld still provide them opportunity make declaration willingness admit observers provided satellites also agree. If this suggestion not acceptable Yugos Dept believes some ref this machinery under Yugo case might be introduced by Yugos, or by US or other Dels with Yugo consent. If Yugos object to this procedure appropriate separate Res under Yugo item might be considered.

As an alternative approach to present Yugo draft Res that may be mentioned at discretion USDel in event Yugos encounter or anticipate difficulties in attaining wide support of Res, Dept offers fol possibilities:

1. Dept appreciates Yugo desire make clear situation of which it complains entirely of Sov making, and that Yugo sinned against but not sinning. Nevertheless, in its own interest to increase support Res, Yugo may wish to consider modification on grounds present draft Res, while moderate, compels members to take sides against Soviets in Yugo–Sov dispute more decisively than many may be willing to do. Proposed recommendations may also lose force in eyes other Dels since addressed only Cominform states and not Yugo. Since these call only for steps required by Charter and by friendly internatl relations and practices, Yugo may not oppose having them addressed in effect to it as well. In light ref Yugo charges in preamble, this cld not reasonably be interpreted as criticism Yugos. By stating principles in gen terms, steps recommended wld appear considered judgment GA rather than program demanded by one party; it wld appear more fully accord purposes cited preamble Res, and might gain wider support other Dels. Also, it wld render immaterial any Sov charges Yugo violations, make Sov rejection Res more embarrassing, and add weight affirmation Yugo willingness cooperate.

2. Under above suggestions, after 4 Paras preamble draft Res wld read along fol lines:

"Considers that in the interest of strengthening Universal Peace the Govt of Yugo and the Govts of the USSR, Hung, Bulg, Rum, Albania, Czech and Pol shld:

a. Conduct their mutual relations in accordance with the spirit of the UN Charter.

b. Normalize their dipl intercourse to conform with the rules and practices which are customary in internatl relations.

c. In the case of Yugo, and Bulg, Hung, Rum and Albania regularize their border relationships by agreement, and estab mixed border commissions for the settlement of possible border disputes.

d. Employ all other appropriate means for the peaceful settlement of outstanding questions between them.

Notes with approval that the Govt of the FPR of Yugo has shown itself ready to act in accordance with the principles set forth in the previous para, and has expressed its readiness to take all the necessary steps for putting them into practice, and calls upon the Govts of the USSR, Hung, Bulg, Rum and Albania as well as the Govts of Czech and Pol to do likewise."

If suggestion acceptable, having Yugo introduce Res addressed to itself among others may be somewhat anomalous but is not inappropriate. Also possible have this suggestion come as amendment by some other Del, which Yugo can gracefully accept. Despite Yugos initial reaction reported Delga 264 Nov 20,[3] they may be interested this suggestion later date.

Minutes of Seventeenth Meeting of the United States Delegation to the General Assembly, Paris, November 23, 1951

SECRET

US/A/M(Chr)/204

Ambassador Austin asked that immediate consideration be given to the Yugoslav item so that the Delegation could deal also with other urgent business.

Mr. Stein explained the revised Yugoslav draft resolution contained in an unnumbered document before the Delegation. It represented, he said, a redraft of the draft resolution considered by the Delegation at the last meeting. Its terms had been generally agreed to by Senator Cooper, Sir Gladwyn Jebb and Ordonneau in a meeting with Bebler of Yugoslavia. The resolution incorporated a number of suggestions by the US including our suggestion that the recommendations be directed toward all parties concerned and not just to the Soviets and satellites.

Mr. Stein explained further that pursuant to a suggestion by Ambassador Gross,[1] we had raised with the Yugoslavs the possibility of including in the resolution a paragraph envisaging the use of the POC Balkan Sub-committee in connection with this case, if the tension does not subside. The precise language suggested to Bebler was before the Delegation in a paper entitled "Possible Addition to the Yugoslav Draft Resolution". This would have the Governments concerned, "if the international tension in the area does not subside", request the Sub-committee of the POC to arrange for "observation and reporting on the situation along the frontiers between Yugoslavia on the one hand and Hungary, Bulgaria, Rumania, and Albania on the other." Mr. Stein reported that Bebler had not been enthusiastic about this suggestion, but had agreed to take it up with M. Kardelj and report his decision promptly. Mr. Stein noted that it had been pointed out to Bebler that if the Yugoslavs wished the UN to take cognizance of this case, it would be fitting and proper that UN procedures available for handling such cases be utilized. Bebler had remarked that this seemed very logical, but he doubted at the same time whether it was politically advisable. Senator Cooper added that Bebler had indicated that although they might not wish to incorporate this language in the Yugoslav draft resolution, they might be able to accept it if it were offered as an amendment by some other delegation. Referring to a telegram from the Department (Gadel 216), Mr. Stein noted that the approach the Delegation had been taking was strictly in accordance with the Department's views. Mr. Stein added that Senator Cooper would make a tough speech in Committee, in the course of which he would make clear the US position on this matter. Senator Cooper said he had little to add to Mr. Stein's presentation, except that some members of the Assembly might conceivably have difficulty in taking sides in the controversy between the Yugoslavs and the satellites.

[Here follows further discussion with the Delegation having no objection to the revisions or amendments proposed herein.

The Delegation then proceeded to discuss another agenda item.]

The United States Representative at the United Nations (Austin) to the Secretary of State

SECRET PARIS, November 23, 1951—9 p. m.

Delga 331. Subj: Yugoslav item. Fol is present status Yugo draft resolution:

Draft resolution was circulated confidentially to friendly dels by Yugos yesterday. Is identical with text transmitted in Delga 297, Nov 21, except for elimination of bracketed [numbered?] para 4 and revision of sentence "recommends to the govts concerned that they" to "recommends that the govts concerned". Dept will note that prior to receipt of Gadel 216, Nov 21, GADel already had successfully suggested to Yugos that their draft resolution be addressed in effect to Yugo as well as Cominform states.

Previous to receipt of Gadel 216 Cooper and staff last night strongly urged Bebler that Yugo draft contain additional recommendation as fols:

"Recommends further to the govts concerned that if the international tension in the area does not subside; they request the subcommission of the peace observation commission, provided fol in the resolution (VI) to arrange for observation and reporting on the situation along the frontiers between Yugo on the one hand, and Hungary, Bulgaria, Rumania and Albania on the other".

In explaining this suggestion, Cooper argued that US believes it wld be inconsistent for Yugos, after raising their complaint against Cominform states not to take advantage of existing UN machinery designed to meet situation. Cooper also said that some use of POC doubtless wld seem quite logical to number of dels which just previously had approved establishment Balkan subcommission under Greek item in same comite.

Bebler last night appeared unenthusiastic, but undertook to discuss suggestion with his del. He observed that Yugo may not be willing propose such recommendation in its own resolution and that if it has to come it wld be better submitted in form of amendment from some other del. He inferred that in such case Yugo wld find it hard to vote against it. He also commented that while US suggestion doubtless has merit from logical point of view, still he wonders whether any use of POC in Yugo at this time wld be politically wise.

Bebler told Cory this a. m. that Yugo del earlier today had decided adversely on latest US suggestion and hopes US will not press it either itself or through other dels, either as addition to present untabled draft or as amendment in comites. He said that Yugo feels such recommendation, if incorporated now in draft resolution, wld attract intensive Soviet attack on general grounds that such use of POC wld constitute unnecessary "imperialist" meddling in Balkans. He added that with this in mind his del hopes to avoid any mention of POC in its own speeches but that, of course, if questions are raised regarding Yugo opinion on use of POC Yugo del wld have to express itself. He said also he hopes that if any del intends to recommend use of POC under Yugo item it will consult in advance with Yugo del, in which case Yugo wld attempt to dissuade.

Cory replied that we will of course promptly transmit Bebler's remarks to US GADel and Dept, but that to be perfectly frank he felt it only fair to state that US still believes limited use of POC wld be desirable altho, of course, final decision necessarily rests with Yugo. He added that there obviously can be no assurance Yugo and other interested dels wld be successful, even if they try, in dissuading other states from presenting an amendment which wld be pertinent and helpful to Yugo draft resolution.

First reaction by Barnes [1] (USDel [UKDel]) to suggested addition was adverse but he agreed US wld go along if Yugo accepts it. Ordonneau (Fr) was non-commital.

Speaking of his conversations with other dels re Yugo item, Dr. Bebler last night said that of 20 dels which he has so far consulted 19 dels seem favorably disposed toward item and believe that Yugo draft resolution is sufficiently mild to merit their support. One exception was India which, Bebler said, was non-commital. He added that Pakistan, which abstained on vote to include item in agenda in general comite; showed more positive interest than before.

It is very likely some other del will propose ref to POC in some form during debate which will open Nov 26. In such case we shall support appropriate amendment. If no such proposal made we shall review situation.

Documentation relating to the legislative history of the Yugoslav item is either printed or cited in United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, Sixth Session, Annexes, fascicule for agenda item 68. The text of the resolution submitted by Yugoslavia and adopted by the Ad Hoc Political Committee is substantially the same as that in Delga 297, November 21, except for the elimination of numbered item 4 in the operational paragraph; the first preambulatory paragraph also included the Soviet Union in the list of countries named (UN Doc. A/AC.53/L.10/Rev. 1, November 30). For the debate in the Ad Hoc Political Committee on November 26, 27, 28, 29, 30 and December 1, see United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, Sixth Session, Ad Hoc Political Committee, pages 39 ff.

Senator John Sherman Cooper, the representative of the United States on the Ad Hoc Political Committee, made a statement of some length on November 29. In this statement he made reference to the interest of the United States Government in linking existing United Nations machinery with the situation described in the Yugoslav complaint:

"Meanwhile, since the Committee had approved the setting up of a Balkan sub-commission . . . the United Nations would be able at the request of any State or states concerned to watch developments and call upon a body equipped to observe and report on any situation likely to endanger the peace in that area. It was very much to be hoped that the services of the sub-commission would not be needed and that the Yugoslav draft resolution would achieve its purpose." (ibid., page 53)

At its 355th plenary meeting, December 14, 1951, the General Assembly adopted the resolution recommended by the Ad Hoc Political Committee. For discussion at the meeting, see United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, Sixth Session, Plenary Meetings, pages 273 ff. Sen. Cooper made a brief statement which conveyed the strong feelings of this Government regarding "the aggressive campaign" to which Yugoslavia was being subjected, in the course of which he warned:

"If this campaign continues, there is danger that it could lead to serious trouble in the Balkans, and have repercussions throughout the world. It is clear to all of us that any new recourse to aggression in the world might strain to the breaking point the fabric of world peace." (United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, Sixth Session, Plenary Meetings, page 278)

I. THE EWE QUESTION IN THE TRUSTEESHIP COUNCIL

Editorial Note

The thrust of United States policy at the United Nations regarding dependent area questions was made evident in the positions adopted by this Government at the time of the Washington colonial policy discusions between the United States and (individually) the United Kingdom, France, and Belgium, in July 1950 (see Foreign Relations, 1950, volume II, pages 434 ff.). The documents that follow are illustrative of an attempt by this Government in early 1951 to apply general policy to a specific problem: the question of the division of the Ewe tribes of Togoland in West Africa between British and French administration. The first two documents which date from the year 1950 are included as conveying essential background information.

The Department of State to the British Embassy

MEMORANDUM

The Department of State refers to the memorandum presented by Mr. Meade of the British Embassy dated June 9, 1950 [1] in which the views of the United Kingdom Government relating to the Ewe question in the Trusteeship Council were set forth and with respect to which the official views of this Government were requested.

The memorandum, together with the attached documents, has been studied by the Department of State and this Government is prepared to support the proposal to enlarge the composition and terms of reference of the Standing Consultative Commission for Togoland Affairs. The United States regards the proposal as a step toward the solution of this difficult political question.

[1] Not printed.

This Government is further prepared to support the proposed positions of the Governments of the United Kingdom and France, as outlined in the memorandum, regarding the three modifications which might be suggested in the Trusteeship Council.

It is noted that the memorandum to be presented to the Trusteeship Council does not contain details as to the method of electing the members of the enlarged Consultative Commission. This Government, and probably others in the Trusteeship Council, would be interested in such details, particularly as to the plans for securing the appropriate proportional representation of various elements of the population.

RESTRICTED [WASHINGTON,] January 12, 1951.

SD/T/167

Item 13: The Ewe Problem (Item 17 on the Provisional Agenda)

The Problem:

The problem is to formulate the position of the United States Delegation to the Trusteeship Council regarding the Ewe problem (Item 17 of the provisional agenda). As presently listed on the agenda, this problem will be raised in connection with General Assembly Resolution A/1616 of December 2, 1950 (copy attached as Annex A to this paper). Presumably discussion of this problem will also include consideration of the report requested by Trusteeship Council Resolution 250 (VII) (copy attached as Annex B). A number of petitions are also related to the Ewe problem (list attached as Annex C).

Recommendations:

1. The Delegation should, as in the past, be guided by the principle of support for such proposals as seen most likely to achieve demonstrable progress, with the least possible delay, toward a solution of the problem raised by the Ewe unification petitions.

2. The Delegation should point out the desirability of considering the British and French progress report on the expanded Consultative Commission (Trusteeship Council Resolution 250 (VII) in conjunction with the French report on its investigation of complaints by the Ewes concerning the manner in which elections to the Commission were carried out in French Togoland (General Assembly Resolution A/1616). The Delegation should also take the position that, until action has been taken by the Council on Item 17, consideration of petitions relating to the above matters should be held in abeyance.

3. The Delegation should consult with the Department as necessary with reference to such specific proposals as may emerge consequent to the consideration of the above-mentioned reports. The discussion section of this paper contains an analysis of previous proposals and provides certain tentative lines of guidance.

Discussion:

Since the history of the Trusteeship Council's consideration of petitions concerning the Ewe unification movement and related questions has been summarized in previous position papers (especially those for the 6th and 7th sessions), this discussion will attempt only to summarize major developments at and since the Seventh Session of the Council.

The major development at the Seventh Session was the adoption by the Council of Resolution 250 (VII). (See Annex B.) This resolution took into account 140 petitions, the report of the UN Visiting Mission to West Africa, the oral statements made by certain petitioners, and the plan put forward by the Administering Authorities (T/702) as explained and amended in the statements made in the Council on July 11, 1950. This plan was to expand the standing Consultative Commission for Togoland Affairs "to make it fully representative of all the people of both Territories" and charge it with the task of "ascertaining the real wishes of the whole population of the two Trust Territories". The plan was amended on July 11, 1950 by the Administering Authorities to make clear "that the Commission is not precluded from submitting to the Administering Authorities recommendations for the 'unification of any parts of the two Trust Territories' ". The Administering Authorities also accepted the interpretation of the United States Representative that such recommendations could include unification "either under British, French, or Franco-British administration" (T/SR 308). The Council expressed the hope that the Administering Authorities would proceed along the lines proposed and would "take all appropriate steps to ensure that the Consultative Commission will equitably represent the different sections and groups of the two Trust Territories", and it requested "the Administering Authorities concerned to inform the Council at its next session of the steps which have been taken to give effect to the plan for the expanded Consultative Commission and to submit to the Council a progress report on the deliberations of the Consultative Commission to date". The representative of the All-Ewe Conference, Mr. Sylvanus Olympio, stated (T/SR, 308) that "although he appreciated the great concession which had been made by the Administering Authorities in permitting the Ewe people at least to discuss their unification, he could not accept that as a satisfactory solution. He could, therefore, do no more than simply inform the people he represented that the concession had been made". Subsequently, however, (see T/PET.6/201–7/166/Add.1) the

All-Ewe Conference agreed to cooperate in the formation and work of the expanded Consultative Commission.

The All-Ewe Conference later reversed this decision. The events leading up to this reversal were brought to the attention of the United Nations by a petition (T/PET.7/160–6/194 and Addenda 1–5) from the President of the Comité de l'Unité Togolaise, French Togoland affiliate of the All-Ewe Conference. Discussion of this petition was introduced into the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly (Fifth Session) by the representative of the Philippines. The petition contains two principal complaints. The first of these is that in French Togoland the method of selecting delegates to the standing Consultative Commission did not result in the choice of delegates who were generally representative of the people. Instead, delegates were elected by electoral colleges whose members were selected by the chiefs, who were under the influence of the administration. As a result of the protests of the Comité de l'Unité Togolaise, the French administration modified the electoral procedure so that: "The population of each village shall appoint a certain number of grand electors (members of the electoral colleges) under the auspices of the village chiefs or regents in council, traditionally responsibile for order, and without intervention of the Administration." The Comité de l'Unité Togolaise interpreted this to mean that village meetings could thereupon be held to appoint "grand electors", and it proceeded to organize such meetings. Arrests were made on the charge that the meetings were held in an illegal manner. This resulted in the second complaint of the Comité de l'Unité Togolaise, which was that persons were arrested and imprisoned because "they wished to have indigenous customs observed in the elections".

After these arrests, the Comité de l'Unité Togolaise decided to withdraw from further participation in the procedures for selecting delegates to the enlarged standing Consultative Commission. While, in general, the selection of delegates in British Togoland took place without difficulty, the All-Ewe Conference, in protest against the electoral procedures in French Togoland, declared that the Ewes in both Togolands would not participate in the work of the Consultative Commission until the "French Togoland elections were revoked and free elections held" (T/PET.6/201–7/166). Should this not be done, the Conference announced that the Ewes would not feel bound by the proposed Commision's decisions.

Considerable discussion of the complaints contained in the petition from the Comité de l'Unité Togolaise took place in the Fourth Committee of the United Nations General Assembly. The representative of France denied that the chiefs had imposed their choice of electors upon the people of their villages. He pointed out that among African indigenous people, opinions were usually made known and decisions taken through free general discussion at gatherings in the village square. He asserted that the petitioners' allegations that instructions had been issued to the local administrative officials to exert pressure upon the electoral colleges was "an absolutely false and unfounded accusation". With regard to the arrests which had taken place, he pointed out that they had been made on charges of (1) calling a meeting without the advance notification required by law and (2) uttering threats of armed violence.

The discussions in the Fourth Committee led to the adoption by the General Assembly of its resolution of December 2, 1950 (A/1616). (See Annex A.) This resolution noted not only the complaints made in the petition from the President of the Comité de l'Unité Togolaise but also the comments to the contrary contained in other related petitions. It noted, furthermore, the declarations made on these matters by the representative of France in Committee Four. Its principal operative paragraph recommends that the Administering Authority of Togoland under French Administration investigate promptly the practices complained of with a view to ascertaining whether the methods of election which have been applied ensure that the views of all sections of the population are faithfully reflected, and to report thereon to the next session of the Council. The discussion preceding the adoption of this resolution indicates that most of the members of Committee Four did not consider that there was sufficient evidence on which to come to a decision as to the validity of the complaints contained in the petition of the President of the Comité de l'Unité Togolaise.

It should be noted, however, that the consideration of petitions relating to the Ewe question by the Fourth Committee not only established a precedent but also was evidence of the growing impatience of a number of non-administering countries with the slow progress made by the Administering Authorities concerned and by the Trusteeship Council toward a solution of the problem. This demonstration of concern by members of the Fourth Committee introduces a new element of urgency and gives greater weight to the desirability of making demonstrable progress before the next session of the Assembly.

Whatever may be the results of the investigation recommended by the General Assembly, it is apparent that the enlarged standing Consultative Commission is not presently fully representative of the different sections and groups of the two trust territories, being boycotted by the representatives of the Ewes, the largest single group concerned. It would seem, therefore, that while it may be important for the Council to determine whether or not there is any truth in the allegation that the methods of election prevented the views of the population from being fully represented, it would seem more important for the Council to devise a procedure for ascertaining the real wishes of the population which would be acceptable both to the Administering Authority and to a majority of the peoples concerned. Several proposals have been made at previous sessions. These include (1) a plebiscite under United Nations supervision, (2) a special mission to visit the two trust territories and to make new recommendations, and (3) new elections to the standing Consultative Commission under United Nations supervision.

A Plebiscite Under UN Supervision

The idea of a plebiscite under UN supervision was suggested by the representative of the All-Ewe Conference. Although feeling that the views of the Ewes had aleady been adequately explored, Mr. Olympio stated that the Conference was prepared to put the issue to such a plebiscite (T/SR.303). However, he evidently conceived of the plebiscite as taking place only in the Ewe areas, including those in the Gold Coast, for he stated that "the All-Ewe Conference was most anxious that the unification of the Ewe people and the unification of the two Territories of Togoland should be treated as two separate questions." The Council not only failed to adopt the idea of a plebiscite [supported by the Philippines; opposed by the two Administering Authorities], but Resolution 250 (VII) clearly indicates that the Council accepts the view of the Administering Authorities that the interests of the inhabitants of all parts of the two Trust Territories and must be ascertained. The Council has, of course, never attempted to extend its competence outside the Trust Territories. The Council's failure to adopt the idea of a plebiscite was probably in part the result of its realization of the difficulties involved in carrying out a plebiscite on such a complex matter. At any rate, it seems unlikely that this solution will ever prove acceptable to the Administering Authorities.

A Special Visiting Mission

The suggestion of sending a special mission to Togoland and the idea of holding elections under the supervision of the UN were made by the representative of the Philippines. As these suggestions may arise again at the eighth session, it will be well to give some consideration to their merits. The idea of sending a special mission to the Togolands involves certain difficulties. The original Philippine proposal (4th Committee, 161st meeting) envisaged a mission "to investigate on the spot the various grievances which had been voiced" in connection with the elections in French Togoland. This proposal could only be reintroduced and adopted by the Council if a majority of its Members were dissatisfied with the investigation carried out by the French Administration. Such a situation seems unlikely. More likely would be a proposal for a mission to visit both Togolands in order to study the entire problem on the spot and to recommend new procedures for a solution. It might even be suggested that this task be assigned to the next Visiting Mission to East Africa, as a special additional function to be carried out en route to or from East Africa. It might well be objected, however, that any mission would find it as difficult to make specific recommendations as did the previous Visiting Mission to West Africa. Furthermore, the Ewes might consider such a mission merely a device for postponing action; nor are the Administering Authorities likely to look with favor on the idea.

New Elections to the Standing Consultative Commission

The suggestion of holding new elections for delegates to the enlarged standing Consultative Commission under the supervision of the United Nations would seem to be of doubtful value unless electoral procedures acceptable to all of the principal parties concerned can be agreed upon. Possibly some kind of United Nations assistance might be helpful in enabling the parties to formulate and agree upon such procedures. The Council might recommend consultation by the Administering Authorities with leaders of all important indigenous groups with the aim of working out agreed election procedures, offering its assistance should such consultations fail. Of course, there is the possibility of discarding the Consultative Commission as a means of ascertaining the wishes of the people; however, in as much as it is not the Commission itself, but only the procedures for selecting its members that has brought about the present impasse, it would seem desirable to pursue the attempt to arrive at acceptable procedures. In any event, it is apparent that the cooperation of all the principal groups concerned is essential to any successful solution.

The Permanent Delegation of the United Kingdom at the United Nations to the United States Mission at the United Nations

CONFIDENTIAL NEW YORK, February 6, 1951.

AIDE-MÉMOIRE—EWE PROBLEM

(Position as on the 5th February, 1951)

1. In implementation of the proposals put forward by the two Administering Authorities and endorsed by a resolution of the Trusteeship Council on the 14th July, 1950, the enlarged Standing Consultative Commission was duly set up in Togoland in order to ascertain the real wishes of the whole population of the two Trust Territories with regard to their political future.

2. Elections to seats on the Commission were held in British Togoland in September and in French Togoland in October.

3. In British Togoland all 17 representatives were elected by the local authorities in accordance with the normal practice.

4. In French Togoland the elections were held in two stages. It became clear, at the "primary stage" that the representatives of the Comite de l'Unite Togolaise, led by Sylvanus Olympio (who favoured the unification of the Ewe-inhabitated area of the two Togolands) would only secure election to 6 seats out of a total of 30.

5. The C.U.T. therefore decided to boycott the second stage of the elections and addressed petitions to the United Nations General Assembly regarding the electoral methods and the manner in which these elections had been conducted.

6. Representation of six constituencies where there was a clear C.U.T. majority was held open by the French Government until the last moment, but the C.U.T. nevertheless persisted in their boycott and, in accordance with the electoral law, these seats were therefore filled by those candidates who secured the next highest number of votes.

7. The C.U.T. petitions referred to above reached the General Assembly at the moment when the Trusteeship Council's report on the Ewe question was being considered by the 4th Committee.

8. The 4th Committee therefore adopted a resolution (later adopted by the General Assembly on the 2nd December) calling upon the French authorities to investigate the complaints made and to report to the 8th Session of the Trusteeship Council.

9. This resolution, as adopted by the General Assembly, tacitly endorsed the Anglo-French proposals for the establishment of the Standing Consultative Commission, but it had no effect in inducing the C.U.T. to change their attitude.

10. When the Consultative Commission met on the 7th November, the C.U.T. was unrepresented, and out of sympathy with their French colleagues five representatives of southern British Togoland decided not to attend.

11. The final figures therefore of those attending were 29 out of 30 representatives for French Togoland and 12 out of 17 representatives for British Togoland.

12. Statements made at this first session of the Consultative Commission indicate clearly a majority, not only of those present but also of the Commission as a whole, in favour of maintaining the existing system of administration in the two Trust Territories.

13. Nevertheless, both the British and French authorities consider that before the two Administering Authorities can communicate to the Trusteeship Council the conclusion that the status quo should be maintained, the representatives of the Ewe unification parties in both Trust Territories should be given a further opportunity of attending the Commission and of expressing their views.

14. It is also considered that a second session of the Commission should in any case be held in order to enable members further to consider the various solutions put forward and thus to complete the implementation of its terms of reference.

15. For both these reasons it is proposed to arrange for a second session of the Commission in the near future and to provide the unification parties with another opportunity of sending representatives to this second session of the Commission. The precise way in which this can be done is still under discussion in the two Trust Territories. The final formula will be worked out in time for a full statement to be made by the two Administering Authorities at the present session of the Council and it is hoped that this will be ready by the 26th February.

16. The French Government has undertaken to make a statement on the electoral methods to which reference was made in the petitions which came before the 4th Committee, and the British authorities are confident that the French delegation will be able to show from the results of the investigation undertaken by the French Government that, as already stated by the French representative at the 4th Committee, the electoral methods employed in French Togoland were fair and that the election results accurately reflect opinion in the two Trust Territories.

17. Against this background it is the hope of the two Administering Authorities that the Trusteeship Council will be able to endorse the proposals for the future operation of the Consultative Commission outlined above and that it will urge the unification parties to join in the work of the Commission so that it may fulfill the terms of reference which have already been endorsed by the Trusteeship Council.

18. The two Administering Authorities regard it as of the utmost importance that a satisfactory solution to the Ewe problem be found and in order to enlist as much support as possible for this action, it is hoped that the other Administering Authorities on the Council will be able to support this line of approach. If the other Administering Authorities find it possible to support this line, it is proposed to convey to them in due course the full text of the Anglo-French statement referred to above before it is delivered to the full Council.

19. For tactical reasons it is not the intention of the two Administering Authorities to make any approach to the non-Administering Authorities since they are of the opinion that any such approach would result in a leakage to the unification parties in West Africa and thereby lead to a series of artificially stimulated demonstrations and petitions which might jeopardise the success of the plan for securing the participation of the dissident parties in West Africa.

20. An approach has been made in the capitals of all the Administering Authorities seeking their support for this line and it is to be hoped that their Delegations to the Trusteeship Council will be able to lend their support to this as being the only practical procedure in all the circumstances.

Participants:

Sir Alan Burns Mr. W. A. C. Mathieson	United Kingdom Delegation
Ambassador Roger Garreau Mr. Henri Laurentie Mr. Francis Hure	French Delegation
Mr. Pierre Ryckmans Mr. Jacques Houard	Belgian Delegation
Mr. D. O. Hay Mr. Roy Peachey	Australian Delegation
Mr. G. R. Laking Mr. Charles C. Craw	New Zealand Delegation
Ambassador Francis B. Sayre Mr. Vernon McKay	United States Delegation

Upon the invitation of Sir Alan Burns, representatives of the six administering Members of the Trusteeship Council met at the offices of the UK Delegation in the Empire State Building from 11:00 a. m. to 12:45 p. m. on Friday, February 16. The main purpose of the meeting, as stated by Sir Alan Burns, was to enable the British and French Delegations to explain their proposals for dealing with the Ewe problem. Sir Alan said the British and French Delegations hoped that the other Administering Authorities, and the Trusteeship Council, would be able to approve these proposals.

Sir Alan stated that either he or Ambassador Garreau would present to the Council a joint Anglo-French statement summarizing the facts regarding the elections to the enlarged Anglo-French Standing Consultative Commission. At the moment, he said, he and Ambassador Garreau each thought the other should introduce the joint statement. The Joint statement would be printed and circulated as a Council document.

With regard to the elections in British Togoland, Sir Alan said that there had been no difficulties. The people had been satisfied. Only one petition protesting these elections had been received, and it had no validity.

Ambassador Garreau then commented on the elections in French Togoland. He said that an investigation had been held and that a special representative was coming to the Trusteeship Council to present a report on this investigation. The investigation had revealed that the elections were perfectly fair, and that absolutely no pressure had been exerted by the government to influence the elections. The elections had shown that the Ewe unity party (Comite de l'Unite Togolaise) was only a small minority in the whole of the two Togos although it was a majority in the Ewe area. After the first stage of the elections, the Ewe unity party had seen that it would win only six seats, and had decided to boycott the second stage of the elections. The French had postponed the second stage of the voting. The French then held the elections anyway and the pro-French party, the Parti du Progres, had elected candidates to all six of the seats which otherwise would have gone to the unity party.

In this situation, Ambassador Garreau said, the French had to decide between two alternatives in formulating a position to be presented to the 8th session of the Trusteeship Council. On the one hand, they could unseat the six Parti du Progres candidates from the seats they won as a result of the unity party's boycott. But they had decided this would be extremely difficult, in fact, illegal, as the Parti du Progres had won these seats in a fair election. Consequently, the French had decided upon a second alternative—to leave those six seats to the Parti du Progress, and to enlarge the Commission further in order to give seats to the unity party. Because of this enlargement of the Commission, the French had agreed to increase the extra seats for the unity party proportionately, from 6 to 8. As the unity party was given one seat in any case without an election, its total representation would be 9 seats out of 60 (38 for French Togoland and 22 for British Togoland). Sir Alan explained that this would also mean 5 extra seats for British Togoland, which would be divided up, one for each of five districts. Ambassador Garreau concluded by expressing the hope that the Trusteeship Council would adopt a resolution asking the Ewes to participate on this basis in the enlarged Commission.

Mr. Ryckmans (Belgium) expressed the belief that the first question in which the non-administering members of the Trusteeship Council would be interested was whether the elections were fair. Mr. Ryckmans (Belgium) asked Ambassador Garreau if the report which the Special Representative would bring to the Council was really convincing on this point. If not, the non-administering members would want new elections. Ambassador Garreau answered that the report would be absolutely convincing.

Mr. Laking (New Zealand) thought the non-administering members might take the following position: they might say they had accepted the British-French proposal for an enlarged commission in the beginning because the British and French had said it would contribute to a solution of the problem. But now it appeared that even if the Ewes were persuaded to participate, they would be completely outvoted. The non-administering members might therefore ask, "What does this do for the Ewes?" Ambassador Garreau's only comment on this question was that the Ewes are a minority in the two Togos.

Mr. Ryckmans said, in partial response to Mr. Laking's question, that the Ewes might have a chance to convince the others of the merits of their case. If the results of the Consultative Commission indicate that the majority does not want unification, then the Trusteeship Council could take up the question of whether the Ewes could secede from the two Togolands.

Mr. Sayre remarked that the immediate objective was to get the Ewes to participate. The question before the group, he said, was a practical one. It was not a question of apportioning blame or challenging the validity of the elections. Everyone might agree that the Ewes were at fault in boycotting the elections. But what of it? A practical solution which would induce them to participate must now be searched for, in order to enable the Trusteeship Council to complete the consultation process it had agreed upon. Mr. Sayre quoted the conclusion of the visiting mission: "In closing these observations the Mission feels that it is its duty to point out that the problem has attained the force and dimensions of a nationalistic movement and that a solution should be sought with urgency in the interest of peace and stability in that part of the world." He pointed out that the Mission was made up of practical and responsible persons, including Mr. Gerig of the United States.

The question in his own mind, Mr. Sayre said, was whether the Ewes would accept the Anglo-French proposal. Whether it was a fair proposal or an unfair proposal, would the Ewes accept it? Mr. Sayre then asked Sir Alan and Ambassador Garreau if they thought the Ewes would accept it. Ambassador Garreau said he didn't know. He then asserted that the Trusteeship Council had decided to appoint a Consultative Commission. The first duty of the petitioners, he declared, was to comply with the Trusteeship Council decision. But they had not done so. He declared that France could not be "bullied" by a small fraction of the population; this would be undemocratic and contrary to the Charter of the United Nations (at this point, Mr. Ryckmans intervened to comment that a statement such as the one just made by Ambassador Garreau should not be made publicly before the Trusteeship Council).

Sir Alan also said he didn't know whether the Ewes would accept the new Anglo-French proposal. Following Ryckmans' suggestion, he said that if they did participate, they would have an opportunity to convert others to their point of view.

Mr. Sayre then stated that the Department of State was at present studying the problem, and had instructed him to seek certain information from the United Kingdom and France which would help the Department in formulating a position. He then read from the Department's telegraphed instructions the following question: "Would it be feasible to hold new elections to the Consultative Commission organized on a simplified basis in both Togolands?"

Ambassador Garreau said he had no instructions from his government on this point, but he was positive that new elections would be unacceptable to France, as they would imply a condemnation of France. Moreover, new elections would lose time and the Ewe unity party might not get as many seats as they were now assured of under the new Anglo-French proposal. The Communist party, he asserted, had entered the picture and was now exploiting the situation, which was bad for France because France was responsible for maintaining peace. Ambassador Garreau concluded with the categorical statement that France would not accept new elections.

Mr. Sayre again stated that there was no question of doubting the validity of the first elections. The question was a practical one of finding a proposal which the Ewes and the United Nations would accept, thereby enabling the Council to complete the consultative process it had begun.

Mr. Ryckmans, in partial response to Mr. Sayre's question, thought that the Ewes probably would not accept the proposal—but he thought the Council should tell them anyway that they should participate. After they had participated, if their views did not prevail, they could appeal to the Council again, and the Council could take up the question of whether the Ewes had a "right of succession". Mr. Ryckmans doubted the advisability of new elections. The Africans, he said, were not ripe for elections. If the Trusteeship Council asked for another vote, the people might vote differently, against their own convictions.

Sir Alan stated that the British had never considered the possibility of new elections in British Togoland.

Ambassador Garreau intervened to say that if the question of elections were raised in the Trusteeship Council, a proposal might be made for an international supervisory committee for the elections. This would be quite intolerable as it would enable the Secretariat to intervene. Ambassador Garreau then repeated at some length a denunciation he had made on several previous occasions of Daniel Chapman, a Gold Coast Ewe on the UN Secretariat. Chapman is now in the Gold Coast on leave from his UN job. Garreau said Chapman may not be making public speeches now, but is certainly intriguing privately on behalf of the Ewes. Ambassador Garreau also said that he has a photostatic copy of a long letter from Chapman to Sylvanus Olympio giving Olympio advice on the Ewe question.

Mr. McKay [1] remarked that he thought Mr. Ryckmans was right in saying that the Trusteeship Council ought to try to carry through the consultative process it had begun. Mr. McKay hoped a way could be found to induce the Ewes to participate. Since the administering authorities considered that new elections were not feasible, he wondered if the discussion could revert for a moment to the two alternatives Ambassador Garreau had mentioned in his opening remarks. Ambassador Garreau had said that the second alternative had been decided upon, namely, the present Anglo-French proposal. Mr. McKay wondered if the first alternative, namely, placing six Comité de l'Unité Togolaise candidates in the seats won by default by the Parti du Progres, would be more likely to induce the Comité de l'Unité Togolaise to participate in the work of the Commission. He wondered if there was any possibility of reconsidering the decision, and reverting to this first alternative. Mr. Laurentie responded in the negative.

Sir Alan then asked whether he should approach Mr. Khalidy [2] to see if Mr. Khalidy would be willing to sponsor the resolution proposed by the British and French (the text of this resolution is attached). Mr. Sayre thought it would be better to wait until the administering authorities had further time to study the Anglo-French proposal.

Mr. Sayre wondered what would happen if the Ewes refused to participate in the Commission on the basis of the present proposals. Ambassador Garreau did not answer this question precisely, but gave a general reply to the effect that the Ewe unity faction was an insignificant group. At this point Mr. Ryckmans intervened to remind Ambassador Garreau that one couldn't get away from the fact that the Visiting Mission had concluded that the Ewe unity movement was very strong, and that the Trusteeship Council had endorsed this conclusion. He hoped that Ambassador Garreau would not state publicly in the Council that the Ewe unity group was insignificant. The question now was to find means of reconciling Ewe aspirations with the wishes of the rest of the Togolanders.

Mr. Mathieson (UK) expressed the opinion that the Council should tell the Ewes to take part in the Commission, and the Council should not allow itself to be blackmailed by the Ewes.

Mr. Laking replied that he thought, on the contrary, that the Trusteeship Council would serve no useful purpose in passing this resolution if it would not be accepted.

Mr. Huré (France), in response to Mr. Laking's earlier question, said that nobody knew whether the Ewes would abide by the terms of the resolution being proposed by the British and French.

Mr. Laking wondered whether the Council would want to pass such a resolution if nobody knows what results it might produce.

Mr. Mathieson (presiding following Sir Alan's departure for another engagement at 12:30), suggested adjournment in order to give those present further time for study of the Anglo-French proposals. It was tentatively agreed that a second meeting on the subject would be held at 11 a. m. on Wednesday, February 21.

Mr. Sayre again remarked that he wanted to make it clear the US had not yet taken a position, but had asked its questions today for the purpose of obtaining information.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Officer in Charge of Trusteeship Affairs (Cargo)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] February 19, 1951.

Subject: The Ewe Problem

Participants: Ambassador Roger Garreau, French Representative on the Trusteeship Council
M. Paulin Baptiste, French Legal Expert who investigated Consultative Commission elections in French Togoland
M. Gabriel Rosaz, Attaché, French Embassy
Mr. Benjamin Gerig, UND [1]
Mr. Jefferson Jones, UND [2]
Mr. William Cargo, UND

Ambassador Garreau, at his request, called on Mr. Gerig to discuss the Ewe problem which is to be considered in the current session of the Trusteeship Council. He brought with him M. Baptiste, who had just returned from French Togoland where he had been sent by the French Government to investigate the elections to the Consultative Commission held pursuant to the resolution adopted by the General Assembly last Fall. Ambassador Garreau handed to Mr. Gerig a copy of the report prepared by M. Baptiste and said that the report was being sent to the Secretariat for distribution to the members of the Trusteeship Council as the report of the French Government on the conduct of the elections. He summarized the report by saying that no election irregularities on the part of officials had been found, although the pro-unification C.U.T. (Comité de l'Unité Togolaise) had exerted great pressure on the population during the election campaigns.

Ambassador Garreau then indicated that the purpose of his call was to explain the proposals which France and the United Kingdom intended to present jointly to the Trusteeship Council on the Ewe question and to express the hope that the United States would be able to support these proposals. (Ambassador Garreau outlined the Anglo-French proposals as presented to the Department in Aide-Mémoires recently received from the French and British Embassies. The plan calls for the further enlargement of the Standing Consultative Commission by 13 members, 8 to be selected for French Togoland by the C.U.T. and 5 to be selected for British Togoland by the existing parties in proportion to their present strength in the Consultative Commission.) In explaining the basis of the Anglo-French proposals, Ambassador Garreau stated that the two governments had rejected certain other alternatives. He said that completely new elections had been rejected, because that would imply that the administering authorities had conducted the elections improperly. Such a solution was therefore regarded by Ambassador Garreau as inadmissible. The two administering authorities had also rejected the possibility of annulling the elections in French Togoland for the six seats which clearly would have gone to the C.U.T. had they participated in the second stage of the elections. He pointed out that the supporters of the anti-unification Progress Party (the Pedro Olympio group), who were now occupying those seats, had complied fully with the electoral regulations; and the French Government felt it difficult to unseat them merely because the C.U.T. did not participate in the second stage of the elections. Accordingly, the French Government had concluded that the most feasible way to make a further effort to secure the cooperation of pro-unification Ewes was to allow the six Progress Party supporters to retain their seats and, as the Anglo-French proposal provides, to increase the membership of the Consultative Commission by adding C.U.T. representatives. He hoped that the Trusteeship Council would urge the C.U.T. to participate on this basis in the work of the Consultative Commission and that the United States would lend its support to this plan.

Mr. Gerig pointed out that we were faced with the practical problem of whether or not the Ewes who favored Ewe unification would participate on the basis of the Anglo-French proposals. If they would not participate, he wondered how it would be possible for the Consultative Commission to ascertain the "real wishes and interests" of all the inhabitants of the two Togolands as its terms of reference required. Mr. Gerig said that the new Anglo-French proposal would commend itself to us if it showed promise of Ewe participation. He then referred to the increasing difficulties which would likely arise for France if the Ewe question continued to be an issue in the Trusteeship Council and the General Assembly. We felt that every effort should be made to avoid the Ewe problem developing into an insoluble problem for the United Nations. He felt that this would place France as well as the other administering members in a most difficult position. The United States wished to do everything possible to help find a practical solution of the long-standing Ewe problem.

Mr. Gerig inquired what were the long-range objectives of France with regard to the Ewes and what were their ideas as to how the question could be ultimately resolved. This question elicited no specific reply. However, Ambassador Garreau observed that questions of boundaries were not matters for consideration by the United Nations. He felt that the adoption by the Trusteeship Council of its resolution on the Ewe question in 1947 had been a mistake and implied that France might well have resorted to the domestic jurisdiction clause of the Charter [3] at that time. Ambassador Garreau said that there were many similar boundary questions in Africa and indeed in independent states throughout the world. For example, there was the problem of the Kurds, a people who were divided among several states, who had a long historical record of existence as a people, and who generally desired separate recognition. He felt that there were many cases, such as this, where the questions required answers to be given by non-administering states.

Mr. Gerig observed that possibly other cases likewise merited attention, but that such a fact, if true, in no way argued against the strength or the desire for separate recognition held by the Ewes and of the particular necessity for taking steps to meet this desire if a very troublesome situation in West Africa were to be averted. He wondered whether thought had been given to the possibility of some kind of a Mixed Commission for the Ewe area, which would deal with common problems of local government and administration. Ambassador Garreau replied generally to this inquiry by referring to what he regarded as the dangers of the growth of Ewe nationalism. He said that to recognize the Ewe claims would be to replace the present North–South frontiers between the two Togolands by still stronger East–West frontiers. He said that this would cut off the peoples of the north from access to the sea and cause economic hardships for them. Ambassador Garreau referred also to the elections which had recently been held in the Gold Coast which, he said, had resulted in a majority of "fellow travelers" in the Gold Coast Legislature who "received their orders from the Cominform". (The United Kingdom does not, however, assess the Gold Coast elections in this way.) He thought that the communist threat in this area should not be under-estimated and was a factor which the United States should take into account in evaluating the Anglo-French proposals.

Mr. Gerig recalled that the United States had supported the Anglo-French proposals last summer to enlarge the Standing Consultative Commission only with some reluctance. He pointed out that we had been disappointed that the two administering authorities had found themselves unable to propose a substantive solution for the Ewe problem. It was therefore of considerable concern to us to see whether in fact the Consultative Commission could be made to work out as projected.

Mr. Gerig referred again to the high desirability of the administering authorities putting forth proposals that were so reasonable in character that the Trusteeship Council and the General Assembly would feel that the pro-unification groups should accept them and participate in the work of the Consultative Commission. He felt that the present Anglo-French proposal left something to be desired when evaluated on this basis. He believed that France could well afford to be magnanimous in this situation and offer not one suggestion but perhaps two alternatives for the Ewes to choose from. If the Ewes then rejected both alternatives, their position would evoke much less sympathy. He felt that the French and British might well present the proposal which they had drawn up and, in addition, the alternative of new elections in the southern part of French Togoland where the Comite de l'Unite Togolaise had not participated. The groups which had failed to participate in the work of the Consultative Commission might be asked to choose which alternative they preferred.

In the ensuing discussion, Ambassador Garreau indicated his willingness to consider the possibility of new elections in the southern part of French Togoland, although he and M. Baptiste thought that new elections, if held, should be confined to the six seats which were the subject of the present Anglo-French proposals. Mr. Gerig indicated that the question of precisely what districts should be covered by new elections should be examined carefully. He said that this would be done, on our part, at once, and that it might be possible to discuss the question further with the Assistant Secretary for United Nations Affairs and other interested officers of the Department. (This was agreeable to the French representatives and arrangements were made for a second meeting to be held in Mr. Sandifer's[4] office at 4:00 p. m.)

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. Curtis C. Strong, Assistant on Dependent Area Affairs

Subject: The Ewe Problem

Participants: Ambassador Garreau, French Representative on the Trusteeship Council
M. Paulin Baptiste, French legal expert who investigated Consultative Commission elections in French Togoland
M. Gabriel Rosaz, Attaché, French Embassy
Mr. Sandifer—UNA
Mr. Gerig—UND
Mr. Strong—UND
Mr. Godley—WE [1]
Mr. Lavalle—AF

Ambassador Garreau summarized the Anglo-French proposal for obtaining the participation of the pro-Ewe-unification parties in the Enlarged Standing Consultative Commission. He stressed the fact that, although an investigation had shown the entire correctness of the elections in French Togoland, the French and British considered it desirable to make another attempt to obtain the participation in the Commission of the abstaining parties. They wished the Commission to carry out the functions for which it was designed and hoped that it might contribute to a solution of this complex problem.

Mr. Sandifer said that the chief concern of the United States was that any proposal made should enlist the cooperation of the Ewes and secure majority support in the United Nations. He said that we had studied the Anglo-French proposals, as well as the proposed joint resolution whereby the Trusteeship Council would endorse these proposals, and that we had an additional alternative to suggest. It was embodied in a modified version of the draft Anglo-French resolution, which he would ask Mr. Gerig to explain.

Mr. Gerig handed to Ambassador Garreau and the others present a draft containing the suggested modifications in language (copy attached). The principal new element would be to offer the Ewe-unification group a choice of an additional alternative consisting of the holding of new elections in the five districts of the southern part of French Togoland (namely Lome-town, Lome-subdivision, Tsevie, Palime (Klouto), Anecho, and Atakpame).

Ambassador Garreau said he had indicated to Mr. Gerig in their earlier conversation that the French Government might be willing to propose the holding of new elections in those areas where the anti-unification party had been elected by a minority of electors due to the abstention of the pro-unification party (namely Lome-town, Lome-subdivision, Tsevie, and Palime (Klouto)), but he saw no reason for new elections in Anecho and Atakpame, where he understood that the anti-unification party had clearly won the election.

Mr. Gerig thought that new elections might be proposed in all areas where the Ewes were the predominant, or a substantial, element of the population even though in the two districts the result might be the same. This would obviate most of the C.U.T. complaints.

There was some discussion of possible modifications in the language of the United States alternative relative to the holding of new elections. Mr. Strong asked if it were not true that the pro-unification party had abstained from participation in the elections in Anecho and Atakpame, as well as in the other four districts and M. Baptiste indicated that this was true, although in these two districts a majority of the electors had participated and had voted for the Parti du Progres. To hold new elections in these two districts would throw into question the validity of elections properly won by majority votes.

Ambassador Garreau agreed and did not think the French Government could agree to new elections in these two districts. He noted the serious difficulties that such a decision would make for local administrators, and indicated that he felt sure the local administration would strongly oppose this part of the proposal.

Mr. Sandifer said we did not question the validity of the elections and that we appreciated the difficulties that new elections might cause. To offer new elections in all six of the southern districts would indeed be a concession on the part of the French Government, but we were inclined to feel that it would be an act of statesmanship. We thought that to make a proposal that would not obtain the participation of the pro-unification group would not be fruitful, and that every effort should be made to frame a proposal that would obtain such participation, as well as the support of a majority of the Members of the United Nations. Taking these considerations into account, we felt that new elections in the six districts would offer a reasonable choice.

Ambassador Garreau asked as a matter of tactics whether we had in mind joining the British and French in sponsoring the resolution as modified, or whether we were considering introducing the modified language as an amendment. If the latter, were we considering obtaining co-sponsorship of the amendment from one or two non-administering Members of the Council. Mr. Gerig said that we were considering an amendment and would probably seek co-sponsorship of it along the lines Ambassador Garreau mentioned.

Mr. Sandifer said we would wish to know, before submitting such an amendment, whether it was acceptable to the French and British.

547-842—79——36

Ambassador Garreau said he would have to refer our proposal to his government and to the British Government. He was extremely doubtful as to the acceptability to his government of new elections in Anecho and Atakpame; however, he would transmit the United States alternative to his government in the language of our modified draft. He wished to know whether, if our amendment were adopted, we would support the amended resolution as a whole. Mr. Sandifer replied that if our amendment was accepted we would be able to support the proposal as a whole.

Ambassador Garreau, in closing, indicated that it would be necessary to postpone consideration of the Ewe question by the Trusteeship Council, presently scheduled to begin Monday, February 26, as it might take at least a week to receive a reply from Paris.

Note: Mr. Godley and Mr. Lavalle, after the departure of the French representatives, indicated general agreement with the approach contained in the United States proposal as explained by Messrs. Sandifer and Gerig.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. Curtis C. Strong, Assistant on Dependent Area Affairs

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] February 20, 1951.

Subject: The Ewe Problem

Participants: Mr. J. K. Thompson, Colonial Attaché, British Embassy
Mr. D. C. Tebbit, Second Secretary, British Embassy
Mr. O. B. Gerig, UND, Department of State
Mr. W. I. Cargo, UND, Department of State
Mr. C. C. Strong, UND, Department of State

Mr. Thompson and Mr. Tebbit called at the Department this morning. They were received by the above-named officers and presented them with a memorandum of today's date on the Ewe question (copy attached).[1] Mr. Thompson made clear that the contents were strictly in confidence between our two governments.

Mr. Gerig took the opportunity to hand Mr. Thompson a United States suggestion for an amendment to the proposed Anglo-French resolution on the Ewe question and to inform the British representatives that, as we had informed Ambassador Garreau yesterday, we were considering the possibility of introducing the modified language as an amendment and would like the reactions of the British and

French to this proposal.[2] (The principal point in the modified language was to provide for offering to the Ewe-unification group the choice of an additional alternative to the present Anglo-French proposal for securing Ewe participation to the Consultative Commission; namely, the holding of new elections in the five districts of the southern part of French Togoland.)

Mr. Thompson was aware of our proposal, having seen Ambassador Garreau after the latter's call at the Department yesterday afternoon. He saw objections to our proposal, particularly from the viewpoint of the local administrators. He also felt that the holding of new elections would be harmful to the political education of the inhabitants of that part of West Africa, encouraging the belief that, if one lost an election, one only had to protest energetically to the United Nations to have a new election held. He felt that the holding of new elections where the first election was conceded to have been validly carried out was highly irregular. Mr. Gerig observed that the Anglo-French proposal to have a party which had failed to participate in the election select eight delegates was equally irregular; however, we were faced with a situation where exceptional measures were called for. He stressed the importance we attached to proposals being offered to the Ewes which provided the greatest likelihood of securing their participation in the work of the Consultative Commission, or, failing that, convincing the majority of United Nations Members that every possible effort had been made to secure their participation.

Mr. Thompson presumed that the French Government in Paris, having probably been informed by Ambassador Garreau of our proposal, might already be in touch with the British Government in London; however, he would also communicate with London and seek his Government's reactions.

The Ambassador in France (Bruce) to the Secretary of State

CONFIDENTIAL PARIS, February 22, 1951—1 p. m.

4959. Lack of understanding allegedly evinced by Department regarding proposed joint Anglo-French resolution concerning Ewe problem causing great concern Foreign Office. We were told that suggested measures by French and British to insure representation of Commission Togo Union in Consultative Commission and draft resolution agreed upon by French and British had been accepted by Ministry Overseas France, which is responsible for administration French Togoland, only after long struggle.

