PREFACE

This volume was prepared under the general supervision of the late S. Everett Gleason, Chief of the Foreign Relations Division.

The compilers of the volume were Neal H. Petersen (Multilateral Relations and Indochina), William Z. Slany (Australia and the Philippines), Charles S. Sampson (Burma, Indonesia, and Thailand), John P. Glennon (China), and David W. Mabon (Japan).

The editors acknowledge with appreciation the assistance provided them by the historians of the Department of Defense, including the Joint Chiefs of Staff. They are also grateful for the cooperation of the National Security Council, the Department of Defense, the Department of Commerce, the Department of the Treasury, and the Central Intelligence Agency, all of which concurred in the declassification of various papers for release herein. Thanks are also due to those foreign governments that kindly granted permission for the publication of certain of their documents in this volume.

The technical editing was done by the Publishing and Reproduction Division, headed by Willard M. McLaughlin. The index was prepared by Francis C. Prescott.

PRINCIPLES FOR THE COMPILATION AND EDITING OF "FOREIGN RELATIONS"

The principles which guide the compilation and editing of Foreign Relations are stated in Department of State Regulation 2 FAM 1350 of June 15, 1961, a revision of the order approved on March 26, 1925, by Mr. Frank B. Kellogg, then Secretary of State. The text of the regulation, as further amended, is printed below:

1350 DOCUMENTARY RECORD OF AMERICAN DIPLOMACY

1351 Scope of Documentation

The publication Foreign Relations of the United States constitutes the official record of the foreign policy of the United States. These volumes include, subject to necessary security considerations, all documents needed to give a comprehensive record of the major foreign policy decisions within the range of the Department of State's responsibilities, together with appropriate materials concerning the facts which contributed to the formulation of policies. When further material is needed to supplement the documentation in the Department's files for a proper understanding of the relevant policies of the United States, such papers should be obtained from other Government agencies.

1352 Editorial Preparation

The basic documentary diplomatic record to be printed in Foreign Relations of the United States is edited by the Historical Office, Bureau of Public Affairs of the Department of State. The editing of the record is guided by the principles of historical objectivity. There may be no alteration of the text, no deletions without indicating where in the text the deletion is made, and no omission of facts which were of major importance in reaching a decision. Nothing may be omitted for the purpose of concealing or glossing over what might be regarded by some as a defect of policy. However, certain omissions of documents are permissible for the following reasons:

a. To avoid publication of matters which would tend to impede current diplomatic negotiations or other business.
b. To condense the record and avoid repetition of needless details.
c. To preserve the confidence reposed in the Department by individuals and by foreign governments.
d. To avoid giving needless offense to other nationalities or individuals.
e. To eliminate personal opinions presented in despatches and not acted upon by the Department. To this consideration there is one qualification—in connection with major decisions it is desirable, where possible, to show the alternative presented to the Department before the decision was made.

1353 Clearance

To obtain appropriate clearances of material to be published in Foreign Relations of the United States, the Historical Office:

a. Refers to the appropriate policy offices of the Department and of other agencies of the Government such papers as appear to require policy clearance.
b. Refers to the appropriate foreign governments requests for permission to print as part of the diplomatic correspondence of the United States those previously unpublished documents which were originated by the foreign governments.

GENERAL POLICIES OF THE UNITED STATES WITH RESPECT TO THE EAST ASIAN-PACIFIC AREA; THE EXTENSION OF MILITARY AND ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE TO THE NATIONS OF SOUTHEAST ASIA; THE QUESTION OF REGIONAL SECURITY ARRANGEMENTS [1]

790.00/1–1650

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Butterworth) to the Secretary of State

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] January 16, 1950.

Subject: Visit of General Romulo [2] to discuss a Southeast Asian Association.[3]

Discussion:

General Romulo first indicated an interest in some kind of Southeast Asian Regional Association after President Quirino's [4] ill-advised meeting at Baguio with Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek [5] and the latter's meeting with President Rhee [6] in Seoul. He discussed this unfortunate approach to the problems with various officers of the Department and subsequently returned to Manila to see what he could do about broadening any Pacific association projects, if possible without participation of Nationalist China. As a result of his conversations with Quirino he received written instructions, later made public, from President Quirino in which he was instructed to explore the possibilities of an overall Pacific and Southeast Asian understanding, based on the self-determination and welfare of the peoples concerned. No mention was made of the Generalissimo.

On his return to the United States General Romulo did in fact undertake exploratory conversations with various diplomatic representatives of the Powers concerned. Because of his new responsibilities as President of the General Assembly of the United Nations however, he was unable to complete the conversations; but the overall reaction has been only lukewarm and cautious. Several of the Powers concerned let it be known that their attitudes would in a large measure be guided by that of the United States. India, on several occasions, has indicated that it has no intention of participating in any meeting which might be called by the Philippine Government. At one stage the picture was further confused by an announcement of the Siamese Government that it intended to call a meeting, unless the Philippines did so. President Quirino has since stated his intention of calling a meeting to be held possibly in February, and nothing more has been heard of the Siamese declaration. Whether President Quirino has in fact already issued formal invitations, and if so, what the response has been, is unknown here.

In the meantime, General Romulo has made several attempts to secure a commitment from the United States that it would support and participate in a Southeast Asian meeting. The position of the Department has been that although it would look with sympathy on the principle of a Southeast Asian association, based on the independence and welfare of the peoples concerned, any such association to be successful would have to be generated spontaneously within the area, and that therefore the United States would reserve judgment pending developments.

It seems altogether possible that both President Quirino and General Romulo find themselves seriously embarrassed by their present predicament and the impetuous action of President Quirino. The Philippines is publicly committed to a position from which it will be difficult to withdraw. On the other hand, it is by no means certain how a Southeast Asian meeting would work out. If Nationalist China is invited to participate it is improbable that India, Burma, and Australia would participate. It is doubtful if India would participate in any event, an omission which would seriously weaken the strength of the association. It is also doubtful what the attitude of Indonesia would be. If Nationalist China is not invited, Siam, Korea, or Indochina might not participate. In brief, President Quirino finds himself committed to a proposal on which he can secure no general agreement; and without general agreement it becomes rather meaningless, a public indication of a lack of community interest within the area concerned. It should be noted, parenthetically, that President Quirino's outlook and understanding are sufficiently limited so that he may well derive some pleasure from the discomfiture of his Ambassador and attempt to lay the blame on him. President Quirino has never relished any competition for the limelight. In these circumstances General Romulo may well ask for advice as to what he should do.

Recommendations:

In view of the foregoing, and of the probable difficulties of securing general agreement among the Southeast Asian countries, it is recommended that the position of the United States remain what it has been, namely, that it looks with sympathy on the general principle of any spontaneously generated Southeast Asian association, based on the independence and welfare of the peoples concerned, and that it reserves further judgment pending developments. If General Romulo persists it might be added that the United States understands the predicament in which President Quirino finds himself but that it has no suggestions as to how he might extricate himself. At the same time Romulo might be complimented on his cooperative efforts to get the démarche on a more realistic basis, and the hope expressed that no blame would be attached to him because the situation was beyond repair before he became concerned with it. If an opportunity presents itself it might also be intimated casually that the state of President Quirino's health might suggest possibilities for evasion.[7]

[7] The files of the Department of State provide no evidence of an Acheson–Romulo meeting prior to March 10. On that date, in Washington, they considered the question of a "Pacific Pact" during a discussion which dealt in large part with Indochina. For the memorandum of that conversation, see p. 752. The subject also arose during a meeting at the White House on February 4 between President Truman, Secretary Acheson, and President Quirino. The record of that meeting appears on p. 1412.

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, 1 February 1950.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I am enclosing a copy of the recommendations which the Joint Chiefs of Staff on 20 January 1950, submitted to me, at my request, regarding the emergency fund of $75,000,000 for the general area of China. My request to the Joint Chiefs was made pursuant to paragraph 3. m. of NSC 48/2 [1] and following consultations between representatives of the Defense and State Departments at which general agreement was reached concerning the assumptions on which planning should proceed.

Without taking a position on these recommendations at this time, I am submitting them to you now in order that the military point of view may be considered in the joint planning of this fund. From this planning there will presumably be developed a joint recommendation which you and I may make to the President on the program called for in NSC 48/2.

Sincerely yours, LOUIS JOHNSON

[Enclosure]

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, 20 January 1950.

Subject: Program of Assistance for the General Area of China.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff have considered your memorandum, dated 10 January 1950,[2] wherein you request that they submit a statement of recommendations concerning the position which the Department of Defense should take with respect to programming assistance in the general area of China to carry out the provisions of Section 303, Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949.[3]

The problem has been examined and there has been prepared, from the military point of view, a statement of recommendations for your

[1] For NSC 48/2, "The Position of the United States with Respect to Asia," a report to the President by the National Security Council, December 30, 1949, see Foreign Relations, 1949, vol. VII, Part 2, p. 1215. Paragraph 3.m reads as follows: "The sum of $75,000,000 for assistance to the general area of China, which was made available under Section 303 of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, should be programmed as a matter of urgency." President Truman approved NSC 48/2 on December 30, 1949, subject to the following statement with respect to paragraph 3.m: "A program will be all right, but whether we implement it depends on circumstances."

consideration and such action as you deem appropriate. In this connection, the Joint Chiefs of Staff are becoming concerned as to the increased military liability which apparently is developing in the Far East. Future allied military requirements in that area, which must of necessity be underwritten if not furnished directly by the United States, will surely increase if the Communist advance continues its penetration into Southeast Asia. Section 303 of the Act is an immediately available vehicle which could be used advantageously to alleviate this situation.

In the preparation of the statement of recommendations in paragraph 6 below the Joint Chiefs of Staff have recognized that overt assistance from the United States in the political field, and perhaps in the economic and psychological fields, to certain countries or regional leaders who are resisting Soviet-led Communism, may be pre-eminent in furthering the objectives established for the United States in Public Law 329—81st Congress (Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949). However, since such matters are beyond the purview of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, it is intended only to take cognizance of the importance of the nonmilitary factors and how they may ultimately affect the military position of the United States in the Far East. The attainment of minimum U.S. objectives in that area will require of the United States and all like-minded peoples, the integration of those political, economic, psychological as well as purely military means which are essential to prevent the domination of the Far East by Soviet-led Communism.

The statement of recommendations herein is consistent with and is believed to fall within the scope of NSC 48/2 and the Presidential statement in connection with his approval of that paper. However, because of the terms of the legislation authorizing the $75,000,000 and the President's statement, it has yet to be determined whether any or all of the funds will be available for the implementation of a program.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff further wish to point out that the preparation of recommendations for the utilization of the $75,000,000 is rendered extremely difficult by the lack of official political guidance as to where in Asia the United States will direct its efforts toward preventing the spread of communism. NSC 48/2 explicitly establishes as one of the basic U.S. security objectives with respect to Asia the "development of sufficient military power in selected non-Communist nations of Asia to maintain internal security and to prevent further encroachment by Communism." It would appear that military aid must be directed toward these selected nations. The selection will presumably be materially affected by political considerations. Firm guidance on this subject will allow for definitive recommendations from a military standpoint as to the ultimate utilization of the $75,000,000 fund.

Meanwhile, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, from a military point of view, believe that a program utilizing the $75,000,000 appropriation for the general area of China is desirable, is entirely feasible, and, although limited when considering the problems of this huge area, can be most effective as an initial investment for a long-range program to deter or prevent the further encroachment of Communism in the Far East. Accordingly, the Joint Chiefs of Staff recommend that:

a. A program of overt assistance and . . . operations in the general area of China be initiated as early as possible.

b. The program of assistance be conducted concurrently in the countries below with emphasis in the order listed:

Indo-China,[4] Indonesia,[5] Thailand[6] and Malaya.

Although Burma is in a critical position, political chaos in that country might well preclude realization of any effective results from an aid program. However, the possibilities of ameliorating the situation in Burma should be investigated, and if considered to contain possibilities, Burma could be allotted funds from the reserve fund.[7]

c. Concurrently with the program of assistance, the possibility of initiating covert operations directed towards China including Taiwan (Formosa) and Tibet be studied.[8]

d. Cognizance be taken of the discretionary powers accorded by the legislation to the President to execute a program for the general area of China without adherence to the administrative procedures established for the other portions of the Mutual Defense Assistance Program.

e. Tentatively, the allocation of funds be approximately in the amounts shown below, but subject to change as actual programs are developed:

(1) For direct and immediate usage in accordance with the above:

Indo-China	$15,000,000
Indonesia	5,000,000
Thailand	10,000,000
	$30,000,000

Memorandum by the Acting Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Merchant) to the Secretary of State and the Under Secretary of State (Webb)[1]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] February 3, 1950.

Subject: Status of Activities Under Section 303 of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act

1. General

On February 1, 1950 the Department received a letter from Mr. Johnson of the Department of Defense transmitting a copy of recommendations which the Joint Chiefs of Staff submitted to him on January 20 regarding the emergency fund of $75 million for the general area of China. Mr. Johnson stated that he was submitting these recommendations, without taking a position on them, in order that the military point of view may be considered in the joint planning of this fund. In summary the JCS believes that, from a military point of view, a program utilizing the $75 million is desirable and is entirely feasible. They recommend that a program of overt assistance and covert operations in the general area of China should be initiated as early as possible, such program to be conducted concurrently in the following countries with emphasis in the order listed: Indo-China, $15 million; Indonesia, $5 million; and Thailand, $10 million. They further recommend a contingency reserve of $45 million with a suggested tentative allocation of $5 million for Malaya, $10 million for Burma, and $30 million for . . . operations in China (including Taiwan and Tibet). The Department's comments are now being prepared.

In collaboration with Mr. Humelsine[2] (A), procedures and relationships to carry out the State Department's responsibilities are being clarified. In accordance with Mr. Rusk's suggestion, steps are being taken to obtain one officer to act full time on following up the details of projects under Section 303.

2. Police Equipment for Indonesian Constabulary

The President approved on January 9, 1950 a proposal to reserve $5 million to equip the Indonesian constabulary as agreed to between the Departments of State and Defense to maintain the internal security of that country against Communist encroachment. A definitive program of aid is now being developed by the Department of Defense based on the specific request which was received from the Indonesian Government on January 27, 1950.[3]

3. Military Assistance to Thailand

A request was received from the Thai Government on January 5, 1950 for arms assistance, under the MDA Act, to meet the requirements of the Royal Thai Armed Forces. This note, which was transmitted by S/MDA on January 20 to Defense, withdrew the earlier request of November 18, 1948 for the loan of arms and equipment for five battalions of Thai troops stationed along the Thai-Malayan frontier.[4] A proposal has also been received from Ambassador Stanton[5] that military aid of approximately $15 million be provided to Thailand. This document was also transmitted at the same time to the Department of Defense for their information in preparing plans for military aid to Thailand and to obtain their technical advice on the proposals in the light of the security interests of the United States.

[2] Carlisle H. Humelsine, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Administration.

[3] The specific request is not printed, but, for documentation on this subject, see pp. 964 ff.

[4] None of the documents mentioned in this paragraph is printed.

[5] Edwin F. Stanton, Ambassador in Thailand.

4. Military Assistance to Indo-China

An agreed memorandum setting forth the political considerations underlying the extension of military assistance to Bao Dai and the French in Indo-China was completed in anticipation of French ratification of the March 8 Agreements according autonomous status to Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia. The President of France signed the ratification instruments on February 2.[6] Arrangements were made with Mr. Bohlen [7] for discussion with the French authorities at Paris of the character and timing of military assistance to Nationalist and French forces in Indo-China.

5. River Patrol Equipment for Burma

Preliminary informal discussions are in process with the Department of Defense on the technical aspects of a proposal for the provision of river patrol equipment for Burma under Section 303 for the purpose of strengthening the Government in Burma to make it capable of putting down internal revolt and of resisting external Communist pressures. A paper on the political considerations was transmitted to the Department of Defense on January 17.[8]

6. Technical Assistance Projects

An agricultural technical assistance project to materially improve the food situation with respect to the growing, storage, and transportation of rice in the Far East which has been developed in preliminary form by the Department of Agriculture is under consideration by the economic and political offices at the present time. The estimated cost is between $5 million and $9 million, the larger figure depending on whether India, Pakistan, and Afghanistan are included. The inclusion of these latter three countries was proposed by Mr. McGhee [9] on January 17.

7. FE Mission to Southeast Asia on Technical Assistance and Economic Activities

Pursuant to the approval by Mr. Webb on January 31, plans are proceeding to send out a small mission to Southeast Asian countries to determine by spot surveys and discussions with the U.S. Missions the types of projects most immediately needed and feasible for which

SECRET [KUALA LUMPUR,] February 6, 1950.

NOTES ON CONFERENCE AT COMMISSIONER GENERAL'S AT BUKIT SERENE, JOHORE BAHRU—5:00 AND DINNER, FEBRUARY 6, 1950

Mr. Langdon,[2] Mr. Gibson [3] and I drove out to Sir Malcolm MacDonald's [4] house at Bukit Serene. The attached list [5] of British officials were also there. We sat around on the veranda where McD has periodic conferences with representatives of the various groups in Malaya. After tea, McD began the conversation with a general survey of the problems of the area as they see them. It seemed to me there was a great deal of concentration upon Malaya as the focal point, all of the analysis of the other countries ending up with its bearing on the possibility of the British holding out in Malaya. As indicated by the British reports which we had already seen, McD stressed their view that Indochina was the key area in so far as the communist movements are concerned. He described its strategic position in regard to the other countries in the usual way. He spoke of the favorable impression which he had received during his visit.[6] He then went on to analyze the problem confronting the French and the possibility of their withdrawal along the lines of the British Defense Co-ordination Committee, Far East Joint Intelligence Committee, Far East Forecast of Possible Military and Political Activities of the Chinese Communists in South East Asia, 1950–1952 of November 10, 1949.[7] He mentioned the contacts which they had established with the French. (We had already learned that a British officer serving with the French in Indochina had just been brought back wounded in an ambush and that some French officers are serving with the British here.) He suggested that the British might be able to help the French with some small arms and that perhaps the US could help with transportation equipment. The second area of greatest danger is Burma. At the Commonwealth Conference [8] they had reached agreement on Commonwealth financial assistance to Burma and the response had been very gratifying. Australia, Pakistan and India had agreed to chip in. New Zealand had subsequently found it impossible to do so. Their latest reports indicated that the Burmese might be willing to accept the financial aid but only if there were absolutely no strings attached to it. McD painted a rather gloomy picture based largely on the unwillingness of the Burmese to accept any advice or assistance. He thought that it was essential that someone should persuade Thakin Nu [9] to mediate the troubles with the Karens. However, they seemed to feel there was no particular need for restoring peace and kept putting off mediation in the expectation that they would soon win a great military victory and then be able to arrange the terms as victors. They were already committed to the principle of autonomy for the Karens and agreement should not be too difficult if the parties could be brought together. He was inclined to believe they were reaching a point to which the UK would really have to step in and take a very firm line on this point. If these troubles were not settled there would be increasingly acute failure of rice production and the economic condition created would make Burma fall easily to the communists. Mr. Benham and Mr. Sterndale-Bennett [10] interposed to explain that, while some rice had been coming out because it was not involved in the civil war area, the saw mills were closed, timber was not moving and there was the barest trickle of petroleum products coming out. In regard to Siam, McD did not take quite so gloomy a view but felt that if Indochina or Burma fell to the communists, it would be very easy for them to sweep over the Thais who were most unlikely to resist. At the present time, the Prime Minister [11] has been showing more courage and determination. The report in the newspaper to the effect that they might close the Russian Embassy in Bangkok, while not confirmed, was in line with his new policy. This is an action which the British had been suggesting to the Siamese Government for quite a while. McD did not have much to say about Indonesia commenting merely on their economic difficulties which require considerable outside assistance. Coming back to Malaya, McD pointed to their vulnerability in case Indochina and Siam fell but said that both politically and militarily they believed they could hold even under those circumstances. However, their difficulties would be enormously increased if their present cooperation with the Siamese police on the border were terminated and agents were freely smuggled across from Indochina.

Rounding out the whole picture, McD suggested the necessity of UK and US laying down a line which we would be prepared to hold. His general thinking was the line along the southern Chinese frontier, but he was not very specific as to how far they would be prepared to go to hold that line and admitted the danger of making a broad declaration if we were not prepared to back it up.

I asked him whether their thinking was really confined to SE Asia or whether they would agree that one should broaden out the area for purposes of planning to include the possibility of the over-running of southern Korea, the actual situation in China, the difficulties in the Philippines, and the situation in India and Pakistan.[12] I also asked whether he did not think that much more extensive and efficient cooperation could be established between our two governments and with the French. I mentioned that while there had been various examples of cooperation, e.g., in Singapore,[13] on the whole our governments had not considered the situation apparently serious enough to warrant the kind of close coordination which existed in war time. In regard to the extent of the area, McD agreed but he and his associates shied away from any real consideration of the Chinese question. He remarked that it would be foolish to bank on the development of Titoism and that we must be prepared to face a communist China for many years. When I called his attention to the fact that he had discussed only economic, political and military methods and had not mentioned the whole field of propaganda in which the communists were so successful, he agreed and thought that our present line about the Soviet encroachments in Manchuria, etc.,[14] was particularly useful. So far as India is concerned, he feels convinced that Nehru [15] is wholly on our side and that if real trouble came would join us much more rapidly than many people expected. He said that it was not at all clear what would happen if Nehru were out of the picture.

In regard to further cooperation between the governments, he enthusiastically agreed and suggested there might be a beginning with a joint conference of British and Americans perhaps in Singapore or perhaps elsewhere. He suggested that it need not be at any very high level but that some sort of joint meeting for exchange of information and planning would be very useful. Mr. Langdon suggested that especially if we also included the French in such a conference but even if we did not, there was great danger that the Asian states would feel that the Western powers were ganging up on them. He inquired if it would not be better to have a meeting to which the Asian states would also be invited. McD admitted that this was a danger which would have to be met and suggested that it would certainly be better to limit the meeting to the UK and US since the inclusion of France and The Netherlands would have bad repercussions. He thought that carefully planned advance statements as to the nature and extent of the conference would not arouse Asian susceptibilities. He did not commit himself on the desirability of a meeting with the Asian states.

On the economic side, Mr. Benham gave a very clear exposition of the rubber problem as it involves the relation between raw rubber and synthetic, and stressed the usual point that unless the price of rubber were sustained at a reasonable figure in free competition with synthetic rubber it would have a devastating effect on the economy of Malaya. McD stressed the grave danger which would arise if the communists controlled the rice producing areas and tried to put on economic pressure by controlling rice exports. In this connection they have been studying the question of drawing on American rice. He has taken up with London for discussion with Washington reports that American rice producers are planning to shift into other products. He talked also about the desirability of trade relations with SCAP and said that this also had been taken up with London for discussion via Washington. He had not raised these issues when he met the West group [16] since it was too large and social a gathering at which he met them.

McD suggested that it might be very useful if the US would appoint some single official such as a High Commissioner to deal with the area as a whole. He mentioned this as well as the proposed UK–US conference as a means of giving assurance to the Asian states that the UK and US were prepared to back them up. He emphasized several times the absolute necessity in this area of showing strength. He believes that this is the only way in which the Siamese particularly but also the other SE Asian states can be stimulated to resist communism. Discussing the question of the Chinese communists in all of these countries he described the very strong measures they are taking in Malaya to restrict communist activities. For example, in connection with the sale of Chinese victory bonds they issued an announcement that their purchase was illegal and violators would be prosecuted. He said this was an immense relief to the local Chinese who could point to this as an excuse for not buying. The regulations invoked for this purpose are those having to do with foreign exchange but under questioning they admitted they could probably do nothing to stop local sales if the proceeds were kept in Singapore to finance CCP activities in Malaya. I asked about their views on the recognition of the Peking Govt [17] and he admitted that in terms of the effects in SEA they had underestimated the difficulties. They are obviously looking forward with a good deal of apprehension to the establishment of communist consular officers in Malaya and elsewhere. McD indicated that they expected to stall off these arrangements for some time and even indicated he hoped it might be postponed indefinitely. He agreed that in many of the countries it was a great problem to reach these Chinese and persuade them but it was less difficult in Malaya since so many of them had been here for generations and did not have such close family ties with China. Again he emphasized his view that the thing that mattered was a showing of strength on the part of the Western powers. If the Chinese were sure that these various countries would be held and would not fall into the hands of the communists, they would cooperate. Their present attitude of wavering or of conversion to the communist cause is based principally on their fear that the UK and the US will not stand firm.

In a discussion of the situation in Malaya itself, McD began by stating rather broadly that their policy was approved by the Malayans who felt that they were moving along satisfactorily. I told him that from my conversation with Dato Onn [18] I felt that he did not take this position and McD agreed and somewhat modified his statements. He stated with vigor that they were way behind on what they should be doing in education and agreed that they had not yet moved nearly far or fast enough in training local administrators who could take over when the time came. In regard to the time of a turn over McD spoke rather generally in alternatives of 5, 10, 15 or 20 years. He of course pointed to the special problem created here by the mixture of the racial communities.

At dinner there were 26 people (see attached list) [19] present including the high British officials, the Regent of Johore, Dato Onn and a scattering of representative Chinese and Indians, and the Commissioners of Australia, India and Ceylon.

At dinner I asked McD about his talks with Pearson [20] on the Kashmir question.[21] He said that Pearson had been impressed with the strength of the Pakistan case which he had not previously appreciated probably because he had heard more from the Indian side. Pearson does not believe that the McNaughton Plan or any other such suggestion will bring about a solution. He thinks the only possible solution would be through a personal meeting of Nehru and Liaquat Ali Kahn.[22] I understood that no particular effort had been made to bring about such a meeting. McD himself was unable to comment on the nature of the personal relations between the two men.

After dinner McD announced that we would have a general discussion around the table during which anyone could ask me questions or I might ask questions in return. Since the questions did not come forward readily, I asked a question which I had put to McD during dinner with an inquiry whether it would embarrass him for me to raise the point. I said that in making statements against imperialism in some other countries I had been asked by the press whether I considered British action in Malaya today as an example of imperialism, and I said "No." I inquired whether every one around the table would agree that I was correct in this answer. Although McD had told me privately and had told the group that the discussion was to be utterly frank and that no one should mind having his toes stepped on, he seemed a little apprehensive as this discussion opened and the faces of the Governor and the British military chiefs were interesting. Dato Onn took the lead in opening the discussion saying that he did not consider that the situation here was satisfactory. He went back and reviewed the history of British acquisition of Malaya and their policy of importing cheap Chinese and Indian labor. He argued that if they had brought in instead Indonesians they would have created a homogeneous population. On this point, Adm. Sir Patrick Brind [23] undertook to argue with him in a restrained way but Dato Onn with some bitterness argued that the whole British policy had been inspired by their desire to exploit the natural resources for their own advantage.

One of the Indians from Singapore asked me rather belligerently whether there was any difference between capitalism and imperialism to which I replied that there was a very considerable difference since capitalism includes a completely domestic system of economic activity not involving necessarily any international aspects in the sense of control of other countries. The Ceylon Commissioner [24] spoke rather strongly about the history of his country and the changes brought about by independence. His main point was that under British rule they had been forced to give up rice production in favor of rubber and had thus become dependent on imports of food. This was one of the first things to which the independent government addressed itself. He nevertheless expressed their gratitude to the UK which they said was evidenced by their electing to stay in the Commonwealth. Later in the discussion when the UK was being attacked, he interposed in their defense. K. C. Lee [25] joined in the discussion by asking me about Russian action in Manchuria. Two or three other Chinese participated in the discussion, generally in terms of support of the British against the position of Dato Onn. When one of these Chinese had made a statement, Dato Onn burst out with the exclamation, "That is utter rot." He and the Chinese after dinner were having it out rather strenuously with the Chinese trying to explain away his statements. The same Indian mentioned above said he wanted to put to me the point-blank question whether the US was going to help SE Asia and what help it was going to give. This led Gen. Harding [26] to say aside to Mr. Langdon that, if that was the attitude, he was going to pull out all of the British troops tomorrow. In reply to this question I spoke of the general problem of the emergence of independent states not only in this area but elsewhere in the world pointing it up with a description of the problems arising in the UN discussion of the disposal of the Italian Colonies.[27] I attempted to soften the attacks on the British as they apparently did not wish to join in the argument but attempted to avoid getting into the position of defending their cause against the Malayan viewpoint.

During dinner at which I was sitting between McD and Dato Onn, I had a considerable discussion with the Dato on various development programs particularly in agriculture. I mentioned the examples of the improvement of the sweet potato in our JCRR work in China and the successful introduction of hybrid corn in Mexico. He apparently had not been familiar with this type of development and drew McD into the discussion to ask whether more of that agricultural experimentation could not be done in Malaya. McD also did not seem to be familiar with this type of idea but agreed it should be done. Dato Onn suggested that experiments should be carried on with the use of tapioca which he felt could be introduced more widely as a rice substitute. He felt that in spite of the difficulties, it should be possible to train the tastes of the people in terms of a broadening of the diet. He asked whether there were any methods which had been tried for this purpose, and I mentioned feeding programs in schools and state institutions as possibilities. I also asked Dato Onn whether he thought birth control offered any solution of the population problem. He said that the Mohammedan religious objection to it was very strong. At my request he inquired of one of the Indians down the table what the Hindu reaction was. The Indian reply was that they had no religious objection to it. Dato Onn pointed out that Malaya is underpopulated but in general even aside from the religious question doubted whether such a program could be carried out.

The conference discussions were based on the following agenda:

1. Discussion of the Communist problem in the Far East and the USIE program.
2. Discussion of the general economic problems of the area with relation to United States political objectives.
3. Discussion of the Japanese situation.
4. Discussion of regional associations and British Commonwealth attitude toward them.

novel ideas developed but we did not expect them. Daily telegrams have informed you general nature discussions but wish emphasize several points.

1. Sentiment strongly against building up either India or Japan as a dominant power in the area.
2. Agreed IC, Burma and Siam constitute area of special and rather critical danger.
3. Need for consultation and coordination with British on both political and economic levels necessary.
4. In most respects subcontinent so different from rest of area as to make single grouping undesirable.
5. Problem of wise selection of personnel, for example on Point Four survey or operations, highly important. All agreed special missions should be confined to small number.
6. Very strong support for high level US declaration of policy by Secretary, President, in Congressional Joint Resolution or otherwise. Content such declaration not fully agreed. All agreed highly desirable Secretary call in Ambassadors all countries other than India, Pakistan and Ceylon for personal assurance of interest, desire to assist and hope negotiations on Point Four aid, et cetera, can be successfully concluded. Practically unanimously agreed Secretary's National Press Club speech did not receive attention or have influence in the area which we had hoped and expected. More formal statement apparently required.
7. Possible further action in UN discussed without definite conclusion.

Conferees agreed on liberal but somewhat restricted communication to governments to which accredited and to colleagues especially in certain cases from Commonwealth and France. Butterworth will talk with British in London and I will also talk with them in London and French in Paris.[2] [Jessup.]

[2] On February 24, 27, and 28 and March 1, Assistant Secretary Butterworth met informally with Sir Esler Dening, British Assistant Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in London. Subject: New Zealand Rejection of Philippine Invitation to Regional Association Meeting in March

Participants: Mr. F. H. Corner, First Secretary New Zealand Embassy
Mr. William S. B. Lacy PSA
Mr. J. Harold Shullaw BNA

Mr. Corner of the New Zealand Embassy called at my request today to discuss the proposed Philippine sponsored Asian Conference to be held at Baguio in March.

Mr. Corner summarized his conversation with Mr. Allison on February 10 concerning the Baguio Conference[2] and stated that a letter had been sent to General Romulo by Sir Carl Berendsen[3] on February 18. The letter, which Mr. Corner read to me, stated that New Zealand regretted that it was unable to accept the invitation extended by the Philippine Government. The reason given in the letter was that New Zealand was already participating to the limit of its ability in international organizations and undertakings and could not, therefore, attend the Baguio conference. The letter mentioned in this connection New Zealand participation in ECAFE and the recommendations concerning South and Southeast Asia produced by the recent Commonwealth Conference at Colombo. Mr. Corner added that among the New Zealand reasons not mentioned in the letter for declining the invitation was the feeling of his Government that such a meeting, or an organization along the lines contemplated, would be of no value unless it included the United States and the United Kingdom. He said that New Zealand was a small country and that perhaps it had already drawn too much attention to itself by the role which it had played in U.N. Mr. Corner added that participation in a regional organization of Asiatic states would inevitably call attention to such matters as New Zealand's domestic Asiatic exclusion policy.

Mr. Corner was told that we were rather sorry that New Zealand had not seen its way clear to accept the Romulo invitation. He was informed that General Romulo had stated that he did not wish to hold a conference without Australia and New Zealand because the result would be a conference solely of colored nations. For our part, we had considered that attendance of Australia and New Zealand would provide useful guidance to the Conferees. While, as Mr. Allison had stated in his conversation with Mr. Corner, we had no desire to put any form of pressure on New Zealand to accept the Philippine invitation, nevertheless we were watching sympathetically the efforts of the Philippines and other interested countries to develop some means of working more closely together to achieve common purposes. Mr. Corner was told that our attitude toward the Baguio conference had become increasingly sympathetic in recent weeks.

Mr. Corner said that his Embassy had reported receipt of the invitation to the New Zealand Government without any suggestion that it should be accepted. He said that had he appreciated our position more fully, the Embassy might have made some positive recommendations. Mr. Corner said that he would inform his Government of this conversation.

Editorial Note

The Chief Public Affairs Officers of 11 United States Missions in Asia met in Singapore from February 22 to February 26, 1950. Posts in the following countries were represented: Burma, Ceylon, Republic of China, India, Indonesia, Republic of Korea, Malaya, Pakistan, Philippines, Thailand, and Viet-Nam. This conference convened to consider implementation of the recommendations of the Bangkok Conference of Chiefs of Mission, evaluate the United States Information and Educational Exchange Program, determine ways to create a favorable climate for United States foreign policy in Asia, and devise means to combat the spread of communism. Certain British officials, including Malcolm MacDonald, Commissioner General for the United Kingdom in Southeast Asia, participated in the conference discussions on Southeast Asia.

In despatch No. 82, March 9, William R. Langdon, Consul General at Singapore, reported that the Conference had adopted unanimously the following general policy recommendations:

"1. Because of the extremely critical situation which exists today, and will probably continue to exist in the next few years, the entire USIE program should be stepped-up markedly at the earliest possible moment if the United States is to preserve and support free institutions still existing in Asia. Experience in China has shown that USIE must fight an aggressive war if it is to counteract Communism. Efforts to temporize in China were completely unsuccessful. The U.S. Congress should be requested to appropriate substantially increased funds for intensified USIE activities.

2. If it is to achieve success in its counter-offensive against Communism, USIE must use a "double-barreled" strategy: the positive approach which vigorously and dramatically sets forth the benefits and blessings of human freedom and the democratic way of life; and the negative approach, which exposes the inhumanity, duplicity and other evils of the Communist way of life, as it now exists in China and other parts of the world. Recent developments in China prove conclusively that appeasement and attempts at rapprochement have no effect on the inexorable march of the Communists toward their ultimate goal of world domination. The United States has nothing to lose and everything to gain, therefore, in adopting a more vigorous, positive, forthright counter-offensive against an enemy who threatens the progress, welfare and freedom of mankind.

3. The stepped-up program, unanimously and urgently recommended by this Conference, involves the following:

a. Reaching a higher percentage of the total population of each country than has been possible in the past. Experience in China and elsewhere emphasizes the primary importance of reaching youth of all ages and its teachers, the overseas Chinese, labor groups and the masses generally. While millions in China have passed behind the "iron curtain," there are still vast additional millions in the Far East who have not yet succumbed to the blandishments of the Communist way of life or been forced against their will, as yet, to submit to Communist domination.

While it is obviously impossible for USIE to reach directly the hundreds of millions who comprise the great undecided Asian masses, this conference believes that it is both feasible and imperative to extend its program downward to reach as high a percentage as possible of the low-level literates. This can be done indirectly through their own natural leaders. The importance of reaching the literate masses of all levels is revealed in a survey made among the PAOs at the Conference. In most cases, they rated the literate masses as their number one target, followed by a secondary audience of government officials and professional classes. See Enclosure No. 5. [Not printed.]

b. If the USIE program is to become increasingly effective in its influence on the peoples of Asia, carefully tailoring its materials (books, pamphlets, posters, moving pictures, etc.) to local interests and conditions, languages, mental maturity and degrees of literacy of the different countries and of the different groups within each country. With this in mind, every operating section of INP, IBD, IMP and ILI should regionalize its output to the fullest extent possible, and extra funds should be allotted to provide suitable material for individual countries of the Far East now menaced by encroaching Communism. In this connection, PAOs will submit to the Department specific data and recommendations on the most important targets within their area and the most effective media for reaching them.

4. Giving recognition to the importance of using all available intelligence and political data as an aid to developing an effective program in each area. Major effort should be made to take advantage of the knowledge acquired by other sections of the diplomatic or consular offices, including those of military attachés. Despite the extra burden and the extra hazard incidental to any identification with intelligence activities, the Conference emphasized the necessity of knowing as much about the area and its peoples as possible, which can be gained by deliberate and systematic efforts on the part of USIE officers to collect and report information relevant to the USIE program.

5. Because the overseas Chinese in Southeast Asia are a potential "fifth column," devoting special attention to them. In order to avoid antagonizing all Chinese by accusations against the present Chinese Communist government, the theme of Soviet imperialistic intervention in China should be emphasized rather than the theme of Chinese Communist betrayal of the Chinese people.

6. Giving increased attention in the future to systematic, scientific evaluation and measurement of program results in all media and in all countries. Only in this way can the program be progessively strengthened and expanded and its ultimate goals successfully attained.

Full time USIE evaluation officers should be added to the USIE staffs wherever possible. Such an officer must be thoroughly familiar with techniques of market research and public opinion analysis in order to train local employees who will do the actual survey work in the country. Korea, Thailand, Malaya and Burma request the provision of such an officer at once. If only one can be provided at this time, a pilot project should be initiated with the assignment of one such officer to Manila." (120.43/3–950)

In a circular instruction of May 26, the Department of State notified the posts which had been represented at the conference that it agreed with the views expressed in recommendations 1–6. (120.43/5–2650)

53. Burton[1] told us today that Lacy had recently discussed with Australian Embassy, Washington, the Romulo conference in March re Pacific Pact.[2] Added Australia has received invitation and that Spender[3] desires talk with me soonest (27th, if possible) about US viewpoint on Romulo conference, in particular, and Pacific pact in general. Spender wishes know our viewpoint as background not only in deciding whether accept Romulo invite but also in preparing his speech for the full dress review of Foreign Affairs in Parliament scheduled for next week. Burton added Australia favors in principle some kind of pact (Embtel 46 February 21)[4] but desires avoid taking opposite side from Nehru.

Romulo proposal certainly not kind of pact Spender has publicly advocated and would probably not prove acceptable Australia, unless there were evidence of strong, immediate or ultimate US backing.

Please instruct urgently.

SECRET WASHINGTON, February 25, 1950—2 p. m.

34. Urtel 53 Feb 24. US position remains essentially unchanged, i.e., it will watch with greatest sympathy development of association of Asiatic and Pacific countries designed to increase cultural, economic, and general cooperation in the area but that to have any durable value such an assn must have firm roots and indigenous motivation.

[1] Repeated to Manila as telegram 325.

What ultimate relation US would have to any such organization would naturally be impossible to forecast.

US not in position to press Australian Govt in matter but it has no desire discourage Australian participation and suggests you point out that only by exploratory talks among powers concerned in a meeting such as Baguio will it be possible to ascertain possibilities inherent in Phil or analagous proposal. Moreover, participation in first or early meetings by Australia would enable it to influence course of development and of course carry right to withdrawal without commitment in event it were out of sympathy with trend.

Australians will undoubtedly wonder why US interest in the favorable disposition toward Phil proposal has increased in late weeks. (Lacy conversation with Australian Embassy.[2]) Forurinfo you shld know that Dept considers development of regional coalition SEA more important to its future plans than it has in the past. Approved NSC policy states US shld make known its sympathy with efforts of Asiatic states to form regional associations along lines envisioned by Romulo proposal.[3] Participation by such states as Australia and New Zealand wld have obvious advantage of ensuring pro-western orientations of any resulting associations.

182. Summary report Jessup's remarks in his final summation conference discussions Communist problem Asia.[1]

1. Jessup convinced SEA vitally important to US although equally convinced necessity US special emphasis on Europe.

7. In this effort we justified regard our interests as generally coinciding those of area and as we have dispassionate as well as selfish interest in maintenance independence SEA countries.
8. Consensus opinion situation Burma and IC constitutes gravest and most immediate danger. Commie threat to Thailand no less grave but slightly less immediate. This is British view also. Thus most urgent US effort should be devoted these three countries.
9. In determining specific steps we limited by availability funds and political impossibility guaranteeing independence territorial integrity countries this area.
10. Nevertheless following measures possible:

(a) Military and economic aid within limits funds presently or in future made available.

(b) New declaration or statement by President, Secretary or Congress along lines of (1) US adherence principal [principle] territorial integrity and gravity with which we would view any violation thereof; (2) our desire and interest in maintenance freedom independence countries of area and (3) our willingness help countries help themselves in maintaining their freedom and to improve the well-being of their people within the limits of US capabilities and commitments elsewhere. (c) Secretary to call in diplomatic representatives SEA countries, except India, and reaffirm our sincere interest their freedom independence also give some indication plans help them.

11. Desirable hold joint discussions with UK plan political economic measures SEA but no conference in area due implication west powers ganging up maintain colonial privileges. Should be held privately in London, Washington.

12. Consensus opposed US attempt sponsor regional conference of area states at this time.

13. Consensus use of ECAFE undesirable in planning aid because of presence USSR and general ineptitude.

14. National Security Council Progress Report by the Under Secretary of State (Webb)

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] February 27, 1950.

MEMORANDUM FOR MR. JAMES S. LAY, JR., EXECUTIVE SECRETARY, NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL[1]

Subject: First Progress Report covering period until January 30, 1950, on implementation of NSC 48/2, "Position of the United States with Respect to Asia," dated December 30, 1949.[2]

[1] Drafted on February 24; circulated in the National Security Council on February 27.

[2] For text of NSC 48/2, see Foreign Relations, 1949, vol. VII, Part 2, p. 1215.

The nature of this paper is such that in many cases it brings together in one document statements of policies upon which the National Security Council has made separate recommendations and on which detailed progress reports are submitted. Other portions of NSC 48/2 deal with long-range matters and recommend general over-all policies which can only be implemented over the course of time and are not in all cases susceptible to periodic review. The following report, therefore, will deal in brief and general terms with those portions of NSC 48/2 which have been specifically implemented or with respect to which action has been begun during the first 30 days following the approval of NSC 48/2.

It should be pointed out that Ambassador Philip Jessup is now on a journey to Asia where he either has visited or will visit most of the areas discussed in the report. Upon his return and as a result of his findings it should be possible to make more detailed assessment of the recommendations in this paper and the possibilities of their implementation. It should also be noted that the Department of State is sponsoring a conference in Bangkok, beginning on February 13, of all the Chiefs of Mission in the area, at which time over-all United States policy for Asia will be discussed. As partial preparation for this meeting, all officers concerned were furnished with copies of NSC 48/2 so that the recommendations therein could be in the minds of all participants during the conference.

With regard to those portions of NSC 48/2 which lend themselves to specific comment, the following paragraphs summarize the action taken in each case:

In regard to 1*b*, 2*c*, and 3*m*, recommendations have been formulated for the provision of sufficient military power in Indonesia and Thailand from the $75 million under Section 303 of Public Law 329 to maintain internal security. The Thai Government has made a balanced and formal request which is being studied by the National Defense Establishment. A similar request has been received from the Republic of the United States of Indonesia. It is understood that the Joint Chiefs of Staff have tentatively agreed on allocation of $10 million for Thailand, and $5 million for Indonesia.

In connection with the foregoing, it is understood that the Joint Chiefs of Staff have also recommended the allocation of $15 million for Indochina. It is expected that as soon as the United States of America has given recognition to Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia steps will be taken to develop a program for using the $15 million.

The development of a Military Aid Program for the above-mentioned three countries is being handled in such a way as to appeal to the Asiatic nations as being compatible with their national interests.

Efforts are being made to send a mission to Southeast Asian countries to expedite action facilitating economic development. Recognizing that Point IV funds may not be available for several months it is hoped that Point IV type activities and perhaps some modest capital expenditure may be possible under Section 303 of Public Law 329. Country studies are also being made from material available in Washington and field officers have been instructed to make preliminary studies and recommendations.

