The meeting was closed by music by Miss Huntington and the critic's report.

Hesperia's hall was well filled last evening, many old members turning out to renew society associations and assist in doing the honors to the members of the outgoing class. The full program of toasts was carried out as published in yesterday's paper. In addition, many of the alumni responded to the call of toastmaster Hocking. Among them were District Attorney Anderson and Messrs. Hart, Kroenke, O'Leary, Doherty, Silverwood and Baker.

After the program proper had been carried out and the refreshments disposed of the members vented their enthusiasm in singing the old familiar songs until after 1 a. m.

NUTRITION.

The Subject of Mrs. Helen Campbell's Talk.

Nutrition in its broadest sense is that stream of materials on which we live. Of the seventy elements existing man may get all that is most wholesome and good for his physical and mental growth. Abundant food is not the only requirement; it is but the necessary thing which requires a regulation by which the different members of the body are fully developed. It is so with society and the same with the household life; each is dependent on the other.

The development of men is by the subservient to the food supply. The primitive man was engaged continually in procuring food, and needed all he secured for nourishment. This is the struggle for existence, but the modern civilized man has made great progress and is far ahead in having secured an abundant supply of food. The higher wants are now satisfied which in their turn call for still higher, more perfect desires. Man is above the animals in that he is a producer and not a product; he makes his living. Household nutrition comprises but a stage in the powers of societies growth.

The art of cooking becomes essential as an element in the digestive process; and the kitchen becomes as necessary to prepare food for the household as the mouth for the stomach. Later day investigation has found many foods formerly regarded as nutritious, only mere stimulants. Among these is beef-tea; while ice cream has taken its place as a valuable nutritive. The food of a people makes to an extended degree their character and is always necessary to their surroundings. The blubber of the Esquimaux is the only food serviceable in that northern climate, also the diet of the Italian, the Arabian, the Chinese and the Frenchman, is adapted to his wants. What is most natural is the best; and in the medicines of today there is a tendency to take those which mother nature would prescribe.

While there is an increase in the complexity of the life of society it has its accompanying increase of food products all tending to satisfy those higher wants. But as a means of nourishment it means nothing more than the simple "bone" of the savage. The change from the "bone" to the banquet mark the stage of development of the human race. While many reforms are necessary in one mode of life none are more required for the good of health and strength than those in the feeding of our bodies. Here the principles of health should be known, and be familiar to us as the multiplication table. The secret of much success depends upon the condition of the stomach. Whether or not we shall be subject to the evils of the present dietary system or controllers of our own nutrition is a subject for individual consideration.

SUMMER AT BAR HARBOR.

Pres. and Mrs. C. K. Adams will spend the summer at Bar Harbor, Maine, with the exception of the first three or four weeks which they will pass at Lake Mohawk in New York.

We heartily agree with the sentiment expressed in the article in this issue from the Milwaukee Sentinel, that more thoroughness is needed in college work. But just why it should quote in this connection Dr. Remsen and President Eliot as wanting the college course shortened, is not clear. Certainly, a person cannot get as thorough and exact a knowledge of a course in three years as he can in four; and the breadth of knowledge which is needed by men who hold important positions today would scarcely admit of a decrease in the number of branches required to obtain a bachelor's degree.

EAST AND WEST.

The Madison Democrat, in speaking of a western man winning the 100-yard dash at Berkley Oval, makes some very timely remarks in regard to eastern and western athletics. It says:

It is refreshing to see western colleges win in the east, where it has been too often the case that western men, who have in a great many cases won before, have lost their identity of nativity because of being students in eastern institutions. It is about to be gradually forced down the throats of eastern college men, too, that, with modern gymnasium equipments, the western colleges are the inevitable record-holders of the future—assuming record-holding to be one of the criteria of athletic excellence. It is safe to prophesy that, within a comparatively few years, there will be distinct eastern and western contests—a condition of affairs which will necessarily result from the fear in the east that too much of the glory of athletics is moving westward; and the eastern colleges will be able to base their demand for such a division of the nation's colleges, athletically, on the ground that the entries are becoming too numerous by virtue of the increasing interest and participation in the contests.

REFORMING THE COLLEGES.

An address by Dr. Ira Remsen, professor of chemistry at Johns Hopkins, was delivered not long ago before the association of colleges and preparatory schools of the middle states and Maryland, and has just been printed in pamphlet form. It is, as the title says, a "plea for a lower standard in colleges." By colleges, as we understand his use of the term, Dr. Remsen means places where students pursue studies leading to the A. B. degree, whether these places be separate institutions or parts of larger institutions calling themselves universities. By a lower standard Dr. Remsen does not mean less searching examinations, but equally searching examinations in fewer subjects. He regrets the length of a course which brings a young man to the age of 22 or 23 before he takes his A. B. degree, and the age of 26 or 27 before he is graduated from one of the professional schools. He believes that a similar course would give better results, that if college students were required to do less they would accomplish more.

Like Dr. Remsen, President Eliot of Harvard has asked for a shortening of the college course, so that college graduates may begin their professional studies a year earlier. How long will it be until some educator of equal prominence demands an even more necessary reform in college training? The bane of our colleges, as most of them are now conducted, is that a young man of average facility and some adroitness in writing examination papers can get his A. B. degree with little exact knowledge. He may not be a smatterer, but his acquirements are somewhere between smattering and thoroughness, and are further than they should be from the thorough side. Take Greek, for example, a subject so far from popularity that it can be discussed without exciting much feeling. The requirements for admission in most colleges where Greek is still required exact from the student a reading of a few books of Xenophon, a little Homer and less Herodotus, and the ability to puzzle out the sense of tolerably easy passages, which are taken from each of these authors and which he has never before seen. He cannot read any one of them fluently, and in most cases he does not learn to do so after he has entered college. Instead of making his knowledge more thorough he makes it more extended, and is graduated with the same comparative helplessness before more difficult authors which he experienced, when entering, in the presence of Herodotus, Homer and Xenophon. He can enter college and graduate from it without learning how to read at sight a single Greek author with ease and accuracy.

Greek is but a specimen of a generally unsatisfactory state of affairs. Every college graduate should know one subject so thoroughly that he can by comparison measure pretty accurately his ignorance of other subjects; in several other directions his knowledge should be exact as far as it goes, and he should know absolutely how far it has gone; if he cares to take a look at a variety of other topics nobody can object to this method of letting light from many directions in upon his mind. This is a realizable ideal, which is realized by a very small percent. of college graduates.—Milwaukee Sentinel.

—F. A. Hoyt, ex-'97, of Sioux City, is making an extended visit at the Phi Gamma Delta lodge.