Foreign Office stated that any alternative measures, as suggested by Department as possible amendment to resolution, would create situation of endless recriminations, with no settlement of problem possible. Holding of new elections would be admission that original elections not properly conducted, and might give rise to demands for review of electoral results in districts other than those predominantly Ewe.

Ministry Overseas France would categorically refuse hold new general elections which they believe would create disorder in territory. French, and Foreign Office assures us that British also, consider that increase in size Consultative Commission with proportionate representation of Ewes based on results general elections recently held is only equitable settlement, and authority of Trusteeship Council should be brought into play to convince Ewes to take part.

Foreign Office has requested us to convey to Department its hope that latter will reconsider its present attitude and support Anglo-French proposals, since they consider this solution only means of putting end to what otherwise might develop into prolonged and increasingly complicated problem.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. D. Vernon McKay of the United States Delegation to the Trusteeship Council

CONFIDENTIAL [NEW YORK,] February 23, 1951.

US/T/100

Subject: The Ewe Problem

Participants: Mr. Awni Khalidy, Iraqi Delegation
Ambassador Francis B. Sayre, US Delegation
Mr. Vernon McKay, US Delegation

On Mr. Sayre's invitation, Mr. Khalidy called this morning to discuss the Ewe problem.

Mr. Sayre opened the discussion by recalling that Mr. Khalidy and Mr. Gerig had worked together on the Visiting Mission to West Africa which had studied the Ewe problem. He hoped that the US and Iraq could continue to work together and could come up with a constructive proposal for dealing with this difficult question. Mr. Khalidy thanked Mr. Sayre and said he accepted this suggestion with enthusiasm. He said that as yet his own thinking had not crystallized into a definite plan.

Mr. Sayre then asked if Mr. Khalidy had heard of the Anglo-French proposal for dealing with the problem. Mr. Khalidy said that he had been informed of the general lines of the Anglo-French proposal. However, he stated that he knew from one dependable source that the Sylvanus Olympio party would reject a proposal along these lines.

In order to obtain a further clarification of Mr. Khalidy's views, Mr. Sayre read the Anglo-French proposal (without the proposed US amendment) to Mr. Khalidy, and Mr. McKay pointed out what the practical effect of this proposal would be in terms of the relative strength of the P.T.P. (Parti Togolais du Progres) and C.U.T. (Comite de l'Unite Togolaise) in the Consultative Commission.

Mr. Khalidy commented that any proposal of this sort would result in the Ewe unification party being overwhelmingly outnumbered. He said that in the south of French Togoland, for all practical purposes, there is no other party than the Ewe unification party of Sylvanus Olympio. The Pedro Olympio faction (P.T.P.) he said, is a very weak, make-shift pro-French arrangement which was artificially inspired and had no actual roots in the history, tradition and culture of the people. The Anglo-French proposal was thus nothing but a joke. (This is particularly interesting because the UK and French Delegations had previously informed the US Delegation that they felt that Mr. Khalidy could be persuaded to co-sponsor the Anglo-French proposal.)

The discussion then turned to the report on the elections in French Togoland which a special representative from France is expected to present to the Council next week. Mr. Sayre commented that Garreau had told him that this report would show that the elections were absolutely free, and that there had been no coercion by the government. Mr. Khalidy responded that this report would be quite "immaterial". Mr. McKay asked if Mr. Khalidy would explain why he considered that this report would be immaterial. Mr. Khalidy responded that of course the report would say that the elections were honest. Perhaps it might even be partly true that the French government did not exert direct pressure to induce voters to support the P.T.P. But the very nature of the French election system made it impossible for the C.U.T. to win a fair representation in the Consultative Commission. What happened in the French elections was this: in each district the chiefs or elders owed their position to the French, and these chiefs made it clear to the voters who they should vote for. This explained, he said, why the Parti du Progres won the election in Anecho and Atakpame, where the great majority of the people were actually supporters of the unification party. In other places he thought the local administrator probably did call together the chiefs or the government clerks and tell them how to vote.

Mr. McKay asked if Mr. Khalidy intended to express this view publicly in the Council. Mr. Khalidy responded that he certainly would express the above opinions publicly in the Council. This was not only his Government's policy, but he considered that his personal honor and honesty as Chairman of the Visiting Mission was involved.

Mr. Sayre then asked Mr. Khalidy what ideas he could suggest for a solution. Mr. Khalidy responded that tentatively he thought new elections should be held, with the Council having agreed in advance on a fixed number of seats to be given to P.T.P. and C.U.T. Mr. Sayre wondered if new elections in the south would not be enough. Mr. Khalidy responded that this might be enough but the important thing was to fix the ratio of seats.

Mr. Sayre wondered if the C.U.T. would accept a proposal for new elections if the US and Iraq could join in such a proposal. Mr. Khalidy responded that he was afraid the C.U.T. would be very "vehement", although he said that he would accept anything that the C.U.T. would accept. He said that De Souza and Sylvanus Olympio are writing him regularly. Mr. Sayre asked if there was any way by which Mr. Khalidy could contact Olmypio to see if the unification party would accept a proposal for new elections. Mr. Khalidy responded that the French would know what he said if he cabled, and would open any letter that he wrote, so he did not think it would be possible to make such a contact.

Mr. Khalidy thought that possibly the oral petitioners from the Togoland Congress, if they appeared, could answer this question. Mr. McKay wondered if any rivalry were developing between Sylvanus Olympio and Togoland Congress leaders. Mr. Khalidy thought this was possible, but felt that the only thing to do under the circumstances was to wait and find out whether the Togoland Congress representatives could tell us what the C.U.T. would accept. Mr. Khalidy also thought it possible that Sylvanus Olympio might come again to the Council.

Mr. McKay called attention to the fact that it was important that Mr. Khalidy and Mr. Sayre have a common understanding of what kind of elections they were each referring to. On the one hand there might be new elections at the primary and secondary stages under the system used by the French in the previous elections. Mr. McKay assumed, from the remarks of Mr. Khalidy, however, that such an arrangement would not be satisfactory to him since the results of new elections on this basis would very likely return so large a number of Parti du Progres candidates that Mr. Khalidy would not find it acceptable. Mr. Khalidy responded that this was precisely the case. He was opposed to new elections on the old basis.

Mr. Khalidy again insisted that the ratio of P.T.P. and C.U.T. seats in the Consultative Commission was the important thing. Mr. McKay asked if Mr. Khalidy did not agree since the northerners outnumbered the southerners, that the C.U.T. would be outnumbered in the Commission. Mr. Khalidy agreed, saying that he only insisted that in the south, where the C.U.T.'s following overwhelmingly outnumbered the P.T.P., the C.U.T. should have most of the representation. Mr. McKay asked if Mr. Khalidy had any figures in mind for this ratio. Mr. Khalidy responded that for French Togoland as a whole, the P.T.P. might be given 23 seats and the C.U.T. 18.

In response to a further question from Mr. Sayre, Mr. Khalidy made the following five suggestions (some of which overlap) as alternative proposals for dealing with the Ewe problem: (1) Do away with the Consultative Commission entirely and ask the administering authorities to come up with a new plan; (2) Do away with the Consultative Commission entirely and have the Trusteeship Council present a new plan to the administering authorities; (3) New elections to the Consultative Commission in all French Togoland on a new basis; (4) Have the Trusteeship Council and the administering authorities, either publicly in the Council or privately behind the scenes agree on a fixed ratio of P.T.P. and C.U.T. seats. (If 23 and 18 were decided upon, for example, the P.T.P. could then elect any 23 people it wanted, and the C.U.T. could elect any 18 people it wanted); (5) Do away with the present Consultative Commission in favor of a Mixed Advisory Commission consisting of representatives of (a) the administering authorities, (b) the Trusteeship Council, (c) the C.U.T., and (d) the P.T.P.

Mr. Khalidy also stated that he would gladly accept a UN supervised election or plebiscite. He pointed out that at the seventh session of the Council he had remarked that the elections proposed by the administering authorities would not be satisfactory unless they were under some form of Trusteeship Council control.

Mr. Sayre thanked Mr. Khalidy for these interesting suggestions, and it was agreed that Mr. Khalidy would call on Mr. Sayre again on Tuesday February 27 at 11 a. m. to discuss the problem further.

Subject: Ewe Problem

Participants: Mr. J. K. Thompson, Colonial Attaché, British Embassy
Mr. J. Jefferson Jones III, UND, Department of State

During my conversation with Mr. Thompson this morning regarding the visit to the United States of the Acting Chief of the External Affairs Branch of the Gold Coast Government, Mr. Michael de Normann Ensor, Mr. Thompson brought up the subject of the joint Anglo-French resolution on the Ewe question.

Mr. Thompson said that he was discouraged at the possibility of arriving at an agreement over this difficult problem. He added that this feeling was intensified by the reports which he had just received from New York setting forth Khalidy's views as to how the question should be dealt with.

Mr. Thompson said that he strongly doubted the advisability of holding new elections to the Consultative Commission because, in his opinion, a decision of the Council to this effect would set back the education of the Africans in democratic methods by at least ten years. He fears that if new elections to the Consultative Commission are held the African people will be given the impression that if a certain party does not win an election it is not necessary for it to abide by the electorate's decision but to demand another election.

I replied that while I considered that his argument had some validity, I did not think it was a completely convincing one in the present circumstances. In the first place, I pointed out that in my opinion some differentiation should be made between elections to a Consultative Commission and to a legislative body in any one of the African territories. I added that if the American suggestion for holding new elections in the southern districts of Togoland found general acceptance, we expected to emphasize that the administering powers had agreed to the new elections not from necessity but from out of their desire to be magnanimous so that there could be no doubt that the wishes of the majority of the Ewe people were taken account of in the Consultative Commission. Mr. Thompson said that logically he could understand our position on the matter, but that he was afraid that the average African would be unable to make the distinction between elections to the Consultative Commission and to territorial legislative assemblies.

Subject: The Ewe Problem

Participants: Ambassador Roger Garreau, French Delegation
Mr. Henri Laurentie, French Delegation
M. Paulin Baptiste, French Legal Expert who investigated Consultative Commission elections in French Togoland
Ambassador Francis B. Sayre, United States Delegation
Mr. Vernon McKay, United States Delegation

At Ambassador Garreau's request Mr. Sayre and Mr. McKay met with members of the French Delegation this afternoon to discuss the Ewe problem.

Mr. Garreau stated that he wished to convey to the United States Delegation the information that his Government rejected the suggested United States amendment to the Anglo-French proposal for dealing with the Ewe problem. He stated that the French Ambassador in Washington was approaching the Department at a high level this afternoon with the same information. Mr. Garreau expressed in strong terms his disappointment that the United States took this position at a time when the Western countries were trying to stand firm together in the face of a world crisis.

Mr. Garreau further stated that in any case he did not think that the Trusteeship Council was competent to deal with a question involving a change of political boundaries. He said that he had pointed this fact out to the Council three years ago but his advice had been ignored. If necessary, he said the French Government would refer the question of the Trusteeship Council's competence to the International Court of Justice.

Mr. Sayre expressed his regret at the sharp difference between the point of view of the French and United States Delegations on the Ewe problem. He said that the United States in no sense was attempting to challenge the validity of the French elections or apportion any blame regarding them. The United States Delegation was looking for a practical solution which would promote peace and stability in that part of the world. With regard to the competence of the Council, Mr. Sayre pointed out that no one had ever suggested that the Trusteeship Council could change political boundaries. However, he said that it was his personal view that in order to reach towards some constructive solution, it might be that the Council would wish on some occasion to make recommendations to the Administering Authorities on such a subject and presumably had the competence to do so. Mr. Sayre remarked, however, that he did not know what the official position of his Government would be.

Subject: The Ewe Question

Participants: M. Jean Daridan, Minister Counselor, French Embassy
M. Gabriel Rosaz, Attaché, French Embassy
Mr. Benjamin Gerig, UND
Mr. William Cargo, UND
Mr. G. McMurtrie Godley, WE

M. Daridan called, at his request, on Mr. Gerig to give to the Department the views of the French Government with regard to the possible amendment to the Anglo-French proposals suggested by the United States. (The proposal was to establish an additional alternative under which new elections would be held at both the first and second stages in the southern districts of French Togoland, including Anecho and Atakpamé.) M. Daridan explained that the French Government was greatly concerned about the Ewe problem. They regarded the Ewe movement as subject to communist influence and, in that sense, a danger. They believed that new elections would further disturb the political situation in the area and consequently were opposed to them. He expressed the hope that the United States would be able to support the original Anglo-French proposals and would not feel obliged to pursue the suggested amendment.

Mr. Gerig said that the United States had put forward the suggestion only in an effort to be helpful to France and thereby, of course, to be helpful to the United States and the other administering powers. M. Daridan replied that his Government understood that this was the spirit in which the suggestion had been made and regretted that there was not a meeting of minds at this stage about it. Mr. Gerig said that we felt that a proposal on the Ewe problem should either result in the participation of the pro-unification groups in the Consultative Commission or, in the event that these groups should still be unwilling to participate, should make the refusal of these groups appear unreasonable to the great majority of Members of the United Nations. He said that the United States would be quite happy about the Anglo-French proposals if we could be assured that they would meet one of these objectives. Our present information, however, indicated that they would achieve neither. Mr. Gerig said that even if the United States supported the Anglo-French proposals, we believed that they could not receive more than the votes of the six administering powers and perhaps not all of those. They would accordingly not carry in the Trusteeship Council. In the General Assembly, he pointed out, the situation would be serious indeed, in view of the fact that the administering powers are but a small minority of the total membership. In that body, far-reaching proposals involving United Nations investigations or supervised elections might readily be made. On the other hand, if Iraq and other non-administering Members of the Trusteeship Council were to give their support to a suggestion such as the United States proposal, we believe that serious difficulties in the General Assembly might be averted. It was recognized that a proposal such as the one we had suggested would involve difficulties for the local administration, but it was felt that the facing of such problems now might avoid greater difficulties at a subsequent time.

M. Daridan indicated that he appreciated the force of these arguments, but that he was instructed by his Government to state that the amendment suggested by the United States was unacceptable and that if it was pursued in the Trusteeship Council the French Delegation would vote against it. He observed that the Ewe question was very complex and regretted that he had no compromise solution to put forward. Consequently, the position, at the present time, was as he had stated it.

M. Rosaz said that the position in the Trusteeship Council would no doubt be clearer after the various delegations had had an opportunity to study the report on the previous elections in French Togoland presented by Mr. Baptiste. Mr. Gerig said that this was no doubt true and that we felt that we should proceed slowly in this matter, taking into account the views of other Council Members.

M. Daridan said that he expected to have further communications from his Government on the Ewe question and that he would therefore hope to be able to discuss it further with Mr. Gerig. Mr. Gerig said that he would be glad to discuss the matter at any time.

CONFIDENTIAL PARIS, February 27, 1951—8 p. m.

5040. Embtel 4959, February 22, 1951. Concurrently with Ambassador Bonnet's approach to Department [1] FonOff reiterated to us their disappointment and perplexity that Department persisted in jeopardizing joint Anglo-French resolution re Ewe problem by wishing to present amendment which would entail new elections and prolong difficulties with no assurance of settlement. They asserted that Department had not given convincing arguments which could in any way alter carefully prepared position British and French. Resolution, they said was result of two months' study and discussion between British and themselves, and they would be obliged to oppose any alterations which might be unfeasible and incompatible with their responsibilities as administering powers.

In conclusion FonOff deplored possible parading of lack of unanimity among North Atlantic powers before Trusteeship Council on Ewe problem. French unshakeably convinced they have fulfilled Council's instructions regarding elections and believe joint Anglo-French proposal equitable means for concluding problem.

Embassy in no position to judge question but is impressed with seriousness with which French regard matter and their desire to settle issue this session Trusteeship Council.

Subject: The Ewe Problem Before the Trusteeship Council

Participants: Ambassador Bonnet, M. Jean-Pierre Benard, First Secretary } French Embassy
Acting Secretary Webb
Mr. Benjamin Gerig, UND

Ambassador Bonnet, at his request, called on Secretary Webb today to present the views of his Government on the Ewe question as it is now developing in the Trusteeship Council. M. Bonnet, after explaining the main elements of the question, said that Paris was very much disturbed at the Department's suggestion in regard to the possibility of holding new elections in the southern part of Togoland, even elections at the second stage. Such elections, he felt, would not only reflect on the validity of the previous election but might cause confusion and even disturbances in that area which might be very difficult to deal with. On this point the local authorities in French Togoland were particularly concerned. He went on to say that the proposal which the French and British were about to lay before the Trusteeship Council, providing for the appointment of eight additional representatives of the Ewe people to the Consultative Commission, would, in the French view, be a fair way to compensate for the non-participation of the unification parties in the recent elections. The French Delegation believed that if the United States supported this proposal it would receive a majority and thus take care of a problem which has become embarrassing for everybody. He hoped, therefore, that we would support the French proposal and not put forward the suggestion for new elections which he said his Government was unable to accept.

[1] Initialed for the Acting Secretary of State by Francis E. Meloy, Jr., of the Executive Secretariat.

Secretary Webb said that our suggestion had only been made informally to the French and the British and that it was put forward in the hope of contributing to a solution of the difficulty which had arisen. The last thing in our minds was to create more difficulties for the French and we thought that by offering the Ewes who refused to participate in the previous election a choice of two alternatives, it would be more difficult for them to reject either one and would, at the same time, secure wider support in the Trusteeship Council and perhaps obviate an acrimonious discussion later in the General Assembly. As to whether the French proposal would secure a majority if the United States supported it, Mr. Webb said that our estimate of the position was somewhat different from that expressed by M. Bonnet. We believed that even with our support of the French proposal, it was not likely to get a majority in the Council. Besides, we had considerable doubt as to whether it would be accepted by the discontented Ewe leaders themselves. The result, therefore, would be to leave the problem unsolved and perhaps even aggravated. Mr. Webb assured M. Bonnet, however, that the Department and our Delegation in New York were most anxious to make a positive contribution to a solution of this question and would continue to study the French proposal and any other proposal with that in view.

M. Bonnet said he had no doubt the Department was considering the question with a view to finding a constructive solution and this was very much appreciated by his Government. The question really resolved itself in a difference in the estimates which our two Delegations attached to the voting position in the Trusteeship Council. Mr. Webb agreed that that difference existed and said that if we could be assured that the proposal would receive a Council majority and be accepted by the Ewe leaders, we would be most happy to support it. If, however, we were all turned down, it would be more difficult for the administering members, and especially the French and the British, immediately concerned, to find a way out of the impasse.

Mr. Webb asked Mr. Gerig if he had anything further to suggest and the latter said that our Delegation at the Trusteeship Council had not intended to speak against the French proposal. Further, what would be very helpful would be some indication that the French proposal for enlarging the Consultative Commission by appointment would be accepted by the Ewe leaders themselves. Our impression was, from indirect sources, that the Ewes were not likely to accept the French proposal, even if it secured a majority in the Council. Mr. Webb added that the strategy of our suggestion was in part that if a choice between two alternatives were offered to the Ewe leaders, it would be more difficult for them to reject both, and in doing so it would emphasize their unfairness and strengthen the position of the French and other administering members in the subsequent United Nations debates.

M. Bonnet thought that the Ewes would accept the single French proposal but if our alternative were put forward, they would almost certainly accept it in order to show that they did not need to accept the proposal made by the French. Mr. Gerig said that there was a possibility that the Ewes might reject both proposals on the ground that either one would still make them a minority in the Consultative Commission—a position which they evidently did not like. M. Bonnet and M. Benard agreed with this possibility and M. Bonnet added that the dislike of the Ewe unification party for being in a minority was probably the main reason why they boycotted the previous election.

Mr. Webb said that we fully understood the French position and he wished to repeat that our whole purpose was to be helpful in this difficulty. We would study the question further and would be glad to consult with the French in regard to any new developments. M. Bonnet concluded by saying that he would try to find out what the prospect of acceptance by the Ewes of the single French proposal would be and would let us know as soon as possible.

4533. Dept has given careful study to points raised in Embtels 4959 [2] and 5040 [3] re Ewe problem as well as reasons given Dept by Ambs Garreau and Bonnet why Fr unable agree our suggested amendment.

US suggestions were made privately to Fr and Brit in effort be helpful meeting situation with which both confronted in TC and were motivated by fol considerations: (1) desirability that any proposal be acceptable to Ewes thus enabling fully representative Consultative Commission carry out intended functions; (2) desirability that such proposal, if not acceptable to Ewes, seem sufficiently reasonable to majority UN Members that they would blame failure Ewes to accept it on Ewes rather than Fr. Dept believes that present Anglo-French proposals will not receive TC majority and even if adopted would be rejected by Ewes and as result inflamed Ewe problem would arise in next GA. Result would be acrimonious debate with majority bloc non-administering powers securing adoption by GA more extreme proposals, such as UN investigating Comite, UN supervised elections, or UN supervised plebescite. Fr Govt will appreciate that adoption by GA of extreme proposal involving increased UN intervention in Ewe problem would establish precedent similar intervention in administration other trust territories.

Request Emb at its discretion bring these considerations to attention of Fr and assure them US does not consider its proposal implies that conduct of original elections in any way questionable. Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Director of the Office of Dependent Area Affairs (Jones)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] March 5, 1951.

Subject: Ewe Question

Participants: Sir Alan Burns, United Kingdom Representative in the Trusteeship Council
Mr. C. A. Gerald Meade, Counselor, British Embassy
Mr. J. K. Thompson, Colonial Attaché, British Embassy
Mr. Hayden Raynor, BNA
Mr. Ward P. Allen, EUR
Mr. J. Jefferson Jones III, UND

Sir Alan Burns stated that he would like to bring before the Department the views of the British with respect to the Ewe problem. He expressed the opinion that the gravity of the situation should not be minimized as he believed that failure to arrive at a satisfactory solution of the problems would have unfortunate repercussions not only in the areas directly concerned but throughout the whole African continent. Failure to arrive at a satisfactory solution of the Ewe problem might also adversely affect the procurement of strategic materials in Africa. Sir Alan asked if Department officials had observed a recent statement of the South African Prime Minister which was critical of the policy followed by the British in the Gold Coast on the basis that the British were moving too fast in granting self-government to the Colony. Sir Alan believed that if the Ewe problem was not solved it might afford a basis for further criticism by Mr. Malan of the British policy of promoting self-government in Africa with the greatest possible rapidity.

Sir Alan stated that the United Kingdom Government had been giving a great deal of thought to a means of reconciling the views of the French and United States Governments on the Ewe question. He wondered if the United States could accept a proposal whereby new secondary elections would be held for the six delegates from the four districts in French Togoland where the Ewe-unification group had a clear majority. He felt that there was some basis for the French objections to holding new elections in the two districts of Anecho and Atakpame (with a total of eight delegates), since the Baptiste Report clearly demonstrated that the Parti Togolais du Progrès had a clear majority in those two areas. Sir Alan said that if such a proposal was acceptable to the United States the British would strongly urge the French to accept. Mr. Jones said that, speaking personally, he doubted that the proposal which Sir Alan had advanced would fulfill the objectives which the United States had in mind in suggesting its proposal to the French viz, the adoption of the Trusteeship Council of a resolution which would secure the cooperation of the Ewe-unification groups or, at the very least, would appear sufficiently reasonable to the majority of the non-administering Members of the United Nations as to obtain their approval. Mr. Raynor said that if the British submitted their proposal, as outlined above, to the French it would be better if they did not indicate to the French that such a proposal was acceptable to the United States.

Sir Alan said that since it was the preliminary reaction of the United States officials present that the proposal which he had sketched was not acceptable, he wondered if it would not be preferable for the Council to approve a resolution merely taking note of the statements of the two Administering Authorities concerned and inviting them to continue their efforts to complete the participation in the Consultative Commission in such a way that it would reflect the views of all sections of the population. He believed that the adoption of a "holding resolution" would give more time to the French and British in their attempts to solve the problem. He also said that he thought that French, British, and United States Governments should consult closely during the interim period that the passage of such a resolution would afford in order to cooperate in working out substantive proposals. He hoped that the Department would participate in such discussions in order to assist the British in prevailing upon the French to take a more reasonable line in connection with this problem than they had heretofore adopted.

Mr. Jones remarked that of the two proposals which Sir Alan had described he thought that a resolution along the lines of the last proposal was to be preferred. He asked what Sir Alan would think of adding another paragraph to such a resolution requesting the Administering Authorities to present proposals for the substantive solution of the problem at the next meeting of the Council. Sir Alan replied that while he anticipated that the French and British would be in a position to present substantive proposals at the next Council meeting he did not think that it would be necessary to spell this out in the resolution. Mr. Jones also asked what the British reaction would be to a proposal providing for the establishment of a committee to assist the Administering Authorities concerned in working out substantive proposals for the solution of the Ewe problem. Sir Alan said that he would not object to the establishment of such a committee provided that it did not visit the two Trust Territories of Togoland.

At the end of the meeting arrangements were made for Sir Alan to call upon Mr. Sandifer the next day at 10 a. m., and he was informed that at that time the Department would be in a position to give a definitive reply to the proposals which he had advanced.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] March 6, 1951.

Subject: Position to be Adopted by the United States Delegation to the Trusteeship Council on the Ewe Question

Recommendations:

It is recommended:

1. that the United States Delegation introduce an amendment to the proposed Anglo-French Resolution (Enclosure 1[2]) along the lines set forth in Enclosure 2, after having determined that such an amendment is acceptable to the French and British Delegations.
2. that, as to the language of our amendment, the Delegation, at its discretion, seek to obtain the agreement of the French and British Delegations to the modifications in language set forth in Enclosure 3.
3. that the Delegation seek to obtain the co-sponsorship of one or more non-administering members of the Council for our proposed amendment.

Discussion:

The above recommendations are based on the following considerations:

1. The Anglo-French proposal for obtaining the participation of the Ewe-unification groups in the Enlarged Standing Consultative Commission and the proposed resolution which would endorse their proposals seem unlikely to be adopted by the Council. Even should they be adopted, it is very doubtful if they would secure Ewe participation in the Consultative Commission or persuade a majority of Members of the United Nations that every feasible step had been taken to obtain Ewe participation.
2. The United States proposal to hold new elections in the southern section of French Togoland as a means of obtaining Ewe participation in the Consultative Commission is entirely unacceptable to the French, and to the British as well.
3. Consultations have been carried on both in New York and Washington with the British and French in order to work out an acceptable solution.
4. Sir Alan Burns has suggested both to the Delegation in New York and to officers of the Department that a way out of the impasse might be for the Trusteeship Council merely to take note of the steps thus far taken by the two Administering Authorities in regard to the Ewe question, to request them to continue their efforts to set up procedures for consulting all elements of the population of the two Togo-lands, and to request them further to report back to the next session of the Council.

5. The United States Delegation drafted an amendment to the proposed Anglo-French resolution to achieve the objectives outlined by Sir Alan. The resolution as amended is attached as Enclosure 2. This draft was discussed with members of the French Delegation on the afternoon of March 5 and Ambassador Garreau expressed full agreement with it.

6. The changes in drafting set forth in Enclosure 3 are proposed by UND in the interest of harmonizing the original draft with our amendment. However, the Delegation should consult closely with the French and British as to the exact language of the amendment and if the British and French Delegations find it impossible to accept any of the drafting changes, the United States should not press them.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Director of the Office of United Nations Affairs (Jones)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] March 6, 1951.

Subject: The Ewe Question

Participants: Sir Alan Burns, United Kingdom Representative in the Trusteeship Council
Mr. J. K. Thompson, Colonial Attaché, British Embassy
Mr. Michael de Normann Ensor, Acting Chief, External Affairs Branch, Gold Coast Government
Mr. Durward V. Sandifer, UNA
Mr. Ward Allen, EUR
Mr. J. Jefferson Jones III, UND
Mr. Curtis C. Strong, UND

Mr. Sandifer stated that the appropriate officers in the Department had been considering the two suggestions which Sir Alan had made at the meeting yesterday with respect to proposals on the Ewe question which might be submitted to the Trusteeship Council. Mr. Sandifer said that the Department had been impressed with Sir Alan's suggestion that a resolution be introduced in the Council taking note of the statements made by the administering authorities concerned and requesting them to continue their efforts to complete the composition of the Consultative Commission. Consequently, we had embodied his idea in an amended version of the original Anglo-French resolution and had already discussed our amended version with members of the French Delegation in New York. The French Delegation, including Ambassador Garreau, found the amended version acceptable but would prefer to have the major changes introduced as an amendment after the French and British had introduced the original Anglo-French resolution. It was our understanding that the French Delegation was now consulting Paris to ascertain the French Government's reaction. Mr. Sandifer then gave to Sir Alan a copy of the amended resolution which we had discussed with the French [enclosure (attached) to Mr. Jones' memorandum to Mr. Sandifer of March 6,[1] entitled "Position to be adopted by the United States Delegation to the Trusteeship Council on the Ewe Question"].[2]

Sir Alan said he thought that the amended resolution was an excellent one and that it was acceptable to the United Kingdom Government. He would be glad to urge the French to accept this draft, and particularly to make every effort to obtain the approval of the French Government in time for the Anglo-French resolution and the United States amendment to be submitted to the Council when it began its discussion of the Ewe question. Sir Alan suggested that it might be well to attempt to obtain another non-administering member of the Council in addition to Iraq to co-sponsor the amendment with the United States. He thought that it would not be difficult to prevail upon either the Dominican Republic or Thailand to co-sponsor with Iraq and the United States.

With regard to the following clause in the Anglo-French resolution, which the United States had suggested might be omitted, Sir Alan expressed doubt that the French Government would be willing to agree to its omission:

"Considering that these methods were such as to enable all sections of the population to express their true opinions".

Mr. Ensor remarked that he considered it preferable to retain this clause, in as much as its inclusion might be a factor of importance in prevailing upon the Ewes to cooperate with the French and British authorities in arriving at a substantive solution of the problem.

The British representatives thought that it would be desirable that the phrase "at its next session" be added at the end of the paragraph recommending that the administering authorities formulate as soon as possible substantive proposals for a practicable solution of the question and inform the Council accordingly. The basis of the British views on this question was that the inclusion of the phrase might be used as a lever with the French to prevail upon the latter that it was necessary to agree upon substantive proposals for the solution of the problem before the next session of the Council.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. D. Vernon McKay of the United States Delegation to the Trusteeship Council

CONFIDENTIAL [NEW YORK,] March 7, 1951.

Subject: The Ewe Problem

Participants: Sir Alan Burns, United Kingdom Delegation
Mr. Henri Laurentie, Mr. Francis Huré } French Delegation
Ambassador Francis B. Sayre, Mr. Benjamin Gerig, Mr. Vernon McKay } United States Delegation

Members of the British and French Delegations called on Mr. Sayre at his request this morning to discuss the text of a ninth draft of a proposed draft resolution on the Ewe problem.[1]

Mr. Sayre presented the British and French representatives a text which included (1) the terms of a resolution which Mr. Khalidy of the Iraqi Delegation yesterday told members of the US Delegation he was willing to accept, and (2) three additional phrases to which Khalidy had indicated strong opposition but which members of the US Delegation felt Khalidy might still be persuaded to accept.

Sir Alan Burns and Mr. Laurentie agreed to the text of this resolution providing it included the three points which Khalidy had not yet accepted. It was suggested that this text be submitted, if Khalidy would agree, as an Iraq-US amendment to the Anglo-French text. In a move to increase the chances of getting Khalidy to accept this text, Sir Alan asked Mr. Laurentie if the UK might not introduce the Anglo-French text as a UK resolution alone. This might make it easier for Khalidy to accept the idea of proposing the new text as an amendment. Mr. Khalidy had previously informed both the US and UK Delegations that he would not under any circumstances agree to the idea of an Iraqi-US amendment to something that France had proposed, as this would give France an initiative which his delegation could not agree to. Mr. Laurentie accepted Sir Alan's suggestion.

Sir Alan said that if Khalidy refused to accept the new text, he thought we should revert to the text which he had agreed to yesterday in a meeting at the Department of State. Mr. McKay remarked that the new text was a text which would get France, the UK and the US into a lot less trouble in the Trusteeship Council and General Assembly. He wondered, since the British and French had just agreed to the new text in principle, if it would not be better to go ahead with the new text, with or without Khalidy's co-sponsorship.

[1] There is no record of nine drafts as such in either the Department of State files or the files of the United States Mission to the United Nations.

Sir Alan agreed and suggested that the Thailand and Dominican Delegations be approached to seek their agreement or possible co-sponsorship of the new text whether or not Khalidy agreed to co-sponsorship. Mr. Sayre replied that the US Delegation would approach the Thailand and Dominican Delegations. Sir Alan suggested that if Khalidy refused to accept the above plan, the US, UK, and French Delegations discuss the situation again.

CONFIDENTIAL [NEW YORK,] March 7, 1951.

Subject: The Ewe Problem

Participants: Mr. Awni Khalidy, Iraqi Delegation
Mr. Benjamin Gerig, Mr. Vernon McKay } United States Delegation

Mr. Gerig and Mr. McKay approached Mr. Khalidy at Lake Success this afternoon to persuade him to accept the text of a tenth draft of a proposed Iraqi-United States amendment to the Anglo-French proposal on the Ewe problem. (The French and UK Delegations expressed to the US Delegation this morning their approval of this text, although they informed us that they would abstain when it was put to the vote).

Mr. Khalidy stated that his government had authorized him to join the US in presenting a suitable text of a draft resolution. He said that he had cabled his government the text which he had discussed yesterday with Mr. Gerig and Mr. McKay, and which he was sure would be acceptable. (This text differed in three important parts from the text which the French and UK Delegations this morning insisted upon maintaining without change). Mr. Gerig reminded Mr. Khalidy that the text Khalidy had wired to his government was only a text which we had discussed provisionally, and not one that the US had agreed to. Mr. Khalidy recognized this fact but said that he did not think he could go beyond this text.

The three disputed points were then discussed and rediscussed at considerable length. Mr. Gerig and Mr. McKay stated that the US felt that the Considering clause and the Urges clause should be maintained, (see Attachment A) and that the words "seriousness of the situation and the desirability" should be replaced by the word "necessity" in the Draws the attention clause. Mr. Khalidy contested all three points. Mr. Gerig and Mr. McKay pointed out that all three clauses had already been considerably modified in order to meet Mr. Khalidy's views. Mr. Gerig said that the US Delegation was in a difficult position because the Department had studied the problem at great length, had in fact taken the matter up at the level of the Secretary's office, and the Department wanted the Delegation to maintain all three of the points which Khalidy now opposed.

Mr. Khalidy responded that he could see the difficulty of our position and, in a spirit of cooperation, he was willing once more to go over the three contested points to see if there was a way out of the impasse. On the Considering clause, Mr. McKay pointed out that it had already been modified twice to meet Khalidy's views; the words "were such as to enable" had been changed to "represented a sincere effort to enable", and later the word "sincere" had been dropped along with the word "true" in the next line. Mr. Khalidy stated that these changes had improved the clause from his point of view but he still didn't like it. He suggested, however, that it might be acceptable if "all sections of the population" could be changed to "the population". Mr. Gerig said he was sorry but the Department considered this an important point. (We knew that it was an important phrase to the French). Mr. Khalidy then suggested "the population concerned", and Mr. Gerig countered with "the sections of the population concerned". Mr. Khalidy accepted this change.

Mr. Khalidy then again asked for the deletion of the Urges paragraph. Mr. McKay recalled that it had already been toned down from urging the Ewes to cooperate in the Consultative Commission, to the much less objectionable phrase of urging them to cooperate in seeking a solution. Mr. Khalidy suggested adding the words "of the Ewe problem" at the end of the Urges clause. Mr. Gerig pointed out that the problem involved other peoples than the Ewes. Mr. Khalidy then suggested "of the problem" which we quickly accepted. (We had agreed with the British and French in the morning to accept no changes, but the above two changes were so inconsequential that the British and French could easily and gladly accept them, a fact which we shortly verified with them).

The third point, on the word "seriousness", was next discussed and Khalidy reluctantly accepted our revision. However, he then said that he did not want to accept the idea of amending even a UK resolution, let alone a French one. He didn't want the UK to get the credit for the resolution. Mr. Gerig pointed out that after our amendment was accepted, there would be almost nothing left of the UK original resolution, and that Iraq and the US would certainly get the credit for vastly improving the resolution. Mr. McKay added that procedurally an amendment was better because it was certain to be voted on first. If we put in a separate resolution, the UK proposal might be voted on first. Mr. Khalidy recognized this danger but still opposed the idea of an amendment because the resolution would have been introduced by the UK, and might be reported in the Iraqi press as a UK resolution.

Mr. Khalidy suggested that Sir Alan Burns be approached at once to see whether he would object to a separate resolution instead of an amendment. (We knew that the French wanted the amendment rather than the separate resolution but thought that the text agreed to by Khalidy met all the latest Anglo-French position, so we thought it worth approaching them again on this point). Mr. McKay therefore asked Sir Alan to step out of the Council Chamber for a few minutes. Sir Alan promptly agreed to Khalidy's desire for a separate resolution and said that if we would wait for him he would consult Laurentie at once. In a few minutes Sir Alan returned with Laurentie's consent.

It was then agreed that in order to ensure the success of the arrangement, the US Delegation should approach the President and tell him that the French, Iraq, UK and US Delegations all wanted him to put the Iraq-US proposal to the vote first. (President Urena subsequently agreed to this procedure).

Mr. Khalidy concluded by expressing his pleasure that we had been able to reach agreement, but emphasized that this agreement depended upon there being absolutely no further changes in the text. Mr. Gerig responded that we were in entire agreement with him on this point. Mr. Khalidy also stated that in making his remarks in support of our draft resolution he intended to be quite moderate, and would not go into details on the French elections or other matters. He would emphasize that in his view, however, the two administering authorities were being given one more chance, and the future depended upon their coming up wih a satisfactory solution at the next session of the Trusteeship Council.

197 and 198. The Anglo-French draft resolution was submitted first (Doc. T/L.140). Subsequently the Iraqi-United States draft resolution was tabled (Doc. T/L.141). The United States Representative (Sayre) made a brief statement calling on the Trusteeship Council to address itself to "a substantive solution of the problem." These events occurred on March 8. On March 9 the Council proceeded to vote on the two resolutions. According to United Nations parliamentary practice, the last was voted on first; and the Iraqi-United States proposal was adopted nine votes to none, with three abstentions. The French delegate, Ambassador Garreau, made a statement regarding the French abstention, and then indicated that France desired to withdraw the Anglo-French draft resolution. Sir Alan Burns, the British delegate, concurred in the French proposal. This ended the Trusteeship Council's consideration of the Ewe question at its eighth session.

In talk with Sir Alan Burns concerning Ewe problem after passage Iraq–US resolution I expressed my sincere hope no time be lost seeking solution to be laid before TC at June meeting. If administering authorities fail submit satisfactory solution there seems strong probability that after sharp exchanges in TC problem will be brought before GA next autumn with most unfortunate developments.

Sir Alan expressed entire agreement and wondered whether Department which had come to rescue of administering authorities at March meeting might not wish to press through diplomatic channels for early consideration and formulation of substantive proposals for practicable solution of Ewe question. In order avoid dangerous procrastination I hope and recommend that Department take appropriate steps. [Sayre.]

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, April 12, 1951—8 : 50 a. m.

Transmitted under separate cover for your info are copies of two res on Ewe problem introduced in Trusteeship Council at Eighth Session (Documents T/L.140 and T/L.141).[2] After considerable consultation with French, British and other interested dels fol plan was evolved: that Franco-British res (T/L.140) would be introduced by British rep with appropriate statement; that Iraq–US res (T/L.141) would then be introduced; that President would call for vote on latter first; that France and UK would abstain on this vote; and that adoption of Iraq–US res would render unnecessary vote on Franco-British res. This plan was successfully followed, resulting on March 9, 1951, in adoption of vote 9–0–3 (UK, France, USSR) of Iraq–US res.

You will observe from Franco-British res that these Govts wld have preferred that TC endorse Franco-British proposals for urging Ewe participation in Consultative Commission. However, they were eventually persuaded that this approach wld not win general support in TC and that it might give rise to serious difficulties in GA. Both expressed their appreciation to US Del for our help in persuading Iraq to cosponsor res which avoided serious clash on Ewe question in TC.

[2] Regarding these documents, see the editorial note, p. 571.

Comparison of the two res reveals that most important difference between Iraq–US res and Franco-British is that former drops emphasis on procedural devices, especially Consultative Commission, and recommends that Administering Authorities formulate substantive proposals and inform TC accordingly not later than July 1, 1951.

The French and British Govts will presumably consult this Govt before next session of TC with view to obtaining our support for such substantive proposals as they agree to make. This Govt has not yet arrived at position as to exactly what sort of proposals it cld support, nor does it wish to intervene at this stage with detailed suggestions. The Dept wld appreciate such indications of French and British thinking re this matter as you may be able to obtain informally from time to time. Indications as to developments in Togolands affecting strength of Ewe-unification movement would also be most helpful. Latter question particularly is drawn to attention of consular posts in area.

Subject: The Ewe Question

Mr. J. K. Thompson, Colonial Attaché, British Embassy
Mr. J. O. Rennie, First Secretary, British Embassy
Assistant Secretary Hickerson
Mr. Durward Sandifer, UNA
Mr. Ward Allen, EUR
Mr. Benjamin Gerig, UND

Sir Alan Burns called at the Department at his request to discuss the steps which have been taken on the Ewe question, which is now before the Trusteeship Council, since the previous session of the Council. Sir Alan said that although the Council resolution urged the United Kingdom and French Governments to get together to make substantive proposals at the Council before July 1, he regretted to say that the two Governments had not yet gotten together on the subject. The United Kingdom had offered to go to Paris or to receive officials of the French Government in London, but no meeting was held so far.

Mr. Hickerson said we were hopeful that the two Governments would find a substantive solution which would be acceptable both to the Ewe people and to the other Members of the United Nations. He regretted that this had not yet been done but expressed the hope that between now and July 1 an acceptable solution would be found. He said that he personally was not familiar with all the details of the problem. But looking at it without this detailed information, he wondered what the obstacles were against regarding the Ewe nation as a separate people with possible nationhood as an objective. Sir Alan said that there were at least three objections to such a course: first, the Ewe people themselves were divided; secondly, it would prejudice the future of the inland tribes whose ultimate rights had also to be taken into account; and third, it could not be a viable nation.

Sir Alan then referred to the summary report of the local Consultative Commission and said that some of its recommendations for fiscal, economic, and cultural amelioration of the Ewe people seemed to offer some constructive suggestions. He wondered whether the Department had yet received a copy of the summary report and when informed that we had not, he left a copy for our information. He went on to say that it was the view of his Government, and himself personally, that the only feasible next step on the Ewe question was in effect to maintain the status quo. Any alternative solution was worse and would be found to be impracticable.

Mr. Gerig questioned whether the summary report of the Consultative Commission would be acceptable either to the non-administering Members of the Trusteeship Council or to a majority of the Ewe people themselves since the latter had boycotted the meetings of the Consultative Commission and the report, therefore, would be regarded by them as not representing their views. Sir Alan replied that these Ewe leaders had an opportunity to be present but refused to avail themselves of it and therefore they could only blame themselves. Mr. Gerig thought that even so it was doubtful whether this view would be accepted by the majority of the United Nations Members or the most vocal Ewe leaders.

A general discussion of the problem followed but no clear course of action seemed to develop. In this discussion, however, a possible long-range development was forecast by Sir Alan in which he thought that since the Gold Coast had now been given almost complete self-government, the next steps would be that British Togoland would wish to be more closely associated with the Gold Coast, and later it was probable that a majority of the inhabitants of French Togo would likewise see the possibility of attaining self-government earlier by associating themselves with British Togo and the Gold Coast. It was recognized, however, that this would take time and that there would be serious difficulties with the French in agreeing to such a development.

On the matter of tactics it was suggested that any proposals which the British alone, or the British and French Delegations to the Trusteeship Council bring forward should not be described as "maintaining the status quo". It was generally agreed that any resolution should give a list of economic, fiscal and cultural ameliorations which could be put into effect to obviate the difficulties complained of by the Ewe leaders in regard to all manner of frontier restrictions.

Mr. Hickerson thanked Sir Alan and his associates for giving us this information even though it was less positive than had been hoped for. He said we would continue to do what we could to assist the British and French Delegations to arrive at a solution satisfactory to a majority.

Subject: Anglo-French Proposals on Ewe Question

Participants: M. Henri Laurentie, Alternate Representative on the Trusteeship Council, French Delegation
Mr. J. Jefferson Jones, III, Adviser, United States Delegation

M. Laurentie told me that the British and French Delegations had received during the day copies of the Joint Anglo-French proposals on the Ewe question for submission to the Trusteeship Council and that it was planned to furnish the United States Delegation with a copy of these proposals some time later in the afternoon.[1]

M. Laurentie said that in brief the proposals merely provided for the continuance of the status quo and the establishment of a Joint Advisory Commission of Ewes in British and French Togoland. He doubted that these proposals would be "satisfactory" to the United States and personally considered them as "disappointing". He said that criticism of the proposals by the United States would be welcomed and indicated that the expression of dissatisfaction on the part of the United States would be a factor of considerable importance in bringing the French Government around to a more liberal policy in dealing with the problem in the Council.

According to M. Laurentie, M. Pignon, after his return from Togoland, almost succeeded in prevailing upon the French Government the adoption of a more forward-looking policy with respect to French Togoland including the broadening of the powers of the Territorial Assembly and widening the franchise for elections to the Territorial Assembly. M. Laurentie believes that if such a policy had been adopted, it would ease the French position in dealing with the Ewe problem in the Trusteeship Council. The French Delegate could then say that, while it was impossible at this time to obtain a clear-cut expression of the views of the Togoland peoples with respect to their political future, the French Government was developing self-governing institutions with the objective of placing the people of French Togoland in a position to be able to evaluate all factors in arriving at a decision regarding their political future.

M. Laurentie said that one method of dealing with the problem, i.e., of holding a plebescite to determine the wishes of the people concerned, could never be accepted by his Government. Such a plan was inadmissible because the Togoland people were not able at present to take into account all the factors which would be brought into play by a change in their political status or to realize the implications of each of the possible changes in political status which could be placed into effect.

PRIORITY

1029. Re: Ewe Problem. Urtel 1731 June 27.

1. On general question tactics Dept believes US can be most helpful by devoting efforts to reconciling views this problem in TC in order arrive at generally acceptable solution. This was role US performed successfully on same question last session. If US to act similar capacity this session we shld not, in order have room negotiate, push Brit and Fr into submitting proposal containing maximum to which they can agree. On other hand proposal shld not be so weak as to be rejected by members TC as basis for action.

2. This respect Dept considers Brit-Fr memo as minimum but as basis on which procede. Chief difficulty wld appear be that memo will be regarded as negative and defensive. Correction this wld require extensive revision memo to build up positive character proposal for new commission in terms need for and role it to perform. Brit and Fr likely consider time insufficient such revision. One helpful revision which cld be made wld be change impression given by statement quoted para 1[2]a reftel that door closed to political unification. Although this may be fact, wld be difficult for TC to endorse statement this time. You might also suggest Annexes to memo be issued separately since they tend indicate reliance Brit and Fr chiefly on views of Consultative Commission boycotted by Ewes and detract from claim that Ewe views given due consideration in preparation memo.

3. If US to follow course outlined para 1 above US wld reserve public comment until other members TC react. Task then wld be work out with Brit and Fr and with key pro-Ewe members TC suitable proposals strengthen role of new Commission. Granting of some degree financial responsibility only promising step this direction now apparent. Some such steps wld seem necessary to differentiate new Commission from previous Consultative Commission.

4. Re last sentence para 21 memo, suggest you inquire Brit and Fr when details for giving effect to proposal wld be available, since matters such as composition of commission wld be important.

Minutes of Meeting of Administering Members of the Trusteeship Council, New York, July 3, 1951

CONFIDENTIAL

US/T/127

Participants: Sir Alan Burns, Representative of the United Kingdom Delegation in the Trusteeship Council
Mr. W. A. X. Mathieson, Alternate Representative, United Kingdom Delegation
M. Leon Pignon, Representative of the French Delegation
M. Henri Laurentie, Gouverneur des Colonies, Alternate Representative on the Trusteeship Council, French Delegation
Mr. Pierre Ryckmans, Representative of the Belgian Delegation
Mr. B. C. Ballard, Representative of the Australian Delegation
Sir Carl Berendsen, Representative of the New Zealand Delegation
Ambassador Francis B. Sayre, Representative in the Trusteeship Council, United States Delegation
Mr. J. Jefferson Jones, III, Adviser, United States Delegation

After passing copies of the redraft of the Anglo-French memorandum on the Ewe question to the representatives present, Sir Alan Burns said that he would like to make a few general comments on the redraft. In the first place, the French and British in redrafting the memorandum had attempted to embody in the new draft as many of the suggestions made by those present at the last meeting as was practicable.[1] For example, the order of the memorandum had been changed and what was considered the more positive parts of the memorandum, i.e., the proposals dealing with the establishment of the Joint Advisory Commission, had been placed in the first part of the memorandum followed by the provisions explaining why unification was not possible. Sir Alan said that the United States criticism that the original memorandum would create the impression that the door was permanently closed on all forms of unification had been taken into consideration in redrafting the memorandum, and that paragraph 7 of the memorandum had been altered in order to indicate clearly that the administering authorities concerned did not mean to imply that unification was permanently ruled out. Sir Alan said that he would appreciate the support of the other administering powers in obtaining Council endorsement of the memorandum, and that he considered it particularly important to emphasize that the two administering authorities had earnestly considered various possible solutions and had reached the conclusion that no solution involving a change in political boundaries could satisfy more than a minority of the peoples concerned.

Mr. Mathieson said that he would like to make a few comments of a more detailed nature regarding the alterations in the original memorandum contained in the redraft. The British and French had decided to make an addition at the end of paragraph 4 of the original memorandum clearly stating that the administering authorities were satisfied that the Consultative Commission had served its purpose and had no role to play in the future. According to Mr. Mathieson, it was thought that this addition would be helpful in making plain that the Joint Advisory Commission described in the memorandum was not merely a refurbishing of the Consultative Commission. Commenting on the new paragraph 6 in the redraft, Mr. Mathieson said that the British and French had decided to include in the memorandum a statement that the large majority of difficulties to the Togoland people resulting from the frontier between the two Togolands had been removed. Referring to the criticism made at the previous meeting by various representatives that the functions of the Joint Advisory Commission were not sufficiently spelled out, Mr. Mathieson said that the British and French accepted this criticism and had attempted to delineate more clearly what, in their opinion, should be the functions of the prospective commission, and particularly had tried to set forth more clearly the financial responsibilities of the commission.

[1] The minutes of the June 28 meeting (U.S. version) are not printed; the meeting was lengthy and inconclusive. Inter alia, the U.S. Representative (Sayre), pending receipt of instructions from the Department of State, requested clarification of several points of the memorandum. (IO Files, Doc. US/T/125)

In reply to a question by Ambassador Sayre, Sir Alan said that he had transmitted to London the United States suggestion that the minutes of the two Consultative Commission meetings be issued separately from the memorandum, but that it was believed in London that the reports should be issued as annexes to the memorandum. Sir Alan said that he personally doubted that the inclusion of the reports on the Consultative sessions would adversely affect the reaction of non-administering powers to the proposals embodied in the memorandum.

Ambassador Sayre asked if the British and French thought that any purpose would be served in retaining in the memorandum that portion of paragraph 4 which was critical of the Ewe groups which did not participate in the Consultative Commission. Ambassador Sayre questioned whether it might not be better to omit these portions of the paragraph, since their inclusion might lessen the chances that the All-Ewe-Conference Members would be willing to participate in the Commission. Sir Alan replied, with the concurrence of the French, that it was thought that this portion of the memorandum should be retained, and that its retention would not affect either one way or the other the Ewe reaction to the document.

Ambassador Sayre said that he would like to have some clarification of the portion of the redraft dealing with the financial responsibilities of the proposed Development Commission (paragraph 17). Sir Alan commented that, while it was true that the Commission would have only advisory functions, it was likely that its advice would be followed by the appropriate governmental bodies. Sir Alan in attempting to illustrate the role of the proposed commission said that if, for example, the Gold Coast Government decided to build a school in Togoland, it would request the advice of the commission as to where the school should be located and would undoubtedly follow the advice given. Both Sir Alan and M. Laurentie pointed out that there should be no overlapping of functions between the legislative assemblies of French Togoland and of the Gold Coast with the Commission; that the two legislative assemblies by law were charged with certain responsibilities and could not transfer these responsibilities to the Commission. Moreover, care would have to be exercised to keep from "treading on the toes" of the local governmental bodies which were extremely jealous of their prerogatives.