3c(2)

The United States stockpiling program, of course, stimulates imports from the Far East since a substantial proportion of stockpile items come from this area. Proposed rubber legislation is in process which is designed to permit more liberal treatment of natural rubber imports.

3c(3)

The stockpiling program is currently acquiring substantial amounts of materials from the Far East. Negotiations with the Dutch and Indonesians are near completion which will materially increase the purchase of tin ore and metal.

3c(6)

Preparations are in process for tariff negotiations with Korea in the fall of 1950 anticipating Korea's adherence to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. Efforts are being made to secure Most Favored Nation treatment for Japan on a bilateral basis through the means of the trade agreements which SCAP negotiates with numerous countries.[3]

3e(1)

In compliance with a United Nations General Assembly Resolution of October 21, 1949, co-sponsored by the United States, a reconstituted, seven-nation United Nations Commission on Korea has authority to observe and report any developments which might lead to or otherwise involve military conflict in Korea.[4]

Approval of a $60 million request to complete a $120 million FY 1950 ECA aid program for Korea is awaiting Congressional approval. The ECA has submitted to the Bureau of the Budget a FY 1951

Korean program of $115 million. Approximately $10.2 million is presently earmarked for Korea from Title III MDAP funds. On January 26 a military agreement was signed with the Government of the Republic of Korea. Based on this agreement and the recommendations of an MDAP Survey Team report, a program covering the expenditure of Title III funds for Korea, which has Korean Government approval, is being reviewed by the Foreign Military Assistance Coordinating Committee. An agreement with the Government of the Republic of Korea covering the presence in Korea of a United States Military Advisory Group was signed on January 26.*

The United States continues to recognize the National Government of China and is giving no serious consideration to recognition of the Communist regime. The United States Government has made clear to other friendly governments its views respecting the Chinese Communist regime and its belief that hasty recognition should be avoided and that there should be full exchange of views prior to any action. It has recognized that final decision respecting recognition will have to be made by each country in the light of its own judgment and interests.

3f(2)

The Communist seizure of part of the American Consulate General at Peiping, following a series of serious incidents involving American official personnel in Communist areas and adumbrating, in the continued absence of diplomatic relations, further, perhaps more serious incidents, has led to a decision by the United States Government to withdraw all official personnel from Communist areas in China. This decision has been announced. When the withdrawal is completed, no official channels for contact with elements in Communist areas will remain. The problem of maintaining our cultural and informational program in China at the most active feasible level, which is made much more difficult owing to Communist restrictions, is receiving intensive consideration. (See also past Progress Reports on implementation of NSC 34/1 and 34/2).[5]

Nothing to be reported at this time.

The Department of Commerce on November 4, 1949, brought all 1A and some IB exports from the United States to China under control by placing them on the "positive list" of items controlled to all destinations except Canada. The Department of the Army has advised SCAP of the criteria deriving from NSC 48/2 which should govern control of Japanese exports to China and adjacent areas. The Department of State is attempting to obtain final agreement by the United Kingdom Foreign Office to the contents of parallel memoranda to be submitted by the United States and United Kingdom Governments to the French, Dutch, and Belgian Governments requesting a common policy of control over 1A exports to China. The Department of State is also working out the details of an arrangement to be carried out in collaboration with the British and Dutch Governments for informal control through the major oil companies of petroleum sales and shipments to China.[6]

The United States Government is continuing to follow the policy set forth in NSC 37/2 and 37/5 [7] respecting Formosa. United States policy lines were further laid down by the President in his public statement of January 5.[8] Pursuant to NSC Action No. 254 † of October 20, 1949, Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek was informed on November 3, 1949, of the position of the United States respecting Formosa. Legislation has been introduced in the Congress to permit continuance of the ECA program on Formosa from February 15, 1950, when the present authorization for the use of funds expires, until June 30, 1950.

In regard to 3*h* the United States is attempting to resolve the colonial-nationalist conflict in Indochina in so far as it can do so and in view of the fact that a large part of the nationalist element is communist-led. We believe it most unlikely Nehru would seriously consider joining any regional association which might be expressly or implicitly directed against Communists or which implied any military commitment. In fact he might even seek use his influence particularly with Indonesians prevent creation such association. Among reasons for Nehru's attitude are:

(1) Desire avoid involvement with "power blocs";
(2) His hope of developing under Indian leadership neutral Asian Third Force;
(3) His interest in developing cordial working relationship with Chinese Communists and
(4) His refusal admit danger to South and Southeast Asia stems from aggressiveness of Moscow-dominated Communists and his consequent tendency emphasize suppression of nationalism in certain areas

Although GOI willing cooperate closely with other Asian powers in cultural and to extent economic matters, it would probably be unwilling accept just now invitation to any conference called under auspices Philippines because it believes that in view Quirino's announcements last summer such conference would be considered as of anti-Communist character.

Subject: Australian Reply to the Invitation from the Philippine Government to Attend the Baguio Conference.

Participants: Mr. Owen Davis—First Secretary, Australian Embassy
PSA—Mr. Lacy

Mr. Davis called today at his request to read me the text of the Australian reply to the invitation from the Philippine Government to attend the Baguio Conference in mid-March 1950. (This reply has been handed our Embassy at Canberra which is pouching text.[1])

The Australian Government has advised the Philippine Government that were it to participate in the conference they would consider it appropriate to send the highest officials; this is impossible because the Parliament will remain in session for some several months. The reply continues to say that the Australian Government is concerned to act upon the recommendations of the Commonwealth Conference at Ceylon and that a convocation of Commonwealth countries will take place at Canberra in the near future for the purpose of discussing Commonwealth interests in southern Asia. The Australian Government expresses the hope that these discussions will form a basis for a south Asian regional arrangement with which the Philippines might be associated. [I asked Mr. Davis when the Canberra meeting would take place and he replied that he thought within the next two months.] [2]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON, March 6, 1950.]

POSSIBILITIES FOR THE EFFECTIVE USE OF PRIVATE U.S. FUNDS TO SUPPORT AND SUPPLEMENT POINT–4 TYPE OF OPERATIONS IN THE FAR EAST

Until it is known how much money may be made available on an annual basis and the limitations which may be attached to the use of those funds by the private sources providing them, it is difficult to work out a comprehensive practical program for effective utilization of such funds in the Far East. The program should of course be drawn up in such a manner as to supplement and extend at points the existing Point–4 type of operations now underway or contemplated. Moreover to be psychologically most effective the governments and/or private individuals and institutions in each country should be consulted. There follows below a list of suggestive uses to which such funds might well be devoted.

Philippines

1. The Japanese during their occupation either destroyed or removed most of the libraries in the Philippines. Practically nothing has been done since the end of the war to restore these libraries. As a result, books are desperately needed and anything which can be done to assist in this process would be most useful.

2. If the proposed Far Eastern University goes through, its need for books and scientific equipment will be practically unlimited. From an educational standpoint this one is probably the most desirable of any which could be proposed.

3. General Smith of the Public Health Service has done a remarkable job in the Philippines. His principal interest has been to set up demonstration stations for problems in health and food which can be handled within the limited resources of the Philippines, and at the same time contribute to public welfare. For example, by inducing rice distributors to put one grain of enriched rice in every 200 grains of non-treated rice, he has in certain areas completely eliminated beri beri. He has also demonstrated that by the use of elevated concrete tanks for ordinary oil drums in which water can be purified by simple means, that he could eliminate disease arising from polluted water. This one demonstration has made the construction of expensive water systems which the Philippines cannot afford unnecessary. It is probable that his projects have made greater contributions to Philippine welfare, with less money, than anything else which the United States has done in the Islands. There is no longer any money available for his projects, but a continuation of his experiments and demonstrations would be most useful.

[1] On March 6, Livingston T. Merchant, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs, transmitted this study to Dean Rusk, Deputy Under Secretary for Political Affairs, who had requested that it be prepared.

Indonesia

1. Fellowships in public health, especially for senior doctors and sanitary engineers in such universities as Johns Hopkins.

2. Books in English for libraries of (a) faculties in Jogja in medicine, dentistry, pharmacy, and veterinary, (b) pediatrics and midwife centers.

3. Laboratory equipment including microscopes and other laboratory materials and sets.

4. Hospital equipment including X-ray apparatus and sets of surgical and gynecological instruments.

5. Phot. and film apparatus including autos and trucks as means communication, for service of medical-hygiene propaganda and rural hygiene.

Formosa

1. The Rockefeller Foundation withdrew its malaria control program in panic some months ago. It could and should be continued.

2. ECA is conducting an animal disease program. Much can be done further in the animal husbandry line— and would be welcome.

3. The Taiwan University would, I am sure, under the current president, welcome interest and aid in the expansion of its English Department. So would other schools throughout the island.

4. There is a great need for a small American Grammar School. Parents who are returned American students want their children prepared for U.S. universities. This requires an American style education. The Consulate General in Taipei has received many inquiries on this. It could best be related to the USIS Library there. Thus children could be taught to rely on American reference books at that early stage when they are first learning to use reference books. To delay education guidance until university level results in need to win over a scholar already formed in procedures.

5. In almost every technical field the Taiwan Provincial Government is anxious to have U.S. technical advice and guidance. J. G. White, Inc. is supplying much of this at present time under ECA grants.

6. There is no American University Club despite the presence of hundreds of returned U.S. students. A grant and support for something along this line would be welcome.

Japan and Korea

The data for compiling a list of projects will have to be secured from the field in the case of Korea and through the Army in the case of Japan.

China

Insofar as the Chinese Communist regime permits private U.S. funds to enter China to support hospitals, schools, provide needed books, arrange for Chinese scholars to study here or for U.S. scholars to study or teach in China it would be advantageous from the long-range viewpoint for this Government to encourage such relationships to continue. Few Chinese as yet read Russian and the longer we can continue to keep English the medium of transmission of Western science and learning the better it will be.

In this connection the needs of many American educational institutions should especially be borne in mind at this time. These institutions have generally succeeded in maintaining a considerable measure of independence notwithstanding Communist pressure and financial stringencies. They have played an important role in fostering pro-American feeling among educated Chinese. Their continued functioning, as long as this is possible without substantially complete Communist regimentation and control, is increasingly important to U.S. long-range interests. It is believed that in some cases at least these institutions are encountering increasing financial difficulties and that their support during this difficult period would be desirable.

Research Projects

In order to increase our knowledge of the grass-roots socio-economic conditions in the Far East it would be extremely useful if private funds could finance competently trained U.S. personnel to undertake relatively long-term regional and local surveys within all of the Far Eastern countries to which such personnel can be sent. Likewise comprehensive politico-economic appraisal of each country undertaken by non-official personnel are of use as they can be published and have wide and beneficial circulation not only in this country but in the countries concerned. Any private funds used to support individuals or groups undertaking such surveys could be most helpful. The type of information gathered would be of wide use within the Government in determining and appraising the utilization of Government funds for Point–4 and economic developmental projects.

Memorandum by the Secretary of State to the President [1]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] March 9, 1950.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRESIDENT

Subject: Allocation of Funds to Provide Military Assistance to Thailand and Indochina under Section 303 of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act

The Department of State and the Department of Defense have agreed that a program of military assistance for Thailand and Indochina should be undertaken for the purpose of providing military equipment to assist in maintaining the security and independence of these countries against communist aggression from without and subversive activities from within. (Annexes A and B, attached, give supporting background prepared by the Department of State.) In reaching this conclusion, the two Departments are aware that the major responsibility for attaining the objectives of the program rests with the recipient governments, and not with the United States. However, it is clear that supplemental military matériel assistance from the United States is required. The duration of such assistance, and the total cost thereof, is not now known. The National Security Council is presently considering this question, with a view to estimating the probable overall magnitude and duration of United States assistance to Southeast Asia.

The staffs of the two Departments have estimated that funds in the amount of $25 million for Thailand and Indochina are needed as initial installments for this purpose, this sum to be divided approximately $10 million for Thailand and $15 million for Indochina. The two Departments believe that for urgent political considerations military equipment should be made available as quickly as possible and propose that the funds mentioned above be provided under the authority of Section 303 of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949.

While the general objectives of the proposed programs of military assistance have been jointly agreed upon between the two Departments, the exact details of the programs have not as yet been formulated by the staffs of the interested agencies. It is accordingly requested that the President at this time approve military assistance to Thailand and to Indochina, and that $25 million be reserved for this purpose under Section 303 of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act.[2] It is proposed that this assistance be administered by the Secretary of State under the provisions of Executive Order No. 10999 [10099] of January 27, 1950.[3]

In addition to the aforementioned programs for military assistance, the Secretary of Defense recommended to you on February 15, 1950, the allocation of $6,524,721 to accomplish the improvement of airfields in Japan.

The Departments of State and Defense are also considering under Section 303 of Public Law 329 a proposed program of supplementary military assistance to Korea in the approximate amount of $9,800,000 which is additional to the program authorized as a part of the regular Mutual Defense Assistance Program. This latter sum is needed to provide a further strengthening of the security of that republic against communist encroachment, both internal and external.

The Department of State is also developing the details of a program to provide assistance to Burma to hasten the development on the part of the Burmese of a national capability for maintaining their independence. Tentative plans for use of Section 303 funds in this connection include a project to furnish ten patrol vessels for use on the Irrawaddy River to enable the Burmese Government to keep that river clear of rebel forces which have hitherto prevented a free exchange of goods between the northern and southern parts of the country. The cost of this proposed project is estimated at $3.5 million. In addition, other tentative plans are under consideration to provide assistance to Burma. These are not yet developed to a point where it is possible to give an estimate of their total cost.

In summary, the aforementioned programs for Thailand and Indochina, for which authorization is requested herein, together with the initial allocation of $5 million which you have already approved to provide equipment for the Indonesian constabulary, will result in a total authorization, when approved, of $30 million. The above-

[2] On March 10, President Truman approved the request. His letter to Secretary Acheson read as follows:

"I have considered your memorandum of March 9, 1950, requesting that $25,000,000 be reserved to provide military assistance to Thailand and Indo-China from funds available under section 303 of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949.

"I approve the principle of furnishing military aid to these nations, and have initially reserved $25,000,000 for this purpose. It is my desire that when definite programs of assistance have been developed, the request for an allocation of funds be submitted to me through the Director of the Bureau of the Budget." mentioned projects for Japan, Korea and Burma will, if approved, be in excess of $20 million.

MILITARY ASSISTANCE TO THAILAND

We are recommending immediate military aid to Thailand because of the serious internal communist threat to it brought about by communists within the nation who are being strengthened daily by events favorable to communism occurring on all of Thailand's borders.

The Thai Government has publicly declared itself in opposition to communism and has sought to align the Thai nation with those nations opposing the advances of communism. Military assistance is needed by Thailand to enable it to oppose communist advances.

Externally, Chinese and Vietnamese communist-led forces are in control of the areas to the north and east of Thailand. It is believed that the Vietnamese communist leader, Ho Chi Minh, is being materially strengthened by the Communist Chinese. Chinese communist forces have infiltrated northeastern Burma on the northern frontier of Thailand and are threatening the security of that area. Burma itself is kept in a turmoil by communist forces which are presently in action along the western border of Thailand. In Malaya on the south, there are strong Chinese communist-led guerrilla bands which are presently in revolt against the British authorities and whose principal sphere of action lies along the Malaya-Thailand border. As communist forces in neighboring parts of Asia are victorious, it seems certain that these forces surrounding Thailand will be able to bring greater pressure to bear, especially through the communists already in Thailand, to align Thailand with the communists.

Internally, Thailand is threatened by Chinese communists who are attempting to gain control of the more than three million Chinese there. The Chinese within the nation are strongly armed and are unfriendly to the declared intentions of the Thai Government. Some Thai political elements are showing evidence of preparing to swing over to the communist side if the pressure should become too great. It is clearly apparent that unless Thailand is given military assistance it cannot hold out against communist pressure. A sample of such pressure is the strong protest reportedly made by the Chinese Communist Vice Foreign Minister, Li Ken Nung, to the Thai Government demanding the end of oppression of Chinese in Thailand and requiring the immediate release of Chinese in prison with guarantees of no further mistreatment.

If Thailand should be lost to the communists, then it would be unlikely that Malaya could be held. This would mean that from Korea to India, there would be no place on the Asian mainland where the United States would have an open friend and ally. Furthermore, there would be no place on the Asian mainland in that area where U.S. policy could be freely expressed as at present. In addition, the United States would lose its last independent listening post in the area. Aside from these political considerations, it is probable that the United States would be unable to secure such strategic materials as tungsten, tin, and rubber in their present quantities. It is clear, therefore, that it is of considerable political and economic importance to the United States to support Thailand with military aid in opposition to the forces of communism.

Annex B

Paper Prepared in the Department of State

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON, undated.]

MILITARY ASSISTANCE FOR INDOCHINA

Immediate military assistance for Indochina is recommended because of the communist threat to the newly created States of Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia, resulting from the existence of an obviously Russian-sponsored communist anti-government force under Ho Chi Minh, which is in conflict with the legal government for control of Vietnam.

On February 7, 1950, the United States extended diplomatic recognition to Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia, This action followed British recognition and many other anti-communist nations of the world are expected to take similar action. Since USSR, Communist China and several other Soviet satellites have recognized the communist movement of Ho Chi Minh as the legal government of Vietnam, the issue becomes more clearly defined as an anti-communist versus communist effort.

The whole of Southeast Asia is in danger of falling under communist domination. The countries in the area of Southeast Asia are not at present in a position to form a regional organization for self-defense, nor are they capable of defending themselves against military aggression without the aid of the great powers. Despite their lack of military strength, however, there is a will on the part of the legal governments of Indochina toward nationalism and a will to resist whatever aims at destroying that nationalism.

The French are irrevocably committed in Indochina and are supporting the three states as a move aimed at achieving non-communist political stability. The failure of the French-sponsored governments of the three states therefore would mean the communization of Indochina under Ho Chi Minh, a Moscow-trained communist. The choice confronting the United States is to support the legal governments in Indochina or to face the extension of communism over the remainder of the continental area of Southeast Asia and possibly farther westward. We would then be obligated to make staggering investments in that part of Southeast Asia remaining outside of communist domination or to withdraw to a much contracted Pacific line of defense.

France needs aid in its protection of the legally constituted anti-communist States in Indochina. We know from the complex circumstances involved that the French will make every possible effort to prevent the victory of communism in Indochina and consequently in Southeast Asia. We would, accordingly, be backing a determined protagonist. The French military leaders are soberly convinced that, in the absence of a mass invasion from Red China, the French could be successful in their support of the anti-communist government in Indochina. French, native and colonial troops are presently engaged in military operations in Indochina aimed at defying the southward expansion of communism from Red China and of destroying its power in Indochina. The military aid which it is proposed to furnish in support of the anti-communist governments of Indochina would be tailored to meet materiel deficiencies toward which the United States can make an effective contribution.

The urgency of the need for immediate military assistance is reflected by the ease with which communist-supplied arms and even troops may now pass across the China–Tonkin border. With this assistance, Ho Chi Minh's forces present a more immediate and dangerous threat to the existence of non-communist governments in Indochina. By taking advantage of an already existing guerrilla army within Indochina, the potential invader may avoid the consequences of border violations but still actively advance the communist cause. It is to help contain this pseudo-nationalist form of invasion that immediate aid is recommended under the provisions of Section 303 of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949.

SECRET CANBERRA, March 10, 1950—5 p. m.

71. Embtel 67 March 10.[1] In speech in Parliament last night Spender went all out in support of a Pacific pact stating he meant "a defensive military arrangement" based on firm agreement between countries with vital interest in stability of Asia and Pacific and "which are at same time capable undertaking military commitments. I would like to think that Australia, UK and I fervently hope other Commonwealth countries might form a nucleus and that such other countries as might wish to do so should be given opportunity associating themselves with it". "I have in mind, particularly, the US whose participation would give such a pact substance it would otherwise lack. Indeed it would be rather meaningless without her".

Burton told Foster[2] today that in view foregoing and of Acheson's statement yesterday before House Committee[3] (reported in Australian press) Spender plans ask me next Tuesday or Wednesday[4] following questions:

(1) What measures taken by Australia would US regard as constituting real initiative for creation of pact?

(2) Supposing Australia takes such measures and fails gain adequate response from other Pacific countries, what would US do then? Would US feel compelled leave Australia out on limb or would she take steps try save situation?

Having in mind Deptel 34 February 25, Foster asked Burton casually as "purely personal question" whether he had ever considered possibility US might feel initiative should come from a country such as Thailand or Indonesia, thereby depriving Communists of chance to claim British imperialism or European colonialism was motivation. Burton seemed clearly taken by surprise and said Australia had never considered this. On contrary she regarded herself as one of the countries from which the initiative for a pacific pact might reasonably come.

Please instruct soonest.

Record of the Conversation Between the Ambassador at Large (Jessup) and Representatives of the British Foreign Office, London, March 11, 1950 [1]

SECRET

Japan

Mr. Dening [2] opened the conversation by reviewing the discussions at Colombo dealing with a Japanese Peace Treaty.[3] He said that it had been hoped that there would be available an American Paper on a Peace Treaty which would serve as a basis for deliberation. Failure to receive this Paper had hampered any constructive work on this topic at Colombo. Nevertheless, it was decided to establish a working party in London comprising representatives of the various Commonwealth Governments. On March 10 the British Government had received an inquiry from Australia asking them when the working party was prepared to begin discussions, and likewise the Government was faced with questions in Parliament with regard to a Japanese Peace Treaty. Some useful work could be done in digesting a Paper prepared at the Colombo Conference, but the failure to receive an American Paper was causing increasing embarrassment.

Dr. Jessup said that he had discussed with Nehru certain questions of procedure. According to Nehru, India was quite prepared to negotiate a Treaty without the Soviet Union and the Chinese Government, once those nations refused to participate. Dr. Jessup said he had raised with Nehru the question of how we could get over the initial difficulty of inviting the Chinese Communist Government to a Peace Conference. Nehru indicated that he would consider in a very different light the stationing of American troops in Japan under an agreement freely entered into by Japan, from the continuation of American occupation forces on the present basis.

Mr. Holmes [4] inquired whether the position of Japan as a trading nation had been given adequate consideration. He said that if an attempt were made to close to Japan Southeast Asia as a market and a source of food supply, the Japanese would have no recourse but to look elsewhere for assistance. Mr. Dening replied that it was recognized that renewed Japanese industrial competition would have to be accepted provided, of course, competition were fair and unsubsidized. Dr. Jessup said that he found both India and Pakistan quite receptive to the revival of Japan as a trading nation. It was generally agreed that of the nations in Asia, only Malaya, Australia, New Zealand and the Philippines remained anti-Japanese. Dr. Jessup pointed out that notwithstanding anti-Japanese sentiment in the Philippines, Japanese trade with the Islands was developing rapidly. There was general concurrence in the thought that anti-Japanese feeling would remain a political football in Australia for some time to come.

A Pacific Pact

In reply to a question from Dr. Jessup, Mr. Dening stated that, in his opinion, Australia would feel secure without a Pacific Pact, modeled on the North Atlantic Pact, if it could be reassured that American authority would remain in the area. Mr. Dening expressed the opinion that India's well-known posture as a neutral in the cold war made her participation in an Asian Pacific Pact out of the question and that without India such a Pact would be valueless. However, he felt that India could likely be brought into the picture through the implementation of the Spender Plan.[5]

Indochina

Mr. Dening mentioned the conversations held in London on March 7 between the French and British Foreign Ministers at the time of the visit of the President of France. He said that responsive to an inquiry from Mr. Bevin,[6] Mr. Schuman [7] had reviewed developments since the recognition by Great Britain of the three new States of Indochina, as follows:

(a) It had been definitely decided progressively to increase Bao Dai's authority;

(b) It had been decided to authorize Bao Dai to send representatives to Washington and London;

(c) The administration of Indochina will be transferred in the near future to a new Ministry probably modeled after the Commonwealth Relations Office;

(d) Bao Dai should be considered the principal obstacle to the spread of Communism in Indochina. The French are finding it difficult to maintain their position in Indochina and are drawing heavily on European sources. The United States, as well as the United Kingdom, had been asked for military supplies. (Embassy's telegram 1326, March 9, repeated Paris 380.[8])

Ambassador Jessup expressed the view that in the long run the best results could be obtained in Indochina by winning over the followers of Ho Chi-minh rather than by shooting them. He said that he had asked DuGuardier [9] and General Alessandri [10] whether it would not be advisable for the French to allow the Vietnam forces their own Officers and that DuGuardier had replied that the French would like nothing better. DuGuardier could not state for sure, however, whether the Vietnam authorities were aware of this. Ambassador Jessup said that the Indian representatives in Vietnam had been sending prejudiced reports and that these had carried weight throughout Southeast Asia. The Southeast Asian countries had not had their own representatives there and had no first-hand knowledge. He felt it would be useful if some of these other countries sent their own observers. It was then noted that in conjunction with the Siamese recognition they had decided to send a mission.

Dr. Jessup stated that he was favorably impressed with Bao Dai and some of his personnel. He inquired as to the advisability of suggesting to the Vatican that it exert its influence in the Catholic areas of Indochina with a view to winning over the Catholics to Bao Dai. He said that his conversation with the Catholic priests there indicated that they took rather a gloomy view of the progress already made in winning over the Annamite Catholics to the side of Bao Dai.

It was the general impression that the French had handled very badly their publicity with regard to recent developments in Indochina and that thought should be given to this problem by the British and American Governments.

In reply to a question by Dr. Jessup as to the possibility of other Asiatic States recognizing Laos and Cambodia, Mr. Dening felt that as yet Asiatic States were hardly Laos- and Cambodia-conscious. Mr. Holmes suggested that if tension in Kashmir were to die down, perhaps Pakistan might be persuaded to recognize Bao Dai and that the Indians would be less inclined to be unfriendly.

India-Pakistan Quarrels

Dr. Jessup inquired whether, if the India and Pakistan Governments were jointly to accept the Security Council's resolution on Kashmir,[11] it would be possible to move in on the economic issues. Mr. Dening said that at Colombo there was an attempt to discuss economic issues, but it seemed that the financial delegates from these two Governments were of too low rank adequately to represent the views of their respective Governments. He recalled that in conversations with Assistant Secretary of State McGhee in Washington, it was suggested that the question of water rights be placed on a technical basis and divorced from political issues. Sir William[12] expressed relief that the Indians had been less intractable on Kashmir than had been feared would be the case. Mr. Dening likewise seemed to feel there might be some ground for encouragement in that Nehru and Liaquat were finally in touch with each other, and said that for the first time in months there appeared to be a ray of hope. Dr. Jessup quoted Ambassador Henderson as stating that Liaquat's failure to accept Nehru's invitation to tour the troubled areas was based largely on a fear that Nehru would hold the center of the stage.

Burma

Dr. Jessup mentioned that while he was in Burma he had discussed the question of the Commonwealth loan. He remarked that the Burmese were very suspicious of British intentions toward Burma and that they had suggested that the United Kingdom might be trying to manoeuvre them into an agreement to lower the price of rice and to enter into negotiations with the Kirins [sic]. Mr. Dening complained that the Burmese habitually make unlimited demands for military supplies, but refuse to indicate the end use for these supplies. He said the United Kingdom had no desire to see arms supplied by it fall into the hands of the Kirins [sic]. He pointed out that it was inevitable for consumer countries to try to keep the price of Burmese rice within reason and that the ultimate aim of all such nations was a lowering of the price of rice through increased production. Dr. Jessup pointed out that production would increase as pacification of the country progressed.

Communist Penetration

Dr. Jessup mentioned the Burmese fear of Chinese Communist penetration via Tibet. He said that Chinese imperialism was probably more feared by the nations of Southeast Asia than Chinese Communism and that the traditional imperialistic tendencies of the Chinese, Nationalist or Communist, might be a useful subject for publicity. Mr. Dening suggested that Chinese Communists might overplay their hand in Southeast Asia, with resultant anti-Chinese feeling which would possibly develop into anti-Communism. He said that India and Pakistan were also worried about Tibet whose capture by the Chinese Communists would facilitate Communist penetration into the Indian Peninsula. The Indians were very much concerned over Communist penetration of Nepal. Dr. Jessup pointed out that the Indians felt that the Nepalese political refugees might turn to China for help in gaining control of the Government in Nepal because the Indian Government had refused to give them such assistance. This would not be because of any pro-Communist affiliation but merely to get some foreign support. Mr. Dening concurred, stating that the Nepalese Ambassador in London had indicated that what Nepal feared was an invasion from the South rather than from the North.

China

Mr. Dening expressed the opinion that the Chinese Communists were attempting to delay entry into diplomatic relations with the United Kingdom for as long as possible and said that the United Kingdom, for its part, does not wish to indicate over-eagerness on this point. He said that Hong Kong would not experience too much difficulty in holding out against a military attack and it could sustain indefinitely an economic blockade. He said there was evidence that some of the deported ring-leaders of the recent labor disturbance in Hong Kong were Communist agents.

With regard to the Sino-Soviet Treaty,[13] he pointed out that, if in 1952 Port Arthur and Dairen were handed back to the Chinese Government, this would serve as a precedent for a Chinese demand to return Hong Kong and Macao. He said that his Government had no concrete evidence of friction between the Chinese and Russian Governments. In his opinion, the Treaty was, on the one hand, a propaganda success for the Soviet Union and, on the other hand, a tactical success for the Chinese Communists. He suggested that there were possibilities for the development of friction between the two Governments and said that the date of 1952 could have been selected for no reason other than as the end of a waiting period to see how the Chinese Communists would behave.

Spender Plan

With regard to the plan developed at Colombo for the economic rehabilitation of South and Southeast Asia, Mr. Dening stated that the program adopted was based on an amalgamation of Ceylon's ten-year plan and the so-called Spender Plan. What was proposed was a joint examination of the economic problems of the area at a meeting in May at Canberra. The British proposal to participate in this meeting had been submitted to the Cabinet for decision. He expressed the fear that at Canberra the various participating Commonwealth nations would be divided into the Asiatic "have-nots" and the European "haves"—a tendency which, if unchecked, might lead to serious East-West conflict. He said that India, Pakistan and Ceylon would be asked to produce a paper showing their present economic situation, what they are doing about it, and what outside assistance they need to carry out their programs for reconstruction. Thereafter the Commonwealth Governments might consider what they could do in Southeast Asia as a whole and then what could be done to fill in the gaps. He said that closely associated with this problem was the problem of sterling balances which was now being discussed in Washington.

He said that short-term problems would have to be handled on an ad hoc basis. However, he pointed out that Communism is an immediate issue and reconstruction is a long-term problem. Nevertheless, even an integrated plan for economic improvement, adequately publicized, will tend to stabilize the Governments now in power.

Mr. Dening admitted the possibility that as a result of the Canberra Conference, the United States would be presented with a staggering bill. However, Mr. Dening said, the United Kingdom was approaching the problem realistically.

American Regional Head for Southeast Asia

Mr. Dening said that he had mentioned to Mr. Butterworth during the latter's recent visit to London [14] the possibility of appointing an American Regional Head for Southeast Asia who would be endowed with powers similar to those of Malcolm MacDonald who would work in close conjunction with him. He said it was realized that there might be practical difficulties in the way of such an appointment, such as the sensibilities of American officials in the area.

Afghanistan [15]

With reference to the Afghanistan–Pakistan dispute, Mr. Scott [16] mentioned that the Commonwealth Relations Office had just sent a telegram to its High Commissioner in Karachi asking him to inquire of Liaquat whether Pakistan considered that approaches to the Afghan Government by the British Government and perhaps by other Governments would serve a useful purpose. In the event of a favorable reply, the Foreign Office will be prepared to discuss any such approaches with the United States and other Governments concerned.

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] March 11, 1950.

MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS FOR THE FAR EAST AND THEIR PRIORITY IN RELATION TO OTHER PROGRAMS

I am becoming increasingly concerned over the following developments which have occurred during recent weeks in connection with the Department's consideration of various military aid programs for the Far East:

(1) The apparent belief of many in the Department that the programs under consideration can be firmed up and physically implemented within any short period of time. This belief is also reflected in despatches from personnel in the field, particularly those from Paris, Saigon, and the members of the so-called Griffin Mission.

(2) The extent to which possible recipients of military aid are being led to believe that they will receive aid quickly and in large amounts.

(3) The apparent belief in the Department that the requirements of Far Eastern military aid programs can be met without serious effects on the rate of delivery of goods under programs for North Atlantic Treaty countries, Turkey, Greece, Iran, and the Philippines.

(4) The failure to face squarely the issue as to priorities from a delivery standpoint of the proposed Far Eastern programs in relation to other MDAP programs.

I think it is imperative to disabuse our own personnel, both here and abroad, of any belief that early deliveries can be anticipated under the programs now under consideration. Programs cannot be developed without a minimum of information, and in many instances reliable information is lacking. It takes time to get this information and it takes time to develop a program when this information has been received. Not the least time-consuming feature of programming is the necessity of determining, from an examination of service stocks, what equipment is available to meet a recipient nation's requirements. This is a complicated process and the time elements involved can best be illustrated by the fact that although MDAP legislation was enacted late in 1949, we are just now receiving firm programs from the Department of Defense. Even when a program has been approved and processed through the Bureau of the Budget, there follows the long process of actual supply. This may involve, successively, rehabilitation (and the letting of contracts for, or the employment of personnel in connection with, such rehabilitation), packing and crating, inland transport and ocean transport. Shortcuts are possible up to a point, but usually only at the expense of regular Defense activities or other MDAP programs. Thus, contrary to the apparently widespread belief, the submission of a list of desired equipment by a nation, followed by a decision to assist that nation, does not ordinarily result in the delivery dockside in Saigon, or some other Asian port, of any or all of the equipment asked for in any period such as 30 to 60 days. We had best revise our calculations and plans to accord with these hard facts.

Because of the foregoing misconceptions, I have the impression that the actions of our representatives abroad have given rise to expectations on the part of other nations which are wholly unjustified by the facts. I believe this is a dangerous situation. We cannot fulfill these expectations, and I visualize serious political repercussions when this fact becomes apparent to them. I get the feeling that bad as the situation may be in Southeast Asia, we are generating unnecessary additional problems for ourselves by giving the impression that large amounts of military aid are practically on the way.

Although long delays will result, under any circumstances, before currently proposed Far Eastern programs result in actual deliveries, the length of these delays can be cut down if, but only if, we are prepared to sacrifice delivery rates for other current MDAP programs. Present matériel availabilities, as well as the existing limited capabilities of depots, modification centers, etc., to do work incident to military assistance programs, makes such a result inevitable. While I express no view as to the priority of the several Far Eastern programs in relation to other military assistance programs, I do want to point out that this issue must be faced quickly by the Department of State, and, subsequently, by the Department of State in conjunction with the Department of Defense. Satisfactory programming by Defense will be contingent on these priority determinations, since the ability to supply the goods required will often depend upon whether they are to be taken out of other competing programs.

I believe that you should give the problems set forth above your urgent personal consideration.

SECRET CANBERRA, March 13, 1950—noon.

72. Burton discussed with Foster the meeting of Intergovernmental Committee of Commonwealth Countries arising out of Colombo Conference and scheduled for mid-May in Australia possibly at Jervis Bay.[1] Said Australia desired keep US Government closely informed of committee's work and would appreciate learning whether US would be interested in assigning an officer to attend informally as observer. Stressed that this suggestion carried no intent to draw US into substance of conference.

Burton added that Australia considered it would be mistake invite non-Commonwealth SEA countries participate this stage since they would be on receiving end economic aid and their presence would hopelessly complicate discussions and plans governments represented at meeting. Fact they were not being invited, debarred Australia from extending formal invitation to US to attend even if US willing accept such formal invitation.

Foster asked whether Australia had yet had any reaction from Manila concerning proposal that Baguio Conference be transferred to Australia and tied in with Intergovernmental Committee meeting (Embtel 62, March 2).[2]

Burton said no, but Spender planned goodwill visit Manila end of March and hopes this would placate Filipinos. Added in strictest confidence that Australians present thinking is to suggest to other Commonwealth countries represented at Intergovernmental meeting that they "exchange views" on a possible Pacific pact. Since India might balk on this, suggestion would be withheld until meeting fully arranged and India's participation assured.

We consider it would be useful send Sturm[3] to meeting, it being clearly understood by Australian and other governments that he was there only as informal observer and that his presence would not in any sense involve US meeting. On assumption Department does not wish at this stage be drawn into these economic discussions and plans for SEA, Embassy recommends against sending an officer from Washington since this could not fail be construed as direct and substantial participation by US.

Please instruct.

Problem

To expedite action on military aid programs of Burma, Indochina, and Thailand under Section 303, Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949.

Action Required

a. Obtain concurrence of Defense and approval of the President for proposed Burma projects.

b. Obtain President's approval of specific programs for Indochina and Thailand.

c. Broaden the terms of reference of NSC 64.[5]

Action Assigned to

O, SOA, PSA.

Discussion

Captain Murdaugh and Mr. Young of the Department of Defense called at the State Department on March 14 at their request to discuss 303 programs with the above mentioned parties.

Captain Murdaugh, who attended the Bangkok conference as representative of the Department of Defense, reported that he was very much impressed with the seriousness of the situations in Indochina and Burma and the urgent need for taking prompt action to save these countries. The cold war, in his opinion, was hot in both countries. Thailand was in a slightly better condition but its position would be seriously jeopardized if Indochina or Burma were lost to communism.

He mentioned that NSC 64, which had been prepared to cover Indochina, was being broadened on an area basis by the Office of the Secretary of Defense to also include Burma, Malaya and Thailand before being sent to the Joint Chiefs for consideration. Mr. Mathews expressed appreciation for receiving this information and suggested that Mr. Kennedy discuss with Mr. Lacy the possibility of taking parallel action in the State Department.

Mr. Lacy pointed out that in a very recent message, the French had attached first priority to obtaining five C–54's and a supply of 37-mm ammunition for Indochina.[6] He stated that the C–54's were particularly important as they were badly needed for the movement of matériel and manpower to strategic points in Indochina.

Mr. Nolting stated that programs of $15 million for Indochina and $10 million for Thailand had been approved in principle by the President subject to specific programs being submitted for these countries. When it was indicated that the French were asking for a much larger program for Indochina, he pointed out that these sums could be considered as initial installments. When the question was raised as to what action would be taken if items sought under these programs were in conflict with those needed for Europe or elsewhere he replied that Mr. Rusk would decide for the State Department where specific equipment should go and the fact that countries of Western Europe may have a higher priority would not necessarily mean that their entire requirements would be satisfied before shipments could be made to countries in South and Southeast Asia. The Department's position on such items short in supply would be coordinated with that of Defense and in the event of any difference of opinion the matter may have to be referred to the President.

Mr. Nolting raised the question as to whether conditions were sufficiently serious in South and Southeast Asia as to warrant token shipments. Captain Murdaugh and Mr. Young replied that it was a matter of urgency that token shipments of military equipment be sent to Indochina and Burma at the earliest possible date as the arrival of such equipment would be interpreted as concrete evidence of our support and interest in the existing governments of these countries. Messrs. Lacy, Mathews, Kennedy and Robertson concurred in this view and stressed the urgency time-wise in arranging for token shipments. Mr. Kennedy stated it may be more important to provide Burma with a $5 million program now than a $50 million program one year hence. However, he cautioned that our role should continue to be one of complementing British efforts who traditionally have supplied arms to Burma; we should not lose sight of the fact that the British have the primary responsibility for Burmese requirements. Mr. Lacy said that we must similarly keep the French in a position of responsibility in Indochina and not let them pass the buck to us.

Mr. Kennedy outlined the existing situation in Burma. He stated that while the present government has many weaknesses it is the best that can be found. The government is confronted by a number of rebellious factions in two of which the communists play a leading role. It is believed that with the ten small craft included in the proposed river boat project the government will be able to clean up insurgent pockets along the river, instill confidence in the people so that workers will return to the fields thereby enabling an increase in production from the present rate of 800,000 tons to some 1,500,000 tons by next year. The government's efforts in this direction are limited both by the number of boats on hand and trained crews. The training of qualified personnel may be a limiting factor in furnishing the new equipment. The government is also actively dealing with other troubled areas. Its troops have taken the second best stronghold of the Karens and are within 25 miles of the Karen capital of Toungoo. Troops dispatched by air to Kengtung have given positive evidence of the desire of the government to control that area.[7]

Mr. Bell indicated that he was concerned over the piece-meal or ad hoc approach as evidenced by the proposed Section 303 projects submitted to date. He felt that it would be necessary to go into fairly detailed programming before it could be hoped to get funds allocated. Mr. Mathews replied that he understood the purpose of Section 303 was to make funds available for providing any form of aid considered necessary to meet rapidly developing emergency situations which could not be foreseen in sufficient time to permit programming in advance. Mr. Lacy most emphatically emphasized that his office had no alternative to pressing for the earliest possible approval of projects designed to strengthen the countries of Southeast Asia.

After the meeting Mr. Nolting gave Captain Murdaugh and Mr. Young a copy of the Burma program as prepared in SOA, indicating that the river patrol project had been presented before FMACC on Thursday, March 9, for clearance with Defense and that he would appreciate if they would clear in Defense the non-military items of the program. Mr. Young indicated that there may be some criticism in Defense and possibly in Congress of the rodent control program.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] March 16, 1950.

Subject: Economic Problems in South and Southeast Asia

Mr. John B. Nason [1] of the ECA has asked that I make available to him in memorandum form the substance of a discussion I had with him on March 6.[2] At that time I made the following comments on the economic position of countries in the "general area of China".

General Observations: Each of the countries is in quite different economic circumstances and stands in a separate and unique relation to possible United States economic aid. Therefore, it is best to summarize first the position of each country and to conclude with general observations on the entire area. Since British dependent territories are under ERP, they need not be discussed.

(1) Philippines: The Department believes that Philippine economic problems are primarily problems of internal management and development of their resources, involving particularly emphasis on agricultural development and possible agrarian reforms, and on fiscal policies and their administration. Without determined efforts by the Philippines to attack these problems, there is nothing United States financial aid can do without encouraging the dangerous illusion that they can become permanent pensioners of this country. Technical advice from the United States can be of assistance, although the major problems and major lines of attack upon them are reasonably well-known to many Filipinos. Economic assistance from the United States cannot replace or itself produce good management, nor is it needed in large sums for agricultural development. In any event, agricultural development in such peasant economy is necessarily a longish-run affair, and cannot be counted upon to produce substantial results in the short run.

However, we may find it desirable and necessary to assist the Philippines in order to make it politically possible for its Administration to undertake necessary measures of internal reform. This will, however, depend upon proper undertakings by the Philippine Government. Both governments have agreed to the despatch of a U.S. mission to the Philippines in the near future to survey the problem and make specific recommendations for governmental action. The Department proposes to avoid any indication of our preparedness or willingness to grant economic assistance of the sort familiar to the ECA until this mission has completed its survey and until we have exhausted every possibility of getting the Philippine Government to take action on its own. In fact, the outlines of a program of economic assistance have been blocked out, which on a maximum basis would not require the expenditure of more than $20 million during its first year of operation.

[2] Shohan transmitted a copy of this memorandum to Nason on March 24.

Actually there is some doubt whether the economic position of the Philippines would require even this expenditure from any economic or political viewpoint except that of gaining adherence by the Philippine Government to a program of sound management.

(2) Indonesia: The Department believes that Indonesia can pay its own way, and can and should primarily rely on Dutch technicians (except probably on broad policy matters). Balance of payments estimates indicate that on the present austere level Indonesia can maintain a viable economy without dollar loans. In fact, small dollar surpluses are envisaged. Her desirable reconstruction needs, however, appear to require dollar loan assistance. Her payment problems are largely with soft currency areas, and particularly with the Netherlands. We expect the Dutch to make extensive offers of credit, if for no other reason than to protect her investments. Essentially, the Dutch would be doing little more than financing current out-payments to Dutch nationals. We would expect considerable revival of trade between Indonesia and the Japanese, particularly in textiles, and are now working on the establishment of credit to this end. There is little doubt in any quarter that given reasonable political stability Indonesia has a wealth of productive and profitable investment opportunities, and little doubt as to her capacity to repay loans. This is borne out not only by the Export-Import Bank and Dutch offers of credit, but by offers the Indonesians are understood to have entertained from Belgian, French and Swiss sources.

We will, of course, be prepared to offer Indonesia technical assistance under Point Four. However, we cannot as a practical matter replace the many technically qualified Dutch in Indonesia and substitute for their intimate knowledge of local conditions. Nor as a political matter would we wish to. Without abstracting ourselves completely or wishing to appear disinterested, or neglecting our own interests, we must act in the light of our desire that the Netherlands-Indonesian Union succeed if it is at all possible.

(3) Indochina: We view the missing component in Indochina as political. Only as the Annamese are convinced that present or future French concessions satisfy their nationalist aspirations can there be a satisfactory political and military solution. With such a solution, we would expect Indochina's foreign economic position to improve rapidly and, in the fairly short-run, with little added equipment or outside aid. This is simply because their major export, rice, is even now being produced in far larger quantities than can be safely transported, milled, and shipped abroad. Furthermore, under reasonably stable conditions, it can be very readily produced, transported, milled and shipped abroad in still larger quantities.

Indochina's dollar deficit is at present fairly small (it is incorrectly exaggerated by taking Indochinese piastre figures and converting at the official rate of exchange). We may find it necessary to assist her, particularly as additional dollar imports may stimulate useful economic activity. True, this may not so much directly help Indochina as partly relieve the French of the financial burden they are incurring. This is, of course, not an unworthy objective, but it is definitely necessary that our economic aid to Indochina be an obvious and direct sign of our support of the three States. (The drain on the French economy through the maintenance of an artificial piastre-franc rate is a critical economic problem which may have to be examined separately.)

It should be noted that as in the case of Indonesia the return of relative stability would result in considerably increased private or semi-public investment by the French, occasioned by the necessity of protecting their private investments.

The requirements and programs so urgently advanced by Bao Dai require largely local currency funds and therefore present mainly a problem of fiscal management. Therefore, we must keep an open mind on the possible need and desirability of giving Vietnam some budgetary assistance.

Possibilities of far-reaching intensive work on agricultural technology, through extension and demonstration work of the JCRR type, remain uncertain both as to practicability and necessity. French agricultural work had been fairly advanced before the war and some of it has been reconstituted. The areas in which it would be safe and desirable for American agricultural personnel to operate is a matter on which judgment cannot be passed at this time.

(4) Thailand: Thailand is in the soundest economic position of any country in the area. It has experienced continuing prosperity of a character unknown for 20 years. It has substantial gold reserves and relatively little inflation since 1946. Its currency and foreign exchange position is so sound that the International Monetary Fund is recommending that import controls and multiple exchange rates be dropped and the baht stabilized in terms of dollars. Its substantial loan applications before the IBRD are regarded as economically sound, although there may be some question of Thai ability to repay in dollars. With the cessation of dollar purchases of rice for relief programs, her dollar receipts will be smaller. Thailand should increasingly have recourse to trade with Japan, which can supply much of the equipment needed for implementation of the projects submitted to the IBRD.

The Department would be loath to see unnecessary and extravagant grants made to Thailand and similarly to see her encouraged to make use of other than normal credit sources. However, if massive aid programs to Southeast Asia were to become the order of the day it would be impossible to discriminate against Thailand and simple enough to transfer her present sound projects to any such program.

(5) Burma: The movement of Burmese agricultural and mineral resources depend upon and support Burma's river, rail and road transport systems. Before the war, these activities were financed, managed and operated largely by British and Indians, with very little development of Burmese capabilities for these functions. Since the war Burma's economy has been run down because of widespread insurrectionary activity and because of the new Burmese Government's program of nationalizing mineral resources, agricultural land and extractive industries.

If the political situation could be stabilized and if the Burmese Government were willing to permit prewar investors to reactivate their enterprises in Burma, it seems likely that a significant part of the economy would very quickly revive. The Burmese, however, will not be willing to permit the reestablishment on prewar terms of British firms and Indian landlords. As Burmese capital and technical skills are insufficient for effective rehabilitation, there might exist under stabilized political conditions a possibility for effective U.S., UN and Commonwealth technical aid on a larger scale than is now contemplated, and for development and rehabilitation loans to the Burma Government.

Despite superficial similarities, Burma is in a somewhat different position from Indochina. Her territory is even more chopped up by civil war. There is no Russian recognized Kremlin-dominated "government". Burma is about to receive a sterling loan from the Commonwealth.

The basic problem now is to build up Burmese willingness to make an aggressive effort to solve their own internal problems and to make use of technical and military advice from the U.K. and the Commonwealth, as well as from the U.S. and the UN. At the moment, we are not prepared to undertake the economic support and development of Burma as a major responsibility, which we believe should be borne by the British, but we have prepared a program embodying various types of limited assistance for application in a limited area. This program is expected to be implemented shortly from funds other than those appropriated to the ECA.

General Problems of the Area: Two major problems affecting the entire area are (1) trade with Japan and (2) agricultural development. Because of Japanese food deficits these are interrelated.

Japan needs primary products from Southeast Asia, and particularly rice, and is in a position to pay for these with her textiles and machinery, both of which are badly needed in the area. Many elaborate schemes have been developed inside and outside of the United States government and in UN organizations to assist in this problem. Actually the log-jam is beginning to break up with improved supply and trading conditions in Japan and in Southeast Asia.

However, all the various schemes and studies devised to meet this problem point to one major deficiency—a lack of normal intermediate credit facilities for financing Japanese exports. This is a major problem that is probably preferably attacked directly but it may have to be attacked as part of one or another of more elaborate schemes designed to increase Japanese trade with Southeast Asia.

Agricultural technology in the area is poor. It is agreed without question that a major line of endeavor by the U.S.—through Point Four or otherwise—must be to start the development of demonstration and extension work designed to improve agricultural yields. As important as this is, and it is basic to all economic problems of each of the countries both domestically and in its international economic relations—we must not be deluded by the notion that rapid results can be obtained in any peasant economy, and particularly in Asia. In addition to the technological problems of agriculture, we are concerned with institutional problems of agricultural reform, not only for their economic significance, but because of their import for political stability.

To these ends the Department of State has prepared what technically qualified authorities believe to be a limited program for the institution of agricultural extension and demonstration work in the rice producing areas of Southeast Asia. Its major limitation has been imposed by prospective lack of personnel. Including the cost of materials, this program would cost about $8 million in its first year of operation, and probably smaller sums in later years since some of the materials needed would not have to be imported each year. As for agrarian reform, in respect of leading problems such as land tenure and agricultural debt, fairly intensive investigation and discussion during the last six months suggests that this is only a critical problem in certain limited areas of the Philippines, in Tonkin (where the problem is debt and not tenure) and in parts of Cambodia (where there is a tenure problem) and possibly in the administration and working out of legislation already on the Burmese law books.

With respect to technological programs, Point Four legislation and appropriations would be a natural recourse although to be sure such programs could presumably be authorized and financed under other legislation similar to that under which the JCRR program has been conducted.

However, we must be cautious both as to the countries and the types of program with which we operate bilaterally, as contrasted with operations through the UN and its specialized agencies. In general, there is a strong disposition in all these countries, with the possible exception of the Philippines, to have Point Four activities conducted through the UN rather than bilaterally with the U.S. Without prejudgment as to particular countries and programs, we are clear that we must not bring pressure to have all this work done directly by the United States.

In this connection, it is a fairly sound if unpleasant generalization to state that the U.S. is feared throughout the whole area, and much of the fear is based upon the notion that our interest in the area originates in large part from conscious programs of economic imperialism. Neither British nor French nor Dutch imperialism is regarded by the sensitive and somewhat xenophobic native nationalism as a serious barrier to their ambitions. We, however, are regarded with considerable apprehension. Even our assistance in the mediation of disputes with metropolitan areas is viewed in part by native populations and always by Moscow as being based upon our desire to replace western European hegemony. For this reason, as badly as these countries need our technical assistance and however eager we may be to furnish it, we must be extremely careful not to overwhelm them with elaborate supervisory missions.

Butterworth told Davis Burton had indicated Spender was considering asking you questions reported urtel 71 Mar 10 and he felt sure Min External Aff already knew answers: for example that question 2 answered itself and bespoke of desirability of Asiatic initiative. Question 1 was hypothetical but of course it is not for US to evaluate initiative but for initiative to be efficacious and US position was that it had indicated on more than one occasion that it regarded with full sympathy development of regional assn of Asiatic and Pacific area but could not in advance of advent of such a movement offer any promise of US participation.

Butterworth took this occasion to ask Davis why Austral Govt had refused to accept Baguio invitation. Davis replied in effect that definite refusal had not been put forward altho Austral had no intention of going and confirmed that Spender was shortly paying a courtesy visit to Manila.

SECRET CANBERRA, March 24, 1950—4 p. m.

92. The tone and content of Deptel 50, March 21, appear so inadequate as response to Spender's approach re Pacific Pact that we cannot believe Department has fully appreciated sincerity of his intention and importance new Australian Government attaches to US phase of its foreign relations. Possibly we are at fault in failing stress in Embtel 71, March 10, that, granted limitations imposed by Australia's size and strength, every known act of government since taking office indicates it really means business. We had supposed Embtel 71 would be read in general context Spender's public statement plus our numerous telegrams and despatches indicating Menzies Government,[1] in sharp contrast to its predecessor, has gone out of its way to strengthen US-Australian relationship. In particular, it is endeavoring meet our position re friendship treaty, encouragement American firms here, joint basis in Pacific, and Chinese Communist problem. Moreover, it conceives Colombo plan for economic aid SEA as complementary our own plans and policies including Point Four. Even in connection Jap problem, touchy domestic political issue, views expressed by Spender in speech of March 9 (Embdes 67, March 10[2]) represent concessions to US position. Again; Spender spoke to me yesterday concerning encouraging prospects for double taxation agreement. New government has been in office only three months but has shown in these and other matters that it repudiates uncooperative attitude of Chifley Government and unrealistic foreign policies of Evatt.[3]

Spender told me yesterday on eve departure for good-will visit Manila that he wished impress upon me that his Government was anxious come to grips soonest with Communist problem in Asia. He hoped Colombo plan for economic aid to SEA would serve useful purpose in that regard, a purpose which ECAFE could not serve as well because its members included the USSR and the SEA countries for which aid intended. Realizing however, that economic aid is not enough, Australia, while fully realizing its limitations as small power, desired do everything possible promote Pacific Pact with military commitments.

As to Baguio Conference, Australia had not so much turned down invitation as questioned value of conference which India and others would not support and whose purposes seemed unclear to Filipinos themselves (Embtel 62, March 2[2]). He was perfectly willing discuss pacts with Filipinos but thought such discussions futile for these reasons and in absence of a lead from US.

Spender's speech of March 9 constitutes first serious Australian attempt to evolve a rational foreign policy taking into account nation's geographic position, declining fortunes of UK, crisis in SEA and position of US as leader of non-Communist world. It is clearly Spender's view that prerequisite to any meaningful Pacific Pact is a clear indication of what support it would ultimately find in the US. He appears consider that no single Pacific nation, or any combination of such nations, can be expected, unless it has reason to believe it will be backed by the US, to commit itself to a course which might prove futile and even disastrous. (Yesterday Spender mentioned Secretary's San Francisco speech with appreciation but in a way which showed that he did not construe it as touching upon basic issue implicit in two questions conveyed in Embtel 71.)

Embassy appreciates that from US viewpoint it would be preferable if initiative for Pacific Pact came from Asiatic country and it would be inadvisable place primary reliance upon Australia. Nevertheless it seems to us that we should not let this offer of closer cooperation go by default. If this is so, we believe that what is needed at the moment, leaving aside consideration of long-term measures or ultimate policies, is some manifestation of responsiveness from the US at a high level and in reasonably sympathetic and encouraging terms.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] March 28, 1950.

Subject: Expanded USIE Program in Southeast Asia

Summary

The USIE program in Southeast Asia (Indo-China, Thailand, Indonesia, Malaya, Burma and including Hong Kong and the Philippines) has been stepped up to the limit of presently available funds. With the exception of radio broadcasts, most of the effort thus far has been directed toward producing in the languages of the area materials which just now are arriving in the field.

The full impact of the expanded program will become increasingly apparent over the next few months. There is already evidence, however, of increased usage of USIE news and feature material in the local press throughout the area. This includes US official statements as well as information about the USSR designed to counteract Soviet propaganda. This increase results from the efforts of additional field personnel, the provision of daily or weekly news files in local languages, and the provision of special articles on activities and policies of the USSR.

Plans for a regional production center in Manila to service all Southeast Asia posts with regionalized material have been completed and approved. Necessary printing equipment is being sought. Meanwhile, staffing plans are being completed. It is planned that the existing Manila print shop can be expanded by means of a night shift to begin producing special materials for Indo-China within 60 days or sooner. This production will gradually be expanded as new equipment arrives to include the entire area. A staff of four or five Americans and 40 aliens will be required for this operation.

Production will include a monthly magazine, profusely illustrated, edited for the region and for specific countries in the region, and produced in each language of the area; picture poster exhibits; wall picture newspapers, etc.

In addition, a $7,100,000 program designed to do the job required of USIE in this area is being documented for presentation to the President as a Department project under Section 303 MDAP funds. All preliminary documentation will be completed this week. This program will be implemented as soon as funds are made available.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. Charlton Ogburn, Policy Information Officer, Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON, April 3, 1950.]

ORAL REPORT BY AMBASSADOR-AT-LARGE PHILIP C. JESSUP UPON HIS RETURN FROM THE EAST [1]

On March 23 in a meeting at 10:00 a. m. in Room 5104 New State, Ambassador Jessup summarized the impressions he had received of the situation in the East to the following officers:

S	The Secretary	NEA	Mr. Hare [5]
U	Mr. Webb	CA	Mr. Sprouse [6]
C	Mr. Kennan [2]	PSA	Mr. Lacy
G	Mr. Rusk	G	Mr. Smith
FE	Mr. Butterworth	S/A	Mr. Gibson
E	Mr. Thorp [3]	FE	Mr. Ogburn (Recorder)
P	Mr. Barrett [4]		Mr. Case [7]
A	Mr. Humelsine		Mr. Fosdick [8]

[1] From December 15, 1949, to March 15, 1950, Ambassador at Large Philip C. Jessup conducted a 14-nation fact-finding tour of the Far East. For the text of his radio address reporting on the trip, April 13, 1950, see Department of State Bulletin, April 24, 1950, pp. 627–630. Documentation on Jessup's visits to Japan, Formosa, Indochina, Indonesia, and Burma appears in bilateral compilations in the present volume. For documentation on the portions of his trip spent in India, Pakistan, and Afghanistan, see bilateral compilations in volume v. Regarding his visit to Korea, see volume VII.

[2] George F. Kennan, Counselor of the Department of State.

[3] Willard L. Thorp, Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs.

[4] Edward W. Barrett, Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs.

[5] Raymond A. Hare, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs.

[6] Philip D. Sprouse, Director of the Office of Chinese Affairs.

[7] Everett Case, President of Colgate University; consultant to the Secretary of State on Far Eastern policy.

[8] Raymond Bland Fosdick, former president of the Rockefeller Foundation; consultant to the Secretary of State on Far Eastern policy.

Ambassador Jessup began by stating that both he and the Bangkok Conference of Chiefs of Mission were in agreement with the Department's report to the National Security Council (No. 64 of February 27)[9] which held that all measures should be taken to prevent Communist expansion in Southeast Asia. The United Kingdom representatives consulted are also in accord with this view. He considered that Indochina is the key to the situation and that Southeast Asia is in balance. A situation comparably critical exists in the subcontinent. The danger of a war between India and Pakistan is very real. (Ambassador Jessup observed that Afghanistan is in a class by itself as is also Ceylon, and he therefore felt it well to omit them from discussion.) Among the other areas Japan, Korea, the Philippines, Malaya and Indonesia are to be considered less critical spots but are not to be neglected.

Recalling that he had visited 14 Asian countries, Ambassador Jessup emphasized that it would be a mistake to dwell exclusively upon China which has a population of 400 million as against 700 million in the other countries of the East.

Ambassador Jessup had found a situation of actual war existing in many areas. In Korea, Indochina, Malaya and Burma the war was a hot war. In the sub-continent the situation is one of near war, while violence is retarding recovery in the Philippines and Indonesia.

Ambassador Jessup said that in characterizing the problems confronting us in the East he would speak first of the difficulties that we have to overcome, which he enumerated under the heading "The Weaknesses of Our 'Friends' ", as follows:

1. The non-democratic character of governments in the area. Rhee[10] is about as bad in this respect as anyone we have had to deal with as was demonstrated by his recent arrest of certain Korean assemblymen and his threats to others. Thailand in the eyes of other Asians is under the control of a completely autocratic, feudal aristocracy. In Burma, although Premier Thakin Nu holds the people together the actual power is exercised by General Ne Win.[11] In India, Patel[12] runs the security machinery with a stern hand although the reputation of the Indian Government is not thereby affected. For example, when Communists arrested by the Indian Government were about to be released for lack of specific charges against them, Patel rushed through a bill suspending the right of habeas corpus in order to keep them in prison.

2. Lack of trained personnel. In Korea, for example, there is no substitute for Rhee. In Indochina Bao Dai's Government would be deficient in competent personnel even if all elements rallied to his side. The Indonesian Cabinet contains men of high caliber, and while there are many capable administrators on the lower levels in Indonesia, the middle ranks are weak. Both the Indonesians and the Burmese are unable to administer businesses, and Burma is in addition notably lacking in trained personnel.

3. Corruption and inefficiency. This weakness is conspicuous in the Philippines. Ambassador Jessup observed that the Secretary's observations on this subject in his Press Club speech were very mild.

4. Economic and financial difficulties. While a cause of basic distress, these difficulties had been given too great prominence by the poverty of India and China. The plight of the Indians is terrible. However, this is not true of the rest of Asia. There is some shortage of food in Japan. In Burma the problem is not endemic but is an outcome of the war. With regard to the problem of land tenure, good progress has been made in Japan, Korea and Okinawa. The Joint Commission for Rural Reconstruction has done excellent work in Formosa. In Burma a solution of the problem awaits a settlement of the civil war. In Malaya the problem is connected with large plantation holdings such as the rubber estates. There is some distress in Pakistan about which it is not possible to do very much at present. Only in India does this problem offer a very fruitful ground for propaganda. Elsewhere it is to be doubted that great capital is to be made of it. The situation facing the peasant in most of Asia outside India and China is not so bad from his point of view although he is beginning to be roused. For the rest there are general financial and economic difficulties in the area. In Korea there is the problem of inflation. The financial difficulties of the Philippines are our own fault to the extent that American money was poured into the country without regulation. As an illustration of the results, Ambassador Jessup cited the market stalls at Baguio crammed with American luxuries. Indochina is fundamentally extremely rich. Indonesia faces serious financial difficulties but the outlook is hopeful. The granting of the Export-Import Bank credit was an excellent move. The general economic problem facing Burma is serious but the Commonwealth loan should help. With regard to Pakistan, an IBRD representative whom Ambassador Jessup had met in Karachi took a very dismal view of prospects owing to the trade war between Pakistan and India. He had reported that 500,000 tons of wheat was spoiling in Pakistan and that cotton and jute were piling up. In Pakistan and also in Indonesia and Burma, military expenditures are at the root of the economic troubles.

5. Military weaknesses in meeting Communist guerillas. The situation in Korea is improving owing to our efforts. However, the Republic requires anti-aircraft guns and planes, having nothing new with which it could meet an air attack from the north. The situation in Indochina is obvious, Ambassador Jessup observed, as it is also in Burma. In the latter country the Government is making progress against the Karens but refuses to come to a political settlement, recalling Generalissimo Chiang's attitude in this respect. In Thailand the danger is potential. The nation is weak and will not attempt to stand up against Communist aggression.

6. Asian psychological attitudes. Both Pignon, the French High Commissioner for Indochina, and MacDonald, Commissioner for the United Kingdom in Southeast Asia, believe that the Asians are inclined by their psychology to wait and see who is winning. The bandwagon attitude will be more important than questions of ideology in determining their decisions.

7. Local Communist strength. The overseas Chinese communities form one of the most important elements in the strength of the Communists in Asia. The Communists are able to work on these communities without encountering resistance by employing the threat of reprisals against the relatives in China of members of the communities. Chiang Kai-shek had expressed to Ambassador Jessup the opinion that nothing could be done about this situation. In Japan there is a potential danger of an increase in Communist strength. The other countries of the East either have a common border with China or else have strong local Chinese communities. Korea not only has a frontier problem but faces the danger that Rhee's policies will produce Communism within the country.

8. Distrust of the West. The outstanding example is the feeling against the French in Indochina. Anti-western sentiment is not important in Malaya although the Malays bear a grudge against the British. In Burma there is not much anti-American sentiment but the country is at odds with the British. In India there is general distrust of the West and the Indian press is generally anti-American.

9. Lack of coordination among the western powers. The differences between the US and UK on recognition of Communist China are not understood in Asia. In addition there is lack of coordination between the US and the UK on one hand and the French on the other as to the moves to be made in Indochina. While in general the Indonesians are working surprisingly well with the Dutch, a hard core of Dutch colonial thinking remains which must be watched. The Westerling affair [13] is a case in point. On the sub-continent the US is working well with the UK and France. Now that the new Kashmir resolution has been passed we should all try to help in the economic situation of the sub-continent and in the difficulties in Bengal. The French colonies in India are a source of mistrust between the Indians and the French. With respect to Japan, it is important that the position of the Western powers on a peace treaty be quickly solidified. In regard to Asia in general, it is necessary that the Western powers pool their resources. We ourselves are in a position to work well with the others but are not altogether doing so. The French requests for assistance in Indochina afford a chance for cooperation. With respect to aid to Burma, it would appear that the Burmese are attempting to play the US off against the UK. In addition to pooling our resources a great deal needs to be done in uniting Western efforts on the propaganda front. In particular the French are failing to put over their viewpoint on Indochina and Asia. They are conspicuously lacking in a sense of public relations. On the military side more use must be made of the skills in counter-guerrilla tactics that we acquired during the recent war. The French in Indochina are making somewhat the same mistakes that the British General Braddock made in the French and Indian Wars. In Malaya the British are now fighting the Chinese Communists whom they had trained and equipped for guerrilla warfare during the Japanese occupation. We are not pooling our skills as we did during the war. Ambassador Jessup raised the question whether the Philippine Scouts could be used in Indochina.

Ambassador Jessup had found no enthusiasm whatsoever for a Southeast Asian Union and does not believe that a regional pact is a very important subject.

[13] See footnote 3, p. 969.

Having concluded his itemization of the weaknesses of our friends, Ambassador Jessup then took up the credit side of the ledger, i.e., the strength of our friends in Asia, which he enumerated as follows:

1. Democratic progress. Progress in democratic methods has been achieved in Japan and in the Philippines. In Malaya the British have put on a good demonstration of democratic progress. An important and useful role is being played in India and Pakistan by officials trained under the British.

2. Economic potential. Food surpluses, actual or potential, exist in Korea, the Philippines, Indochina, Thailand, Burma and Pakistan. In addition, many of the countries of the area have other resources to contribute.

3. Military strength. Our forces in Japan and Okinawa, our bases in the Philippines, the French army in Indochina, the British forces in Hong Kong and Malaya, and the trained armies in India and Pakistan are all assets in the area.

4. Anti-Communist feeling. Anti-Communist feeling is strong in Japan, strong and intense in Korea, very considerable in the Philippines, considerable in Malaya (where it is combined with anti-Chinese sentiment), fairly considerable in Indonesia, existent to a certain extent in Burma, considerable in Thailand and also existent in India and Pakistan. Such feeling has a religious basis among Buddhists, Moslems, and Catholics. This factor should be kept in mind, especially in Indochina where the Catholics form an important element. (Mr. Butterworth interpolated that the strength of Communist sentiment in the overseas Chinese communities will be affected to an important degree by conditions in China. He recalled that the recent railway strike in Hong Kong had failed after some of the striking employees had visited Canton and observed the very unpleasant situation existing there.)

5. Pro-American sentiment. The US has had a good build-up in Japan. Pro-American feeling is very strong in Korea, is continuing in the Philippines, exists definitely in Indonesia and Thailand, is rather strong in Burma and is fairly considerable in Pakistan. At the same time, anti-Chinese sentiment or a fear of China is present. Between Indochina and China hostility is traditional and is perhaps being intensified by the propaganda emanating from the Peiping radio, which advances Chinese claims to a protective interest over Indochina—in effect a manifest destiny. The Malays are strongly anti-Chinese. Indonesians fear and dislike the Chinese and were prone during recent disorders to pillage and kill them. In Thailand where the Chinese minority is feared and possible Chinese movements into Indochina and Burma are regarded with apprehension, the feeling against the Chinese is very strong. The Burmese take a dim view of the Chinese Communist movement to liberate Tibet, fearing that Burma may find itself in the same category. Nepal is extremely concerned over the threat to Tibet, and India is concerned to the extent of considering supplying the Tibetans with some quantity of arms. By exploiting indigenous fear of the Chinese in Asia we can gain a momentary advantage but it is less clear what the effect would be 20 years hence.

Ambassador Jessup next considered the prospect of Western coordination in Asia. With regard to the forthcoming meeting of the Foreign Ministers in May,[14] Mr. Schuman in a conversation with Ambassador Jessup had cited Bevin's sensitivity on Far Eastern matters owing to British relations with the Commonwealth.[15] Mr. Butterworth observed that the British consider that the French are pressing for Western solidarity in respect to the Far East and are using the technique of leaks to the press to force a US declaration on the subject. The British, he pursued, are embarrassed, having been pleased by the tensile strength of the Commonwealth demonstrated at the Colombo Conference, which they would not wish to see jeopardized.

Ambassador Jessup next considered the question of appointing a US official for the area who would in a sense be an opposite number to Mr. Malcolm MacDonald. He recalled that Messrs. Case and Fosdick and he were strongly in favor of such a step. MacDonald had urged in Singapore that we have such an official who could deal with him. MacDonald had observed that Consul General Langdon in Singapore is geared into the work of his office and is a good official but is unable to speak for the United States with respect to the whole area. Ambassador Jessup recalled, however, that the Bangkok Conference had been unanimously against him in this matter. The Conference had instead considered that a regional office of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development might be set up. The Conference believed that the local governments would rely heavily upon such an office which through its ability to offer unpalatable advice would be very useful in the area.

With respect to possible actions we might take, Ambassador Jessup observed that no single plan is possible since the sub-continent must be considered separately. He then took up the following specific matters:

1. A Japanese peace treaty is of prime importance and we should move on the matter as soon as possible. General MacArthur supports the Department's line. Admiral Toyoda had told Ambassador Jessup that there must be American bases in Japan. The position of the Occupation is all right today but will become more unsatisfactory as time passes. Ambassador Jessup reported that Nehru had expressed to him the view that maintenance of US troops in Japan would be acceptable if agreed to by the Japanese.

2. With regard to a settlement in the sub-continent Ambassador Henderson is doing everything possible. A settlement is so vital that all our efforts are justified. In this connection Ambassador Jessup touched on the matter of the balance of power in Asia and the question whether India or Japan should be built up. The Bangkok Conference had concluded that it would be a mistake to build up India. For one thing, trouble with Pakistan would result.

[14] Documentation on the London Conference of the Foreign Ministers of the United States, the United Kingdom, and France, May 11–13, 1950, is scheduled for publication in volume III.

3. On the subject of China, Ambassador Jessup said that he had little to say since he did not visit the country. As for Formosa, Ambassador Jessup considered that the reports being received are in general accurate. Mistrust and backbiting are continuing under the Generalissimo. General Sun Li-jen [16] is in a pocket. He states that he has no authority over the air force and navy and has no one at "court" to espouse his cause. There is a great deal of bitterness among the Formosans towards the Chinese, but the independence movement means little in terms of action. Touching on the second thoughts of the governments which have recognized the Peiping regime, Ambassador Jessup recalled that the Governor General of Hong Kong had said that things had not worked out as well as had been hoped. MacDonald had confessed that difficulties had resulted in Southeast Asia. Officials in Rangoon had been miffed by the original Chinese Communist rebuff. In New Delhi Bajpai [17] had said that little progress in the development of relations was taking place and did not appear very happy about the situation. Liaquat Ali Khan in Karachi had stated that the Chinese Communist reply to Pakistan's overture was not considered a rebuff but that nothing was developing. Dening in the British Foreign Office thought that events were proceeding but had little evidence at present of any progress. Ambassador Jessup concluded that there was general disillusionment among the governments which had recognized the Peiping regime.

4. The movement towards some form of Asian association was considered by the Bangkok Conference to show no signs of strength but Prime Minister Phibun of Thailand had expressed the view that occasional meetings of the Southeast Asian Prime Ministers would be useful. Prime Minister Thakin Nu of Burma had spoken in favor of close relations among his country, Pakistan, India and Ceylon. No other Southeast Asian leaders had exhibited any enthusiasm at all for any form of association.

(At this point it was brought out that a heated discussion had taken place in the Bangkok Conference on the desirability of our drawing a military line in Indochina. The participants were split on the question of what the United States should do in the event of the Chinese Communists' invading the country, some foreseeing that active intervention on our part would lead to the third world war. The desirability of a statement on the subject by the United States Government was considered. Mr. Butterworth observed that we have called upon the Department of Defense for an estimate.) [18]

5. With regard to Point Four, Ambassador Jessup had found an encouraging amount of understanding on the part of the Southeast Asian governments which foresee real benefits accruing to their countries. Projects capable of producing a quick psychological effect as well as those designed to attain long-range results are both desirable in the view of the Bangkok Conference. The Conference considered that supervision would present difficulties. Sukarno,[19] who had talked to him after visiting Nehru, stressed the sensitivity of the Asians and opposed administration of the programs by the United States. Nehru's opinion was that we should help but not attempt to exert control. He recognized that we should have to see that the funds were effectively employed and thought that great tact on our part would be required. Ambassador Jessup regarded the question of attaching strings and conditions as an important one. He had been impressed by the work of the Joint Commission for Rural Reconstruction and recommended that it be taken as a pattern. Training in government administration would be a good field for Point Four technical assistance. It would be important, for example, for us to help with problems of tax collection. We must make sure that our efforts are unified. Our posts in the field are baffled by the multiplicity of missions which had been arriving. Moreover, large missions excite local suspicions. In some countries a 40-man mission would be regarded as tantamount to an invasion. Ambassador Jessup had received the impression that there are many people running around and very little is happening. We should recognize both the difficulty and the importance of obtaining qualified personnel for technical missions. Ambassador Jessup found that Japanese personnel would be generally welcomed outside of Korea, Malaya and the Philippines.

Mr. Thorp raised the question of what use we could make of the United Nations in the field of technical assistance. Mr. Butterworth commented that the IBRD should prove especially useful since the governments in the East would take advice from it which they would resent coming from us.

6. Ambassador Jessup considered that we are weak on propaganda. He raised the question of whom we are trying to reach and recommended that more thought be given to methods of reaching our audience and to the themes we are trying to put across. The story of the Joint Commission for Rural Reconstruction should certainly be told and could be very effective. Representatives of American labor like Jim Carey[20] should be sent to the Far East. While in Karachi Ambassador Jessup had found the bookstalls filled with Communist literature. There were few American books and these were high-priced. Mr. Fosdick interpolated that he had found that there was a restriction on second class mail to China under a post office regulation of November 4, 1949. Mr. Butterworth suggested that Communist China had probably refused to meet its obligations under the International Postal Union. Ambassador Jessup stated that the way must be found to solve this problem.

7. As a final point Ambassador Jessup brought up the problem of coordination among United States agencies. This is especially important with respect to the Departments of State and Defense. He noted in this connection that some of our air attachés feel that they must fly around the area to show the flag after the manner of the Navy, but are unaware of the construction that may be put upon some of their activities.

[19] President of the United States of Indonesia.

[20] James B. Carey, president of the International Union of Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers, Congress of Industrial Organization.

In conclusion Ambassador Jessup offered the view that the situation in the East is bad but not desperate. The area cannot be written off. We are committed. Burma and Indochina are key points. Indian-Pakistan relations are a critical point. Short-range efforts on our part are indicated but must be fitted into an over-all plan. Much depends upon the situation in China of which a careful estimate is required. The Southeast Asian governments are not encouraged by developments in Peiping and the Peiping government itself is in difficulties.

In reply to a question from the Secretary with respect to the outlook for Formosa, Ambassador Jessup offered the opinion that if the Generalissimo is content to hold the present position, to stop the bombing, and to call off the blockade, the national government could hold out on Formosa much longer than would otherwise be the case. These activities are doubtless designed to assist the Nationalist lobby here in the United States. While the Chinese Nationalist air force is fairly efficient, our military attachés say that the armed forces are not very good. Sun Li-jen had indicated to Ambassador Jessup that there are far too many troops and that he cannot equip them. For example, many of the pill-boxes which have been constructed are without machine guns. The situation on Formosa is much like what it used to be on the mainland, with the subordinates not knowing what cards the Generalissimo holds. While doubting that there will be a turnover to the Communists on the island unless an important figure in the National government defects with his troops, Ambassador Jessup considered that Chiang could never pull the Chinese together, and observed that in the universal Asian view Chiang is discredited.

Memorandum by Mr. Samuel T. Parelman[1] to the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Merchant)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] April 12, 1950.

Subject: Status of Section 303 Proposals

1. Indochina Military Assistance (Approved by the President 3–10–50).[2]

Pursuant to advice from the Bureau of the Budget that they would consider making an allocation on the basis of any emergency items which were required immediately for Indochina, a letter was transmitted today by S/MDA to the Bureau requesting the allocation of $15 million.[3] Of this total, $10 million will cover the C–54's, the 37 mm.

ammunition and certain Navy items which have been requested on an emergency basis. The balance of $5 million is for certain ground force items which are going to be necessary.

2. Indonesia Military Assistance (Approved by the President 1–9–50).[4]

The Department of Defense transmitted to S/MDA today its recommended program for military assistance which totals slightly less than $5 million. A request for an allocation of $5 million is being included along with the aforementioned Indochina amount in the letter to the Bureau of the Budget. At the request of the Department of Defense, a telegram was transmitted to Djakarta requesting further detailed information with respect to certain items of equipment which was necessary before actual supply assignments could be completed.[5]

3. Indochina Economic Assistance.

The Memorandum to the President was made available to the Secretary yesterday to obtain the Secretary's approval for the proposed initial program of economic assistance to Indochina in the amount of $5 million which is to be administered by ECA.[6] Inasmuch as the Department of Defense has not objected to this project but has expressed doubts that the 303 fund should be so expended, the presentation of this project to the President will serve to make clear the President's views as to the use of these funds for other than military purposes.

4. Korea Supplemental Military Assistance.

The proposal for a program under Section 303 of $9.8 million to supplement the regular Military Assistance Program for Korea was discussed with Defense at the top level with the result that Defense has advised us (April 5, 1950) that "there appears to be no military necessity for an increase in the fiscal year 1950 MDA Program for Korea at this time."[7] They wish to be advised if State anticipates, for political reasons, recommending the revision of NSC 8/2[8] to provide for increased Korean military strength. We are awaiting the return of Ambassador Muccio[9] before proceeding further with the proposal.

5. Thailand Military Assistance (Approved by the President 3–10–50).[10]

Revised proposals for assistance received from Ambassador Stanton are being reviewed by Defense preparatory to their submitting a program to FMACC. The Embassy has been cautioned about premature release by Thai Government of information on the program.

6. Burma River Patrol Project.

Pursuant to advice received from the military as to the availability of shallow draft vessels, the mission has been queried by the Department as to the feasibility of using the available vessels. The mission has informed us that there are some technical problems and they will advise us further.

7. Burma Country Program (Other than River Patrol Project).

This has been discussed informally with Defense and in view of their attitude with respect to projects other than military, it is being held in abeyance pending a decision by the Secretary and the President relative to the pilot economic project being submitted for Indochina.

8. Expanded Food and Anti-Malaria Program for Southeast and South Asia.

This program, which was transmitted to the Deputy Under Secretary's office on March 29, is also being held in abeyance pending the action taken on the pilot project for Indochina. This program, which totals $17.5 million, includes $8.3 million for the rice program and $9.2 million for the anti-malaria program. There are some questions as to the size of the program and its applicability as an emergency program to certain of the countries. It was intended that these programs would be undertaken in Thailand, the Indochinese states, Indonesia, Afghanistan, India, Pakistan and for the rice program alone, the Philippines.

9. Expanded Propaganda Program for Southeast and South Asia.

The various projects proposed under this heading have been undergoing a process of refinement in the P area based on the latest developments in the Far East and the availability of funds under the regular program.

10. Other.

S/MDA was asked by G to take action to have appropriate language inserted in the amendments to the MDA Act in order to make the balance of the present Section 303 funds available for obligation in the fiscal year 1951 and to plan to seek new obligational authority in an amount sufficient to build the fund up to $75 million for 1951. It is planned that this matter will be discussed with the Secretary and the President before the suggested legislation is introduced.

FE and L are collaborating in the development of appropriate intergovernmental agreements or notes in connection with assistance provided to other countries under Section 303.

Recommendations on programs of assistance to the countries of Southeast Asia have been received from the Griffin Mission with respect to Indochina, Thailand, Malaya and Burma. The Indochina proposals are included in the material mentioned under Item 3 above. The Burma proposals are similar to the material included in the item under 7 above, and the Thailand and Malaya proposals are now under study in the Department.

The Ambassador in Thailand (Stanton) to the Secretary of State

[Extracts]

SECRET BANGKOK, April 12, 1950—10 a. m.

319. From Griffin. After extensive discussion American Embassy, UN Thai officials and American businessmen, following conclusions reached: [1]

I. Political Factors

A. Thailand, oldest free independent country SEA, possesses high degree administrative stability continuity not seriously affected by recent political turnovers. Country's stability not seriously threatened by traditional political rivals. Neither two opposition groups pro-Communist or anti-American or likely threaten present government near future. Government anxious cooperate with West, particularly, US.

B. Thailand like rest SEA threatened by Communist imperialism controlled from China, which makes no secret designs SEA.

Principal factors

(1) Large Chinese minority about 3 million dominating important segment country's economy and susceptible use by Peiping Government which already exerting pressure.

(2) Urgent Communist China need Thai rice.

(3) Possible opportunistic switch by Thai people if feeling develops Communist victory inevitable and West support too little and too late.

(4) Possibility Communists will bypass Burma, IC attempting seize Thailand first.

[1] For the text of the report prepared by the Griffin Mission during and after its visit to Thailand, April 4–12, regarding the needs of that nation for economic and technical aid, see Hayes, The Griffin Mission, pp. 223–267.

C. Immediate economic aid definitely needed achieve US political objectives Thailand for following reasons:

(1) Improvement conditions people will make them less susceptible Communist propaganda and convince them our interest based genuine good will.
(2) Position Thailand strengthened through encouraging non-Communist Chinese resist pressure threats blandishments of Chinese Communists.
(3) Strengthening Thai economy lessens chance Communists' efforts seize control before Burma IC.
(4) Aid will not be opposed by Thai opposition parties.
(5) Aid will convince Thai they not abandoned by West, thus reducing chances opportunistic volte-face.
(6) Due large number visitors missions talking economic aid in last months and due non-materialization, many Thai regard aid plans as so much talk. Actual aid now necessary politically to fulfill some expectations and hopes.

D. Serious deterioration in Thailand unrelieved by sizeable US-Western aid, would likely start wave defeatism in all SEA. Aid to Thailand obviously in accord our expressed interest independent nations SEA.

II. Economic Factors

A. Thai economy based principally on rice although country important exporter of tin, rubber, teak. Country has no capital goods industries and no large-scale production of consumer goods.

B. Steady and increased flow rice from Thailand vital political stability in Asia and hence of great US concern. Moreover, Chinese Communist eyes certainly set on Thailand and make it undoubted economic prize in SEA.

C. Thai favorable dollar trade balance in 1949 of about 33 million due primarily ECA rice purchases for China; with cessation such purchases Thai now estimate total official 1950 dollar income only about 12 million with estimated necessary dollar expenditures 32 million although Embassy estimates 14 and 26 million respectively. Thailand, while ostensibly enjoying relatively prosperous economy, unable pay substantial dollars for capital goods, equipment and services, thus seriously handicapping rehabilitation development. Moreover, UK unable promptly supply capital goods and equipment urgently needed. Only speedy solution for resulting bottle-necks is dollar assistance.

D. Notable shortage Thai officials trained and experienced economic planning administration and organization and Thai earnestly desirous assistance these fields. US technical advisers would have immediate political and economic effect particularly in convincing Thai we seriously interested their independence and welfare.

E. Substantial requirements remain resulting from wartime demolition deterioration not yet replaced. Some US demolition including Bangkok power.

[Here follow Part III, Program recommendations; Part IV, Local currency for program; and Part V, Field organizations.]

VI. Urgency of Action

Although emergency comparable IC and Burma not existing here, nevertheless, immediate start implementing recommendations imperative both for political effect on government and people and to indicate reality American protestations of interest welfare this country. Precise character some projects subject modification, but less than in neighboring countries. First personnel arriving for programs should be competent continue planning help negotiate project agreements and be prepared remain on job. Although limitations authority this mission carefully explained, nevertheless, Thai officials expect earliest action and top planning and operating personnel should arrive within 90 days at outside.

Representatives American Embassy have participated practically every meeting with Thai officials and drafting this cable. Total contents this cable discussed with Ambassador Stanton who concurs. [Griffin.]

SECRET CANBERRA, April 21, 1950—10 a. m.

120. I am much heartened by Deptel 79 April 19, the substance of which I communicated to Spender yesterday. (I of course refrained from mentioning the clause in next to last paragraph concerning "impression received by Butterworth and Jessup of lack of indigenous interest" in pact.) Spender expressed appreciation and I hope and believe this interim message will be regarded by Australian Government as creating a favorable atmosphere in which to treat specific problems of mutual concern to the two governments.

Yesterday before receipt Deptel 79, Spender had told me that Australians would send representative (probably Burton) to Baguio Conference. Said during recent visit Manila he had discussed conference with Quirino, who emphasized cultural and economic cooperation and played down military aspect despite Spender's strongly expressed interest in latter. Spender's reversal of decision reported in Embtel 62 March 2[1] is clearly intended as friendly gesture toward US. He evidently doubts as much as before whether Conference will serve useful purpose. (Foregoing may perhaps have bearing on forecast re Baguio stated in next to last paragraph Deptel 79.)

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk) to the Under Secretary of State (Webb)

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] April 25, 1950.

Subject: Budgetary Plans for Fiscal Year 1951 for Assistance to Countries Eligible Under Section 303 of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act.

For purposes of presenting to the Bureau of the Budget estimates of funds necessary to carry out the Mutual Defense Assistance Program for fiscal year 1951, it is necessary that S/MDA be provided with a firm estimate covering the cost of military assistance to countries eligible under Section 303 of PL 329.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff, in a memorandum recently forwarded by Secretary Johnson to the Department,[1] has recommended that the Administration seek obligational authority in the amount of $100 million for fiscal year 1951 to cover the cost of military assistance to certain countries in the Far East.This estimate of requirements by the Department of Defense assumes that such funds will be devoted to military assistance only.

As you know, out of the existing $75 million fund appropriated under Section 303 for this fiscal year, $36.5 million have been reserved by the President for military assistance projects in Indonesia, Indo-China, Thailand and Japan. These projects are moving forward. In addition, we are seeking an allocation of $5 million from 303 funds for the first installment of ECA operations in Indo-China, to complement the military assistance program by means of rural rehabilitation projects in liberated areas, in accordance with the Griffin Mission recommendations. Present tentative plans for the use of the remainder of the $75 million fund are as follows: an increase in the amount reserved for military assistance to Indo-China; allocations to initiate economic assistance projects in Burma, Thailand, Malaya, and possibly Indonesia, in accordance with the recommendations of the Griffin Mission.

As in the case of the proposed ECA project in Indo-China, it is contemplated that the funds to continue economic programs in these other countries during fiscal year 1951 will come from the unexpended balance of the China Aid fund, approximately $60 million of which will be available for use in the general area of China if legislation now pending is approved.

It is recommended that S/MDA be authorized to insert a figure of $100 million for fiscal year 1951 in the estimates to the Bureau of the Budget for MDAP in countries in the general area of China, upon the understanding with the Department of Defense that this amount, if appropriated, will be used primarily for military assistance and for the financing of any covert operations undertaken by the Central Intelligence Agency. Such an understanding between the Departments of State and Defense would not preclude the possibility that at a later date, after consultation between the two departments, this fund might be used for purposes other than military assistance or covert operations, if circumstances so required; and the requested legislation should be drafted so as to admit this possibility.

It is further recommended that you authorize the planning, together with ECA, for the utilization of the approximately $60 million unexpended China Aid funds for economic purposes in the general area of China during fiscal year 1951.

With regard to the portion of the existing $75 million fund unobligated as of June 30, 1950, we are planning to ask for a carryover under the general terms of the present legislation (Section 303 of Public Law 329), which would permit the expenditure of these monies for either military or economic projects.

Editorial Note

The South Pacific Commission, composed of representatives ("commissioners") of the Governments of Australia, France, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom, and the United States, was established in 1948. The Commission acted as a consultative and advisory body to the participating governments in matters affecting the economic and social development of the non-self-governing territories of the South Pacific region within the scope of the Commission and the welfare and advancement of their peoples.