Governor Ryckmans asked if the British and French had any idea of what the reactions of the Gold Coast and Ewe leaders, including Nkrumah, Antor, and the two Olympios,[2] would be to the proposals. M. Laurentie said that he did not know but that he anticipated that their reactions would become known since Antor was already in New York and would remain at least until after the Council discussions of the Ewe question. It was also expected that both Pedro and Sylvanus Olympio would be present at Council discussions of the Ewe problem. M. Laurentie stated that Sylvanus Olmpio had altered his views and now favored Togoland unification rather than Ewe unification. Governor Ryckmans said that his experience as a colonial administrator had convinced him that the administering authorities who possessed the responsibilities for administering a particular territory were in a better position to know what was best for the people of that territory than was any one from the outside. He would, therefore, support the proposals contained in the memorandum. He made no further mention of his previous suggestion for the establishment of an "Ewe Provincial Assembly" within the framework of the Commission.

Sir Alan then asked if Sir Carl would care to give his comments on the redraft. Sir Carl replied that he had received the comments of the New Zealand Government on the original memorandum and that his Government considered the memorandum to be "ineffectual". The New Zealand Government also believed that, even if the Council accepted the memorandum, the solution which it provided would cause "violent altercations" in the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly.

Mr. Ballard expressed regret that he had not as yet received the views of his Government on the memorandum.

Ambassador Sayre stated that, in his opinion, the redraft constituted an improvement over the first draft but that the United States would like to have the views of other Members of the Council and of the peoples directly concerned before determining its final position with respect to the memorandum.

Sir Alan reiterated his hope that the various administering authorities in their talks with other delegations would support the Anglo-French proposals. He also said in reply to a question from Ambassador Sayre that if the Council approved the proposals it was anticipated that the Advisory Commission would be established immediately and would be functioning before the time the General Assembly was convened. Sir Alan said that it should be remembered that next year a

"Nevertheless they must add that they are satisfied that the Consultative Commission had served its purpose of elucidating the views of the majority of the people of the two Trust Territories, and they desire to place on record their appreciation of the manner in which the Commission has carried out its terms of reference, handicapped as it was by the absence of a section of its members. Even in its expanded form, however, it was a special body elected for a specific task and that task has now been fulfilled. In the positive arrangements for the future the Administering Authorities envisage no continuing role for the Consultative Commission."

II. THE BASIC PRINCIPLES GOVERNING CONSIDERATION OF THE PROBLEM

5. In preparing this memorandum, and indeed from the outset of the matters with which it deals, the Administering Authorities have been conscious that any proposals which they finally put forward must conform to two principles;

1. they must pay full regard to the known wishes of the peoples of the two territories and command general acceptance or at any rate acceptance by a large majority;
2. any change in political organisation in the territories must be practicable from the economic and fiscal aspects as well as on political grounds.

Throughout this memorandum these two principles are regarded as fundamental to the examination of the problem with which it deals and to be the basis both for the proposals put forward and for the criticisms which are advanced of alternative suggestions for a solution.

III. PRACTICAL STEPS OF AN ECONOMIC, CULTURAL AND FISCAL CHARACTER

6. It must be stated at the outset that much has been accomplished in the four years in which this matter has been before the Trusteeship Council to alleviate the difficulties which the presence of the frontier causes. The Administering Authorities sympathise with the Ewes in their desire to retain their cohesion and with all the inhabitants of the two Togolands whose family connections and normal avocations have been affected by the existence of the boundary between the two territories. They have always been ready, and are now, to do everything practicable to meet all legitimate grievances and remove every impediment to free association across the frontier. Already by the end of 1948 considerable ameliorations had been effected and these are fully described in paragraphs 13 to 52 of the Special Report made by the Visiting Mission on the Ewe problem, which for convenience of reference are appended as Annex II to this memorandum. They include extensive improvements in such fields as the movement of persons, goods and currency, public health, education, communications and taxation. In the intervening period since 1948 progressive improvements have been accomplished and as a result of the extensive concessions which have been made there is now complete freedom of movement of persons and only the minimum restraint on other traffic. The efficacy of these improvements can be gauged by the fact that no significant complaints of difficulties caused by the frontier were brought to the notice of the two Governments in 1950.

7. That further progress in this field is possible is evidenced by the recommendations made in paragraph 7(iv) and (v) of the Summary Statement of the second session of the Consultative Commission in regard to economic, social and cultural matters. In the comparatively short time which has elapsed since the close of the second session of the Commission the Administering Authorities have given earnest and urgent consideration in conjunction with the authorities on the spot, to the implementation of these recommendations. While some raise issues of considerable complexity involving also administrative arrangements which cannot safely be improvised a number of decisions have already been reached and put into effect which will be communicated to the Trusteeship Council by the Special Representatives of the two territories.

IV. SUBSTANTIVE PROPOSALS OF THE ADMINISTERING AUTHORITIES

8. The Administering Authorities recognise that the practical steps described in the preceding paragraphs cannot yet be regarded as completely satisfying the aspirations of the peoples concerned. They are fully conscious that the existence of two separate administrations exerts a sundering influence on these peoples of the two Trust Territories who feel natural ties of kinship and they have considered together, in response to the recommendation of the Trusteeship Council at its Eighth Session, in what way an effective link can be maintained between the peoples on each side of the frontier. For reasons which are analysed in detail in the concluding section of this memorandum they have reached the decision, based on the fullest possible consultation with the people of the territories, that it is conclusively demonstrated that no solution involving an alteration of boundaries or of political allegiance can currently be proposed which commands the general assent of the peoples of the two territories or even the agreement of a majority. They are equally satisfied that no change of this nature can be undertaken which does not raise a fresh set of problems, whether political, economic or fiscal, in place of those which they are now considering. They feel that the setback which the disruption of any change would cause in the political and economic fields must outweigh the advantages to be derived from the gratification of the ambitions of political groups in the territory, none of which represents a majority. They particularly wish to make clear one point which they feel has not always been evident to all the advocates in the respective territories of unification in one form or another. Unification must imply the creation of a political entity. Such an entity must have its own constitutional organisation, whatever may be its relationship to one or more of the neighboring territories. It must have its own administrative organisation and its own fiscal and economic structure which will enable it to stand on its own feet financially and to maintain and develop itself. If new frontiers are created, new controls and customs barriers must be set up on those frontiers if the separate existence of the new entity is to be established and preserved. The renunciation by one part of the present Trust Territories of its present status must inevitably mean the abandonment by it of the advantages which it enjoys under its present state in exchange for any which might be conferred by its new state; and this in its turn must greatly influence the prospects of viability of the new territory.

9. Within the framework of existing boundaries, however, there is scope for closer relations between the peoples of the two Territories. The Administering Authorities have noted with considerable interest the reference in paragraph 4 (a) of the Summary Statement of the Second Session of the Consultative Commission to the desirability of harmonising the policy of development in the two Trust Territories as an essential corollary to their advancement towards self-government. The Administering Authorities are fully in sympathy with this view, and it has been and will remain their object to administer the territories in the closest co-operation. They feel that the problem which has been raised in the Trusteeship Council by Ewe and other petitions cannot be considered in isolation and is not of a nature which permits of some immediate solution. In Togoland, as in West Africa as a whole, developments and changes are going on at a rapid pace in all fields. On both sides of the frontier which divides the two Trust Territories, important developments are in progress in the shape of regional and local government and in the manner of participation by the inhabitants in the administration of public affairs. The final pattern cannot yet be set; in the meantime the inhabitants of the Trust Territories are gaining political experience and maturity by participation in these developments. This was recognised by the 1948 Visiting Mission which in its Special Report on the Ewe problem (Document T/798, paragraph 101) said "The Political formula that will in the opinion of the Mission meet the situation in the future depends to a large degree on the people of two Togolands themselves, on the extent of a well informed public opinion, and on the political maturity of the people. Such a condition appears to be rapidly advancing in the South".

10. In order to associate the people more directly with their efforts to ensure congruity between these developments, the Administering Authorities have decided that a joint body of representatives of the two Trust Territories should be created which would be an effective instrument in establishing these closer relations. Although it is clear that any such new body can have no executive or legislative power extending over both Trust Territories, it should nevertheless be a meeting place of representatives of the peoples of the two Togolands wherein views on the development of the respective territories can be exchanged and co-ordinated and the measures of development in every field harmonized and stimulated.

11. The new body would meet at regular intervals and as often as the occasion demands. It would have the opportunity of discussion and consultation with the senior Administrative and Technical Officers from each side and would consider and advise the two Administering Authorities jointly on the planning and implementation of the programme of development, economic and social, in the light of available resources and on all other practical questions relating to the preservation of close connection between the peoples on each side of the frontier, together with any further amelioration of conditions caused by the existence of the frontier. It will of course review the progress of the measures referred to in paragraph 7 above and also advise on their development. One important feature of the functions of the new body will be to advise the Administering Authorities on the projects of common interest on which they consider it necessary that funds should be expended and on the priority which should be accorded among such projects in the expenditure of funds as they become available for such purposes from the respective administrations. Discussions are now in progress between the most senior representatives of the two Administering Authorities on the detailed organisation and functions of this body which will make it effective for the purposes set out above.

12. The Administering Authorities believe that by this means it will be possible for them to maintain and develop the administration of their respective Trust Territories in accordance with the terms of the Charter and of the Trusteeship Agreement. They believe also that given this link, together with the existing close collaboration between French and British Authorities, both locally and at the Metropolitan level, the legitimate aspirations of the people of the Trust Territories will be assured and any prejudice to their interests avoided during the period of their advance towards self-government.

V. ANALYSIS OF THE VARIOUS PROPOSALS FOR UNIFICATION WHICH HAVE NOT BEEN ACCEPTED BY THE ADMINISTERING AUTHORITIES

13. The Administering Authorities have not reached the conclusions indicated above without the most searching re-examination of all the various proposals for "unification" which have been advanced from time to time by different groups in the Territories. As is made clear by careful analysis in the report of the Visting Mission on the Ewe problem, the term "unification" does not imply any single or agreed solution of the demands put forward by the petitioners. There is, on the one hand, a group consisting of the pan-Ewe parties which advocates unification of the areas inhabited by Ewes; on the other hand, there are elements, in the main based solely in Togoland under United Kingdom Trusteeship which advocate unification of the two Trust Territories as a whole. Either of these projects, viewed within the framework of British and French Administration, is capable of more than one interpretation; there may be unification under French Trusteeship, under British Trusteeship or conceivably under some form of Anglo-French Trusteeship.

Here insert paragraphs 8–16 of original draft as paragraphs 14–22.

VIII. CONCLUSION

23. It is for these reasons, which in view of the history of this question they felt bound to expose in some detail for the consideration of the Trusteeship Council, that the Administering Authorities have reached the conclusion that the proposals set out in section IV of this memorandum offer the best prospect of leading the two Trust Territories towards the most rapid and harmonious attainment of the aims embodied in Chapter XII of the Charter and they commend them to the Trusteeship Council and to the peoples of the Territories.

CONFIDENTIAL NEW YORK, July 3, 1951—10:23 p. m.

23. For Gerig from Sayre. Re Ewe question. At meeting administering powers today Brit Fr gave us copy redraft their joint memorandum on Ewe question (ourtel 1731 June 27) embodying suggestions made by various reps including US present at June 28 meeting. Redraft pouched Dept tonight.

Most significant changes in redraft follow:

1. Order of memorandum is changed to put "more positive" provisions, i.e., those relating to joint advisory commission for two Togolands, in first part of memorandum followed by portions of memorandum explaining why Ewe or Togoland unification not practicable.

2. Effort was made to avoid impression door closed permanently unification by revising para 17. Key sentence this para now reads: "For reasons which are analyzed in detail in concluding section this memorandum, they (administering authorities) have reached decision based on fullest possible consultation with people of territories it is conclusively demonstrated no solution involving alteration boundaries or political allegiance can currently be proposed which commands general assent of peoples of two territories or even agreement of majority."

3. Functions of joint development commission somewhat more clearly delineated in redraft. For example, redraft states one important feature of functions of new body will be "advise administering authorities on projects common interest on which they consider it necessary funds should be expended and on priority which should be accorded among such projects in expenditure of funds as they become available for such purposes from respective administrations."

Burns (UK) told me he had transmitted to London US suggestion that minutes of consultative commission sessions be issued separately but had received reply UK Govt considered advisable issue them as annexes to memorandum.

Redraft has now been submitted London and if clearance obtained it will be given secretariat for distribution to council in near future, probably Thursday.[1]

Our preliminary comment is that redraft, although it constitutes improvement over original memorandum, leaves much to be desired particularly in form of presentation and will probably arouse unfavorable reaction among at least some non-administering members TC. Dept will be kept advised comments other members TC. [Sayre.]

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. J. Jefferson Jones, III, Adviser, United States Delegation to the Trusteeship Council

CONFIDENTIAL [NEW YORK,] July 10, 1951.
US/T/132

Subject: Anglo-French Memorandum on the Ewe Question

Participants: Mr. Awni Khalidy, Representative of Iraq to the Trusteeship Council
Ambassador Francis B. Sayre, Representative of the United States in the Trusteeship Council
Mr. J. Jefferson Jones, III, Adviser, United States Delegation to the Trusteeship Council

Ambassador Sayre opened the conversation with the statement that he thought it might be mutually helpful if he and Mr. Khalidy could exchange views, informally and personally, with respect to the Anglo-French memorandum on the Ewe question which the two administering authorities had submitted to the Trusteeship Council. Mr. Khalidy said that his first reaction to the memorandum was that it was "at least a beginning" and "better than nothing". He summarized his views on the memorandum with the remark that it was "worse than he had hoped for and better than he had expected".

Mr. Khalidy said that in his opinion the Ewe question could be analyzed from two points of view—either as a local problem of the Ewe people or as a broader question intricately related with the future of all West Africa. If the problem was considered to be purely the question of satisfying the Ewe desire for unification under one administering authority, the Anglo-French memorandum did not contribute to its solution. If, however, the problem was considered in the broader West African context, it would be necessary to take into consideration the recent political developments in the Gold Coast. As the results of the acquisition of a substantial degree of self-government by the Gold Coast people, there was a tendency on the part of the inhabitants of British Togoland to look towards the Gold Coast rather than to continue their efforts to obtain unification with the French Togoland Ewes. On the other hand, in the opinion of Mr. Khalidy, the Ewe unification movement was as strong as it had ever been among the French Togoland Ewes.

When Ambassador Sayre asked Mr. Khalidy if he had any specific suggestions to make with respect to the Anglo-French memorandum, Mr. Khalidy replied that he thought that the only action which the Council could take with respect to the memorandum was to attempt to strengthen the powers of the "Commission" or "Council" described in the memorandum. His two concrete suggestions were that the Commission might be empowered to advise the two administering authorities with respect to political questions and educational questions. In this connection, he said that the Consultative Commission had been able to go into political questions and he saw no reason why the powers of the new Commission should be more restricted than those possesssed by the Consultative Commission. According to Mr. Khalidy, there were two methods by which a joint group from French and British Togoland might be permitted to advise the two administering authorities on political questions. In the first place, the Commission itself might advise the administering authorities on political as well as economic, social, and educational problems. Then, an alternative possibility might be the establishment of a separate body to advise the two governments on political questions. This body might be composed of some of the members of the French Togoland Representative Assembly and the Togoland members of the Gold Coast Legislative Assembly.

Ambassador Sayre informed Mr. Khalidy that while the Department's position with respect to the Anglo-French memorandum had not been established, it was his personal view that several of the proposals contained in the memorandum were worthy of careful consideration. In the first place, it was his belief that, as stated in the memorandum, the Consultative Commission had served its purpose and should be discontinued. Moreover, he thought that the establishment of some sort of joint organization composed of representatives from the Togoland peoples might be a constructive step.

Mr. Khalidy said that he had strong doubts that the Ewe unification group headed by Sylvanus Olympio would agree to participate in the Commission described in the Anglo-French memorandum. In reply to a question from Ambassador Sayre, he expressed doubt that the Olympio group of Ewes would participate in the Commission even if it was strengthened in accordance with the suggestions which he had made. Ambassador Sayre asked, if it was true that the Ewe would not participate even in a strengthened position, what purpose would be served in attempting to increase the scope of responsibility of the Commission. Mr. Khalidy replied that he believed that the only action which would satisfy the pro-unification Ewes would be agreement on the part of the British and French to the adjustment of political boundaries so that all Ewes would be included within one political unit. Such a solution, however, was clearly impossible in view of the present attitude of the French and he, therefore, considered that the only action which the Council could take in the light of these circumstances was to urge the enlargement of the field of activities of the Commission. Moreover, if the Council did take action to strengthen the Commission, there would undoubtedly be a more favorable reaction in the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly when the question was considered by that body.

Mr. Khalidy reiterated that the movement for Ewe unification continued to be as strong as it ever was in French Togoland and added that he had received information to this effect from the leaders of the Ewe unification groups in the territory. He was highly critical of the tactics followed by the French in Togoland under French administration in dealing with the Ewe problem, and of their policy of suppressing the growth of political consciousness in the territory. He said that it was likely that the Council would receive within the next few days a petition from Mr. Augustino de Souza complaining about the action of the French authorities in breaking into his home in French Togoland. It is this sort of action by the French authorities which in Mr. Khalidy's opinion is so unwise.

At the conclusion of the conversation, it was agreed that Ambassador Sayre and Mr. Khalidy would meet again in the near future to discuss the problem.

M. Naudy recalled that the Trusteeship Council will be discussing the Ewe problem in French and British Togoland within the next ten days and referred to the joint Anglo-French memorandum which had been submitted to the Council (UN Doc. T/931). He said that terms of reference for the new commission envisaged by the joint memorandum would be presented more fully in the oral statement to be made by Sir Allan Burns and M. Pignon. The composition of the commission was being studied but he did not think that it would be decided before the end of the Trusteeship Council session.

The French government hoped that the United States would find the Anglo-French proposals acceptable and wished us to know in advance that the French government has decided to grant self-government to French Togoland by "steps". A government on the order of that in the Gold Coast is envisaged. There would be an executive council with ministers and the powers of the legislature would be increased. Universal suffrage would also be introduced. M. Naudy said that M. Pignon would outline these steps in a statement to the Trusteeship Council and requested that we keep the information confidential until that time in order not to decrease its effectiveness in the Council. The importance of this step would be the attainment of increased political maturity by the people of French Togoland who would thereby be better able to assess the issues involved in the Ewe problem.

M. Naudy referred to those sections of the Anglo-French memorandum dealing with the difficulties of unification and pointed out that the situation had changed in the past four years since the Ewe problem was introduced into the Council. He noted in particular the developments toward self-government in the Gold Coast and mentioned that in the recent elections in French Togoland the opponent of unification was successful. In reply to a question, M. Naudy stated that Sylvanus Olympio was being very silent and was "embarrassed" as a result of his relations with Nkrumah of the Gold Coast.

On the subject of the terms of reference of the new commission to be established, M. Naudy considered that it would be difficult to grant the commission any powers, even advisory, in the political field, mentioning in particular that a problem would exist in relation with the Gold Coast government. He indicated, however, that he considered education to be included in the social field. It was suggested to him that it might be well to specify education separately in view of the Trusteeship Council's general practice in this respect.

Assistant Secretary Hickerson informed M. Naudy that we find the framework of the proposed new commission to be an acceptable basis on which to work toward a solution and that we will be very interested in the reactions of other members of the Council since we feel that in this type of question we can be most helpful in reconciling the various points of view. Although we can not foresee what the solution of the problem will be, we hope that it will be possible to work out something which would be widely supported. In response to a question as to the type of resolution which M. Naudy thought the Council might adopt, he replied that he thought the Council might note the joint Anglo-French memorandum and approve of the steps which the Administering Authorities propose therein.

We have discussed informally and confidentially with UK and Fr dels Khalidy's views on Anglo-French memo re Ewe question (ourtel 66, July 10 [1]), particularly his belief that Joint Commission should be strengthened by including political and educational matters within scope commission's advisory responsibilities.

Burns (UK) said he was certain British would not object inclusion educational matters within scope commission's functions. He personally saw no objection inclusion political matters but would want clear this point with London. Hure (Fr del) was willing accept inclusion educational matters but evidenced considerable reluctance to inclusion political matters. He was fearful use of broad term "political matters" would confuse situation; also that commission would waste time in bootless political bickering rather than directing its energies constructively to solution real economic and social problems.

Memorandum Transmitted by Mr. Leon Pignon, Representative of the French Delegation to the Trusteeship Council, to the United States Representative to the Trusteeship Council (Sayre)

[Translation]

CONFIDENTIAL

NEW YORK, July 13, 1951.

Subject: Ewe Problem

As it has already informed the United States delegation, the French delegation is convinced that the Ewe question presents itself in 1951 in a completely different light from that in which it was usually considered in the past. Not only have the difficulties, which the inhabitants of the French territory may have suffered as a result of the war and the fact that the frontier was closed been completely eliminated today, but in addition the annexationist tendencies of the Gold Coast do not permit of giving any further thought to the constitution of a truly autonomous Ewe territory.

On the first point there is little to add. It is obvious that the liberal and democratic policy pursued by France in the territory placed under her trusteeship and the common desire of the United Kingdom and France to eliminate all exchange difficulties between the two territories have likewise borne fruit. The advocates in French territory of unification can no longer invoke any reason for popular discontent; they must fall back on arguments of principle, which have infinitely less effect on the masses and are being questioned by the leaders themselves. As shown by the last election (June 17).

As to the annexationist tendencies of the Gold Coast, that is the very factor which makes many hesitate who heretofore took an active part in the unification movement. It seems to them, rightly, that the autonomous Eweland of which they had dreamed would come up against the new political tendencies of the Gold Coast; the system established in the country appears, in fact, to be incompatible with the setting up on the frontier of a rival government which would be based on a tribal principle and would by that very fact threaten the integrity of the Gold Coast. Prestige, power and the science of organization give to leaders at Accra a considerable advantage over the all-Ewe Conference and the Committee on Togo Unity, at least over those of their members who were sincerely advocating the formation of an autonomous Eweland; there is therefore reason to think that the unification movement would in reality work only to the advantage of the Gold Coast, which for this purpose has the mass of Ewelanders in Keta. The United States delegation is aware of the situation; acts and talk leave no doubt as to intentions and methods of the leaders in Accra.

That is why, without even mentioning the other inhabitants of French Togo, who have clearly and resolutely opposed all unification, one has every reason to think that, at least in French territory, the Ewelanders themselves are beginning to ask themselves more or less confusedly what would happen to their originality and their influence if the progress of events reduced them to only one district of some province of the Gold Coast.

My Government deems it just to give them time for reflection, since the circumstances, that is, the present calm prevailing in Togo, permit it. In order to prepare them for a perfectly clear choice, it has decided to develop considerably the local political institutions in the trust territory. Suffrage will be considerably extended; the territorial Assembly's administrative power and power of decision will at the same time be greatly increased; and executive positions in which the Togolanders will share in the responsibilities of government are in the process of being set up. Thus the territory will take a long step in the direction of self-government, while by this means the inhabitants, particularly the Ewelanders, will be able, within a reasonable period of time, to decide their own fate with full knowledge of the facts.

To act differently, to hold, for example, a consultation on the real scope of which the people would not be informed, would be a sort of deceit. It would also be an error of policy with respect to West Africa in general.

The French government has followed with great interest the political evolution of the Gold Coast as well as that of Nigeria, and considers that the progress made in these two territories, although obtained in different ways, is no less worthy of interest than that from which the French territories of Black Africa have themselves benefited. But it is needless to point out to the United States delegation the political, strategic, and economic drawbacks of a West Africa in which the interior frontiers would become infinitely less fluid than they were during the colonial period.

Now if Gold Coast trends may, a priori, appear to be tending toward the formation of a large African combination, the actual situation would be of a different nature. The exclusive hegemony of Accra on the contrary, is in danger of ending in a partitioning that will render more difficult the establishment of harmonious relations among the various regions of the continent. The government of the Gold Coast is now giving evidence it has of a leaning in that direction; in seeking to annex British Togo and all or part of French Togo, it is manifesting the desire to enlarge its own domain without consideration for the sentiment of the neighboring countries or for a higher regional interest. Nothing can be more contrary to an organized or even merely harmonious concept of West Africa than this closed imperialism of classic form.

The French delegation takes the liberty of calling special attention to this aspect of the problem. In its opinion, any action that succeeded, by surprise, in encouraging Gold Coast expansionism at the expense of French Togo, would, besides being a strange infraction of the rules of the trusteeship system, constitute a precedent the results of which might be extremely serious both for the African peoples in general as well as for the position of the Atlantic powers in Africa.

I shall mention, in order to make my thought more clear, that my government will endeavor to seek the conclusion with the British territories of all possible economic agreements, local or regional, on transportation, roads, agriculture, stockraising, electric power, etc. This policy of agreements, according to the observations which the E.C.A. representatives were led to make in Black Africa, will have as its purpose not only to ensure the better employment of capital but also to prevent the frontiers from being closed and to create lasting bonds between the various countries of West Africa. Thus, in the absence of unity proper, it will be possible for solidarity and consequently harmony to prevail in this part of the continent despite the variety of political systems.

Those are positive measures that will help to spare West Africa a political and economic partitioning that would obstruct the progress of the people and the legitimate concern of the Atlantic powers for security. Quite to the contrary, the tendencies concealed in the self-styled Ewe propaganda of today would only lead to rash acts if they were satisfied.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. J. Jefferson Jones, III, Adviser, United States Delegation to the Trusteeship Council

CONFIDENTIAL [NEW YORK,] July 13, 1951.
US/T/136

Subject: The Ewe Problem

Participants: Mr. Awni Khalidy—Delegation of Iraq
Ambassador Francis B. Sayre—US Delegation
Mr. J. Jefferson Jones, III—US Delegation

Ambassador Sayre opened the conversation with a statement that he thought the further exchange of views between him and Mr. Khalidy might be helpful in furtherance of their efforts to work out a joint position on the Ewe problem, which might serve as the basis for a resolution to be submitted to the Trusteeship Council which Iraq and the United States might co-sponsor. Ambassador Sayre said that the United States Delegation had given further thought to the ideas advanced by Mr. Khalidy in the last conversation which they had had together, and thought that it might be possible to go along with Mr. Khalidy's ideas, particularly his belief that the Joint Council for the two Togolands should be strengthened by empowering it to advise the two administering authorities with respect to political and educational development matters, as well as social and economic matters. Ambassador Sayre then went over briefly what in his opinion might be the most important provisions of such a resolution.

Mr. Khalidy replied that "his thoughts had crystallized" on the question since the last meeting and that he had reached the conclusion that he should abstain on such a resolution as Ambassador Sayre had described, rather than co-sponsor or support it. He thought that the failure of the Council to obtain a solution of the problem after considering it for four years was to be deprecated. Ambassador Sayre expressed surprise at this change of attitude, as he had thought from the last meeting that the two delegations were in substantial agreement as to the most constructive action which the Council might take under all the circumstances. He went on to say that he believed that there could be no present solution to the underlying problem which would gain the approval of the majority of the people of two territories, and that it would seem to him difficult and most unwise for the Council to attempt at this time to impose a permanent solution, particularly since, as Mr. Khalidy had agreed previously, the situation in the two trust territories was extremely fluid. Ambassador Sayre said that, so far as he could see, the establishment of a Joint Council such as that envisaged in the Anglo-French memorandum, would be the most constructive step which could now be taken, provided of course that the functions of the Joint Council were strengthened along the lines which Mr. Khalidy had suggested at their former meeting. Such a Council would furnish the means for all groups concerned to get their views before the United Nations and the world.

Mr. Khalidy said that he would have no objection to statements on the part of the French and British that no solution could be currently reached with respect to the Ewe problem under present conditions. He did resent, however, the constant efforts on the part of the British and French to stave off a final solution by current successive proposals which did not and could not solve the problem. According to Mr. Khalidy, the French administration in French Togoland was following a policy of attacking him personally as well as of criticizing the activities of the United Nations and the Trusteeship Council; and in his opinion it was high time that the two administering authorities be made to realize that they must move forward towards solving the problem or reap the consequences. He reiterated that it would be better for the Trusteeship Council to take no action at present rather than to endorse another "experiment" like that of the Consultative Commission. He considered the new Joint Council to be nothing but another "experiment". He felt that it might be better for the Trusteeship Council to take no action other than noting the Anglo-French memorandum, leaving it to the General Assembly at its next session to decide whether or not constructive action should be taken.

Ambassador Sayre asked what kind of a joint proposal Mr. Khalidy would be willing to support. Mr. Khalidy replied that he would be glad to put his ideas in writing and give them to Ambassador Sayre at this afternoon's session of the Council. Ambassador Sayre said that he would appreciate his doing so in order that he might obtain the Department's opinion whether it would be better for the United States to proceed along the lines of the resolution which had previously been suggested and which Mr. Khalidy agreed not to oppose, or whether it would be preferable to attempt to work out some sort of different resolution which the two Delegations could co-sponsor.

86. For Gerig. Re Ewe question. With reference to Gerig–Jones telecon this afternoon, there follows text of rough draft of resolution on Ewe question, prepared by Khalidy of Iraq:

"1. The Council notes the joint paper which might be yet another attempt to arrive at a conclusion in the Ewe problem.

"2. The Council realized that this paper is not a solution of the Ewe problem, and to that end the Council decides to await at the next session a plan that will aim directly at the solution of that question.

"3. The Council takes no responsibility for the joint paper presented, but the two administering authorities may put it into action on their own responsibility, if they think that it will contribute to the solution of the problem; and to that end welcome the cooperation of the indigenous groups with the two administering authorities for the solution of the problem.

"4. The Council, while realizing that there are difficulties in the situation, nevertheless should express its regrets that a solution of the problem has not been found after five years of the reception of the original petition, and after the report of a visiting mission."

Khalidy said he would be prepared co-sponsor resolution along foregoing lines.

Subject: Trusteeship Council Action on Ewe Problem

Participants: Mr. Rodolfo Munoz, Argentine Delegation
Mr. Quesada Zapiola, Argentine Delegation
Ambassador Francis B. Sayre, United States Delegation
Mr. J. Jefferson Jones, III, United States Delegation

Ambassador Sayre said that he had requested the meeting with Mr. Munoz in order that they might have an exchange of views on what action the Trusteeship Council might most wisely take with respect to the Ewe question. Ambassador Sayre said that United States thinking on the Anglo-French memorandum was that certain parts of it could be approved by the Trusteeship Council, particularly the portion setting forth the plans of the administering authorities to establish some sort of joint body of representatives of the two Togolands and also the suggestion that the Consultative Commission had no further role to play in the future. The United States believed, however, that the joint body mentioned in the memorandum which we understand is to be called a Joint Council, should be strengthened, and that the Trusteeship Council should urge that its advisory powers should be increased so as to include matters relating to political and also educational development. Ambassador Sayre stated that he did not know whether or not the British and French intend to submit a resolution to the Council on the Ewe question, but that if they did, we hoped that Argentina would join us in submitting an amendment broadening the powers of the Joint Council along the foregoing lines. We also hoped that if the French and British did not introduce a resolution, Argentina would join us in submitting a proposal to the Council along the same lines.

Dr. Munoz replied that his Delegation might wish for the record to vote for more extreme proposals which Mr. Khalidy might submit even though it realized that such proposals had little chance of passage. Mr. Sayre replied that he had talked to Mr. Khalidy about the Anglo-French memorandum and that Mr. Sayre judged from what the latter had indicated that he did not expect to present an Iraqi proposal to the Council. Mr. Khalidy had said that while he did not feel that he could co-sponsor a resolution with the United States along the lines which Ambassador Sayre had already described, he would not oppose such a resolution but would abstain if such a resolution was put to the vote. Mr. Sayre said that he considered his proposal as a liberalization of the conservative Anglo-French position and he hoped the Argentines would come along with us in this effort. After further conversation Dr. Munoz stated that upon further consideration he thought that the Argentine Delegation might be able to associate itself with the United States in introducing the United States proposals. He promised to take the question up with the Argentine Government and to let us know definitely within two days if possible. In answer to Mr. Sayre's question, he added that in his message to the Argentine Government he would recommend to his Government that they join with the United States in sponsoring the Resolution.

CONFIDENTIAL [NEW YORK,] July 17, 1951.

Subject: The Ewe Question

Participants: Mr. Awni Khalidy, Iraqi Delegation
Mr. J. Jefferson Jones, III, United States Delegation

Mr. Khalidy stopped me just outside the Trusteeship Council chamber to discuss the Ewe question. He reiterated his reservations to Council action along the lines the United States had in mind. He went into considerable lengths in his argument that the United States should support a resolution along the lines of the draft which he had given us. He said that he would be perfectly willing to give the administering authorities another chance and to authorize them to submit to the Council definitive proposals for settlement of the question at the next session of the Council. He also said that unless the administering authorities were confronted with a Council demand for action, they would let the question drag on interminably.

Mr. Khalidy said that he would like to bring to the attention of the United States Delegation his firm view that, unless some definitive progress was made toward solving this problem, there would be an "eruption of violence" in the Ewe areas. He referred to the New York Times news article of recent date regarding rioting in the Gold Coast and French Togoland and said this was merely a foretaste of what would happen unless concrete steps were taken at once to work towards a settlement of the problem.

Mr. Khalidy said that he thought that the United States was deeply concerned in the problem for two reasons: (1) In case of another world war, it was likely that the Mediterranean Sea would be closed to the free world in the same way that it was during the last war. If this proved to be true, western Africa would become vital to the Western nations in their communications with the East. Consequently, it behooves us to attempt to win the sympathetic understanding of those peoples who would probably control that area of Africa within the next several years. (2) Unless progress was made in solving the Ewe problem, there would inevitably be a tendency on the part of the Ewe people to fall under the domination of more extremist elements, particularly the Communists. Mr. Khalidy thought that for this reason, if for no other, the United States would wish to follow a policy which would retain the friendship of the Ewes.

In my reply to Mr. Khalidy, I advanced again the reasons which form the basis of the United States attitude with respect to Trusteeship Council consideration of the Ewe problem. I took advantage of the occasion to ask Mr. Khalidy to clarify the statement which he had previously made to me with respect to the possibility that he might be able to vote for the United States resolution rather than abstain. He replied that if the United States resolution, as finally presented, contained a sufficient number of his ideas, he might be able to vote for the resolution as a whole although abstain on certain paragraphs. I pointed out the difficulty in the way of amalgamating the views of the two delegations in one resolution, and particularly the fact that such a resolution would "go in two directions at once". I said, however, that we should be glad, of course, to give consideration to his suggestion.

Subject: The Ewe Question

Participants: H. R. H. Prince Wan Waithayakon, Thailand Delegation
Ambassador Francis B. Sayre, United States Delegation
Mr. J. Jefferson Jones, III, United States Delegation

Ambassador Sayre said to Prince Wan that he had requested him to lunch with him in order that they might take counsel together as to what would be the most constructive action the Trusteeship Council could take with respect to the Ewe question. Ambassador Sayre stated that the United States Delegation thought that the Anglo-French memorandum on the Ewe question submitted to the Council contained some suggestions which were worthy of careful consideration. For example, we thought that the idea advanced in the memorandum of establishing a joint body, or joint council, composed of representatives of the two Togolands was a good one. We thought, however, that the joint council should be strengthened in that it should be empowered to advise the two administering authorities with respect to educational and political matters as well as social and economic matters. Ambassador Sayre gave to Prince Wan a copy of the resolution embodying the United States views on constructive Council action and said that he hoped that, if Prince Wan agreed with these views, he would be able to join with the United States, and possibly some of the other members of the Council, in co-sponsoring a resolution along these lines.[1]

Prince Wan stated that he agreed with Ambassador Sayre's view that there was no permanent solution of the Ewe unification problem which could be effected at this time that would obtain the approval of the majority of the inhabitants of the two trust territories. Prince Wan thought that the idea of a joint commission was a practical one. He cited the collaboration which had taken place between Indo-China and Thailand as an example of what might be accomplished by the establishment of a joint Togoland council with respect to the solution of frontier problems. After reading the draft resolution, he noted with approval the provision in the resolution recommending that the scope of responsibilities of the proposed joint council be broadened to include the giving of advice on political, economic, social, educational, and cultural development matters. He indicated that he thought that the Thailand Delegation would be able to co-sponsor a resolution along these lines with the United States.

117. TC—Ewe question. As authorized Deptel 38, July 18, 1951, we have consulted almost all TC members regarding our draft resolution on Ewe question.

Our discussions British and French dels have convinced us they are pleased and gratified with resolution. French, however, would prefer deletion para 8 resolution recommending to administering authorities that method determining composition joint council be such as ensure, if possible, participation major groups in two territories. Real basis French objection this provision is their wish prevent any onus for failure Ewe unification groups participate joint council, if such proves to be case, from falling on shoulders of two administering powers. We believe para 8 should not be dropped and, if any change made, it be somewhat strengthened, possibly along lines suggested by Bunche (see Sayre–Bunche memo of conversation, July 18, 1951 [1]). Basis for foregoing view is our belief that non-administering members, who we hope will co-sponsor resolution with us, would react adversely deletion this para and our own feeling administering authorities should not be placed in position enable them avoid all responsibility in case Ewe unification groups refuse participate joint council.

Australians, although authorized co-sponsor resolution present form, would prefer somewhat weaker resolution. New Zealanders first reaction as strongly set forth Sir Carl Berendsen, is that adoption our resolution will not prove step forward in solution of problem as unification groups will refuse participate joint council.

With respect non-administering powers, Dept aware Iraq reversal of opinion on resolution and its present view council should not in any manner endorse proposals contained in Anglo-French memo but should express regret at British and French failure submit constructive proposals settle problem in five years it has been before TC and calling upon two governments submit further proposals next session TC. Khalidy (Iraq) has informed us he will abstain our resolution and we fear abstention his part will lessen chances unification groups will accept Anglo-French proposals. Argentine, Dominican Republic, Thailand reps have indicated willingness co-sponsor resolution with us, but Argentinian co-sponsorship contingent upon favorable instructions Buenos Aires.

We believe nature of clarifying statements made by British and French at TC debate on problem is of utmost importance and might be determining factor in crystallizing attitude towards Anglo-French proposals non administering members TC, political groups in Togoland, and also non administering members fourth comite next GA. We therefore believe British and French should be urged make clear their statements during council debate their intention that proposed joint council will be a strong body, and that its advice will be given serious and sympathetic consideration. Two specific points which arise re British-French statements in council debate follow: (1) We consider it important that British-French indicate before end of debate their willingness empower joint council deal with political development matters. Khalidy (Iraq) for example, feels such action by British and French would be most desirable (2) It would also be most helpful if British and French could give satisfactory assurances in debate that method of selection members of joint council will be such as to provide unification groups with fair and reasonable opportunity secure proportionate share of seats. We believe British and French should be approached before debate begins especially re last point above as our conversations these reps have indicated they, and particularly French, have in mind method of appointment mem-

Editorial Note

On July 23 and July 24 the Trusteeship Council received and discussed the joint Anglo-French draft resolution (Doc. T/L.212), and the amendment to the draft submitted concurrently by the Dominican Republic, Thailand, and the United States (Doc. T/L. 213). The Council on July 24 adopted the amendment, in turn amended in two places by Argentine motion; and then proceeded to adopt the joint Anglo-French draft resolution as amended. In support of the three-power amendment, the United States Representative (Sayre) made a strong statement on July 24 explaining that the United States "was deeply concerned with the problem of the Ewes and of the peoples of the two Togolands" and that this Government was convinced that the powers of the new proposed Joint Council should be broadened to include "all questions of common concern to the inhabitants of both Territories" (that is, political as well as economic and social questions). For the proceedings of the Trusteeship Council on this matter, see TC (IX), 379th meeting, page 296, and TC (IX), 380th meeting, pages 297–304.

II. CONSULTATIONS ON DEPENDENT AREA QUESTIONS WITH NON-ADMINISTERING MEMBERS OF THE UNITED NATIONS

ODA Files, Lot 62 D 228

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Dependent Area Affairs (Gerig) to the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] March 29, 1951.

Subject: Consultations on Dependent Area Questions with Non-Administering Powers

Problem

The problem is to determine whether and in what form it would be advisable and practicable to consult with non-administering Members of the United Nations on dependent area questions prior to the next session of the General Assembly, having regard to the successful results of our consultations last year with administering Members.

Recommendations

It is recommended that:

1. Consultations be initiated with as many as possible of the non-administering countries, with the exception of the Soviet bloc, and that priority be given to certain key non-administering countries.
2. With the exception of certain European countries, all consultations be on a bilateral basis.
3. The consultations be held in Washington, on an informal basis, and generally at the Office Director level.
4. The attached outline of suggested topics be submitted to the various Governments invited to consult at the time the invitation is extended, with the understanding that the consultations will be sufficiently flexible to permit discussion of such other dependent area questions as they or we may wish to raise.[1]
5. The objective of the consultations be a frank and informal exchange of views on general dependent area questions arising in the United Nations, but that specific questions be discussed as appropriate with particular countries.
6. During the course of the consultations the attached aide-mémoire be handed to the representative concerned for transmission to his Government, if he deems such action desirable.[2]

Discussion

1. The path of the United States Delegation to the General Assembly would undoubtedly be smoothed by as great a degree of consultation with the non-administering powers as is practicable, particularly since such countries know that the United States has already held similar conversations with certain administering powers. It might be held that an unfavorable impression would be created if the United States arranged wide-spread discussions with a large number of countries on what is primarily a United Nations matter, particularly if publicity is given to the discussions. Such a view does not appear to be valid, particularly if the discussions are held on an informal basis and it is emphasized that they are merely one aspect of the continuous consultation carried on by the United States with other United Nations Members on United Nations questions. Stress could be given to our belief that such consultations would provide an occasion for a mutually profitable exchange of views, affording each an opportunity to explain the basic motivations and objectives. Publicity of course should be limited to the minimum.

The major obstacle in the way of arranging consultations with all the non-administering countries, except the Soviet bloc, is the physical difficulty of completing the discussions in the time available before the next General Assembly session. The physical difficulty would be decreased, however, if consultations were initiated in the near future and, in the majority of cases, were limited to a brief discussion of selected dependent area questions arising in the United Nations. It is anticipated that the duration of the majority of the discussions would be about two hours. It is possible that some of the non-administering countries might not wish to enter into consultations, and the attitude of the countries should of course, be ascertained informally before the invitation is extended.

[2] Not printed; but see Department of State memorandum (transmitted to the Embassy of Pakistan), dated August 29, p. 612. The final form of the memorandum was substantially the same as initial drafts, with the exception of revisions necessitated to bring the memorandum up-to-date by taking into account developments that had occurred since drafting began in March.

2. In general it is believed that bilateral discussions are preferable and would be more effective than multilateral discussions because representatives of the non-administering powers would probably speak more frankly in bilateral discussions, and would appreciate an invitation to participate in such discussions on an equal basis with the United States.

Nevertheless, there appears to be no objection to arranging consultation on a multilateral basis with some of the European non-administering powers such as Norway, Sweden, Luxembourg, and Iceland.

3. It would be extremely difficult to hold discussions with a large number of countries prior to the next session of the General Assembly either in the capital of the particular country or in New York. Neither the Assistant Secretary or the Deputy Assistant Secretary is likely to have the time to participate in discussions with a large number of non-administering countries. Moreover, the holding of discussions on the Office Director level, or perhaps in some instances at a lower level, would have the effect of making the discussions more informal. In some cases, however, such as the Philippines, it might be desirable to have the Assistant Secretary or Deputy Assistant Secretary head the United States group. The participation of the geographic office concerned would be assumed.

4. The submission of an outline of suggested topics would be of value in that it would not only clarify, to the Government invited to enter into discussion, the scope and objectives of the consultation, but would also afford it an opportunity to prepare for discussion of the matters listed as well as related questions in which it might have a particular interest.

5. The primary objective of the consultations would be to obtain as wide an understanding and as full an acceptance as possible of the views of the United States on United Nations treatment of dependent area questions. Consequently, it is believed that the discussion should deal mainly with the broad subject of United Nations consideration of questions involving trust and other non-self-governing territories. It would also appear desirable to include some particular questions which are likely to come to the fore in the next session of the General Assembly.

6. It would seem helpful, both to this Government and to the various governments consulted, to hand to the representatives of the latter during the course of the consultation an aide-memoire summarizing the views of the United States on the various items on the outline of suggested topics. This would assist in ensuring that our views are fully, accurately, and uniformly reported to each government concerned.

Editorial Note

In the subsequent weeks, there was discussion within the Department on the Gerig proposal (which was submitted on an official basis by the Bureau of United Nations Affairs). Concerned officers of the Bureau of European Affairs, specifically within the Office of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs, reacted guardedly; and in the end the plan seems not to have been applied to that area. On the proposal of the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs the discussions with the Latin American countries were held in the field rather than in Washington; this procedure led to a great deal of memorandum writing in the Department before instructions were sent out to the Embassies in that area, mainly in September. Conversations with countries within the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs were held as proposed in Washington, in August and September. In October the Washington discussions were extended to include China, the Philippines, and Thailand. Subjects discussed corresponded to those in the list printed infra. The memorandum handed to the foreign representatives in Washington and the Foreign Ministries in the American Republics was the same, mutatis mutandis; for text, see page 612. Pertinent documentation is found in Department of State decimal country files; in files 320, 320.14, 350, and 700.022; and in ODA Files, Lots 60 D 152 and 62 D 228 (working files of the Office of Dependent Area Affairs). Documentation is located also in the files of the United States Mission to the United Nations.

MEMORANDUM [2]

Mindful of their own colonial origin and their successful struggle for independence, the people of the United States have always maintained an attitude of sympathetic understanding towards dependent peoples striving for their freedom. In consonance with this attitude, the United States Government favors the progressive development of all dependent peoples towards the goals of self-government and, where conditions are suitable, of independence. It is believed that these views are shared by the Government and the people of Pakistan.

The application of the principle enunciated above will obviously vary in accordance with the conditions prevailing in each territory, particularly the adequacy of resources for the social and economic development of the people as well as their degree of political maturity. The general principle that too great political or economic fragmentation is undesirable should also be kept in mind.

It is the policy of the United States to support firmly the provisions of the United Nations Charter dealing with questions of dependent peoples. This Government believes that the United Nations has made, and will continue to make, noteworthy contributions to the political, economic, social, and educational progress of peoples of dependent areas. The United States welcomes the freest exchange of points of view in the United Nations and believes that the administering and non-administering Members alike can benefit from frank discussion conducted in a helpful and scientific spirit. The development of sharp cleavages between administering and non-administering Members would limit the ability of the United Nations to contribute to the welfare of non-self-governing peoples as well as operate to the advantage of the Soviet Union and its satellites. The scientific approach has, fortunately, become more evident in recent meetings of United Nations organs and committees. The United States welcomes this encouraging trend.

[2] As noted in the editorial note, p. 610, this was one of 15 or so memoranda handed to as many foreign diplomatic representatives in Washington mainly in September. As it is printed as a model, there is accordingly no special significance attached to the selection of Pakistan here as the recipient government.

Copies of the memorandum, together with the list of topics for consultation (supra) and the record of the conversation that took place (none printed), were subsequently transmitted by the Department under cover of an instruction to the U.S. diplomatic mission in the country concerned for appropriate discussion with the local Foreign Ministry. This correspondence is located in the central indexed files of the Department of State, files 350 and 700.021.

As the Government of Pakistan has been informed, the United States initiated discussions on dependent area questions prior to the last session of the General Assembly with representatives of some of the administering powers. It believes that these conversations were fruitful and that they resulted in a greater realization, on the part of the Governments participating, of the growing interest of all Members of the United Nations in the welfare and advancement of the dependent peoples, a realization which was reflected in more positive cooperation by these Governments in United Nations bodies dealing with dependent area questions.

RELATIONSHIP OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY (COMMITTEE FOUR) TO THE TRUSTEESHIP COUNCIL AND THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION TRANSMITTED UNDER ARTICLE 73(E) OF THE CHARTER

The United States believes that it is important to differentiate clearly between the functions of Committee Four of the General Assembly on the one hand and the functions of the Trusteeship Council and of the Special Committee on Information Transmitted under Article 73(e) on the other. The United States believes that there should be a proper distribution of functions and that the Fourth Committee should generally be regarded as the organ of the United Nations which deals with developments in trust and other non-self-governing territories in their broader aspects.

In contrast to the Fourth Committee, the Trusteeship Council, though operating under the authority of the Assembly, is a body of "specially qualified persons" established by the Charter for the purpose of reviewing in detail and on a continuing basis, political, economic, social, and educational conditions in the territories placed under the international trusteeship system. The United States considers that, generally speaking, the Fourth Committee should function primarily as a reviewing body and not as a rule make detailed recommendations on specific questions involving individual trust territories. On the other hand, the General Assembly, as the organ representing the views of all Members of the United Nations, may usefully bring to the attention of the Trusteeship Council general problems which, in its view, are of such importance as to merit consideration by the Council in relation to conditions in the trust territories or the operation of the trusteeship system, setting forth at the same time to the Trusteeship Council, if circumstances warrant, its own general views on the subject. The Trusteeship Council in its deliberations should, of course, be mindful of the views of the General Assembly.

Similarly, the Special Committee on Information Transmitted under Article 73(e), although it is a temporary body with powers and functions which differentiate it from the Trusteeship Council, might best function as a body of specially qualified persons. As a result of its smaller membership and of the practice of including technical advisers in delegations, the Special Committee would seem better constituted than the Fourth Committee to give such detailed and expert consideration as is necessary to difficult problems of the non-self-governing territories. The United States believes that the studies and recommendations of the Special Committee have been of great value and assistance to the General Assembly.

The views of the Government of Pakistan as to the relationship of the General Assembly to the Trusteeship Council and to the Special Committee would be appreciated.

THE FUNCTIONING OF THE TRUSTEESHIP COUNCIL

The United States considers that the Trusteeship Council as an organ exercising supervisory functions in connection with the international trusteeship system is effectively fulfilling the functions assigned to it in the Charter, and that it has already made a significant contribution to the advancement of non-self-governing peoples. In connection with the administration of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands this Government will continue to give the most careful consideration to the observations and recommendations of the Council.

The United States believes, moreover, that the Trusteeship Council might be made an even more effective forum for a constructive interchange of ideas relating to the administration of the peoples under the international trusteeship system. The administering Members of the Council can manifestly benefit from such an exchange of ideas with all Members of the Trusteeship Council and can contribute on the basis of their particular experience in the administration of the trust territories and other territories for which they are responsible. The non-administering Members of the Council can contribute much of value to such Council discussions on the basis of the experience which they may have had in dealing with comparable economic and social problems in their own countries. The United States hopes that this useful aspect of the Council's work will be further developed in the future.

It is recognized that apart from the Soviet Union, Members of the Trusteeship Council have not sought to use the Council for propaganda purposes. With the exception noted, both the administering and the non-administering Members of the Council have participated constructively in the work of the Council in its consideration of the complex problems arising in the administration of the trust territories. The United States is convinced that the maintenance of an atmosphere of cooperation in the Council is essential to the steady advancement toward the objectives of the trusteeship system; for only on the basis of such cooperation can the full potentialities of the Trusteeship Council to contribute to progress of the peoples of the trust territories be realized.

THE FUNCTIONING OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION TRANSMITTED UNDER ARTICLE 73 (E) OF THE CHARTER

The attitude of the Government of the United States toward the Special Committee on Information Transmitted under Article 73(e) is based on its conviction that the United Nations should make a positive and constructive contribution to the welfare and development of non-self-governing territories, at the same time fully respecting the distinction clearly laid down in the Charter itself between the functions of the United Nations with respect to the trust territories and the other non-self-governing territories.

The original vote of the United States against the establishment of the Special Committee in 1946 was based not on a belief that the General Assembly could not legally establish such a body but on doubts as to whether a committee of political representatives was the best type of mechanism to consider the technical data transmitted under Article 73(e). In an effort to obtain an adequate test, the United States supported the continuation of the Special Committee on a year-to-year basis in 1947 and 1948, and in 1949 sponsored a proposal for the continuation of the Committee for a three-year period. This Government has not sought to confine the Committee to a purely procedural role but has, on the contrary, supported the right of the Committee to make recommendations in the economic, social, and educational fields, provided these did not relate to individual administering Members or to particular territories. The United States also co-sponsored with Mexico in 1949 a proposal that the Special Committee give particular consideration each year to one of the three fields within its terms of reference without neglecting the other two. The United States considers that the 1950 session of the Committee was a constructive one.