Under the auspices of the South Pacific Commission, delegates from 14 non-self-governing territories (including American Samoa) met in Suva, Fiji, from April 25 to May 3, 1950. Members of the Commission attended solely as observers. The Conference arrived at a number of recommendations to the Commission on a variety of social and economic topics. In the opinion of the American observers, the Conference, without precedent in the South Pacific region, marked "the beginning of a program of combined endeavor among the island territories of inestimable significance for them."

The South Pacific Commission held its Fifth Session in Suva from May 11 to May 19, 1950. The Commission evaluated and reviewed the recommendations of the South Pacific Conference and also took up a number of organizational and administrative problems. The American Commissioners reported that the session was "a hard-working and harmonious one." The Commission held its Sixth Session in Noumea, New Caledonia, October 23–November 2, 1950. Considerable attention was given to the problem of developing a special technical assistance program for the South Pacific area.

Record of an Interdepartmental Meeting on the Far East at the Department of State, May 11, 1950, 11:30 a. m.[1]

CONFIDENTIAL

Mr. Rusk opened the meeting and expressed to Mr. Griffin the Department's gratitude for the very useful work his mission had accomplished.[2] Mr. Griffin listed the members of the Mission as follows:

Department of State:
Mr. Samuel P. Hayes, Jr.
Mr. William McAfee
J. C. White Engineering Co.—Mr. Henry Tarring
ECA—Dr. Raymond Moyer
Agriculture—Dr. Ross Moore
Public Health: Dr. Howard M. Klein

[1] Drafted by Windsor G. Hackler, executive staff officer, Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs.

[2] The Griffin Mission completed its work in Southeast Asia on April 22 in Indonesia and returned to Washington via Paris. On May 2, Griffin participated in a conference at the Department of State which dealt in large measure with the subjects under consideration at the May 11 meeting. His memorandum on the May 2 meeting is not printed except for his record of the discussion on Indochina, for which see p. 794.

The purpose of the Mission had been the development of a program of economic assistance on an emergency basis which would remove impediments to economic development in Southeast Asia and strengthen the governments there by making it possible for them to assist their peoples in economic rehabilitation. The Mission, Mr. Griffin said, also was charged with pointing out specific needs for technical assistance and advising on necessary consultants for top-level planning in the various countries. Mr. Griffin paid tribute to the industry and cooperation of the members of the Mission.

In Indochina the Mission had walked a very tight rope in an endeavor to avoid becoming involved in difficulties between the French and Bao Dai, between the French and Ho Chi-minh, and between Bao Dai and Ho Chi-minh. The Mission had travelled in the Red River area where the members saw the depravations [depredations] of Ho's forces. All of the buildings between villages have been destroyed and 40 to 60% of the buildings within villages in the Red River area have been demolished. The incidence of malaria and trachoma in the area had never been equaled. The people of the area who had been forced by the Viet Minh to flee to the hills were thoroughly antagonistic toward Ho Chi-minh but, on the other hand, have no love for the French.

Mr. Griffin described a welcoming arch leading to one of the villages in Indochina—"Communism, no; Colonialism, never". He said that this sentiment was characteristic of all of Southeast Asia but that it undoubtedly represented the spirit of at least 90% of all of the Indochinese. He commented favorably on recent articles in the New York Times by Mr. Sultzberger [3] concerning Indochina.

Mr. Griffin stated that in his judgment the French had not yet decided to make a success of Bao Dai while, at the same time, they realized that military means alone could not subdue Ho Chi-minh. While accepting the fact that the solution must be political, the French had not been working wholeheartedly to make a success of their chosen successor, that is, the Bao Dai government. Mr. Griffin described a meeting with the staff of M. Pignon, the French High Commissioner, which developed into an embarrassing wrangle over the possibility of U.S. technicians going to Indochina, the French pointing out that the March 8 agreements provided for exclusive French technical assistance. They had retreated from this position only at a later meeting. Mr. Griffin said that the French were slowly defeating Ho Chi-minh but at a vast expense to both the French and the U.S., with over 50% of the French Army in Indochina. Native armies being trained by the French have far to go before they become effective.

Mr. Griffin described the situation in Indochina as amorphous but urged the rapid dispatch of American teams into the field to test out the program just developed and work out on the spot relations with the French. He described as essential the immediate manifestation of American encouragement for Bao Dai and his people.

From Indochina the Mission travelled to Malaya where consultations were held with the British preparatory to visiting Burma. During long consultations with Mr. MacDonald, the British High Commissioner for Southeast Asia, Mr. Griffin learned that the British analyses of the situation in Indochina and in Southeast Asia as a whole were similar to those which he and his mission developed. The Burmese, MacDonald had informed him, do not wish to receive British technical or military advice, and the British Army mission in Burma never appears in public in uniform. In this connection, Mr. Griffin remarked that the U.S. military personnel in the area would be well advised to follow this precedent and put a stop to the unnecessary display of American military uniforms.

Mr. Griffin described the Burmese government as unstable and cockeyed, unprepared and shaky. Nonetheless, he had not found the situation as bad as he had expected it to be. The depravations [depredations] of the "bandits" had not been nearly so severe or permanent as the guerrilla operations in other parts of Southeast Asia. The opposition is not terroristic nor anti-foreign. Mr. Griffin felt that stabilization could be achieved, both rapidly and satisfactorily, in Burma if a change of attitude on the part of the government could be brought about. Following gentle persuasion by the Griffin Mission, the Burmese government finally submitted the exact proposal for economic assistance which the Mission had wanted it to do. Mr. Griffin stated that this proposal could be implemented by the U.S., certainly not by the British, and might well prove to be the necessary element which would lead to rapid improvement in the whole situation in Burma.

The situation in Thailand had been much more encouraging. The Mission developed very quickly successful team work relationships with officers of the Embassy at Bangkok. The program for Thailand had been designed to help retain the present favorable conditions and to prevent the development of crises. A critical problem in Thailand is the powerful Chinese minority.

Many disappointments had been found in Indonesia, Mr. Griffin reported. The Indonesians, like other Southeast Asian peoples, had not been prepared for self-government and recognized the need for moral leadership and skills from the West. Indonesian leaders had expressed their concern over the departure of experienced Dutch personnel. Originally, the Mission had been favorably impressed with the Dutch in Indonesia and had considered the desirability of subsidizing Dutch efforts. The original impression, however, had been gradually overcome when it was discovered that the Dutch would not recommend any proposals for improvement until "law and order" had been established. No justification had been prepared by either the Dutch or the Indonesians for projects under the $100 million Export-Import Bank loan.

Ambassador Cochran had arranged a conference for Mr. Griffin with Mr. Djuanda, Minister of Economic Affairs, who had confessed that he felt constantly frustrated by the lack of Dutch cooperation, although he admitted that there were some "good" Dutch who were trying to help. The small Indonesian government, Mr. Griffin found, was terribly overworked and he recommended the assignment of a top-level group of American engineers and planners, not to supersede the Dutch but to bridge the gap between the Indonesians and the Dutch advisers.

For both Burma and Indonesia, Mr. Griffin recommended the establishment of schools for training government administrators and suggested that they be located in Rangoon and Djakarta. He described the lack of trained bureaucrats and the pressing need to provide training for the young people in public administration.

Mr. Griffin reported that the members of the mission had not returned from its tour in a pessimistic frame of mind. They were hopeful that a small group of good men and the expenditure of small amounts of money could accomplish wonders in the area. Although some of the Southeast Asian governments had developed peculiar attitudes toward westerners and their neighbors, and although there was a very active hot war in Indochina, the situation in the area was not basically unsound. Mr. Griffin stated that it was most important that workmen-like groups be sent to the area and given authority to make adjustments in the program to fit changing conditions in the field.

In response to a question by Mr. Rusk, Mr. Griffin stated that men with enterprise, initiative and determination must be placed in charge of carrying out U.S. programs in the area and must be given full authority. He stated that the proposals and programs which his mission had developed will of necessity be changed as they are worked out, but he believed that the changes should be made in the field and reported to Washington, not requested. He said that the heads of the economic mission must be field commanders with general directives, and stated that the heads of our diplomatic missions in the area all feel the sense of great urgency.

Mr. Rusk then introduced Mr. McConaughy [4] who has just returned from his post as Consul General at Shanghai. Mr. McConaughy reported that the Russian influx into China is continuing and estimated that more than 3,000 Soviet agents have arrived straight from Moscow. At the time of his departure from Shanghai, Mr. McConaughy reported the trend in China was completely unpromising and he considered that the situation would deteriorate further. He believed, however, that a modicum of trade would probably continue with the West and that a few American businessmen and missionaries might be able to carry on in China for some time. The trend, however, was to squeeze out all Western influence.

Mr. McConaughy reported that the last word he had received from the American business community in Shanghai was the request that the U.S. Government prevent funds from being remitted to China from the U.S. While recognizing that the freezing of funds had many ramifications, the American businessmen believed that this help was needed to prevent their being held for ransom or as hostages. Mr. McConaughy suggested that the UN Commission on Human Rights might be the best forum for raising the issue of exit permits for foreigners desiring to leave China. He said that the Chinese Communists considered it a privilege and not a right to leave Communist China.

In conclusion, he stated his conviction that the top command of the Chinese Communists was thoroughly indoctrinated in Soviet theory and practice and completely loyal to Moscow. In the near future, therefore, he would expect all high policy to be directed by Moscow. Implementation, however, of the policy may well develop along Chinese lines as distinguished from Soviet practice.

SECRET BANGKOK, May 11, 1950—4 p. m.

410. Depcirtel May 4. 1. Seriously doubt whether formal conference on arms smuggling and suppression would achieve any practical results.

2. We believe that at formal conference countries would officially deny involvement. Therefore, extremely doubtful whether Thailand, for instance, would wish participate such conference since she would be one of principal targets of conference. Thailand, Philippines in particular more likely antagonized by holding formal conference and obviously without their willing cooperation, little can be achieved. Furthermore, while there has been considerable smuggling arms into Vietnam from Philippines through Thailand, main source supply such arms in future will almost certainly be Communist China. Regarding that source there is little conference could do. Stoppage arms smuggling from Philippines would be very limited benefits so long as arms can be poured across China–Indochina border.

3. My own feeling is much more can be accomplished by:

(a) Repeated strong but friendly diplomatic representations to Thai Government;
(b) Greater efforts on part French authorities reach working agreement with Thai Government on measures prevent smuggling (such effort about to be made by French Ambassador here);
(c) Further representations to Philippine Government prevent smuggling arms out of Philippines;
(d) We, British, French, tighten up own controls prevent smuggling arms.

4. Re reaction Thai Government do not believe government would welcome holding such conference here or would be particularly anxious participate for reasons mentioned above. Furthermore, must be borne in mind Thai Government decision recognize Bao Dai not popular and many Thailand still think of Ho Chi Minh as Nationalist fighting for independence against French. Therefore, strict enforcement measures stop arms smuggling not easy in face such public sentiment. Arms conference here rather pointedly aimed at Thailand and Philippines would not, we fear, make Thai Government's task any easier.

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] May 22, 1950.

Subject: Status of Problems Considered at the Foreign Ministers' Meetings.[1]

Out of the discussions held both bilaterally and trilaterally in Paris and London the following problems arose:

1. Paris bilateral talks with the French.[2] In discussing the situation in Indochina with Mr. Schuman the Secretary reiterated that American aid would not become a substitute for the basic French responsibility for that area. The Secretary indicated to Mr. Schuman that approximately $20 million would be made available by the United States for both economic and military aid during fiscal year 1950.

2. Trilateral Talks in London.

(a) Problem: In paragraphs 7 and 8 of Minute No. 1, agreed to by the United States and United Kingdom it was stated that the British and French have direct responsibility in Southeast Asia which make its security of even greater concern to them than to the United States. The United States has taken and will continue to take every

[1] The Foreign Ministers of the United States, the United Kingdom, and France met in London from May 11 to May 13, 1950, to discuss problems of common concern. These conversations were preceded by preliminary discussions which commenced on May 1. In addition to the tripartite sessions, United States officials participated in bilateral meetings with British and French Representatives. Aspects of the situation in the East Asian-Pacific area received consideration at various sessions. Documentation on the London Foreign Ministers Meeting and related discussions is scheduled for publication in volume III.

[2] Regarding the Acheson–Schuman discussions in Paris on May 8, see editorial note, p. 812.

diplomatic action which appears practicable to defend Southeast Asia against further Communist encroachment. The United States is also prepared to accord military aid within its capabilities and is examining the possibility of according economic aid to Indochina and certain other parts of Southeast Asia.

Action: The United States plans for both economic and military assistance are well advanced. $13 million has been allocated by the President under 303 for military assistance to Indonesia and Indochina. Supply action has begun on military aid for Indochina and the first shipment may take place within thirty days, depending upon French clarification of certain details. The President has approved $750 thousand for economic assistance to Indochina and the Chief of the ECA Mission will arrive at Saigon on May 24. The Governments of the three states will be notified on that date of the establishment of the ECA Mission to Indochina.

(b) Problem: In sub-paragraph (a) of Minute No. 2 which was agreed to by all three delegations it was recognized that there is a considerable amount of arms smuggling taking place from Thailand which aids the Vietminh forces. It was suggested that the French, the United States and the United Kingdom Ambassadors in Bangkok should be instructed to meet together to discuss ways and means of influencing the Thai Government to exercise more strict control over the smuggling of arms into and out of Thailand. Likewise, it was recommended that the Philippine Government be approached by the United States Government on the same subject.

Action: The Department on May 22 instructed the United States Ambassador at Bangkok of the suggestion outlined above and directed him in conjunction with the Ambassadors of the United Kingdom and France to investigate means of controlling the arms traffic from Thailand into Indochina. The Department has also instructed the United States Ambassador at Manila to approach the Philippine Government along the same lines to prevent further arms traffic from the Philippines.

(c) Problem: Under Minute No. 2 which was agreed to by all three delegations it was suggested that the three Governments should seek to coordinate their policy on exposing and combatting Communist propaganda through consultation between their appropriate authorities in the area.

Action: The United States Legation at Saigon has been instructed to coordinate USIE efforts with the French authorities and with the State governments in order to publicize captured documents and expose the aims and designs of the Communists in Indochina.

3. Conclusion:

Arising out of the foregoing agreements the United States is committed to extend political, economic and military assistance to Southeast Asia. No specific sums of money nor timetable have been promised. It is important to note that both the French and the British Governments are on record that the security of Southeast Asia is primarily their responsibility and that the United States assistance will be supplementary only. United States military assistance to Indochina specifically has been delayed because of confusing French requests and lack of clarity in French planning. The United States is prepared to act quickly if the details of military assistance are worked out between French authorities at Paris and the United States military aid group Paris and the French and Vietnamese authorities in Indochina. Economic assistance to Indochina should be able to develop rapidly if the ECA Mission produces a firm program which will be suitable for supporting a request for additional funds.

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] June 1, 1950.

MEMORANDUM FOR MAJOR GENERAL LYMAN L. LEMNITZER [1]
DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE
MR. EDWARD T. DICKINSON [2]
ECONOMIC COOPERATION ADMINISTRATION

Subject: Implementation of and Planning for Section 303 Programs

Reference is made to previous discussions between officials of the Departments of State and Defense and within the FMACC [3] regarding the provision of military assistance under Section 303 of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act to certain Southeast Asian nations.

Of the $75,000,000 appropriated to the President under Section 303, the President has approved the reservation of $15,000,000 for military aid to Indochina, $10,000,000 for military aid to Thailand, and $5,000,000 for military aid to Indonesia. Of these amounts, $10,000,000 has been allocated for Indochina and $3,000,000 for Indonesia. In addition, $6½ million has been allocated for certain installations in Japan, and $3½ million for aid to Burma. Thus, $40,000,000 has so far been earmarked or allocated for military aid purposes. In addition to the foregoing, $750,000 has been allocated by the President for an economic program in Indochina.

It is understood that our agencies are in agreement at this time that the balance of funds not earmarked or allocated ($34,250,000) should be apportioned for planning purposes and subject, of course, to Presidential approval as follows: $13,750,000 is to be utilized for non-military programs or held in reserve. In FMACC planning for additional or estimated programs of military aid in this area, the balance of $20,500,000 should be contemplated as available therefor. In addition to this sum, we are, as you know, seeking additional funds in the amount of $75,000,000 in the proposed 1951 Mutual Defense Assistance Program for Section 303 purposes. All agencies involved are agreed that those funds which are allocated, or proposed to be allocated for military aid should be administered through the FMACC in the same manner as other military aid programs under the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949. As you are aware, the President, in making the allocations referred to, has signified that such was his desire.

It is generally agreed that in order effectively to implement the programs so far developed and effectively to plan as to further military assistance in this area, it is necessary and desirable that a survey mission be sent to Southeast Asia as soon as possible. It is accordingly proposed that such a mission, under the auspices of the FMACC, be organized and, subject to FMACC instructions, depart if possible not later than June 15, 1950. There will be transmitted to you separately, a memorandum setting forth the terms of reference which we suggest should be adopted by the FMACC and incorporated as a directive to the survey mission. The views of the Department of Defense and the ECA thereon are solicited.

It is also apparent from the discussions which have taken place to date that there will be a need for United States military personnel to be attached to the United States Missions in Indochina, Thailand, Indonesia and Burma, to assist in the implementation of the military aid programs for those countries. While the exact size and composition of personnel requirement and the precise organizational arrangements involved cannot be definitively determined at this moment, it is believed that there is a sufficient basis of knowledge to permit the initiation of action in the Department of Defense looking toward the procurement and making available of at least key personnel for these purposes. It is urged that such action be taken.

In the period intervening the establishment of permanent personnel and organizational arrangements, it will undoubtedly be necessary to make interim arrangements for such personnel as are necessary for supply and training action in these countries. It would be appreciated if the Department of Defense would undertake to develop proposals for handling this situation as soon as possible. Due to the complex political factors involved therein, such proposals should receive the concurrence of this Department prior to their implementation.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Officer in Charge of Philippine Affairs (Melby)

RESTRICTED [WASHINGTON,] June 15, 1950.

Subject: Baguio Conference [1]

Participants: Brigadier General Carlos P. Romulo, Secretary for Foreign Affairs, Philippines
Joaquin Elizalde, Philippine Ambassador
Dean Rusk—FE
William Lacy—PSA
John Melby—PSA

In a conversation this noon, General Romulo outlined the work and accomplishments of the Baguio conference in the following terms:

[1] The Baguio Conference, May 26–30, was attended by representatives of India, Indonesia, the Philippines, Australia, Ceylon, Pakistan, and Thailand.

He stated at the outset that as he had anticipated there was considerable suspicion concerning the real purposes of the conference among most of the delegates who feared it as an American trick. In this sense, he believed the conference was a great success in that he was able to disabuse the delegates not only on this point but also concerning their doubts about American intentions and activities in the Philippines. He said he was able to explain the underlying philosophy of the Bell Trade Act [2] and the accomplishments of the various rehabilitation programs, and thus to demonstrate that there has been nothing sinister in American activities. He also said that the delegates, including Australia, were unanimously critical of the American press as presenting an unfavorable picture of their respective countries.

He outlined the specific work of the conference as follows:

(1) Under instructions from President Quirino he proposed the inclusion of Nationalist China and South Korea since it had previously been agreed that all decisions would be unanimous. As India, Pakistan, and Indonesia opposed this proposal it failed. Romulo said he then raised the question of observers and the same three countries again opposed.

(2) Vietnam. An unnamed delegate proposed that a Commission composed of three members of the conference be named to investigate the situation in Vietnam. Romulo said he was able to sidetrack this question, but he pointed out that not a single delegate, not even Thailand or Australia who had recognized Bao Dai had a good word to say for him. Romulo said the Australian delegate explained Australian recognition of Bao Dai as having come about at a time when there was a change of government in Australia and anything done by the previous government is almost automatically reversed by the new one which has particularly close relations with London. Romulo then went on to add that after talking with various Asiatic representatives his own views on Bao Dai remained as he had expressed them in his letter to the Secretary of State.[3]

(3) Formosa. An unnamed delegate suggested that since the consensus among those present was against imperialism, consideration should be given to the question of Formosa where Nationalist China was playing an imperialist role in denying the legitimate aspirations of the Formosan people for autonomy and independence. Romulo claims that he also succeeded in sidetracking this issue.

(4) Communist China. According to Romulo, India raised the question of the recognition of Communist China as the legitimate government. Romulo stated that he at once pointed out the impossibility for the Philippines now or in the predictable future to recognize Communist China because of its behavior and aggressive intentions, and that this question therefore also came to nothing. Despite what appeared to have been a series of inconclusive debates on specific topics, Romulo reasserted his belief that the conference had been a success because he was able to strengthen the prestige and influence of the United States in the area, and that this fact, combined with the hands off attitude of the United States, had redounded to the American benefit.

Memorandum by the Under Secretary of State (Webb) to the President

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] June 21, 1950.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRESIDENT

Subject: Allocation of Funds to Provide an Intensified Program of Information and Educational Exchange for Southeast and South Asia under Section 303 of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act.

The Department of State recommends that an intensified program of information and educational exchange be undertaken immediately in the countries of Southeast and South Asia to acquaint those countries with the policies of the United States and to explain United States' programs of military and economic aid to their peoples and governments. An important part of this information program will be concerned with the true nature of Communism and its threat to the independence of those countries through aggression from without and subversive activities from within.

While it is clear that a major responsibility for attaining the objectives of the total program rests with the governments concerned, the Department of State recognizes that no local governments are equipped to perform the informational task. Nor can the Department of State undertake an expanded program on the scale required in this crucial area within the limits of the modest appropriation available for its overseas information and education program. In this connection it will be recalled that you, on December 30, 1949, approved the conclusions of the National Security Council on "The Position of the United States with Respect to Asia" (NSC 48/2) which included the following statement (3–k):

"The United States should undertake an information program, both foreign and domestic, and publish United States' policies and programs vis-à-vis Asia designed to gain maximum support both at home and abroad."

It is therefore requested that you at this time approve an intensified program of information and educational exchange for Southeast and South Asia, and that the amount of $2,930,000 be allocated immediately for this purpose under Section 303 of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act.[1] This program would be administered by the Secretary of State under the provisions of Public Law No. 402.[2]

These funds would permit the immediate expansion of the information program in this critical area. The estimates provided herein (Annex B)[3] are the nearest that could be made at this time and are based on the assumption that Congress will authorize the carry-over of unobligated Section 303 funds into fiscal 1951. It is anticipated that this allocation will be sufficient to carry the intensified program in Asia until the Congress acts on the supplemental information appropriation for fiscal 1951 which you already have approved in principle for submission to Congress.

It is anticipated that a substantial part of the funds would be obligated before the end of this fiscal year for the purchase of supplies and equipment which are urgently needed in overseas operations and for which sufficient field staff is available to provide immediate utilization. This will provide an immediate impact on the peoples of the area.

Details of the proposed intensified programs are given in Annexes A and B.

JAMES E. WEBB

Annex A

Memorandum Prepared in the Department of State

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON, June 21, 1950.]

INTENSIFIED INFORMATION PROGRAM FOR SOUTHEAST AND SOUTH ASIA

An intensified information program for Southeast and South Asia is recommended because of the increasing communist threat to this area and the generally meager knowledge and understanding of the United States on the part of the peoples of this area. An intensified information program must be undertaken simultaneously with our economic and military assistance programs if the United States is to obtain maximum value from its efforts in the area.

Practically all of these countries are young in political and economic developments. The level of literacy is low, as is the standard of living. Communications are poor. The national governments lack adequate funds and trained personnel for widespread public education and information programs. Comparatively few nationals understand the current policies of the United States or the history and tradition of this country.

[1] In a letter of July 5, President Truman notified the Secretary of State that he had approved the request (511.90/7–550).

[2] Reference is to the United States Information and Educational Exchange Act of 1948—the Smith–Mundt Act (62 Stat. 6).

[3] Not printed.

Communist-controlled areas border most of these countries. Indigenous Communist movements are known to exist within their borders. Communist propaganda bitterly denounces the United States and its policies with regard to those countries. The start of military and economic assistance programs will be grossly misrepresented by Moscow and by local Communist groups. If our aid in military and economic terms is to be understood and accepted, it is vital that means be provided for explaining the purpose of this aid and the objectives of the United States.

The Department's overseas information and educational exchange program is operating on a limited scale in the major cities of the area. If the American story is to reach any considerable part of the population, the present program must be expanded and adapted to meet local needs.

The Special Economic Mission, headed by Robert Allen Griffin, cited the need for an intensified effort in information and educational exchanges to accompany economic assistance to the countries in this area.

The Voice of America must be expanded so that it will reach a larger number of people in the area in their own languages. Motion pictures, film-strips and other visual materials should reach far greater numbers of persons unable to read than in the past. News bulletins, features, pamphlets and books must be made available in the local languages. While all means possible should be used to spread information about the United States and to counter Communist propaganda as quickly as possible, the long-term objectives of the program must also be maintained. Through special aids to local education, particularly through the Department's Exchange of Persons program, every effort should be made to improve general education and to help train the leaders and students in these countries.

Detailed proposals for expanding all of the above activities in the area are contained in the attached document (Annex B).

Editorial Note

On June 25, 1950, North Korean forces invaded the Republic of Korea. On June 27, the United Nations Security Council approved a United States resolution recommending that members of the United Nations furnish assistance to the Republic of Korea to repel the armed attack. The same day, President Truman issued a statement indicating that he had ordered United States air and sea forces to give support to troops of the Republic of Korea. The President also announced that he had ordered the United States Seventh Fleet to prevent attacks on or from Formosa, the strengthening of United States forces in the Philippines, and the acceleration of military assistance to Indochina. Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Philippine and Southeast Asian Affairs (Lacy) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk) and Mr. Merrill C. Gay, Special Assistant to Mr. Rusk

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] June 30, 1950.

Subject: Funds for Griffin Mission Programs

I suggest that an early item of business for the new SEA Coordinating Committee might be to consider requesting additional funds from Congress to permit implementation of the Griffin programs in substantially their original magnitude.

It is not so much that I regard full implementation of the programs as a vital contribution to today's problems in Southeast Asia, but rather that default on them would be extremely undesirable after all the publicity received by the Mission and by the ECA.

The present position is apparently as follows: The original Griffin recommendations for Burma, Thailand, Indochina and Indonesia total over $60 million. Last week approximately $46 million seemed to be in hand from residual China aid moneys, in addition to the small Section 303 contribution, but of this sum the ECA chief in Saigon has publicly committed $23.5 million for Indochina. His action has already required, at least for planning purposes, a cut of approximately 40 percent in the programs originally proposed for Burma, Thailand and Indonesia.

These cuts could be tolerated last week. They are now increasingly obnoxious in view of the changed political situation, in view of SOA's insistent position that the Burmese program should be restored to the original figure, and in view of the danger that it may become possible, i.e., desirable, to spend more money in Formosa.[1]

1. Terms of Reference of Joint MDAP Survey Mission to Southeast Asia

The Committee approved, subject to certain additions, a draft of the terms of reference of the SEA Survey Mission. The terms of reference as approved will be distributed as FMACC D–29.[2]

2. Briefing of Southeast Asia Survey Mission

The meeting was called to brief the members of the Survey Team on the general political, military and economic situations existent in the countries of Southeast Asia, in order that the objectives of the Mission may be placed properly within the perspective of our policies in the area. A more detailed briefing will be supplied to the Team prior to its departure. The Mission will also be furnished certain written material, notably Mr. Kenneth Landon's[3] despatches transmitted during his recent trip to the area and the appropriate State Department country policy studies.

A. POLITICAL ASPECTS

Mr. William Lacy, Acting Director of the State Department's Office of Philippine and Southeast Asian Affairs, presented a brief outline of our political objectives in the area. He pointed out that the region is of the highest political importance to the West for three principal reasons:

(a) Frustrating the Communists in their attempt to obtain control of Southeast Asia will help to frustrate also their plans for complete control of the Asiatic mainland, and indeed weaken the degree of control they already have, by preventing their exploitation and acquisition of the area's food, raw materials and industrial products;
(b) Events in Southeast Asia will influence the course of future events in the rest of Asia and in other parts of the world;
(c) The economic importance of Southeast Asia to the U.S. was forcibly demonstrated during the last war, when we experienced serious shortages of critical materials produced in that area.

The attainment of political and economic stability in Southeast Asia depends in large part upon the establishment of adequate military forces within each of the countries in the area. The problem, therefore, is the proper integration of our political, economic and military policies conducive to the attainment of those objectives. Mr. Lacy pointed out that in all of the Southeast countries except Indo-China the local nationalist movement is non-Communist. A strong anti-Communist attitude is developing also, particularly amongst people who have experienced the rigors of Communist rule. A resolute pursuit of our political, economic and military programs will encourage the further development of that attitude and conversely induce a stronger inclination toward the West.

[2] Not printed. For the terms of reference and composition of the mission, see telegram 1 to Saigon, July 1, infra, and telegram 14 to Saigon, July 5, p. 114.
[3] Mr. Landon was a member of the staff of the Office of Philippine and Southeast Asian Affairs.

Mr. Lacy discussed the situation existing in each of the countries to be visited by the Mission:

(1) Indo-China—Here exists, from our viewpoint the worst situation in Southeast Asia. Strategically Indo-China is extremely important, since its fall to the Communists would encourage communization of the rest of Southeast Asia. Indo-China is the only Southeast Asian country where a nationalist movement was seized upon and exploited by the Communists. Our policy (which unfortunately does not have the whole-hearted support of the French) is to counter this Communist position by supporting Bao Dai, making whatever concessions are necessary to Indo-Chinese nationalism, and by so doing provide to him the stature necessary to remove the basis for the political incitation which is Ho Chih Minh's main weapon. A successful military operation in Indo-China is essential, however, for the achievement of this objective.

Mr. Lacy recalled to the Survey Team the fact that military control of Indo-China is vested in the French, against whom great resentment exists on the part of the local population. A difficult task of the Mission will be to impart to the Vietnamese the conviction that U.S. aid is being provided primarily for their benefit but at the same time not destroy French military expertise and control. (A more detailed account of the domestic political picture in Indo-China will be furnished to the Team before its departure.)

(2) Indonesia—The nationalist movement in Indonesia is anti-Communist, due in large part to the predominantly Muslim population. The leaders can be counted on if only because of their knowledge that their political positions depend upon their control of the nationalist movement and the suppression of Communist activity.

Military assistance to Indonesia will be of a type necessary for the maintenance of internal security. The chief problem, however, is to supply such assistance in a manner which will strengthen, and not weaken, the present Government. Soekarno presently is under fire because of his alleged pro-American proclivities.

(3) Thailand—In Thailand the Government is anti-Communist. The country is, however, still suffering socially and economically from the devastating effects of Japanese occupation—effects which are conducive to the growth of Communism. Our assistance will therefore be directed toward the maintenance of internal security.

(4) Malaya—There is as yet no nationalistic movement of serious proportions in Malaya. The difficulty there is caused by imported Chinese thugs who, by their guerrilla activities, are sabotaging Malaya's political economy. The British consider the problem to be of an essentially military nature, an approach with which we agree. The warfare in the country is extremely difficult and of the type which results in the pinning down of a great number of troops by a comparatively small number of guerrillas. A serious difficulty faced by the British is their inability to break the lines of communication between the guerrillas and their command posts, which apparently are under the direction of professional Communists established outside of Malaya.

(5) Burma—Mr. Elbert G. Mathews, Director of State Department's Office of South Asian Affairs, reported on the situation in Burma. The problem in Burma arises from the fact that even before that country achieved its independence from the UK the Anti-Fascist People's Freedom League (AFPFL), which dominates the make-up of the present government, had already begun to split up into various leftist groups, creating thereby a lack of political cohesiveness which still exists. Certain of these leftist groups, including the Communists, and minority groups desiring political autonomy, resorted to armed guerrilla activity.

The Burmese Government has done a good job within the past year in suppressing the guerrillas, and as a result the economic situation looks more hopeful. There has, however, been a recent very serious development. Some months ago Chinese Nationalist troops, fleeing from the Chinese Communists, crossed the Burmese border and established themselves in Kentung province. Recent reports indicate that those troops are in effect acting as an occupying force and refuse to be disarmed and interned. The Burmese Government is concerned that the Chinese Communists will follow the Nationalist troops into Burma, and has appealed to India to use its good offices to persuade the Chinese Communists not to take such action. It has also asked the U.S. to request the National Government on Formosa to order the Nationalist troops to disarm. It seems unlikely, however, that the troops would comply. The Burmese Government appears unable to cope with the situation, in view of its concentration of resources on the suppression of guerrilla activity.

Recalled also to the Mission's attention was the poor state of relations between the Burmese Army and the British Military Mission, which the Survey Team, if circumstances permit, might attempt to improve.

B. ECONOMIC ASPECTS

Mr. Harlan Cleveland,[4] ECA, presented a brief account of the economic situation in Southeast Asia and U.S. economic programs contemplated for the area.

Our economic programs in Southeast Asia will be based on the report of the Griffin Mission, and will be implemented by missions to be known as "STEM" (Special Technical and Economic Missions). He cautioned that this operation is not to be confused with the ECA.

Mr. Cleveland pointed out that the economic programs contemplated are related intimately to our aim to achieve political stability in Southern Asia, instill in the people a feeling of confidence in their governments, and encourage the area's continued orientation toward the West. Economic programs will encourage the attainment of these objectives by bringing real, and if possible immediate, economic benefits to large numbers of the inhabitants of the area.

Eighty percent of the population of Southeast Asia live in rural areas; the programs designed to benefit the majority must therefore be of a rural nature. This fact requires a change in the concept upon which ECA aid to highly developed countries was based, namely the concentration on supplying of a few bulk commodities and a resultant "seeping down" of economic benefits to the people. In Southeast Asia aid given must be direct, and of immediate benefit to large numbers of people. Primary emphasis will therefore be placed upon health, agricultural rehabilitation, and training and education programs.

There must also, however, be programs of a longer range nature, of a type to convince the people that their hopes for the future can be realized through cooperation with the West. Such programs will involve such things as advanced agricultural techniques and science, although, remembering the experience of the Joint Committee on Rural Reconstruction in China, some difficulty may be encountered in persuading the local farmers to adopt methods other than those traditionally used.

The fund available for Southeast Asia economic programs consists of $44 million for the "general area of China," from the $98 million unexpended from the China Aid fund. $54 million of the $98 million was earmarked by Congress for other purposes. The Griffin Mission reported that adequate programs for the area would require $61 million. However, because of the time needed for organization staffing, etc., the $44 million available may be sufficient for some time.

The "general areas of China" is defined, for economic program reasons, as Indo-China, Burma, Thailand, and Indonesia, Malaya not being included in view of the para-military nature of the equipment to be provided under the program for that country.

The "STEMs" in each country will be comparable to regular ECA Missions, although possessing a different staffing pattern. Each mission will consist of a number of specialists—primarily on health, agriculture and industry—with other types as needed to meet particular conditions in a given country.

Bilateral draft agreements, upon which the relations of the "STEMs" vis-à-vis the local government will be based, have been sent to the field. In Indo-China those relations will be with each of the native governments, not with the French.

The financing of a program is a particularly knotty problem, the limiting factor being not the lack of dollars but the lack of sufficient internal resources, which are necessarily concentrated on military needs. To meet the situation a change will be required in the ECA concept, as applied in Europe, that dollar financing can take place only when absolutely necessary. Dollars supplied under the SEA programs will be used to generate local currency (the payment of wages, etc.), to assure that sufficient internal resources will be available to permit proper use of equipment and materials supplied under the programs.

C. MILITARY ASPECTS

General Lemnitzer posed the main military problems with which the Mission will be faced, and outlined the functions it is expected to perform. A most important duty of the Mission will be to collect information upon which intelligent programs for the area and for each country in the area can be based. Until Military Advisory Groups are established in Southeast Asia reliance will necessarily be placed upon the intelligence brought back by the Survey Mission. Such information should include in part:

(a) The military plans of the governments of each country;
(b) The materiel presently available in each country or to be forthcoming from European sources;
(c) The facilities available for training of native troops;
(d) Requirements from the U.S.; (e) Priorities for supplying of U.S. equipment; and
(f) The type of country-level organization needed for proper implementation of programs, and the related question of the attitude of the local government as to numbers of U.S. personnel in such organizations.

Also a delicate position which the Mission must maintain in its discussions with European and native officials is the avoidance of any implication that the U.S. is prepared to assume European military responsibilities in the area.

General Lemnitzer raised also the public relations aspect of the Mission, feeling that a comprehensive statement of its function, etc., should be prepared for submission to the press. The matter was turned over to the FMACC Public Information Working Group, which will consult with Mr. Sargeant,[5] P, and Mr. Connors, FE, in the preparation of such a statement.

Mr. Bell mentioned also that the Mission should, through an explanation of the operating problems involved, make every effort to dissipate any expectation on the part of the countries visited that U.S. aid will be forthcoming almost immediately after the arrival of the Mission.

[5] Howland H. Sargeant, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs.

3. Bilateral Agreements With Southeast Asian Countries

Mr. Vigderman[6] pointed out that although legally no bilateral agreements are required on aid supplied under Section 303, we are in the process of obtaining such agreements for our own protection. The agreements follow the pattern of those consummated with NAT countries, varying only according to the type of aid to be supplied. (For an example of the provisions of such agreements see FMACC D–33/3, draft No. 2.)[7]

The following agreements are now in process:

Indonesia—We have received comments on a draft submitted to Djakarta, and the agreement will be ready for FMACC consideration shortly.

Indo-China—A draft has been sent to Saigon, upon which comment is awaited.

Burma—The first draft is in preparation.

Thailand—An FMACC-approved draft is ready for transmission to Embassy Bangkok for negotiations with the Thai Government.

Malaya—A draft agreement has not yet been prepared, in view of the lack of a firm program and allocation.

Mr. Dickinson, on the basis of ECA's experience, commented that, because of a possible charge of exploitation, the strategic materials and local currency provisions may give rise to some controversy.

4. The Korean Situation and MDAP

The Committee discussed briefly a paper, prepared in State, raising certain questions relating to the effect of the attack by North Korea against the Korean Republic on the MDAP for Korea.[8] The paper will be studied in each agency and discussed at a future meeting.

Memorandum by the Secretary of State to the President

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, July 10, 1950.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRESIDENT

Subject: Request for the Allocation to the Department of Defense for the Purpose of Providing Military Assistance to Thailand in the Amount of $10 million from the Funds Provided by Section 303 of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949 [1]

The Departments of State and Defense have agreed upon a program of military assistance to the Government of Thailand in the estimated amount of $10 million which it is proposed should be financed out of funds made available for fiscal year 1950 under Section 303 of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949. These funds continue available during July, 1950 for obligation pursuant to H. J. Resolution 492, 81st Congress.[2]

[1] In letters to the Secretaries of State and Defense dated July 14, President Truman indicated his approval of the request contained in this memorandum (792.5 MAP/7–1450).

[2] H.J. Res. 492 (Public Law 585, June 29, 1950) provided temporary appropriations for fiscal year 1951. Under Section 2, funds available in fiscal year 1950 were continued available until July 31, 1950, for Mutual Defense Assistance and other programs (64 Stat. 302).

The outline of this program, which may be refined in certain details in light of the recommendations which the Survey Team now enroute to Southeast Asia will make, is summarized in the last paragraph of this memorandum. This program of assistance has been developed in response to your letter of March 10, 1950, in which you approved in principle the furnishing of military aid to Thailand.[3]

The allocation of $10 million at this time is needed to enable the Department of Defense to undertake supply action to the Government of Thailand. The unsettled conditions in the general area of China have generated apprehensions among the friendly Governments of the area, and it is therefore believed desirable to accelerate the furnishing of military assistance to the Government of Thailand as well as to Indochina. This program of military aid will be administered, if you approve, in accordance with Executive Order No. 10099,[4] under which other mutual defense assistance programs are conducted.

In my memorandum of July 3, 1950[5] requesting the allocation of $16 million for furnishing additional military assistance to Indochina, I indicated that the interested agencies are re-studying the problem of applying effectively all the means available to this Government to advance our political, military and economic objectives in the critically and strategically important countries in the general area of China. The Survey Mission to countries in Southeast Asia, consisting of representatives of the Departments of State and Defense and of the ECA, is expected to be of assistance in recommending conclusions on this problem. As soon as this work has been completed, I shall advise you further on the questions raised in your letter dated May 1, 1950.[6]

The principal components of the fiscal year 1950 program for Thailand follow.

Army—Equipment for 9 Thai Infantry Battalions, and essential mission-type items for 3 Infantry Regimental Headquarters Companies, together with one year's ammunition and maintenance supplies.

Air Force—Items consisting of Ordnance items, ammunition and spare parts for training aircraft in the possession of the Thai forces. Additional training aircraft are also to be provided, along with spare parts, and about 36 F–51 fighter aircraft, complete with spare parts for one year.

Navy—Weapons and equipment to rearm and re-equip 18 ex-U.S. vessels in the possession of the Thai Navy; communications equipment; arms and equipment for about a 4000-man Thai Marine Corps, and Naval aircraft.

Minutes of the First Meeting of the Southeast Asia Aid Policy Committee, Department of State, July 13, 1950

SECRET

Present:

Members

Mr. Dean Rusk, Department of State
Maj. Gen. J. H. Burns, Department of Defense
Mr. Harlan Cleveland, Economic Cooperation Administration

Others

Mr. Shannon McCune, Economic Cooperation Administration
Mr. Samuel T. Parelman, Department of State (Executive Secretary)

Mr. Rusk opened the meeting with a discussion of the purposes for which the Southeast Asia Aid Committee (hereinafter referred to as "the Committee") had been organized. It was stated that the agencies had agreed that the Committee was to be responsible for the coordination of general policy for political-military-economic aid from the United States to Southeast Asia. It would be primarily a policy consultation group which would have no direct operational responsibility but would see that major policy directives with respect to Southeast Asian aid programs were being carried out. This would include policies of the President as well as policy decisions and agreements made at the highest levels in the agencies. One of its primary responsibilities would be to find out what major obstacles are preventing the successful accomplishment of the program objectives and to determine what steps should be taken to deal with these problems. It was emphasized that the Committee would use existing machinery in the agencies to accomplish its objectives, and its work would not interfere with the regular functioning of the executive agencies. The members of the Committee concurred in this description of the Committee's responsibilities.

Mr. Cleveland raised a question as to the relationship with the FMACC. It was agreed that, within the general policy coordination of this Committee, the FMACC will continue to be the interdepartmental agency primarily concerned with and responsible for the development and implementation of military assistance programs for Southeast Asia. The Committee would have the responsibility for seeing that the FMACC operation was proceeding successfully and that as a result of their operations there were no major political repercussions. From time to time it would be necessary for the Committee to seek appropriate directives where shifts in program emphasis were necessary. Mr. Rusk pointed out that because of his relationship both to the Committee and to the problem area involved it would be his continuing responsibility to see that the military programs for this area being carried out by the FMACC proceeded at the required pace.

There was limited discussion as to the need for the country to enter upon a full industrial production program in order to successfully carry out our military program objectives. Mr. Rusk explained that the Department had no doubts whatsoever as to the imperialistic aggressive intentions of the Soviets, and the threat to the security of the United States. It was his opinion that there should be no question whatsoever of our Government having to eke out equipment on a priority basis because of the lack of industrial production. Increased industrial production was imperative to permit our military to go on a "force in being" basis, and to eliminate the current problems of priorities between areas and countries.

Mr. Cleveland inquired as to the availability of Section 303 funds for economic programs. ECA was particularly concerned because the Griffin program did not provide dollars to cover local currency costs. It had been anticipated that these costs would be provided either through counterpart funds or directly by the recipient governments. Such costs might be two or three times the direct dollar costs to the United States. Since there would be negligible counterpart resources there were afforded three alternatives, as illustrated in the case of Indochina, for obtaining local currencies, namely, (1) the printing of money for this purpose, (2) recourse to the French Treasury, or (3) bringing in supplies for the express purpose of generating counterpart funds. Mr. Cleveland thought one possible solution for obtaining additional funds to finance local needs was to include a transferability provision in the ECA Act similar to that in the MDA Act which would permit the transfer of funds between titles. The other members of the Committee indicated that this was a problem which they would have to discuss further, and the possible use of Section 303 funds might be considered in this connection. It was pointed out that the provision of military assistance without the provision of basic economic aid might be meaningless in achieving our political objectives in the area.

In further reference to the Griffin program Mr. Rusk stated that he would strongly urge the ECA to place a materially greater proportion of their activities in a stepped up program in the first half of the current fiscal year so the greatest possible immediate benefits could be obtained. Except for provision for the retention of staff for the latter six months, virtually all of the supply and equipment items might be programmed in the first half. He indicated a possible source of funds for filling the later needs.

General Burns initiated discussion as to the aid programs which were within the province of the Committee. These programs at the present time are primarily the Mutual Defense Assistance Program, the economic aid program (Griffin Program) being administered by the ECA and the contemplated Point IV Program [2] which would incorporate the Public Law 402 projects.

Mr. Cleveland inquired as to the availability of data setting forth the precise objectives under each program. He felt this was essential in some cases to permit planning and programming under other programs. For example, in order for ECA to intelligently determine whether they can send medical teams into certain portions of Indochina, it is necessary to know what the military objectives are in such areas. It was agreed that this matter should be taken up at a subsequent meeting.

The current status of the MDAP program with respect to Southeast Asia was briefly reviewed by Mr. Rusk. It was agreed that there would be presented at each regular meeting of the Committee a status report on each aid program. The Committee designated Mr. Parelman as Executive Secretary to be responsible for maintaining a continuing review on behalf of the Committee of the progress of the programs, report on such progress to the Committee members prior to each meeting, maintain appropriate liaison and records in connection with the activities of the Committee and perform such other pertinent duties as may be essential to the effective discharge of the responsibilities of the Committee. The next meeting of the Committee was scheduled for Monday, July 24, 1950.[3]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] July 27, 1950.

Subject: Discussions with Prime Minister Menzies of Australia—Question of a Pacific Pact.[1]

The attached memorandum, prepared by FE, contains additional details on the United States attitude toward a Pacific Pact. It also lists a number of questions which might be raised with Prime Minister Menzies in discussions on this subject.

[Annex]

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Northeast Asian Affairs (Allison)

PACIFIC PACT

While no commitments should be made with respect to the United States attitude toward a Pacific Pact, it is believed that, should Mr. Menzies raise the question, the opportunity should be taken for a full and frank exchange of views. Mr. Menzies should be told that this Government has an open mind on the question but has not as yet seen how the many problems connected with a Pacific Pact can be satisfactorily solved. The suggestions of Mr. Menzies would therefore be welcome.

There is given below a brief statement of what United States policy has been up to the present and the reasons therefor. There is then given a series of questions with regard to a Pacific Pact which are suggestive of the type of problem upon which the views of Mr. Menzies would be helpful.

The present most authoritative statement of United States policy toward any form of Pacific Pact is stated in MSC 48/2, which says:

"The U.S. should make known its sympathy with the efforts of Asian leaders to form a regional association of non-Communist states and if in due course such an association eventuates, the U.S. should be prepared, if invited, to assist such an association to fulfill its purposes under conditions which would be to our interest."

[1] Robert G. Menzies, Prime Minister of Australia, visited the United States from July 27 to August 7. During that time, Menzies met with President Truman, Secretary of State Acheson, and other United States officials. Contrary to United States expectations, the Prime Minister did not raise the subject of a Pacific Pact and Pacific security arrangements in general. For documentation on the Menzies visit, see pp. 189 ff.

This rather cautious policy was based upon the realization that up to the present the formation of any such regional organization has been difficult because of the wide diversity in the area of political organization and development, the lack of a tradition of cooperation and a sound economic basis for large-scale mutual trade and the suspicions with which the weaker nations of Asia view the stronger. In addition it is recognized that the peoples of Asia are suspicious of the West and any cooperation extended by the U.S. to a growing regionalism must be done in a manner which will not excite further suspicions of our motives.

India, one of the most important of the Asiatic countries, and one whose influence extends throughout the Pacific, has made it clear that it will have nothing to do with any pact which is military in nature or specifically directed against Communism. This reluctance to become involved in the cold war by India and other Asiatic nations which do not believe themselves directly threatened by Communist aggression was largely responsible for the failure of the recent Baguio Conference called by President Quirino of the Philippines, to agree on a South East Asian Regional Union.

Nevertheless, in spite of the above factors it is probable that the Communist aggression against South Korea has served to hasten the day when the true nature of the Communist threat will be recognized by those Asiatic nations now unable to believe the truth. It may therefore be expected that there will be a growing demand for the formation of some type of Pacific or Asiatic Pact.

There are many questions to be answered before making any commitment to take part in any such Pact or Union.

Problems of membership immediately arise. Who will be asked to join? If only white countries, will not the rest of Asia cry White Imperialism? If both white and colored countries, do not the white countries have to assume an undue burden? Is the Pact to be confined to Pacific Ocean countries, the U.S. and the British Commonwealth, or will it include the smaller countries on the mainland of Asia? If the latter are not included, will it not encourage them to believe they are not important to the West and thus make them easier victims of the Communists? Will the formation of a Pacific Pact in addition to an Atlantic Pact create an irresistible cry for a Middle East Pact? Can we afford all of these? And what about Japan? Will it be invited to join? If so, on what basis? If not, will it not encourage Japan to lean more toward her strong Communist neighbors?

In addition to questions of membership there immediately arise questions of purpose. As indicated above, India and some of the other Pacific or Asian powers have been reluctant to join any Pact or Union which is military in character or specifically directed against Communism. President Quirino of the Philippines stressed in his invitations to a Pacific Pact conference that he had in mind an organization which would confine its activities to political, economic and cultural cooperation. Even so there was but scant enthusiasm for his proposals. Therefore, what should the purpose be? If outright opposition to Communism, would it not mean that in effect the U.S. would be carrying the major portion of the burden? If the Pact is a defensive pact, how is it to go into operation? Will it be on the order of the Atlantic Pact or only a consultative pact?

The above questions are only a few of the many which could be asked. They indicate the complexity of the problem and it is believed furnish lines for profitable discussions.

Mr. Harlan Cleveland, Deputy to the Assistant Administrator for Program, Economic Cooperation Administration (Bissell), to the Ambassador in Burma (Key)[1]

PERSONAL CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, August 3, 1950.

DEAR MR. AMBASSADOR: There have been enough inquiries from the field about the Griffin Report and programming in general to suggest the need for a general exposition of preliminary ECA thinking on the development of the Southeast Asia program. To some extent what is said in this letter may duplicate what has been said in cables or previous letters; but an attempt is made here to set down certain ideas in a little more systematic fashion than has been done previously. Any views about a program just beginning must, of course, be tentative. They can grow firm only as a consequence of the experience of the Special Technical and Economic Missions in field operations.

In a letter dated July 26, 1950,[2] I informed you that the Griffin Report [3] had not yet been issued. We have so far worked from a single carbon copy of an early draft. Copies will be sent you as soon as available. This delay, however, need not be unduly retarding in its effect on programming. You and your staff participated in the original telegraphic summary of the Report and perhaps in developing some of the working papers. The copy of the Report we have seen does not generally carry projects into substantial detail. In view of the short duration of the Griffin Mission, and the wide field covered by its recommendations, it would be surprising if this were not so.

[1] Identical letters were sent to Merle H. Cochran, Ambassador to Indonesia; Edwin F. Stanton, Ambassador to Thailand; and Robert Blum, Chief of the ECA Mission in Indochina. Copies were sent to Raymond T. Moyer, Chief of the ECA Mission in China (Taiwan), and to Livingston T. Merchant, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs. Cleveland's letter of transmittal to Merchant, August 3, read as follows: "The enclosed informal letter has been sent out to give further background to the acting STEM chiefs on several points which have been covered by cable. We expect to circulate it for general information within ECA minus the last section. You may wish to do likewise in the State Department. If so, we can send you some mimeographed copies of the abridged edition." (890.00/8–350).

The Griffin Mission recommendations as such have already served a most useful purpose in outlining the general nature and size of the program needed. It remains for the STEMs and ECA/Washington, working together, to create an actual program. And the initiative and primary responsibility for creating a program, as you are aware, devolves upon the Chief of the Special Technical and Economic Mission who, in turn, must inspire and draw out and work out a program with appropriate officials of the Government to which he is accredited. Ideally, a program of rehabilitation and development should originate with the local government and our role should be that of aiding in its execution. In practice, it will probably be necessary for us to suggest, work out details, and even help put the program into operation.

I draw your attention to one major deficiency of the program recommendations which we are charged with carrying out: They do not take explicit account of the problem of financing the internal costs, within each country, of the U.S. aid program. The primary need in each country, as emphasized by Mr. Griffin and every member of his group, is for assistance in restoring or extending essential services—mostly government services (to health, agriculture, education, industry, utilities, transport, etc.). These will require U.S. dollars for U.S. or other foreign exports and equipment, but they will also require large amounts (compared to current revenues) of local currencies. And yet, large amounts of funds are simply not to be raised without resort to the printing press.

We therefore recognize that there is a major difference between aid to Southeast Asia and aid which has been given to Europe under the Marshall Plan.[4] Europe's financial problem has been a scarcity of dollars—a foreign exchange problem. Southeast Asia needs dollar aid too, if it is to pay for external assistance. But we recognize that in most countries of Southeast Asia the financial problem is primarily one of a scarcity of internal revenues to pay for an expansion of essential services (which in turn, it is hoped, will in time generate revenues to pay for a continuation and expansion of such services). We can overcome this deficiency of internal revenues via dollars and without inflation only by the supply, under our aid program of commodities that can be sold for local currency which can then be used for public projects and services. We are fully facing the fact that we are going to have to do this on a scale sufficient to pay most of the internal costs of the aid program in some countries, and at least some of these costs in all countries.

In some of the recommended country programs of the Griffin Mission there are significant amounts of commodities (such as cotton textiles, agricultural implements and fishing equipment for Indonesia, cotton yarn and miscellaneous iron products for Indochina, and irrigation equipment for Thailand) although it is not clear to what extent it was expected that these items could be sold on the market for cash (as distinct from being sold on terms or given away as part of government programs). In other recommended country programs there are fewer commodities listed. But regardless of whether listed or not, the commodities have not been, so far as we can gather, included in the programs for the express purpose of generating local currency revenues with which to finance the extension of services which constitutes the major part of the programs. It is not likely therefore that the Griffin program recommendations are properly balanced as between saleable commodities, on the one hand, and technical assistance and non-saleable goods on the other. Accordingly, it is suggested that the first major overhaul of the Griffin recommendations be made with such a balance in view.

The question naturally arises as to what should be the criteria for the selection of saleable commodities for the program. This is a difficult question to which we have been giving some thought, and I hope to be able to send you some notes on this point before long.

II

Another subject to which I suggest some serious thought needs to be given is the whole question of how we organize our relationships with each of the Governments to which the aid is being given. It may be found that in each country some type of special organization needs to be established. It might be a national organization or a joint organization with the United States; but previous experience elsewhere suggests the need for vesting in a central place the responsibility for planning a program of rehabilitation and development (with dollars plus counterpart funds) and for supervising its execution by the several ministries concerned. Quite aside from the question of efficiency, such an organization would seem to be necessary to the political effectiveness of a program—an organization that could engage in publicity, employ emblems, and bring the program home to the population at large. We are not dealing in Southeast Asia, as in Europe, with highly organized and efficient governments capable of planning and carrying on a program. We are dealing with governments we must help even to maintain essential services. Moreover, in Southeast Asia we have no

OEEC [5] to act as a prod and a censor, and no central U.S. Government field agency to stimulate the whole. Our program in Southeast Asia requires a great deal more administrative action per dollar of aid than in Europe. If our program is to have a political impact, our money must be spent on well-designed, efficiently-executed and well publicized programs.

a. One way of operating would be for the Mission to work out an aid program in cooperation with the officials of the several ministries of the local government—more or less in the European ERP pattern—and then try to get it put into effect. This method has obvious disadvantages where a weak and inexperienced government is concerned.

b. A second manner of operating is suggested by the Chinese National Relief and Rehabilitation Administration (CNRRA)—set up by the Chinese Government at Cabinet level to handle the distribution of all UNRRA supplies. This agency cut across the work of individual ministries and had the advantage of relative efficiency of operation, but it frequently snarled up the normal operation of the individual ministries and was not conducive to the development of orderly government processes, which is one of our aims in Southeast Asia.

c. A third device is the Inter-Ministerial Committee, with a competent staff, working in close cooperation with the Mission at various levels. One example of this was the Chinese Council on U.S. Aid (CUSA) with a staff comprising many highly competent planning-minded members of the Chinese Government, with which the ECA worked on the mainland in the execution of the ECA China Program. The ECA Mission staff worked closely with CUSA staff at all levels in developing and executing programs. Another example is the American-Korean Stabilization Commission, chairmanned by the Korean Minister of Finance. This Commission was composed of several cabinet level officials on the Korean side and the top U.S. Mission officials on the American side. Below this level there were a number of joint committees in which the ECA staff worked alongside the Koreans on specific programs and problems both on planning and execution. There are similar examples throughout Europe in connection with the carrying out of ERP.

d. A fourth kind of operation is that represented by the Joint Commission on Rural Reconstruction (JCRR) that has done such good work in China and is still operating in Formosa. The JCRR represents perhaps the ultimate in "jointness" of operation. In JCRR three Chinese work alongside two Americans in the actual planning and operation of a program, which is carried out by an integrated staff of Americans and Chinese. The success of this kind of operation depends to a great extent, however, upon the compatibility and similarity of outlook and objectives on the part of the members.

No one of these devices need serve as an exact precedent for any of the countries of Southeast Asia. Organization must be tailored to meet the special needs and capabilities of the country concerned and to serve the special ends our programs have in view. Bearing especially in mind that our programs must seek to make the maximum political impact upon the greatest number of people, to increase the authority and prestige of the local government, and to emphasize the solidarity of the government with the U.S. and the free world, what are your thoughts on this whole question of organization?

[5] Documentation on United States interest in the Organization for European Economic Cooperation and related subjects is scheduled for publication in volume III.

III

If we are obliged to devote a substantial part of our program funds to commodities chiefly to get local currency for local program expenses, will this not limit our positive programs of technical assistance? Will we not run out of money fast?

The answer is of course yes, but in the opinion of both the State Department and ECA, program planning should be done more in terms of what it takes to do an adequate job than in terms of a tentative total based on Griffin Mission estimates. Our several programs will be for quite a while highly fluid and shifts can be accomplished fairly easily. Moreover, if need arises, as seems likely, we contemplate going to Congress for a deficiency appropriation early in the new year. The Korea war with its train of new policies and emphases, including general and official recognition of the necessity of holding the line in Asia, dictates that we keep our sights high rather than low, and long range as well as short range.

One of the main functions of the Mission Chiefs after they get the program of aid started will be to develop with the governments concerned a long range program of rehabilitation and development covering a period of years, pointing up longer range goals, resources available, and U.S. aid necessary over a period of years. We think it necessary to proceed upon the assumption that our responsibilities in the area will require U.S. aid in adequate amounts over a considerable period. You will recognize, of course, that this general line of thinking should not be discussed even in the most guarded terms outside the U.S. Government.

We are building an organization and refining the aid program in a time of fast moving international events, in a situation where few precedents exist. I am sure you realize the extent to which we are dependent upon the Missions to take the initiative in developing imaginative programs adequate to cope with today's danger. I have written frankly and informally of the state of our present thinking in order that we might together arrive at the most effective solutions. We would very much appreciate your observations and suggestions in the same vein.

Sincerely yours,

HARLAN CLEVELAND

Memorandum by Mr. John Foster Dulles, Consultant to the Secretary of State, to the Secretary of State

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] August 7, 1950.

It seems to me that we may not get much sympathy in the United Nations with our Asiatic policy unless we emphasize that the colonial struggle for political independence has now been won and that the present danger is that the independence will be lost to the aggressive imperialism of Russia, using communism as a bait.

This is a point of view which you have already developed, but now it has become somewhat obscured by our reluctance to use Korea as a case exhibit.

I suggest that it may be useful for you, either in the Security Council or elsewhere, to develop this thesis again in a major, documented speech. I have discussed this idea with Matthews,[1] Hickerson,[2] Kennan and others who seem to think favorably of it.

You could start with Stalin's program of 1924, incorporated in the current communist "Bible" which deals with the two stages of (1) arousing the spirit of nationalism in the colonial and dependent peoples of Asia so that they will fight the West and then (2) subverting this nationalism into "amalgamation" with the Soviet socialist regime.

It is this second phase, long foreseen, that is now in process. I believe that we can effectively demonstrate that fact and thereby have a platform that will attract more support from the newly independent governments and peoples of Asia.

I attach a memorandum of August 4th which develops this thesis somewhat more fully.

[Annex]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] August 4, 1950.

I think we should consider whether, from the standpoint of Asiatic policy, we ought not now to stand on the proposition that we are defending the independent nationalism of the new Asiatic states, whereas

[1] H. Freeman Matthews, Deputy Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs.
[2] John D. Hickerson, Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs.
[3] On August 4, Dulles transmitted copies of this memorandum to Deputy Under Secretary Matthews, Assistant Secretaries Rusk and Hickerson, and Counselor George F. Kennan. The copy located in the files of the Policy Planning Staff bears the following notation by Kennan: "I think this is excellent." (Policy Planning Staff Files: Lot 64D563: Box 20027: Communism)

Russia is seeking to destroy that independence, using communism as the device.

Our present policy of attacking communism and not attacking Russia seems to me to be doomed to failure. There is no particular opposition to communism among the peoples of Asia, indeed it has quite an appeal. To the peoples of the West communism is abhorrent because it destroys personal freedoms which are dear to them—freedom of speech, freedom of religion, freedom of the press, etc. However, these freedoms as yet mean little to the peoples of Asia and we cannot expect that loyalty to them will produce a willingness to fight. What they will fight for is their national independence from whatever quarter it is threatened.

In reality the threat to their independence comes from Russia and what is going on in Asia is little more than a recrudescence in a new guise of the aggressive ambitions of the Czars.

For example, Russia has been trying to get control of Korea ever since the beginning of this century and what is going on there now is a projection of the Czarist policy. The same is true of Manchuria, Port Arthur, Dairen, etc.

It can be shown that the present communist regimes in China and Viet-Nam are in effect puppets of Moscow, taking orders from it and being "assisted"—really dominated—by Russian military, technical and political advisers. The independence of these countries is being threatened by Russian imperialist ambitions to dominate Asia. It is this ambition that threatens and frightens India, Burma, etc.

Stalin, in his lectures on "The Foundations of Leninism" (1924) recognizes how delicate will be the task of first fomenting revolution and then producing what is called "amalgamation" in favor of "true internationalism" represented by "the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics—the living prototype of the future union of nations into a single world economic system". (Problems of Leninism, p. 56)

Asia is now in fact in the position which Stalin foresaw would create embarrassment for Soviet Communism, namely nationalism has already been largely achieved and the Soviet effort now is to "amalgamate" the independent nations into the framework or orbit of the USSR.

Stalin foresaw the difficulty and delicacy of this phase of Soviet policy and it seems to me that we would be remiss in not exposing the real threat that it involves to independence—a threat which Stalin himself did not ignore.

The western powers have granted independence, and because of their foresight and statesmanship it has, in the main, come about without that fighting and bleeding of the western powers that Stalin wanted. Now that the "national" phase has largely been completed, Russian policy is seeking, as the second phase, to pervert it into "internationalism" which will in effect end independence and increase Soviet dominance.

The events in Korea are a remarkably effective exhibit, showing the destruction of real independence. The ruling elements in North Korea have been made part of the Soviet Communist system, taking orders from the Moscow Politburo and accepting its "iron discipline". They are fighting and dying, and indeed ruining the whole country, to the end that Russia may achieve its Czarist ambition of dominating this strategic area.

I realize that to take this position tends to identify the Soviet Union with the North Korean military effort and this might conceivably lead it to give the effort more open support than would otherwise be the case. This, however, is highly speculative. It is equally arguable that to charge the Soviet Union with responsibility in Korea would lead it not to give open support. In any event I think the essential thing is to talk in the Security Council the language that the Asiatic peoples understand and which exposes the real threat of Soviet Communism to their independence—a threat which was conceived many years ago and is inherent in the very nature of Soviet Communism.

PROCUREMENT OF STRATEGIC MATERIALS FROM SOUTHEAST ASIA

For strategic stockpile commodities obtainable largely in Southeast Asia, the properly cautious assumption should be made that beginning sometime in the next twelve months or for, say, a year or more thereafter, their receipt will be significantly curtailed or made much more difficult. Expressed in a schematic formula, the assumption might run as follows; not only for purposes of analysis but to arrive at sound recommendations for action.

1. There will be no interruption of access before December 31, 1950; present "normal" assumptions as to the world supply and demand situation will prevail.
2. After December 31, 1950, total supplies from Southeast Asia to NATO countries and the rest of the Western Hemisphere will be one-third less than would "normally" be available.

Such assumptions are arbitrary. Access may very well be more difficult before January 1951 or in considerably different degree from that suggested; access might even possibly improve slightly after December 1950. But the assumptions proposed are sounder from the point of view of national security than the Munitions Board's assumption that we have two years to gain our stockpile objectives without any allowance for interruptions to supply.

Reasons for proposing the less conservative assumptions follow:

1. The immediate threat is real and ominous that Chinese Communist strength will be increasingly diverted through a major effort to the support of Ho Chi Minh. The position of the West in Indochina is only uneasily maintained by commitment of considerable French forces operating in a generally hostile environment. This balance can be turned against the West more quickly than we can correct it, not only by enemy action directed against the French forces in Indochina, but by action requiring diversion of French forces to Europe (or Africa). To be sure, we do not now depend significantly on Indochina as a source of strategic materials. The "loss" of Indochina during the year, however, is a real threat not only because the West may be deprived of an uneasy base but because the Communists may gain for themselves a firm base for operations against other SEA areas.

2. In Malaya, Communist-led guerrillas are conducting a slowly broadening and accelerated campaign of terror and armed attack on the more developed portions of the country. The guerrillas command the support, in form of food supplies, intelligence and cover of some 500,000 additional Chinese who live as "squatters" on the margins of the developed areas. At present, these guerrillas get little or no direct support from outside Malaya. It would be extremely easy for such increased support to be delivered [by?] the Communists, extremely difficult to counter it.

In addition, there is a Chinese "minority" of 40 percent of the population which for the most part does not now sympathize with the guerrilla movement and desires the return of law and order. But if Communist aggression were to spread in Southeast Asia, and the present guerrillas given aid from the outside, the pressures on and temptations to the Chinese population of Malaya to fall in with such aggression would be tremendous. The resultant challenge to the interests of the Western powers in Malaya would be one that British armed strength would be extremely hard put to meet. Judged on the basis of what is now being invested unsuccessfully to stem present hostilities, British suppression would have to be on an extremely large scale. The nearby spectacle of approximately one-third of the Army of the French Republic fighting an expensive and precarious holding action in limited areas of Indochina, leaves nothing for the Westerner to be smug about in Malaya.

3. While there is no serious internal disorder in Thailand today, and the present government appears at the moment to be internally secure as well as firmly committed to a foreign policy favoring the Western powers, the prospect in Thailand, as in all Southeast Asian areas today, is clouded by the likelihood of slowly mounting Communist internal and external aggression in the region.

If Communist China were to succeed with aggression (overt or subversive) in any part of Indochina, to aim any military forces in Thailand itself, to cause a further deterioration of conditions in Malaya, and to agitate the large and economically dominant Chinese minority in Thailand, the Thai governing classes would be under an almost desperate pressure to accommodate themselves to this menace. The present government under such circumstances would be a particular liability in view of the forthright stand it has taken in favor of cooperating with the West. The political adjustment of Thailand to a serious Communist threat against it would probably take the form of one or more of the contending political factions seizing power on the understood basis of changing the national policy over to accommodation to and cooperation with Communism. A probable early consequence of such developments would be the cessation of exports of strategic materials to the United States.

4. The present non-Communist political forces in Indonesia have apparently successfully accommodated their mutual rivalries in creating the new unitary state. On the other hand, Communist penetration is increasing rapidly at an alarming rate, with consequent increases in Communist potential not merely in the direct political sphere but in the form of ability to engage in sabotage and ability to foment strikes. Even aside from Communist influences, the instability of Indonesian labor unions and their leaders results in a continuing threat of widespread labor stoppages. In addition to these dangers of an essentially internal nature, increasing Communist power in other parts of Southeast Asia would affect significantly the internal strength of the Communist movement in Indonesia and even the attitude of the non-Communist government forces. Furthermore, in the event of open warfare in the area, a more remote possibility but one not to be neglected, interruptions to shipping would result in a virtual cessation of exports from Indonesia.

5. As mentioned throughout, these ominous possibilities in Southeast Asia are not to be considered as separate factors—adverse developments in one country, depending on their nature and origin, would have specific and extremely rapid adverse consequences in each of the other countries. Nor are the only forces to be taken into consideration those arising inside Southeast Asia. An increased tempo of activity in other parts of the Far East—either in Korea or as a result of a Formosan action, will not only tie up increasing quantities of shipping, but unless extremely quickly and successfully handled by the West would adversely influence our position in Southeast Asia itself.

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, August 30, 1950—8 p. m.

1066. Second day prelim tripart discussions covered Item VI (Far East Problems).[2] Brit considered situation SEA improved; Burma showing strength; Siam making bolder anti-commie effort; confidence justified re Indonesia in spite present instability. Hopeful success Briggs' Plan in Malaya,[3] designed to control all Malaya by late '51. Noted relative lack recent VM activity Indochina. Brit do not believe Chi Commie will embark on aggression on any part of SEA but will continue foment internal unrest. Commie aggression Korea caused hardening of anti-commie opinion in SEA therefore necessary intensify our efforts and convince SEA our determination to make them strong and independent. Brit stressed necessity economic aid for Asia and made fol statement:

"In the long run the economic development of South and South-East Asia wld contribute not only to the welfare of SEA, but also to the balance of world trade by developing sources of raw materials for the US and Europe so giving Eur an opportunity to earn by trade with SEA dollars spent there to buy raw materials for the US. But, in the short term, US dollar aid is also needed in direct form to enable the necessary development work to go forward fast enough. We hope, in this connexion, that any aid will be given so far as possible in an untied form so that WE may have an opportunity to earn some of these dollars by themselves supplying the capital and other developmental goods on which the dollars may be spent."

Brit also stressed importance of rice stability SEA and their difficulties in equitable distribution. Brit also stressed necessity three govs strengthening social and cultural link between SEA and West and combating Commie front organizations.

Brit concluded: 1) IC should be considered principal problem in area. 2) Briggs plan must succeed. 3) Brit and US shld continue furnish military aid Siam and Burma. 4) Urgency implementing plans for economic aid. 5) Adequate rice supplies in area necessitating cooperation SCAP.

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (McGhee) to the Deputy Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs (Matthews)

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] August 30, 1950.

Subject: "A New Approach in Asia".

I attach a paper entitled "A New Approach in Asia", which is a revision of an earlier paper entitled "A New US Policy toward Asia".

The latter was submitted to you and discussed in your office early this month. The present version has been drafted in the light of comments within the Department on the previous paper, the responses from Ambassadors Henderson and Warren [1] to our query concerning the desirability of closer consultation with Asian governments,[2] and recent developments in the Korean and Formosan situations.

I am circulating the attached paper to various officers of the Department for comment. I do not think that a meeting is necessary at this stage, although I may wish to impose upon you when the comments are in.[3]

I should, of course, welcome any views you may wish to express on the paper or its handling.

Policy Paper by the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (McGhee)[4]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON, August 30, 1950.]

A NEW APPROACH IN ASIA

The Issue

Much of Asia is unconvinced of our devotion to peace, our lack of imperialist ambition and our interest in Asian freedom and progress. These doubts derive in large part from Asian misunderstanding and suspicion of our decisions and actions, in Asia and elsewhere in the world, directed toward containing Communist expansion. The free Asian governments resent what they conceive to be our disregard of their views and interests, particularly with respect to problems arising in Asia. This conception of the US attitude is in part a consequence of the fact that our moves in Asia frequently take the form of hasty responses to Communist initiative and that we seek the support of the free Asian governments after we have decided and acted.

Unless we can establish a more intimate relationship with the free Asian governments and convince them, and through them the Asian peoples, of the true nature of US interests and intentions, Asia will continue to be unsympathetic to our actions and unresponsive to our needs. Should the present estrangement between Asia and the US grow rather than diminish, the whole of Asia, except those areas where we or our non-Asian allies can maintain direct military control, can fall to Communism. If we are to avert this disaster, we must seize the initiative from the Communists and win the support of free Asia.

[3] During September and early October, the officers who received copies of the attached paper commented upon it. Their replies are located in file 611.90. On October 6, the paper was considered by the Under Secretary's Committee, the forum for general discussion between the Under Secretary and other principal officers of the Department. The paper was not rejected by the Committee, but neither was it formally approved. It was not subsequently endorsed as official Departmental policy. (Executive Secretariat Files: Lot 53D250: Under Secretary's Meetings)

The Objectives

1. To increase free Asian participation in and responsibility for the solution of problems arising in Asia.

2. To strengthen the ability and determination of the free Asian countries to maintain peace and resist Communism in Asia.

3. To minimize direct US military involvement in Asia west of the Japan-Okinawa-Philippines defense line.

4. Eventually to eliminate Communism as a force in Asia.

The Assumptions

1. We should risk serious over-commitment if we undertook to contain and eventually to eliminate Communism in Asia by force, whether by ourselves or with the assistance of our non-Asian allies.

2. Certain of the free Asian countries, particularly India and Pakisthan have the capability of controlling Communism in their own territories and of making a significant contribution to its elimination elsewhere in Asia, provided that they receive assistance from the US and other free nations in their efforts to build economic and political stability and military strength.

3. Nationalism is the strongest force in Asia. The free Asian governments and peoples have as their primary goal the prevention of foreign interference in their affairs. They are becoming increasingly aware of the foreign inspiration of domestic Communist activities and of Soviet imperialism's threat to national independence in Asia. Their attention is, however, still diverted from the Communist threat by their preoccupation with the Asian remnants of nineteenth century colonial empires and their suspicions of the Western European colonial powers. The potential strength of nationalism as a force against Communism cannot, therefore, be fully realized until the US and other Western countries commit themselves to eliminating all vestiges of colonialism in Asia.

The Plan of Action

1. Pursue studies within the Department and consultations with Congressional leaders, both now in progress, looking toward (a) Congressional acceptance of the concept of an expanded Asian economic aid program, (b) discussions with appropriate free Asian Asian governments on the nature and scope of such a program and (c) the preparation and submission of the program to the Congress for legislative action early in the next session.

2. Undertake on an informal basis more intimate consultation with key free Asian governments on our foreign policies and contemplated actions in the foreign field, and encourage those governments to consult more frankly with us.

3. As part of the foregoing consultations, explore with the free Asian governments at appropriate times possible solutions, where practicable within the UN framework, of such problems as the future of Korea, the future of Formosa, a peace treaty with Japan and arrangements for Japanese security, Chinese representation in the UN and the future of Indochina.

4. Keep the UK Government and, to a lesser extent, certain other Commonwealth governments and the French currently informed of our progress under this plan of action. At an appropriate stage, possibly in early 1951, hold top secret discussions with the UK Government looking toward the maximum practicable coordination of US, UK and Commonwealth policies and actions with respect to South and Southeast Asia.

5. Step up official output on Asia for the US public stressing the determination of the Asian peoples to control their own destinies, our historic interest in the political and economic progress of the peoples of Asia, and the current, urgent need of the free Asian countries for assistance in carrying out their plans for such progress. In the foreign field, intensify USIE operations in free Asia and covert psychological warfare activities in Communist China emphasizing the following themes: US interest in the welfare, progress and freedom of the Asian peoples, Soviet imperialism, and the importance of the UN as a growing force for world peace and progress.

6. Meet the most urgent requirements of the free Asian countries for military assistance not available from other sources and required to maintain internal stability and to strengthen resistance to Communism.

7. Encourage the free Asian governments to persuade the Chinese Communist regime that cooperation with the free nations of Asia is the only way to escape domination by the USSR, to participate in an Asian development program and to assure independence of all Asia from outside domination.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] September 5, 1950.

Subject: Proposed Action Regarding PSA Nations "on the fence"

Several recent events seem to me to indicate that the time has come to make the issues in world politics so clear that the nations in the PSA area would realize that they must decide whether to side with Communism or against it; that they must take action in accordance with the fundamental truth that "He who is not with me is against me." Recent actions of the Burmese Government in connection with the Melby Survey Mission point up the fact that Burma is prepared to receive military and economic aid from the US while avoiding any appearance of commitment to the cause against Communism. The attached memorandum to Mr. Jessup and telegram from Djakarta are indications that Indonesia is in somewhat the same general situation.[2] The Philippine Government has been only slightly less reluctant than Indonesia and Burma, perhaps because impelled by fiscal troubles from which it hopes to be saved by the US. The other countries of Southeast Asia do not present the same problem. Thailand is forthrightly committed to the UN cause; the Governments of Indochina are aligned against the Viet Minh forces of Communism, and the British administration in Malaya is in full cooperation with us.

Burma, Indonesia, and the Philippines are organic situations, each different from the other. Consequently, action aimed to bring each of these countries into full cooperation with the United Nations must be patterned to suit each individual case. I suggest that some or all of the following actions be taken in regard to Burma, Indonesia, and the Philippines according to their suitability to each country:

1. We should begin an informational campaign, both through our Informational Services and our Chiefs of Mission to convince the governments and the peoples of the countries that we have a genuine interest in the welfare of the Far Eastern peoples and have had for the past century.

2. We should begin a well-considered campaign through the same media to convince the governments and peoples of the nations involved that isolation, neutrality or being a "third power" is impossible in the present world. It should be demonstrated that the present conflict is not of a sort which requires two to make a quarrel, and that there is a malicious and evil political force at work throughout the world which requires either subservience or conflict.

3. We should be prepared to make it known at the appropriate time, which may be within the next few weeks, that we are considering drawing the lines more sharply between the supporters of the UN and its enemies in the firm conviction that those which are not with us are against us. This might be done initially simply by withholding military and economic aid from unfriendly or neutral nations. In the case of Indonesia and the Philippines, such action should be adequate. Burma, however, might require more emphatic treatment. The Burmese in their history have not shown themselves to be politically astute. Further steps might be necessary to convince the Burmese that the road to survival lies with the UN. PSA is prepared to study with the Policy Planning Staff additional steps which might be taken with respect to Burma. Consideration might be given, for instance, to treating an obdurate country as we treat a "curtain" country such as Poland.

The Director of the Office of Foreign Agricultural Relations, Department of Agriculture (Andrews), to the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, September 25, 1950.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The staff of this Office, as well as the other interested Bureaus of the Department of Agriculture, has been giving study to some of the fundamental problems which underlie a great deal of the discontent and disturbance in some so-called undeveloped areas of the world.

Inclosed is a memorandum which sets forth certain facts on this subject. In bringing this to you, we are not advocating that our Point IV Program be based upon any assumption or guarantee that world-wide land reform will have to be undertaken. As a matter of fact it is merely one phase of many difficult problems. In the implementation of Point IV, we must somehow, some way get over to the little fellow in these areas the idea that this program is directed to his welfare rather than—as sometimes turns out—we touch only a few of the more important people at the top economic levels of the country.

I am passing 5 copies to you for your perusal or any distribution you may desire among the staff members dealing with this particular problem.

Sincerely yours, STANLEY ANDREWS

[Enclosure]

Memorandum Prepared by the Office of Foreign Agricultural Relations, Department of Agriculture

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] April 17, 1950.

STATEMENT OF THE PROPOSED UNITED STATES POLICY WITH RESPECT TO LAND REFORM IN ASIA

I. The approaching implementation of the Point Four program, in the formulation of which the Department of Agriculture has been actively cooperating, makes it appropriate to focus attention on the question of land tenure and the peasant welfare in general in southeast Asia and the Middle East. These are crucial questions on the solution of which victory in the struggle against communism in Asia largely depends.

II. Four-fifths of Asia's vast population consists of peasants, and agriculture is the pivot of its economic and social life. Consequently, measures of assistance to be taken under the Point Four and related programs towards the improvement of the lot of the common man will necessarily have to be oriented in these regions towards agricultural problems. The central agricultural and, indeed, economic and social problem throughout Asia is the abject poverty of the large masses of the peasants, which the communist propaganda has been adroitly exploiting. One of the basic reasons for this widespread poverty and rural distress, apart from the pressure of population on the land, has been the landlord-tenant system in many parts of Asia, under which large groups of peasants are cultivating somebody else's land and paying exorbitant rents for it. These rents, which often take the major share of the crop, coupled with other abuses, make it impossible for the tenants to introduce any improvements. This is bound to constitute a serious drawback to the Point Four program. Such a system has been a fertile source of unrest and has provided the communists with an especially convenient target for attack, which they have not been slow to utilize in their propaganda.

III. The fact that the communist ideology is hostile to small peasant farming and land ownership and would do away with them at the first opportunity, as happened in Russia, does not hurt communists in the eyes of the peasant of Asia. They can hardly be expected to be familiar with the writings of Marx, Engels, Lenin and Stalin, or with Bolshevism in action in Russia and other countries of Eastern Europe under the Soviet sway. The communist propaganda, which harps day in and day out on the necessity of abolition of the "feudal" landlord system and transfer of the land to the tillers of the soil, naturally has a tremendous appeal to the poverty-stricken tenant peasantry of Asia.

IV. The success of communists in China, where they largely won the support of the peasants by promising land to the landless in drastic revision of landlord-tenant relationships, may be repeated in other parts of Asia if the field of agrarian reform is left by default to the communist propaganda. The haste with which the Communists of North Korea are attempting to carry out a land reform program in the captured portions of South Korea, and the recent decision of the Communist Party of India to center all its attention on the agrarian problems of the country with the objective of winning recruits for "national liberation", are just two more illustrations of the manner in which the Communists attempt to gain the support of the peasantry. It should be fairly clear by now that the communist threat in Asia can be best met through an agricultural policy that emphasizes widespread land ownership among the peasants, provides reasonable terms of tenure for those who cultivate land as tenants, and other relevant actions that show in practical ways the concern of the respective governments with the improvement of status of the peasantry. Such measures would not only remove the principal peasant grievance which is at the bottom of the political unrest in Asia, would not only take the wind out of the sails of communist propaganda, but the prospects of expanding agricultural production would also be materially enhanced. Ownership of the land or reasonable tenure conditions would provide the peasant with the incentive to increase the productive power of the land.

V. Orderly agrarian reforms, with fair compensation of the landlord, are not socialist measures, but actually are probably the best contribution that could be made towards strengthening the system of free enterprise by diffusion of private property and re-inforcing the economic foundation of the State. It imparts greater stability to the whole social order. Ideologically, democratic agrarian reform stems from Thomas Jefferson and Abraham Lincoln, from John Stuart Mill and William Gladstone, and not from Marx, Lenin and Stalin. It has been carried out in the 19th Century in many countries of Europe, notably Ireland, and has also been successfully executed by United States occupation authorities in Japan since the war. Progressive rural legislation in Asia is the road to freedom and genuine democracy, and a formidable bulwark against communism.

VI. In southeast Asia and in the Middle East it is not necessary to split up into small and possibly uneconomic units large and efficiently operated farms, as was the case in parts of Eastern Europe. It is simply a matter of change in legal status, which entitle the small farmer, who already cultivates the land as a tenant or a sharecropper, to a larger share of the product of his labor, and in the end would make it possible for him to become the owner of the land. This is especially significant with respect to large areas of potential crop land. The fear, therefore, that is sometimes expressed that land re-distribution would spell disaster is groundless. On the contrary, it would not only be of the greatest significance politically, but in time would also have favorable economic effects, because they would stimulate the personal interest of the tillers of the soil.

VII. Measures benefiting the peasants are powerful political weapons. Native governments would be likely to win what so many of them lack—popular support—and popular support in Asia is peasant support or nothing. A native government, therefore, which deals boldly with these questions would be greatly buttressed against the attacks from Communists within or outside its borders. In short, the fate of non-communist Asia is bound up with the success or failure of its handling of the peasant problem.

VIII. The urgency of embarking upon a progressive agrarian policy as a challenge to communism in Asia is obvious, and in some countries the sands are running low. Myopic selfishness of some powerful interests tends to block the necessary reform, but there are important elements favoring land reform and they need and would greatly profit from our encouragement. It is, of course, for the native governments to initiate and carry out progressive farm legislation. However, since the vital interests and the national security of the United States are deeply affected by the threat of Communism in Asia, it seems proper that we should utilize all our diplomatic skill and resources to encourage the development of land policies which would lay the foundation for an economically and politically stable rural life. Thus we would help to ward off the Communist danger without infringing upon any other country's sovereignty.

IX. With the above end in view, the following steps are recommended:

1) All United States embassies, legations and consular representatives in the Middle East and southeast Asia should be informed that the United States Government is deeply concerned about the peasant problem in these countries, and that it is considering this problem as a major factor in the formulation of its Asiatic policy, since it is convinced that land reform and practical concern with the well-being of the farmer in general provide the most important alternatives to Communism in many of these countries, and is a necessary foundation for Point Four and related programs.

2) All the embassies and legations concerned should be directed to make use of every opportunity to inform the governments and private organizations in the countries concerned of the United States Government's deep interest and policy with respect to land reform and peasant welfare.

3) State clearly and directly the concern of the United States Government with respect to widespread land ownership in Asia and its stand in harmony with the democratic aspirations of the people of those countries. It is desirable that such statements should be included in major foreign policy pronouncements by top level officials of the United States Government.

4) In the formulation and implementation of the Point Four program it should be made clear that those projects will be given priority which are aimed at the democratic solution of the land tenure problem and other causes of rural distress.

In a conversation on other matters, Mr. Bevin mentioned his efforts to get Mr. Spender of Australia to take the lead in the Commonwealth program of aid to Southeast Asia. Mr. Bevin said that he had, when he was in Colombo, asked Mr. Spender to propose the program. He said that he thought that it was best for the proposal to come from another country rather than the United Kingdom. Mr. Bevin expressed the hope that an Asiatic organization would be created on which the United States might keep a free eye even though the United States might not be in it. He mentioned the possibility of a military pact but said he thought there was no military pact in Asia which could be the basis for a pact. He suggested to Mr. Spender that economic power be pulled together for common purposes.

Mr. Acheson said that he had also talked to Mr. Spender about this and that we looked with favor on the program.

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk) to the Deputy Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs (Matthews)

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] October 9, 1950.

Subject: Trilateral Agreement and Consultations with Australia and New Zealand.

We have been giving continuing consideration to the question of regional arrangements in the Far Eastern area, particularly to proposals for the formation of an association of Asian states and for the negotiation of a Pacific Pact. In accordance with the policy toward regional associations established in NSC 48/2, we have not taken the initiative to prod Asiatic states into organizing themselves or negotiating a treaty. Until there arises a clearer manifestation than exists now of desire on the part of Asian or Pacific states and of the practicality of forming a regional arrangement, it seems wise that the United States Government continue to remain open-minded on the subject and to refrain from pressing other governments to action.

Nevertheless it has become increasingly evident, most recently in conversations held with the Foreign Minister of Australia, that some diplomatic exchange between Australia and the United States which would include a more formal statement of mutual security commitments than now exists and would provide for military and political consultations, would be welcomed by the Australian Government. Mr. Spender has proposed a Pacific pact, to include Australia, New Zealand, the Philippines, the U.S. and the U.K. It seems to us that should we proceed to negotiate a pact of this nature, the choice of members would at the outset introduce problems which might vitiate our position in the Far East, considerably weaken the effect of the pact, and highlight rather than resolve the differences now existing between our own policies and those of certain of the Asian nations whose friendship and cooperation we desire to secure.

There appears to be merit, however, in tightening our relationships with Australia and New Zealand. The cooperation and support of these countries will be of increasing importance to us during the coming year as we face the peculiarly difficult problems of the post-hostilities security and reconstruction of Korea and the negotiation of a Japanese peace treaty. Therefore, if by trilateral agreement, the desires of Australia for some closer relationship can be met, it would appear to be likewise in our interest to proceed toward this objective. An agreement might set forth the general defense position of the United States in the Pacific area in case of war, such mutual military commitments as the JCS might propose or accept, and might provide for continuing tripartite conversations of a military and political character. These conversations might take the form of those recently held in the Department with the British and French.[1]

It is recognized that the JCS may not wish to enter into military commitments more specific than those implied in the general position of a defense line through Japan, Okinawa and the Philippines. It is unlikely that the Australians would press for more than this. They appear to be interested not so much in written assurances of military protection as in an opportunity to participate more closely in military and political planning. Their desires would therefore probably be met by an agreement as outlined above. Out of consultations might arise a discussion of a Pacific Pact and, depending upon developments in the Pacific area, some association of an acceptable type might eventuate. At the commencement of the consultations, this Government could indicate its willingness to discuss the problems of regional association and its desire to hear proposals which either the Australian or New Zealand governments might offer.

It is assumed that the United Kingdom would be informed and its sympathetic approval sought for any proposal for an Australian-New Zealand-U.S. agreement. In view of Commonwealth arrangements and the fact that no regional association is envisaged at this stage, it seems likely that the British would not object to the proposal as outlined.