The Government of the United States hopes that the Government of Pakistan will share its view that considerable credit for the success of the 1950 session of the Special Committee should go to those administering Members who, in spite of their misgivings about the legality of the Special Committee and of the appropriateness of the functions assigned to it by the General Assembly, participated helpfully along with the non-administering Members in its work at that session. Since the effectiveness of the recommendations of the United Nations is directly related to the spirit with which they are applied in the territories by the administering authorities, the United States attaches the greatest importance to the willing cooperation of such Members in the work of the Special Committee and Committee Four.

The United States hopes that the harmonious atmosphere of the 1950 session of the Special Committee will continue during the 1951 session and believes that, barring unforeseen circumstances, it would not be desirable to modify the existing functions of the Special Committee during the present trial period. Valuable contributions were made by non-administering Members of the Committee to the Special Report on Education and the United States feels certain that they will make a similarly valuable contribution to the discussion of economic conditions and development in the non-self-governing territories to be undertaken in the forthcoming session. The United States on its part will cooperate to the best of its ability to achieve this objective.

SPECIFIC QUESTIONS

1. South West Africa

As the Government of Pakistan is aware, the General Assembly, at its Fifth Session, established a committee of five to confer with the Union of South Africa concerning the procedural measures necessary for implementing the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice on the question of South West Africa. This Committee has held an exchange of views with representatives of the Union Government. While consultations are not yet completed, the Union's views have been heard and a draft agreement embodying procedural measures considered necessary by the Committee for implementing the Court's opinion has been submitted to the Union Representatives. The United States, as a sponsor of the resolution establishing the Committee, and as a member of the Committee, has exerted, and will continue to exert, every effort to work towards a satisfactory solution of this difficult problem, and considers that the Committee has taken a useful forward step.

The United States, in its participation in the work of the Committee, has been guided by the belief that means should be found for implementing the opinion of the Court, as well as by its recognition that an attempt should be made to find such means in cooperation with the Government of the Union of South Africa. The process undertaken by the Committee of exploring carefully with the Union Government various procedures for implementing the Court's opinion seems at this stage to be the best means of protecting the interests of the inhabitants of South West Africa. While opinions must be somewhat tentative until the Committee has made its report, the views of the Government of Pakistan on this question would be welcomed.

2. Italian Participation in the Trusteeship Council

It will be recalled that the approval by the Fifth General Assembly of the Trusteeship Agreement for Somaliland under Italian administration required the Trusteeship Council to work out the necessary arrangements for the participation of Italy in the work of the Council. Special arrangements were necessitated by virtue of the fact that Italy is not yet a Member of the United Nations.

The Trusteeship Council at its Eighth Session gave attention to this question and, in the opinion of the United States, made provision for the participation of Italy in the Council's work in the fullest degree compatible with the provisions of the United Nations Charter. Rules of procedure were adopted enabling the representative of Italy to be seated at all times during the sessions of the Council and providing for participation by Italy, without vote, in the deliberations of the Council relating to Somaliland and to general questions relating to the operation of the international trusteeship system. The right to vote was specifically excepted, since Articles 86 and 89 of the Charter of the United Nations make clear that membership in the Trusteeship Council is limited to Members of the United Nations and that the right to vote in the Council is accorded only to Members. Representatives of Italy participated effectively in the Ninth Session of the Council in accordance with the above-mentioned rules of procedure.

The Trusteeship Council, taking into consideration the strong desire of the Government of Italy to be empowered to vote in the Trusteeship Council, adopted a resolution by a vote of 9–1–2 requesting the General Assembly to include in the agenda of its Sixth Regular Session the question of "the full participation of Italy in the work of the Trusteeship Council".

The United States considers that Italy could acquire the right to vote in the Trusteeship Council only through admission to membership in the United Nations or through special amendment to Article 86 of the Charter. The United States has supported and will continue to support the admission of Italy to membership in the United Nations. The Government of Pakistan is familiar with the consideration of this question in the United Nations. In the view of the United States, the adoption of an amendment to Article 86 of the Charter would be at least as difficult to achieve as the admission of Italy to membership, since an amendment would also require approval by all permanent Members of the Security Council. Moreover, it would appear to be far less satisfactory to Italy. The views of the Government of Pakistan on any aspect of this question would be welcomed.

3. General Assembly Consideration of Trusteeship Council Procedures

The Government of Pakistan will recall that consideration by the Fifth General Assembly of the procedures of the Trusteeship Council resulted in three resolutions: General Procedures of the Trusteeship Council, Organization and Methods of Functioning of Visiting Missions, and Examination of Petitions. Although the United States voted for these resolutions in the plenary session of the Assembly, this Government has some misgivings lest the feeling become widespread that the General Assembly should give the Trusteeship Council specific directives regarding the Council's rules of procedure.

The United States recognizes that under Article 87 of the Charter the Trusteeship Council takes actions under the authority of the General Assembly. The General Assembly, therefore, has not only the right but the duty to consider the results attained by the Council in taking those actions. On the other hand, the provisions of Article 7 of the Charter clearly designate the Council as a principal organ of the United Nations, and Article 90 provides that the Council shall adopt its own rules of procedure.

Moreover, since the functions of the Trusteeship Council are of a special character, the United States believes that the Council, on the basis of its own experience, is the body best qualified to develop the rules of procedure necessary for the most effective accomplishment of its work.

As a Member of the Trusteeship Council, the United States is of course continually endeavoring to improve the procedures of the Trusteeship Council and believes that the Council should take fully into account any suggestions made in the Assembly which might improve the Council's work. It is in this sense that the United States supported actions in the Trusteeship Council at its Ninth Session pursuant to the three above-mentioned General Assembly resolutions on procedures. While the Council did not complete its review of its procedures at that session, the United States considers that several improvements were made, and it will continue to urge such further improvements as in its view appear to be necessary in the light of the Council's experience. The Government of the United States would be glad to have the views of the Government of Pakistan on this question.

4. The Transmission of Political Information Under Article 73(e)

The United States is of the opinion that the specific language of Article 73(e) was intended to exclude any obligation on the part of administering Members to transmit political information on non-self-governing territories. Hence, the United States has voted against resolutions stating or implying that the transmission of such information is required. As the Government of Pakistan is aware, however, the United States believes that the transmission of political information is desirable and has from the beginning voluntarily transmitted such information under the appropriate rubric of the Standard Form. Furthermore, the United States has supported resolutions of the General Assembly inviting administering Members to transmit political information voluntarily. It believes that this is a more appropriate and constructive approach to the problem than an attempt to require the submission of such information.

5. The Question of "The Factors Which Should Be Taken Into Account In Deciding Whether a Territory Is Or Is Not a Territory Whose Peoples Have Not Yet Achieved a Full Measure of Self-Government"

The United States considers that this question, which the General Assembly assigned to the Special Committee for study and which will be on the agenda of the 1951 session, presents great difficulties. The problem is manifestly complex not only because of the bewildering variety of political relations between territories and their respective administering Members but also because of the rapidity with which these relationships are evolving. However, the United States believes that a consideration of this question is within the competence of the General Assembly and of the Special Committee and wishes to participate as helpfully as possible in the discussion.

6. The Ewe and Togoland Unification Questions

As the Government of Pakistan is aware, the General Assembly by its resolution of December 2, 1950, on the Ewe problem, requested the Trusteeship Council to devote a special chapter or sub-chapter of its next annual report to setting forth all steps undertaken in connection with the Ewe question. It is not proposed to outline these steps in this memorandum; however, occasion is taken to point out the continuing concern of the United States that solutions to the complex problems raised by the Ewe petitions be found. In the view of the United States it is not possible at this stage to arrive at a single solution which would have the adherence of all major groups in the two Togolands. It is largely for this reason that the United States, in the Ninth Session of the Trusteeship Council, took the position that a useful step forward could be accomplished by the establishment of a Joint Council composed of representatives of the two territories to advise the two administering authorities on matters of common concern.

It is now the view of the United States that every effort should be made to set up the new Joint Council in a manner which will obtain the participation of all major groups in the two territories and that the new body should be given a fair and reasonable opportunity to prove its effectiveness as a means whereby the inhabitants of both Togolands can influence developments in which they have a common concern. If the foregoing conditions are fulfilled, it should be possible, as contemplated in the resolution adopted by the Trusteeship Council on July 24, 1951, for the 1952 United Nations Visiting Mission to West Africa to form an evaluation of its accomplishments. Slow though such a process may be, it is the most feasible one, in the opinion of the United States, which can be undertaken at present in order to avoid the possibility of doing serious harm to the interests of important groups in the territories. The United States would be very much interested in the views of the Government of Pakistan on this question.

The United States Government will appreciate any further views on the questions discussed in this memorandum which the Government of Pakistan may wish to express, as well as its views on other questions in the field of non-self-governing territories which are likely to come before the next session of the General Assembly.

Memorandum by the Deputy Director of the Office of Dependent Area Affairs (Jones) to the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] November 20, 1951.

DISCUSSIONS ON DEPENDENT AREA AFFAIRS WITH NON-ADMINISTERING COUNTRIES

I refer to Mr. Gerig's memorandum of June 11, 1951,[1] which you approved, setting forth the plans for holding discussions on dependent area affairs with non-administering members of the United Nations. UND, assisted by appropriate officers from the geographical bureaus, has now held discussions with representatives of the missions of all NEA countries with the exception of Ethiopia. Discussions were also held with representatives of the missions of China, Thailand and the Philippines. It was not found possible to arrange to hold discussions with the Burmese and Indonesians because of the imminence of the opening of the General Assembly at the time the missions of these countries were invited to consult. Copies of the memorandum setting forth United States views, however, were transmitted to the missions of these two countries. As you are aware, it was decided to hold the consultations with a majority of ARA countries in the field and despatches from our missions indicate that most of these discussions have now been held.

I consider that the discussions were successful and that they resulted in a greater appreciation on the part of the representatives of the participating governments of the United States positions with respect to the consideration of dependent area questions by the United Nations. I am not certain, however, that the favorable outcome of the discussions will counter the intensification of the anti-colonial trend which will undoubtedly result from the raising of the Moroccan question[2] and other recent developments in the Middle East. Consequently, I fear that the general atmosphere in the Fourth Committee will not appear to have been altered substantially as the result of the non-administering talks.

There is attached a report summarizing briefly the views set forth by the non-administering representatives on the more important subjects discussed. As would be expected, it was the consensus of the majority of the representatives that the progress of dependent peoples towards self-government or independence was too slow and should be accelerated. One point which emerged during most of the conversations in which I participated impressed me greatly: the non-administering powers made a clear distinction between the United States and the other administering powers. While their statements along these lines must be discounted to a certain degree, I am still convinced that the non-administering powers do not consider the United States as motivated by the same considerations in the colonial field as the other administering powers.

[1] Not printed.

[2] For documentation regarding the Moroccan question at the Sixth General Assembly, see pp. 135 ff.

I think that we should give consideration to the advisability of carrying out similar consultations prior to the 1952 meeting of the General Assembly. If this suggestion is adopted, I strongly recommend that the invitations to consult be transmitted at a sufficiently early date to permit the missions here in Washington to obtain the views of their governments on the topics to be discussed. It was unfortunate, in my opinion, that in the consultations which we carried out this year the great majority of the representatives stated that they had not had time to obtain the views of their government and that, consequently, it should be understood that they were expressing only their personal views.

[Enclosure]

Summary of Colonial Talks With Non-Administering Powers of the UN

In an attempt to summarize the views expressed by representatives of the non-administering members of the UN in the Colonial Policy Talks, several factors must be kept in mind. In some cases the representatives who were called in were unprepared to state the official views of their governments on the topics discussed. They were also unprepared through lack of background knowledge to set forth even their personal views on some questions. It is believed that in those cases where unofficial views were expressed there will not be too wide a divergence with the official attitudes and positions of the respective governments.

In many cases it is noted that the area of agreement stated with respect to the United States position is more apparent than real. It is believed that this is especially true with respect to the Latin American countries, with whom talks were held in the field.

Keeping these considerations in mind, we have made an attempt to summarize the talks by cataloging those positive points which were made during the talks and which reflect an attitude somewhat different than the United States position. Absence of a country from the list of those who maintained a certain position does not necessarily imply agreement by that nation with the United States position. Reticence and the often resulting apparent agreement might be caused by lack of instruction, background knowledge, or both.

GENERAL QUESTIONS

The most persistent theme in the discussions with non-administering states on colonial problems was that the achievement by non-self-governing peoples of independence or self-government should be expedited. In a few cases the suggestion was advanced that a timetable be set up for the achievement of these objectives (Syria, Saudi Arabia and Thailand).

The Representative of Pakistan expressed his belief that the prestige of the UN was diminishing because of many compromise solutions reached by the General Assembly and the failure of that body to take a clear-cut stand based on the right or wrong of any given issue. His evaluation of the British and French colonial administrations is worth noting: whereas in the colonies French administration was superior because of the absence of discrimination, the French government in the Metropole, unlike the British government, was bad because of its lack of organization and fixed responsibility.

The Liberian Representative was critical of the lack of training in self-government given by the Administering Members to their African colonials.

The Representative of India expressed the view that the inhabitants of trust territories could be made more aware of their special status.

In response to a statement that the Trusteeship Council was functioning effectively, the Indian Representative pointed to the growing tendency of the General Assembly to assume the functions of other UN bodies which were not functioning effectively. The "Uniting For Peace" resolution was cited as an example.

SOUTH WEST AFRICA

The opinion that the General Assembly should take a firm stand on this question was expressed by the Representatives of Pakistan, Afghanistan, the Philippines and Cuba. The Pakistani Representative thought that the primary short-range problem of the UN in the field of dependent area affairs was to prevail upon the Union of South Africa to submit reports.

ITALIAN PARTICIPATION

The Pakistani Representative thought it wrong to assign any administrative functions in Africa to Italy. The Representative of Syria expressed the same opinion based on the belief that Italy's colonial attitude had not changed. The Indian Representative believed that the only solution for Italian participation lay in agreement by the Members of the Security Council on the whole question of Membership.

TRUSTEESHIP COUNCIL PROCEDURES

The Representative of Saudi Arabia thought it would be unwise to attempt to restrict General Assembly discussion of Trusteeship Council procedures. The officer of the Cuban Foreign Office with whom the discussions were held emphasized the broad powers of discussion available to the General Assembly.

TRANSMISSION OF POLITICAL INFORMATION

The Representatives of Saudi Arabia, China and Uruguay while recognizing that the Charter did not specifically require the submission of political information on the non-self-governing territories thought that it would be desirable for Administering Members to submit such information voluntarily. The Representative of Saudi Arabia suggested that the United States urge other Administering Members to follow its example in submitting this information.

FACTORS WHICH SHOULD BE TAKEN INTO ACCOUNT IN DECIDING IF A TERRITORY IS OR IS NOT A TERRITORY WHOSE PEOPLE HAVE NOT YET ATTAINED A FULL MEASURE OF SELF-GOVERNMENT

The Representatives of the Arab States almost without exception expressed the view that it was not desirable to establish criteria of too restrictive a nature in determining if a territory is ready for self-government or independence. For example, the Iraqi Representative maintained that lack of political and economic development should not be given too much emphasis in determining whether colonial peoples were ready for self-government.

One of the arguments most frequently advanced against the establishment of criteria of too restrictive a nature, was that in many independent countries the level of social, economic and educational advancement was low. One Arab Representative compared the stage of development in the independent country of Yemen with that of Morocco, and concluded that, since Yemen was independent, Morocco which was much more advanced was also entitled to independence.

The Representative of Lebanon did not believe that the final determination of whether or not a territory is self-governning should be left exclusively to the Administering Member concerned. The Indian Representative thought that before the General Assembly approved a change in status it should make certain that the wishes of the people concerned had been considered.

III. BILATERAL TALKS ON COLONIAL POLICY WITH THE UNITED KINGDOM (LONDON) AND FRANCE (PARIS), OCTOBER 1951[1]

Editorial Note

Proposals for United States–United Kingdom talks on colonial matters at the United Nations, along the lines of the 1950 Washington colonial policy discussions were broached informally by British representatives at New York on November 20, 1950 (for memorandum of conversation, see Foreign Relations, 1950, volume II, page 473); the 1951 talks would be held in London. The initial British suggestion that the talks be held in January 1951, before the eighth session of the Trusteeship Council, did not prove to be feasible; nor did subsequent entertainment of a May date. In a meeting on May 7 between the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson) and officers of the British Embassy, tentative agreement was reached on a date between late July and October; the dates were finally set at October 10 through 13. Informal discussions with the French Embassy in August and September resulted in an arrangement for United States-French talks in Paris after the London talks.

[1] For previous documentation on this subject, see Foreign Relations, 1950, vol. II, pp. 434 ff.

On July 10 an exchange took place between officers of the Department and the British Embassy regarding the proposed agenda for the talks, work on which began in the Department as early as April. In July and August work was pushed by officers of the Bureau of United Nations Affairs and the geographic bureaus on the preparation of position papers, many of which appear below.

Documentation regarding the above-described events is located in Department of State decimal files 350, 700.022, 741.022, and 751.022; and in ODA Files, Lots 60 D 512 and 62 D 228. Memoranda, position papers, and the minutes of the Paris meetings come exclusively from the lot files named, which were office working files of the Office of Dependent Area Affairs.

Discussion Brief for Bilateral Talks on Colonial Policy To Be Held at London and Paris (Agenda Items III (a) and III (b)) [1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] September 4, 1951.

Item III (a)—Appraisal of United Nations activities in the colonial field during 1950–51 in the light of the consultations on colonial policy held during July 1950

Item III (b)—Ways of improving the atmosphere in the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly

I. Problem: To appraise United Nations activities in the colonial field during 1950–51 in light of consultations on colonial policy held during 1950; to determine ways of improving atmosphere in Fourth Committee of GA.

II. Recommended United States Position:

A. We should appreciate that public opinion in various administering countries differs in its approach to dependent area problems. For example, our public opinion, because of our history, shares much of approach of non-administering Members and we recognize that opinion expressed by Australia and New Zealand is more in accord with our opinion than is that of some of other administering powers. Accordingly, we do not expect administering powers can adopt identical approaches in all cases to dependent area problems arising in UN.

B. Colonial policy talks held last year, and more positive approach taken in UN should be judged highly successful as evidenced by:

1. Improved atmosphere in Fourth Committee; and
2. Numerous favorable comments by various non-administering delegations regarding cooperative attitude shown by administering powers.

C. Policy followed in Fourth Committee last year by administering powers should be repeated and further developed during Sixth GA.

1. Our experience in Fifth GA demonstrated that it was at least partially responsible for ability of administering powers to prevent GA from adopting more extreme resolutions.
2. Moreover, seemingly uncooperative or reticent attitude also offers base for effective propaganda by Communist bloc.

D. In determining their policies with respect to UN consideration of dependent area questions we, the administering powers, should bear in mind that

1. There is among majority UN Members deep concern for welfare of dependent peoples and feeling of responsibility for accelerating their progress through UN channels as rapidly as possible;

[1] This and similar papers are not located chronologically; the arrangement is by agenda item number (see memorandum on the agreed agenda, supra).

2. We are greatly out-numbered by non-administering powers and are obliged to face opposition which is, in part, ill-informed and which contains segment of immovable and often times influential Members who are convinced that administration of dependent peoples by metropolitian powers could not be considered good under any circumstances;

3. As results of beliefs current in number non-administering countries that no colonial administration is morally defensible unless clearly desired by dependent peoples concerned, administering powers obliged to demonstrate to the world at large that interests of peoples presently dependent, as well as rest of world, can best be served by enlightened colonial administrations working towards increased self-government;

4. Our records of colonial administration are, on whole, extremely good and will stand up under scrutiny; and

5. Many non-administering powers, having experienced colonial relationship, have suggestions to make with regard dependent area administration. Some of these suggestions are worthwhile, some are subject to serious practical objections. Full exchange of views with non-administering powers, outside as well as within UN sessions, may serve to persuade non-administering powers to modify or withhold introduction of some of their proposals.

E. U.S. fully appreciates U.K.'s experience and record of achievement in dependent area field and British aversion to self-praise. However, U.S. believes situation calls for full and frank, although modest, presentation of facts of accomplishment, in order to:

1. Win friendly support of largest possible number of non-administering powers;

2. Avoid being accused of being uncooperative and hiding facts; and

3. Utilize Committee's time for constructive exchange of information and to prevent, if possible, waste of Committee's time by irresponsible and garrulous delegates, such as Cuban Delegate at last session.

F. We believe that it would be good tactics for administering powers to:

1. Commend, as appropriate, achievements of other administering powers by citing specific examples of general interest; and

2. Express constructive criticism from time to time of other administering powers which would be answered frankly and accepted without misunderstanding.

G. We are anxious that gains made in Fourth Committee during Fifth GA should be maintained and augmented during Sixth Assembly. We are convinced that only by keeping performance of UN representatives of administering powers on high standard will there be opportunity to pursue constructive policies for dependent peoples with minimum of criticism and fomenting of dissatisfaction.

Discussion Brief for Bilateral Talks on Colonial Policy To Be Held at London and Paris (Agenda Item III (c))

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] August 31, 1951.

Item III, (c)—Ways of raising the prestige of the Trusteeship Council in the opinion of members of the Fourth Committee.

I. Problem: To determine U.S. position as to methods which might be adopted by Administering Members to raise increasingly low opinion in which many Non-Administering Members hold TC.

II. Recommended United States Position:

A. U.S. not only considers it important in principle to maintain at high level prestige of TC as major UN organ, but also believes heightened prestige advantageous to Administering Members as means countering tendency on part of certain Non-Administering Members to favor extension of direct GA action in trusteeship field.

B. U.S., recognizing that psychological factors are of major importance in attitude toward TC of Non-Administering Members, considers it of vital importance that no representative of an Administering Power deprecate value of TC and Fourth Committee in conversations with Non-Administering Delegates or Members of Secretariat.

C. U.S. considers that narrow legalistic attitude by some Administering Authorities on proposals, procedural or other, made by Non-Administering Members in TC is factor contributing to low estimate of TC by Non-Administering Members of Committee Four. U.S. believes that it would be advantageous to accept them, wherever possible, in order reduce criticism of TC by Non-Administering Members in GA.

D. U.S. considers that TC activities have on whole been of benefit to U.S. administrators. For example, Visiting Missions brought to light problems in minds of inhabitants of which administration not fully aware. U.S. would like to suggest that, whenever usefulness TC activities to Administering Authorities demonstrated, latter give full and favorable publicity in TC and GA.

E. U.S. also believes it would be to advantage of Administering Members to give careful consideration to next selection new Non-Administering Members TC with view to choosing Members who will be not only responsible and effective, but also of stature to affect favorably prestige of TC among other Non-Administering Members of UN.

F. We of course realize TC is major organ of UN. Nevertheless our experience in GA has indicated that, if measures adopted in TC are out of line with general attitude of GA, there will be strong attempt in Committee Four to inquire into, and in some instances reverse, TC decisions. This fact should be kept in mind by Administering Authorities in determining their policies on issues arising in TC.

Discussion Brief for Bilateral Talks on Colonial Policy To Be Held at London and Paris (Agenda Item IV (a) 1)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] August 31, 1951.

Item IV, (a), 1: Ewe Problem

I. Problem: To determine U.S. position on the question of Ewe or Togoland unification.

II. Recommended United States Position:

A. U.S. believes Anglo-French proposal to establish Joint Council of representatives both Togolands to advise on matters common concern two territories a forward step, but is concerned lest manner of implementing this proposal provoke Ewe boycott, extreme reaction in Fourth Committee by non-administering Members, and therefore hopes U.K. and France will work out manifestly fair and reasonable procedures for selecting members Joint Council.

B. U.S. considers Joint Council of doubtful value if it fails to get adequate participation and, therefore, hopes every effort will be made to obtain participation of all major groups at each stage in establishment and functioning of Council, such participation being in our view even more important than prompt establishment of Council.

C. U.S. also considers that, whether or not it proves possible to obtain participation unification groups, steps taken by the two Administering Authorities should be such as to obtain, if possible, majority support in Fourth Committee.

D. U.S. is of opinion that successful establishment of fully representative Joint Council likely to avoid move in Fourth Committee to send special U.N. mission or investigator to examine situation on spot, especially in view plans regular U.N. Visiting Mission to go to Togolands in 1952; however, should method of establishment of Joint Council arouse widespread substantial opposition in the General Assembly, administering authorities might well be confronted with proposal for special investigation, and U.S., in these circumstances, might have to reconsider its position on this point.

Discussion Brief for Bilateral Talks on Colonial Policy To Be Held at London and Paris (Agenda Item IV (a)3 (a))

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] August 31, 1951.

Item IV [(a)] 3(a): Problems in Connection with the Definition of the Concept of "Non-Self-Governing Territory"

I. Problem: To determine position on definition by UN of term "non-self-governing". Non-administering Members support right of UN to define term, some feel GA may apply definition. Administering Members do not oppose, on principle, right of UN to define, feel task sterile, oppose UN attempt to apply to particular territory.

II. Recommended United States Position:

A. U.S. maintains each administering Member has right to determine constitutional status of any territory under its sovereignty; however, assumes all Members would wish to respect any ICJ opinion on Chapter XI.

B. U.S. does not consider interpretation of terms in Chapter XI matter wholly for unilateral determination; therefore, considers that GA, under Article 10, not exceeding authority to

1. Discuss, attempt to define this expression,
2. Recommend that administering Members consider such definition,
3. Express opinion on guiding principles in determining status of territories.

C. U.S. should urge administering Members to participate, offer constructive suggestions in Special Committee discussions of "factors to be taken into account" in determining status of any territory (Res. 334 (IV)); since

1. Further discussion this problem in UN cannot be avoided,
2. Smaller, balanced Committee best forum.

D. U.S. still considering best course for Committee to follow pursuant to Res. 334(IV):

1. We think that

a. Committee should undertake comply with invitation of GA
b. In the course of our participation in the discussion, we might point out difficulties of definition as educative process for non-administering Members.

2. We feel it would be extremely difficult, and probably politically unwise, to formulate all-inclusive definition but list of factors which should obviously be taken into account might be drawn up for consideration by GA.

E. If unacceptable definition emerges, U.S. inclines to view submission some aspects of problem to ICJ for advisory opinion might be appropriate.

Discussion Brief for Bilateral Talks on Colonial Policy To Be Held at London and Paris (Agenda Item IV (a) 3 (b))

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] August 31, 1951.

Item IV, [(a)] 3, (b)—Submission of Political Information to UN

I. Problem: To determine U.S. position on submission of political information under Article 73(e). USSR bloc demands mandatory submission; majority administering, non-administering Members support voluntary submission; U.K., Belgium oppose both; France has supported voluntary submission, reserve position in 1949.

II. Recommended United States Position:

A. U.S. maintains view that submission political information not required by Article 73(e), but itself voluntarily submits political information and hopes others will do so.

B. On use of voluntary political information, U.S. maintains

1. Terms of reference of Special Committee apply as in case of other information under Article 73(e); viz., can make general recommendations on functional fields, but not re specific territories.

2. GA competent to utilize such information in discussing general definition "non-self-governing"; but should not make recommendations on this matter on specific territories. U.S. maintains voluntary submission does not prejudice right of administering Members to determine status of their territories under Chapter XI.

C. U.S. considers that, in revision of Standard Form, provisions of Resolution 327(IV), para. 3, should be complied with. (This recommends that information on geography, history, people and human rights should cease to be classified under general category of Standard Form.)

D. U.S. believes it desirable, in principle as well as for tactical reasons, that

1. Democratic governments expound, discuss, and defend democratic institutions, and problems of their evolution, particularly in respect to areas in which they are responsible for development of such institutions.

2. Any other course invites unjustified suspicions, presuppositions and insinuations.

ODA Files, Lot 60 D 512

Discussion Brief for Bilateral Talks on Colonial Policy To Be Held at London and Paris (Agenda Item IV (a) 4)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] September 4, 1951.

Item IV, (a) 4—Administrative Unions (for talks with UK only)

I. Problem: To determine position on question of administrative unions between trust and adjacent territories with particular reference to future development of such unions in British territories. Non-administering Members view unions with suspicion, support investigation of them, desire safeguards for political identity of trust territories. So far as question of principle is concerned, administering Members, including U.S., support unions, cite provision for them in various trusteeship agreements (UK has three unions: Togo with Gold Coast; Cameroons with Nigeria; Tanganyika with Kenya–Uganda. France has none. Belgium has one: Ruanda-Urundi with Belgian Congo. Australia has one: New Guinea with Papua. U.S. has none.)

II. Recommended United States Position:

A. U.S. should maintain previous position on general question of administrative unions, i.e.:

1. U.S. aware that unions authorized under certain conditions by trusteeship agreements, believes that in certain circumstances they may have positive advantages, such as more economical administration, avoiding fragmentation, etc; cannot be condemned per se.

2. U.S. would judge each administrative union by following standards:

a. Status and identity territory should be maintained until inhabitants reach stage political maturity enabling own decision as to form of government, political associations, if any;

b. Political, social, economic, educational advancement should not be subordinated to interests any other territory;

c. Union should not prevent separate financial, statistical, other records to TC.

B. Re specific unions and their future development, U.S. will continue policy of examining operation using above standards, and

1. U.S. would be glad to know UK views on future relationship between Togoland and Gold Coast and between Cameroons and Nigeria, with particular reference to the constitutional developments in these areas. U.S. is aware that UK considers that Togo–Gold Coast and Cameroons–Nigeria are not strictly "administrative unions" but come under 5(a) of the trusteeship agreement.

2. U.S. believes that although not required, it would nevertheless be advisable to inform TC in advance of major changes involving administrative unions as matter courtesy, good tactics. With reference to the Tanganyika union, U.S. will give careful consideration to any

UK proposals for future of East Africa Central Legislative Assembly, which is presently under review.

C. U.S. believes TC's Standing Committee on Administrative Unions is functioning satisfactorily and may possibly serve to reduce agitation on this subject.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] October 8, 1951.

Item IV, (a), 5: South West Africa

I. Problem: To determine U.S. position as to further steps which might be taken with regard to the question of South West Africa.

II. Recommended United States Position:

A. U.S. continues to favor achieving agreement, consistent with advisory opinion of ICJ, with Union of South Africa on the future status of the Territory of South West Africa.

B. U.S. considers that Ad Hoc Committee on South West Africa made careful and commendable effort to achieve agreement with Union. We regret that Union was unable to accept as basis for discussion draft agreement submitted to it by Committee. We consider this draft agreement fair and reasonable; furthermore, it is doubtful if any proposal containing less than principles set forth therein could be considered to be in conformity with Court's opinion or would be approved by GA. Therefore, we hope that the Union will reconsider its stand and accept the Committee's offer of further consultations on the basis of the Committee's draft.

C. U.S., while aware of difficulties inherent in further delays on this question, considers that it would be advantageous to continue exploring possibilities with Union if the latter shows any willingness to consult further on basis of Committee's proposal; however, should Union maintain its position that it cannot accept the Committee's proposals as a basis for discussion, U.S. may be obliged to conclude no further mediatory role possible.

D. U.S. continues to be willing to examine any further suggestions as to procedures for implementing Court's opinion, and would welcome any suggestions UK [France] [1] may wish to make; however, U.S. could not support procedures which would wholly divorce GA from supervisory machinery.

E. U.S. willing as one of remaining Principal Allied and Associated Powers to be one of contracting parties to an agreement such as that proposed by the Committee if UK and France agree, and if approved by the GA, and would therefore be interested in knowing views of UK [France] on this question.

Discussion Brief for Bilateral Talks on Colonial Policy To Be Held at London and Paris (Agenda Item IV (b) 1)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] September 4, 1951.

Item IV, (b), 1: General Assembly Resolution on Rural Economic Development in Trust Territories

I. Problem: To determine U.S. position with respect to GA resolution on Rural Economic Development in Trust Territories.

II. Recommended United States Position:

A. As indicated in opening speech of Secretary of State to Fifth General Assembly, U.S. believes there is urgent need for efforts to meet problems of use and ownership of land. U.S. therefore co-sponsored GA Resolution 438(V), Rural Economic Development of Trust Territories.

B. U.S. believes rural economic development, with particular emphasis on land problems, constitutes appropriate and potentially useful field of study for TC.

C. Committee of Rural Economic Development of TC has made useful beginning in its study of land problems in trust territories, having determined what data is necessary as basis for Council's recommendations and having requested these data from administering authorities.

D. While it is not feasible to arrive at definite decision on question of recommendations of TC until such time as all data requested from administering authorities has been received and studied by Council, U.S. preliminary thinking on this question is as follows:

1. In view of diversity of conditions in various trust territories, U.S. believes Council's recommendations, if any, should be of specific nature for each territory.

2. However, if it should be found possible to formulate meaningful general recommendations, U.S. would be prepared to consider advisability of this approach, especially if such general recommendations were supplemented with specific recommendations for particular trust territories.

3. Recommendations of Council should not be inconsistent with those of other UN bodies dealing with land problems, particularly ECOSOC, but it should be borne in mind that conditions in trust territories differ in certain respects from those in many other areas of world.

E. It is strongly urged that an energetic effort be made by all concerned to accelerate consideration of this question by TC so that it may be in position to make full and constructive report to Seventh Session of GA.

F. Although it will not be practicable for emphasis to be given to interim report of TC on this question in forthcoming session of GA in view of strictly preliminary nature of Council's work up to present, administering authorities might well take advantage of opportunity afforded by Fourth Committee's discussion of TC's report on question to describe measures already taken in trust territories under their administration to improve land situation.

Discussion Brief for Bilateral Talks on Colonial Policy To Be Held at London and Paris (Agenda Item IV (b) 2)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] October 3, 1951.

Item IV (b) 2: Handling of the 1951 Special Committee including the General Assembly Resolution on the implementation of the Declaration of Human Rights in non-self-governing territories, and including the question of the revision of the Standard Form (including the possibility of making arrangements whereby the smaller colonial territories would be required to transmit information at intervals longer than one year).

I. Problem: To determine the best methods of handling the work of the 1951 Special Committee, including the questions of human rights and the revision of the Standard Form.*

II. Recommendations:

A. It is recommended that the British [French] [Belgians] [1] be informed that:

1. The United States believes

a. that the constructive approach of the Administering authorities in dealing with educational problems at the 1950 Session of the Special Committee was beneficial to and was appreciated by other Members of the Committee;

b. that the same constructive approach, including the assignment of an expert to each delegation if at all practicable, should be continued.

*This paper was drafted prior to the meeting of the Special Committee in 1951. Some of the recommendations contained herein may be obviated by the results of that Committee's work. [Footnote in the source text.]

[1] Brackets in the source text.

2. In keeping with its policy of according full respect to recommendations of the General Assembly, the United States has already prepared, and intends to submit to the Secretary General, a detailed Report on the Application of Human Rights in Non-Self-Governing Territories Administered by the United States. The United States believes

a. that no useful purpose would be served by failing to submit this information, particularly if any attempt were made to justify the failure to submit information on the ground that such information should be submitted by self-governing as well as non-self-governing territories;

b. that such an attitude of non-cooperation might tend to disrupt the work of the Committee, and might jeopardize the harmonious and constructive trend which characterized the discussions of the 1950 Session;

c. that the other administering Members should likewise submit information on human rights in their territories, and that if they do not have this information ready for submission by the time the Special Committee meets, that they inform the Special Committee that the information is in preparation;

d. that the submission of this information would strengthen the position of the Administering Authorities in the Third Committee in supporting Article 60 of the Draft Covenant on Human Rights in which the signatories of the Covenant undertake to submit reports concerning progress made in achieving the observance of human rights;

e. and that the actions of the Administering Members, in respect to submitting information on human rights in their non-self-governing territories will be a significant step forward in the furtherance in all countries of the principles set forth in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

3. With regard to the revision of the Standard Form, the United States Delegation intends to await further clarification of the proposals by the United Kingdom and to await the reaction of the other members of the Special Committee, especially the non-administering members. The United States understands from this document (A/AC.35/SC.1/L.4)

a. that the United Kingdom wishes to reduce the burdens on the small administrative staff in 19 of its smaller colonies by submitting full information from those colonies every three years beginning in 1952 instead of annually;

b. that the Secretary General would be empowered to use any supplementary material in his summaries and analyses prepared in three years placed at his disposal by administering members concerned, relating to educational, social, and economic conditions in those territories;

c. that the United Kingdom would, in addition, supply annually to the Secretary General the information described in the introduction to the revised Standard Form relating to significant developments in the 19 territories concerned;

d. The United States is aware, however,

(1) that the United Kingdom proposal might lead to the charge by the non-administering Members that it is a plan to withdraw further from the obligations of Article 73(e) of the Charter;

(2) that some difficulty might be experienced in defining the term "small" territory; and

(3) that the action of the United Kingdom in withdrawing from annual reporting on 19 of its small territories would establish a precedent which might be followed by other administering Members.

Discussion Brief for Bilateral Talks on Colonial Policy To Be Held at London and Paris (Agenda Item IV (b) 3)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] September 4, 1951.

Item IV, (b), 3: The Relationship Between the Trusteeship Council and the General Assembly

I. Problem: To determine U.S. position on relationship between General Assembly and Trusteeship Council. Non-administering Members cite Articles 85, 87 in contending Council executive body of Assembly; administering Members maintain Council principal organ with powers of deliberation, conclusion; cite balanced nature, majority rule of Council.

II. Recommended United States Position:

A. U.S. should maintain its position on general question of relationship TC to GA; i.e.:

1. Assembly should not attempt detailed resolutions on Council's work; direct recommendations from Assembly to Administering Authority should not be encouraged; such action more appropriate for TC.

2. Authority of Assembly (per Articles 85, 87) should not be exercised in a manner which would deny Council independent, deliberative qualities.

3. If the question arises, US should state that it considers inadvisable at this time attempt by Assembly or ICJ to define relation of Council to Assembly, since a. Restrictive definition of Council's powers disadvantageous;

b. Broad definition might encourage direct recommendations by Assembly to Administering Authorities.

4. It is desirable Administering Authorities avoid provoking non-administering Members to carry issues from Council to Assembly and should seek to dissuade latter from doing so unless we think such procedure justifiable.

B. In its consultations with non-administering Members, U.S. has outlined its concept of the relationship between the TC and the GA.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] September 4, 1951.

Item IV, (b) 4—Actions arising out of GA Resolution 436(V) (information on the implementation of Trusteeship Council and General resolutions relating to trust territories)

I. Problem: To determine position of U.S. on question of implementation of TC and GA recommendations relating to trusteeship and trust territories. [Non-administering Members are increasingly pressing for more prompt and complete implementation of GA and TC recommendations and for recognition of obligatory character such recommendations, also increased insistence on reports from Administering Authorities on implemental action.] [1]

II. Recommended United States Position:

A. U.S. should take position consonant with general UN policy, i.e., that although UN recommendations do not have force of law, every effort should be made to carry them into effect.

B. In view U.S. policy strengthen GA and respect for its actions, U.S. should seek to avoid, insofar as possible, debate or decision by GA on obligatory character its recommendations re Fourth Committee affairs which might have compromising effect on GA actions in other fields.

C. U.S. will make every effort in administration of Trust Territory of Pacific Islands to implement resolutions of Trusteeship Council and to report fully thereon. U.S. hopes to devote more space in future annual reports to description and discussion of implementation. U.S. considers full, frank reporting on implementation, indicating thorough and sympathetic effort to carry out recommendations, is best antidote to criticism and pressure on this matter.

D. If legal question implementation GA recommendations in Trust Territory Pacific Islands is raised, U.S. should take position that while legal non-competence GA is clear (in view its status as strategic trust territory), U.S. will avoid narrow interpretation of Charter in this matter and will, in absence of strategic considerations, make every effort carry out GA views, without, however, prejudicing its position under Article 83.

E. Should any proposals concerning implementation arise in Sixth GA as result of consideration of report of Secretary-General called for in Resolution 436(V), U.S. in formulating its position will take into account the foregoing considerations.

Item IV, (b), 5: Revision of the Trusteeship Council's Questionnaire

I. Problem: To determine the position of the United States on the question of the revision of the Trusteeship Council's Provisional Questionnaire.

II. Recommended United States Position:

A. The U.S. considers the reporting function to be among the most important features of the Trusteeship System since

1. it provides a standard, authoritative method of publicizing policies and accomplishments of administering authorities in the trust territories, and
2. full, accurate information is best weapon against generalized, tendentious criticism.

B. U.S. believes, therefore, that in revision of questionnaire the tactical, political advantages of full and frank reporting as well as considerations of the substantive value and usefulness of information for purposes of Trusteeship Council should be kept in mind.

C. In view of above, U.S. position on revision of questionnaire will be based on following principles:

1. Questionnaire should be sufficiently inclusive and detailed to provide opportunity for complete reporting on all important aspects of administration,
2. Emphasis should be placed on information which will assist TC to perform review, supervisory functions,
3. Every effort should be made to eliminate redundancy, duplication and to insure conciseness without sacrifice of completeness,
4. A short, unduly vague questionnaire is not necessarily advantageous since from point of view of preparation of reports, a full and specific outline is helpful, and since, from tactical point of view, it is important to avoid grounds for suspicion that administering authorities are attempting to subordinate reporting function,
5. In the absence of overriding considerations to the contrary, the U.S. believes that efforts should be made to determine what information, particularly statistical information, will be requested from administering authorities on annual basis by specialized agencies, other UN bodies and make provision for such information in questionnaire thus enabling all regular requests for information be met in a single report,
6. Form of questionnaire should be that of topical outline rather than series of questions thus being consistent with preferred narrative-type report and allowing more flexibility in presentation information,
7. Following revision questionnaire, administering authorities should make every effort to follow outline closely and consistently in order to facilitate examination of reports. Where items in questionnaire do not apply, report should so state with explanation, if necessary, in order to avoid implication of omission or suppression of information.

D. U.S. has submitted Secretariat draft revision of questionnaire to appropriate administrative officials for comment, but until such comments are received we are not able to comment in detail on specific points in Secretariat draft.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] August 31, 1951.

Item IV(b)6: Colonial Application Clause

I. Problem: To determine U.S. position with respect to inclusion of "colonial application article" in international treaties, conventions or agreements.

II. Recommended United States Position:

A. U.S. should maintain attitude of sympathetic understanding of the constitutional problem of the U.K. and other metropolitan states which in some cases cannot extend the application of a convention to a territory without the consent of the local government.

B. U.S. does not desire to have problem of federal-state article linked with colonial article in U.N. formulation of treaties, but U.S. desires that special constitutional problem of this country in this connection be recognized.

C. While U.S. thus recognizes in principle the legal requirements of some metropolitan states, consideration should be given to measures for securing more general understanding of the problem.

1. Legal issues involved have been skillfully confused so that many governments normally anti-Soviet consider colonial application clause to be a legal device for imperialistic exploitation, as evidenced by substantial majorities against the colonial clause in past two sessions of Committee 3.

2. Much misunderstanding might be eliminated by more precise explanation of constitutional problem to other states outside U.N. sessions.

3. U.S. believes that prompt consideration should be given to finding an acceptable formula for a colonial clause which will make clear to other states the fact that the metropolitan states do desire to apply conventions as widely as possible.

4. The U.S. believes that in cases where the (clause) convention would be suitable for application and could be applied, prompt action to secure application would remove unnecessary suspicion.

Item IV, (b), 7: Italian Participation in the Trusteeship Council.

I. Problem: To determine United States position on question posed by TC resolution requesting GA include on agenda 6th Session matter of "the full participation of Italy in the work of the TC." Italy falls short of "full participation" only by lack of right to vote, a right presently restricted to Members of UN.

II. Recommended United States Position:

A. U.S. considers Italy could acquire right to vote in TC only through:

1. admission to membership in UN
2. amendment to Article 86 of Charter

B. U.S. has supported and will continue to support admission of Italy to membership in UN. (Note: The possibility of resubmitting Italy's application to the Security Council as a special case on the basis of her special responsibilities as the administering authority of a trust territory is, as of the date of this paper, being discussed by the U.S., U.K., and French Missions in New York.)

C. U.S. considers adopting of amendment to Article 86 of Charter would be at least as difficult to achieve as admission of Italy to membership in UN, since amendment would also require approval of all permanent Members of Security Council; moreover it would appear to be far less satisfactory to Italy. However, if Italy is not admitted to membership in the UN, we would be prepared to vote for amendment to Article 86, if Italy desires.

D. U.S. would welcome views of UK [France] [1] on possibilities of achieving "full participation" of Italy in TC by either of above means, or by any other means.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] September 4, 1951.

Item IV (b) 8—More effective measures to counter Soviet-inspired propaganda activities in colonial areas and Soviet exploitation of the theme of "Western Imperialism" in their propaganda

I. Problem: To determine more effective measures to counter Soviet-inspired propaganda. Some reasons for the apparent success of Soviet propaganda are:

1. Soviet propaganda has been cleverly designed to capture the imagination of colonial peoples and play upon their susceptibilities, particularly of those whose standard of living is low;

2. Soviet attack is facilitated by the fact that nations which have risen to independence from colonial status consider colonialism an anachronism in world of today. This attitude also makes it difficult for Administering Authorities convincingly to defend colonial relationship.

II. Recommended United States Position:

A. We believe that general measures to counter Soviet propaganda should include:

1. A progressive colonial policy providing for rapid political and economic advancement which would include the following:

(a) development of organs of self-government,
(b) training of peoples to assume political, administrative and managerial responsibilities, and
(c) rapid promotion of sound systems for improvement of territorial economies and educational and social reforms necessary to support political structures.

2. Consideration of desirability of advance announcement, wherever possible, of impending attainment of self-government or independence in particular territories, as for example, was done in cases of Philippines, Libya and Somaliland. Such announcement would, in our opinion, be potent weapon in deflating Soviet propaganda.

3. Pointing out, where appropriate and when colonial relationship as an institution is attacked, that all Members of UN have subscribed to Chapters XI and XII.

(a) Administering Authorities might argue that all Members of UN have (1) thus recognized constitutional bases of colonies, and good faith of Administering Authorities to provide good government, and (2) further agreed their policy in respect to these territories must be based on general principle of good neighborliness.

B. We believe specific measures in UN should include these tactics:

1. Answering Soviet attacks calmly, fully and authoritatively;
2. Including more representatives from territories in national delegations to various meetings in order that they can assist in countering Soviet propaganda;
3. Giving wide publicity to progress achieved in various territories; and
4. Using every effort to keep discussion in Committee 4 on substantive questions. However, we suggest that advantage should be taken of every opportunity to point out that principal threat to dependent peoples today is conspiracy of Soviet imperialism. It might be remarked at appropriate opportunities that world's real concern is with number of independent countries which have recently become dependent, thus reversing world trend.

C. Following suggestion made by Belgian and U.K. representatives, U.S. has begun study and suggests that there be discussion at later date on question of best tactics to meet standard Soviet resolutions.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] September 4, 1951.

Item IV, (b), 9—Indian Proposal on Fourth Committee Procedure (simultaneous discussion of developments in both trust and non-self-governing territories)

I. Problem: To determine U.S. position on Indian proposal that since functional (economic, social and educational) problems are essentially same in both trust and non-trust territories, there should be common discussion of such problems, it being provided that ensuing recommendations would be differentiated to take account of constitutional differences under Charter. Proposal was withdrawn last year for lack of support for opposite reasons from both administering (France, Belgium and Denmark) and non-administering Members (Brazil, Venezuela, Byelorussia, Chile, Mexico).

II. Recommended United States Position:

A. U.S. initially felt that since Committee Four will, in any case, discuss these functional problems in relation to both trust and non-trust territories, single rather than double discussion would have advantages. Following arguments can be made in favor of proposal:

1. It would save time;
2. It would subject administering authorities to only one "barrage";

3. It should decrease emphasis on political aspect only of colonial problems;

4. Proposed procedure might also help develop desirable differentiation between role of GA (general principles and trends) and that of TC (attention to specific territories) and would avoid duplication; and

5. We have felt that Indian proposal had further merit of inscribing in resolution "marked difference" between responsibilities of GA in respect of Chapters XI and XII of Charter. We understood initial UK reaction at 1950 Assembly was similar to ours.

B. Further reflection has caused U.S. to have some doubts as to proposal. Following arguments can be advanced against proposal:

1. Single discussion of two types of territories might tend to blur Charter distinction;

2. Question arises as to whether Fourth Committee or specialized agencies furnish most appropriate forum for technical discussions in economic, social and educational fields;

3. While rational, proposal is perhaps not rational enough since functional problems are not really peculiar to non-self-governing and trust territories and might really best be discussed on regional basis; and

4. Since such functional problems cannot be exhaustively or intensively discussed in Fourth Committee, their discussion in relation to trust territories, where GA has unquestioned responsibilities, might be regarded as sufficiently representative to render similar discussion regarding Chapter XI territories redundant.

C. Department considers question premature in light of last year's reactions and does not propose to raise it. However, should it be raised again, we now intend to assume attitude of indifference during debate, consider abstention in the vote, and accept either procedure because it seems whatever valid arguments can be leveled against single discussion can be equally leveled against double discussion, if not more so.

Item IV (b), 10—Questions Relating to Caribbean Commission (For UK talks only)

I. Problem: To determine how the Commission can be made a more effective body in the economic and social development of the area. British are critical of Carribean Commission accomplishments but do little or nothing to carry out recommendations of the Commission or its auxiliary bodies.

II. Recommended United States Position:

A. U.S. believes in purposes of Commission and will continue to support and strengthen it. At end of first five years of operation, helpful to assess its accomplishment and shortcomings.

B. We strongly endorse Commission's placing the emphasis of its work programs in economic field for next several years. This, we believe, is sound procedure based upon five years of research into basic problems of region. Such projects might be in fields of housing, cooperatives, industrialization, fisheries, forestry, tourist facilities.

C. In order to achieve positive results and make best use of limited funds, Commission, we think, should devote greater proportion of annual budget to concrete projects; and without serious curtailment of essential research and informational services of the Commission, concentrate on carrying out several specific projects a year; and direct its Research Council to work out details of such projects.

D. We believe Commission can be really effective regional body only if the recommendations of the Commission and, so far as agreed on by the Commission, of its Research Council, and of the West Indian Conference are adopted by Metropolitan and Territorial Governments in terms of specific action programs. Some of the Caribbean peoples are critical and disillusioned because of lack of action upon recommendations they make through their own political and technical representatives. Technical conferences are increasingly popular and unless programs are based upon these recommendations, the Commission will fail of its purposes.

(For French talks only)

I. Problem: To determine how the Commission can be made a more effective body in the economic and social development of the area. The French are critical of Caribbean Commission accomplishments but do little or nothing to carry out recommendations of the Commission or its auxiliary bodies.

(1) French should be assured again that the United States has no political solutions in the French Antillean Departments and has no intention ever to use the Caribbean Commission for this purpose.

(2) French have always feared possible Caribbean Commission interference in the French Antillean Departments and have consistently attempted to limit the Commission's operations in every way especially through budget reductions.

Item IV (b), 10—Questions Relating to South Pacific Commission
(For U.K. talks only)

I. Problem: To determine the position on matters pertaining to South Pacific Commission.

II. Recommended United States Position:

A. U.S. is gratified that Commission has been established on what we believe to be sound, workable basis and that its comprehensive Work Program is now showing very real promise of producing results which will fully justify efforts being made.

B. U.S. wishes express its appreciation to U.K. for:

1. Its active support in Commission and cooperation from British Pacific Territories, particularly Government of Fiji, in substantive work of Commission;
2. Helpful attitude of His Majesty's Government in Fiji which contributed greatly to successful outcome of First South Pacific Conference of Native Peoples; and
3. Its making available the new Secretary-General-Elect, Sir Leslie Brian Freeston.

C. U.S. believes application of principle of regional cooperation to economic and social problems of South Pacific area is eminently sound and economical and believes Commission can be strengthened by:

1. Continuation of high degree of cooperation and confidence already developed among Commissioners;
2. Continued development of regional approach to problems through territorial representatives at South Pacific Conference and by meetings of experts in Research Council and at technical meetings;
3. Consultations for development of technical assistance programs to promote development and welfare in area;
4. Strengthening of relations on informal basis (we see no need to formalize these unnecessarily) relations with UN and specialized agencies whenever cooperation of these organizations can be helpful; and
5. Encouraging more active interest and support by other Governments in work of Commission.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] October 4, 1951.