It is suggested that, if the Secretary approves this project, Ambassador Jessup be authorized to discuss it informally with General Bradley, after which it be communicated formally to the Secretary of Defense for consideration.

implications as this one cannot be accomplished speedily. As example Spender shld recall length of time taken bring about North Atlantic Treaty.

As stated previously Dept open-minded on this subject but aware tremendous difficulties which must be overcome before any arrangements such as Pacific Pact cld be consummated. While no US position on Pacific Pact has been established, see no reason why you should not indicate our general sympathy with efforts non-Commie states to form regional associations (as expressed NSC 48/2). We have not felt US should take leadership in attempting organize such groupings particularly in view problems which naturally arise, such as possible misunderstanding US motives, varying conceptions and aims of states which might be concerned, and choice of members. Latter leads to complications to which Dept does not have answers, such as Pacific vs Asian association, inclusion or exclusion India, Nationalist China, France, Netherlands, Latin American west coast states, etc.

We shld be very grateful for Spender's considered views on these problems, and for an exposition from him of Australia's conception of a Pacific Pact, its membership, objectives, form of organization, and method of bringing it into being. You may wish to discuss with him whether type of pact he envisages might be correlated with implementation of any GA resolution on UN Action for Peace.

Ward P. Allen, EUR

Mr. Hickerson opened the conversation by making clear that while, as the Vandenberg Resolution [2] shows, the United States has a general background of sympathetic interest with respect to regional pacts, nevertheless there are a large number of questions in our mind regarding any Pacific Pact relating to the participants, scope of the area, nature of obligations, etc., on which we would appreciate Mr. Spender's views.

[1] Mr. Allen was Special Assistant on United Nations Affairs, Bureau of European Affairs.

[2] For the text of the Vandenberg Resolution and other documentation on the origins of the North Atlantic Treaty, see Foreign Relations, 1948, vol. III, pp. 135 ff.

Obligations in Pact: Mr. Spender stated that he envisaged as the "pivotal point" a provision substantially similar to Article Five of the North Atlantic Treaty, embodying a definitive and general obligation. He appreciated the scope of the Article as Mr. Hickerson explained it and felt that the same obligation was what was needed. In response to a question as to machinery, Mr. Spender stated that some sort of continuing council would be necessary with some adjunctive military mechanism, but nothing as "elaborate and cumbersome" as the NATO.

Participants: In Mr. Spender's view, there are three strategic areas of the world (leaving aside Latin America) : (1) North Atlantic, (2) Middle East, and (3) the Indian Ocean and Pacific. However, from a realistic point of view the Pact could not embrace the entire third area. He had recently made a public statement suggesting a Pact which would include the Commonwealth countries in the area (Pakistan, India, Burma, Ceylon) but this was purely "for political reasons." He stated that he was aware that India would not join. He referred to Nehru's expressed antipathy for such a Pact at the Colombo Conference and stated his conviction that if we waited for India "it is clear there won't be any Pact."

Therefore, within practical realistic limits, Mr. Spender believes the parties should be Australia, New Zealand, the Philippines, United States, United Kingdom and Canada, if she is willing—those states capable of undertaking military commitments in the area. Indonesia should be asked but would probably follow India's line and refuse. It is "important but not necessary" to have Asiatic non-white states as members "but the creation of the Pact should not be conditioned upon this." The question of China's participation is premature and cannot be answered now. He would be opposed to the participation of the Nationalist government "even assuming they have any probable remaining length of life" but felt that if the Peiping Government is generally recognized, it could be invited to adhere. Japan must be a party at some future time; it is obviously premature now. To exclude them would appear to make the Pact a "bloc anti", i.e., a bloc directed against some specific country. France and the Netherlands should not participate; their pacific interests are such that it would introduce the whole explosive colonial aspect. Thus the Indochina States could not be members because they could not be brought in except through France.

Thailand would not be a member at least initially. It is a power vacuum, difficult to fill now except by economic means. Later, perhaps after the vacuum is filled they might become members.

There would be no great practical value in including Chile and other Latin American Pacific States, although there would be no objection if it were politically advisable and, from the point of view of the concept as a "Pacific Pact", the more the better. Mr. Hickerson raised the question as to whether without a non-white country there would be real danger of any Pact being regarded as a white Asian alliance, attendant undesirable implications and repercussions. Messrs. Spender and Officer replied that in their view we tend to emphasize such political aspects. "We cannot hold the Asians without strength which they respect". It can be sold to them on the theory that it would help prevent war and keep it from Asia. Mr. Hickerson also pointed out that with such a membership, as proposed, the Pact could hardly be effective to protect the mainland, to which Mr. Spender responded that it would probably be difficult defend in any case.

Operative Area: Mr. Allen indicated that the Rio [3] and NA treaties become operative in the event of an attack on certain countries within the region although they are not parties and wondered whether Mr. Spender had in mind embracing the same concept. Mr. Spender responded that the strategic area extended through Indonesia, Malaya, Thailand and Indonesia and that at or within those boundaries it might be provided that an attack would be considered an attack on the parties, but would not obligate them to the specific assistance of the non-party initially attacked. He added, however, that this would have to be further considered.

Need For Pact: In response to our doubts as to need, Mr. Spender stated that of course no Pacific war could be fought without Australia (and in this connection deplored United States Navy's thinking in World War II that Australia could be written off) and that the Pact would serve a real strategic purpose.

He pointed out it would also help Australia discharge its world responsibilities. He recalled that in World War II Australia had sent several divisions to the Middle East and with Japan's attack, "got caught with its pants down" and would have been lost but for the United States. He referred to the rising feeling in the Labor Party against overseas service and said that although if war came Australia would send its troops where needed, it would be much easier if they had the assurance of a Pact.

In response to questions, Mr. Spender stated that he personally realized that there was no danger of Australia being attacked and no probability that they would ever be attacked without simultaneous attack on the United States. But in his view "that is not the point". It is public opinion and the necessity of assurance of some assistance. He added that if there is no danger, then the United States commitment under the Pact would be less than that of Australia.

Messrs. Spender and Officer made two additional points regarding public opinion: (1) the Australians, with their affection for the United States, do not understand why, when they are prepared to stand with us if we are attacked, they get no response. It is a feeling that "friends don't get the same consideration as weak sisters" and that the Australians "are not getting a fair go". Every time we extend the NAT, as to Greece and Turkey, we strengthen that feeling. (2) Present United States ideas for a "soft" peace with Japan would be very difficult to sell without the counter balance of a pact.

Mr. Hickerson observed that in short the Australian Government's main concern is public opinion rather than any invocation of a Pact in the immediate future. Mr. Spender agreed with the qualification that of course a Pact would have preventive value and would improve general stability. He did not feel that other means, such as intensified diplomatic consultation to let Australia's voice be heard would serve the same purpose. (He referred to his defense against criticism for Australia's exclusion from Korean planning.) However, he did agree that some bilateral agreement would help.

Mr. Hickerson concluded on the note that we see their problems and are sympathetic but there are still major difficulties involved and we do not, at the moment, know the answers.

CONFIDENTIAL BANGKOK, October 20, 1950—5 p. m.

442. If reports correct of major diversion to France and Indochina of funds presently available for military aid in general China area, I urge careful consideration following points:

1. Recent military developments Indochina point to probability if Viet Minh attacks increase in strength and frequency French will have to give up Tonkin and concentrate forces for defense Cochin-China in spite any increase military aid we may give.

2. Viet Minh infiltration into Laos and Cambodia will in consequence be virtually unopposed with result that Commies will have little difficulty seizing control these two territories thus outflanking French and directly threatening Thailand.

3. We expect here these developments will closely coincide with efforts by well-organized Commie groups in Thailand seize control this country.

4. Even greatly increased military aid France and Indochina unlikely enable French hold all Indochina including Laos and Cambodia and create secure bastion for all SEA.

5. Therefore logical that other countries SEA and Thailand in particular because its geographic and strategic position be strengthened in order prevent complete engulfment by Commies of SEA countries.

At Thailand considering antipathy Thai people for Communism, realize prosperity, veneration for King and religion, and friendship toward US/UN and western democracies [garble] comparatively solid foundation on which to build strength [sic].

We strongly urge therefore no cut in approved aid recommended 50–51 program for Thailand and that shipments be greatly expedited.

Memorandum by the Department of Defense Member on the Southeast Asia Aid Policy Committee (Malony)

SEAC D–27

Subject: U.S. Position With Respect to Thailand, Burma and Malaya

[1] Drafted on October 30 and circulated as document SEAC D–27 on October 31.

Problem

To determine what policies are required to strengthen the security of Thailand, Burma and Malaya, individually or together, in order both to increase the effectiveness of U.S. policies in Indochina and to anticipate the possible loss of all or part of Indochina.

Discussion

The security of Thailand is closely related to the security of Indochina. If Communist forces gain control of Laos and Tonkin, they would outflank and endanger Northeastern Thailand, develop a direct overland route for passage of arms from South China to Thailand, and, to a lesser extent, would threaten Eastern Burma. At the present time the Thailand government has inadequate internal forces to cope with such a threat.

Thailand is the one country in Southeast Asia that has remained free of colonial control. U.S. officials have formed a healthy respect for the independent thinking of the Thai government and the relatively competent manner in which the Thai people seem to handle their problems. Accordingly, and in view of the extremely complicated Indochina situation, it might be advisable for the U.S. government to consider its policy with respect to Thailand, in particular. As a long-term policy, the U.S. might well put greater effort and interest in Thailand insofar as Southeast Asia is concerned.

Burma is an area primarily of British interest and relationship. In view of the long common frontier between Burma and Thailand, the U.S. should take an interest, from the military point of view, in promoting closer relations between these two countries, in aiding The British Service Mission, and in establishing appropriate bilateral relations between Burma and the U.S.

Malaya is significant in this area because it is a large source of dollar earnings for the United Kingdom. These earnings, in turn, affect British capabilities within the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Accordingly, it is important to strengthen the defense of Burma, Thailand and Indochina in order to keep the threat of Communist encroachment as far away from Malaya as possible.

Recommendations

It is recommended that the Southeast Asia Aid Policy Committee (a) consider the desirability of defining U.S. policy on the above problem, (b) establish a working group to draft a policy statement for NSC consideration, and (c) indicate the Committee's interest in this problem, through proper channels, to the Intelligence Advisory Committee,[2] for the purpose of obtaining a national estimate of the U.S. security interests involved in the problem.[3]

Mission to Southeast Asia [2]

7. Mr. Melby reported on his mission with General Erskine to Southeast Asia. This mission included State, military and ECA people.

8. When the mission was in Indochina the military situation was in a quiescent period and this condition permitted the mission to travel over a good part of Indochina. The French military forces are active during the day but retire to their defenses at night. At night the Viet Minh forces hold forth and carry on their normal operations which include not only raids on villages but the collection of taxes, rice, etc. The Viet Minh forces have lost considerable support by their vicious use of communist tactics. When the mission was first in Indochina the French were preparing for an offensive but the Viet Minh leadership apparently found out about this and it anticipated them by launching their own offensive. The serious situation in Indochina is evident by the fact that one-half of the French Army, one-half of the French air force, and one-fourth of the navy are tied up in Indochina, but they are still unable to control the country. The military representatives on the mission felt that the French were justified in recently pulling back from some of their positions but the extent of their retreat was probably not warranted.

[1] This meeting of Under Secretary Webb and other principal officers of the Department was attended by the Secretary of State.

[2] For the joint Mutual Defense Assistance Program survey mission's final written report, December 6, see p. 164.

9. At the present time Hanoi and the Red River Delta are in jeopardy and the chances of this whole area being lost is possible. If the French can hold this area until a national Vietnamese Army is formed, there would be considerable support. The formation of a Vietnamese Army is important militarily and politically. In addition, if the Army is formed the psychology of the Vietnam would be completely changed. However, they need many arms and officers in order to form such an army. Because the loss of French officers in Indochina has been greater than the output of the French military schools, it is not hopeful that the French could supply the necessary training officers to form cadres for this national army. It cannot be expected that the French could or should make any more concessions. The problem is to instill confidence in the Vietnam and assist them in obtaining a realistic concept of their needs and the conduct of their affairs. The Vietnam must be compelled in every possible way to have a more responsible attitude toward their affairs. Of course it should be pointed out that if the French left, Ho Chi Minh would quickly take over the country.

10. The favorable position of Malaya should be credited to a considerable extent to the work of Malcolm MacDonald. The so-called Briggs plan is enforced now by which forces sweep the country of bandits, killing them and their assistants as they go along. As they move through the country and find people who have no land, land is deeded outright to them. Also local police are established and general economic and social reforms take place. Considerable progress has been made in giving some of the people basic education. The success of this experiment has been extremely good. The attitude of the people in Malaya is very good and they sincerely believe that the British are attempting to give them self-government. There is no opposition to the British except to the bandits which are systematically being cleaned out.

11. Siam is openly committed to our side and deserves our support. The Siamese military force consists of men who are excellently trained but who are without equipment. They have 19th century arms and no ammunition but take a great deal of pride in maintaining their equipment and vigorously following a most rigid training program. One of the problems in Siam is that there are too many old generals who have political influence. The Siamese feel that they should have 11 divisions but this is partly rationalized by the fact that such a number would take care of all the generals which they now have. The army is impressive because of their willingness to be trained and because of their excellent morale.

12. In Indonesia the mission was unable to make a complete investigation, even though the reception was cordial. The government officials pointed out that their present policy is one of neutrality and therefore could not reach an understanding with the mission. Ambassador Cochran feels that given a reasonable period of time the Indonesians will come around to the acceptance of some U.S. support. It was pointed out that the Indian Ambassador here has made violent speeches against the U.S.

13. In the Philippines the problem is more one of correcting the corruption in the government and of assisting in the necessary social and economic reforms. We cannot afford failure in this area and the Filipinos want our help. The Huks are increasing in strength but it is almost certain that their strength would decline perceptibly if the economic situation in the Philippines improved.

14. In summary the people in Southeast Asia are sympathetic toward the U.S. and are not supporters of communism. However, it should be recognized that generally the people in this area are sympathetic toward Ho Chi Minh because he is now fighting the French. Among the possible recommendations which might be suggested are such proposals as having a stockpile program for Southeast Asia, probably located in the Philippines. Also, it might be wise, if conditions permit, for the U.S. to have two American divisions readied in the Philippines. Another possibility might be to reactivate the Philippine scouts, which has certain disadvantages, or provide payment for two or three Philippine divisions. In this regard it should be noted that the Philippine Government cannot support an enlarged army and some support would have to be given by the U.S. Another suggestion is to set up a regional MDAP organization which would operate in Southeast Asia as an American organization for coordinating political, economic and military problems in this area.

15. Mr. Melby was complimented by the Secretary for his excellent presentation. Mr. Ohly pointed out that the Melby mission is a good example of how such a group can work efficiently together.

The Ambassador in the United Kingdom (Douglas) to the Secretary of State

CONFIDENTIAL LONDON, November 14, 1950—4 p. m.

2813. Please pass ECA for Harlan Cleveland. Department's attention invited to fact that "Colombo Plan for cooperative economic development in South and Southeast Asia" will be published both in official and popular form November 21[1] and that British Government planning give wide publicity to it, thus raising in acute form question of US attitudes. We have found among Asian representatives here great curiosity about and interest in US position regarding plan and suggest that attitude of Asians toward US might immediately be favorably affected if US should express itself as in favor of aid to Asia and that conversely continued silence on our part might lead Asians to believe US not interested aid to Asia.

Embassy has been glad to learn from Joseph Jones[2] latest ECA and Department thinking on aid to Asia. Question arises whether Department may not wish to release to press statement tied to Colombo report at an appropriate time or in any case to give Embassy policy guidance for discussing matter with British Government and press which continues to display lively interest in matter.

Department may quite possibly not wish now give preview its development plan for aid to Asia. On other hand Embassy suggests that publication of Colombo report offers splendid opportunity for doing so and at same time for clarifying a few main points as to desirable relation of US aid to Commonwealth plan. Such a statement could include for example indication that Commonwealth conclusions as to scope and kinds of program seem reasonable from what we, without detailed investigation, have been able to judge. It could make it clear (if as Embassy understands it is our position) that US aid to Asian countries would be administered bilaterally in coordination with local plans and other aid accruing in the individual country, and that we believe there need be no conflict with US or UN assistance. It could specify degree to which US feels it could participate in advisory and consultative group in Colombo. It might with advantage emphasize in same statement that US is already carrying on broad aid programs in SEA and that UN likewise has certain programs and plans for aid to Asia.

Incidentally in informal discussions here British have suggested that bilateral approach is only feasible approach for US aid to Asia. Also we gather impression that British are overwhelmingly interested in application of plan to India and have no design for re-establishing influence in SEA through plan and seem willing to have US continue carry main responsibility for this area.

We feel that substantial political advantage could accrue from clearing up these several points in an early public statement. We realize however that a large strategy is involved and that any public statement on Colombo plan must fit into it.

The Secretary of State to the Embassy in London

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, November 22, 1950—6 p. m.

2698. Pls convey to UKGovt fol position relative to questions advanced by Gaitskell concerning US participation in Colombo Plan.[1]

USGovt is fully aware development aspirations of countries this area. It understands need for such development and has independently devoted much study to nature of problem, its necessary dimensions, and role which US might play in contributing to a solution. Participation of USGovt in arrangements for continuing consultation on development problems in South and SEA wld be natural consequence of US interest and work in this area. It must be emphasized, however, that such participation wld not imply approval or endorsement of particular development programs which have been submitted to the comite or a commitment by this Govt to provide financial aid for such programs.

USGovt believes that emphasis shld be on continuing consultation and not on formal organization as such. Believe it wld be undesirable contemplate substantial full-time secretariat. Periodic meetings of participating govts shld be the means by which reviews of progress and other exchanges of info wld be accomplished rather than thru services of a permanent central staff.

[1] Hugh Gaitskell, British Minister of Economic Affairs, visited Washington from October 8 to October 12. In telegram 1930, October 13, not printed, the Department of State informed the Embassy in London that during a meeting with Under Secretary Webb and other Department officials on October 10, Gaitskell had put forth certain questions regarding the United States attitude toward the Colombo Plan. He had asked whether the United States would "come in"; if so, what type of organization it desired; whether the Philippines should participate; and what procedure should be followed henceforth. (890.00/10–1350)

Foregoing wld be consistent with understanding of USGovt that functions Consultative Comite will continue to be exploratory, advisory, and consultative and that comite will remain informal as at present. It is the view of this Govt that any material or technical contribution which US might make (other than that provided thru UN agencies) wld be directed bilaterally toward recipient countries. Believe also that avoidance of duplication in various bilateral and UN programs in any country will have to be worked out primarily among those concerned in that country rather than from a central org.

Further believe any reports which might emerge from consultative comite must carefully avoid any implication of certification of relative needs of participating countries and any implication of endorsement of claims for external assistance.

Question of inviting participation of other Asian govts is, of course, for consultative comite to determine. USGovt believes, however, that it wld be desirable that non-Commonwealth countries in the region be participants in consultative comite if US is also to be invited, in order to avoid possible misapprehensions in area of an exclusive Commonwealth–US club.

On assumption foregoing views consistent with those of and acceptable to other members of Consultative Comite, USGovt is willing, with agreement of all member countries, participate with other govts in future meetings of consultative comite.

In period immed ahead, USGovt intends continue study programs of Commonwealth countries. In this regard it may informally seek additional detailed info from technical representatives of the particular countries which have formulated development programs. This Govt believes that other govts which may be in a position to contribute to programs shld formulate specifically as possible the nature and level of their possible assistance.

When the Colombo Plan Report is publicly released this Govt will be prepared to express publicly its views along lines summarized above.

Apart from above suggestions US at this time has no further opinion concerning procedures to be fol.

Re Philippines: As indicated above USGovt believes question of inviting Phil participation in program, or participation of any other Asian Govt is for consultative comite to determine. Discussions between US and Phil on econ problems of latter Govt now taking place. USGovt doubts that there wld be an inconsistency between these developments and Phil participation in Colombo Plan.

SECRET WASHINGTON, November 30, 1950.

Between my morning and afternoon meetings with Senators Taft [2] and Millikin,[3] I jotted down the enclosed notes which I read to Millikin and Taft in the afternoon, indicative of my own initial reactions to the Korean developments.[4]

JOHN FOSTER DULLES

[Annex]

Paper Prepared by Mr. John Foster Dulles, Consultant to the Secretary of State

SECRET [WASHINGTON, November 30, 1950.]

ESTIMATE OF SITUATION

1. Developments in Asia confirm that there is a comprehensive program, in which the Soviet and Chinese communists are cooperating, designed as a present phase to eliminate all Western influence on the Asiatic mainland, and probably also in relation to the islands of Japan, Formosa, the Philippines, and Indonesia. It would be reckless not to assume that such a program has been carefully worked out and that steps are being prepared to implement all its various aspects. What has happened shows that our policies have been sound in so far as they have recognized the impossibility of separating the Chinese and Soviet communists, at least for the predictable future. The mistake has been inadequate appraisal of the danger that resulted from the hostile alliance. Through underestimating the risks, we may have been sucked into a major military disaster in Korea which could not only gravely impair, for a time, the military capability of the United States everywhere, but which would have grave psychological repercussions upon the Japanese nation and the countries and islands of South East Asia.

The repercussions will not be limited to Asia, but will extend to Western Europe and the British Commonwealth. These countries have misjudged the situation in China even more seriously than have we. Nevertheless, they have until now deferred to our policies, particularly in relation to Korea. If these policies lead to a major disaster, they may be less disposed to follow us in the future, despite the fact that in reality our policies were more nearly right than were theirs.

2. As far as the future position in Asia is concerned, it would seem that we must now more closely limit ourselves to areas subject to sea and air power, which fits our natural role.

3. The question of whether we can hold on in Korea and if so, where, is of course a military one. From a political standpoint, however, it is important to hold at least a sizable beachhead in south Korea so as to deny this area to communist military concentrations which, with the concentration already present in Sakhalin Island, would put Japan in position where the nation would probably reconcile itself to falling into the Soviet communist orbit. It would not now seem practical to proceed with a formal Japanese peace treaty, but if Japan is not to fall under communist control, a major political effort is required. This would doubtless involve some sort of agreement with Japan which, while short of a formal peace treaty, would restore to Japan a large measure of self-government together with the capacity and, we might hope, the will to use her strength in the cause of the free world, or at least to make the exertions necessary to prevent communist conquest of this area, which with its industrial power and trained and disciplined manpower is a dominate [dominant] factor in Asia and the Pacific.

4. As regards Vietnam, it would seem that this situation would need to be reconsidered in the light of what might be a hopeless military situation, given the efforts which the Chinese communists seem prepared to make.

5. It would seem that there should be a review of our attitude towards Formosa. Our sea and air power and the presence of the Chinese Nationalists, should make it possible to salvage Formosa, and perhaps use it as a base for covert and perhaps open Chinese activities against the China mainland, which would at least divert the Chinese government (communist).

6. Consideration should be given to the possibility of stimulating guerrilla and insurrectional activities in China against the Communist government. We presently have good will and friends, but this will not be indefinitely available in the face of propaganda and purge.

7. It would seem important to accelerate some understanding with Australia and New Zealand, the only two dependable countries in the Pacific area.

8. So far as Europe is concerned, it must, I think, be taken as doubtful that there will be time to create an effective European army at the rate this is now moving, or perhaps even at the optimum rate. If so, the question of the best use of our economic, military and manpower resources would need to be reconsidered.

9. In general, it would seem that consideration should be given to the possibility of stepping up subversive activities within areas of Soviet control, where ever there are any elements available for such purposes. We can not safely go on playing a purely defensive role, as this enables the potential enemy to organize themselves at one place or another with a pre-arranged time table which we have no will or capacity to disarrange. Our best defense lies in exploiting potential jealousies, rivalries, and disaffections within the present area of Soviet communist control so as to divert them from external adventures to the problem of attempting to consolidate an already over-extended position.

SECRET WASHINGTON, December 6, 1950.

To: The FMACC

I have the honor to submit herewith the final recommendations and report of the Joint State–Defense Mutual Defense Assistance Program Survey Mission to Southeast Asia,[2] together with my own final comments. The country reports for Indochina, Malaya, Thailand, the Philippines, and Indonesia have already been submitted.[3] Due to internal developments it was not possible for the Mission to visit or make a report on Burma. This final report includes our observations on an area basis together with a few changes in detail on the various country reports. Contrary to our expectations, we have found no call out of our area experience to revise any of our major judgments on any given country. Rather, developments in recent weeks in Indochina, for example, have only served to reinforce our conviction on the magnitude of the general problem, its growing difficulties, the importance of the area to the United States, and the serious menace which the threats and the disturbances in the area present to American security and interests.

In each report submitted by the Mission every member has been given the opportunity to express his views and recommendations. It will have been noted that although on numerous occasions these views and recommendations have differed on various phases and specific details of a given problem, these differences to a large extent have arisen from the particular viewpoint and the specific technical competence of the individual concerned. I am convinced, however, that out of our observations and experience, both singular and collective, the Mission has completed its task with an extraordinary community of views on the broad, general problem of Southeast Asia, its complexities, and its indicated solutions. Despite this general agreement I, of course, assume sole responsibility for the political interpretations and recommendations herein contained.

Throughout the entire extent of our travels, our observations, and our conversations, one major impression grew and developed, namely, the lack of definition and of coordination of American policy and objectives in Southeast Asia. The closest we could come in finding any precision of approach in policy was that American policy is designed to deny to the enemy the area and its resources, both human and material. This is legitimate as far as it goes, but it is not good enough, being both negative and vague. Unless this policy is developed further it will in all probability fail. And it will fail in an atmosphere in which, despite the magnitude of the problems to be solved, a positive and vigorous policy can succeed. We observed political, military, economic and propaganda programs, each doing the best it could in the given circumstances, and each at the same time failing to contribute that which should be expected and that which is obtainable. Wherein arises the difficulty? Wherefrom the failure?

I am convinced that the basic difficulty arises from the failure in responsible American policy circles to answer and define in detail two basic questions: (1) What is Southeast Asia worth to the United States? (2) What is the United States able and willing within the confines of its over-all commitments and its over-all resources to pay for Southeast Asia? Despite various attempts which have been made to answer these two questions we have found nowhere anything other than a reluctance to face up to them or than general and sometimes contradictory answers. Until these questions are answered and American activities oriented in line with the answers, we can only expect that American activities will be aimless, conflicting, and self-defeating. It is of course beyond the competence, the knowledge, and the terms of reference of the Survey Mission to provide the answers; nor will we attempt to do so. We suggest the problem because our own military recommendations for the area have been hypothecated on the intention of the United States to attach the countries of Southeast Asia firmly to the democratic bloc, and our specific military recommendations are designed to secure that objective. We have realized, however, that military activity is only one aspect of the problem and that without precise area and particular objectives, and coordinated over-all programs, the military effort is not only futile but will almost certainly fail at a not negligible cost. I would indicate the area alternatives, as we see them, which should be taken into account in placing the problem of Southeast Asia in the American world context.

There would appear to be three major alternatives of policy. These alternatives are presented on the assumption that loss of any one of the countries to the enemy would almost certainly result in the loss of all the other countries, with the possible exception of the Philippines which presents a specialized problem and where the unique American position and responsibility would, we assume, indicate a kind of intervention different from what we might undertake in other countries:

1. To cut our losses and disengage ourselves entirely from the mainland of Southeast Asia and probably also Indonesia. This decision would be based on a lack of resources to hold the area or a belief that it could not be held regardless of the cost. We have no opinion on available resources, but we are convinced that the area can be held if we are determined to do so. We are also convinced that the broad base of the area wishes to remain with us and to be assisted in doing so.

2. A holding operation which does not anticipate full success on its own merits but which would envisage holding as much as possible, even at a high price, and long enough for some other eventuality to develop which would of its own weight and magnitude automatically solve the general problems or, at least, the menace of Southeast Asia for the United States. However fumbling, open to criticism, and expensive such a solution might be, it could well be justified if there were some definite and properly timed eventuality in mind and planned. It could hardly be justified if that eventuality were only the "miracle solution", which at times has appeared to be too much the last despairing and defeatist French hope in Indochina.

3. The third solution is the decision that Southeast Asia can be held and that the United States can pay the price. It is not for us to attempt an answer on American ability to pay the price. As I have stated before, we are convinced that the area is willing and able to become and remain in a community of interests and relationship with the United States if we will do the necessary. We are equally persuaded that American interests dictate the accession of the area to the American camp if it is within our capability to bring this about. The local factors which argue for workability of this solution are simple and persuasive.

(b) The manpower of the countries concerned is larger than that of the United States itself. Its peoples are industrious, intelligent, and in most parts possess ancient and impressive cultural traditions.

(c) Though largely undeveloped, the area possesses great natural wealth and many strategic materials of basic importance to the United States.

(d) Although the standards of living do not begin to approach those of the Atlantic community, the problem of Southeast Asia is nowhere complicated by the corrosive poverty which so tragically characterizes the masses of China and India. Nowhere is there the gnawing cancer of the land problem, except in the Central Luzon plains and in Java, and in these two instances there is a solution to be found in adjacent empty lands—again in distinction to China and India where there are too many people for the land available and simply no plausible place for the large surplus population to migrate.

(e) The overwhelming motif of Southeast Asian thought and emotion is nationalism. There is no need here to explore its whys and wherefores. It is a fact which dominates all Southeast Asian life and a wind which can be slowed-down or speeded-up, changed somewhat in course, but now never reversed or brought to a halt. Now, whatever the cost or whatever the time interval involved, the peoples of Southeast Asia will for all practical purposes in the end become self-determining. The United States has never denied the validity of this concept, and in general has for that matter expressed its sympathy with the movement, thereby incurring the regrettable, if understandable, resentment of the slowly receding colonial powers. The peoples of Asia, on the other hand, are quite aware of this American attitude and have given us a full measure of appreciation for our understanding. Where we have lost sympathy—and we are losing it today at an alarming rate—it is because we have been less vigorous in our support of nationalism than Asia would have wished and because, be it admitted, the problem for us is not simply one of Southeast Asia versus the colonial powers, but has been gravely complicated by issues which are larger than just Southeast Asia. The tragedy is that in several of the countries the Communists have succeeded in capturing the leadership in the nationalist movement and in identifying themselves with it. The Communists have been and are the one organized force which has bitterly and uncompromisingly fought colonialism. Communism as an ideology is understood only by pitifully small groups, and in the areas where the impact of its practices and excesses have been felt it retains its hold only because it can still persuade that it is centrally nationalist and only peripherally something else. Sufficient effort has yet to be made to demonstrate that it represents a tyranny far more onerous and degrading than European colonialism at its worst and the complete negation of those values of religion, community organization, and personal worth which are the very heart-beat of Asian life and culture. If Southeast Asia could be convinced of these ugly facts and strengthened in its inherent belief that they are also the core of America and of American interest in self-determination, there would be no question of which way it would go.

Full recognition should coincidentally be given to the difficulties which would confront this solution. Granted the emphasis in Asiatic thinking on the all-important goal of nationalism, it will be exceedingly difficult for the United States to sell the menace of communism unless it can identify itself with nationalism. In most of Southeast Asia there is no fear of communism as we understand it. For them communism so far is the by-product of nationalism whose ideological doctrines, in so far as they are known at all, do not appear necessarily evil and, in some respects, appear to offer acceptable solutions for some of the many pressing economic problems which beset the area. The task of persuasion will be the more difficult for the lack of experience with their practical application. Although it appears as a unit on the map, the area has historically been largely a prey to centrifugal pulls. Since the war against Japan, progress has been made in building up a cohesiveness largely, it is true, through the impact of nationalism and, in more aware circles, the fear of communism. Much yet remains to be done, however, and must be reckoned with in any area program. Most important perhaps is the appalling amount of illiteracy, the lack of communication among the broad masses, and the absence of any real starvation pressures which result in a significant and widespread apathy. The spoils will go to the leader who can promise something more that is understandable and within the limited horizons of the recipient. In this respect, the appeals and the approach of local leaders have much to teach us. On balance, however, we believe that the strength of our position can be greater than our weakness.

Arising from the foregoing generalities, certain specific problems must be considered. These concern not only the military aspect but also corollary problems and solutions. I should state at this point that in so far as my lack of military competence permits, I concur entirely with the military observations and recommendations made by General Erskine, as attached. (It was apparent from all my own observations and conversations that General Erskine, by his own abilities, accomplishments, understanding and growth, commanded the unqualified respect, confidence and admiration of all officials, both civilian and military, with whom he came in contact. His usefulness in and knowledge of Southeast Asia should by all means be put to the best possible use.)

1. Regional organization. Balancing the arguments for and against which are listed in enclosure 2.[4] General Erskine has recommended the establishment of a regional MDAP organization. I concur with his reasoning and his recommendation. He of course assumes that the MDAP for Southeast Asia will be on a scale at least as large as that recommended by the Mission or its equivalent. A program of this scope seems to me obviously to require an area approach which would be unnecessary were the program to be limited in size to that of fiscal year 1950. To his reasons I would only add my conviction that even though Burma and Indonesia at present do not figure in the picture there are important political forces which can before long bring them in. My own preference would be for a separate theatre of operations rather than having Southeast Asia under CINCPAC or CINCFE. The problems of Southeast Asia are sufficiently unique, and there is enough growing cohesiveness in the area, to warrant its treatment as an area and avoid complicating it by the inclusion of such disparate areas as Formosa, Korea, Australia and New Zealand. The same applies at the moment to India, although it is not inconceivable that developments in the predictable future would counsel a reappraisal.

Although I would agree that the commanding military officer in the theatre should have appropriate rank and authority over strictly military matters, I could not agree that his authority should extend into other realms. His relationship to the various ambassadors should be that of a partnership, with each having authority in his own field and differences to be resolved on a high level in Washington. This raises the question of a broader regional organization which I would recommend along the following lines:

Some time ago consideration was given to the establishment of a regional organization, possibly along lines somewhat comparable to the British organization in Southeast Asia which surrounds the person of Malcolm MacDonald. At that time the idea was discarded for good and sufficient reasons. I believe the time has now come when it might be profitable to reconsider that proposal. With the present state of the China debacle; with the events in Korea, Japan, and Formosa; with the unsettled attitude of India; and with the growing closeness of Southeast Asian countries, I believe that some form of regional American organization in the area could perform a useful function, not only for our own representatives but also to encourage the local countries to strengthen their own intra-area relationships, of which the first sign was the Baguio meeting last spring. Every one of our ambassadors with whom we worked at one time or another expressed the need for closer cooperation of the countries concerned and for a greater exchange of ideas and opinions among our own people in the area. None of this reflected any criticism of the coordinating work of the Department in Washington but, rather, a belief that there was a type of coordination to supplement Washington to be done in the area, arising from a greater closeness to the actual scene. The person designated for this job would have coordinating and advisory responsibilities, but without executive or administrative authority, similar to the case with the British Commissioner-General for Southeast Asia who must rely largely for his authority on his own personal persuasiveness and the common sense of his recommendations. He would necessarily spend much of his time traveling so that he could speak with the authority of intimate first-hand knowledge. He by no means necessarily need be a famous name in the United States and, in fact, might better not be too well known in order to avoid arousing undue suspicions of American intentions. His interests would include the political, economic, military and propaganda; and the regional MDAP organization would be attached to his office. In other respects his staff would be kept to an absolute minimum, probably not exceeding two or three officers with appropriate supporting staff. His headquarters should be in Manila since that is the focus of American activities in the area and has the most adequate administrative facilities. The reasons against locating him in any other country are obvious. I would suggest that the title of commissioner-general or commissioner not be used in order to avoid the association with British and French colonialism. He might be an ambassador-at-large, or better, diplomatic agent, with appropriate rank. Concentration of appropriate functions in his office could eliminate many of the conflicts and contradictions which will inevitably arise with expanding American activities in various fields.

2. Native troops. One of the most serious weaknesses in all countries has been the failure properly to develop the use of native troops. This has been particularly striking in Indochina. The arguments on the incompetence of these troops are too well known to need recapitulation. The answer is that the Viet Minh uses them exclusively. The bandits in Malaya, the dissidents in Indonesia, and the Huks in the Philippines all demonstrate that native troops can and will fight if they believe that they have something to fight for. Furthermore, white troops will always be associated with colonialism, and even granting as most Southeast Asians do that withdrawal of white troops now would precipitate an immediate Communist victory, the new governments and peoples cannot be expected to cooperate fully in the anti-Communist struggle until they are given that kind of confidence and psychological fillip which can come from having their own armies, and with it the knowledge that their views and opinions will carry the weight which they can acquire from having force at their disposal. There is, of course, danger that this force will be turned against us, but as contrasted with the certain danger arising from Southeast Asian determination that its peoples will be independent, it appears the lesser of the risks. The former is a risk, the latter well-nigh a certainty. It might even prove possible in time to organize a Southeast Asian expeditionary force available for use anywhere in the area.

White manpower is strictly limited and its commitments are heavy. The Russians have learned the trick of using others to fight their battles. It is time that we learned the trick of at least having Asians fight Asian battles before we find that our manpower resources have reached the danger point of exhaustion. Even though there is and will continue to be great need for American aid in various forms, it is now in order that Asia learn to do more for itself in the military as well as in other fields. It is also high time that those Asiatics who are allied with our enemy learn that they do not represent all Asia and that most of Asia opposes them when given the chance. Much of the stigma of colonialism can be removed if, where necessary, yellow men will be killed by yellow men rather than by white men alone.

3. Counterpart funds. Consideration should be given to greater flexibility in the counterpart funds expected from the countries in the area. Despite their basic wealth, none of these countries is today in the kind of financial position where it can afford the cost of modern warfare on anything approaching the scale to which we are accustomed. By no means the least important aspect of denying Southeast Asia to communism is that the countries must be self-supporting and prosperous. That is the aim of our economic program. If, at the same time, the military phase requires unduly onerous contributions from the recipient governments, the economic program will be defeated. It can be accepted as axiomatic that no amount of force will succeed unless there is a reasonable minimum of economic stability. Forces which are now at work in Southeast Asia are greater and more powerful than force itself. It is therefore recommended that financial contribution to be made by Southeast Asia be adjusted in the light of its capacities.

4. Caliber of MAAG personnel. Since our recommendations for matériel necessarily include provision for widespread training by American cadres, selection of personnel is of supreme importance. With the spread of nationalism American training must be far more persuasion than compulsion. The extent of persuasion will in no small measure depend upon the abilities, caliber, and understanding of the men selected. They should therefore be among the finest in the American armed services. In this respect, the selections made so far are anything but encouraging and must be remedied at the earliest possible moment unless much of our impact is to be wasted, if not positively harmful.

5. Intelligence. One of the most depressing lacks we encountered was the quality of intelligence available to us wherever we traveled. Almost without exception we were compelled to do the basic work which should have been available in each office we visited. Not only was the information inadequate, its interpretation was faulty. These observations apply not only to Southeast Asia, but also to Hong Kong which we visited briefly. In the latter case, we expected comprehensive coverage and understanding of developments in China and of our particular interest in the Indochina border. We did not find them. This deficiency applied to all agencies concerned with intelligence work. None were performing satisfactorily and, with only a few honorable exceptions, the individuals concerned were not qualified to discharge their responsibilities. Considering the imminent peril in which the United States finds itself, it is at best shocking that those who are charged with formulating policy should be forced to do so on the basis of faulty and even misleading information. It is little exaggeration to say that in the circumstances the situation approaches malfeasance. The dreadful lesson of Korea should be enough, but even a drastic improvement in personnel is not enough.

We also found a great need for intelligence coordination on an area basis. Although there is some exchange between countries and some between services, it is inadequate. Much of the exchange which does exist goes from a given country back to Washington and thence is returned to other countries. When it is received it is frequently too late to be of value and lacks in the kind of intimate area understanding which comes best from within the area. It is therefore recommended that a central coordinating intelligence organization for all concerned services be established in Manila through which all information would be filtered for checking, correlation, evaluation and dissemination within the area. The output, in addition to local dissemination, could be sent directly to Washington, if any particular service so desired it. But we do feel strongly that the process described above should be going on coincidentally within the area.

6. The Philippines. The unique American record and position in the Philippines creates a special problem. To Asia the Philippines is the American show window on Asia and the tangible evidence of American intentions and performance. Asia does not find the results encouraging at the moment. The President and the Secretary of State have said publicly that aggression against the Philippines will not be tolerated. We assume this includes internal as well as external aggression. We assume that communism, however Filipinized it might appear, will be considered as aggression and a threat to the security of the United States. In brief, we assume that the Philippine experiment must and will succeed, and that any measure necessary thereto will be undertaken. I shall not consider here the economic aspects of the problem, which have been so ably analyzed and handled by the Bell Mission [5] and whose report is now in process of implementation. I shall suggest three points on the military side which are in addition to our general military recommendations for matériel and training:

(a) Stockpiling. Wherever we went in Southeast Asia we found a disposition to believe that the United States means what it says about military aid. There was, however, a skepticism as to our ability to provide such aid in a crisis, due to an intervening distance of more than 10,000 miles. This skepticism suggested to us the possibility of stockpiling in the Philippines, where the matériel would be available on short notice and would provide a certain flexibility in the redistribution of equipment between various countries in the light of developing circumstances. Stockpiling would not only have beneficial results throughout the area, but would have a particularly sobering effect upon certain undesirable and ambitious Philippine elements.

(b) It is further recommended that two American divisions be stationed in the Philippines. The presence of American troops would help to alleviate the military burden which the Philippine Government is now carrying and which is greater than its resources can long stand, it would discourage unruly elements, and would add greater stability. The President of the Philippines indicated to me that he would welcome additional American troops.

(c) Additional Philippine troops. The suggestion has been advanced that the Philippine Scouts be reactivated. There is much to be said for this proposal although it possesses the old disadvantage of American officers commanding Filipinos and Filipinos receiving advantages denied Philippine troops. Perhaps a better alternative would be for the United States to organize, train and entirely pay for two additional Philippine divisions for as long as necessary, thus establishing a future hard core of a good army which could be reduced in size when the Communist threat has been removed. During the period of danger the United States would at the same time, of course, need to be importantly concerned with the organization, training, and promotion system of the entire army, to ensure that it reached satisfactory standards.

[5] For documentation on the economic survey mission to the Philippines headed by Daniel W. Bell, which submitted its report in October 1950, see pp. 1399 ff.

7. Propaganda. If American activities are to have the desired impact, they must be well and properly advertised. Such is not the case at present. I recognize the handicaps under which the USIS is operating, its difficulties, and the limitations on its activities, but this must be changed. At present we are talking over the heads of Southeast Asia, and doing so inadequately. Wherever we went we found the same story—a mass of material of which relatively little was pointed directly at Southeast Asia and, therefore, was not only missing the mark but also causing important Southeast Asian elements to ask just what we were after, what did we think we were doing anyway, and what did all this mean? Everywhere we found agreement that the most effective instrument of USIS so far is the libraries. This is all well and good as a long-range program which by all means should be continued and increased, but it does not produce results today. Current activities need advertising today—not tomorrow.

Most importantly in talking to Southeast Asia today, we must learn the psychology of poor people—at best a difficult lesson for Americans to learn—a lesson which the Russians have already learned altogether too well. It is not enough that we try to teach Southeast Asia to understand us; it is perhaps even more important that we learn to understand them. Until we do learn that, we will never understand their apathy in the face of communism, nor will we ever really learn how to interpret America and American democracy to peoples for whom the United States is still a legendary land half-way around the world. Nor will we learn that we must first make clear to them the menace of Chinese and Russian imperialism, which they can understand, and thence identify communism with those imperialisms.

8. Economic. Since the economic aspects of the Southeast Asian problem have been most adequately covered in the report of the Griffin Mission, I shall not consider them here.

In conclusion I would state that if we are to ally Southeast Asia to ourselves, the decision to do so must be taken now. The issue of China has been settled. The future and meaning of Korea are still unsettled and uneasy. The role and attitude of India are a growing shadow across the face of Asia, influenced by events in China and, in turn, influencing Southeast Asia. Under these pressures the time of decision on the future of Southeast Asia has long since arisen above the horizon and is reaching for the zenith. Everything we have seen and heard convinces us that the area can be held if we will it. But it must be done now. In the eyes of Asia, failure will for the predictable future compromise, if not destroy, American influence and prestige. America without Asia will have been reduced to the Western Hemisphere and a precarious foothold on the western fringe of the Eurasian continent. Success will vindicate and give added meaning to America and the American way of life.

Respectfully submitted,

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. George H. Alexander of the Economic Resources and Security Staff

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, December 11, 1950.

Subject: Anglo-American cooperation in rubber.