Item IV, (b), 10—Questions Relating to South Pacific Commission (For French talks only)

I. Problem: To determine position on matters pertaining to South Pacific Commission. The French have requested assurances from the United States that it will not take the position in the Commission which tends to extend its activities beyond the advisory function stated in the Agreement. The French interpretation of the Agreement is extremely rigid as compared to the other five Member Governments.

II. Recommended United States Position:

A. U.S. is gratified that Commission has been established on a sound, workable basis and that its modest, though comprehensive, Work Program is now showing promising results which will fully justify efforts being made.

B. U.S. believes application of principle of regional cooperation to economic and social problems of South Pacific area is eminently sound and economical and believes Commission can be strengthened by:

1. Continuation of high degree of cooperation and confidence already developed among Commissioners;
2. Continued development of regional approach to problems through territorial representatives at South Pacific Conference and by meetings of experts in Research Council and at technical meetings;
3. Consultations for development of technical assistance programs to promote development and welfare in area;
4. Strengthening of relations on informal basis (we see no need to formalize these unnecessarily) with UN and specialized agencies whenever cooperation of these organizations can be helpful; and
5. Encouraging more active interest and support by other Governments in work of Commission.

C. U.S. expresses its appreciation to French Government for:

1. Cooperation of French Government and Government of New Caledonia for:

(1) assisting in the development of the headquarters site by making available funds for reconstruction of the Pentagon Building;
(2) encouraging the building of houses for the staff and;
(3) the generous assistance of the Officers of the Institute Français d'Océanie in the development of the Work Program.

D. The United States Government is in sympathy with:

1. The difficulties encountered by the French Government in thoroughly examining the reports of experts, recommendations of technical meetings, etc., owing to the lack of adequate translation and interpretation facilities at the headquarters.

2. The position taken by Dr. Bugnicourt at the Third Research Council Meeting that a branch office for Economic Development should not at this time be established outside of New Caledonia, although the United States Government recognizes that Article XVI of the Agreement does permit the Commission to establish such offices at other places, and that such action may become feasible in the future.

E. The United States Government does not agree, however, with:

1. The French position that the Commission activities should be limited strictly to the scope of its work to advisory functions. For instance, the French Senior Commissioner has expressed concern over the undertaking of a survey for the establishment of a vocational training school. The United States is of the opinion that the Commission should not be limited to a specific survey and can continue with extended tasks to explore further the vocational training field. The detailed plan, authorized by the Commission, is really an extension of formulating expert advice as to the feasibility of a central vocational training school—in this case, detailed to take account of building plans and costs which none of the participants in the project to date were technically able to supply. With this information then, the Commission will be in a better position to make recommendations to metropolitan and territorial governments as to vocational training in the area.

2. The attitude of the French Government that relations with UN and the Specialized Agencies should be limited and in particular, the view of the French Government that the recommendation of the Commission as an associated organization with UNESCO would result in an organic connection with the United Nations. It is the United States view that this recommendation would not result in an organic connection with the United Nations since:

1. UNESCO is an international organization with its own separate treaty quite distinct from the UN, and
2. the relations between UNESCO and UN are defined in a special agreement which in no way impairs the autonomy of UNESCO, thereby, not infringing upon Article XV, paragraph 55 of the Agreement Establishing the South Pacific Commission.

The United States believes that these relations should be strengthened whereby the Specialized Agencies can cooperate with the Commission by

1. providing experts
2. co-sponsoring technical conferences.
3. Disseminating technical information upon technical problems for the benefit of the peoples of the area.

3. The position of the French Government that the preparation of and the publication of text books as a function of the South Pacific Literature Bureau is outside the Commission's terms of reference. In our view, these operations are to develop materials for the consultative and advisory program in the social development field and no Government will be forced, collectively or individually, to take this material in the manner of executive function.

Note: In May 1951, all Commissioners received a letter from the Senior Commissioner for France on the relationship with UNESCO, the South Pacific Literature Bureau, and Vocational Training. The United States reply in detail, dated July 10, 1951, is along lines set forth in Section E above. Our position is similar to that of Australia, New Zealand, the Netherlands, and the United Kingdom in the Commission. Any concession to the French would constitute not only a reversal of our previous positions, but also weaken the effectiveness of the Commission and create serious difficulties for us in relation to the majority of the Members of the Commission.

Item V: The Question of Further Diplomatic Approaches to Other Member States of the United Nations Prior to the 1951 General Assembly.

I. Problem: To determine the advisability of making diplomatic approaches regarding dependent area questions to other Member States of the United Nations prior to the 1951 General Assembly.

II. Recommended United States Position:

A. The Department believes that much good will and a better understanding would be created by U.S. consulting frankly on dependent area questions with the non-administering members of the U.N., other than the Soviet bloc, as well as with the administering Members.

B. Such consultations would be most effective, in our opinion, if they were bilateral discussions between the U.S. and each of the non-administering States.

C. In accordance with the foregoing, the Department has consulted on dependent area questions with representatives of the Washington Missions of the Near Eastern [and Far Eastern] [1] countries; and has requested U.S. Missions in the Latin American countries to hold similar consultations with the Foreign Offices of the Governments to which they are accredited.

D. The Department has in most cases discussed the following questions with the afore-named Governments:

1. General Questions
a. Basic views of the United States and _____ with respect to questions involving non-self-governing peoples and the treatment of such questions in the United Nations
b. Relationship of General Assembly (Committee Four) to the Trusteeship Council and to the Special Committee on Information Transmitted under Article 73(e) of the Charter
c. The functioning of the Trusteeship Council
d. The functioning of the Special Committee on Information Transmitted under Article 73(e) of the Charter
2. Specific Questions
a. South West Africa
b. Italian participation in the Trusteeship Council
c. General Assembly consideration of Trusteeship Council procedures.
d. The transmission of political information under Article 73(e)
e. The question of "the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose peoples have not yet achieved a full measure of self-government"
f. The Ewe and Togoland Unification questions

The British [French] [Belgians] [2] are familiar with the U.S. views on these topics.

E. The U.K. [French] [Belgian] [2] Government, if it has not already done so, may also wish to consider the desirability of consulting on dependent area questions before, during, and after the General Assembly, with non-administering Members of the U.N., when it believes that such consultations would be productive.

Editorial Note

John D. Hickerson, Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs, was to head the United States group at the bilateral talks on colonial policy in London and Paris, October 1951, but was prevented from attending just before departure. Mr. William Sanders, Special Assistant to Assistant Secretary Hickerson, was designated to replace Hickerson. Other members of the group were Mr. Ward P. Allen, Adviser on United Nations Affairs, Bureau of European Affairs, and Mr. O. Benjamin Gerig, Director of the Office of Dependent Area Affairs. Detailed from their respective Embassies were Miss Margaret Joy Tibbetts (for the London talks) and Mr. John E. Utter (for the Paris talks). Gerig proceeded to London from Geneva where he was attending the meeting of the Special Committee on Information Transmitted under Article 73 (e) of the Charter of the United Nations.

The talks with the British at London were held from October 10 (afternoon) to October 12 (morning). The principal officers engaged on the British side were, from the Foreign Office, Messrs. Paul Mason, Superintending Under Secretary, and C. C. Parrott, Head of the United Nations (Political) Department; from the Commonwealth Relations Office, Mr. Neil Pritchard, Superintending Under Secretary; and from the Colonial Office, Messrs. John Martin and Andrew Cohen, Assistant Under Secretaries of State. Messrs. P. C. Hope and D. I. Dunnett also attended from the Foreign Office; and there was a supporting element of eight officers from the Commonwealth Relations and Colonial Offices. Mr. J. K. Thompson, Colonial Attaché at the British Embassy, Washington, was also present. Mr. Ernest Davies, Parliamentary Under Secretary of State, Foreign Office, opened the conference and presided the first day.

The colonial policy talks with the French Government were held in Paris on October 15 and 16. M. Léon Pignon, Representative of France on the United Nations Trusteeship Council, presided. Delegates attending from the French Foreign Ministry were: M. André Naudy (Ministry Delegate to the United Nations), M. Jean-Daniel Jurgensen (Africa Division), M. Pierre Salade (Far Eastern Department) and M. Jules (?) Charles-Roux (Caribbean Department). M. Kresser represented the Ministry of Overseas France.

A summary report on the London and Paris talks by William Sanders, dated December 7, 1951, is printed infra. The United States Minutes for the British talks (in brief form and not "agreed" minutes) are located in Department of State file 741.022/10–1851, under cover of London despatch 1826, October 18, 1951. The United States Minutes for the French talks are located in Department of State Office Lot File 62 D 228 (ODA Files), "Colonial Policy Talks UK and France–1951", as part of Tab A of the Sanders Report of December 7. (Tab A also included a set of the minutes of the British talks.)

The London Embassy despatch forwarding the London minutes (No. 1826, October 18) emphasized that the British participants regarded the discussions to be of very considerable value. It was noted that the Colonial Office participants had been most frank. The Foreign Office had reiterated its belief to the Embassy that only through such conversations could the Colonial Office be assured of the value of a less legalistic and more flexible approach to dependent area questions in the United Nations. The London Embassy stated that "unquestionably" the morale of the Colonial Office had been raised "by the evidence of a friendly United States interest in these problems." (741.022/10–1851)

Memorandum by Mr. William Sanders, Special Assistant to the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson), to Mr. Hickerson[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] December 7, 1951.

Subject: Report on the Talks on Colonial Policy Held in London and Paris, October 10 to October 16, 1951

Copies of the attached minutes (Tab A)[2] of the talks prepared by members of the United States group have been distributed to interested Officers in the Department. Matters on which immediate follow-up action was required were discussed and appropriate decisions taken at a meeting held in my office on October 23, 1951. These matters are listed in the attached memorandum of the same date. (Tab B).[2]

The American group operated as a well-coordinated team. Mr. Gerig and Mr. Allen did yeoman service and in London Miss Margaret Joy Tibbetts, Embassy Attaché, as Secretary of the group and as liaison officer, did an outstanding job. As was to be expected, the American group relied heavily on Mr. Gerig's background and experience and his close personal relations with most of the United Kingdom and French participants in the talks.

The United Kingdom and French Foreign Offices apparently consider that the talks were helpful. The American Embassy in London reports that there is continuing evidence that the United Kingdom participants were highly pleased and consider that the discussions are of real value. The American Embassy in Paris reports that the French were very pleased with the exchange of views.

As to the future, the United Kingdom definitely expects the talks to become an annual feature. The French will no doubt accept annual meetings but will not, I think, press for them. I think the talks should be continued but that no formal agreement to have annual meetings is necessary or desirable. Their usefulness is clear from our experience the last two years. The talks not only anticipate future difficulties in such a way as make our negotiations in the United Nations easier, but they are of general political and psychological value. They reassure the UK and the French regarding our desire to be helpful, our willingness to hear their side, and our readiness to apply in colonial matters the London agreements of 1950 regarding consultations.

[1] Attached to the memorandum was an undated "chit" handwritten by Mr. Hickerson: "Mr. Sanders [,] I read all of your excellent memo [presumably Hickerson meant by this, both sets of U.S.-UK and U.S.-French minutes, and related miscellaneous matter which is not printed here] and I agree with your conclusions. After Gerig returns I want us to go into this whole question fully. There are some very basic differences between us & the Br[itish] & Fr[ench] that we must face realistically. J[ohn] D. H[ickerson]."

[2] Not printed.

The talks indicated that the UK and France continue to see the advantages of a less legalistic and more flexible approach to these problems. This fact has tended to create the impression that the issues between them and us relate primarily to questions of timing and tactics. While reflecting a healthy optimism which should be encouraged, this impression is misleading. For example, the talks in London revealed a strong and continuing concern that the practice of yielding to pressures calling for the submission of information on constitutional and political matters or to do other things not required by the Charter may, through a cumulative effect, establish a principle which would end in giving the UN additional powers. Among the "hard core" issues are:

(a) In the trusteeship area, the United Kingdom will not accept prior consultation and the alleged right of the General Assembly to tell the administering powers how they should discharge their responsibilities.

(b) In the non-trusteeship area, the United Kingdom will not accept resolutions that do not apply to all members or recommendations regarding particular territories; it insists that the United Nations should not discuss constitutional questions or political questions except as incidentally related to social, economic, or other similar matters; it also will not admit that there is an obligation requiring prior consultation.

The American group made it clear that the US did not want to tell the UK and France how they should administer their territories. It indicated that perhaps the basic difference between our respective approaches turns on the judgment we pass on the liabilities of a negative attitude in the United Nations on questions that involve strong political and psychological reaction. The estimate made by the US leads it on balance to the conclusion that more is to be gained by submitting information, even though not legally required, and by discussing such information, than by taking a negative or antagonistic attitude. The UK and the French, on the other hand, concentrate on the other side of the coin, on the difficulties and hinderances created in the administration of territories by such submissions and discussion.

In summary, I think it is important for us not to be deluded by the the appearance of happy agreement. Under the smooth surface there are many rocks that are bound to cause serious difficulties as we deal with specific issues in the United Nations. It is one thing to discuss these problems in general terms in the relatively relaxed and friendly atmosphere of the talks in London and Washington; it is quite another to discuss the same issues in specific terms while being prodded and needled, frequently in what seems to us to be an irresponsible way, by the non-administering powers in the relatively psychopathic atmosphere of Committee 4. The flare-up last year over the Michael

Scott[3] affair shortly after the Washington talks, and the one this year over discussion of political conditions in non-self-governing territories, give accent to this point.

These two instances involved one or more of the "hard core" issues mentioned above. The United Kingdom in these and other similar cases has taken the attitude that our failure to give them complete support represented a departure from the understandings reached during the colonial talks. This reaction on the part of the United Kingdom raises a basic question as to what these understandings were and who has been converted to whose gospel. After the Washington talks last year the United Kingdom sent circulars to its missions saying the talks had been successful in convincing the United States of the validity of the United Kingdom position. We, on our part, thought we had persuaded the United Kingdom of the advantages of a more flexible approach. Instances of the kind referred to have shown how far apart we remain and how the contradictions in the two approaches emerge to join issue over specific problems. For our part we see that, at least on the issues where the new approach is really needed, the United Kingdom continues to maintain the inflexibility which characterized its attitudes during the period prior to the colonial talks.

Some of our troubles are created by UK and French representatives in the actual negotiations in the United Nations who have not participated in the colonial talks and are not conditioned to the more flexible attitudes which the talks promote. No doubt the UK is saying the same thing about us, in view of their recent comments about our representative in Committee 4 in Paris. Study of these and other aspects of our experience with the discussions will offer helpful hints on where and how we move from here with the talks.

For one thing I believe they should increasingly focus on specific issues expected to arise in the UN. I think also that we should soft-pedal exhortations about the virtues of more democracy and self-government and independence for dependent peoples and generalized concepts as to how Soviet tactics may be met. The same applies to generalizations about the historical factors which explain our attitude toward these problems. The United Kingdom and the French profess to fail to understand why we do not take into account that the clock has long since passed the hour of "colonial imperialism" and that the "enlightened" colonial policy of today is a far cry from the policy that led to the American revolution.

This does not mean that our approach to the talks should be governed by excessive consideration for United Kingdom and French [3] This refers to the Rev. Mr. Michael Scott, Anglican clergyman from the Union of South Africa who regularly sought to appear before the Fourth Committee at sessions of the General Assembly, on behalf of the Herero and Nama peoples of South West Africa. susceptibilities. The point is that diminishing returns have set in on some of our standard arguments. We should begin to take for granted, at least for purposes of discussion with them, that the United Kingdom and France accept certain basic propositions of the new approach which supposedly has evolved out of the talks. Perhaps one way to do this is to develop a series of such basic propositions which could serve as points of departure in the discussion of specific issues. They could include points that both sides could assume have become axiomatic in the new approach, e.g., the desirability of greater flexibility and the merits of explaining what is being done to improve the welfare and increase the self-government of dependent peoples. The idea would be to set a platform under the progress already achieved. The application of these standards to specific issues would promptly reveal where the shoe pinches without requiring a recapitulation of basic philosophy.

This may not be the way to do it but I do believe that if we do not do something of the kind we will continue to alternate each year between the sometimes misleading optimism of the talks, and the pessimism produced by the frustrations in the United Nations.

INFORMATION ON THE IMPLEMENTATION OF TRUSTEESHIP COUNCIL AND GENERAL ASSEMBLY RESOLUTIONS RELATING TO TRUST TERRITORIES: THE REPORT OF THE SECRETARY GENERAL

THE PROBLEM

The problem is to determine the position of the United States Delegation to the Sixth Session of the General Assembly on the question of the implementation of Trusteeship Council and General Assembly resolutions relating to Trust Territories.

---

[1] The General Assembly was to convene in Paris on November 6. For information regarding the composition and organization of the U.S. Delegation and its Advisory Staff, see pp. 2–10 and 37–44.

Although neither the Fourth Committee nor the General Assembly took action on this item until January 1952, this position paper is printed here as of interest in this phase of Department's policy formulation.

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. On the general question of the implementation of General Assembly and Trusteeship Council resolutions, the United States Delegation should base its position on the following two factors:

a. The United States does not consider that the nature of the obligations arising from recommendations by the General Assembly or the Trusteeship Council on trusteeship affairs differs from that arising from recommendations by the General Assembly on other subjects.

b. With respect to the nature of the obligation arising from such recommendations, the United States considers that, although such recommendations do not have the force of law, they should be accorded the greatest respect and every effort should be made to carry them into effect.

2. The United States Delegation should seek, insofar as possible, to minimize any discussion of the nature of the obligation arising from recommendations concerning trusteeship and to avert the introduction or adoption of any proposal thereon in the Fourth Committee. Should a proposal be introduced which would attempt to establish or recognize a legal obligation on the part of administering authorities to implement recommendations of the General Assembly or the Trusteeship Council on trusteeship affairs, the Delegation should initially take the position that such a proposal is concerned with an aspect of the general question of the nature and extent of the obligations imposed on Members by all recommendations of the General Assembly and therefore involves matters which are beyond the scope of the Fourth Committee. The Delegation might, on the above grounds, (1) seek to have such a proposal withdrawn or (2) if appropriate, favor referring the question to the Sixth Committee. If substantive action in the Fourth Committee cannot be averted by these or other means, the Delegation should (1) oppose such a proposal or (2) if necessary, favor amendments to make the proposal acceptable in terms of the position set forth in Recommendation 1.

3. The Delegation should take into account the foregoing considerations in any discussion of specific issues covered by the Report of the Secretary General pursuant to Resolution 436 (V). Should the question of further reports by the Secretary General arise, the Delegation should take the position that there is no need for such reports since, pursuant to Trusteeship Council Resolution 128 (VI), the Reports of the Trusteeship Council to the General Assembly include information on the implementation of resolutions, and should, if necessary, vote against a proposal for further special reports by the Secretary General, making clear that it was doing so on the procedural grounds outlined above.

4. If the question of the implementation of General Assembly recommendations in the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands is raised, the Delegation should take the position that the United States is making and will continue to make every effort to carry out the views of the General Assembly, subject to security considerations and without prejudice to the status of the Territory as a strategic area. If the Secretary General's report pursuant to Resolution 436 (V) includes data on the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, the United States should not object to inclusion in the Secretary General's report of data on the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands for the information of the Assembly.

COMMENT

The question of the implementation by administering authorities of recommendations of the General Assembly and the Trusteeship Council relating to trusteeship matters has received increasing attention at recent sessions of the Assembly. The General Assembly at its Fourth Session adopted four resolutions, (320(IV), 322(IV), 323(IV), and 324(IV)), dealing respectively with political, economic, social and educational advancement in trust territories. Each of these resolutions included a recommendation that the Trusteeship Council include in its report to the Assembly a special section on the implementation by administering authorities of recommendations in each of these fields. Accordingly the Trusteeship Council at its Sixth Session adopted Resolution 128(VI) in which it resolved to include in future reports to the Assembly special sections on the implementation of recommendations of the General Assembly and information on the application of the recommendations of the Trusteeship Council. As a result of this decision separate sections on implementation were included in those parts of the Council's report to the Assembly covering its Sixth and Seventh Sessions which were adopted after the passage of Resolution 128(VI). Thus, for example, the Council's report on British Togoland, adopted at the Seventh Session, includes in Part I, under each of the functional fields, a section which quotes each previous recommendation dealing with that field, followed by detailed information on the implementation of that recommendation based on information from the annual reports by the administering authorities and the statements made by the representative and special representative of the administering authorities during the Council's discussion of the annual report on the Territory. It should also be noted that the Trusteeship Council's Provisional Questionnaire, upon which the annual reports of the administering authorities are based, includes as question 246 the following: "What has been done to implement the suggestions and recommendations of the Trusteeship Council and the General Assembly?" Annual reports have included, in varying degrees of detail, information in response to this question.

Despite the action noted above, however, a draft resolution was introduced into the Fourth Committee at the Fifth General Assembly by the Mexican and Cuban delegations which requested the Secretary General to prepare a list of Assembly and Council resolutions, and to report annually to the Assembly on the implemental action pursuant to these resolutions, setting forth the reasons for delay in cases where no implemental action has been taken. The United States opposed this resolution on the grounds that it would result in a duplication of effort, was unnecessary, ill-timed, and might result in confusion. Other administering authorities also opposed the draft resolution, chiefly on procedural rather than substantive grounds; however, in commenting on the draft, the United Kingdom delegation stated that the administering authorities were not required automatically to apply resolutions of the General Assembly or the Council; they considered those resolutions as mere recommendations and felt bound to accept them only if they judged them to be compatible with the conditions in the Territory concerned and in accordance with the essential aims of the Trusteeship System. Shortly after this unfortunate statement, the Philippine delegate, stating that he could not agree with the British statement, introduced an amendment to the preamble of the draft resolution, the first paragraph of which read as follows:

"Considering that the Administering Authorities have a clear obligation to implement the recommendations of the General Assembly and the Trusteeship Council in matters relating to Chapter XII and XIII of the Charter;"

In introducing and defending this amendment, the Philippine delegation made it clear that this amendment referred to a "binding obligation", resting upon a legal basis.

In discussing the above amendment at a subsequent meeting, the United States urged the Philippines to withdraw the amendment since it had only a tenuous connection with the draft resolution and raised the broad issue of relations between the General Assembly and Member States with respect to Assembly resolutions, a matter which affected the work of all Committees of the General Assembly. The Cuban delegation also urged withdrawal of the amendment, although it supported the principle and would vote for it as a separate draft resolution. The Indian delegation stated that it supported the principle of the amendment but would abstain in the vote since it regarded the amendment as unnecessary. The Philippines thereupon withdrew the amendment but reserved the right to submit it at another time as a separate resolution. In withdrawing the resolution, the Philippines attempted to refute the various arguments which had been advanced against it and, in particular, took exception to the United States view that the principle raised the question of relations between the General Assembly and Member states. In the Philippines view the principle concerned only relations between the Assembly and administering authorities of trust territories. Following the withdrawal of the amendment, the draft resolution was adopted by the Fourth Committee by a vote of 31–11–5 and in the plenary by a vote of 33–11–12. In both cases the six administering authorities voted negatively.

In view of the background of this question, it is possible that the question of implementation will be a major issue in the Fourth Committee of the Sixth Assembly and that the Secretary General's Report called for in the above resolution will serve as a point of departure for a discussion of the nature of the obligations of administering authorities arising from recommendations with respect to trusteeship. Furthermore, there is a strong possibility that an attempt will be made to introduce a proposal along the lines of the Philippine amendment of last year. Such a situation poses a difficult problem for the United States since, while making every effort to strengthen the General Assembly and respect for its actions, it might be forced to support a restrictive position with respect to the legal obligations deriving, from Assembly recommendations. While the United States position on the substance of the issue is clear, (see Recommendation 1, (b)), it would obviously be preferable for the United States to avoid, if possible, emphasizing the negative aspect of that position. A discussion of the question might very well result in other administering authorities stressing the non-obligatory character of Assembly recommendations. Furthermore, a divisive debate on this issue could well have unfortunate effects on United States efforts to encourage both administering and non-administering Members to adopt a broad, constructive and cooperative attitude in United Nations' discussions of colonial affairs.

In view of the consideration outlined above, it is believed that the United States should make every effort to keep discussion of this question to a minimum and, by appropriate informal consultation, to avert the introduction of any proposal dealing with the nature of the obligation arising from recommendations concerning trusteeship. While it would be preferable that no proposal on this subject be debated in the Fourth Committee in view of the implications which such a debate would have with respect to Assembly actions in other fields, such an outcome may prove impossible. Should a proposal along the lines of the Philippine amendment of last year be introduced, the United States should seek to prevent its adoption without, if possible, taking a position which would emphasize the legal limitations inherent in the obligations attaching to Assembly or Council actions. This might be achieved by taking the position that such a proposal raises the broad issue of the nature and extent of obligations imposed on all Members by Assembly recommendations and therefore extends beyond the scope of the Fourth Committee. This would provide a basis, without taking a position on the substance of the proposal, for urging that the proposal be withdrawn or referred to the Sixth Committee. The latter tactic may be useful since the Sixth Committee is less likely to be influenced by the political and emotional factors which are inherent in Fourth Committee discussions and therefore less likely to support the thesis that recommendations of the Assembly and the Council with respect to trusteeship differ from other recommendations in that they impose on administering authorities a legally binding obligation for implementation. This was the main argument advanced by the Philippine delegation at the Fifth Assembly in support of its amendment and, judging from the brief discussion of the issue at that time, there may be considerable support for this argumentation among non-administering members. Briefly stated, this argument holds that the Assembly under Article 18 (2) makes "binding decisions" with respect to trusteeship rather than "recommendations" as in the case of matters involving international peace and security; furthermore, resolutions of the Assembly on trusteeship affairs were directed to states, not as Members of the United Nations, but as Administering Authorities of Trust Territories, who are regarded as "agents", responsible to a higher authority and bound by its decisions. While this argument is believed to be susceptible of refutation along the lines outlined below, the atmosphere of the Fourth Committee may indicate that the Sixth Committee would be a more sympathetic forum in which to debate what is essentially a legal issue.

If, however, neither withdrawal nor reference to the Sixth Committee appears feasible, a proposal of the type anticipated might successfully be opposed in the Fourth Committee by refutation of the argument outlined above without taking a definitive position on the issue of the obligation involved in Assembly action. Thus without debating the issue of the nature of the obligation involved, the enthusiasm of many non-administering members for a legally binding obligation with respect to trusteeship matters may be dampened if the position can be established that—whatever the nature of the obligation is—it does not differ from that placed upon all Members by Assembly actions. The following points might be used to establish this position:

1. Article 10 of the Charter provides that the Assembly may discuss and make "recommendations" with respect to any questions and matters within the scope of the present Charter, except as provided in Article 12.

2. While Article 18 (2) provides that "decisions" of the Assembly on certain questions (including trusteeship matters) shall be by a two-thirds majority whereas "recommendations" are specifically mentioned only with respect to the maintenance of international peace and security, it cannot be concluded that this represents an attempt to differentiate with respect to the obligation involved between "decisions" and "recommendations". It is obvious in the context of the Charter that the term "decisions" is employed to describe all actions adopted by the Assembly which may include recommendations, requests, expressions of opinion or desire, etc. If it is argued that the term

"decisions" in this instance implies a particular sort of obligation, it would follow that the same sort of obligation must arise in those matters covered by Article 18 (3) where it is provided that "decisions" on "other questions" shall be made by a simple majority. A similar deduction would have to be made with respect to Article 67 concerning actions of ECOSOC and Article 89 concerning actions of the Trusteeship Council.

3. Furthermore, Articles 81, 85 and 87 provide that the relationship between a state, in its capacity as an Administering Authority, and the General Assembly shall be established by individual trusteeship agreements and that the actions of the Assembly and the Council in carrying out their functions shall be in conformity therewith. There are no provisions in the trusteeship agreements adopted thus far upon which it could be concluded that administering authorities have accepted an obligation with respect to Assembly actions, the nature of which differ from that of other Member states.

If despite refutation along the above lines, there does not appear to be sufficient opposition to ensure the outright defeat of a proposal of the type envisaged here, the remaining alternative would be amendment of the proposal to make it acceptable in terms of the the fundamental position of the United States as set forth in Recommendation 1 (b). Consideration of this alternative has been left to the last, however, since as was stated before, it is preferable that no proposal of any type be adopted on this question. Since the United States considers that the obligation attaching to recommendations of the Assembly in the case of trusteeship affairs does not differ from that in other cases, any proposal or amendment to a proposal which would emphasize the legal limitations involved in the obligation with respect to trusteeship would, ipso facto, imply that the same limitations applied in all other cases. Obviously such an implication would be undesirable in view of United States' efforts to strengthen the Assembly and to emphasize the general responsibility of Members to respect and implement its recommendations. While it is difficult to foresee all of the tactical possibilities which might arise in consideration of a proposal of this type, it should be borne in mind that a situation might develop in which the objectives of the United States might be achieved by abstention.

Although a proposal of the type dealt with above is likely to be the major problem which will arise in connection with the agenda item on implementation of Assembly and Council resolutions, it is possible that a proposal may be made to require further reports by the Secretary General of the type submitted this year. In its original draft form, Resolution 436 (V) called for annual reports by the Secretary General; this was changed in a subsequent revision to provide for one report covering action up to the present time. While the United States and other administering authorities opposed the draft resolution in both forms, as unnecessary and repetitious, proponents of the resolution pointed out that it would be advantageous to Members to have all the information available to date on this subject collected into one document for ready reference. Even if this consideration were of sufficient importance to justify the report called for in Resolution 436 (V), it would not appear to have any validity with respect to further reports, particularly on an annual basis. As was pointed out before, the Trusteeship Council includes sections on implementation in its annual report to the Assembly. There appears to be no justification for changing the position adopted by the United States on this issue at the Fifth Assembly, and the United States should therefore oppose further reports by the Secretary General on implementation.

The Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, administered by the United States, has been designated as a strategic area under the terms of the Trusteeship Agreement, and Article 83 (1) of the Charter provides that all functions of the United Nations relating to strategic areas shall be exercised by the Security Council, which shall avail itself of the assistance of the Trusteeship Council in performing those functions relating to political, economic, social and educational matters. Relations between the Security Council and the Trusteeship Council with respect to strategic areas were the subject of a resolution adopted by the Security Council at its 415th meeting on March 7, 1949, (S/1280), which requested the Trusteeship Council to perform on behalf of the Security Council to the functions specified in Articles 87 and 88 of the Charter, subject to any decisions made by the Security Council with respect to security considerations. The Trusteeship Council was also requested to submit to the Security Council its reports and recommendations on strategic areas. Three such reports have been submitted to the Security Council thus far but have not been discussed in that body.

On the basis of a strict interpretation of the Charter, the General Assembly may be regarded as exercising no functions with respect to the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands. However, should the question of implementation of General Assembly resolutions in the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands arise, the United States should avoid a narrow, legalistic position which might arouse suspicions as to the actions or intentions of the United States in the territory or which might prejudice the United States efforts to promote a cooperative and progressive attitude toward trusteeship affairs. While making a brief and general reservation with respect to the status of the territory as a strategic area, the United States should state that it is making and will continue to make every effort to carry out the views of the Assembly and the Council. Should the Secretary General include in his report information on implemental action by the United States as administering authority, the United States might state, if appropriate, that it has no objection to the inclusion in the Secretary General's report of data for the information of the Assembly on the implementation of resolutions in the Trust Territory.

COMPETENCE OF THE FOURTH COMMITTEE OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

THE PROBLEM

The problem is to determine the Delegation's attitude on a proposal laid before the Fourth Committee by Iraq to the effect that "The Fourth Committee reaffirms that in accordance with the terms of the Charter it is empowered to discuss political matters and political aspects in regard to non-self-governing territories".

This matter has arisen out of an effort on the part of the Arab States to introduce a discussion of the Moroccan question in all of its aspects in the Fourth Committee. To this the French Delegation has taken vehement exception on points of order on the ground that a discussion of political and constitutional aspects of Morocco is beyond the competence of the Fourth Committee under the terms of the Charter. On Friday morning the French Delegation, in protest, walked out of the Committee and has been bringing strong pressure on the British and United States Delegations to do likewise.[1] References by Guatemala to the political situation in British Honduras, by Greece to the Cyprus question, and by Yemen to alleged British violations in Aden, have precipitated the same question.[2]

The basic question as to the limits of the competence of the Fourth Committee, and indeed of the Assembly, in regard to political aspect of non-self-governing territories has been before the Fourth Committee for several years. The Iraqi motion is intended to force a decision in favor of the widest interpretation of the Committee's powers on this question.

[1] The events described in this paragraph regarding Morocco occurred on Thursday and Friday, November 22 and 23. The French delegates withdrew on November 23. (hereafter cited as GA (VI), Fourth Committee).

DISCUSSION

Legal Aspect

Under Article 73(e) of the Charter, Members of the United Nations agree to transmit regularly to the Secretary-General for information purposes "statistical and other information of a technical nature relating to economic, social and educational conditions in" non-self-governing territories which are not under trusteeship. The General Assembly set up a Special Committee on Information Transmitted Under Article 73(e) of the Charter to consider these reports and to report its conclusions to the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly. Since under Article 73(e) there is no requirement to transmit political information to the United Nations, this Special Committee has concentrated on economic, social and educational matters.[3]

The Fourth Committee, however, has in practice taken up discussion of both trusteeship matters and of non-self-governing territories, some of which are of a political nature. For instance, under Article 73(a), Members of the United Nations agree "to ensure, with due respect for the culture of the peoples concerned, their political, economic, social and educational advancement". Under Article 73(b), Members agree "to develop self-government, to take due account of the political aspirations of the peoples and to assist them in the progressive development of their free political institutions . . .".

Although under Article 73(e), Members are not required to transmit political information concerning non-self-governing territories, a majority of the members of Committee 4 take the view that the General Assembly, under Article 10, and under the specific provisions of Article 73(a) and 73(b) does have the right to discuss questions concerning the political advancement and the political aspirations of the peoples of non-self-governing territories. The British, French, Belgians and others have stoutly maintained that Sections 73 (a), (b), (c) and (d) are a part of a unilateral declaration and are not within the competence of the General Assembly or any of its Committees. They maintain that they would never have subscribed to the Charter on any other interpretation. It would seem, however, that on legal grounds, this view is open to serious question.[4]

Political Aspect

The question has a serious political aspect. France has manifested from the beginning a super sensitivity with regard to the discussion of conditions in Morocco, and, as stated above, walked out of the Fourth Committee when the Committee showed its determination to discuss conditions in Morocco. The British position is that, whatever the legal interpretation of the Charter may be, firmly maintained at San Francisco, that it must be clearly understood that the United Kingdom would not assume responsibility for international accountability with respect to its dependent areas.

The British and French take so serious a view of the matter that if the United States takes the position that the Fourth Committee is competent to discuss political questions, they will feel seriously affronted. The United States consequently finds itself in a position where failure to side with France and Great Britain may cause serious political difficulties. Belgium, Australia and the Netherlands, as well as several other delegations held much the same view as the UK and France.[5]

Parliamentary Situation

The problem is made the more difficult by the situation in the Fourth Committee, which is composed of eight administering authorities, and 52 non-administering authorities. The latter, in most cases lacking experience and knowledge of colonial problems, many of them smarting under former discriminatory treatment by the white races, as a rule make common cause against the administering authorities. While the eight administering powers on particular issues often secure the support of some twelve others, some thirty to thirty-five votes are usually cast against them.

So far as practical results are concerned, a point of order by an administering authority, in the course of the debate, may prove quite futile, since even if the President sustains the point of order, he can be, and frequently is, over-ruled by an overwhelming vote against the administering authorities.

Public Relations

In the discussions of the Fourth Committee, the issues are usually phrased in terms of human rights and the majority attempt to make it appear that the administering authorities, having opposed majority proposals, are engaged in the denial of human rights. Many of the NGO's appear to support the majority opinion and exercise considerable influence on the American public and press. It is clear, therefore, that public relations and press aspects of this question are important factors to take into account.

[Here follow list of persons (25) present and discussion of a prior agenda item.]

2. After the working group on this matter had withdrawn to undertake the drafting job, the Delegation, or those members present, were asked by Mr. Taylor [1] to stay and consider an urgent problem to be presented by Mr. Gerig [2] and Ambassador Sayre [3] concerning developments in the Fourth Committee. This had to with the French walkout of the day before, following a political discussion of Morocco in Committee 4, and an Iraqi motion that Committee 4 had the power to discuss political questions concerning the non-selfgoverning territories.

Mr. Gerig said that a serious crisis had arisen in Committee 4 when the French had walked out. The Belgians and UK were taking the same general line as the French although they had not walked out. He pointed out that by Monday afternoon when the Committee would meet again, a decision would be necessary from the Delegation on how to deal with this matter for the US. He added that Padilla Nervo [4] was meeting at that time with the UK and French and might later see the Iraqi. Padilla Nervo was understood to feel that this matter should not go into the General Committee but rather that he would go to the Chairman of Committee 4 who, it was hoped, would say that this was not a proper proposal and that he would not put it to a vote in the committee. That was the line which the UK and the French were seeking to pursue at that time. Padilla Nervo might also approach Khalidy,[5] the Iraqi, and point out to him the very dangerous results that could follow from carrying through on his draft resolution. The results would be dangerous for not only Committee 4 but also for the very existence of the Special Committee to Receive Information submitted under Article 73(e) of the Charter. The result might be that no more information would be submitted. The hope would be that Padilla Nervo could get Khalidy to withdraw his motion or get him to suspend pushing it forward to a vote. The problem for the US however was what to do if the approaches currently being made were unsuccessful. The Arabs in their speeches, he pointed out, were covering the whole problem of Morocco in all its aspects. The last few years had seen a process develop within Committee 4 of what the UK called amendment to the Charter by resolution. New functions and powers were being given to Committee 4 by resolution saying that the Committee was so empowered. The colonial powers of course insisted that they had not subscribed to any such agreement at San Francisco.[6]

The French, according to Mr. Gerig, felt that they were being maltreated in the UN in regard to Morocco and were getting quite nervous about it. The UK had taken the matter up on the highest levels. It was desirable to have the question withdrawn in favor of a rule of thumb heretofore practiced by which it was generally agreed that since one could not separate completely the political aspects from what were primarily economic, social and educational questions, if the bounds of reason were maintained there would be no objection to occasional reference to these political aspects. The UK reluctantly has accepted this but if the rule of thumb method was disregarded a ruling would have to be made that political matters were outside the scope of the Committee to discuss. This latter position of the UK was felt by the Legal Adviser to exceed the limits of propriety. An attempt was in progress to draft a speech for Dr. Tobias to make on Monday afternoon expressing the US position on this matter.

Ambassador Austin asked what the parliamentary situation was. Mr. Gerig said that Committee 4 had received the motion one hour before it adjourned on Friday. It would therefore come up Monday. Ecuador and Iraq had moved in a short statement to the effect that Committee 4 was empowered to discuss political matters in connection with the report on the territories which were non-selfgoverning. Ambassador Austin[7] wondered whether the non-selfgoverning part of this statement took it outside of the general mandate of Article 10. Mr. Gerig said that on the contrary the feeling was that Article 10 was the generally permissive basis on which the present motion had been made. Mr. Meeker[8] said that the Legal Adviser felt that this was not a problem of Charter interpretation or of what powers in general the Assembly had, but related solely to the propriety of Committee 4 action of such a nature. This was a much narrower issue. He pointed out that while Article 73(e) did not call for political information, the countries responsible for non-selfgoverning areas submitted political information. Our feeling was that when the discussion under Article 73(e) got too far away from the basic purpose of that article, it would be appropriate to have the chair call the meeting back to that primary purpose.

Ambassador Sayre agreed with this legal opinion. He pointed out that the French feel that a discussion of political matters by Committee 4 was illegal. They said that Chapter 11 of the Charter was a unilateral declaration by the countries responsible for the non-selfgoverning areas and not an agreement. They would submit information but they were not bound to come and discuss it before the special committee, at least on the political aspects. He agreed with Mr. Meeker also that this was an unsound legal position to the extent that it denied the general competence of the Committee to discuss political matters. If the GA could discuss political matters under a general mandate, so could Committee 4. The UK and French position was not of course a purely legal one. There had been a long-continuing fight going on in Committee 4 wherein the non-colonial powers would ask political representatives of the colonial powers to appear in Committee 4 and talk to political matters. They might further consider the idea of sending visiting missions out to the non-selfgoverning areas. This would be clearly illegal. The important question was where to fight the big battle that would inevitably have to be fought. Should it be fought out when the non-colonial powers adopt the clearly illegal position of sending out these visiting missions, or should we decide now to depart from firm legal grounds and fight it out for political considerations connected with the UK and French desire to take the stand now? Ambassador Sayre felt that the US should continue to stick to its legal position but show a readiness to fight, if illegal steps were taken as indicated above. He preferred to wait till the battle lines were drawn on firm ground and not to fight on the quicksand of the present position. Ambassador Sayre felt that the UK and France had gone too far in saying that no political questions could be discussed, and that the Iraqi had gone too far in saying all political questions could be discussed. He therefore proposed that a middle ground be sought and that the US seek also to bring the two sides somewhat nearer this middle.

Mr. Ross [9] felt he might somewhat overstate his case out of strong feelings on the subject but he disliked intensely the tendency of the present US position. He admitted that each country was entitled to its own legal interpretation of this or any matter. The UK and France felt that our interpretation was wrong in this case, that the Charter was being interpreted by this motion, and that the US was at fault for making ex cathedra statements about the legality of this matter. He recalled the difficult history of Committee 4 between the "enlightened policies" of the colonial powers and the "irresponsible demands" of the noncolonials. He felt that we had come upon the crisis of which the UK and France were so certain. Our conduct vis-à-vis the nonselfgoverning areas and the East–West struggle was highly important. The best analogy he could recall would be the recent decision to back the French to the fullest in Morocco.[10] An equally firm stand would have to be taken in this case, in his opinion. This would not of course prevent our urging calm counsel upon our friends.

Mr. Nolting liked Mr. Ross' analogy. Mr. Meeker said, in response to a question by Mr. Nolting, that the legal adviser's opinion was that the Iraqi motion ought to be opposed not on the basis of the Charter but on the basis of "allocation of work". Ambassador Austin called for hitting the problem squarely on the nose. This, he said, was a constitutional announcement of a judgment that the Charter empowered Committee 4 to discuss these political items in the particular connection mentioned. This was a new item, and had not been assigned to any committee yet. There was only an accidental relation of this item to the Moroccan matter. According to Mr. Gerig, Padilla Nervo was going to object only to the form of the motion by Iraq and not to the substance of it. Mr. Nolting said that we should approach this problem one step at a time. Ambassador Sayre gave an exact recapitulation of what happened and how the issue arose and how tangled the procedure was. He also pointed to a difficulty underlying all this business which was the necessity for the US to avoid giving the impression it was basing its actions on the "unhumanitarian" ground of backing the colonial powers in their differences with the non-colonial ones.

Ambassador Austin could not see how this Iraq resolution could be advanced in Committee 4 since it had not gone through the appropriate procedures for new matters. Mr. Sandifer[11] said he approved of the Chairman's suggestion that this matter be dealt with on procedural grounds. We would only be faced with the policy conflict outlined by Mr. Ross if this procedural approach failed. On the substance of the matter he would disagree with Mr. Ross, in the argument that we should back up the UK and French on untenable legal grounds, and for that reason he felt we should seek to steer clear of the substantive issues by getting the UK and France onto procedural grounds.

Ambassador Austin wondered how France could avoid coming back into Committee 4 and raising a point of order on the Iraqi motion. Ambassador Sayre said that the French had raised a point of order on the Egyptian speech which had precipitated this whole matter. It was during the course of the Committee 4 chairman's attempting to dodge a ruling on the point of order that the Iraqi motion had been presented. Ambassador Austin wanted to see the fuzziness of the parliamentary situation erased and the record kept straight. Mr. Gerig said that in view of a clear cut decision going against our point of view, a certain amount of fuzziness would not be a bad idea, unless of course the proposal we made for the rule of thumb were to be adopted. This could hardly come out of a ruling by the Chair. Ambassador Sayre urged seeking the middle ground he had suggested earlier. In view of the alarm of nearly everyone on the Committee and the particularly nervous state the UK and France were in over this matter, it would be useful to compose their differences this way.

Mr. Taylor said that it would be wise to try first the suggestion by Ambassador Austin to solve the question on procedural grounds. In the event we should lose on this move, which seemed likely, we could consider how to vote on the resolution. In any case, we could talk around with the other more reasonable members of the Committee tomorrow concerning the most effective procedural approach.

Mr. Maffitt[12] agreed with Mr. Taylor that the procedural gambit be tried and asked whether the time element were not the most important one. Ambassador Sayre agreed, saying that if one week's time could be gained on the item or motion, the Committee would then be on to other matters and the matter would probably not bother us. However, there was an aspect that might recur. This was that the Arabs were continually trying to plague the French over Morocco and might try it in other ways if this particular method failed. He agreed, too, that the procedural approach be tried first.

Mr. Taylor asked Mr. Gerig to report on Committee 4 developments. Mr. Gerig reviewed the highlights of the French walkout in that Committee after the Egyptian delegate had discussed political matters with regard to Morocco in considerable detail in connection with the debate on the report of the Special Article 73(e) Committee and the Secretariat summaries of the reports of the administering authorities on non-selfgoverning territories. Mr. Gerig recalled that in the past Committee 4 had allowed some political remarks to be made but that Delegations had generally adhered to a "gentlemen's agreement" that such remarks should be strictly germane to the item under discussion. In this case the Egyptian had gone too far. After the French had walked out in protest over this development, the Iraqi had introduced a motion which stated that the Fourth Committee was acting within its proper limits in discussing political matters in connection with a discussion of the reports submitted to the Special Committee under Article 73(e). It was feared that the results of such an explicit statement as to Committee 4's competence would be very dangerous for the proper functioning of either the Special Committee or of Committee 4 itself. The UK, Belgium, the Netherlands, Australia, and of course France, were extremely concerned about these developments. The non-administering powers on the Committee were equally adamant in insisting that the powers of the Committee should be spelled out in the proposed fashion.

Mr. Gerig stated that an attempt was underway to persuade the Chairman of the Committee 4 to rule the Iraqi motion out of order, on the grounds that it involved a constitutional question of a very broad character and was not at all germane to the agenda item under which it was being introduced.

Dr. Tobias said that he wanted to see Urena [1] use the power of his prerogatives as Chairman to declare the motion out of order, and that he would be prepared to raise the point of order himself if necessary. A speech which the US Representative could make to this point had been prepared. Dr. Tobias stated, however, that he was not too enthusiastic about making any great polemical endeavor in this regard since there were certain considerations which gave him pause. He found it difficult to erase from the back of his mind the recollection that the United States itself had once been a non-selfgoverning territory. Since those days, of course, the US had grown in size and stature, and had also acquired dominion over several territories. The US was justifiably proud of its record of enlightened policy vis-à-vis these territories, and ought therefore to be extremely careful in how it dealt with such problems in the context of the present day. He added that it was obvious to him that recommendations for reporting political matters under 73(e) had been omitted for reasons other than mere chance. He felt the intention, nevertheless, was to examine these reports and make recommendations thereon in the light of all the necessary considerations, which of course would have to include the political.

Mr. Sandifer stressed the importance of disposing of the Iraqi proposal on a procedural basis and noted that we had solid grounds on which to do this. In view of the importance of our relations with the UK and France, it would be exceedingly unwise to consider or deal with the resolution on a substantive basis, the UK and France were, in fact, claiming that the US was not doing enough in colonial matters to back them up. Although this claim was unjustified, it was nevertheless being made. Should there be a showdown on the substance of this issue, the US might well have to stand in support of the right of the Fourth Committee to discuss the political aspects of the economic, social and educational problems presented to it.

Mr. Fisher[2] liked the legal position as outlined by Mr. Gerig, and felt that it was so valid that it would be unfortunate for the US position to lose on a vote. He wondered how the voting strength lined up. Mr. Sandifer said that it would take a good deal of active political liaison work to ensure acceptance of our position; Mr. Gerig noted that if we could convince Padilla Nervo and Urena of the correctness of our position, we could probably swing the Latin American vote.

Mr. McKeever[3] wanted the US to get some middle country like India to join the US in raising the point of order, to avoid the appearance that the US was siding with the colonial against the non-colonial powers. Mr. Sandifer responded that although this was technically a point of order, it was not really the US intention to operate on that basis. The proposed statement referred to earlier would be given, according to his understanding, only in the event that a vote was likely to be taken. The current attempts were to keep this matter from being voted upon, at all.

Mr. Plitt[4] said that while it sometimes appeared that the Indians and others could influence the Arabs, in a case like this the Arabs were presenting a united front. Ambassador Sayre feared that Committee Four's future would be jeopardized in the extreme if present developments were allowed to continue. The Iraqi resolution seemed to him completely out of order and if adopted would lead to a "quagmire" of difficulties. He offered to talk with Urena and felt he could convince him to accept our position. If that approach did not succeed, Ambassador Sayre thought the US ought to demand a ruling, and if it should go against our position, appeal the ruling and demand a vote thereon. Thereafter, the delegation approved the approach outlined by Mr. Gerig.

Editorial Note

For the proceedings of the Fourth Committee on November 26, see GA (VI), Fourth Committee, pages 55 ff.

At the outset of the meeting the chairman, Henriquez Ureña, made a short statement regarding Committee procedure and his conduct of the Committee's business as chairman. He announced that he would "continue to conduct the meetings as he had previously, in other words, he would remind speakers to confine their remarks to essential points and to deal with political questions only if they were related to economic problems. He was not making a ruling." (GA (VI), Fourth Committee, page 55) The Iraqi delegate, immediately following, "appreciated the statement just made by the Chairman; it contained, he felt, the substance of what his delegation wished to say in its draft resolution. For that reason, while he did not withdraw that proposal, he did not want it put to a vote for the time being." (Ibid.)

The United States delegate (Tobias) made a short statement, which, however, was directed more to remarks made by certain delegates of the Soviet bloc (ibid., page 62).

COMMITTEE OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY ON SOUTH WEST AFRICA

THE PROBLEM

The General Assembly, by its resolution of December 13, 1950 (Annex A),[3] established a Committee to confer with the Union of South Africa concerning the procedural measures necessary for implementing the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice. The Committee also was authorized, as an interim measure, to examine, in accordance with the procedure of the former mandates system of the League of Nations, reports, petitions, and any other materials relating to the territory of South West Africa that may be transmitted to the Secretary-General of the United Nations and to submit a report on its actions to the next regular session of the General Assembly. The problem is to determine the position to be taken by the United States Representative on this Committee.

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. Organizational Questions

(a) The United States should favor a reasonable delay in the initiation of actual negotiations in order that the Union Government may find it easier to change from the inflexible views expressed by certain officials during the August election campaign in South West Africa and thus make possible a calmer atmosphere in which negotiations may be undertaken.

(b) The Committee should meet at Lake Success.

(c) The United States should support the representative of Thailand as chairman. The United States should not accept the chairmanship of this Committee.

(d) In drawing up its agenda, the Committee should first seek to perform its major function; namely, conferring with the Union on procedures for implementing the Court's opinion. After such negotiations have been initiated, the Committee should turn to its interim function, the examination of any reports and petitions which might have been received regarding the territory.

2. Work of the Committee

(a) The United States Representative should propose that after its election of officers the Committee inform the Union of South Africa of the action taken and perhaps invite the Union Government to designate a representative to confer with the Committee at a later date.

(b) If a proposal is made to examine petitions or reports, the United States Representative should suggest that discussion of the substantive business of the Committee should be postponed for a reasonable period to give the Union Government Representatives an opportunity to confer with the Committee. The United States Representative might suggest that a necessary step should be a request to the Secretariat to prepare a study of the procedures of the Mandates Commission for Committee examination (a digest of the Mandates Commission procedure is attached as Annex B).[4]

DISCUSSION

In 1949 the General Assembly requested the International Court of Justice to furnish an advisory opinion regarding the international status of the territory and the international obligations of the Union arising therefrom. On June 11, 1950 the Court delivered its opinion advising:

"that South-West Africa is a territory under the international Mandate assumed by the Union of South Africa on December 17th, 1920;

"that the Union of South Africa continues to have the international obligations stated in Article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations and in the Mandate for South-West Africa as well as the obligation to transmit petitions from the inhabitants of that Territory, the supervisory functions to be exercised by the United Nations, to which the annual reports and petitions are to be submitted, and the reference to the Permanent Court of International Justice to be replaced by a reference to the International Court of Justice, in accordance with Article 7 of the Mandate and Article 37 of the Statute of the Court;

[4] Annex B not printed.

"that the provisions of Chapter XII of the Charter are applicable to the Territory of South-West Africa in the sense that they provide a means by which the Territory may be brought under the Trusteeship System;

"and that the provisions of Chapter XII of the Charter do not impose on the Union of South Africa a legal obligation to place the Territory under the Trusteeship System;

"that the Union of South Africa acting alone has not the competence to modify the international status of the territory of South-West Africa, and that the competence to determine and modify the international status of the Territory rests with the Union of South Africa acting with the consent of the United Nations;".

The Court also stated in the body of the opinion that:

". . . The degree of supervision to be exercised by the General Assembly should not therefore exceed that which is applied under the Mandates System, and should conform as far as possible to the procedure followed in this respect by the Council of the League of Nations. These observations are particularly applicable to annual reports and petitions."

At the fifth session, the General Assembly accepted the Court's opinion and established a committee of five, consisting of the representatives of Denmark, Syria, Thailand, Uruguay, and the United States, to confer with the Union of South Africa concerning procedural measures necessary for implementing the Court's opinion. This committee was also authorized to examine, in accordance with the procedures of the former Mandates System of the League of Nations, reports and petitions relating to the territory that may be transmitted to the Secretary-General.

COMMENT ON RECOMMENDATIONS

1. Organizational Questions

(a) It would appear desirable to postpone negotiations with the Union Government until at least March or April in order to give time to the Union officials to reflect on, and perhaps adjust as far as possible, to the views of the Court and the Assembly, and to allow public opinion in the Union to cool off with respect to the territory of South West Africa. It is reported that the press in the Union has recently contained some editorial comment to the effect that the action of the General Assembly is not unacceptable to the Union. This might be interpreted as indicating an attempt by the Union officials to prepare the public for some retreat from the Union's previous position that it had no obligations to the United Nations with respect to the territory and toward an acknowledgement in some measure to the United Nations.

(b) There appears to be no reason why the Committee should meet elsewhere than at the United Nations Headquarters.

(c) The difficulty of achieving results acceptable to both the Union and the General Assembly are so great that it seems highly desirable for the United States to avoid the chairmanship. The United States will be in a better position as an ordinary Member of the Committee to exert maximum leverage during the negotiations and to strive to avoid an impasse between the Committee and the Union.

(d) It is possible that petitions may be received early in 1951. A petition from the Reverend Michael Scott,[5] representative of the Herero tribes, has been discussed by a group of non-governmental organization representatives in New York. The Committee's examination of this or other petitions before conferring with the Union as to the procedures for such examination might be deeply resented by the Union and might jeopardize the negotiations which are the major function of the Committee.

2. Work of the Committee

(a) Manifestly, the Committee will not be able to begin negotiations with the Union of South Africa until the latter designates a representative to confer with the Committee concerning the procedural measures necessary for implementing the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice. The next step, therefore, after the election of officers, might logically be for the Committee to notify the Union of South Africa that it has convened and is organized to carry out the General Assembly resolution, and to invite the Union of South Africa to designate a representative to confer with the Committee at a later date. The Committee should then recess. If a proposal is made by any of the members to take up substantive questions, the United States Representative should suggest that substantive matters should be postponed until the Union Government Representative has had an opportunity to confer with the Committee.

(b) If a proposal is made to examine petitions, the United States Representative should suggest that the Committee first request the Secretariat to prepare a study of the procedures of the Mandates Commission so that the Committee may utilize this material in conforming its procedures to the opinion of the Court.

No notification that any petitions are actually pending has been received from the United Nations Secretariat. Unless, therefore, a proposal is made that the Committee consider the "petition" made on behalf of the Herero tribes by the Reverend Michael Scott to the Fourth General Assembly, it would not appear that the question of petitions procedure would arise at this meeting.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Director of the Office of Dependent Area Affairs (Gerig)

Subject: Question of South West Africa

Participants: Ambassador Jooste,[1] Mr. B. J. Jarvie,[2] Embassy of the Union of South Africa
Assistant Secretary Hickerson [3]

Mr. Benjamin Gerig, UND

Ambassador Jooste called today at his request to ascertain the Department's views on several questions which might arise in the UN's Committee on South West Africa. (Before taking up these points Mr. Hickerson expressed the Department's appreciation on the manner in which the Union Government had paid their tribute to the late United States Ambassador Erhardt, in response to which Ambassador Jooste said that the Union Government had felt this loss very keenly because Ambassador Erhardt had so quickly learned to understand some of the special problems with which the Union was faced.)

Ambassador Jooste then asked a series of specific questions as to our probable attitude, in particular as to the questions of (a) competence of the Committee to receive "new information" which might have changed the Court's opinion, and (b) probable willingness of the Committee to receive suggestions or proposals which might not completely seem to correspond to a literal interpretation of the Court's opinion. Ambassador Jooste prefaced his points by saying that the Union Government had accepted the principle of international accountability but it was on the details of implementation that the difficulties might arise.

On the question of the Committee's competence to receive new information, Mr. Hickerson said, and Mr. Raynor and Mr. Gerig agreed, that it was doubtful in our minds whether the Committee was competent to receive and consider "new information" which the Union Government thinks might have changed the Court's opinion. Mr. Donges, at the Fourth Committee, had referred to this material at some length and therefore the Assembly was apprised of this matter before it adopted its resolution setting up the negotiating committee, with its present terms of reference. He added, however, that such information might very well be brought to the attention of the next Assembly by the Union Delegation and, indeed, the Union Government might find some other way of bringing the matter to the attention of the Court. Ambassador Jooste appeared to accept Mr. Hickerson's view that the Committee should not be presented with this question.

On the question of the Committee's competence to receive suggestions which might fall short of a literal reading of the Court's opinion, Mr. Hickerson gave it as his own opinion that the Committee should and would receive such suggestions. Mr. Gerig and Mr. Raynor both agreed. Mr. Raynor thought that such suggestions could be taken as a basis for negotiations and in the course of the discussions it would be seen how close together the committee and the Union Representative would come.

Ambassador Jooste then said that the Union Government, in accepting the principle of international accountability, had had in mind that an agreement could be entered into with the United Nations which would incorporate certain of the articles of the mandate under which the Union would undertake, inter alia, to promote the material and moral well-being of the inhabitants, prohibit forced labor and the supply of intoxicating beverages, insure freedom of conscience and worship, regulate the arms traffic, etc. Mr. Gerig thought that the Committee would welcome a proposal that an agreement should be negotiated, even though the contents of an agreement might be the subject of some difficult negotiations.

Mr. Hickerson said that it would be a good start to assume that an agreement could be negotiated, and he expressed the hope that the Union Government would not take a rigid position in the nature of "freezing" their position at the outset. Ambassador Jooste agreed and said he hoped the Committee, on its side, would not take a rigid position either but would be willing to consider various ways of expressing the undertakings in such an agreement. For example, he felt that if the Committee would start to say that unless annual reports were submitted there was no use going on, it might be very difficult. He would not say that such reports in some form would not be agreed to by his Government—he didn't know—but language might be found which would deal with this question under the principle of international accountability which would be satisfactory to all parties concerned.

Mr. Hickerson said that since the Union Government accepts the principle of international accountability he would hope that the Union would make a statement agreeing in principle to the opinion of the Court which would leave open a wide area for negotiating the details. He thought this was the more possible since the opinion of the Court was really not onerous and asked no more of the Union Government than they were able to accept for twenty years under the Mandates System. Mr. Jooste said he hoped they could consider some such approach.

Mr. Gerig said that the question of open or closed meetings of the Committee would probably arise when the negotiations started. All seemed to agree that although certain meetings should be open for a kind of pro forma discussion, it would be impossible to carry on such delicate negotiations in public. While there would probably be no great public interest in some of the questions, others would be discussed in a manner which would tend to get positions fixed in such a way that agreement would be rendered much more difficult. Mr. Hickerson said that Mr. Gerig, as the United States Representative, would try to get the Committee to conduct its meetings in a manner most conducive to successful negotiations. Mr. Raynor also agreed that the meetings should be closed.

Ambassador Jooste ended the conversation by referring to the reply which the Union Government had made on the Indian question in South Africa.[5] He pointed out that the reply, though negative, might have used much more vehement language. It was, however, a restrained reply, and, he thought, indicated that the Union Government was really desirous of getting along with the United Nations so long as its domestic position was not interfered with. Mr. Hickerson said he had noticed this reply and was encouraged to think that the Union was making a real effort to strengthen the United Nations as well as itself. On the big issues, such as Korea, the East–West conflict, etc., we agreed. It was only on certain other minor matters that we had differed and he believed that as soon as these were cleared away the Union Government would be able to play the role in the United Nations for which it was fitted.

Ambassador Jooste came in today at his request to explain the attitude of the Union Government in regard to the forthcoming negotiations with the United Nations Committee re South West Africa.

Mr. Jooste said that in his recent visit to the Union he had an opportunity to discuss this matter fully with the Prime Minister and others and he was very glad to report that the Union Government had decided not only to negotiate with the UN Committee, but that they would approach the negotiations in an attitude of hopefulness. The Union Government had not taken a "frozen position" on this subject. They were prepared to be reasonable in the negotiations and hoped that the Committee would take an equally reasonable and realistic attitude toward the problem at issue.

Mr. Hickerson said that he was very gratified to hear of this decision by the Union Government in regard to the negotiations. He was particularly pleased that the Ambassador had referred to the attitude of the Union Government as not frozen, but rather that their approach would be an open-minded search for a solution.

Ambassador Jooste then referred to the date for opening the negotiations. June 18 had been mentioned by the Secretariat, but this date might be a little too early to meet the convenience of the Union since the Ambassador was very anxious that Mr. Steyn, one of the legal advisers to the Union Government, should be present to assist him in the negotiations. This was the more important since Mr. Steyn would be returning to the Union before the next Assembly and would be able, therefore, to present a clear picture of the negotiations to the Prime Minister. He hoped that the delay in starting the negotiations would not be more than a week or ten days and he thought that we would be hearing from the Secretariat on this matter in a few days.

The question was then raised as to the nature of the meetings—should they be open or closed. It was agreed by all present that such negotiations could only be conducted in private. Mr. Hickerson suggested that Mr. Gerig should get in touch with the Chairman of the Committee, Prince Wan, to see whether he would not consult with the other members of the Committee in favor of closed meetings. Mr. Gerig thought that the press might make some difficulties and suggested that perhaps the Chairman might be entrusted by the Committee to make brief and general statements in regard to the progress of the negotiations. Mr. Jooste, however, felt that even this might be disadvantageous since an impression might be given out which would require some explanation on his part. It was generally agreed that the negotiations should be conducted in closed meetings, it being understood, of course, that the conclusions and report would be openly discussed by the General Assembly later on.

Ambassador Jooste repeated in closing the conversation that Dr. Malan held very strongly to the opinion that if there was no hope in arriving at an agreement it would be better not to have any negotiations at all. The fact that the Union Government was agreeing to negotiate was evidence that they still entertained hope that the results would be fruitful.

At the suggestion of Assistant Secretary Hickerson I discussed with Prince Wan, Chairman of the United Nations Committee on South West Africa, as to the manner in which the forthcoming negotiations with the representative of the Union of South Africa might be conducted. I said that our feeling in the Department was that these negotiations could best be conducted in private since that would give the conferees greater ease in putting forward suggestions. We felt that since the whole report in any event would be submitted to the General Assembly for public discussion, it would greatly facilitate the negotiating state if conversations could be carried on in an informal manner and without press and public attendance.

Prince Wan said that his own views were identical with ours and that he also believed that such a procedure would commend itself to the other members. He said he was going to New York shortly and would be seeing the other members of the Committee and try to get them to accept this procedure. I said this would be very satisfactory to us.

Prince Wan felt that perhaps the first meeting on June 18 might be an open meeting in which the representative of the Union and members of the Committee might wish to make some general remarks of a hopeful nature but without going into detail. His thought was that he would then adjourn the meeting and state that the Committee would go into executive session for the purpose of exchanging views on the way in which the negotiations could be carried forward. He believed that there would be no further difficulty and that there would be no need for issuing communiqués and for him, as Chairman, to contact the press. If such need should develop however, he would take it up with the Committee before making any decision.[1]

Memorandum by Mr. J. R. Fowler of the Office of Dependent Area Affairs to the Director of That Office (Gerig)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] July 13, 1951.

Subject: Possible diplomatic approach to Union of South Africa urging acceptance of Ad Hoc Committee draft as basis for negotiation.

Should a decision be made to approach the Union of South Africa directly, either in Washington or Pretoria or both, some of the following points may be useful in urging the Union Government to consider favorably the draft agreement presented to the Union by the Committee:

1. Appropriate reference might be made to the positive attitude of the Union Government in agreeing to meet with the Committee and in taking the initiative in proposing that a new agreement be negotiated clarifying the status of South West Africa.

2. The attitude might be taken that the Committee draft represents not so much a counter-proposal as a development of the original proposal of the Union for a new agreement, in effect, a spelling-out of the points which might be a part of such an agreement as that proposed by the Union.

3. Reference might be made to the common ground which exists between the Committee and the Union, that this augurs well for the attainment of a satisfactory solution and that, in view of the progress made to date, it would be unfortunate for all concerned if such a solution were not achieved. Existing common ground between the parties at present appears to include the following points: (1) a new agreement concerning the Territory is possible, (2) such an agreement would "clarify" (thus evading the subsidiary issue of "continue" vs. "re-establish") the status of the Territory, (3) the status of the Territory would be based upon the essential concepts of the Mandate system, (i.e., recognition of the principles of "non-annexation" and the "sacred trust"), (4) the agreement would re-state the obligations of Articles 2–5 of the Mandate, (5) the non-fortification provision of the Mandate would be replaced by the obligation of the Union to ensure that the Territory plays its part in the maintenance of international peace and security and the right of the Union to establish military installations in the area.

4. It might be pointed out that the United States, for its part, would be prepared to have the agreement entered into between the remaining Principal Allied and Associated Powers and the Union of South Africa with approval by the UN, if this should be desired by the Union Government and be agreeable to the UK and France.

5. Emphasis should be placed upon the tactical and political advantages which would flow from a satisfactory agreement:

a. The problem of South West Africa is within the competence of the General Assembly and, failing some positive action on this question, it will be a recurrent subject for discussion in the Fourth Committee where the emotional atmosphere of the past may be expected to continue, if not increase, and where failure to achieve a settlement will crystallize present attitudes and result in yearly discussions of South West Africa in a manner sharply critical of the Union Government.

b. Since the problem is and will continue to be before the Assembly in any event, it will be advantageous to remove it from the status of a "special" problem and place it in a more normal context. The position of the Union Government in the UN would be improved and the volume and nature of the criticism re South West Africa would be reduced and changed by adoption of an agreement along the present lines. Criticism of members administering dependencies cannot be eliminated, but experience has shown that it can be moderated. Experience has shown that there is a body of moderate opinion in the GA which can be appealed to on such issues as this. The friends of the Union would be in a far better position to assist in obtaining fair consideration of the problems of administration which the Union faces if the status of the Territory and the position of the Union were satisfactorily established.

6. While it is not possible to predict the reception which an agreement along the present lines might have in the GA, the possibility of obtaining the necessary two-thirds majority to confirm will be greatly increased if the Committee and the Union can agree on the general terms of a new agreement. There appears to be no hope of obtaining GA approval for any proposal which the Committee cannot accept and recommend.

7. With respect to the substance of the issues involved, the following points might usefully be made:

a. While it is obvious that the views of the Union and members of the Committee on the ICJ opinion do not coincide, these divergencies in legal opinion do not constitute an insuperable difficulty; such legal issues as whether the mandate has or has not terminated, whether the UN has or has not succeeded—in law—to the functions of the LN, etc., could be left to one side if agreement in principle were reached that the new agreement would, in so far as is possible, re-establish the procedures which obtained under the Mandate.

b. The establishment of machinery as proposed in the Committee draft would result in consideration of South West Africa by bodies whose composition and procedures would be most favorable to the Union. Such features as the unanimity rule, closed meetings, the expert character of the primary consideration given to the administration of the Territory, would serve to protect the interests of the Union.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, July 16, 1951.

US/A/AC.49/6

Subject: Counter-Proposal of the Ad Hoc Committee re South West Africa

Participants: The South African Ambassador the Honorable G. P. Jooste
Mr. W. Dirkse-van-Schalkwyck, First Secretary
Mr. Hickerson, UNA Mr. Allen, EUR[2]
Mr. Gerig, UND Mr. Shullaw, BNA

The South African Ambassador, Mr. Jooste, called on me today at my request to discuss the counter-proposal regarding Southwest Africa which the Ad Hoc Committee presented to the South African representatives in New York on July 12. I told the Ambassador that I believed real progress had been made in the negotiations between the [1] Drafted by J. Harold Shullaw of the Office of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs.

[2] Ward P. Allen, Special Assistant for United Nations Affairs, Bureau of European Affairs.

Committee and the South African representatives. I said that the counter-proposal made by the Committee included the three basic principles which were generally agreed on by the negotiating groups. These principles were:

1. That an agreement be negotiated to regulate the future status of Southwest Africa.
2. That provision might be made for some form of implementation, and
3. That certain modifications might be made in the terms of the present mandate.

The basic difference between the Ad Hoc Committee and the Union Government is with regard to the mode of implementation. I said that in actual practice, however, this difference would not be great since even in the absence of an agreement the General Assembly would certainly discuss Southwest Africa. Discussions in UN, in our opinion, would be far less hostile if agreement with the UN were achieved on the basis of the counter-proposal of the Committee. This counter-proposal affords the Union Government safeguards by establishing a commission of experts which would examine annual reports and which might meet in private. Furthermore the proposed small Political Committee would include South Africa and would act on the basis of unanimity.

I told Mr. Jooste that we believed there was a chance of getting the General Assembly to approve an agreement along the lines of the counter-proposal but that anything less, we were firmly convinced, would not get the necessary two-thirds vote. I said that speaking as a friend of South Africa I most earnestly urged that the South African Government accept the counter-proposal in principle with the details to be worked out with the Committee. I said that I believed such action was in the interests of South Africa since a solution of the problem of Southwest Africa would enable South Africa to play the role in UN to which its importance as a nation entitled it.

In replying to my remarks, Ambassador Jooste said that it was not the details but the principles to which his Government would object. He said that he did not believe his Government would accept any agreement which resulted in reports finding their way directly or indirectly to the General Assembly. He remarked that this was a matter not only of Government policy but also of public opinion. In the past discussion of the administration of Southwest Africa had inevitably led to a discussion of the racial policies of South Africa itself, this notwithstanding Article 2(7) of the Charter. In response to a question, Ambassador Jooste stated it would be clearly impossible and undesirable for South Africa to pursue a different racial policy in Southwest Africa than in the metropole because 1) to do so would admit that the latter policy was wrong; 2) in Southwest Africa segregation is necessary for the protection of the native versus the white man; and 3) geographical contiguity would make it impossible. He remarked that the question of reports had been exaggerated out of all reason and that the amour propre of both the UN and South Africa had become involved. He expressed doubt that the Committee would even accept negotiation of an agreement between the remaining Allied and Associated Powers and South Africa. Mr. Gerig remarked at this point that the Committee had not rejected the idea of the agreement being negotiated with the three remaining Allied and Associated Powers with subsequent General Assembly approval. The United States would be quite prepared to join the United Kingdom and France as the contracting powers provided the latter were willing and the General Assembly did not oppose this procedure.

The Ambassador recalled that in the negotiations he had from the beginning attempted to keep the position fluid. He said that Mr. Steyn, who has now returned to South Africa, will endeavor to persuade the South African Government to delay its reply to the Committee's counter-proposal for a month or even two months and not to reject it immediately as they would probably be inclined to do.

In the general discussion which followed the Ambassador's remarks, the point was repeatedly stressed that Southwest Africa would continue to be discussed in UN regardless of whether or not agreement were reached with the negotiating Committee. Acceptance of the counter-proposal would place South Africa in a stronger position and would lessen the acrimonious character of the discussions, since such discussions in the General Assembly would then be within the framework of South Africa's own report as transmitted by the Committee of which South Africa is a member. Moreover, we felt that with the problem of the agreement removed from the political arena, the other question of the treatment of Indians would assume less importance and arouse much less controversy and interest. Furthermore the safeguards provided in the counter-proposal for South Africa did protect South African interests.

The Ambassador said that while the individual members of the Committee had been friendly and even sympathetic, they had in some instances been the spokesmen for UN blocs and their freedom of action had been inhibited by that fact. He mentioned as an example the position of the Syrian representative on the Committee. He admitted, however, that to date the negotiations had accomplished one thing at least. They have demonstrated to the South African Government that it is possible for South Africa to discuss this problem with a cross section of the UN without coming to blows. The Ambassador expressed his appreciation for the helpful attitude of the United States on the Committee and for the time we had given him and said that he would communicate over [our?] views to his government.

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, July 17, 1951—6 p. m.

13. Negots between GA Ad Hoc Comite SW Afr and Union have reached point where Dept considers approach thru dipl channels may be useful. Accordingly Dept called in Jooste yesterday urge acceptance in principle by Union new draft agreement (text by air pouch) along lines submitted by Comite using arguments outlined below. You shld take same line, in your discretion and as opportunity affords, with officials FonOff.

US strongly hopes Union will agree accept Comite draft in principle since a. Comite proposal includes three basic principles agreed to by Union rep and Comite; i.e., (1) new agreement regulating future status terr be negotiated, (2) provision cld be made for implementation, (3) certain modifications re mil and security provisions be made in terms mandate.

b. US confident GA will continue discuss SW Afr any event, hence little practical gain to Union in restricting implementation to ICJ thru judicial supervision as Union proposes rather than accepting Comite proposals for implementation thru UN paralleling LN procedures far as possible. Latter arrangement wld result in far less hostile, acrimonious GA discussion, thus favoring Union and indirectly other free nations friends of Union. Successful negot agreement will remove question SW Afr from category "special" UN problem attracting undue attention, lead to consideration more normal atmosphere.

c. Union interest adequately safeguarded under proposed procedures since reports wld be examined by expert Comm which cld meet privately and which wld report to small polit comite, including Union, resembling League Council and operating basis unanimity. Such procedure wld place ultimate report to GA under control since wld have to be unanimously approved by 15 members GA.

d. US given careful study to proposal of Comite and considers that, while GA approval agreement on present lines possible, any proposal containing less than principles set forth present draft wld fail to obtain required two-thirds majority in GA.

As to parties to such agreement, US wld be willing as one of remaining Principal Allied and Associated Powers to be one of contracting parties, if GA approved, and if UK and France agreed, and if such arrangement were still desired by Union as proposed by Union rep when putting forward Union proposal.

In view above considerations and after careful study question, U.S. strongly urges acceptance points in Comite draft as best means liquidating question and removing cause for attacks in UN on important member free community of nations.

FYI Jooste said Govt acceptance difficult in view present state public opinion and accordingly he and Dr. Steyn recommending delay of month or six weeks for further reflection. Dept gained impression counter proposal wld not be rejected in toto. Believes suggestion for delay in reply may be useful. Jooste feels fact negots with Comite representing cross section UN held in such cooperative and friendly atmosphere represents significant progress and will help show his Govt it possible deal amicably with UN on vital matters.

38. Union unlikely accept UN counterproposal on South West Africa Secy FonOff Forsyth [1] said privately Aug 1 during our discussion based on Deptel 13, July 17 and Depgam 4, July 18.[2] He stated officially Cabinet now considering matter and thought its decision wld be taken in about two weeks.

Forsyth expressed his appreciation of ad hoc comite's efforts, their proposal showing they had given careful and sympathetic consideration to problem and Unions view. But comite proposal still required submission reports petitions to UN body reporting to GA, and he did not see how Cabinet cld agree to this in view Prime Minister's several public statements Union wld not submit reports to any UN body and low esteem in which Cabinet regard UN. To comment that if problem not settled and taken out of lime-light South Africa wld continue be subject charges and adverse criticism in UN he replied he thought present govt did not particularly care if this happened. He agree proposal took case out of Comite 4 and acknowledged unanimity requirement protection for Union but remarked countries like India, Arabs States, Mexico, etc., which were Union's severest and loudest critics altho they had no direct interest in or knowledge of colonial problems wld still be able make accusations when 15 nation comite reports to GA. Attitude these countries long been sore point with Union.

In addition UN connection, another unacceptable point in comite proposal Forsyth mentioned was obligation enfranchise natives (presumably para 6 draft) even tho such a stand wld be very long way off. This he said wld be polit impossible for any South African Govt in view public opinion as wld lead to end white supremacy. (We feel he is correct on this point).

Asked about Union's attitude if body to which reports were submitted was composed of countries having overseas possessions and thus familiar with problem and nominated by, for example, ICJ, he replied that in that event he did not foresee great difficulty in a satisfactory agreement being reached.

From Forsyth's remarks we conclude (1) Union wants settle SWA case but (2) almost no chance it will accept any agreement giving GA final say in matter.

Department of State Instruction to the United States Delegation to the Sixth Regular Session of the General Assembly of the United Nations [1]

RESTRICTED [WASHINGTON,] October 11, 1951.

SD/A/C.4/89

THE QUESTION OF SOUTH WEST AFRICA

THE PROBLEM

The problem is to determine the position which the United States Delegation should take with regard to the question of South West Africa.

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. The Delegation should favor continued efforts to achieve agreement, consistent with the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice, with the Union of South Africa on the future status of the territory of South West Africa.

2. The Delegation should support the position of the Ad Hoc Committee on South West Africa as outlined in its report to the Assembly and any action by the Assembly urging the Union to reconsider its stand and accept the Committee's offer of further consultations on the basis of the Committee's draft agreement.

3. If there appears to be any possibility of further consultations with the Union along the lines proposed by the Committee, the United States should endeavor to discourage any action by the Assembly which might prejudice such consultations.

4. If the Union maintains its stand that the Committee's proposal is unacceptable to it as a basis for further consultations, the Delegation should attempt to moderate any unduly critical or condemnatory action by the Assembly but should support any reasonably moderate action such as (a) urging the Union to implement the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice, (b) recommending resumption of reporting by the Union on South West Africa or (c) recommending acceptance by the Union of the Committee's draft agreement.

5. The Delegation may indicate its willingness to examine any further suggestions as to procedures for implementing the Court's opinion. However, it should not indicate support for any procedure which would wholly divorce the General Assembly from the supervisory machinery.

6. If the question is raised as to whether the United States, as one of the remaining Principal Allied and Associated Powers, would be willing to be one of the contracting parties to an agreement with the Union the Delegation should indicate that the United States would be willing to do so if the United Kingdom and France agreed and if the agreement is approved by the General Assembly.

7. With regard to the petitions attached to the report of the Committee on South West Africa the Delegation should take the position that as they have been forwarded to the Union Government in conformity with the procedures of the former Mandates System it would be preferable that no action be taken pending receipt of comments from the Union Government during the six months period allowed for the transmission of such comments.

COMMENT

The question of South West Africa is on the Assembly's agenda by virtue of General Assembly Resolution 449 A (V), of which the United States was one of the co-sponsors. Paragraph 3 of the operative part of this resolution "establishes a Committee of five consisting of representatives of Denmark, Syria, Thailand, United States of America and Uruguay, to confer with the Union of South Africa concerning the procedural measures necessary for implementing the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice and to submit a report thereon to the next regular session of the General Assembly". Paragraph 4 "authorizes the Committee, as an interim measure, pending the completion of its task referred to in paragraph 3, and, as far as possible in accordance with the procedure of the former Mandates System, to examine the report on the administration of the Territory of South West Africa covering the period since the last report, as well as petitions and any other material relating to the Territory that may be transmitted to the Secretary-General, and to submit a report thereon to the next regular session of the General Assembly."

With regard to paragraph 3, the report of the Committee recounts the activities of the Committee, including the proposal made to it by the Union of South Africa, the counter-proposal made to the Union by the Committee (in the form of a draft agreement for South West Africa), and notes the unwillingness of the Union to accept the Committee's counter-proposal as a basis for further consultations. The Committee, while thus having reached an impasse at the time of the adoption of its report, continued to hold the door open for further consultations on the basis of its own counter-proposal.[2]

The United States played an active role in the work of the Committee and considers that the Committee made a careful and commendable effort to achieve agreement with the Union. We regret that the Union has been unable to accept as a basis for discussion the draft agreement submitted to it by the Committee. We consider this draft agreement fair and reasonable; furthermore, it is doubtful if any proposal containing less than the principle set forth therein could be considered to be in conformity with the Court's opinion or would be approved by the General Assembly. We hope, therefore, that the Union will reconsider its stand and accept the Committee's offer of further consultations on the basis of the substance of the Committee's proposal.

While there are difficulties inherent in further delays on this question, the United States considers that it would be advantageous for the Committee to continue consultations with the Union if the latter shows any willingness to consult further on the basis of the substance of the Committee's counter-proposal. However, should the Union maintain its position that it can not accept the Committee's counter-proposal as a basis for discussion, it is difficult to see any useful purpose that could be served by endeavoring to continue consultations. In the face of such an attitude on the part of the Union, the United States, in order to maintain a consistent position, would be obliged to support action by the Assembly urging the Union to implement the Court's opinion and while the Delegation should endeavor to avoid condemnatory action by the Assembly, it could scarcely oppose a resolution which contained certain critical implications.

With regard to paragraph 4 of Resolution 449 A (V) the report of the Committee states that the Committee was unable to comply with the General Assembly's instructions because no reports were submitted. So far as the examination of petitions is concerned the Committee reports that it considered two communications addressed to the Secretary General on the question of South West Africa, accepted them as petitions and, in accordance with the procedures of the former Mandates System, transmitted them to the Union Government for comment. Copies of the petitions are attached to the Committee's report. It would not seem appropriate, therefore, to take any further action on these petitions, both of which were addressed to the Chairman of the Ad Hoc Committee on South West Africa, pending the receipt of comments thereon by the Union Government during the six months period allowed for the transmission of such comments under the procedures of the former Mandates System. Should new petitions be brought up for consideration in the Fourth Committee, they would have to be judged on their merits and the Delegation would consult the Department as necessary.

In connection with the examination of any further suggestions as to procedures for implementing the Court's opinion, the United States could not support procedures which would wholly divorce the General Assembly from the supervisory machinery because such procedures would not be in conformity with the advisory opinion of the Court. The Court arrived at the conclusion "that the General Assembly of the United Nations is legally qualified to exercise the supervisory functions previously exercised by the League of Nations with regard to the administration of the Territory, and that the Union of South Africa is under an obligation to submit to supervision and control of the General Assembly and to render annual reports to it".

The Union, in its proposal to the Committee, suggested that it might make an agreement with the remaining Principal Allied and Associated Powers of World War I (i.e., United Kingdom, France and United States) establishing its responsibility toward South West Africa. The representative of the United States on the Committee was authorized to state that the United States was willing to be one of the contracting parties to an agreement such as that proposed by the Committee if the United Kingdom and France agreed and if it was approved by the General Assembly. There appears to be no reason why this position should be altered.

Union Government had indicated that it was prepared to continue the discussions on the basis of the proposal which it had made to the Ad Hoc Committee. He reiterated the South African position that it could not submit reports on the administration of the territory. He then said that the Committee had rejected the South African proposal on the basis that it did not fall within the Committee's terms of reference and indicated that South Africa would look with favor upon the re-establishment of the Committee or a similar committee with broader terms of reference which would permit it to consider the South African proposal. Mr. Hickerson expressed doubt that such a course was feasible. Ambassador Jooste said that he hoped that the General Assembly would not take the position that the counter proposal of the Ad Hoc Committee constituted the only basis for a future agreement between the United Nations and the Union with respect to this question. He added that he hoped that the General Assembly would appreciate, as he was certain that the Ad Hoc Committee had, that South Africa in its negotiations with the Committee had made an honest and sincere effort to arrive at an agreement on this complicated question.

1. If Union South Africa replies to Cmte accepting offer continue consultations on basis of "substance of Cmtes counter-proposal" Del shld work actively to have Cmte continued or reconstituted for this purpose.

I spoke in turn with Havenga,[2] Sauer [3] and Naude.[4] All three said that action of Trusteeship Comite in agreeing receive Herero petitions on So West Afr came as complete surprise to govt.[5] All three expressed concern about action. Havenga stressed particularly that govt was unprepared for this and characterized situation as "very serious." I found that he was not inclined to say more. Sauer emphasized that So African Govt was trying very hard to coop with West. Actions, such as taken by Trusteeship Comite, however, aroused public opinion very much. That made govts position very difficult. Govt now was faced among other things with difficult problem placating public opinion. Naude said he felt govt shld avoid any extreme action at this time so as not to call any more attn to the Trusteeship Comite action than absolutely necessary.

Sole [7] FonOff UN expert emphasized to us no legal basis for Comite 4 action since GA not Comite 4 set up ad hoc comite which was instructed operate along League mandate comite procedure requiring petitions be submitted through administrating power for later transmittal with its comments to mandate comite. Hence matter is properly one only GA can consider, not Comite 4.

Webber, editor govt mouthpiece Die Burger told Sweeney [8] govt took a serious view of US abstention.[9] He claimed Cabinet considered ordering Donges [10] to leave Comite and return to Union, but did not consider leaving UN.[11] Cabinet, according to Webber felt that it had been unwise in committing Union wholeheartedly to West defense effort because US now thought it can count on Union and cld afford placate other powers. Webber believes solution SWA problem is outright incorporation of territory into Union.

United States Delegation Working Paper: Draft Resolution on South West Africa

CONFIDENTIAL [PARIS,] December 1, 1951.

US/A/C.4/212

The General Assembly,

Believing that an agreed solution of the vexed question of South West Africa would not only bring greater peace and harmony to the Continent of Africa, but would contribute significantly to the relieving of tensions in wider areas of the world;

2. Considering that the general acceptance of the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice of 11 July 1950 would greatly strengthen the rule of law and reason in international affairs and thus the defenses of the United Nations;

3. Having by resolution 449 (V) of 13 December 1950 accepted the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice with respect to South West Africa;

4. Having established a Committee of five consisting of the representatives of Denmark, Syria, Thailand, the United States of America and Uruguay to confer with the Union of South Africa concerning the procedural measures necessary for implementing the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice;

5. Having authorized this Committee, as an interim measure, to examine the report on the administration of the Territory of South West Africa covering the period since the last report, as well as petitions and any other matters relating to the Territory that may be transmitted to the Secretary-General;

6. Having received the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on South West Africa (A/1901, A/1901/Add.1, A/1901/Add.2, A/1901/Add.3);

7. Noting that the Union of South Africa submitted to the Ad Hoc Committee on South West Africa a proposal which the Ad Hoc Committee found unacceptable because it did not allow for an adequate implementation of the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice and because the proposal made no provision for the supervision of the administration of the Territory of South West Africa by the United Nations;

8. Noting that the Ad Hoc Committee submitted to the Union of South Africa a counter-proposal based on the existing Mandates Agreement and providing for a procedure for the supervision of the administration of the Territory of South West Africa by the United Nations as nearly as possible analogous to that which existed under the League of Nations, and to the extent practicable, involving international obligations no more extensive or onerous than those existing under the League of Nations;

9. Noting that the Union of South Africa, in reply to the Ad Hoc Committee's counter-proposal, was willing to resume negotiations only on the basis of its own proposal, and informed the Committee that the Union of South Africa was unable to accept the principle of submission of reports on the administration of the Territory;

10. Noting with concern that the Ad Hoc Committee was unable to comply with the resolution of the General Assembly to examine the report on the administration of the Territory of South West Africa because no report was received and that no petitions were transmitted by the Union of South Africa;

11. Recalling that the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice with respect to the Territory of South West Africa sets forth, inter alia, that

(a) The Territory of South West Africa is a territory under the international Mandate assumed by the Union of South Africa on 17 December 1920;

(b) the Union of South Africa, acting alone, has not the competence to modify the international status of the Territory of South West Africa, and that the competence to determine and modify the international status of the Territory rests with the Union of South Africa acting with the consent of the United Nations;

(c) the Union of South Africa continues to have the international obligations stated in Article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations and in the Mandate for South West Africa as well as the obligation to transmit petitions from the inhabitants of that Territory, the supervisory functions to be exercised by the United Nations, to which the annual reports and the petitions are to be submitted;

12. Commends the Ad Hoc Committee on South West Africa for its earnest and constructive efforts to find a reasonable basis of agreement;

13. Endorses, in principle, as a minimum, the proposal of the Committee, appended hereto;

14. Deplores the fact that the Union of South Africa, in the course of the negotiations with the Committee, while prepared to negotiate on the basis of certain articles of the Mandate, indicated its unwillingness to give adequate expression to its international obligations with respect to South West Africa, and in particular with regard to the supervisory responsibility of the United Nations toward this Territory;

15. Declares that since the Union Government cannot escape its international obligations by unilateral action, the United Nations cannot recognise as valid any measures taken unilaterally by the Union of South Africa, which would modify the international status of the Territory of South West Africa;

16. Appeals solemnly to the Government of the Union of South Africa to reconsider its position, and urges it to resume negotiations on the basis of the Ad Hoc Committee's proposal for the purpose of concluding an agreement providing for the full implementation of the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice; and urges it further to submit reports on the administration of the Territory of South West Africa and to transmit petitions from communities or sections of the population of the Territory to the United Nations;

17. Continues until the next regular session of the General Assembly the Ad Hoc Committee on South West Africa, established by resolution 449 (V), and requests it to continue to confer with the Union of South Africa concerning means of implementing the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice;

18. Authorizes the Ad Hoc Committee on South West Africa, as an interim measure, and pending the completion of the negotiations with the Union of South Africa, and as far as possible in accordance with the procedure of the former Mandates System, to examine reports on the administration of the Territory of South West Africa as well as petitions and any other matters relating to the Territory that may be transmitted to the Secretary-General;

19. Requests the Ad Hoc Committee to submit a report on its activities to the next regular session of the General Assembly.

Editorial Note

On November 16 an event had occurred in the Fourth Committee with important consequences for the ongoing debate on the report of the Ad Hoc Committee. The Fourth Committee voted favorably on a nine-power (Brazil, Cuba, Ecuador, Egypt, Guatemala, India, Indonesia, Pakistan, and the Philippines) joint draft resolution which provided that the Committee would hear petitioners from the Herero and Nama peoples of South West Africa in the person of certain named chiefs or headmen and/or other spokesmen designated by them (UN Doc. A/C.4/L.136; for text, see UN Doc. A/C.4/190 which has the same text, GA (VI), Annexes, agenda item 38). The joint draft resolution was adopted by 37 votes to 7, with 7 abstentions. The United States abstained from voting.

The United States Delegate, Ambassador Francis B. Sayre, made a statement to the Committee just before the vote. He said that "largely for the reasons put forward by the Danish representative" and partly because the Ad Hoc Committee of which the United States was a member had already expressed its view on the question, the United States Delegation would abstain. The Danish Delegate, Mr. Lannung, in an earlier statement had emphasized that he did not believe that the Fourth Committee was entitled to grant hearings in this case without the consent of South Africa. (GA (VI), Fourth Committee, page 19)

This was the basis of the position set forth by Dr. Donges, the Delegate of South Africa, in a strong statement which drew a distinction between the Committee's powers with regard to trusteeship territories vis-à-vis Non-self-governing Territories outside the United Nations trusteeship system. "The United Nations Charter contained no provision for the hearing of oral petitions from non-self-governing territories." At the conclusion of his statement, Dr. Donges cautioned the Committee:

"The Committee would make its own decision; all he could do was to draw its attention to the implications involved in accepting the draft resolution. He had done so to the best of his ability and, whatever the outcome, the responsibility would rest on the shoulders of the Committee." (GA (VI), Fourth Committee, page 18)

Minutes of Twenty-fifth Meeting of the United States Delegation to the General Assembly, Paris, December 4, 1951

SECRET

US/A/M(Chr)/212

[Here follows list of persons (37) present. Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt was in the chair.]

1. South West Africa. Mr. Gerig recalled that this question had been before the UN for several years. The territory of South West Africa was the last of the League mandates not turned into a trust territory or given its independence or otherwise provided for under the UN. Pointing out that the territory of South West Africa was about the size of Pennsylvania, populated principally by Hereros, Mr. Gerig noted that some 600 miles of border contiguous with the Union of South Africa served to complicate the situation. The territory had been mandated under the League of Nations since 1920 to the Union Government, which had rendered annual reports on it to the League and allowed written petitions to be accepted and examined. When the League came to an end, the Union took the position that it was no longer bound by the mandate. In fact, the Union Government had been taking steps to incorporate this territory into its own. An opposite view had been taken by the vast majority of states, who believed that the elements of international status still clung to the territory, and regarded the incorporation of the territory into the Union as an improper procedure. This latter position had been considerably strengthened when the Malan government came into power in South Africa and promulgated the Group Areas Act—legislation which enforced a policy of apartheid, or racial segregation, of an extreme nature. Parenthetically, Mr. Gerig noted that it was at this point that the question of South West Africa touched upon the question of the treatment of Indians in South Africa.

The question of whether the mandate of the League carried over had been submitted to the International Court of Justice, for an Advisory Opinion. The Court stated that the mandate did continue in force and that the Union Government could not unilaterally act to end the mandatory status of the territory, without the consent of the UN. The advisory opinion stated further that the Union Government was obliged to render reports to the UN on conditions in South West Africa and to transmit petitions. In response to this advisory opinion the Union Government said that it would continue to govern the territory in the spirit of the mandate in the policies it pursued but refused at the same time to recognize that the mandate continued in force.

Mr. Gerig remarked that the US had submitted its views on this question to the Court when it was considering the case. As the advisory opinion followed so closely the views expressed in the US submission, there was an added reason for the US to take all possible steps to seek the acceptance of and compliance with the opinion. In this connection he said that the Advisory Opinion had expressed the idea that the UN should not impose upon the Union Government undertakings which were more onerous than those required by the League Mandate. As examples of League conditions which do not exist under the UN, Mr. Gerig mentioned the requirement of unanimity and secrecy which attached to the mandate procedure.

When the question was discussed at the 5th GA, the US felt that in order to implement the Advisory Opinion, and to gain the assent of the Union Government, it would not be wise to have the General Assembly dictate the terms of settlement. We had previously indicated our preference for taking representatives of the Union Government into the negotiations on this question, and so had urged the creation at the 5th General Assembly of a Committee of Five to meet in New York and seek an agreed settlement. During the course of these committee meetings, the Union Government indicated its willingness to make an agreement with the US, the UK and France as the remaining Principal Allied Powers of World War I with whom they could deal on this matter, Japan and Italy having since been deprived of their role in this connection. To these three powers the Union Government would be willing to submit reports on the conditions prevailing in the territory and their conduct of the administration of South West Africa. They refused to submit this information to the UN as a whole. If there were any charges of non-compliance with the terms of the agreement they could be presented to the Court.

Mr. Gerig commented that the representatives of the Union Government had indicated privately that annual UN debates on the policies of the Union Government in the territory would make the domestic political situation unbearable. The Committee of Five felt that the Union Government's position was too far removed from the Advisory Opinion of the Court and therefore had made proposals to the Union to bring them nearer to that position. These proposals were rejected by the Union Government.

This had been the situation when the Sixth Session of the Assembly convened in Paris. Since then Committee 4 had taken action which Mr. Gerig felt to be a bit impetuous, by inviting the Herero chieftains to come and present their case to the Committee. This he felt exceeded the policies of the League under the mandate. The Union Government in response to this action by the Committee had sent a letter to the President of the Assembly, of which we had only unofficial cognizance which stated that the Union Government was compelled by this action to instruct its delegates to withdraw from further participation in Committee 4 on this matter. When this became generally known in Committee 4, Mr. Gerig predicted further violent reaction.[1]

The position paper prepared by the Department, document SD/A/C.4/89,[2] indicated that the US Delegation should continue to support the Advisory Opinion of the ICJ. In accordance with this paper, Mr. Gerig and Ambassador Sayre had been informally in touch with Prince Wan of Thailand, Chairman of the Ad Hoc Committee, and with a number of others, regarding a draft resolution which they termed the "grand appeal". This draft resolution was before the Delegation in document US/A/C.4/212.[3] In the words of the draft resolution itself, this was to be a "solemn appeal" to the Union Government to reconsider its position, and to resume negotiations through the Ad Hoc Committee of Five with a view to reaching agreement on the basis of the Court Opinion. In the course of formulating this draft, there had been evidence of support for this approach on a very broad basis. In addition to requesting the Delegation's approval of this draft resolution, Mr. Gerig and the staff wished to raise the question of sponsorship. Pointing out that there was nothing contained in Gadel 175 on this question, he believed that unfortunate results would flow from absence of US sponsorship.

Ambassador Sayre added to this presentation what he considered to be the important points requiring Delegation decision. First, there was a problem of the tone of the resolution. This was connected with the substance of the resolution itself. There were many "firebrands" in Committee 4 who were pressing for strong condemnatory action by the Committee. This draft, negotiated with Cuba, Ecuador, Egypt, Denmark, Iraq, Thailand and others, was intended to keep the door open to the possibility of furthering negotiations, as a way of implementing the Advisory Opinion of the Court. It would constitute one further appeal. The second problem involved sponsorhip. Recognizing the fact that US sponsorship of this resolution might incur the ill-will of the Union Government, he nevertheless felt it absolutely necessary in order to avoid loss of a restraining influence over potential "firebrands" in Committee 4 who would push for a strong condemnatory resolution. Mrs. Roosevelt asked what the precise purpose of the resolution was. Ambassador Sayre said that this resolution contemplated keeping the door open with the hope that there might be a change in attitude on the part of the Union Government.

Dr. Tobias [4] asked the indulgence of the Delegation while he expressed himself on the general nature of the problem. In detailing his connections with this matter he pointed out that he was the director of the Phelps-Stokes Fund, a philanthropic foundation, which had established the Institute of Race Relations in the Union of South Africa. This Institute was predominantly a church organization, and as such was only a part of the church movement in South Africa. The leaders of the Dutch Reform Church in South Africa, he recalled, were behind the Malan government. But this group at the Institute had been responsible for a pamphlet being written by Alan Paton, author of Cry, the Beloved Country, which contained a sober analysis of problems within the Union. He felt that the US ought to be extremely careful in its approach to this subject. In this connection he felt that the position paper of the Department had been "oversoft" in its wish to "moderate any unduly critical or condemnatory action by the assembly." He pointed out that this was not a question of how the Union Government handled its internal affairs. Were it such a question, the US and the UN would be "estopped" from investigating therein. He recalled that in Committee 4 a speaker had raised the question of the competence of the Committee to inquire into matters within non-self-governing territories, especially as to their capacity for statehood, or independence. Although he abhorred the internal policies of the Union Government, Dr. Tobias firmly supported the doctrine that the UN could not penetrate the barrier of domestic affairs. This was not the question in the case of South West Africa. It was a matter of international concern, recognized as such by the ICJ. The US could not afford to lean so far backward in a conciliatory attitude toward South Africa that its position would raise questions at home as to the consistency of our statements and actions. The people who firmly believe in freedom, as evidenced by the bloody struggle during the Civil War, would not be content with such a soft position, even given the necessary limitations of conducting international affairs. The US need not go out of its way to conciliate. Whereas the UK had a vested interest in South Africa, the US was not burdened with such interests. The US must live up to its traditions, and not succumb to the deplorable traditions of others.

Ambassador Sayre said that he felt very deeply the righteousness of Dr. Tobias' position. If anything could be done to stop South Africa from its present course, that should be done. He did not feel, however, that the draft resolution was being soft upon them. He indicated that the language in paragraphs 14, 15, et alia, was exceedingly strong in its approach. Dr. Tobias answered that he was not questioning the draft resolution, which he supported, but only the language in the position paper itself. Mrs. Roosevelt felt that the draft resolution was the only possible course. She personally felt the Union Government was courting disaster just as fast as could be done. She added the hope that when any US Delegate or staff member spoke to the South Africans they would make clear that the US was not being soft toward them. Dr. Tobias remarked that the only way people within the Union could ever achieve a change in policies was to have every possible support from without. Mr. Gerig remarked that high level conversations with the South Africans had been held in Washington, during which the disapproval of the US with the policies of the Union Government had been made very clear.

Mr. Vorys [5] questioned the listing in the position paper of various courses of action vis-à-vis the Union Government in the alternatives. He felt they should all be pursued. Mr. Gerig indicated that the draft resolution was doing exactly what had been suggested by Mr. Vorys. Ambassador Gross [6] was concerned with the use of two qualifying adjectives—"general" and "greatly"—in the second paragraph of the preamble of the draft resolution. It seemed to him that they unnecessarily weakened the effect and could well be redrafted to indicate our actual intentions. Mr. Gerig said that these words had not been intended to limit the effect in the way Ambassador Gross indicated, and could easily be changed. On the question of sponsoring, Mr. Gerig indicated the possibility that Cuba, Denmark, Ecuador, Egypt, and Thailand would join the US if the Delegation authorized the US to seek such action.

Mr. Cohen [7] thought that the emphasis on non-condemnatory language in the position paper blurred and weakened the US position. He did not object to the draft resolution, the language of which he felt to be quite satisfactory, but only the attitude of the Department which showed a tendency to weaken the position of the US in matters of this kind. Mr. Sandifer [8] commented that this resolution was as mild as an "electric sledge hammer", considering the history of the GA approach to this case. It was, he said, a very firm, even severe, resolution.

Mrs. Roosevelt took it that the position of the Delegation was that there was no objection to the draft resolution or to the US seeking to co-sponsor it. The only objection was the the language contained in the position paper of the Department, which was too mild.[9]

[Here follows brief discussion of another matter.]

[9] In Paris telegram Delga 494, December 4, 1 p.m., the Delegation transmitted the text of the operative paragraphs of the draft resolution (paragraphs 12–19) to the Department. The Department of State was informed that it was the "unanimous" feeling of the Delegation that the United States should agree to cosponsor such a resolution "now being drawn up by dels of Thailand, Denmark, Iraq, Egypt, Cuba, Ecuador and others . . . since such wide co-sponsorship will apparently secure near unanimous support of resolution in committee. Unless Dept instructs otherwise, del [will] follow this course." (320/12–451)

CONFIDENTIAL PRETORIA, December 6, 1951—5 p. m.

155. I called on Secy for External Affairs Forsyth this morning for purpose of introducing Robertson.[1] After a brief exchange of pleasantries. Forsyth embarked on discussion of UN SWA issue and the "Illegality", in the absence of any authority provision in the Charter, of the Trusteeship Comite action in inviting Scott [2] to appear before it. In response to my observation concerning difficulty of getting Cabinet consideration on important developments, with Prime Min already in Capetown and other Cabinet members preparing to leave, he stated categorically that Cabinet had met some days ago and made full decision on its position if Trusteeship Comite "Carried the matter too far." He stated that Union was more determined than ever to face this issue squarely and gave as reasons:

1. Illegality, in absence of Charter provision, of Trusteeship Comite's action to invite Scott and Herero chiefs to appear for a hearing.
2. Act [Fact?] Herero tribe in SWA represent only limited minority of natives in territory while endeavoring to exercise claim over large part of territory.

At this point discussion was interrupted by telephone call from Prime Min in Capetown and we excused ourselves from his office. Upon our return Forsyth, intimating that subj of discussion had been UN

[1] David A. Robertson, First Secretary of Embassy, was appointed on October 24, 1951.

[2] Regarding the Reverend Mr. Michael Scott, see footnote 5, p. 676.

SWA issue, stated firmly Union wld not only refrain from participation in Trusteeship Comite while issue being considered but that, if Comite action pushed "too far," decision concerning Union withdrawal from entire UN might become imminent. I interjected that this wld be not only most unfortunate for Union, but also for all of us who were joined in common cause. He proceeded to reiterate that treatment being accorded Union "Completely illegal under Charter" and was almost unbearable to his govt, particularly coming on top of UN action on Indian issue, a "domestic issue." [3]

Forsyth stated that as an internationalist he was being placed in most difficult position in a govt which came to power as strong nationalist group, but which fortunately had wisdom at least to try out participating in intl cooperation on probs confronting us all today. Many of Union nationalist leaders were now pointing to error of this course, were thoroughly dissatisfied and now seemed determined to call a halt in face of mounting "mistreatment" from UN Trusteeship Comite. His people were beginning to feel that Union is being treated as small and unimportant country. When France raised objection to Trusteeship Comite inquiry concerning its territories I [it?] promptly dropped from consideration,[4] but comite virtually ignoring protests from Union. I assured him at this point US considered Union neither small nor unimportant. Contributions to West cause, I added, were fully appreciated by me and my govt.