Participants: E—Mr. O'Gara
ER—Messrs. Armstrong and Alexander
BNA—Mr. Labouisse [1]
General Services, Administration—General Wilson, Messrs. Walsh [2] and Casto [3]
British Embassy—Messrs. McDougall [4] and Christelow [5]

The meeting was called at the request of the Department to consider informally the necessity and desirability of a unified Anglo-American approach to world rubber problems.

Mr. Armstrong explained that the United States is seriously concerned about three problems involving natural rubber;

1. Sales to the Soviet bloc.
2. The necessity for acquiring large quantities immediately for the United States.
3. Exorbitant prices.

He opined that the United Kingdom and continental European buyers must be concerned by the same phenomena and added that the United States considers these problems sufficiently grave to justify the British in putting Malayan rubber under export control immediately without waiting for other countries to agree to international allocation or some other form of control system for rubber. The United States has proposed an intergovernmental meeting for January to consider broader measures.

The British were told that GSA shortly would be designated as sole legal importer of rubber for United States industry and stockpile. The effective date probably will be January 1. Messrs. Walsh and Casto stated that United States requirements are covered for December and January delivery but that GSA must enter the market shortly to buy for February and March delivery. GSA has not been in the market since October 17.

[2] Aloysius T. Walsh, Commissioner, Emergency Procurement Service, General Services Administration.

[3] George K. Casto, Assistant to the Director of the Rubber Division, General Services Administration.

[4] Mr. G. E. M. McDougall, First Secretary, British Embassy.

[5] Mr. A. Christelow, Counselor, British Embassy.

Mr. McDougall said that the British favored the idea of a January meeting to discuss some form of international control and added that effective control will require all rubber markets to be closed. This, however, cannot be done overnight. He pointed out that any controls established in Malaya are likely to be ineffective if the Indonesian market remains uncontrolled and a price differential develops that makes it profitable to smuggle rubber from Malaya. He offered to inquire whether London had any suggestions as to how to secure cooperation from Indonesia. Mr. Armstrong observed that if the January talks fail because Indonesia won't cooperate it may be necessary for the United States, the United Kingdom, and other buyers to buy together preclusively in the Indonesian market. This method of control obviously would be expensive and least desirable.

Mr. McDougall also recognized the need of Anglo-British cooperation during the short run before a broader international control scheme can become effective. He promised to consult London regarding measures that could be taken at once in cooperation with the United States to meet the tight February–March position.

Mr. Armstrong pointed out that the immediate and longer term problems are related because if either the United States or the United Kingdom enters the market too aggressively in buying rubber for February–March delivery, both may face increased prices when a control scheme is being discussed next month. He called attention to the uncertainty and high cost of operating on the basis of spot purchases and suggested the need for long term contracts negotiated at a fair price.

In response to a question from Mr. O'Gara, Mr. McDougall expressed the opinion that the United States would not jeopardize a future allocation scheme if it were to negotiate bilateral, Government-to-government contracts now, provided that the contracts were not in excess of probable allocations and would be pooled once the scheme went into operation. The merits of buying spot rubber in Burma, Indochina, Thailand, and Ceylon (leaving Indonesia as an off-shore hedge) were discussed.

Mr. McDougall suggested that United States officials go to London immediately to discuss the possibility of US–UK cooperation in meeting GSA's requirements for February–March delivery and to develop a unified Anglo-American position in preparation for the proposed January talks. He stated that the British probably would be agreeable to having the latter meeting also held in London.

Mr. McDougall also stated that the UK would attempt to secure the cooperation of Ceylon. In fact, the British already had talked with the Ceylonese, whose initial reaction was hostile. As the price for agreeing to an international control scheme they apparently want the protection of a long-term price guarantee and some agreement that the production of synthetic rubber will be reduced if a rubber surplus develops. Rightly or wrongly they feel they received a raw deal in regard to rubber during World War II.

Mr. Casto stated that the GSA hopes to obtain 75,000 long tons of rubber for delivery during February and an additional 75,000 tons for delivery during March, although 35,000 tons each month would be sufficient to support industrial consumption alone with no allowance for stockpiling. He stated that GSA plans to adjust its selling price to industry monthly during the first quarter of 1951 and quarterly thereafter. It is recognized that while markets remain open in other countries the United States selling price will establish a floor for natural rubber prices. Mr. Casto added that there is no intention to subsidize industry or to use rubber from the stockpile as a price weapon.

General Wilson stated that the United States also is thinking of going into the public purchase of tin and wants the International Tin Committee reconstituted. It was generally agreed that tin is an easier commodity to control than rubber because the necessity of smelting tin ore and the scarcity of smelters provide a bottleneck where controls can be enforced.

Report Prepared by the Economic Cooperation Administration

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] December 15, 1950.
SEAC D–33

ECONOMIC COOPERATION ADMINISTRATION
STEM STATUS REPORT AS OF DECEMBER 4, 1950

GENERAL

After returning from visits to Formosa and Southeast Asia, Mr. William C. Foster, ECA Administrator, has stressed the importance of the ECA Far East program and has directed that efforts be made to expedite all phases of program implementation related to that area.[1] Mr. R. Allen Griffin, Director of the ECA Far East Program Division, is currently making a second circuit trip to discuss

[1] Foster visited the Philippines, Indochina, Indonesia, Burma, Thailand, Formosa, Japan, and Korea during November. For the White House press release announcing the Foster trip, see Department of State Bulletin, November 13, 1950, p. 777.

major program developments and problems with each Southeast Asia STEM and the China Mission.[2]

MAJOR DEVELOPMENTS

In part because higher priorities are now placed upon the Far East program within ECA/Washington, and in part because Southeast Asia program operations in the field have been moving from the planning stage to the implementation stage, procurement of commodities and materials for the Far East program have reached a new high. Procurement authorizations issued during the week ending December 8 were the highest, both in number and dollar value, for any week to date.

The China Mission has made firm requests for additional commodity aid, to arrive in January and early February. The arrival of these commodities is considered of great importance due to the continued difficulty of the Chinese Government in raising local currency to meet budget requirements. A minor factor in early arrival is the desire to build up some food stocks in time for the Chinese New Year (February 5, 1951). The China Mission has also forwarded to ECA/W for consideration a series of proposed recommendations to the Chinese Government which, if implemented, would achieve major reforms in exchange control, taxation, central banking, and budgeting. These measures, it is believed, would better qualify the Chinese Government to receive and use additional ECA aid, which it needs during FY 1951.

The Indochina STEM has submitted a firm program of specific projects for FY 1951 which will involve the expenditure of approximately $16 million for Vietnam ($7.9 million for material and equipment to be used by the Vietnamese in ECA approved projects and $8.1 million for a commodity program to produce local currency counterpart funds); programs aggregating $4 million for Cambodia and $2 million for Laos are expected to be sent to ECA/W shortly. Implementation of many of the projects in this program is now under way in Vietnam, and considerable progress has been made by the Vietnamese Government in establishing local organization to carry out the projects. Procurement providing supplies is being pushed by ECA/W, and in particular completion of negotiations for four prefabricated hospitals will speed up the public health program. Authority has been given to STEM to expend 14 million piastres out of the counterpart fund to finance local currency expenses of programs during FY 1951 in North Vietnam; these funds will be used principally for the North Vietnam relief program.

[2] Griffin accompanied Foster on his Far Eastern tour.

The Thailand STEM has made progress toward getting tentative programs in shape, and it has formulated definite procedures for screening and presentation of firm project requests from the Thai Government. Recruitment of medical personnel, due to arrive in Thailand by the end of this year, and procurement of needed medical supplies will speed up the Thai public health program, and ECA/W is in contact with engineers who may be sent to Bangkok in response to a Thai request for assistance in constructing freezing and cold-storage facilities to benefit the sea fishing industries.

The Burma STEM has formulated a general outline of program philosophy and criteria to serve as a guide for development of definite projects; this outline indicates that rural health work will be a principal feature of the program, and that health work will be first initiated by mobile units moving between the larger villages in the Kachin State. A request for medical technical assistance is now being processed by ECA/W. ECA/W is also expediting procurement of cotton requested by Burma. Meanwhile, the Burma STEM is urging the Economic Aid Council of the Burmese Government to formulate and present a full program so that advance planning and project implementation can move more rapidly.

The Indonesia STEM is still hampered by staff shortages and lack of adequate housing, but it continues to develop its program and has submitted to ECA/W a preliminary outline for a malaria control project. ECA/W is pushing procurement of agricultural implements, super-phosphate for control of the "mentek" rice disease, and fishing vessels and diesel engines for the fishery project. In Washington, conversations have been carried out between ECA representatives and the Indonesian Finance Minister concerning the best use of 500 million rupiahs ($44 million equivalent) of local currency counterpart funds; these negotiations will be continued in Djakarta. NAC has approved the transfer of obligations related to the Indonesian counterpart and $17.2 million of Export-Import loans from the Netherlands to Indonesia.

The Special Representative of ECA in the Philippines has outlined the aims of a three-phase program: (1) until January 1951: to persuade the Philippine Government to act upon the Foster–Quirino Agreement;[3] this requires passage of tax and minimum wage legislation and endorsement of the objectives and methods of the Bell Report; (2) January 1 to June 30, 1951: to take action reinforcing public morale and confidence; this should include tax enforcement measures by the Philippine Government, U.S. assistance for selected development and rehabilitation projects, well-publicized measures to aid the farm population, and modifications of Philippine policies on remittances and import controls; (3) longer-term phase; to place large numbers of technicians in the Philippine Government, implement social and agrarian reform, and push major development projects proposed in the Bell Report. Phase (1) is being pushed, and tentative estimates of the dollar requirements for Phase (2) have been forwarded to ECA/W.

MAJOR PROBLEMS

The rate of expenditure for Formosa and Southeast Asia countries has increased markedly. By December 15, approximately $32 million will have been obligated for the China program, leaving only $8 million available for the remaining 6½ months of FY 1951. The need for funds for the new Philippine program is obvious. These facts clearly indicate the need for additional funds for the Far East program for FY 1951, and the means for providing such funds are being explored. A great deal of work has already been done, and more will continue to be done, toward preparation and justification of budget figures both for 1951 and for 1952; Mr. Griffin is now working on budget problems with the STEMs in Southeast Asia and is gathering firm data.

Personnel recruitment is a serious problem affecting all the Far East missions. Formosa needs the recruitment of top-flight financial, central banking and tax specialists to help strengthen the economy of Formosa. Health personnel is the top priority need in Burma and Thailand. The lack of a mission chief and other key personnel is still hampering development of the Indonesian program. The difficulty of recruiting needed personnel for Indochina has been increased by deterioration of the military situation in North Vietnam. Recruitment of the large number of technicians contemplated for the Philippine program will present major difficulties. In addition, recent developments in Korea affecting the entire Far East and world situations have made personnel recruitment even more difficult than heretofore.

Procurement of requested commodities and supplies has also presented many problems. Procedural difficulties in ECA/W in procurement for the Far East have been lessened by steps recently taken, but the deteriorating world supply situation of many commodities and supplies may create new problems. Steps are now being taken to obtain forward estimates of probable needs of critical goods in short supply to facilitate procurement and, where procurement becomes impossible, necessary program modifications.

Negotiations of contracts for engineering advisory services between the J. G. White Company and the Chinese and the Indonesians continue, but progress is slow. The major hold-up is determination of means whereby the White Company may meet costs in the event of war internment. The Indonesia contract is important for development of the entire program in that country, and the Formosa contract has taken a new importance with the increased emphasis placed upon industrial growth in Formosa during recent months.

A number of counterpart problems have arisen in all of the Far East countries, and careful analysis is being made of the best solutions. The shortage of needed counterpart funds both for administrative costs and for program expenditures is a serious problem in Indochina. The French five percent counterpart fund can be used for some administrative costs and can be borrowed for program costs. However, a commercial import program is being studied, and consideration is being given to whether or not some of the French dollar costs in Indochina might be taken over to alleviate the problem. It is estimated that peso costs of the Philippine program may be two to three times the dollar costs, and the serious problem of raising the necessary local currency is now being studied.

One overall problem, related to the entire Far East program, which is of particular concern, is the problem of adjusting the economic aid program to the military aid program in Southeast Asia. The economies of many countries in the area cannot support greatly increased military aid without additional economic assistance. The necessity of coordinating economic and military assistance is clear and needs recognition, particularly on the part of local governments.

Efforts to get the Philippine program underway have encountered considerable opposition to the tax program called for by the Foster–Quirino Agreement, and some leading Filipinos, as well as U.S. business interests in Manila, have come out in favor of raising revenue by improved tax collection rather than by enacting a new tax program. Some difficulty may be encountered also in forthcoming negotiation of a bilateral agreement, a rough preliminary draft of which has been drawn up by the General Counsel of ECA/W. An additional problem, currently being studied, is the ratio which should be established between loans and grants in the Philippine program.

The military situation in Vietnam presents a problem of uncertainty for the future. Although the Indochina program is continuing without major reorientation to date, further deterioration of the military situation in North Vietnam may necessitate modification of the program.

6. The Committee considered the question raised by Mr. Cleveland whether, in light of Chinese Communist military effectiveness, the U.S. Government was still justified in feeling that small Southeast Asian forces should be built up even though they might be overrun readily by superior forces. The similarities and differences with the problems involved in the granting of U.S. military assistance to Europe were discussed at length, differences of geography and in capacity for establishing regional security arrangements being stressed. The Committee also considered the nature of the NSC decision concerning the Defense of Korea which preceded the Communist attack of June 25,[1] and the absence of a present commitment (unlike in the cases of Europe and Japan) on the part of the U.S. to consider an attack on any free nation in Southeast Asia an attack on all the free countries. The specific purposes to which military assistance in the region addressed itself was then analyzed; and it was generally agreed that these arms were aimed at providing internal security, and creating a deterrent to outside aggression against the countries.

7. The Committee considered the degree of possibility of military cooperation, or even unification, in Southeast Asia. MR. RUSK pointed out that while the United States was willing to face the possibilities of further military reverses in Southeast Asia, certain unwise "assumptions" had been given wide currency. These were that: (a) if Tonkin falls, Indo-China will fall; and (b) if Indo-China falls, all of Southeast Asia will fall. MR. LACY added that the countries of the region, (Thailand and perhaps Viet Nam being the exceptions) simply refused to consider the U.S. views on the necessity of concerted action against current and future aggression. It was very unlikely that the free countries of Asia would see the necessity of their binding together with the United States to defend Indo-China.

8. MR. LACY agreed with the objective of greater unity in Southeast Asia raised by Mr. Cleveland and stated that some progress had been made over the past year and a half. MR. RUSK remarked that, while only a relatively small force could be mustered in the region, the countries of the area were not unaware of the problem of regional cooperation. Moreover, the U.S. was now talking with Indian officials concerning the problem. Prospects, however, of any marked advance in the near future were very limited. MR. CLEVELAND stated that, while the chances for economic unification were nil, it was essential that all possible efforts be made for further political cooperation.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Ambassador in Thailand (Stanton)

CONFIDENTIAL BANGKOK, December 21, 1950.

Subject: Conditions in the Far East

Participants: Sir Esler Dening,
British Foreign Office
Mr. Richard Whittington,
Chargé d'Affaires, British Embassy
Edwin F. Stanton

Sir Esler Dening of the British Foreign Office, who has been visiting Bangkok briefly, called to see me and we had a general talk about conditions in the Far East.

Sir Esler said he had made repeated efforts to get to Peiping but no replies whatever had been received from the Chinese Communist Government. He said Mr. Bevin, the British Foreign Secretary, had felt it would be worth while to send some one from the Foreign Office to Peiping who could speak directly to Chou En-lai, the Chinese Communist Foreign Minister, and make clear to him the British Government's views and policies with respect to China and other Far Eastern problems. However, he said these efforts had been thwarted at Peiping but that the British position had been explained to General Wu, the Chinese representative sent to the United Nations, by Mr. Younger [1] and Sir Gladwyn Jebb.[2] We had some discussion regarding Soviet influence upon the Chinese Communist Government. Dening expressed the view that although in international affairs it was evident that the Soviets were able to impose their will upon Mao Tse-tung and his Government, nevertheless the pattern of events in China itself was, in his opinion, strictly Chinese. This view seemed to be a comforting one to Sir Esler. I said what ever the pattern of internal events in China, it seemed clear that for the present and probably for some time to come, Mao would be doing the Kremlin's bidding and the latter had apparently been very successful in convincing Mao that the Soviet Government was China's only friend.

Speaking of Indian Ambassador Pannikar's [3] efforts to convince the Chinese Communists of Nehru's great friendship for Communist China, Sir Esler said their information indicated that Chinese Communist leaders paid little attention to Pannikar's views and were not interested in Nehru's efforts to woo them. Dening said that the Chinese Communist propaganda line had for so many years branded India as a "running dog" of Imperialist Britain that the Chinese were not convinced of India's new position in the world and the genuineness of overtures being made to them by Nehru. Dening added that the Soviets had been very successful in persuading Chinese Communist leaders that India, at the instigation of Great Britain, had designs on Tibet, and that in consequence the Chinese Communists rationalized the present invasion of Tibet as a move to forestall the Indians.

With respect to Indochina I found Sir Esler quite optimistic, evidently basing his views on reports received from Mr. Malcolm MacDonald in Singapore. As regards the military situation in Indochina he said the French would most certainly hold their own unless the Chinese intervened. I pointed out that although the French were holding the Hanoi–Haiphong area, Saigon, and a goodly portion of Cochin China, that the rest of Indochina and more specifically the Kingdoms of Laos and Cambodia were quite inadequately protected. I said that in Laos all information being received indicated growing strength of Vietminh and dissident Laos forces, and that this development was coupled with increasing rumors and reports of the overthrow in the near future of the present Laos Government and establishment of a Communist dominated Government in that State. I said that this development would constitute a direct threat to Thailand where there are more Laos than in the present Kingdom of Laos. I asked Sir Esler whether he thought intervention by the Chinese in Indochina was likely. He replied he did not think so. We had some further general discussion about conditions in Indochina, during which Dening said that the recent concessions made by the French Government to Bao Dai's Government and the Governments of Laos and Cambodia should have a good effect but might be "too late". With regard to the appointment of General de Tassigny,[4] Sir Esler remarked that the appointment of a military man to the post of High Commissioner scarcely seemed to be a happy one.

I asked Dening what he judged the Kremlin's strategy to be and whether he thought it was their intention to precipitate a third world war. He said he thought the strategy was to achieve their aims and objectives in so far as possible through the use of satellites who, as so successfully demonstrated in the case of China, might be induced to fight in Russia's behalf and to seize objectives which the Soviets desire. He said these tactics were proving very successful and he thought that from the Kremlin's point of view there was no need to precipitate a world war. He said Stalin was aware of the fact that industrial production was the key to victory in modern warfare and that Stalin realized, in spite of the superhuman efforts made to build up the war industry of the USSR, they were still far behind the combined production output of the United States and the United Kingdom.

No. 398

Subject: Comment on Report to Foreign Military Assistance Coordinating Committee of Joint MDAP Survey Mission to Southeast Asia.

I have read with considerable interest the final report to the Foreign Military Assistance Coordinating Committee of Mr. John P. Melby, Chairman of the Joint State-Defense Assistance Program Survey Mission to Southeast Asia, dated December 6, 1950, and venture to comment on certain assumptions and conclusions therein:

1. On Page 3 it is said:

> "There would appear to be three major alternatives of policy. These alternatives are presented on the assumption that loss of any one of the countries to the enemy would almost certainly result in the loss of all the other countries, with the possible exception of the Philippines which presents a specialized problem and where the unique American position and responsibility would, we assume, indicate a kind of intervention different from what we might undertake in other countries."

2. In the foregoing assumption (underscoring mine), (a) the political influence and military potentialities of the British Commonwealth in Southeast Asia are ignored, whereas I believe that they should be reckoned with, no matter how much they might be discounted; (b) it is not clear who the "enemy" is: whether it is the internal Communist organization in each country or the Chinese Red Army, which it is thought makes a vast amount of difference in the context.

With respect to (a), assuming that the enemy is the Chinese Red Army, either with its own formations or by means of "volunteers" as in Korea, I am not at all persuaded that Malaya will fall. When United Kingdom Commissioner-General Malcolm MacDonald as is his wont tells his American callers that if Indo-China falls to the Communists, Siam will go first and then Burma, he stops there and says, "Malaya will be next". I have never heard him complete the sentence with the words "to go" or "to fall", and at the closed regular periodic meetings of the British Defense Coordinating Committee Far East which I have attended in the past two years, I have not at any time detected any fear on the part of Mr. MacDonald, its Chairman, or the UK Armed Forces Commanders-in-Chief in the Far East, of losing Malaya to anybody. In this connection, as an illustration of the fear of an undetermined enemy and the poor opinion of British military power on the part of the local public, and of the confidence in their ability to defend Malaya on the part of the British military, I repeat an incident which was reported to the Department at the time by Ambassador Jessup.[1]

At a dinner party in February 1950 given by Mr. MacDonald for all the local Asian and British personages to meet Dr. Jessup, which developed into a question-and-answer forum, a Mr. Jumabhoy, prominent Muslim Indian Councillor of the Singapore Legislative Council, at one point blurted out, "Dr. Jessup, when is the United States going to protect us?" Before Dr. Jessup could reply, General Sir John Harding, Commander-in-Chief of the United Kingdom Far Eastern Land Forces, flushed red and called aloud across the table to his air colleague, "Did you hear that, Hugh (Marshal Sir Hugh Lloyd)? You and I might as well pack up and go home with our chaps tomorrow."

The Air Vice-Marshal commanding the RAF in Malaya, charged with the air defenses of the country, has told me that his command has absolute control of the air approaches to Malaya by any likely enemy. The Commander-in-Chief of the Far East Station (Royal Navy) makes the same claim in respect to the sea approaches, and while both Commanders may be bragging, it is a fact that Communist China has no long range air force, no surface navy and no seagoing transports. While the Soviet Far East Navy is probably no match for the Royal Navy's forces in the Far East, I am not in position to compare the air strength of the two powers in the region. Even were Russian Far East strength superior, it would seem to take more than air power to invade Malaya and support such an invasion.

Assuming that the worst happens, that the Red Chinese Army by open aggression or through "volunteers" establishes Communist national Governments successively in Indo-China, Burma and Siam and stands after a long trek overland at the borders of Malaya, at the thin neck of the Malay Peninsula since it has no wings or ships to land troops along the coast or behind the border as the Japanese Army in 1941: even if by then formal war will not have been declared, it is scarcely likely that strong British defenses will not have been prepared to meet the aggressive mass.

I have no ground for any speculation as to what India or Pakistan might do in such an event, but as we have reported from time to time, task forces of the Royal Pakistan Navy and the Indian Navy call at Singapore at intervals to take part with the Royal Navy in Combined Naval Exercises in surrounding seas. The reasonable assumption is that such exercises are predicated on training in resisting a common enemy. Australia presently contributes one bomber and one transport squadron to RAF operations in Malaya, and New Zealand one transport squadron. If Malaya were threatened and their link with the United Kingdom in danger, these two countries might well once more make an important war effort in Malaya as they did in 1941–1942. It must be remembered that it was the British 14th Army which put most men in the field in Southeast Asia in the last war, and that this Army was made up largely of dominion and colonial troops. There seems to be no ground for supposing the same scale of Commonwealth effort would not be made to save Malaya. Because of her dependence on Burma for rice and her territorial contiguity, it is even conceivable that India might intervene in Burma long before Malaya was attacked.

It will now be postulated that the enemy is internal Communism supported only morally and with smuggled arms by Communist China. Indigenous Communists have been getting moral support for many months now, but they have steadily been losing ground in Burma according to my British sources. In Siam they do not appear from Bangkok Embassy reports to be making any headway either. In Malaya the Chinese Communist guerrillas are a nuisance and a police rather than a military problem, and have not prevented the country from producing the greatest quantities of goods and having the biggest prosperity boom in its history, even though they may have slowed down state programs for improved social services. While it is possible that the Government of the Federation of Malaya may be oversanguine in expecting to suppress Communist militant activities by the end of 1951, it is also unlikely these activities will grow in troublesomeness.

Thus it would appear to me that the assumption that "all the other countries in Southeast Asia will fall if one of them falls" is unwarranted if only internal Communism is predicated. Even though occupation of a country or massive support of its internal Communist organization by the Chinese Red Army is hypothecated, it is my opinion, resting on two years' association with the British Defense Coordinating Committee, that Malaya will not fall or at worst will be retaken if it falls in the beginning.

AUSTRALIA

POLICIES AND PROBLEMS IN RELATIONS BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND AUSTRALIA

611.43/4–2150

Department of State Policy Statement [1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] April 21, 1950.

AUSTRALIA

A. OBJECTIVES

The fundamental objectives of US policy toward Australia are: (1) to obtain support for the policies which we are pursuing in the furtherance of international cooperation, in the development of a democratic order in Japan and Germany and in the protection of our own liberties and those of the rest of the free world from Russian aggression; (2) to discourage Australia from taking positions which hinder us in achieving these objectives, particularly in the case of the Japanese occupation; (3) to encourage the economic development of Australia and the growth of its foreign trade in accordance with the principles of the ITO Charter, bearing in mind the contribution which this development can make to the economic recovery of Great Britain and also the role in military matters which Australia as a friendly power can play in the Pacific.

B. POLICIES

Relations between the US and Australia, which had always been friendly, became even more so during World War II when the two countries cooperated to the fullest in the common war effort. In the immediate post war period these friendly relations were strained or impaired by differences of opinion rising from dissimiliar views of the Japanese occupation policy, by the initial efforts to Australia to lead a third force in the growing conflict between East and West, and by the difficult personality of the Australian Minister of External Affairs, Dr. Herbert Evatt.[2]

Since the advent in December 1949 of the Liberal-Country party coalition there has been a marked change in the orientation and direction of Australian foreign policy. The new Minister of External Affairs, Mr. Percy Spender, is desirious of establishing the closest and most cooperative relations with the United States and has in effect made this objective a cardinal point of his foreign policy. Apart from this Mr. Spender has indicated that Australian effort in the field of foreign relations will not, as was the case under Dr. Evatt, be exerted primarily through the United Nations nor will it be spread so thin throughout the world. The major Australian interest is now taken to be in the area of South and Southeast Asia, and it is there according to Mr. Spender that Australia's efforts should be concentrated. One of the immediate manifestations of this altered emphasis in Australian thinking was the role played by Mr. Spender at Colombo in connection with the plan for economic assistance to South and Southeast Asia and Australian leadership in Commonwealth efforts to implement the recommendations adopted at Colombo.[3]

Political. Australia in the past has taken a very independent line in UN affairs and has attempted, with considerable success, to avoid giving any suggestion of subordination to UK or US policies. It is, however, strongly affected by its constitutional, racial and sentimental attachment to Great Britain and by its strategic dependence upon the US. Furthermore, in view of the importance which the present Australian Government attaches to relations with the US, the emphasis on independence in UN is likely to be subordinated to an effort to achieve a greater measure of agreement with the US and with the UK in the more important issues which arise. The lessened emphasis on the UN aspects of Australian foreign policy, the removal from the scene of Dr. Evatt and his personal ambitions and the more unqualified recognition of the nature of Soviet aims and techniques make possible a greater measure of agreement in UN matters between the US and Australia.

In the Indonesian conflict there was a pronounced Australian tendency to regard the US as the sponsor of the Dutch and Australia as the protector of the Indonesian Republic. This attitude was not helpful to our efforts to obtain a satisfactory solution of the Indonesian problem. The present government, however, will be faced with different problems in its relations with Indonesia which will require a modification of Australian policy. Indonesian aspirations with respect to Netherlands New Guinea run counter to what Australia considers to be her security interests in the area. While this may develop into a serious point of difference, Australia does apparently attach considerable importance to a continuance of her close and friendly relationship with the new state. As an illustration of this, Australia at the Colombo Conference indicated that its major contribution to economic assistance for Southeast Asia would be Indonesia.[4]

As a permanent member of the Trusteeship Council and as administering power for New Guinea and Nauru, Australia has taken an active and responsible part in the work of the Council. It would seem, however, that current public interest in the territories is not so strong as the interest displayed by military and governmental leaders. Although it is clear that Australia's chief concern in both territories is rooted in national interest, Australian administration has been consistent with the obligations assumed under the Charter and the trusteeship agreements.

While displaying an interest in making the Trusteeship Council an effective organ of the United Nations, Australia has argued strenuously that there was no Australian obligation to consult the Council prior to the introduction of Australian legislation for the administrative union of Papua and New Guinea. Australia, however, did submit to the Council copies of the bill and subsequently modified it to meet most of the objections voiced by Council members.

Apparently the Australian delegation in the Trusteeship Council receives definite instructions on matters affecting the Australian trust territories but it is not instructed on numerous other matters considered by the Council. Although Australia can be classed as one of the more conservative Council members, the delegation has not in all instances joined with the UK to present a common front.[5]

Australia sees itself as spokesman for the British Commonwealth and senior member of the Anzac partnership in all matters relating to the Pacific area, and especially in the problems of non-self-governing peoples. It was largely through the initiative of the Australian Government that the South Seas Conference met in Canberra in 1946 to establish the South Pacific Commission. Australia has continued to take an active interest in the work of the Commission and its policy in this regard has been a source of satisfaction to us.[6] Australia has displayed an active interest in the Point 4 program and in the contribution which this program can make to the improvement of the conditions of the native peoples of the islands of the South Pacific.

Australia represents the entire British Commonwealth on the Allied Council in Japan, and the British Commonwealth occupation force in Japan is manned by Australians. Australian policy with regard to Japan is directed toward strengthening the FEC as opposed to SCAP, and thereby gaining for Australia a greater voice in determination of policy toward Japan. Despite expanding Soviet influence in Asia and, in fact, on the direct approaches to Australia through Indochina, Australia has in the past adhered to the view that the principal threat to its security comes from Japan rather than from Russia. The present government is much more aware than its predecessor of the threat to Australian security inherent in the Communist advances in Asia and, without any fundamental change in its attitude toward Japan, can be expected to give greater weight in its calculations to the Soviet danger. Australia is anxious to see the US military position in the western Pacific strengthened and, in matters involving Australian security, cannot afford to oppose major US policy toward Japan.[7]

Since Australia fears commercial competition with Japan, it tends to pursue economic policies toward Japan which inhibit Japan's economic revival, and it has opposed steps which we feel are necessary to make the Japanese economy self-supporting and thus to lighten the burdens of the Japanese occupation. Basically, Australia's criticism of SCAP policy has been that Japan is being built up as a US bastion against the USSR and that no practical problem is allowed to be decided solely on its merits, but always in relation to Soviet-American relations.

As Australian support for our policy in Japan is highly desirable and can usually be counted upon to involve New Zealand and often UK support as well, every effort should be made to prepare the ground through diplomatic channels before new measures are adopted which might be misunderstood by the Australian Government. Since the Australian public fears a revival of Japanese power, and since the government's actions must be justified to the public, an effort should be made to brief Australian correspondents both here and in Japan on reasons for SCAP policies.

Australia suggested that the UK take the lead in recognizing the Chinese Communist government. This suggestion was based on the idea that a Communist government controlling most of China is inevitable, but that the pattern of dependence on Moscow does not apply as in the case of the satellite countries. The anti-Communist attitude of the Liberal-County party coalition and the desire of Mr. Spender to achieve a closer cooperation with the United States in the Far East have together caused Australia to fail to follow through with a recognition of the Chinese Communist government despite the action of the UK. Mr. Spender has informed us that Australian recognition of the Communist regime will not take place until after consultation with the US.

Economic. An adverse balance of dollar payments, though greatly reduced by rigid import controls, remains the outstanding economic problem affecting our policy toward Australia. We recognize the necessity of present import restrictions, which are being maintained for balance-of-payment reasons, but we urge the elimination of these controls as soon as possible. Rather than see US exports to Australia curtailed further, it would be to the mutual benefit of the two countries that US imports from Australia be increased to aid in closing the sterling area dollar gap. Australia's balances of over 300,000,000 Australian pounds held in London make more difficult the solution to Australia's dollar problem, which must be considered in its relation to the dollar problem of the whole sterling area.

We also recognize that Australia's commercial policy is characterized by its long-standing policy of Empire preference. In addition there is the desire for protection against imports in order to develop Australian industry. In recent years, however, Australia has given increasing evidence of its willingness to cooperate with other countries in bringing about freer world trading conditions. Australia is a contracting party to GATT and in December 1948 the Australian parliament ratified the ITO Charter, subject to prior acceptance by the US and the UK. We hope the Australia's formal adherence to the principles of the elimination of trade barriers will gradually counteract the narrow trade concepts of the past. Australia has agreed to enter into further trade negotiations with the US and other countries at the third round of GATT negotiations beginning in September 1950.

While we fully understand Australia's desire to assure a steady, favorable market for its large exportable surpluses of meat, grain, and dairy products, we understand that the UK will probably continue to be the largest purchaser of these products. We are concerned over Australia's practice of entering into long-term bulk-purchase agreements, such as those concluded with the UK, India, and New Zealand on wheat, and we take exception to the meat purchase agreement between Australia and the UK. We feel that such agreements, by channelizing trade and fixing prices, tend to undermine the structure of international trade and to impede its revival. On suitable occasions we should continue to point out to Australian officials the economic objections to such arrangements.

The rapid liquidation of large stocks of Dominion wool held by the joint UK–Dominion wool organization as a result of strong world demand and the reduction in our wool tariffs have eased the friction between the US and Australia which had developed as a result of the high protectionist policy of our wool industry. Although US consumption of wool has declined since the war-time high, it is still over twice as great as in the pre-war period and is likely to remain at a high level and necessitate continued high imports.

In general we look favorably on private dollar investments in Australia for the development of resources, basic industries, or other enterprises which would contribute to the economic well-being of that country. However, Australia for many years has been opposed to the investment of foreign equity capital and the recent Labor government took the position that in view of labor shortage, substantial new investments could not be absorbed. The present Australian government is not in accord with these views and has manifested an interest in encouraging American investment in Australia. We consider Australia a good risk and if the Australian Government applies to the International Bank or to the Export-Import Bank for assistance in financing sound projects we would support the request. As a part of its general policy of strengthening relations with the US, the present Australian Government has expressed renewed interest in both an FCN treaty and double taxation conventions. We have presented a revised draft FCN treaty which is now being studied by the Australian Government.[8] Our Embassy has been instructed to suggest at an appropriate time that Australian tax experts be sent to Washington for exploratory talks to determine the basis and scope of tax conventions.

In addition to our readiness to support requests for financial assistance for worthwhile undertakings, we are prepared to make available technical assistance for basic economic developments under the Point Four program. We have agreed to undertake discussion on a technical level leading to providing technical assistance for the Snowy River project, which would divert the Snowy River for irrigation and power. The Australian Government is prepared to pay for any assistance it gets for this project.

Australia has followed a restrictive policy in international civil aviation. We will use all appropriate means to induce Australia to adopt a more liberal attitude.

[8] Following indications that the Australian Government would respond favorably, the United States submitted a new draft treaty of friendship, commerce, and navigation to Australia in February 1950. Detailed discussions regarding the draft began in June 1950 in Canberra between American Embassy representatives and Australian officials. Documentation on the negotiations regarding the proposed treaty is included under Department of State file number 611.434.

C. RELATIONS WITH OTHER STATES

Based on a common outlook, a common racial stock, and a similar geographic position, Australia's relations with nearby New Zealand have always been close. This intimacy was formalized in the Australia–New Zealand Agreement of 1944, which provided for continuous consultation on policy and amounted to an Anzac "Monroe Doctrine" for the South Pacific. Both countries recognize their strategic dependence on the US as the dominant Pacific power and their economic dependence on the UK as the chief market for their agricultural produce and chief source of manufactured goods. The 1949 agreement to permit citizens of either country living in the other to share social insurance benefits is evidence of this identity of interest and attitude.

A strong British Commonwealth is a fundamental aim of Australian foreign policy. For this reason Australia welcomed the decision to keep India in the Commonwealth, even though Australians generally regretted the concomitant diminution of the Crown's prerogatives. Australia is concerned about the weakened economic and strategic position of the UK, and has viewed the increasing economic and military links between the UK and continental Europe with some misgivings.

Australia has favored a Pacific counterpart of the North Atlantic Pact modified to meet the different circumstances of Pacific security. At the same time it maintains that no Pacific Pact will be of any value without US participation or support. Australia has not favored the efforts of the Philippines to form a regional association, excluding military commitments, and it in effect declined an invitation to attend the Baguio Conference. The present Australian position apparently is to await US initiative in this matter.[9]

Apart from heavy but sporadic Soviet purchases of Australian wool and an Australian order for Soviet manganese, commercial relations between Australia and the Soviet Union are slight. Prolonged negotiations during 1948 for the barter of Australian wheat for Soviet wood products and seafood were largely unsuccessful. Although in 1948 both countries raised their Legations to Embassies, at Australia's suggestion, political relations have been almost wholly confined to the UN.

The Communist party in Australia closely follows the Cominform line, but evidence of any connection with the Soviet Embassy in Canberra is lacking. In case of war with the USSR, the Australian [9] Representatives from Australia, Ceylon, India, Indonesia, Pakistan, the Philippines, and Thailand met at Baguio, the Philippines, May 26–30, 1950, to discuss possible organization of a Southeast Asian union. For documentation on the attitude of the United States toward this meeting and the general question of a "Pacific Pact", see pp. 1 ff.

Communists, through their control of key labor unions in heavy industry and transport, could temporarily cripple the national economy. This ability now appears to be diminishing chiefly because moderate unionists have been aroused by a series of political strikes and by the crudity of Communist tactics in manipulating union affairs. Numerically the party is weak, and its political representation is limited to one member of a State parliament. The present government is considering outlawing the Communist party in accordance with its pre-election pledge.

The Australian public is sensitive to the possible danger in the proximity of heavily peopled Asia to the inviting vacuum of their own relatively unpopulated continent. While liberal opinion in Australia is embarrassed in any attempt to make a purely ethical justification of the "white immigration" policy, it is nevertheless a policy which on practical grounds commands the overwhelming support of the people. The Australians are eager to win the friendship of the native peoples of Southeast Asia for reasons of both security and commerce, but wish to do this without compromising their fixed policy of restrictive immigration.

Australia claims sovereignty over a third of the Antarctic continent. Its interest in Antarctica is based on considerations of prestige, weather forecasting, whaling and defense. We sought Australian cooperation in our project for the internationalization of the Antarctic continent, but without success. Australia, however, was not alone in rejecting our plan for internationalization. We are now considering other proposals which will serve to remove the immediate cause for rivalry in the Antarctic and which will perhaps increase the possibility of achieving internationalization at some later date.[10]

D. POLICY EVALUATION

Our relations with Australia traditionally have been friendly. Americans visiting or residing there find the atmosphere congenial and hospitable. Australians and Americans share a common western orientation and a common distaste for arbitrary power and violent change. Our national interests are fundamentally the same. Hence in any issue on which the Australians are fully acquainted with the facts and which involves a matter of principle, their reactions are apt to parallel our own.

At the same time there are points of disagreement between our two countries. The scope of "free enterprise" is more narrowly defined and the concept does not enjoy the same veneration in Australia as in the US. Suspicion of American financial and military power has deep roots in Australia and can result in unfavorable reactions to our policies.

Our approach both to the government and, in our information program, to public opinion should be designed to remove any suspicion that our policy in Europe and the Far East is dictated by class bias or that in endeavoring to contain Soviet expansion we subordinate principles to military requirements. With the government, such an approach should be on a basis of candor and informality, which the Australians appreciate and understand. In our information program, a more effective contribution to increased understanding of our policies might be rendered by a bolder approach and less reluctance to discuss controversial subjects.

The degree of our support from Australia frequently will be influenced by the intimacy of our relations with the UK. In those cases where differences arise between the US and the UK, care should be taken to explain our position fully, having in mind the Australian tendency in the past to suspect that we are taking unfair advantage of the UK's postwar economic difficulties to advance our own interests within the British Commonwealth. We now have in the Australian Government, in contrast with recent years, a friendly spirit and a desire for cooperation in the field of foreign policy which should be preserved, in so far as it lies within our power. This new attitude is of value to us in our bilateral relations with Australia, in our relations with the Commonwealth, in our efforts to resist further Communist subversion in South and Southeast Asia, and in UN. It should not be undervalued nor taken for granted.

SECRET CANBERRA, July 5, 1950—5 p. m.

6. Prime Minister Menzies told me last night he leaves Australia July 9 for London and would like return via Washington discuss number issues with President and Cabinet members. Said he had in mind particularly Pacific and world defense and contribution Australia might make in short run and long run towards common objectives. Also "certain economic questions including those arising out of Australian economic development and the immigration program". He would hope arrive US about July 25 "and would be able spend week or so in Washington if this plan would be suitable to US administration".

Prime Minister added that in day or two he would talk to me about details (at which point I will, of course, telegraph Department again). We gather he is now reviewing with Cabinet Chief subjects (possibly including substantial dollar credits) he plans discuss in Washington.[1]

Prime Minister will be accompanied by following (all bearing diplomatic passports with diplomatic visas from Embassy):

Allen S. Brown, Secretary, Prime Minister's Department; Commander Robert G. A. Jackson, Secretary, National Development Department; Fred K. H. Wheeler, First Secretary, Treasury (Treasury's top policy man); Francis Anthony Meere, Assistant Comptroller General, Department Trade and Customs; Trevor W. Swan of Prime Minister's Department; J. R. Willoughby, personal assistant to Prime Minister; Henry G. Rourke, officer of Australian Military Forces. As Department knows, Commander Jackson was recently "seconded" from UK to assist Casey [2] in program of general economic development.

While Menzies away, Fadden [3] will be Acting Prime Minister.

Menzies' visit obviously will steal some of Spender's thunder in connection latter's visit in September. When I saw Spender today, I thought he seemed accept this in reasonable good humor. Incidentally I reminded him we are anxious send word Department well in advance concerning purposes his trip and subjects he wants discuss.

Prime Minister has made these plans without requesting us ascertain whether Washington considers his visit desirable and convenient at this time and has, therefore, presented us in a sense with a fait accompli. Nevertheless, we hope Department will agree with us that visit is desirable and will, therefore, telegraph Embassy soonest (bearing in mind his departure 9th), a message for him expressing gratification his visit and opportunity review outstanding problems at first hand with him.

[1] Telegram 11, July 7, from Canberra, not printed, reported that Prime Minister Menzies had publicly announced the previous evening that he planned a quick visit to London, Washington, Ottawa, and Wellington to discuss defense cooperation, migration, and certain financial questions. Menzies was scheduled to arrive in New York on July 27. The telegram also reported that Counselor of Embassy Andrew B. Foster had discussed the proposed visit with Allen S. Brown, Secretary of the Prime Minister's Department. Foster tactfully pointed out the unusual length of the proposed visit and the lack of opportunity for American officials to prepare adequately for the visit on such short notice. Brown, after consulting with Menzies, offered to split the proposed visit to Washington with a visit to Ottawa (743.13/7–750). Telegram 12, July 7, from Canberra, not printed, reported that Brown had informed Foster that the purpose of Menzies' visit to Washington was to get better acquainted with President Truman and with the Secretaries of State, Treasury, and Defense and other ranking officials; to gain a general idea of American thinking on certain security and economic problems; and to present a picture of Australia's current position. Menzies had neither the expectation nor the intention of obtaining any commitments nor reaching any agreements during the visit (743.13/7–750).

Background Memoranda Prepared in the Department of State [1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] July 24, 1950.

I. IMPORTANCE OF PRIME MINISTER ROBERT MENZIES' VISIT

UNITED STATES INTERESTS IN AUSTRALIA

Our interests in Australia arise from the fact that it is an important member of the British Commonwealth, basically friendly toward the United States, sharing the same democratic traditions and aspirations and aligned with us in the present struggle against communist imperialism. Australia, as a loyal member of the Commonwealth, has contributed to the economic recovery of the United Kingdom and by so doing has furthered our own objectives in this respect.

We recognize that Australia's economic development, in addition to the bearing which it has on British recovery, enhances the role which Australia can play in military matters in the Pacific. Our cooperation with Australia in World War II was particularly close, and we could expect such cooperation in any future conflict to be of comparable value. The prompt reaction of Australia to the invasion of Korea and the unanimous vote of approval given by the Australian parliament to the military measures taken by the Government afford a good indication of the close identity of views between the United States and Australia on matters of fundamental importance.

Australia is vitally interested in the future of Japan, has taken an active part in the Far Eastern Commission and at the present

A copy of this "Background Memoranda" was sent to President Truman on July 26 for his "information and reference." References in other papers in the files of the Department of State indicate that this compendium was prepared by the Bureau of European Affairs with the assistance of the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs.