We were impressed by frankness and deep feeling with which Forsyth talked to us.

[1] Dated December 1, p. 696.

[2] On December 8 Ambassador Sayre told the Fourth Committee that the draft resolution "was the culmination of the Committee's sincere efforts throughout the years to find a just and practicable solution to the thorny question of South West Africa. . . .

"It was greatly to be regretted that those efforts had failed. All the Committee could do was to support the opinion of the International Court of Justice and to hope that the Government of the Union of South Africa would give effect to that opinion. It was essential to maintain the rule of law and reason in international affairs. A just solution in respect of South West Africa would bring greater peace and harmony not only to Africa but also to the world as a whole. The people and Government of the Union of South Africa believed in the rule of law and had contributed much to its maintenance. . . . He therefore felt that a solemn appeal should be made to the Government of the Union of South Africa to reconsider its position and to resume negotiations on the basis of the proposals of the Ad Hoc Committee on South West Africa. . . . The joint draft resolution was couched in reasonable, though firm terms, and he trusted that it would win unanimous support." (GA (VI), Fourth Committee, p. 131.)

Delga 621. Subject: South West Africa. Committee 4 today adopted eight-power joint resolution on Southwest Africa by vote of 39–5 (Soviet bloc)–8 (Australia, Belgium, Guatemala, Mexico, New Zealand, Peru, UK, Yugoslavia.)

Para 13 first eliminated on suggestion of Dominican Republic and agreed to by all sponsors. Reason given for its elimination was that it gave too much emphasis to proposals of Ad Hoc Committee (it was apparently not realized by proponents of elimination that this was the one para most unacceptable to Union). Consequential vote eliminated words "on basis of the Ad Hoc Committee" proposal from para 16.[1]

Concurrently, with the passage of the 8-power joint draft resolution, the Committee had entertained a 5-power (Cuba, Ecuador, Egypt, India, and the Philippines) joint draft resolution (UN Doc. A/C.4/L.157). This proposed that the General Assembly would reaffirm the position stated in its resolution 449 B (V) of December 13, 1950, that the normal way of modifying the international status of the Territory of South West Africa would be to place it under the United Nations trusteeship system by means of an instrument negotiated under Chapter XII of the United Nations Charter. Immediately after the vote on the 8-power resolution extending the life of the Ad Hoc Committee on South West Africa, on December 11, the Fourth Committee adopted the 5-power draft resolution, 33 votes to none, with 17 abstentions. The United States abstained from voting.

The following is the official summary record of the United States Delegate's statement on this occasion:

"82. Mr. Sayre (United States of America), in explanation of his vote, said that it was not obligatory for the Government of the Union of South Africa to put South West Africa under the International Trusteeship System, although that could be regarded as the desirable and normal procedure. He felt, therefore, that nothing was to be gained by repeating General Assembly resolution 449 (V), and that there would even be a danger of cheapening United Nations resolutions by reiterating the previous year's resolution. A solemn appeal had already been made to the Government of the Union of South Africa to reconsider the implementation of the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice, and he felt it inadvisable to urge that Government at present to go farther. He would therefore abstain from voting on draft resolution A/C.4/L.157." (GA (VI), Fourth Committee, p. 152)

CONFIDENTIAL
PRIORITY

PARIS, December 13, 1951—1 a. m.

Delga 641. Re: Southwest Africa. We noted from Pretoria's 155 to Dept, Dec 6, Forsyth's insistence that South Africa was being deprived of its legal rights in UN concerning SW Africa. Forsyth appears to have maintained that Fourth Comite action in inviting Herero chiefs and reps to Paris was in violation of court's opinion on SW Africa. Both Forsyth in Pretoria and South African del in Paris have based their walkout from Comite Four on what they contend is illegal action of Fourth Comite.

According to South Africans, action is illegal because under mandate oral petitions were not permitted in League of Nations practice, and no oral hearings on written petitions were permitted. South Africans appear entirely to overlook fact that GA in considering SW Africa item is doing more than simply exercising internatl supervision of South Africa's mandate administration over SW Africa. We of course agree that GA in exercising such supervision shld fol ICJ opinion under which UN supervision of mandate administration is to fol League of Nations pattern; under League of Nations practice, there were no oral petitions or oral hearings on written petitions. But GA is considering item which also includes problem of future status of Southwest Africa, which under ICJ opinion is status that can be modified only by agreement between South Africa and UN.

In considering latter aspects SW Africa item, GA and its comites are obviously entitled, in accordance with long-standing practice, to invite individuals to GA session for purpose of making statements to Comite Four and presenting views which comite might find relevant in its discussions. Believe we shld make it entirely clear to South Africans that in US view, South African assertion that Comite Four illegal action is groundless and can constitute no basis whatsoever for South African walkout from comite. South African govt may be under impression that US agrees with it on this issue or at least believes there may be some merit in South African view. Any such thought on part of South African Govt shld, it seems to us, be effectively dispelled.

Suggest, therefore, Dept may wish to instruct Embassy Pretoria to discuss matter further with Forsyth, for purpose of explaining to him US views on legality of Fourth Comite action in inviting Herero chiefs and reps. We believe Union legal position on Fourth Comite action, to effect that South Africa is being deprived of its legal rights by unconstitutional action of comite, may be serious obstacle to achievement of our primary objective at this time with respect to SW Africa, which is acceptance by the Union of the ICJ opinion. We wld hope that if South Africa cld be shown that their legal position was not sound, or at least that it was not shared by other UN members, such as US, South Africa might be more ready to accept ICJ opinion.

We note from report of conversation with Forsyth that he referred to Moroccan item in GA as example of how improper agenda items were definitely disposed of when western great powers were determined to stand together on an issue concerning non-self-governing territories. It might be well in this connection to point out to Forsyth that action taken by GA on Moroccan item has simply been to postpone consideration for present. This action was taken by GA on basis of definite statements made to Assembly by responsible French ministers concerning a program of evolution which French Govt was determined to push ahead in Morocco. It cld be pointed out that South Africa on the other hand, instead of announcing any progressive programs relating to such GA items as Southwest Africa and the treatment of Indians in South Africa, for three years proclaimed its intention to try to turn the clock back and institute in the territories under the control of the South African Govt a political and social system which the great majority of UN members find contrary to the purposes and aspirations of the UN in the field of human rights and incompatible with the obligations of members under Article 55 and 56.

164. Prime Min Malan announced in Capetown last night for release this morning's papers that South Africa (re Embtel 155, Dec. 6) wld withdraw from proceedings Gen Assembly "pending the possible hearing and satisfactory consideration our complaint against fourth comite". Full text given Reuters by SAPA. Emb airmailing copy today. Substance as fols:[1]

1. Claims "overwhelming majority of the people" feel "deep indignation" over UN action. "In conflict with UN in own charter and rules of procedures contact has been made over our heads with individuals in Southwest Africa and Michael Scott, a well-known, hostile and fanatical foreigner and agitator, has been called on give evidence against us." Thus "rights allocated to us under the Treaty of Versailles have been violated. The UN has committed aggression against us".

[1] A verbatim text was sent to the Department in Pretoria's despatch 376, December 13, 1951 (320/12–1351).

2. South Africa no longer satisfied with ordinary protests. "More forceful and, if needs be, drastic action called for".

3. Donges recalled for oral report.

4. "The fundamental principle of the charter is this: That, this organization will not poke its nose into the domestic matters of other countries. If we had not laid down such a principle there wld have been absolute chaos. No one in the world, no nation, big or small, wld have known where it was.

"Unless nations are acknowledged as being sovereign and conduct their own internal affairs according to their own concept and their own system, you will have chaos in the world.

5. On basis reply of president GA refusing Donges appeal, Union assumes Assembly "silently associates itself with action of Fourth Comite, and onus now rests on GA to prove to the contrary and provide opportunity for presentation and discussion our complaint.

6. Lest anyone think this first time South Africa experienced antipathy of UN or that this applies only to present govt, he quoted from Smuts'[2] speech to Union Senate on Jan. 30, 1947 to show that Smuts had same experience.

7. From outset, UN alleged it had claim on trusteeship of Southwest Africa, "and for that reason, it cld force us into anything it wished in spite of charter".

8. UN even went further and after Smuts' last voluntary annual report, trusteeship comite "openly, or by implication, demanded full equality in all respects between all races and colors in Southwest Africa, including equal franchise, removal of residential separation in urban area, and breaking up of native reserves".

9. "Our withdrawal from the proceedings of the UN at least for this session, does not mean the resignation of our membership of that organization. We still want to believe that that organization has done much, and still can do much, for the maintenance of world peace. We will therefore continue to participate in the political comite in the discussions on gen disarmament and on Korea".

10. Dr. Malan appealed to all South Africans of all political parties, to support the govt in its action.

Memorandum by Mr. Robert R. Robbins of the Office of Dependent Area Affairs to the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] December 17, 1951.

Subject: Statements by Ambassador Jooste re United States Position on South West Africa

A memo of conversation of December 7, 1951,[1] reports that in a recent conversation with Mr. Ross (GADel) Ambassador Jooste made the following three points concerning the United States position on South West Africa:

1. That you and other United States representatives had assured him that "the Allied and Associated Powers idea" merited consideration;
2. That he had also been assured the United States would not join in any action condemnatory of the Union;
3. That characterizing the Ad Hoc Committee's proposals as a "minimum" left "no room for negotiation".

With respect to these points you may be interested in the following information:

1. Records of the several conversations between you and Ambassador Jooste refer to the "Allied and Associated Powers idea" only once, (July 17 [16], 1951).[2] Ambassador Jooste remarked that he did not believe that the Ad Hoc Committee would accept that idea. Mr. Gerig remarked that the Committee had not rejected the idea that the agreement be between the Powers and the Union with Assembly approval. The United States was quite prepared to join the United Kingdom and France as contracting powers provided the latter were willing and the Assembly did not oppose this procedure. This position was also stated in the Ad Hoc Committee and has been the consistent United States position on so much of the Union's proposal as dealt with the parties to an agreement.

[1] Not found in Department of State files.
[2] See memorandum of conversation, July 16, p. 684.

Jooste's statement to Ross appears to confuse the issues of procedure and substance and to imply that the United States had been sympathetic to the Union proposal on both. While the United States has never opposed idea of the remaining Allied and Associated Powers as parties to the Agreement, it has never indicated any support for the Union's proposal that the terms of agreement be limited to a resumption of Articles 2–5 of the original Mandate and has always told the Union that it strongly supported the Committee's draft of the terms of an agreement.

2. Whether the resolution recently adopted by the Fourth Committee may be termed "condemnatory" or not is obviously a matter of interpretation. It seems almost certain, however, that had the United States not taken the initiative in co-sponsoring a moderate resolution—which in final form merely "regretted" rather than "deplored" the Union's action—proposals indubitably condemnatory would have been made. Thus the United States not only did not support "condemnatory" action by the Assembly, but played an active part in the formulation and approval of a resolution which, in the circumstances, was extremely moderate.

3. With respect to the Committee's proposal as a basis of negotiation, you told Jooste in the July 17 conversation that while we believed there was a chance of getting Assembly approval for the Committee's proposal, we were firmly convinced that anything less would fail to get a two-thirds majority. Jooste should therefore have been aware that the United States would support the provision in the resolution (which was eliminated in final voting), by which the Assembly endorsed the Committee's proposal "in principle, as a minimum".

Copies of this memorandum are being sent to the Delegation for information.

SECRET WASHINGTON, December 18, 1951—3:35 p. m.

130. Fol is background on SW Africa question at GA: USGADel, in view US membership and active role in Ad Hoc Comite on SW Africa, was instructed support that Comite's report in Comite Four. Also, if Union maintained stand that Ad Hoc Comite's proposal unacceptable as basis further consultations Del was instructed attempt moderate any unduly critical or condemnatory action by GA. As situation in Comite Four made move for such action likely, Del joined with two other members Ad Hoc Comite (Denmark, Thailand) and other interested members Comite Four in exploring possibilities moderate Res acceptable to majority Comite Four. When draft of such Res emerged Del felt US shld agree co-sponsor in order help secure widest support in Comite Four, and Dept agreed.

Draft Res submitted on Dec. 7, co-sponsored by Cuba, Ecuador, Egypt, Iraq, Philippines, and above-mentioned Comite members, and adopted by Comite Four Dec. 11 by vote 39–5 (Soviet bloc)–8 (Aus., Belg., Guatemala, Mex., N.Z., Peru, UK, Yugoslavia). First eleven paras are recital of background and not of controversal character. Operative paras, except certain minor verbal changes not recd in Dept, being sent in fol tel.[1] Re para 16, election members reconstituted Comite not yet held.

Del discussed earlier draft of Res with Union Del. Latter particularly objected to word "deplores" with which para 14 originally opened. This was subsequently changed to "regrets". During adoption Res by Comite para which stated endorsement Ad Hoc Comite proposals "in principle, as minimum" was eliminated as suggestion Dom. Rep. with concurrence all sponsors. Reference to Ad Hoc Comite's proposal in para 15 of Res also eliminated. Over-emphasis on Comite's proposals stated as reason for these amendments. Del states these references among most unacceptable to Union. Del has informed Dept that "Union Del aware US playing important role adoption firm but reasonable Res based acceptance Court's opinion". However, it also true that Jooste has predicted to Del that "South Africa will probably never again return to Comite Four".

In future conversations you may have on this question with Union Govt officials, you may wish emphasize that if US had not participated actively in preparation and sponsorship Res, it is almost certain that a Res much more critical of Union and more unsatis to them wld have emerged and wld have been difficult, if not impossible, defeat. Many supporters eight-power Res might, for example, have given support extreme Guat Res had not widely sponsored moderate Res been introduced first.

With Ref statement urtel 155, Dec. 6, regarding possibility Union withdrawal from UN, Dept strongly hopes Union will not consider such action necessary. You may wish express this view to Union Govt officials on appropriate occasion, pointing out grave damage that wld result to unity of free world at this critical time.

SECRET PRETORIA, December 29, 1951—3 p. m.

Unnumbered. Personal for the Secretary. Prime Minister Malan asked me to call his residence this morning. He explained that as a result of an exchange of views with Donges, who would leave South Africa by air Monday the 31st for Paris, he wished to make a personal appeal to you through me.

Donges, is returning to Paris with draft resolution which he wishes, on appropriate occasion, to introduce in Assembly. Sense of resolution is that, in the absence of charter provision, committee four's action in inviting Herero chiefs to appear before it is illegal. Prime Ministers request is that you ask our UN delegation to get in touch with Donges, on his return to Paris.

I told Malan that I would convey his request to you. I inquired though why he was asking that our delegation take initiative in approaching Donges. His reply was that Donges had appealed to President of Assembly for hearing on committee four's action but that President of Assembly had said he could do nothing. That had led to South Africa "provisionally" and he repeated "provisionally" withdrawing from General Assembly proceedings the onus for present situation therefore rests with Assembly, first step in trying to resolve situation, he said, should come from source other than South Africa.

How I asked did he envisage getting proposed resolution before Assembly when South African delegation was abstaining from proceedings. That, he replied, was something Donges would want to discuss with steering committee.

Before leaving this subject Malan said he hoped very much way could be prepared for bringing proposed resolution before Assembly and that action favorable to South Africa by Assembly would result. Otherwise the result would "at least" be prolonged abstention of South Africa from General Assembly proceedings.

Malan then at length reviewed "intolerable" treatment of South Africa by UN in spite of what South Africa was doing in defense of Africa and Middle East and in Korea. From this he turned to detailed justification of administration of Southwest Africa. He made much of South Africa's "right" under League mandate system, to integrate Southwest Africa administratively in South Africa. Administratively South Africa and Southwest Africa were "one" if outsiders questioned acts of South African Parliament, they were interfering in internal affairs.

[1] Repeated to the Embassy in France as Gadel 570, December 31, 1 : 33 p. m., for the United States Delegation to the General Assembly, with the addition of the following: "Dept advises utmost caution due serious implications this request. Instructions follow soonest." (350/12–2951)

I responded that what South Africa was doing in Korea, was prepared to do in the defense of Africa and the Middle East, and was doing through sharing its mineral wealth in strengthening free world was fully appreciated by US. As for Southwest Africa, I said that it was true that South African Govt had administrative rights, "up to a point", but it was also true that the IJC had rendered opinion that international status of Southwest Africa could not be changed unilaterally, the important thing to remember, however in these difficult days was that all free nations suffer through weakening of UN. There must be give and take. I added that if it had not been for role our delegation in Paris had played, chances are that resolution on [South?] West Africa more critical of South Africa would have been adopted. We very much hope that South Africa would return to Committee Four and General Assembly proceedings. Complete withdrawal from UN by South Africa would be most harmful to South Africa and cause of whole free world.

Malan replied that his govt valued highly the good relations with the United States, especially in struggle against Communism leading part played by the United States in that field was deeply appreciated here. South Africa needed the United States in building up its armaments, and it was glad in turn to assist the United States with its mineral wealth.

On taking leave I told Malan that I wanted to keep in close touch with him [and?] he said he wanted that too.

[Here follows list of persons (34) present. Mrs. Roosevelt was in the chair. Three prior agenda items were taken up and disposed of.]

4. South West Africa proposal by South Africa

Mr. Taylor noted that South Africa wanted the United States to support a declaration in the plenary that Committee Four's action in inviting the Herero chieftains to be heard had been illegal. (See Delga 848).[1] No instructions had been received from the Department as yet. The Delegation might, he suggested, send some suggestions on the matter to the Department for its consideration.

[1] Not found in Department of State files.

Mr. McKay noted that South Africa had moved that the item on South West Africa be moved from last place on Committee Four's agenda to the second place. After considerable acrimonious debate, the Herero chiefs had been invited to come to Paris to participate. The resolution proposing this had been adopted by a vote of 37–7–7, the United States abstaining. Mr. McKay referred to Delga 848 which listed the arguments the South Africans had made in connection with the International Court's opinion on South West Africa. He reported that Robinson, a Canadian, had approached him the day before with the confidential information that the South Africans had proposed in a Commonwealth meeting the tabling of this resolution in the plenary which would declare the Committee Four action illegal. At that meeting the United Kingdom and Australian delegates had strongly opposed this move. Mr. Donges, the South African delegate, had been considerably shaken at this lack of support from quarters which usually were amenable to his ideas. Robinson suggested that, were the United States to follow up with another strong expression of opposition to the South Africans' proposed move, perhaps they could be persuaded to refrain from offering it.

Mr. Allen mentioned a conversation he had had with Ambassador Jooste, of South Africa, in which the various factors compelling the South Africans to make this or some other move had been set forth. Mr. Taylor asked if the Delegation were agreed that as to the merits of this proposed move the South Africans were in the wrong. He took it that we agreed the Fourth Committee had acted legally. He then asked how the United States could assist the South Africans in view of this position on the merits. One suggestion had been to let them put in a new item which would be referred to Committee Six on the legal aspects of their contention. Or conceivably South Africa could put its resolution in the plenary as an additional resolution connection with the South West Africa item. He wondered whether it would be politically desirable for the United States to take this advanced position in assisting South Africa.

Ambassador Jessup took it that the Delegation disagreed on the merits with the South African position, but that it would be undesirable to spell this out too clearly. However, he felt that we ought to tell them that we could not vote for their resolution. If they wanted, nevertheless, to air it in the Assembly we might agree to help them get the necessary ⅓ vote for discussion of the Fourth Committee report so that they could present the constitutional issues, while warning them that it would not be a wise course to follow. We should advise them that they would get a bad beating on this, and that it would be better to raise the matter in some other way. Possibilities in this connection might be submittal of the question to the Sixth Committee or conceivably to the ICJ. Dr. Tobias saw a difference between not trying to gag them and in actively helping them. Senator Cooper thought that South Africa's position was unsound. Mr. Tate said they had no legal grounds, and seemed, in fact, to recognize this, in that they had based their proposed action on the very broad and loose basis of Article 10 of the Charter. The question in his opinion was only one of policy as to whether we wanted to help them have a hearing, i.e., to "get another black eye". Senator Cooper said that the basic weakness of South Africa's position is that it would not agree to put South West Africa under the Trusteeship system. Dr. Tobias saw the United States in the peculiar position of wanting to help South Africa in Committee Four when they had absented themselves from that Committee.

Ambassador Sayre thought that the merits of the case were clear: the United Nations could not compel South Africa to put South West Africa under the Trusteeship system, but if they would not, then the territory remained under the former mandate system, and reports on their administration of it were required. The United States more than any other state had tried to move the situation along to a solution. At our instigation a meeting had been held which had resulted in keeping the resolution on this item down to a relatively moderate tone, compared with the wishes of most of that group. He thought it would be unwise to throw the South African proposal into the Assembly since it would only succeed in getting a "red hot" retaliatory resolution aimed against them. This in turn would add fuel to Malan's adamant policies.

In regard to the invitation to the Herero chiefs, Ambassador Sayre agreed with the Department that the action was entirely legal. Committee Six would doubtless say that Committee Four had the right to invite indigenous representatives. The result of such a determination however might well be to turn Committee Four into an arena to hear the grievances of non-official indigenous representatives. As to practical courses which could be taken, the only thing Ambassador Sayre could say was that the United States could not support South Africa in its discriminatory practices. He cautioned that even putting our finger in the pot might cause it to be burned.

Mr. Allen had a short suggestion to make. This matter was not a question of whether or not to be nice to South Africa. It was rather a question solely of tactics to be followed within the Assembly vis-à-vis the South Africans and what they might do in Plenary. Since it was generally agreed that it would be undesirable to open up a Pandora's box in Plenary, we should try to head off the South Africans by having them put in something which would raise the constitutional question for Committee Six or ICJ determination, phrased in general terms rather than the specific one of the invitation to the Hereros.

Ambassador Jessup suggested that it be pointed out to the Department, along the lines indicated by Ambassador Sayre, that the Moroccan issue [2] and various others might be opened up if an explicit statement by Committee Six were given that the Committee Four action had been legal and justified. Mrs. Roosevelt noted that Tunisia might be one of these issues, and that the general Arab displeasure with the United States should be borne in mind in addition to Morocco. She said that the Delegation should tell the Department that the Delegation would have to be honest with the South Africans and tell them that we would have to vote against their policies because we could never agree to them. We should emphasize that we would stand for what we believed to be right.

Ambassador Sayre suggested that the Delegation tell the South Africans that if they would come into the Assembly with clean hands everything would be much improved.

Mr. McKay asked about the Canadian suggestion that the United States follow up the strong representations against the South African proposed move made by the United Kingdom and Australia. Mrs. Roosevelt said that the Delegation must report upon this matter to the Department to the effect that it would be necessary to add our pressure to that given already by the United Kingdom and Australia. Mr. Allen's idea of going to Committee Six or the ICJ for a determination on Committee Four's action would also be reported together with the arguments for and against it.

2. Del considers it tactically desirable to make this approach to SA del soonest in view confidential info from Robinson (Canada), Delga 851,[3] that Donges was visibly shaken at Commonwealth group mtg yesterday when UK and Australia, whom he relies on for most support, strongly urged SA not to attempt to have Comite Four res declared illegal. Robinson felt immediate US approach, following strong UK-Australian opposition yesterday, might dissuade Donges.

3. Fol points might be made:

(a) In view consistent US position concerning right GA comites hear such persons as necessary for performance of tasks, and in view our belief that Comite Four res to hear Herero spokesmen was legal, US cannot support res to have GA declare Comite Four res illegal.

(b) Such a res as SA contemplates wld certainly fail, and such a GA decision wld set a dangerous precedent which wld be cited in future efforts obtain Comite Four hearings for others.

(c) Submittal res under which GA wld declare Comite Four res illegal wld open acrimonious debate in which SA conduct wld be attacked and vilified by numerous dels who might in turn introduce strong res condemning SA. (USGADel fears this might give Malan additional fuel for extremist action concerning SA relations with UN.)

4. In discussing other ways by which SA might accomplish its objective, del examined possibility of suggesting that SA might introduce new agenda item referring to Comite Six a constitutional question concerning the general problem of granting hearings in Comite Four, but del concluded it wld be undesirable for issue be raised in this or any other form.

In general, Dept believes such invitations shld be issued sparingly. We do not see therefore how USDel cld support Res along lines desired by Union.

Dept still considers that SoAfr interests wld best be served by negotiating agreement along lines proposed SWAfr Comite. Mrs. Roosevelt explained to Ambassador Jooste the reasons why in the US view it would be very inadvisable for South Africa to present in the plenary its proposed resolution on the legality of Committee Four's decision to hear the Herero chiefs. She pointed out that South Africa's own interest, in our view, would be gravely harmed by the bitter debate which would follow, and the certain defeat of the resolution. The US felt that such a definite decision by the Assembly might also have unfortunate consequences as a precedent in other cases, and this matter was an aspect with which other countries, as well as South Africa, are concerned. She stated that after careful consideration of the legal issues involved, the US had come to the conclusion that the action of Committee Four was legal, although in general, the US believes invitations to individuals should be issued only sparingly.

Thus, if the resolution were presented, the US would not be able to support it. She strongly hoped, therefore, that South Africa would reconsider its decision to proceed, believing that the better course would be to continue negotiations with the Ad Hoc Committee to work out an agreement following the procedures of the Mandate. Ambassador Sayre substantiated Mrs. Roosevelt's statement, pointing out the difficulty of obtaining moderate action by the majority in Committee Four, and the assistance of the US in the passage of the main resolution.

Ambassador Jooste replied that the South African government realized the seriousness of the contemplated move, and was aware of the risks and difficulties, but found themselves under overwhelming pressure from public opinion in South Africa, inflamed at this latest act, to take some action. His government feels that it must try to seek clarification by the General Assembly as to whether in the future the Charter limits, and Mandate procedures will be respected or not. He stated that it is very painful and inconsistent with the dignity of a country to walk out of a Committee, and is harmful to the interest of the organization. It is not the course that South Africa desires to take, but it must know where it stands.

In the ensuing discussion of the influence of domestic and world opinion, particularly on racial questions, Mrs. Roosevelt pointed out that the US has learned in connection with its racial problem the importance of taking into serious consideration the strong currents and attitudes of work in the world, Governments can do much to influence their domestic opinion at home and can help ward off emotional attacks upon their policies abroad by continual and full dissemination of facts of the situation and of the efforts they are making to solve such problems.

Ambassador Jooste stated he would convey the views of the US on the proposed resolution to Minister Donges, and he thought it might be desirable to have further consultations on this matter in a day or so.

Subsequently, Jooste indicated to Mr. Allen that one of the purposes of the further consultations would be to have Minister Donges explain in detail the constitutional basis for South Africa's position. Mr. Allen suggested that while we were always glad to discuss any question, he frankly thought no useful purpose would be served by further detailed discussion on the legalities. When Jooste, nevertheless, indicated a strong desire to hold them, Mr. Allen suggested that as an alternative, it would be better for the South African delegation to set forth their legal arguments in an informal memorandum which we would be glad to bring to the attention of the delegates and the Department, although it would probably not alter the opinion.

When he pressed further as to whether the statement that the US "would not support South Africa's resolution" meant that we would vote against or abstain, Mr. Allen explained that this phrase was the language of our instructions, but that he personally felt we would probably vote against. Jooste again stated that the following countries had assured South Africa that they believed the Committee Four action was illegal: UK, France, Australia, Netherlands, Canada, and Belgium. He suggested it would be undesirable, since all these countries would vote in favor of the resolution, for the US to vote against. (UK and Australia subsequently confirmed their position that the action was illegal. M. Naudy stated that the French Government was inclined to the view that the action was illegal, but was not certain how definite M. Schuman [1] had been with Jooste on this point.)

2. South West Africa. Mr. McKay referred to an item in the Classified Summary, Delga 946,[1] page 1, in regard to the formal request the Rev. Michael Scott was making to speak again to the Fourth Committee on the question of South West Africa. Rev. Scott planned to indicate that the reason the Herero chiefs had been unable to come to Paris and present their views was that the South African Government had not given them the necessary travel documents. Sir Alan Burns of the United Kingdom had reported that Khalidy of Iraq offered to intervene with the Arabs to restrain them from expressing strong views or asking leading questions of Rev. Scott if in turn the Latin Americans could be persuaded to show similar restraint.

The chances of having Dr. Tobias seek to dissuade Scott from making his presentation to the Committee had been discussed. Scott had already presented a formal written request, however, and he felt a moral obligation to speak on behalf of the Hereros. It was therefore unlikely that he could be dissuaded. In view of the overwhelming support for allowing him to speak, it was felt best not to oppose his speaking per se but rather to have him, if possible, present his remarks in a restrained vein. Mr. McKay noted the urgent need to begin approaches on this subject, since the Committee had scheduled four meetings for a two-day period and could conceivably reach the South West Africa item by the next day.

Ambassador Gross asked what might result if we did not seek to restrain Rev. Scott. Mr. Ward Allen recalled that the United States was undertaking strenuous efforts in conjunction with other delegations to prevent the South Africans from "blowing the lid off" in Plenary on their suggested tactic of having the Plenary declare the Committee Four invitation to the Hereros illegal. The relationship of these two problems satisfied Ambassador Gross of the need to follow the suggested course.

Mr. Sandifer added that it would be unwise to have the Committee end on a crescendo of confusion. He thought our approaches should be made to more delegations than just the Latins. In addition it should not be made in terms of "coercing" them, but rather explaining to them our view of the matter.

Mrs. Roosevelt noted that she had for the first time in her conversation with the South Africans the day before received the impression that they were admitting that they were trying to do something which would ease the situation, and that the solution to their problems would take some time to accomplish. She asked Ambassador Sayre whether her impression was unique or whether he had ever seen similar intimations. He answered that he had occasionally seen such signs, but warned that Malan was the one with whom we would have to reckon, and that he was completely rigid. Dr. Tobias said that any loosening in Jooste's attitude was due to a stiffening in the US position. They still wanted the United States, however, to do what was incompatible with our tradition and belief. He added a note of caution indicative of the scope of the problem with which we had to deal—that the Dutch Reform Church in South Africa was a warm supporter of Malan's policies.

Mr. Ward Allen noted that there was a possibility that Rev. Scott's views might be sent to the UN by letter rather than being presented orally. He had followed that practice once before in answering questions put to him by the Committee. Mrs. Roosevelt wondered whether his absence in England might be due to illness, and whether that fact might not be an appropriate reason for asking his views by letter. Mr. McKay thought an approach might be made by Dr. Tobias along those lines, but he doubted the success of such an approach. Dr. Tobias indicated he would feel able to make a personal appeal to Scott stressing the need for caution by him in his presentation.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. Ward P. Allen, Adviser, United States Delegation to the General Assembly

CONFIDENTIAL PARIS, January 11, 1952.

Subject: South Africa's Proposed Resolution On Illegality of Invitation to Hereros

Participants: Minister Donges, South Africa
Ambassador Jooste, South African Delegation
Mr. Wessles, South Africa Delegation
Mrs. Roosevelt, US Delegation
Ambassador Sayre, US Delegation
Ward P. Allen, US Delegation

After expressing regret at the misunderstanding which had led us to firm up our position [1] in advance of further discussion with him, Dr. Donges re-stated the reasons which prompt South Africa to take this step. He pointed out that the situation in South Africa is one of "extreme gravity" and that it is absolutely essential that some such move as this be made in order to "stave off something more serious". Minister Donges re-emphasized in the first place the importance of permitting debate on this item in the Plenary so that South Africa can be heard and stated he would not dare prophesy the results of the "added insult hurled on us" if they are not given an opportunity to speak. It would, in his view, be a "tragedy".

They do intend to introduce their proposed resolution, except in the event that Committee 4 between now and the time of the Plenary should pass a condemnatory resolution regarding the refusal of South Africa to grant passports and facilities for the Herero chiefs to make their appearance. Mr. Donges pointed out since the South African government was convinced the invitation was illegal they were, of course, unable to grant these facilities since to do so would have made them in fact "accessories after the Fact" to this unconstitutional act. If Committee 4 does pass such a condemnatory resolution, the South African Delegation will not present its resolution to the Plenary, but would of course want to have the condemnatory resolution rejected and this they would regard as a "second best" solution to the problem. If Committee 4 does not pass such a resolution, then South Africa does intend to introduce its resolution in the Plenary. Minister Donges felt there was a real possibility that it might be ruled out of order. Then at least the government could not be blamed for [not?] having tried.

[1] This is a reference to the position adopted by the Department of State, and set forth in Department's telegram Gadel 619, January 7, 1952 (telegram 145 to Pretoria, p. 720), that in the opinion of the United States Government the Fourth Committee invitation to the Herero chiefs was not ultra vires. This clarification is contained in the Delegation's telegram to the Department, reporting this conversation with Donges; see footnote 2 below.

In that case South Africa would of course like other countries to support them in the course of the debate which would give them some consolation. (Although he was careful not to say so, it was the impression of the US representatives that Minister Donges is rather hoping that the resolution will be ruled out of order since this would provide a way out for his Delegation).

In the course of the discussion Minister Donges pointed out that South Africa is not actuated in this proposed move by petty motives. There is a serious danger in his view to "our Organization". He went on to say that South Africa does regard the UN as their Organization as much as anybody else's and they are fully prepared to stand by the Charter as it was originally conceived at San Francisco. He pointed out that those who are most vociferous in attacking South Africa and in seeking to extend the Charter procedures do not show up very well in the last analysis when their support of the UN is put to the test of making actual sacrifices and contributions of men and wealth in support of the Charter.

He made a plea that the various delegations should see South Africa's unique situation in a broader light. He pointed out it was difficult to discuss her particular situation with persons who have not actually been in South Africa and understand it. It is possible in such matters, even if all the facts are correctly stated, to come out with an entirely wrong picture.

Mrs. Roosevelt replied that we would immediately transmit Minister Donges' points to the Department and request that they give them careful consideration and send us further instructions.[2] She stated that, however, she was not "overly hopeful" that it would be possible for the Department to change its basic position, but pointed out that Minister Donges had introduced a new element in referring to the possibility that the resolution might be presented but ruled out of order and not pressed to a vote. She stated that the US continues to feel that efforts to work with South Africa in an approach of friendly and frank understanding are important to the US and stated we did have a full appreciation of the contribution South Africa is making to honor its commitments under the Charter. In the ensuing discussion Ambassador Sayre pointed out our fear that if the resolution were pressed to a vote and rejected, as it certainly would be, that rejection would be taken as a precedent to hear all sorts of individuals in Committee 4 and our efforts to keep such invitations to a minimum would

[2] The Delegation reported this conversation to the Department of State in Paris telegram Delga 979, January 11, 1952, 5 p. m. At the end, the telegram reads: "We intend obtain views Padilla Nervo and others on question whether [proposed South African] resolution would be in order. We have not yet told Donges exact US position on this point or on support for plenary debate. . . . If South Africa continues determined present resolution it may be that after debate a presidential ruling or plenary decision that it is out of order will be best solution." (320/1–1152) be useless. Minister Donges replied that then at least we would all know where we stood and all be in the same boat.

1. South West Africa.

Mr. Taylor stated that Mr. Ross and Mr. Allen had talked with Mr. Jooste of South Africa on this subject which would be taken up in plenary on Friday, the 18th. The Secretariat had planned that only Committee Four Items would be considered at that meeting. Mr. Allen then recalled the previous Delegation decision to seek to dissuade the South Africans from attempting to put a resolution into the plenary which would seek to declare illegal the action of Committee Four in inviting the Hereros. He reported that considerable effort had been made along these lines, with results as outlined in Delgas 983 and 1035.[1]

The latest proposal made by the South Africans, according to Mr. Allen, was that they approach Padilla Nervo, Assembly President, on the question whether their proposed resolution would be in order. If he thought it were not in order and if the US and other Western Powers would make speeches critical of Committee Four Action from which some sympathy for South Africa could be inferred, then South Africa might not have to introduce the resolution, Mr. Allen thought there were four questions which the Delegation would have to consider:

1. Should US Delegation vote for plenary discussion of the South West Africa item? (This was the Union's wish.)
2. If Padilla Nervo privately should tell the South Africans he had doubts on whether the proposed resolution would be in order, could the US Delegation make a statement along the lines mentioned by the South Africans?
3. If the question were put to a vote whether or not the South African resolution was in order, which way should the US vote?
4. On the resolution itself, if it came to a vote, which way should the US vote?

Mr. Ross saw clearly that in view of our opposition to the proposed resolution itself, and because the South Africans were trying to find a way to satisfy both their home opinion and their instructions, they would certainly make a strong speech against the Committee 4 Action, even if the resolution were not put in by them. Mr. Jooste had understood we would still support the substantive resolution on South West Africa as passed by the Committee. Mr. Ross noted that South West Africa placed more importance on who supported them, rather than on how many, on the issue of the invitation to the Hereros. In addition, in a somewhat "blackmailing" manner, Mr. Jooste had put this matter in terms of South African support for the UN in general.

In regard to hearing Rev. Scott, Mr. Ross stated that he could not approve the general practice of inviting people to come to present their unofficial views to the UN. He saw this as an unhealthy development. He felt that the resolution on South West Africa was basically sound, but the procedural action taken in connection with it was "not so good". On balance, he felt that if the US could "raise its eyebrows" at least, it would tend to help move things along.

At Ambassador Gross' request, Mr. Allen read from Delga 908 the proposed draft resolution of the South African Delegation and in particular the operative paragraph which would find that Committee Four had exceeded its legal competence. Mr. Tate wanted it to be clear that the question was not one of the legality of Committee Four Action but whether we should say that its legal powers had been exercised unwisely. Mrs. Roosevelt recalled that the Delegation had previously decided that Committee Four action was legal. We were now discussing the question of how to approach the South Africans and how far we could go in stating that it was unwise for Committee Four to have taken the action it did. She noted that the South Africans had stressed, in their talks with her their participation in Korea. Mr. Ross said that Mr. Jooste had not mentioned this point.

The South Africans, Dr. Tobias felt had realized from their talks with Mr. Allen the lack of wisdom in their proposed move. Mrs. Roosevelt agreed that there was no sense in their proposal. Dr. Tobias said that that was the precise reason for not attempting to aid them in their present predicament. They had refused to conform with the mandate, or heed the opinion of the International Court of Justice to report on South West Africa, but they now asked us to support them on a technicality which "evades the moral issue involved". That, to Dr. Tobias, was the sum and substance of the whole question.

The world knew that South Africa was wrong, and would be weighing our every step. Particularly was this true of colonial peoples. The basic substance of the matter was that a state was suppressing 4/5ths of its population. South West Africa had been a League of Nations mandate to which the UN had indirectly fallen heir. South Africa asked that it be left alone to administer the area in accordance with its own principles which were based on disrespect for the human rights of 4/5ths of the population.

Admitting that not much could now be done, Dr. Tobias analyzed the present situation in South Africa. He said that if discrimination were based on ignorance, it could be removed by education and study. If it were based on poverty or uncleanliness, those too could be removed. But if discrimination were based on "what a person is as God made him, it is not removeable." It would be a very dangerous thing to support any group basing its practices on a "God-made difference". In contrast to South Africa, conditions in the US were improving. Discriminations were yielding. For this reason, Dr. Tobias had felt able to state to the Soviet Delegate in Committee that freedom must be for all or it was not freedom.

Stressing the importance of this question, he recalled that in 1946 he had spoken to President Truman after returning from Africa, and having just heard of lynchings in Georgia. He told the President that something must be done to protect US prestige. What the US had done in the past must not be undone. No technicalities should be supported which give comfort to those in a predicament resulting from a practice whereby the government had its "foot on the necks" of 4/5ths of the population. What would the US appear to be, he asked the Delegation, if it backed a group which had been "babyish" enough to walk out when it could not stand up and answer justified criticism. Concluding, Dr. Tobias stated that he opposed any proposal, regardless of his being the Committee Four Representative, that would have the US call Committee Four to task for having sought information from various sources. If the proposal were out of order, it could be called so. But complete suppression of a population could not be supported.

Mr. Allen observed that perhaps South Africa was not bluffing when they said that if something were not done they might leave the United Nations. He had been inclined in the past to regard this as "bluffing" on their part. Now he was not so sure they did not mean it. If they did, of course, they would be the first to withdraw, and would thereby set a dangerous precedent.

Ambassador Sayre thought that the US position was quite clear on this question. The instructions were to vote against the proposed South African resolution in the Plenary. Everyone agreed to the wisdom of that course. He sincerely hoped that the issue would not be forced in the plenary so as to cause all the Fourth Committee, and the Plenary too, to stand in favor of the Committee's prior action. For the US to oppose the invitation would put it in an untenable legal position. It would be very unwise to place the US on the "wrong side" in the bitter struggle now going on within the UN. The Latin Americans and Arabs were so inflamed on this matter that for the US to range itself on the South Africans' side would be politically disastrous. If the resolution were introduced, the US should definitely vote against it.

Ambassador Sayre then read from Delga 890 [2] and the reply thereto in Gadel 628 [3] which approved of the position taken by the Delegation. And in Deptel 145 to Pretoria,[4] the Department had said that the US should oppose any resolution which purported to call the Committee Four action illegal. This left us no choice on the matter. We should do everything possible to prevent the introduction of the draft resolution, but vote against it if it were tabled. South Africa was a manifest wrong-doer and should keep quiet on this matter.

Senator Cooper noted that, as he had mentioned earlier, and also during the Fifth Session of the Assembly, when he had worked on the South West African problem, his views were thoroughly in accord with those of Dr. Tobias. Mr. McKay pointed out that on the South West African issue in Committee Four it was not only the Arab-Asian-Latin American group which pushed for the action taken by the Committee, but that countries like Norway, Sweden and Denmark had also supported this action. Norway and Sweden had in fact made statements in support of the hearings. With regard to the comment just made that the action of the Committee on South West Africa had been "excessive", he thought this a matter of opinion. He would agree that the Committee action on other problems had been "excessive", but on the South West Africa question this year he felt that the Committee had been less extreme than might have been expected. The main resolution had been moderately phrased, and the decision to hear the Herero spokesman, although impractical under normal circumstances, was admittedly legal and could perhaps be justified by the exceptional character of the South West African case.

Mr. McKeever thought that this was a good example of the kind of dilemma the US faced in the propaganda battle going on in the world. We forced ourselves into unclear, and complex positions. Such positions could never get into the headlines, which was what was effective in the propaganda battle. Long explanations of complicated positions were not read. If we intended to oppose the South African resolution, we should do just that and not be-cloud the issue with conditions and explanations.

Mr. Maffitt noted that the US had exercised a moderating influence which made it unpopular both with the NATO colonial powers and with the Latin Americans on the other side. This moderating influence could be lost however, by supporting the "oil-on-the-waters" scheme of Mr. Jooste. For this reason he opposed such a scheme. Such opposition would preserve our delicate balance. He further speculated that perhaps South Africa was provoking UN censure by its proposed move in order to pave the way with domestic opinion for withdrawing from the UN. If it wanted to withdraw, there was not much anyone could do.

[3] Dated January 8, 1952, 3 : 43 p. m. (320/1–452)
[4] Dated January 7, p. 720.

Ambassador Jessup thought there was no serious question on the substance of the resolution: the US would of course oppose it. On the broader policy level, the question was how the US could most effectively benefit the people of South Africa on behalf of the freedoms enumerated by Dr. Tobias. He hoped the US could back up the people within the Union of South Africa who might be able to effect a change in present policies. On balance, as all these matters must be measured, Ambassador Jessup felt that we had reached a point where we could not do much along the latter lines. Therefore we should not make a statement along the lines requested by Jooste which would criticize the Fourth Committee action and thereby imply sympathy for South Africa. Miss Strauss agreed with Ambassador Jessup.

Mrs. Roosevelt said that there was no question of not voting against the resolution. We had tried to keep South Africa in the UN so they could feel the pressure of world public opinion as expressed through all the delegations. She felt we must honestly tell them that we would not make a speech as requested. If this were the consensus of the Delegation nothing further need be said.

Mr. Allen noted, not in opposition to the position of the Delegation as just stated by Mrs. Roosevelt, but in the hope of knowing the full decision of the Delegation, that all his original questions had not been fully answered. He favored voting for plenary discussion on the South West Africa item, even if it meant that the South Africans would be censured. He wondered how the Delegation should vote if the question were put on whether the South African resolution were in order. Mr. Sandifer read from Gadel 628 previously referred to by Ambassador Sayre, in which it was assumed that the resolution would be in order. He stressed the purely technical nature of such a vote. Mr. Tate also felt the resolution would be in order, as pertinent to the business under discussion. Mrs. Roosevelt said that the Delegation would vote for its being in order if put to a vote. On the resolution itself we would vote against. Senator Cooper wondered what the implications would be if the only vote taken were on whether the resolution was in order and it were voted out of order with the US on the losing side. He felt that an explanation of vote would be necessary to make clear that the US position was based purely on the technical legal ground that such a resolution could be put, without in any way supporting the resolution itself. Dr. Tobias thought that this would be the case, and that such an explanation would be an excellent idea.[5]

HUMAN RIGHTS QUESTIONS IN THE UNITED NATIONS SETTING: THE UNITED STATES POSITION [1]

I. THE DRAFT INTERNATIONAL COVENANT ON HUMAN RIGHTS

RESTRICTED [WASHINGTON, April 1951.]

DRAFT INTERNATIONAL COVENANT ON HUMAN RIGHTS
ECONOMIC, SOCIAL AND CULTURAL RIGHTS

PROBLEM

What should be the position of the United States Delegation at the Seventh (1951) Session of the Commission on Human Rights with respect to the inclusion of provisions on economic, social and cultural rights in the International Covenant on Human Rights?

RECOMMENDATION

1. As a first position, the Delegation should support—or, in its discretion, propose—the view that the provisions on economic, social and cultural rights in the International Covenant on Human Rights should be limited to general language along lines proposing the promotion of economic, social and cultural progress and development. The Delegation may, if it is deemed advisable, submit and support language along the lines of the alternative texts (a) and (b) set forth in the Annex, preferably alternative (a). The Delegation should explain that the United States, in view of the resolution adopted by the General Assembly on December 4, 1950, is prepared to support the inclusion of such language in the Covenant. If necessary to strengthen support in the Commission for general language in the Covenant, the United States Delegation may consult with other Delegations with respect to language along the lines of alternative (c) in the Annex and support such language in the Commission.

2. If the Commission rejects the United States proposal to limit the language in the Covenant on economic, social and cultural rights along general lines and decides to include language in the Covenant which is detailed, the Delegation should undertake to limit this language as far as possible along practical lines generally in harmony with American practice and constitutional principles, and should vote for such detailed provisions if so modified. It should be assumed, in considering the provisions for inclusion in the Covenant, that they will be subject to a federal state article.

[1] For previous documentation on these matters, see Foreign Relations, 1950, vol. II, pp. 509 ff.

547-842—79——48

DISCUSSION

Delegations of the United States to the United Nations Commission on Human Rights during 1948, 1949 and 1950 consistently opposed the addition of articles on economic, social and cultural rights to the present text of the draft International Covenant on Human Rights. The United States urged that provisions relating to economic, social and cultural matters be set forth in separate protocols for separate ratification. This position of the United States was in the majority in the Commission.

When the same question was raised in the General Assembly consisting of representatives of 60 members, the General Assembly adopted a resolution on December 4, 1950 expressly deciding "to include economic, social and cultural rights in the draft Covenant on human rights" and calling "upon the Economic and Social Council to request the Commission on Human Rights, in accordance with the spirit of the Universal Declaration to include in the draft Covenant a clear expression of economic, social and cultural rights in a manner which relates them to the civic and political freedoms proclaimed by the draft Covenant."

The United States opposed the inclusion of these provisions in the December 4, 1950 resolution, but the General Assembly nevertheless voted to include them in the resolution. The vote in the General Assembly in favor of these provisions was 23 to 17 with 10 abstentions.

It appears that when this issue is voted again in the General Assembly at its 1951 session, the vote for the addition of provisions on economic, social and cultural rights in the Covenant will again be favorable to their inclusion in the Covenant.

In view of the decision at the 1950 session of the General Assembly and the anticipated repetition of this decision at the 1951 session of the General Assembly, it seems advisable for the United States to proceed with the development of language expressive of economic, social and cultural rights which is generally in harmony with United States practice and constitutional principles, and to take appropriate steps to advise friendly members of the Commission on Human Rights of such language.

It is particularly important that the United States proceed along this line in order to prevent the USSR and Yugoslavia from winning the acceptance of their proposals for inclusion in the Covenant at the next session of the Commission. It is felt that only if the United States proceeds along this line will there be a possibility of forestalling the acceptance of the USSR and Yugoslav texts in the Commission.

The USSR and Yugoslav proposals have been submitted to previous sessions of the Commission. The language of these proposals is in general not consistent with American practice and constitutional principles and accordingly is unacceptable to the United States. The proposals are in general drafted along typical communist totalitarian lines, with particular stress on governmental control. The USSR texts include the usual Soviet effort to restrict the freedom of the individual and to obtain United Nations approval of ambiguous language ostensibly promoting freedom but actually not doing so.

In accordance with the recommendations set out above, if the Commission decides to vote on language such as the USSR and Yugoslav texts for inclusion in the Covenant, the United States should propose and support modifications of these texts to conform them as much as possible along practical lines generally in harmony with American practice and constitutional principles.

With respect to articles on economic, social and cultural matters in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights which may be proposed by other delegations for inclusion in the Covenant, the United States should propose necessary modifications to these also to conform them as much as possible along practical lines in harmony with American practice and constitutional principles. In general, these articles are now phrased in terms of rights to which all individuals are entitled immediately. Obviously, for inclusion in the Covenant, many of them must be rephrased as objectives to be promoted by parties to the Covenant.

Considerable discretion in phraseology is necessarily left to the United States Delegation to the Commission since it is difficult to foresee all the various texts that may be submitted for consideration to the Commission at its next session.

The United States Delegation should in particular emphasize in the Commission that much of the work in implementing and effectuating the promotion and safeguards of economic, social and cultural rights is being done and should continue to be done by specialized agencies such as the ILO, WHO, UNESCO, etc.

Editorial Note

The Seventh Session of the Commission on Human Rights held 50 plenary meetings at Geneva, April 16–May 19, 1951. Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt was the United States Representative on the Commission. James Simsarian of the Office of United Nations Economic and Social Affairs (UNE) was Adviser to the United States Representative. Simsarian submitted five official weekly reports to the Department on the progress of the Commission's work. Some are found in Office Lot File 55 D 429 (Files of the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs, Durward V. Sandifer). An article by Simsarian, "Economic, Social, and Cultural Provisions in the Human Rights Covenant: revisions of the 1951 session of the Commission on Human Rights", is printed in Department of State Bulletin, June 25, 1951, pages 1003 ff. This includes a complete text (73 articles) of the Draft International Covenant on Human Rights, as it stood after the work of the Seventh Session.

The official text of the Draft Covenant is found in United Nations, Official Records of the Economic and Social Council, Thirteenth Session (hereafter cited as ECOSOC (XIII)), Supplement No. 9, Commission on Human Rights Report of the Seventh Session (Doc E/CN.4/640), Annex I. Annexes II–X of the Report contain complete information on draft proposals, amended texts, statements, etc., or exact documentary references thereto.

Annex II of the Report contains an official statement of the United States on the Draft Covenant on Human Rights as prepared at the Seventh Session, as follows:

"1. The United States wishes to call attention to the desirability of including in the Covenant on Human Rights an article on the right of everyone to own property.

"2. The United States wishes to call attention to the express reservation it made in the Commission on Human Rights on 19 May 1951 with respect to the provisions on economic, social and cultural rights drafted in this session of the Commission. The United States feels that there should be a careful reconsideration of these provisions. This is not, however, to be interpreted as indicating any lessening of the interest or efforts of the United States for the achievement of economic, social and cultural rights through the United Nations or through the various specialized agencies in this field.

"3. The United States participated in the work of this session of the Commission on Human Rights in attempting to carry out the mandate of the General Assembly to draft economic, social and cultural rights with a view to their inclusion in the Covenant. The United States did so, despite its initial view that such rights should not be included in the same Covenant with civil and political rights. Our experience in the present session of the Commission on Human Rights has been such that we are now of the view that the provisions in the Part of the Covenant dealing with economic, social and cultural rights—being loosely drafted and not being expressed in terms of legal rights and with different implementation and undertaking—should be dealt with in a separate legal instrument."

the persons above listed in the morning and again at lunch. At noon she saw the President and in the early afternoon the Secretary.

By way of background for the discussion of the problem of the position to be taken by the United States on further work on the Human Rights Covenant in the Summer session of the Economic and Social Council and in the sixth session of the General Assembly, Mrs. Roosevelt summarized some of the impressions she had gained on broader related questions in conversations with various members of the Human Rights Commission, particularly with the new Chairman of the Commission, Dr. Charles Malik, Representative of Lebanon. Dr. Malik stressed heavily and at length the needs and aspiration of the under-developed countries. He pointed out the tremendous social and cultural problems in the countries of the Middle East and in all the under-developed countries, the incompetence and corruption in the governments, and the need on their part for leadership and technical assistance. He said this leadership and assistance must come from the United States and that the United States must both tell these countries what to do and how to do it. This same view was expressed to Mrs. Roosevelt by other members of the Commission but in a less articulate fashion. As applied to the Human Rights Covenant, Mrs. Roosevelt said that in the minds of Dr. Malik and others this meant that the Economic and Social Articles had become a symbol of the aspirations and needs of these countries. They did not understand or attach the same importance to civil and political rights as does the United States and some of the more developed countries. They may not fully understand the Economic and Social Articles but they look to them as a lever which may help to raise them out of their present depressed condition. They do not understand the concern of the United States over the question of whether these "rights" shall be stated and treated as legal rights and obligations. In most of these countries the rights are definitely regarded as goals or objectives—as something to be achieved and not as legal obligations. They do not understand, and in fact resent, the unwillingness of the United States to state them in terms of rights. These matters are covered in the Constitutions of most of these countries but the attitude there toward the effect of such constitutional provisions is different from the attitude in the United States. Most of the other members of the Commission therefore insist tenaciously on stating these propositions in terms of rights and including them in the Covenant with Civil and Political Rights.

One point that Dr. Malik stressed was that the leaders in many of these countries, and especially the leaders of the opposition, want and need these economic, social, and cultural international guarantees as a standard with which to challenge and prod their own governments and the leaders in their countries to greater effort in the direction of attaining social improvement.

In terms of future policy on the Human Rights Covenant, Mrs. Roosevelt felt strongly that this general situation confronted us with a very difficult problem. It is a first-rate propaganda problem in relation to the Soviet Government and its reckless propaganda campaign. Mrs. Roosevelt felt that it means that we must find some way to protect our interests and maintain our position in an affirmative way. For example, she thought that we could not win a campaign, no matter how hard we pressed diplomatically, to separate the Economic and Social Articles from the Civil and Political. By such an effort we would generate a great deal of ill will, lose our position of leadership and end by failing to attain our objective. She fully recognized the difficulty the Covenant with the Economic and Social Articles presented in this country. In the general language in which they are drafted, they can cause us a great deal of trouble both in terms of public opinion and in terms of their actual application. Unless very carefully safeguarded, their inclusion in the Covenant would mean the rejection of the whole Covenant by the Senate.

In the ensuing discussion, the general problem as presented by Mrs. Roosevelt was very thoroughly canvassed. There was reluctant agreement that a campaign to separate the Economic and Social Articles from the present Covenant would be unproductive and unwise. There was discussion of the maturity and completeness of the present Covenant, particularly the Economic and Social Articles, and of the strategy that might be followed with respect to the timing of consideration of the Covenant in the General Assembly. This included discussion of the question of possibly having the Assembly send the Covenant back to the Human Rights Commission for further study and of the problem of having the Covenant debated in the General Assembly in New York in 1952 during a Presidential election year in the United States.

The substantive discussion concentrated on the question of the method by which we might deal with the problem of stating the economic and social rights as "rights" with the implication in American law of their being binding legal obligations. This was still a problem, it was felt, despite the general introductory Article to the economic and social rights. Mr. Tate suggested that this problem might be handled by a reservation (which might take the form of a unilateral reservation by the United States or by a general Reservation Article) stating in substance that the economic, social, and cultural rights represented objectives to be attained by progressive action and not legal obligations. This reservation would have to be very carefully worded to make quite clear the different character of these rights as contrasted with the political and civil rights in the Covenant. There was general agreement, after some exploration of this suggestion, that it might offer a satisfactory approach that would have the advantage of making it possible for the United States to go along with the development of the Covenant as a whole and also of making it unnecessary for the United States either to press for the separation of the economic and social section or to press for an Article providing for adherence to separate parts of the Covenant.

There was agreement that the Economic and Social Council should not get into the substance of the Covenant and that it would probably have to send the Covenant forward to the General Assembly for action. There was no clear agreement as to the form which the Report and Recommendations of the Council to the Assembly should take. There was uncertainty as to the approach which the United States should take in the General Assembly on further action on the Covenant. It was finally agreed that Mrs. Roosevelt should raise with the President the question of the timing of consideration by the General Assembly, particularly the question whether consideration of the question by the General Assembly in a Presidential election year in the United States would cause serious difficulty. Mrs. Roosevelt would also explain to the President the nature of the problems involved in the Economic and Social section of the Covenant.

At lunch Mrs. Roosevelt reported that the President expressed the positive view that the United States should not hang back in going forward with the Covenant. He saw no difficulty in having the Covenant debated in the General Assembly in the United States in 1952. He thought, in fact, there might be some advantages in having it debated then since in an election year neither party would be in a position to oppose a program of economic and social improvement. At the same time the President felt that it was important for the United States to take an affirmative position in the handling of the Covenant in the General Assembly this Fall and that we should go along with the general sentiment in the Assembly on the question of timing.

It was finally agreed tentatively, subject to further study in the Department and discussion with other agencies, that an effort would be made to develop the reservation procedure suggested by Mr. Tate. The United States would support action by ECOSOC forwarding the Covenant to the General Assembly. We would go along with the development of a Covenant including economic and social rights. We would also go along with the consideration of the Covenant in detail in this session of the General Assembly if that were the general sentiment. If opportunity offered, we would point out the incompleteness of the Covenant in its present form and the fact that the Commission had not had time to carry out all of the directions from the fifth session of the General Assembly. In the end, if this seemed feasible, we would support action by the Assembly returning the Covenant to the Human Rights Commission for further study and report to the next session of the Assembly. However, we would not get out in front on this question or put any pressure on to bring about this result. We would, as in the past, insist on the inclusion of a federal state clause in the Covenant. If an adequate federal state article is not included, the United States would at the appropriate time make a reservation setting forth an adequate federal state provision.

Position Paper Prepared in the Department of State for the United States Delegation to the Thirteenth Session of the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations

RESTRICTED [WASHINGTON,] June 29, 1951.

SD/E/561

REPORT OF SEVENTH (1951) SESSION OF COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS (ITEM 18)

PROBLEM

What action should the United States support in the Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC) in regard to the report of the Seventh (1951) Session of the Commission on Human Rights?

RECOMMENDATIONS

The United States should support the view that:

1. ECOSOC should note and comment the report.

2. ECOSOC should not undertake a drafting revision of each of the provisions of the draft International Covenant on Human Rights. ECOSOC should instead discuss the provisions of the Covenant and forward such comments as are made at its 13th Session to the General Assembly. If majority sentiment in ECOSOC is against this view, the United States should urge as a second position that recommendations be formulated and forwarded to the General Assembly rather than an article-by-article revision of the provisions of the Covenant. Such recommendations should if possible be limited to the provisions of Parts III and V of the Covenant on economic, social and cultural rights and on reporting.

3. If there is a discussion of drafting changes in ECOSOC, the United States Delegation should be guided by Annex A and not propose or support changes except as set forth in Annex A.[1]

4. If general sentiment in ECOSOC favors the view that the provisions on economic, social and cultural rights should remain in the Covenant, the United States should support the retention of such provisions in the Covenant. The United States would prefer to have these provisions separated from the Covenant and provided for in a separate instrument, but it does not intend to attempt to oppose majority sentiment in ECOSOC on this question for reasons stated below in the discussion section of this paper. Accordingly, if general sentiment in ECOSOC favors the separation of these provisions, the United States should continue to support this view.

[1] Not printed.

5. The United States should, during the consideration of the Covenant in ECOSOC, make a statement of understanding along the following lines with respect to the provisions on economic, social, and cultural rights:

"The United States desires to make clear for the record its understanding of the term 'rights' as used in the economic, social and cultural provisions in Part III of the Covenant in contrast to the use of the term 'rights' in the civil and political provisions in Part II. The civil and political rights are of such a nature as to be given legal effect promptly by the adoption of legislative or other measures as may be necessary. The economic, social and cultural rights, while spoken of as 'rights' are, however, to be treated as objectives towards which states adhering to the Covenant will within their resources undertake to strive by the creation of conditions which will be conducive to the exercise of private as well as public action for their progressive achievement.

"The United States wishes to reiterate in the Economic and Social Council, as its Representative repeatedly stated in the Commission on Human Rights, this understanding of the United States Government that the economic, social, and cultural rights in the Covenant are recognized as objectives to be achieved progressively, as provided in Article 19".

In making this statement the United States Delegation may wish to point out to the Members of the Economic and Social Council the part that the United States is taking with other countries toward the attainment of improved economic, social and cultural conditions in the World. It is scarcely necessary to enumerate the many activities of the United States in this respect. The United States feels that all the Members of the United Nations should not only support the Covenant as a standard of action in economic, social and cultural matters but should also actively participate in the many specialized agencies which are doing daily constructive work in these fields. It might also be pointed out that the Soviet Union talks about achievements in these fields but contributes very little constructively to the improvement of economic, social and cultural conditions in other countries either through the specialized agencies or through the United Nations.

6. The United States favors the position that ECOSOC forward the draft Covenant to the 1951 Session of the General Assembly with no recommendation as to whether it be completed in that session of the General Assembly or be forwarded by the General Assembly to the Commission on Human Rights for further consideration. The United States should, however, go along with prevailing sentiment in ECOSOC on this question. If prevailing sentiment favors recommending that the General Assembly complete the Covenant at its 1951 session, the United States should support this view. If prevailing sentiment favors recommending that the General Assembly forward the Covenant to the Commission on Human Rights for further consideration, the United States should go along with this view.

7. The United States should continue to oppose the inclusion of provisions in the Covenant to extend the right of complaint to individuals, groups or organizations. The United States should point out such provisions should be included in a separate protocol or protocols. The United States should also oppose the inclusion of a provision in the Covenant referring to other international instruments authorizing complaints to be filed by individuals, groups or organizations.

8. ECOSOC should take action with respect to the other sections of the report of the Commission on Human Rights as set forth in Parts C and D of the discussion below, except that with respect to the draft Declaration of the Rights of the Child, see separate position paper on this subject.

DISCUSSION

A. Work of the Commission in General

The Commission on Human Rights at its five-weeks 1951 session considered only the draft International Covenant on Human Rights and the confidential list of communications. It did not have time to consider any other matters on its agenda.

B. Draft International Covenant on Human Rights

1. General

The Commission on Human Rights drafted two new parts on economic, social and cultural rights and revised the implementation machinery with respect to civil and political rights. The Commission did not have time to review the other parts of the Covenant. Part III of the Covenant now sets forth the economic, social and cultural rights. Part V sets forth the new reporting requirements and Part IV sets forth the implementation machinery with respect to civil and political rights. Parts I and II on civil and political rights remain unchanged. Part VI which contains drafts of the federal state article, the territories article and procedural articles was not considered except to include the territories article which was approved by the General Assembly at its Fifth (1950) Session.

2. Economic, Social and Cultural Rights

It is provided in recommendation 4 above that if general sentiment in ECOSOC favors the view that the provisions on economic, social and cultural rights should remain in the Covenant, the United States should support the retention of such provisions in the Covenant. The United States would prefer to have these provisions separated from the Covenant and provided for in a separate instrument, but it does not intend to attempt to oppose majority sentiment in ECOSOC on this question. Accordingly, if general sentiment in ECOSOC favors the separation of these provisions, the United States should continue to support this view. The United States intends to follow a similar position in the General Assembly, i.e., that of going along with general sentiment on this question.

The United States expects that there will be majority sentiment in the General Assembly favoring the retention of the provisions on economic, social and cultural rights in the Covenant and any effort on the part of the United States to press for the separation of these provisions will not be successful and will rebound unfavorably with respect to the general political position of the United States vis-à-vis other countries, particularly the many underdeveloped countries urging the inclusion of these provisions in the Covenant.

After a careful consideration of the factors involved in the drive by other countries for the inclusion of these provisions in the Covenant, both at the 1950 session of the General Assembly and the 1951 session of the Commission on Human Rights, the United States realizes that the inclusion of these provisions in the Covenant constitutes a symbol of the needs and aspirations of these countries. They look to these articles as a lever which may help to raise them out of their present depressed condition. They do not understand the preference of the United States that these provisions not be included in the first Covenant. They do not understand, and in fact resent, the reluctance of the United States to state these provisions in terms of rights. They insist on the use of the term "rights"—many of these provisions are already stated in terms of rights in their Constitutions. In general they regard these provisions as goals or objectives, not as immediate obligations. In particular, the individuals representing governments in the Commission and in the General Assembly feel that they need such provisions in the Covenant as a standard with which to challenge and prod their own governments and leaders in their countries to greater effort in the direction of attaining economic and social improvement.

It is also necessary to consider this question in connection with the propaganda problem it presents, vis-à-vis the Soviet Government and its unscrupulous propaganda tactics.

Since it appears that even an intensive diplomatic campaign to separate the economic, social and cultural provisions would not be successful and would only create a great deal of ill-will against the United States, it is the recommendation of this paper that the United States simply go along with the majority on this question, without pressing for one side or the other in this matter.

At the same time, however, the United States should make it clear, as appropriate, that the economic, social and cultural provisions are obviously different in a number of respects from the civil and political provisions of the Covenant. These differences were recognized by the Commission on Human Rights and are acknowledged in the draft Covenant.

See Annex A for changes which should be proposed or supported by the United States with respect to the economic, social and cultural provisions in the present text of the draft Covenant. If appropriate changes are not made in the present text of the draft Covenant, the United States contemplates making reservations as necessary at the time of signature or ratification.

3. Reporting on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights

The Commission initially drafted a new Part V in the Covenant to provide that States ratifying the Covenant would submit reports concerning progress made by them in achieving the observance of economic, social and cultural rights. At the same time, the Commission provided in Article 60 that these reports would be submitted in conformity with the recommendations of ECOSOC and the General Assembly in the exercise of their general responsibility calling upon all Members of the United Nations to provide such reports. The United States should support Article 60 as set forth in the draft Covenant.

There was strong sentiment in the Commission that all Members of the United Nations should be called upon to submit these reports, whether or not they ratified the Covenant on Human Rights. It was recognized of course that only States ratifying the Covenant could be obligated under the Covenant to furnish these reports, and that other Members of the United Nations would not be under a similar obligation to do so. It was felt, however, that since it was being provided in the Covenant that the reports would be considered by the United Nations, all Members of the United Nations should be requested to submit the reports by the adoption of recommendations to this effect by the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly.

The United States should support the provisions on reporting except as set forth in Annex A.

4. Implementation of Civil and Political Rights

The Commission revised Part IV of the draft Covenant on the implementation of the civil and political rights. The United States should support the revised text of these provisions. See, however, the change proposed in Article 33 (in Annex A).

The United States should oppose the application of the implementation procedure set forth in Part IV in the economic, social and cultural rights. There was no sentiment at the 1951 session of the Commission for the application of this procedure to economic, social and cultural rights. It was practically the unanimous view in the Commission that this complaint procedure would not be appropriate for the economic, social and cultural rights. These rights are to be achieved progressively and the obligations of States with respect to these rights are not as precise as with respect to the civil and political rights. The Commission felt it was important to stress the assistance to be accorded to States to achieve economic, social and cultural progress rather than to stimulate complaints against States. The Commission felt that the gradual character of the economic, social and cultural program envisaged was not conducive to an effective complaint procedure.

The Commission at its 1951 session again rejected the inclusion of a provision in the Covenant to extend the right of complaint to individuals, groups and organizations. This proposal was rejected by a vote of 7 to 10 with one abstention. The seven countries voting in favor of this proposal were Chile, Egypt, Guatemala, India, Lebanon, Sweden, and Uruguay. The ten countries voting against this proposal were Australia, China, France, Greece, Pakistan, Ukraine, USSR, United Kingdom, United States and Yugoslavia. Denmark abstained.

Guatemala proposed that a provision be included in the Covenant referring to other international instruments authorizing complaints to be filed by individuals, groups and organizations. This proposal was also rejected by the Commission by a vote of 7 to 9 (US) with 1 abstention.

The United States should continue to oppose the inclusion of provisions in the Covenant to extend the right of complaint to individuals, groups or organizations. The United States should point out that such provisions should if they are to be set forth, be included in a separate protocol or protocols. The United States should also oppose the inclusion of a provision in the Covenant such as that proposed by Guatemala to refer in the Covenant to other international instruments authorizing complaints to be filed by individuals, groups and organizations.

5. Federal State Article

The United States should make entirely clear its view that a federal state article should be included in the Covenant on Human Rights and should be applicable to economic, social and cultural provisions as well as to the civil and political provisions in the Covenant. See Article 71 in Annex A for the text of the federal state article supported by the United States for inclusion in the Covenant.

This new Article 71 is designed to meet the proposal of India to the 5th (1949) session of the Commission on Human Rights, the proposals of the United Kingdom at the 5th (1949) and 6th (1950) sessions of the Commission on reporting and the proposal of Denmark at the 1951 session of the Commission to phrase this article in terms of an approved reservation.

This proposal should help to meet the criticism expressed at the 1950 session of the General Assembly with respect to the earlier language submitted by the United States for a federal state article. In order to secure the support of other delegations to authorize the Commission on Human Rights at its 7th (1951) session to study the inclusion of a federal state article in the Covenant, the United States indicated in the 1950 session of the General Assembly that it would be willing to take the views of other delegations into account as much as possible in a revision of the federal state article.

Three principal points were made in the discussion in 1950 session of the General Assembly: (1) there was objection to the use of the word "appropriate" in the United States proposal; (2) there was a general preference for the Indian proposal rather than the United States proposal, a number of delegations feeling that the Indian proposal was stated in a more objective sense than the United States proposal; and (3) considerable support developed for the United Kingdom proposal that a reporting requirement should be included in the federal state article.

The language proposed for Article 71 in Annex A undertakes to meet these three principal objections to the previous United States proposal for a federal state article as well as the proposal of Denmark, made in the Commission on Human Rights at its 1951 session, to call for a reservation on this matter by a federal state. The new language also states with added clarity and emphasis the limited character of the obligation a federal state assumes with respect to its constituent units.

At the same time, it is proposed in this paper that a reporting requirement also be included in the Covenant with respect to all States adhering to the Covenant. If a reporting requirement is included in the federal state article requiring a federal state to submit information received from constituent units to the Secretary General of the United Nations, each unitary state should also be required to report with respect to the manner in which provisions of the Covenant are being given effect in that state. In this way, there will be less stress given to the reports of federal states, and unitary states will not be in as strong a position to criticize the reports of federal states. The noncompliance of a unitary state with provisions of the Covenant, as reflected in its reports, will be open for close scrutiny.

6. Territories Article

It was decided in the 1951 session of the Commission on Human Rights that the territories article approved by the General Assembly at its 1950 session should be included in the Covenant as Article 72. The United States should not oppose the inclusion of this article in the Covenant.

7. Other Articles of Covenant

The United States should support the articles in Parts I and II and Articles 70 and 73 in Part VI of the Covenant except as set forth in Annex A.

C. Confidential List of Communications

The only agenda item considered by the Commission at its 1951 session other than the draft Covenant was the confidential list of communications. At a brief meeting the Commission received the confidential list of communications and observations from governments concerning human rights prepared by the Secretary General. The Commission simply noted these communications and called the attention of ECOSOC, in its consideration of the question of petitions to the fact that the Commission has been receiving communications concerning human rights since its establishment. No action on the part of ECOSOC is necessary on this point.

D. Right of Peoples and Nations to Self-Determination

The Commission did not reach the consideration of the right of peoples and nations to self-determination as requested by the 1950 session of the General Assembly. If this question is raised at ECOSOC, the United States should support its consideration at the Eighth (1952) Session of the Commission.

Editorial Note

At meetings on August 27, 28, and 29, 1951, the Economic and Social Council considered the Report of the Seventh Session of the Commission on Human Rights, that is, the Commission's Draft International Covenant on Human Rights and measures of implementation. On August 29, the Council adopted Resolution 384 (XIII), which took note of the Report of the Commission; expressed appreciation for the Commission's efforts to formulate basic economic, social, and cultural articles; noted that lack of time had prevented the Commission from completing tasks assigned to it by the General Assembly, in particular the revision of the first 18 articles of the draft Covenant and the preparation of recommendations regarding a federal-state article; and in respect of the latter requested the Commission at its next session to proceed to the completion of those tasks. The resolution provided for the transmission of the Commission's reports and drafts to the Sixth Regular Session of the General Assembly, together with the Council's own deliberations on the subject, for the information of governments not represented on the Commission or the Council. For text of the resolution, see ECOSOC (XIII)), Supplement No. 1, Resolutions. For the proceedings of the Council on this matter, see ECOSOC

(XIII), 522d meeting, 523d meeting, 524th meeting, and 525th meeting, pages 396–419. For statements to the Council by the Alternate United States Representative (Kotschnig), see ibid., pages 406–407 and 417. In the first statement, August 28, Mr. Kotschnig specifically reserved this Government's understanding of the term "rights" as used in the economic, social, and cultural provisions of the draft Covenant (Part III) in contrast to the use of the term "rights" in Part II (provisions on civil and political rights).

340.1–AG/9–1451

The Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Sandifer) to Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt

WASHINGTON, September 14, 1951.

MY DEAR MRS. ROOSEVELT: Enclosed is a copy of the resolution on the draft International Covenant on Human Rights adopted by the Economic and Social Council in Geneva on August 29, 1951 together with an explanatory statement concerning the vote for Part C of the resolution and on the resolution as a whole.[1]

The fourth paragraph of Part A of the resolution was adopted 11 to 7. Part B was adopted by a vote of 15 to 3.

A review of the minutes of the meetings of the Economic and Social Council at which this resolution was discussed shows that only six of the eighteen members of the Economic and Social Council expressed the view that the economic, social and cultural provisions should be removed from the Covenant. These six countries were India, Belgium, Uruguay, Canada, United Kingdom and the United States. The following countries expressed the view that these provisions should be retained in the Covenant: Mexico, France, Pakistan, Philippines, Chile, China, USSR, Czechoslovakia and Poland. Peru also tended toward this position. Sweden reserved its position, and Iran did not express its point of view on this question.

There was wide sentiment in the Council discussion that the Covenant should be returned to the Commission on Human Rights for its further consideration after its review by the General Assembly.

We are proceeding with the preparation of a position paper on the draft International Covenant on Human Rights for the next session of the General Assembly. When our work has advanced sufficiently on this paper, we would very much like to discuss it with you.

Sincerely yours, DURWARD V. SANDIFER

DRAFT INTERNATIONAL COVENANT ON HUMAN RIGHTS

THE PROBLEM

What should be the position of the United States concerning the draft International Covenant on Human Rights?

RECOMMENDATIONS

(1) The United States would prefer to have the provisions on economic, social and cultural rights separated from the present draft Covenant on Human Rights and provided for in a separate instrument. The following course of action should accordingly be followed:

(a) The United States should, if it finds majority sentiment in the Assembly favorable, support the position that two instruments instead of the present single instrument on human rights be drafted. One instrument would contain civil and political rights and the other instrument would contain economic, social and cultural rights.

(b) If it appears majority sentiment in the General Assembly is unfavorable to position (a) and the General Assembly decides to refer the draft Covenant to the Commission on Human Rights for its further consideration, the United States Delegation should, if it is likely to obtain majority support in the Assembly, propose and support the position that the General Assembly defer its decision and request the Commission to prepare three instruments for the consideration of the Assembly at its 1952 session—the first instrument would contain civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights; the second instrument would contain only civil and political rights; and the third instrument would contain only economic, social and cultural rights. The Assembly would at its 1952 session then decide whether all these rights should be in one or two instruments, accepting either the pattern of the first instrument or the pattern of the second and third instruments.

(2) If majority sentiment in the General Assembly appears unfavorable to recommendations 1(a) and 1(b) and favorable to the inclusion of economic, social and cultural provisions in a single Covenant with civil and political rights, the United States Delegation should not oppose but should vote for the inclusion of economic, social and cultural provisions in a single Covenant. In this event the United States should explain that it intends to vote for the retention of these provisions because of the general sentiment in the Assembly favoring this view. The United States Delegation should not oppose majority sentiment in the Assembly on this question for reasons stated below in the comment section of this paper.

(3) The United States should, during the consideration of the Covenant in the General Assembly, make a statement of understanding along the following lines with respect to the provisions on economic, social and cultural rights:

"The United States desires to make clear for the record its understanding of the term 'rights' as used in the economic, social and cultural provisions in Part III of the Covenant in contrast to the use of the term 'rights' in the civil and political provisions in Part II. The civil and political rights are of such a nature as to be given legal effect promptly by the adoption of legislative or other measures as may be necessary. The economic, social and cultural rights, while spoken of as 'rights' are, however, to be treated as objectives which states adhering to the Covenant will within their resources undertake to achieve progressively by private as well as public action.

"The United States wishes to reiterate in the General Assembly, as its representatives repeatedly stated in the Commission on Human Rights and in the Economic and Social Council, this understanding of the United States Government that the economic, social and cultural rights in the Covenant are recognized as objectives to be achieved progressively, as provided in Article 19."

In making this statement the Delegation may wish to point out the part that the United States is taking with other countries toward the attainment of improved economic, social and cultural conditions in the world. The United States believes that all the Members of the United Nations should not only support the Covenant as a standard of action in economic, social and cultural matters but should also actively participate in the many specialized agencies which are doing daily constructive work in these fields. It might also be pointed out that the Soviet Union talks about achievements in these fields but contributes very little constructively to the improvement of economic, social and cultural conditions in other countries either through the specialized agencies or through the United Nations.

(4) The United States should go along with prevailing sentiment in the General Assembly for the completion of the Covenant in this session or its reference to the Commission on Human Rights for further consideration. The Delegation should explain that it is prepared to participate in the completion of the Covenant at this session if it is possible to do so and if other delegations are also prepared to do so.

(5) If the General Assembly undertakes a discussion of drafting changes in the Covenant, the United States Delegation should be guided by Annex A. If the Assembly proceeds with the drafting of the Covenant, the Delegation should indicate its preference that the Assembly begin with the consideration of Article 1 since in this way the first 18 articles would be discussed first. The United States considers these articles as being closer to a satisfactory completed drafting stage than the other articles of the Covenant.

(6) The United States should continue to oppose the inclusion of provisions in the Covenant to extend the right of complaint to individuals, groups or organizations. The United States should point out that such provisions should, if they are to be provided, be included in a separate protocol or protocols. The United States should also oppose the inclusion of a provision in the Covenant referring to other international instruments authorizing complaints to be filed by individuals, groups or organizations.

(7) The United States should urge the inclusion of a federal state article in the Covenant on Human Rights as set forth in Article 71 of Annex A in order that it will be expressly clear that the obligations of the United States under the Covenant are limited to matters which, under the Constitution of the United States, are in their federal jurisdiction. This article should be applicable to the economic, social, and cultural provisions as well as the civil and political provisions of the Covenant.

COMMENT

1. General

The Commission on Human Rights at its 1951 session drafted two new parts of the Covenant, one setting forth economic, social and cultural rights and another setting forth reporting requirements. In addition, the Commission revised the complaint provisions with respect to civil and political rights. The Commission did not have time to review the other parts of the Covenant. Part III of the Covenant now sets forth the economic, social and cultural rights. Part IV sets forth the complaint provisions and Part V the new reporting requirements. Parts I and II on civil and political rights remain unchanged. Part VI which contains drafts of the federal state article, the territories article and procedural articles was not considered except to include the territories article which was approved by the General Assembly at its Fifth (1950) session.

2. Economic, Social and Cultural Rights

As pointed out above in recommendation 1, the United States would prefer to have the provisions on economic, social and cultural rights separated from the present draft Covenant and provided for in a separate instrument. It is hoped that majority sentiment in the Assembly will support the course of action proposed in recommendation 1. If, however, Assembly sentiment is unfavorable to this recommendation and favorable instead to the retention of economic, social and cultural provisions in a single Covenant with civil and political rights, the United States Delegation should not propose or support recommendation 1 but should instead vote for the retention of these provisions in a single Covenant.

After a careful consideration of the factors involved in the views expressed by other countries for the inclusion of these provisions in the Covenant, at the 1950 session of the General Assembly, the 1951 session of the Commission on Human Rights and the July–September 1951 session of the Economic and Social Council, the United States has come to the conclusion that it would not be wise to oppose majority sentiment in the Assembly at this session on this question. To press for the separation of these provisions in the face of majority opposition in the Assembly would only invite a great deal of ill-will against the United States and rebound unfavorably with respect to the general political position of the United States vis-à-vis other countries, particularly in view of the many underdeveloped countries urging the inclusion of these provisions in the Covenant.

The economic, social and cultural provisions in the Covenant constitute a symbol of the needs and aspirations of these countries. They look to these articles as a lever which may help to raise them out of their present depressed condition. They do not understand the preference of the United States that these provisions not be included in the same instrument as civil and political rights. They do not understand, and in fact resent the reluctance of the United States to state these provisions in terms of rights. They insist on the use of the term "rights"—many of these provisions are already stated in terms of rights in their Constitutions. In general they regard these provisions as goals or objectives, not as immediate obligations. In particular, the individuals representing governments in the Commission and in the General Assembly feel that they need such provisions in the Covenant as a standard with which to challenge and prod their own governments and leaders in their countries to greater effort in the direction of attaining economic and social improvement, despite the fact that it is realized that they are handicapped in the full attainment of these objectives by the lack of funds, technical "know-how," etc.

It is also necessary to consider this question in connection with the propaganda problem it presents, vis-à-vis the Soviet Government and its unscrupulous propaganda tactics.

At the same time, however, the United States should make it clear, as appropriate, that the economic, social and cultural provisions are obviously different in a number of respects from the civil and political provisions of the Covenant. These differences were recognized by the Commission on Human Rights and are acknowledged in the draft Covenant.

3. Reporting Requirements

The Commission initially drafted a new Part V in the Covenant to provide that States ratifying the Covenant would submit reports concerning progress made by them in achieving the observance of economic, social and cultural rights. At the same time, the Commission provided in Article 60 that these reports would be submitted in conformity with the recommendations of ECOSOC and the General Assembly in the exercise of their general responsibility calling upon all Members of the United Nations to provide such reports. The United States Delegation should support Article 60 as set forth in the draft Covenant.

There was strong sentiment in the Commission that all Members of the United Nations should be called upon to submit these reports, whether or not they ratified the Covenant on Human Rights. It was recognized of course that only States ratifying the Covenant could be obligated under the Covenant to furnish these reports, and that other Members of the United Nations would not be under a similar obligation to do so. It was felt, however, that since it was being provided in the Covenant that the reports would be considered by the United Nations, all Members of the United Nations should be requested to submit the reports by the adoption of recommendations to this effect by the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly.

The United States Delegation should support the provisions on reporting except as set forth in Annex A.[2]

In adopting Part V at its 1951 session, the Commission postponed its decision as to whether the reporting requirements of this Part should apply only to the economic, social and cultural rights recognized in Part III or also to the civil and political rights in Part II of the Covenant.

On this question, the United States would prefer that the reporting requirements of Part V be applicable solely to the economic, social and cultural rights in Part III and to limit reporting on the civil and political rights along the lines of the United States reporting proposal for an additional paragraph 4 for Article 1.

As a second position, however, if sentiment in the General Assembly favors the extension of the reporting program of Part V to the civil and political rights, the United States Delegation should go along with this view.

4. Implementation of Civil and Political Rights

The Commission revised Part IV of the draft Covenant on the implementation of the civil and political rights. The United States should support the revised text of these provisions. See, however, the change proposed in Article 33 (in Annex A).

[2] Annex A not printed. It was a detailed commentary on all 71 articles of the Draft Covenant.

The United States should oppose the application of the implementation procedures set forth in Part IV to the economic, social and cultural rights. There was no sentiment at the 1951 session of the Commission for the application of this procedure to economic, social and cultural rights. It was practically the unanimous view in the Commission that this complaint procedure would not be appropriate for the economic, social and cultural rights. These rights are to be achieved progressively and the obligations of States with respect to these rights are not as precise as with respect to the civil and political rights. The Commission felt it was important to stress the assistance to be accorded to States to achieve economic, social and cultural progress rather than to stimulate complaints against States. The Commission felt that the gradual character of the economic, social and cultural program envisaged was not conducive to an effective complaint procedure.

The Commission at its 1951 session again rejected the inclusion of a provision in the Covenant to extend the right of complaint to individuals, groups and organizations. This proposal was rejected by a vote of 7 to 10 with one abstention. The seven countries voting in favor of this proposal were Chile, Egypt, Guatemala, India, Lebanon, Sweden and Uruguay. The ten countries voting against this proposal were Australia, China, France, Greece, Pakistan, Ukraine, USSR, United Kingdom, United States and Yugoslavia. Denmark abstained.

Guatemala proposed that a provision be included in the Covenant referring to other international instruments authorizing complaints to be filed by individuals, groups and organizations. This proposal was also rejected by the Commission by a vote of 7 to 9 (US) with 1 abstention.

The United States Delegation should continue to oppose the inclusion of provisions in the Covenant to extend the right of complaint to individuals, groups or organizations. The United States Delegation should point out that such provisions should if they are to be set forth, be included in a separate protocol or protocols. The United States Delegation should also oppose the inclusion of a provision in the Covenant such as that proposed by Guatemala to refer in the Covenant to other international instruments authorizing complaints to be filed by individuals, groups and organizations.

5. Federal State Article

The United States should make entirely clear its view that a federal state article should be included in the Covenant on Human Rights and should be applicable to economic, social and cultural provisions as well as to the civil and political provisions in the Covenant. See Article 71 in Annex A for the text of the federal state article supported by the United States for inclusion in the Covenant.

This new Article 71 is designed to meet the proposal of India to the 5th (1949) session of the Commission on Human Rights, the proposals of the United Kingdom at the 5th (1949) and 6th (1950) sessions of the Commission on reporting and the proposal of Denmark at the 1951 session of the Commission to phrase this article in terms of an approved reservation and to reflect the federal state article included in the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees adopted by the Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Status of Refugees and Stateless Persons at Geneva on July 25, 1951.

This new proposal for Article 71 should help to meet the criticism expressed at the 1950 session of the General Assembly with respect to the earlier language submitted by the United States for a federal state article. In order to secure the support of other delegations to authorize the Commission on Human Rights at its 7th (1951) session to study the inclusion of a federal state article in the Covenant, the United States Delegation indicated in the 1950 session of the General Assembly that it would be willing to take the views of other delegations into account as much as possible in a revision of the federal state article.

Three principal points were made in the discussion in the 1950 session of the General Assembly: (1) there was objection to the use of the word "appropriate" in the United States proposal; (2) there was a general preference for the Indian proposal rather than the United States proposal, a number of delegations feeling that the Indian proposal was stated in a more objective sense than the United States proposal; and (3) considerable support developed for the United Kingdom proposal that a reporting requirement should be included in the federal state article.

The language proposed for Article 71 in Annex A undertakes to meet these three principal objections to the previous United States proposal for a federal state article as well as the proposal of Denmark, made in the Commission on Human Rights at its 1951 session, to call for a reservation on this matter by a federal state. The new language also states with added clarity and emphasis the limited character of the obligations a federal state assumes with respect to its constituent units and includes some of the language of the federal state article approved for the Refugee Convention.

At the same time, it is proposed that a reporting requirement also be included in the Covenant with respect to all States adhering to the Covenant. If a reporting requirement is included in the federal state article requiring a federal state to submit information received from constituent units to the Secretary General of the United Nations, each unitary state should also be required to report with respect to the manner in which provisions of the Covenant are being given effect in that State. In this way, there will be less stress given to the reports of federal states, and unitary states will not be in as strong a position to criticize the reports of federal states. The noncompliance of a unitary state with provisions of the Covenant, as reflected in its reports, will be open for close scrutiny.

6. Territories Article

It was decided in the 1951 session of the Commission on Human Rights that the terrorities article approved by the General Assembly at its 1950 session should be included in the Covenant as Article 72. The United States should not oppose the inclusion of this article in the Covenant.

7. Other Articles of Covenant

The United States should support the articles in Parts I and II and Articles 70 and 73 in Part VI of the Covenant except as set forth in Annex A.

The Secretary of State to the United States Representative at the United Nations (Austin)

RESTRICTED WASHINGTON, October 2, 1951.

No. 118

The Secretary of State requests the United States Representative to the United Nations, if he perceives no objection, to discuss with the British, French, Canadian and Australian Delegations to the United Nations the attitude of the United States with respect to the consideration of the draft International Covenant on Human Rights in the sixth (1951) session of the General Assembly as set forth in the attached statement and at the same time to hand a copy of this statement to these delegations and to request a statement of the views of their Governments on these issues.

There is enclosed for the information of the United States Representative three copies of the position paper concerning the draft Covenant on Human Rights at the sixth session of the General Assembly which has been finally approved as the position of the United States.[1]

ment. The United States accordingly proposes to take the following course of action at this session of the General Assembly:

(a) The United States will support the drafting of two instruments instead of the present single instrument on human rights, provided that there is majority sentiment in the General Assembly favorable to this position. One instrument would contain civil and political rights and the other instrument would contain economic, social and cultural rights.

(b) If it appears majority sentiment in the General Assembly is unfavorable to position (a) and the General Assembly decides to refer the draft Covenant to the Commission on Human Rights for its further consideration, the United States intends, if it is likely to obtain majority support in the Assembly, to support the position that the General Assembly defer its decision and request the Commission to prepare three instruments for the consideration of the Assembly at its 1952 session—the first instrument would contain civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights; the second instrument would contain only civil and political rights; and the third instrument would contain only economic, social and cultural rights. The Assembly would at its 1952 session then decide whether all these rights should be in one or two instruments, accepting either the pattern of the first instrument or the pattern of the second and third instruments.

2. If majority sentiment in the General Assembly appears unfavorable to these recommendations and favorable to the inclusion of economic, social and cultural provisions in a single Covenant with civil and political rights, the United States does not intend to oppose the inclusion of economic, social and cultural provisions in a single Covenant.

3. The United States Delegation intends, during the consideration of the Covenant in the General Assembly, to make clear for the record its understanding of the term "rights" as used in the economic, social and cultural provisions in Part III of the Covenant in contrast to the use of the term "rights" in the civil and political provisions in Part II; i.e., that the economic, social and cultural rights, while spoken of as "rights" are, however, to be treated as objectives which States adhering to the Covenant will within their resources undertake to achieve progressively by private as well as public action.

4. The United States intends to go along with prevailing sentiment in the General Assembly for the completion of the Covenant in this session or its reference to the Commission on Human Rights for further consideration. The United States intends to explain that it is prepared to participate in the completion of the Covenant at this session if it is possible to do so and if other delegations are also prepared to do so.

5. The United States intends to continue to oppose the inclusion of provisions in the Covenant to extend the right of complaint to individuals, groups or organizations. The United States intends to point out such provisions should, if they are to be provided, be included in a separate protocol or protocols.

6. The United States will urge the inclusion of a federal state article in the Covenant on Human Rights. This article should be applicable to the economic, social and cultural provisions as well as the civil and political provisions of the Covenant.

The United States would appreciate receiving the views and support of the British, French, Canadian and Australian delegations with respect to the following draft of a federal state article for Article 71 of the Covenant:

"A Federal State may at the time of signature or ratification of, or accession to, this Covenant make a Declaration stating that the provisions of the Covenant are not entirely, under the Constitution of the Federal State, within the jurisdiction of its federal authority but are in part within the jurisdiction of its constituent states, provinces or cantons. In the event such a Declaration is made, the obligations of the Federal State shall be:

"(1) In respect of provisions of the Covenant that in the absence of this Covenant would come within the jurisdiction of the federal authority the obligations of the Federal State shall to this extent be the same as those of Parties not filing such a Declaration.

"(2) In respect of provisions of the Covenant that come within the jurisdiction of its constituent states, provinces or cantons, which are not under the constitutional system of the federation bound to take legislative action, the obligations of the Federal State shall to this extent be (a) to bring these provisions with favorable recommendation to the notice of the appropriate authorities of the constituent units at the earliest possible moment, and (b) to request such authorities to inform the Federal Government as to the status of the law of the constituent units when compared with these provisions of the Covenant. The Federal Government shall transmit such information received from constituent units to the Secretary General of the United Nations.

"The Secretary General of the United Nations shall inform other States Parties to the Covenant of such Declaration."

This new Article 71 undertakes to incorporate language proposed by India to the 5th (1949) session of the Commission on Human Rights, the proposals of the United Kingdom at the 5th (1949) and 6th (1950) sessions of the Commission on reporting and the proposal of Denmark at the 1951 session of the Commission to phrase this article in terms of an approved reservation and to reflect the federal state article included in the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees adopted by the Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Status of Refugees and Stateless Persons at Geneva on July 25, 1951.

This article should meet the criticism expressed at the 1950 session of the General Assembly with respect to the earlier language submitted by the United States for a federal state article. In order to secure the support of other delegations to authorize the Commission on Human Rights at its 7th (1951) session to study the inclusion of a federal state article in the Covenant, the United States Delegation indicated in the 1950 session of the General Assembly that it would be willing to take the views of other delegations into account as much as possible in a revision of the federal state article.

Three principal points were made in the discussion in the 1950 session of the General Assembly: (1) there was objection to the use of the word "appropriate" in the United States proposal; (2) there was a general preference for the Indian proposal rather than the United States proposal, a number of delegations feeling that the Indian proposal was stated in a more objective sense than the United States proposal; and (3) considerable support developed for the United Kingdom proposal that a reporting requirement should be included in the federal state article.

The language proposed for Article 71 meets these three principal objections to the previous United States proposal for a federal state article as well as the proposal of Denmark, made in the Commission on Human Rights at its 1951 session, to call for a reservation on this matter by a federal state. A Declaration rather than a reservation seems preferable to the United States to avoid the many complexities involved with respect to reservations. It has also seemed useful to use some of the language of the federal state article approved for the Refugee Convention.

3. Mr. Green noted that the other principal items in Committee 3—freedom of information and refugees—would be taken up with the Delegation at a later date. He gave a brief account of the attempts at drafting the Human Rights Covenant, by which the principles of the Human Rights Declaration would be embodied in a treaty. The Human Rights Commission had wanted, at its last session, to add to the Human Rights Covenant certain portions on economic, social, and cultural rights in addition to those on civil and political rights.

[1] For information regarding the composition and organization of the United States Delegation to the Sixth Regular Session of the General Assembly, see pp. 2–10 and 37–44. The Secretary of State presided at this meeting.

There would be two major questions for Committee 3. The first was whether or not to sustain the latest ECOSOC recommendation that the Covenant should be returned to the HRComm for further consideration. The proposed position was that we should be prepared to draft the Covenant at any time that was practicable, i.e. either in C.3 or in the HRComm. This would depend entirely on which way the majority tended. We would follow the majority, recognizing that the drafting of the HRC wherever done would be a big job. Ambassador Austin interrupted to ask if our decision on procedure might be affected by our position on the substance. Mr. Green said we would have to have an argument on the substance at some point, and it did not too much matter where it came.

Mr. Cohen said there was a difference in not opposing the majority and supporting it. His view was that we must not act with undue haste on this matter. His substantive views had been made apparent at meetings of the Delegation during other sessions of the GA.

Mr. Green explained that the second major question was whether to include economic and social rights in a single covenant, or to insist on two separate covenants, as had been our position in the past. We had taken our previous position from a feeling that a separate covenant on civil and political rights would receive the largest number of ratifications. Supported by the UK, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and occasionally India, we had argued that economic and social rights were of a different character from civil and political rights. The majority did not support us in this position, or at least favored a single covenant. The Latin Americans, Near Easterners, and Far Easterners took a different view, since they were not concerned by the fact that their governments would become a party to obligations which they could not fulfill at the present. They felt that the inclusion of such rights would act as a lever in raising their economic and social status. The general emotionalism of the underdeveloped countries lay behind the majority feeling in C.3. They also felt that, if there were two covenants, one would be considered more important than the other, and many states might not adhere to the lesser one regarding economic and social rights. ECOSOC had, by an 11–5 vote, supported our position of separate covenants.

The general US position was not to risk all of the ill will we had obtained last year by opposing the majority. It would be better to have a flexible position, thereby being able to take the leadership away from the Soviets. Thus, if the majority should favor drawing up two covenants, we would agree. In the event that the majority wanted a single covenant and also was willing to let the drafting take place in the HRComm, we would take the position that the Commission should draw up two sets of covenants: one would be the single covenant, the other would contain two covenants, one on civil and political rights, the other concerning economic and social matters. In this way we could offer for full consideration the two alternatives, in a side-by-side comparison. If the majority wanted a single covenant drafted now by the 3rd Committee, our position would be flexible enough to agree to this. We would not, however, lose the opportunity to make known our position and the domestic difficulties which a single covenant would present. We would thus make clear at every turn the fact that we regarded the so-called economic and social rights as objectives, and not legally enforceable obligations. The papers offered by Mr. Green for consideration of the Delegation also included a draft statement to be made by us on this latter matter, and detailed proposals on drafting the covenant.

Dr. Lubin pointed out that the US in last summer's ECOSOC meeting had obtained an agreement that, if the result were to be two separate covenants, they would both be submitted for ratification and signature to governments at the same time. Mr. Green said he would note this in the US position.

Dr. Tobias wondered about the relation between the HRC and the obligations of states under Article 73(e) of the Charter. Ambassador Sayre thought the covenant would not change any of the obligations of the Charter as to the nature of the Reports submitted under that Article. Mr. Sandifer pointed out that the question of ratification would still be up to the various states after the HRC had been drafted. Mr. Fisher posed a sample problem along these lines. If France should become a party to the HRC, and the Moroccans should protest under the appropriate procedures of the HRC, this would have no effect on Article 73(e). The matter would not be kept away from the Assembly because of the reports submitted under that article either. It would come to the Assembly, or to the UN's consideration, even if not raised as an Item on the GA agenda.

2. In a continuation of the Human Rights Covenant discussion, Mrs. Roosevelt offered background information on the C.3 situation. This, she felt, would serve to explain why the US had so many possible positions. The US and the western Europeans had been outvoted by the underdeveloped countries on the basis of emotion rather than reason. For example, the Indians had behaved quite irrationally in not carrying out their instructions and in voting against their previous stand. The day before, Professor Bokhari of Pakistan had told Mrs. Roosevelt that he did not favor trying to draft the Covenant over again in C.3. But he still wished to put all the economic and social rights into a single Human Rights Covenant. The Egyptians had taken the lead on this position in the UN. Even the NGO's from the US had disagreed with the US position on this matter, wanting to go much further, and in particular opposing the limitation of the right of petition to governments only. They did not seem to realize the practical difficulties involved, especially in connection with ratification by Congress.

Another point which the underdeveloped countries had insisted upon was that there would be no difficulty in having economic and social "rights" which were not justifiable. To avoid difficulties the US had devised a way of saying that these were not really "Rights", but only objectives to be sought. Mrs. Roosevelt would warn the other countries that the US would have a serious problem in trying to obtain ratification, and probably would not succeed. Furthermore the Federal-State clause, which was highly unpopular was of major importance to the US. It would probably be voted down just as the UK's territorial clause had been.

Mrs. Roosevelt added that she was aware of the tremendous legal difficulties encountered by the US, but she also feared the danger that the US might seem to be opposed to the cause of Human Rights. We would have to go along with the majority if it insisted on a single covenant, and we would leave it up to Congress to make whatever reservations they felt were needed. Above all we should not give the impression that the US was afraid to broaden the application of Human Rights provisions either at home or abroad. She said that a two-covenant situation would make it possible for the US to consider favorably the adoption of the one with civil and political rights.

In answer to a question by Miss Strauss, Mrs. Roosevelt said that the 5th GA had voted for a single covenant. ECOSOC had obtained a vote recommending reconsideration of this decision; but C.3 was far more representative of the Human Rights Commission than it was of ECOSOC.

Ambassador Sayre asked why the US position was not to oppose but to vote in favor of a single covenant, including the economic, social and cultural rights, when we did not think it was right and when we did not believe in it. Mrs. Roosevelt responded that we should not again be completely against a large majority. We should show that we were not trying to dictate and that we would go along, provided it was very clearly understood just what our position was. The Department felt that it would hurt the US more to be adamant when it would obviously lose anyway, than to go along with the majority and let them know of our objections. We would have to gauge the temper of the majority at the time the matter came up for a vote, and at that time decide whether to abstain or vote in favor. Replying to Ambassador Gross' question, she said that the USSR was always in the lead on this matter, but it tried to amend everything to give more enforcement power to individual states, rather than to retain the international flavor.

Dr. Tobias asked if the US was only supporting two covenants from a feeling that Congress would just [accept] the civil and political one. Mrs. Roosevelt said that it was very important that we should ratify the civil and political rights covenant, even if it were necessary to have a big debate in the Congress on the anti-discrimination clause. This would be a good thing for the US. She felt we would never ratify economic and social rights in a treaty. Such rights meant all things to all peoples. We would be getting something if we achieved a ratified covenant on civil and political rights.

Senator Cooper wondered if the Delegation were to take final action that morning on the US position. Mrs. Roosevelt said that was not expected, but that since C.3 discussion toward the end of the week might conceivably get to this matter, it was wise for the Delegation to be thinking seriously about it. Mr. Cooper asked to reserve his rights to comment later when he had had time to study the matter further.

Delga 450. Following is draft resolution (A/C.3/L.182) on Human Rights Covenant submitted in committee 3 by Chile, Egypt, Pakistan and Yugoslavia:

"Whereas the Economic and Social Council requested, by its decision of 9 August 1950, the General Assembly to make a policy decision concerning the inclusion of economic, social and cultural rights in the Covenant on Human Rights, Whereas the General Assembly affirmed, in its decision contained in resolution 421 E (V), that (the enjoyment of civic and political freedoms and of economic, social and cultural rights are interconnected and interdependent) and that (when deprived of economic, social and cultural rights, man does not represent a human person whom the universal declaration regards as the ideal of the free man),

Whereas the General Assembly, in the aforementioned resolution after a thorough and all-round discussion, confirmed the principle that economic, social and cultural rights should be included in the Covenant on Human Rights,

The General Assembly, having in mind resolution 384 (XIII) of the Economic and Social Council of 8 August 1951, but taking into account the fact that the Commission on Human Rights, at its seventh session, with the cooperation of the international labour organization, educational, social and cultural organization and world health organization, had already elaborated the first draft of economic, social and cultural rights in fourteen Articles, reaffirms its decision recorded in resolution 421 E (V) that economic, social and cultural rights should be included in the Covenant on Human Rights."

Delga 451. Following is Chilean draft resolution (A/C.3/L.180) in Committee 3 on human rights covenant:

"The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Commission on Human Rights (seventh session) and the records of the discussion thereon at the thirteenth session of the Economic and Social Council,

Noting that only lack of time prevented the Commission on Human Rights from undertaking certain of the tasks which the General Assembly assigned to it under Resolution 421 [E] (V) in connection with the draft international covenant on human rights.

Noting, likewise, that the Economic and Social Council decided to request the Commission on Human Rights to proceed, at its next session, with these tasks, in particular the revision of the first eighteen articles of the draft covenant and the preparation of recommendations aimed at securing the maximum extension of the covenant to the constituent units of federal states and at meeting the constitutional problems of those states,

1. Reaffirms the directives already given by the General Assembly in Resolution 421 [E] (V) and requests the Economic and Social Council to transmit to the Commission on Human Rights the records of the General Assembly meetings containing the discussions on the report of the Commission on Human Rights and the comments of representatives on the draft covenant, in order to guide the commission in its work;

2. Requests the Economic and Social Council to take appropriate measures to ensure that the Commission on Human Rights shall have the necessary time at its disposal to complete before the fifteenth session of the council the work assigned to it in connection with the international covenant on Human Rights so that the council may submit it, together with its own recommendations, to the seventh session of the General Assembly."