The text of only three of the 32 double-spaced, typewritten pages of the source text are presented here. Part II (four pages in length) consisted of biographic sketches of Prime Minister Menzies and members of his party. Part III was a brief, one-page summary of the political situation in Australia. Part IV (four pages in the source text) was a review of Australian foreign policy with particular reference to Australian relations with China, Japan, New Guinea, the United Kingdom, the United States, and the United Nations. The points made in Part IV are covered in greater detail in the Policy Statement on Australia, April 21, p. 189. Part V (18 pages in the source text) reviewed in some detail the main topics which Prime Minister Menzies might wish to discuss. These included the question of a Pacific Pact, military cooperation in Korea, the Australian offer of base facilities on Manus Island, the release of classified military information to Australia, the Japanese peace treaty, the Australian immigration program, and dollar financing of Australian economic development. The principal recommendations on all these topics are set forth in Assistant Secretary Perkins' memorandum of July 27 to the Secretary of State, infra.

time supplies all the personnel constituting the British Commonwealth Occupation Forces in Japan. We are naturally interested in achieving the greatest possible measure of Australian understanding and support for our policies relating to Japan.

Australia is very conscious of the dangers of communist expansion in South East Asia. Australian initiation of plans for Commonwealth technical and economic assistance in this area was prompted in the first instance by a desire to ameliorate conditions of poverty and underdevelopment which are conducive to the spread of communism. We, of course, share the Australian interest in maintaining the stability of this area.

ATTITUDE OF PRESENT AUSTRALIAN GOVERNMENT TOWARD UNITED STATES

Since the coming to power in December, 1949 of the Liberal-Country Party coalition, there has been a marked change in the attitude of the Australian government toward the United States. The change results from an altered emphasis in Australian foreign policy. The previous Labor government, in which Dr. Evatt was Minister for External Affairs, tended to neglect United States-Australian relations, or in any case to subordinate them to a foreign policy which found its primary expression in the United Nations.

The government of Prime Minister Menzies, however, has made the achievement of close relations with the United States a cardinal point of Australian foreign policy. Leading members of the government have repeatedly stated that it is essential for Australia to maintain the best possible relations with the United States and, in so far as possible, to initiate and carry out Pacific policies in cooperation with this country.

The explanation for this emphasis on United States-Australian relations lies in the keener appreciation by the Menzies government of the dangers to Australian security attendant upon communist advances in Asia. The leaders of the Australian government are well aware that Australia alone, or even in conjunction with the United Kingdom, does not have the power to ensure its own safety. This being the case, the Menzies government has determined that, given present circumstances, Australian security interests will be best served by close association with the United States. The Minister for External Affairs, Mr. Percy Spender, expressed this idea in his first foreign policy speech. At that time he went so far as to state that it was the objective of his government to build up with the United States somewhat the same relationship as exists within the British Commonwealth.

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs (Perkins) to the Secretary of State

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] July 27, 1950.

Subject: Appointment for Prime Minister Menzies of Australia, July 28, 1950.

Discussion

Prime Minister Menzies of Australia has an appointment to see you on July 28 [1] and presumably will introduce at that time a number of subjects he wishes to discuss with officials of this Government.

Recommendations

(1) That you encourage Mr. Menzies to state what problems or points of common interest he wishes to discuss during his visit.

(2) That you offer to arrange appointments for him to discuss these various subjects in more detail with appropriate officers of the Department and other agencies.

(3) That in any general discussion of the following topics which the Prime Minister may introduce you take the line indicated:

Pacific Pact: Mr. Menzies might be told that this government has an open mind on the subject. We have not as yet, however, seen how the many problems involved, particularly those relating to membership and purposes of a Pacific Pact, can be satisfactorily solved. The views of Mr. Menzies, therefore, would be most welcome to us.[2]

Korea: Australia has just announced its intention to supply ground troops to Korea. Mr. Menzies should be told that we appreciate this further Australian contribution.[3]

Australian offer of base facilities on Manus Island: We have learned informally and unofficially the Joint Chiefs of Staff have determined that, in view of the events in Korea, the United States would not be prepared at this time to accept the Australian offer. In the event of a spread of hostilities we would be interested in considering joint operation of the base facilities.[4]

. . . . . .

Netherlands New Guinea: Mr. Menzies may cite the Indonesian policy of neutrality in the Korean war as a justification of Australia's contention that its vital security interests are involved in the future disposition of Netherlands New Guinea and that Australia cannot acquiesce in the extension of Indonesian control over the territory. In reply to any remarks by Mr. Menzies on the subject, you might say that our representations to Australia of a few months ago expressing concern at the manner in which Australian interests were being asserted was prompted by our belief the two parties, Netherlands and Indonesia, should be permitted to continue their efforts to reach agreement between themselves as provided at the Hague Round Table Conference. We continue to feel that this is the best procedure to be followed.[5]

Japanese Peace Treaty: We would be happy to have the benefit of Mr. Menzies' views. I understand from FE that you are fully briefed on the subject of the Treaty.

Australian immigration program: Australia may wish to obtain financial assistance in some form for an expanded immigration program. We should express our willingness to discuss the Australian immigration program if Mr. Menzies raises the matter. We are very much interested in the resettlement of European peoples and the relation of this project to the Australian plans but are unable to determine in what manner we can be of assistance until we know more about the Australian plans.[6]

Australian Economic Development, dollar financing: There have been indications that Mr. Menzies intends to explore the possibility of obtaining dollar financing in the United States for certain Australian development projects. If it appears that he has the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development in mind as the prospective source of dollars, it need only be indicated that this would meet with the entire approval of this Government. If he is thinking of applying to the Export-Import Bank, or if he seeks an indication as to which bank would be preferable from the point of view of the U.S., it should be explained to him that it is the usual policy of this Government to refer members of the IBRD to that institution for dollar accommodation in the first instance rather than to the Export-Import Bank.

Commonwealth Plan aid South and Southeast Asia: We welcome the initiative taken by the Commonwealth as a result of the Colombo and Sydney Conference and are willing to discuss with Mr. Menzies our own plans for the area.[7]

Wool Organization: Australia wants an International Wool Agreement which would maintain a reserve or floor price system on raw wool sales in order to stabilize prices. We should tell the Prime Minister, if he raises the matter, that the present situation in Korea would prevent the United States from considering such an agreement at this time.

[6] Five pages of the unprinted portion of the Background Memoranda Prepared by the Department of State (supra) was devoted to a review of the Australian immigration program. According to that memorandum, Australia had embarked upon a large scale European immigration program aimed at increasing the population of the country and by so doing furthering Australian security interests and developing the national resources. In 1949 approximately 160,000 immigrants had entered Australia. The plan for 1950 called for 200,000 new settlers, of whom 100,000 would come from the United Kingdom and 50,000 would be displaced persons from Europe.

Friendship Commerce and Economic Development Treaty: We should take the line that such a treaty would provide a more healthful climate for American investment and that we hope technical discussions on a treaty can begin at an early date.[8]

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Secretary of State

SECRET WASHINGTON, July 28, 1950.

Subject: Internal Development in Australia

Participants: The President
Prime Minister Robert Menzies of Australia [1]
Secretary Acheson

The Prime Minister brought up the subject of Australia's need for development and tied this in, as he had with his talks at the Department, with the program for large immigration. He stressed the importance of development in the basic industries and housing, and in irrigation projects which would broaden the base of agricultural production. He spoke of the urgency of this problem and the need for dollar funds. He thought that the dollar amount over a period of five years might be $250,000,000. He said that the International Bank from many points of view seemed to him the best source for these funds. However, the great difficulty with this source was that the International Bank wished to finance projects, and that would require an interminable time with engineering reports, etc.

The Prime Minister said that Australia had a number of projects, one of which the Snowy Mountain project, was already being undertaken and others would soon be ready. To carry these forward and to get materials for basic industry expansion could best be served by a line of credit to be drawn on as needed for commodities. He thought that the Export-Import Bank seemed better suited to accomplish this purpose within practicable limits of time.

The Secretary stated that a working party had been organized from the various Departments of the Government to meet with the Prime Minister's staff, analyze these needs and make recommendations. The Prime Minister spoke with appreciation of this work and agreed that beyond stating the urgency and importance of the need he did not wish to go into details with the President.

No other matters of substance were dealt with in the conversation.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Secretary of State

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] July 31, 1950.

Subject: Korea; Migration Program; Requirement for Funds

Participants: Prime Minister of Australia, Robert G. Menzies
Secretary of State, Dean Acheson
Assistant Secretary of State Thorp [1]
Assistant Secretary of State Rusk [2]
Assistant Secretary of State Perkins

The Prime Minister stated there were three principal items, with which Australia was concerned, which they wished to discuss with the U.S. The first was Korea. He stated that as of course we knew Australia was wholeheartedly with the UN and the U.S. in the Korean situation. He skipped over briefly the fact that they intended to send further help to Korea and went on to say that they were planning, and in fact had been planning before the Korean incident, to build up their military strength, and believed that some kind of universal training of adequate duration would have to be adopted to carry this out. In this connection and in connection with any forces they might send to Korea, they were very anxious to work closely with us on what they should do and what equipment they should provide. This, he said they proposed to discuss with Defense.

The second point which he wished to mention was their migration program. He stated that Australia was undertaking a program which in proportion to their existing population was larger than any immigration into the U.S. at any time. This was putting a great load on the Australian continent in housing and in demands on basic commodities. He indicated that it was important for their own interests and for the interests of the other nations of the free world for Australia to be strong and they would probably not develop in strength without additional population. He indicated that they could take 200,000 immigrants a year and might even raise this to 250,000 per year in time.

The third point which he made was largely related to the second although not wholly dependent upon the second, and this was their requirement for funds for developing the country. He stated that their basic industries needed expansion, that they required public works, particularly hydro-electric facilities which would serve the double purpose of irrigation and power production. He specifically mentioned the need for earth-moving machinery which they could only buy in the U.S. He said they did not feel in a position to ask for more dollars than were now allotted to them in the sterling pool and that, therefore, additional dollar requirements must come from other sources. He mentioned that they had considered Wall Street, which he did not think was possible; a Government loan from the U.S., the difficulties of which he recognized; the International Bank; or the Ex-Im Bank. He said in his conversations with the British they had seen no objection to Australia attempting to obtain credit and that the British had favored the International Bank as the source thereof. He had doubts, however, about the International Bank as he understood they usually operated on a project basis and this involved detailed studies which in turn took appreciable periods of time and that he felt there was an urgency in their migration program which made prompt action essential. In reply to my question he indicated that the amount of money they were thinking of was 250 million dollars over a 5 year period or 50 million a year. I told him that we would be very glad to give him such help as we could in studying the details of his suggestions. It was agreed that Mr. Thorp would arrange a meeting at which State, Treasury, and Commerce representatives would meet with his representatives to study the problem.[3]

[1] Willard L. Thorp, Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs.

19. Fol FYI only. In talks with Pres, SecState, SecTreas and at lower levels in Dept,[1] Menzies and party have raised question of dollar financing needed to implement 5 yr Australian immigration and development program. Latter as yet described only in broad outline, but dol aspects have been discussed in more detail. Total dol credit requirements of $300–350 million estimated by subtracting from total external cost of program value of materials procurable in soft-currency areas and with dollars from sterling dollar pool. PM has indicated that if such a sum not obtainable, program cld probably be carried out with $250 million, but this rock-bottom dol figure. Wld like line of credit available over 5 yr period. Dept has participated in talks on fact-finding basis but at same time has made clear wld prefer application be made to IBRD rather than to Eximbank. (British, who also apparently favor IBRD approach, said to have assured PM in London that such a dollar transaction would be welcomed and that service charges would be given priority if necessary as regards dollar pool resources.) No mention has been made Pacific Pact presumably because of Spender's impending visit and emphasis Menzies placing on dollar financing Australian economic program. Report Prepared by the Department of State [1]

Our Embassy at Canberra was informed on July 4, 1950 that following a visit to London Prime Minister Menzies wished to visit Washington for the purpose of discussing a number of matters with the President and officials of this Government. The Prime Minister indicated that he had in mind questions of Pacific and world defense and economic matters related to the Australian development and immigration program.[2] The question of Mr. Menzies' visit was referred to the President and, upon receipt of his approval, our Embassy at Canberra was instructed to inform the Australian Government that we would welcome the Prime Minister's visit.[3]

Prime Minister Menzies arrived in New York on July 27 and proceeded to Washington on the same day. He left Washington on August 3, 1950 for New York, where he remained until August 7 and then left for Ottawa.

During his visit to Washington Prime Minister Menzies was entertained at luncheon by the President, at which time he was awarded the Legion of Merit.[4] He was also given a dinner by the Secretary at Prospect House.[5] Other entertainment accorded him during his visit, addresses which he delivered and other activities in which he participated are listed in the program of his visit immediately following.[6]

In addition to his calls on the President and the Secretary, Mr. Menzies called on Secretary Johnson, Secretary Snyder, and Mr. Averell Harriman.[7] Memoranda of the conversations between the Prime Minister and the President and the Prime Minister and the Secretary are attached.[8] There are also included with this paper, memoranda of conversations between officers of the Department and

[5] Secretary of State Acheson's dinner for Menzies was held on July 31.

[6] The program of the Menzies' visit is not printed. Regarding Menzies' address to the National Press Club on July 31 and his addresses to the Senate and the House of Representatives on August 1, see footnote 3, to telegram 19, August 3, to Canberra, supra.

[7] According to the program of the Menzies' visit, the Prime Minister had an appointment with W. Averell Harriman, Special Assistant to President Truman, on the morning of July 29, and he had appointments with Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson and Secretary of the Treasury John W. Snyder on the morning of July 31. No records have been found of those meetings.

[8] President Truman, with Secretary of State Acheson, conferred with Prime Minister Menzies at the White House for approximately 1 hour on the afternoon of July 28. For the Secretary of State's memorandum of that part of the discussion devoted to economic development in Australia, see p. 204. A separate memorandum of conversation (the original of which is filed under 795.00/7–2850 and a copy of which is included as an attachment to the source text) dealing with the discussion of the sending of Australian troops to Korea is not printed. For the Secretary of State's memorandum of his conversation with Menzies on July 31, see p. 205. During and after a dinner at the Australian Embassy on the evening of July 28, Secretary of State Acheson, together with Presidential Special Assistant Harriman, Ambassador at Large Philip C. Jessup, and John Foster Dulles, Special Assistant to the Secretary of State, discussed a number of topics with Prime Minister Menzies and Australian Ambassador Norman J. O. Makin. For Dulles' memorandum of that portion of the conversation devoted to a Japanese peace treaty (a copy of which was attached to the source text), see p. 1261. Jessup's memorandum of that portion of the conversation given over to various efforts to achieve peace in Korea (a copy of which was also attached to the source text) is not printed.

members of the Prime Minister's party.[9] No memoranda of the conversations with Secretary Johnson, Secretary Snyder and Mr. Harriman are available.

When the Prime Minister called on the President on July 28 he raised only two matters, Australia's plan to send ground forces to Korea and Australia's need for dollar financing to carry out a five year development and immigration program. In discussing the decision to send ground forces to Korea, the Prime Minister mentioned the larger problem of strengthening Australia's defense forces. He observed that in the event of a general war Australian troops might be needed in the Near East and the Far East beyond areas where service is now permissible. In his remarks on Australia's development and immigration program, Mr. Menzies stated that $250 million would be required over a 5 year period for the development of basic industries, improvement of transport, provision of housing and for irrigation projects. In other conversations with members of the Prime Minister's party the figure $350 million was also used, but it was explained that Mr. Menzies considered $250 million as the minimum amount required if the program were to be carried out.

As regards the source of this dollar financing, the Prime Minister stated in his conversations with the President and with the Secretary that the British had suggested he make his request to the International Bank. While agreeing that this was probably the best source in view of the nature of the Australian program, Mr. Menzies expressed doubt that the Bank would be able to act promptly enough to meet the urgency of the situation. He pointed out that the flow of immigrants to Australia had already reached a rate of 200,000 per annum and that his Government wished to maintain this rate over a period of ten years.

A working party was organized from the various interested Departments of the Government to meet with Prime Minister Menzies' staff for the purpose of receiving and analyzing information on Australia's needs. The first meeting of this working party with the Australian representatives took place on July 28 in Mr. Thorp's office. There was a further meeting of the same group on July 31. The Prime Minister and his party were obviously favorably impressed by the expeditious manner in which the Department organized these discussions and proceeded to consideration of the Australian problem.

Prior to Mr. Menzies' arrival, the Department had determined that he should be advised to take up the question of dollar financing in the first instance with the International Bank rather than with the Thorp, officers of the Department of State, and representatives of the Departments of Commerce and the Treasury met with members of the Menzies' party on July 28. Export-Import Bank. This position was agreed to by the Export-Import Bank and the Treasury Department.

On August 2 Prime Minister Menzies saw Mr. Black, President of the International Bank, and outlined the Australian need for $250 million in dollar financing over the next five years. He stated that assurances as regards at least $100 million of this amount were needed immediately and asked whether the Bank would be able to give him an answer prior to his departure from the United States. Mr. Black told the Prime Minister that on the assumption that the Australian delegation then in Washington could provide an economic justification for the program and an analysis of its effect on the Australian economy and could satisfy the Bank on the repayment prospects, the Bank would be prepared to give priority to a study of the proposals with a view to negotiating a loan to cover certain immediate dollar needs.

On August 8 the United States Executive Director of the International Bank requested NAC consideration of a proposal by the management of the Bank that a loan of from $50 million to $70 million be made to Australia to finance some costs of the Australian development program. On August 11 [14?] the NAC advised the United States Executive Director that it approved his consideration in the Board of Directors of loans up to $100 million with terms of 20 or 25 years at an interest rate not to exceed 4¼ percent.[10]

The President of the Bank informed the Executive Directors on August 10 that he proposed to inform the Australian Government that, (1) the Bank is willing, in principle, to participate over the next five years in the financing of the Australian development program; (2) the Bank is prepared to enter into negotiations at once for an initial loan of $100 million with repayment on the basis of a maximum life of 20 or 25 years; and (3) that the Bank is prepared to send representatives to Australia in the fall of 1950 to examine the Australian development plans in more detail to determine the extent to which Bank participation in the full five year program is justified. The President stated that if negotiations with Australian representatives could be concluded in time, he proposed to submit

APPRAISAL OF THE VISIT

Prime Minister Menzies, contrary to original expectations, did not bring up during his visit to Washington any matters other than Australian participation in the Korean operations and the question of a dollar loan. It is probably that he confined his discussions to these two matters because of his desire to concentrate on the loan question and because the Minister of External Affairs, Mr. Percy Spender, may wish to cover the broad range of political problems in which the United States and Australia are interested during his forthcoming visit to the United States.

There can be no question that the visit of the Prime Minister was an outstanding success and that it has contributed to closer and more cooperative relations between Australia and the United States. We can expect to benefit from this attitude in our relations with Australia in the UN, in obtaining understanding and a greater measure of support than in the past for our Far Eastern policies in general and particularly as they relate to Japan, and in obtaining such agreements as an FCED Treaty and Double Taxation Conventions.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Chief of Protocol (Simmons)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] September 13, 1950.

Participants: The President
The Australian Foreign Minister [1]
The Chief of Protocol

The President received at 12:15 p. m. today the Australian Foreign Minister, the Honorable P. C. Spender.[2]

Early in the conversation general remarks were exchanged by the President and Mr. Spender, including expressions of satisfaction at the possibility, here illustrated, that representatives of free nations such as Australia and the United States could talk together frankly and without the old-style diplomatic reservations, concerning important matters of mutual international interest. The President illustrated this point by citing the record of the Senate Special Committee to Investigate the National Defense Program, of which he was once chairman, and which never, during that time, presented a minority report.

Mr. Spender then came to the principal point which he had in mind. This he described as the basic difficulty now being experienced by Australia in "not having a say" in most of the important international decisions now being made by the friendly powers. He described this as a great handicap to his country. He indicated the existence of a Spender visited Washington on September 13 and 14 before taking up in New York his duties as head of the Australian Delegation to the Fifth United Nations General Assembly which opened on September 19. local feeling of frustration that, in a world crisis such as now exists, many important decisions affecting Australia were being made, without Australian participation, by the Atlantic Pact powers and the European powers under the leadership of the "Big Three". He added that he was frequently being put on the defensive, vis-à-vis local public opinion, on this point.

As regards some form of Pacific agreement similar to the Atlantic Pact, he said that he realized that Great Britain and the United States were disposed to work toward the formation of some organization of this type. He deplored what he indicated as the obstructive attitude of India, which attitude provided the chief stumbling block toward the formation of such a pact. At this point, he advanced the idea that after all India was not, strictly speaking, a Pacific power. He then briefly summed up his concept of a logical geographic division of the four chief power groups outside of the Western Hemisphere. These groups he classified under the headings of Atlantic, European, Indian Ocean and Pacific. He apparently made this point to emphasize his view that India should belong to the third, rather than the fourth, of these groups.[3]

Mr. Spender continued by expressing the thought that Australia had narrowly escaped a Japanese invasion in the last war, had thrown all she had into that conflict and could be counted upon in any emergency to give the utmost of her manpower and equipment to meet all new crises. This, he believed, should merit a greater degree of consideration in matters of consultation among the great powers. He did not specifically indicate just what form such increased participation might take. He did not, for example, make a plea for the inclusion of Australia as a member of the Security Council.

The President expressed sincere admiration for the people and Government of Australia, adding that his attitude was most sympathetic towards any problems, including the present one, with which Australia might be confronted. He suggested to Mr. Spender that these matters might be taken up in greater detail with Secretary Acheson, who would, of course, be glad to go into the matter more thoroughly and attempt to ascertain whether a satisfactory solution might be found.

The interview closed, as it had begun, in an atmosphere of friendliness and cordiality.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. Horace H. Smith, Senate Liaison Officer, Office of the Assistant Secretary of State for Congressional Relations [1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] September 14, 1950.

Participants: The Honorable Norman J. O. Makin, the Australian Ambassador
The Honorable Percy C. Spender, the Australian Foreign Minister
Mr. Douglas J. Billington, Secretary to Australian Foreign Minister
Senator Tom Connally (D., Tex.)
Senator Alexander Wiley (R., Wisc.)
Senator J. William Fulbright (D., Ark.)
Senator Bourke B. Hickenlooper (R., Ia.)
Representative Thurmond Chatham (D., No. Car.)
Mr. Francis Wilcox, Chief of Staff, Sen. For. Rel. Com.
Mr. Boyd Crawford, Adm. Officer, House For. Affairs Com.
Asst. Sec. Jack K. McFall
Mr. Horace Smith, Senate Liaison Officer

At 3 p. m. on Thursday, September 14, the Australian Foreign Minister, accompanied by his secretary, Mr. Billington, and the Australian Ambassador, by virtue of previous arrangements made by Assistant Secretary McFall, arrived at the Committee on Foreign Relations for a joint meeting of that group with the House Foreign Affairs Committee. As none of the Senate or House Members had arrived by that time, Mr. Spender and party were ushered into the Chairman's private office, where preliminary discussions took place with Messrs. McFall, Francis Wilcox, and Boyd Crawford until the arrival of Senator Connally and Senator Wiley, when conversation covering substantive matters began. During the course of the conversation, Senators Fulbright and Hickenlooper and Representative Thurmond Chatham joined the group, the latter being the only representative of the House Foreign Affairs Committee. Urgent last-minute legislative developments in the House of Representatives caused this unfortunate development.

The Australian Foreign Minister said that his visit was in a sense following up on the visit of the Prime Minister six weeks before. He had seen and talked with the President and hoped to have an opportunity to have a talk with Secretary Acheson in New York.[2] He had particularly looked forward, however, to the opportunity to talk with the Senate and House Committees dealing with foreign affairs, for he wished to bring to their attention the conviction he and his Government have formed to the effect that the time has come for the negotiation of a Pacific Pact, similar in terms to the Atlantic Pact, which would make it possible for Australia and New Zealand and other interested countries to act more freely and effectively in the event of the outbreak of a global war or larger-scale outbreaks in the Pacific or the Middle East in taking immediate action that would be effective. He pointed out that Australia had fought in the Middle East throughout the last war, even though its homeland had been under extremely serious threat from Japan during most of that time, and as evidenced by the Australian action in sending troops and naval and air support to fight in Korea, Australia continues to stand ready to send her men to fight on foreign shores. He stated, however, that her Government does not wish to see Australia again placed in a position where they are obviously badly needed and withholding them for the defense of Australia's own shores in the face of a lack of any guarantee that, in the event an aggressor moved against Australia at a time when Australian forces were engaged elsewhere, the United States and other powerful allies would be clearly obligated to come to Australia's aid without delay.

[1] For the Australian External Affairs Minister's own brief account of this conversation, see Spender, Exercises in Diplomacy, pp. 41–42. Regarding Spender's two-day visit to Washington, see Assistant Secretary of State Perkins' memorandum of September 15 to the Secretary of State, infra.

The Foreign Minister pointed out that Australia was in fact frequently placed in the position of having to accept the decisions of the Atlantic Pact countries with regard to world strategy and to play an inescapable part in the implementation of these decisions without having the right to sit in on the formulation and discussion of the decisions before they are finalized. He said that the thought sometimes expressed that the British Government could be expected to maintain consultation in advance with the Australian Government did not always work out in practice. Frequently on matters of great interest to Australia she has been presented with a fait accompli on matters in which she felt a special competence to advise and was left no alternative but to accept and go along or reject entirely solutions that could have been much improved with her prior advice. He pointed out that in any world conflict, even though it started in the Atlantic, Australia should certainly be counted upon to play a part much greater than any part that could be played by several of the smaller nation members of the Atlantic Pact put together, and even Luxembourg has a right under the Pact to participate in the formulation of world strategy that is denied to Australia. He urged that this was an additional reason for the formulation of a Pacific Pact and stated that he thought that if this was not possible, consideration should be given to some method of providing better Australian representation in Atlantic Pact consultations.

The Foreign Minister then went over the articles of the Atlantic Pact, item by item, and pointed out that with a very minimum of alteration he considered that its provisions could be used as a basis for the negotiation of a Pacific Pact. He pointed out that even though the Atlantic Pact was in fact a very loose obligation, it was the type of obligation that would be much more satisfying to Australia than the more nebulous, though sincerely intended, statements made from time to time by American officials and leading citizens that, if Australia were attacked, we of course would come to her aid.

The Foreign Minister suggested that Australia, New Zealand, the Philippines, Canada, Great Britain, the United States, Mexico, and appropriate South and Central American states bordering upon the Pacific might well become the original members of the Pacific Pact. He stated that he realized that it would be helpful to have India and other Asiatic countries in the organization eventually, but he felt that there were many reasons why this might not be advisable at the present time. He pointed out that India would probably be the most desirable additional member from many points of view, but that he was convinced that Nehru would not be able to swing his countrymen behind him in joining such a Pact, and he was even doubtful if Nehru himself would wish to do so at this time.

Senator Connally thanked the Foreign Minister for his frank expression of his views on this matter and said that, as the Foreign Minister was no doubt aware, the desirability of some such Pact had long been under consideration in the United States but that this discussion had not yet reached the point of action, so far as the Senator was aware. The Senator thought that it was most helpful to have the views of the Foreign Minister, and he felt sure that his colleagues would wish to draw out in more detail the Minister's opinion with regard to the current state of affairs in the Pacific.

Senator Connally inquired about the number of Australian ground forces that were scheduled to be thrown into the Korean fight and when it was expected that they would actually arrive. The Foreign Minister explained that over 2,000 have volunteered to fight for the United Nations in Korea and that he believed a force of 1,000 men was already in Japan or en route there for training prior to being staged into the Korean battle by the U.N. Commander.

Senator Wiley then asked the Foreign Minister about progress in building the economic strength of Australia, the progress of the large-scale immigration and settlement program, and the plans made for increasing the strength of the armed forces.

Senator Fulbright asked for information as to the exact size of the Australian armed forces and what total forces could be expected from the conscription program mentioned by the Foreign Minister.

Senator Hickenlooper inquired about the methods used by the Australians in ferreting out Communist subversives within the country and the program for dealing with them. The Foreign Minister described the system of proclamation of individuals considered to be Communists or Communist sympathizers, who, once proclaimed, were thereafter prevented from holding any job as a union official in a key industry or a Government job unless they went to court and obtained an order for their removal from the proclaimed list. He pointed out that if the individual charged took the witness stand and under oath swore that he was not a Communist, the burden of proof of Communist affiliation rested with the State. On the other hand, if an individual chose not to deny his Communist membership, under oath, then the burden of proof that he was not a Communist or a dangerous fellow traveller who should remain on the proclaimed list remained with him.[3]

In closing the conversation, the Foreign Minister, after answering the questions of the Senators, again stressed the importance of bringing into being at this time, with the utmost expedition possible, a Pacific Pact which would not only strengthen the determination of the countries concerned to resist but would increase their ability to do so by freeing them from the uncertainties that at present beset them with regard to the action that other countries facing their common enemy could be unequivocably counted upon to take.

The Chairman again thanked the Foreign Minister for his visit.

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs (Perkins) to the Secretary of State[1]

SECRET [NEW YORK,] September 15, 1950.

Subject: Visit of Mr. Percy C. Spender, Australian Minister for External Affairs.

Mr. Spender has been in Washington for two days during the course of which he has seen the President,* Messrs. Harriman and Webb[2] and a number of Departmental officers. The most urgent problem he has on his mind is the lack of Australian participation in global planning. The Department reports that he discussed this with the President, who suggested he take it up with you. The Australian Embassy has indicated a list of other topics he wishes to mention. The number he in fact touches on will depend on how long you can see him. The list, not in order of importance except for the first three, follows:

1. Absence of any organic political machinery to enable Australia to participate in global planning.

Mr. Spender has expressed the view that Australia, which has demonstrated in Korea its readiness to contribute to the common cause, should have some way of participating in global planning which he believes is largely done by the U.S., U.K. and France. He would have little sympathy with the idea that Australia's interests are covered through the U.K. representation of the Commonwealth.

It is recommended that you ask him to expound his ideas of how such participation might be worked out. He will probably mention a Pacific Pact as his principal proposal and less importantly, the establishing of some consultative group, outside the UN, consisting of countries making the major contributions in Korea. These are discussed immediately below. (See memo of conversation with Mr. Jessup. Tab B [3])

[1] Secretary of State Acheson was in New York for meetings with British Foreign Secretary Ernest Bevin and French Foreign Minister Robert Schuman (September 12–18), for the Fifth Session of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization Council (September 15–26), and for the opening of the Fifth Session of the United Nations General Assembly. Assistant Secretary of State Perkins was a member of the United States Delegation to the meetings of the Foreign Ministers.

2. Pacific Pact.

Although Prime Minister Menzies is understood not to believe a Pacific Pact necessary now, Mr. Spender has consistently advocated it. He has favored the Commonwealth countries taking the initiative to form the nucleus of a pact which the U.S. would be invited to support.

It is recommended that you tell him the U.S. has an open mind on this subject. While we have given the matter a good deal of thought, there are problems such as membership, geographical scope and the nature of the commitments to be included which appear very real and to which we have no answers.

3. Establishment of an Advisory Committee of countries making the largest contribution in Korea.

Such a committee would not be of Security Council members (Australia not being one) and would deal with (a) questions of coordination of offers of assistance and related matters;

(b) military liaison between contributing countries and the Supreme Command, and

(c) political and other matters (such as political responsibility for South Korea excesses and their future prevention) and supply of information generally in connection with UN action in Korea.

This proposal reflects a strong belief that Australia, which is making a major contribution in Korea, has no participation in the political or military direction or planning.

[3] External Affairs Minister Spender and Australian Ambassador Makin met with Ambassador at Large Philip C. Jessup and Wayne G. Jackson, Officer in Charge of United Kingdom and Ireland Affairs in the Office of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs, in New York where Jessup and Jackson were serving as members of the United States Delegation to the meetings of the American, British, and French Foreign Ministers. During the conversation, Spender raised the question of Chinese representation in the United Nations, the Formosa question, the absence of any organic political machinery which would enable Australia to participate in global planning (upon which Spender laid the greatest emphasis), the matter of a Pacific Pact, the Australian offer for the reciprocal use of military bases, the possibility of the establishment of an advisory organization of countries making substantial contributions in the Korean War, and the Netherlands New Guinea problem about which Spender spoke at some length and with considerable feeling. Jackson's memorandum of the conversation, under reference here, is not printed. The portion of that memorandum dealing with the discussion of the Pacific Pact corresponds closely to the account in Spender, Exercises in Diplomacy, p. 43.

It is recommended that you express understanding of the validity of the Australian views and interest in this idea, but that you indicate we would be reluctant to change the established focal points of the UN and the Secretary-General, which seem to be functioning satisfactorily and preserve the wide degree of UN support in Korea.

4. UN General Assembly.

(a) Mr. Spender may mention the Australian desire for a vice-presidency and for representation on ECOSOC. We have given a negative answer on ECOSOC in view of the heavy Commonwealth representation.

It is recommended that you express the hope that Australia and Canada can work out between them their respective desires for a vice-presidency. We would presumably have to support Canada (Pearson [4]) who approached us first.

(b) Mr. Spender may touch on Soviet strategy and other UN problems generally. He discussed these with Departmental officials. Australia has not placed any items on the agenda except for joining with the U.S. and U.K. on the war prisoners item.

It is recommended that you avoid discussing any specific items and suggest he may want to continue his discussions of the agenda further with Mr. Hickerson.[5]

5. Japanese Peace Treaty.

The views Mr. Menzies expressed when he was in Washington were in large measure close to ours.

It is recommended that you repeat to Mr. Spender about what you said to Messrs. Bevin and Schuman,[6] including the suggestion that he discuss the matter further with Mr. Dulles next week.[7]

6. Commonwealth Aid to South and Southeast Asia.

Mr. Spender discussed this at length in Washington with Mr. Thorp and others.[8] He will probably not wish to say much more.

It is recommended that you welcome the Commonwealth initiative, largely spearheaded by Australia, in working out an aid program and assure him of our willingness to coordinate any program we may have with the Commonwealth efforts.[9]

7. Netherlands New Guinea.

Australia has actively voiced its opposition to Indonesian control over Netherlands New Guinea. We joined with the British several months ago in urging Australian moderation. The Dutch and Indonesians are beginning negotiations on this on September 30 and both hope the issue will not be brought up in the UN. If Mr. Spender expresses the active Australian concern in this matter, it is recommended that you reiterate our previous urgings that the Dutch and Indonesians be permitted to try to work this out bilaterally without outside intervention.[10]

8. Policy with relation to Formosa.[11]

9. Chinese representation at the UN.[12]

10. Continued recognition of the Chinese Nationalist Government.

No special Australian angle on these is known and it is recommended you take the same positions as with the British and the French.

11. Policy of "continuance" in Korea.

This item is believed to refer to the status of the Rhee[13] Government both in relation to North Korea and after hostilities cease. The Australians have no sympathy with the Rhee Government and even question whether it is still a government.

It is recommended that you point out that the Rhee Government was legally established under UN supervision and we understand continues to receive the support of the South Koreans. The question of the political set-up in Korea after hostilities should be worked out through the UN.[14]

12. Use of Australian bases by Naval forces.

The Australians offered to share bases with the U.S. on Manus Island. We have told the Australians, pursuant to a JCS decision, that we believed the establishment of joint bases not necessary militarily but that it was desirable that U.S. and Australian ships be able to use each other's bases when occasions arise.[15] Mr. Spender left Australia

It is believed Mr. Spender will only wish to express some general views.

It is recommended that all you need do is listen.

14. Wool.

You have a separate memo on wool.—Tab C [16]

[16] The memorandum of September 12 from Assistant Secretary of State Perkins to the Secretary of State under reference here, not printed, reviewed the position to be taken if the United States wool allocation proposal was raised by External Affairs Minister Spender. In view of a significant expansion of United States wool requirements resulting from the Korean War and an anticipated short world wool supply, the United States in August 1950 proposed international collaboration among producers and consumers of apparel wool in order to allocate the current season's supply. Immediate action was urged inasmuch as a substantial portion of new wool would be marketed in late August. Australia did not favor such an allocation program but agreed to discuss it in secret meetings in London prior to the regular session of the International Wool Study Group in early October. Regarding those discussions, see the editorial note, p. 223.

SECRET [NEW YORK,] September 18, 1950.

Participants: Mr. Percy C. Spender, Australian Minister for External Affairs
Mr. Norman J. O. Makin, Australian Ambassador
The Secretary of State
Mr. George W. Perkins, Assistant Secretary

Mr. Spender asked, before taking up the matters he had in mind, whether or not I had anything I wished to discuss with him. I mentioned the Japanese peace treaty and that we were proposing to get on with this now. We hoped to do it through the Far Eastern Commission, but it was not yet determined who would attend the talks. However, we hoped it would be a large group as we did not want to be in a small group with Russia. I mentioned that our principal objective was to turn sovereignty back to Japan so far as possible and at the same time make adequate provisions for security. Mr. Spender said that their chief concern was to prevent the resurgence of militarism in Japan.

Mr. Spender went on to say that he did not feel this was the time to admit Communist China to the UN. I outlined our position to him and told him briefly of Romulo's thought that the Chinese Communist question should not be voted on at the beginning of the Assembly but that it might be referred to the General Committee. Mr. Spender said he would consider this situation and would inform us of their views as soon as possible.

He brought up the question of some kind of an arrangement in the Pacific, pointing out that they were very eager for some form of participation in the decisions affecting their welfare. They did not feel that the consultations which they had now with the UK were sufficient, that they found themselves faced with decisions without having taken part in making these decisions.

Mr. Spender also mentioned the possibility of a bilateral declaration by the United States and Australia. I told him of the difficulties in which we found ourselves in making bilateral declarations and referred briefly to the consequences that might arise in other SEA countries should we do this. I suggested that perhaps the best place to discuss these matters was in the treaty negotiations. I told him that, of course, we were glad to consider his suggestions and that I felt more talks were needed in connection with the situation in the Middle East. I also outlined to him how I felt the building up the strength in Europe would help in strengthening the whole free world.

Mr. Spender then brought up the question of Korea. He said that they felt that the countries contributing to the UN action in Korea should be formed into a committee to steer the Korean situation.

He also mentioned New Guinea and outlined their position on this matter. I told him that we felt that for the time being it should go through the Round Table procedure, and that if this failed, we could then consider what else should be done.

In closing, I said that I would arrange for him to have a talk with Mr. Dulles.[2]

[2] Regarding Spender's meeting with Dulles on September 22, see the editorial note, p. 1308.

Editorial Note

As a result of consultation among the United States, United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa in confidential sessions prior to and concurrently with the International Wool Study Group meeting at London, October 2–10, 1950, a memorandum was agreed upon providing for a set-aside program to insure the adequate provision of wool needs for Western defense. The proposed program was based upon an Australian counterproposal to the United States recommendation for a system of international wool allocation to divide the world supplies of wool equitably. At their meetings, the 27 participants of the Wool Study Group adopted a joint United States-French proposal that the Management Committee of the Study Group study and draft an international allocation plan for possible later use. The Wool Study Group also adopted, with some modifications, the proposals submitted by Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa for a reserve price scheme on wool.

Discussions in Melbourne, Australia, November 15–24, 1950, among representatives of the United States, United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa resulted in agreement that a system for the preemption (setting-aside) of international wool supplies raised legal and administrative problems that could not be surmounted in time to permit such a system to assist the United States in meeting its emergency wool requirements. The conference reviewed current United States plans to meet emergency military wool needs.

For a more detailed description of the conferences discussed here, see Division of International Conferences, Department of State, Participation of the United States Government in International Conferences, July 1, 1950–June 30, 1951: Including the Composition of United States Delegations and Summaries of the Proceedings (Washington: Government Printing Office, 1952), pages 134–140. Documentation on the wool negotiations and meetings mentioned here are found principally in block 398.24222 of the files of the Department of State.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] October 27, 1950.

Subject: Course of Action To Be Followed To Meet Spender's Desire for Pacific Pact and Closer Participation in United States Military Planning Involving Australia and the Pacific.

Problem

When Spender originally brought forward last year his plan for a Pacific Pact, the emphasis was on obtaining some assurance that the United States would defend Australia in the event of aggression from Russia. This emphasis is no longer important in Spender's or other Australian eyes since our defense of South Korea is more than ample proof to Australia that we would defend them if attacked. Thus, while Spender is still interested in the Pacific Pact, what he really wants is closer participation in all stages of high level Washington planning which might later involve the disposition of Australian forces or material. He uses as an example of Australian exclusion the fact that Luxembourg and Portugal, through the Atlantic Pact, participate in planning which may eventually involve Australian forces—(He doubtless has in mind that if the United Kingdom becomes involved in war along with other NAT countries, Australia will be called upon to assist, particularly in the Middle East.)

Another example advanced by Spender was that Egypt, through the Security Council, participated in planning which resulted in Australia's sending forces to Korea while Australia has no machinery or channel through which it could make its influence as a Pacific power felt. Nearly all of the nations, even the smallest, have some machinery such as the Organization of American States, and North Atlantic Treaty in which to plan defense action with the United States, while Australia has none.

It is out of the question to make Australia a member of the Atlantic organization nor would Australia consider it sufficient to participate in the Atlantic Pact second-handed through the British (although they may do this too).

We believe that Spender's and Australia's needs would be substantially met if we were to accept in Washington a high level Australian military mission with perhaps a civilian or civilian members which had direct access to top echelons and participated in formulating decisions which involved its major interests. . . .

Recommendation

That EUR, with other interested Bureaus, discuss[2] the Pentagon the acceptance of an Australian Military Mission.

The Secretary of State to the Secretary of Defense (Marshall)[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] November 24, 1950.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The purpose of this letter is to submit for the consideration and recommendations of the Department of [1] This letter, which was drafted by J. Harold Shullaw of the Office of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs, was submitted to the Secretary of State for approval under cover of a brief memorandum from Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs Perkins concurred in by the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs, the Munitions Division, and the Office of Deputy Under Secretary of State H. Freeman Matthews. Perkins' memorandum, not printed, explained that the question of meeting the Australian desire for closer participation in United States military planning involving Australia and the Pacific was discussed informally with officers of the Department of Defense following Secretary Acheson's approval of Perkins' memorandum of October 27 (supra). Officers of the Department of Defense had suggested that the views of the Department of State be set forth in a letter from the Secretary of State to the Secretary of Defense (743.5811/10–2750).

Defense a proposal that the Australian Government be invited to send a high level military mission to Washington. This mission, perhaps including a civilian member or members, would have access to top echelons of this Government and would have an opportunity to participate in policy planning involving major Australian interests. The mission would not be expected to participate in planning or have access to information not involving Australian interests. Furthermore, existing policies respecting the disclosure of classified military information would, of course, govern the classification and character of information given the mission.

The foreign policy of the Australian Government has stressed increasingly since World War II the importance of closer and friendlier relations with the United States. We have profited from the implementation of this policy both in our bilateral relations with Australia and in international bodies where Australia has made an effort to achieve an increasing measure of agreement between our two countries.

The discussions which we have had in recent months with the Prime Minister and Foreign Minister of Australia have served to underscore the following basic factors in the Australian-United States relationship: The Australian Government sincerely wishes to achieve a closer relationship with the United States, and it stands ready to contribute to the extent of its ability to those measures necessary for the maintenance of peace and security. This willingness to share the burden of resisting Communist aggression has been demonstrated in the case of Korea where the Australian response has been prompt and, considering Australian resources, substantial. At the same time, the present Government of Australia is very mindful of the fact that Australia is not a member of any organic body, such as the NATO, dealing with security and related questions, and among nations of its size and orientation is almost unique in this respect. As a consequence Australia, although ready to discharge its international responsibilities for the maintenance of world security, is hardly able to play even a minor role in influencing those policies and events which condition world peace.

In stating these views to the President during his recent visit to the United States,[2] the Australian Foreign Minister, Mr. Spender, reiterated his frequently expressed arguments in favor of a Pacific Pact providing firm collective security arrangements. It has become increasingly clear, however, that Mr. Spender is primarily interested in a Pacific Pact, not for security reasons, but as a vehicle to achieve a closer participation for Australia in all stages of high level Washington planning which might later involve the disposition of Australian forces or material.

After careful consideration of various alternative courses of action, we have concluded that Australian needs would be substantially met by the acceptance in Washington of the proposed high level military mission. Acceptance of the mission would constitute a positive effort on our part to ensure that our relations with Australia and Australia's willingness to cooperate with us are maintained on the high level which present world conditions make necessary. In the opinion of this Department such an effort is politically necessary if we are to avoid the danger of a deterioration in our present cordial and cooperative relationship.

There are a number of factors which, quite apart from the merits of the Australian claims for closer participation with this country in policy planning, would appear to warrant an invitation to Australia to send such a mission to Washington. Australia is alert to the Communist danger and willing to give military support to measures which may be necessary to resist it. In the area of South and Southeast Asia, Australia has taken the initiative in the formulation of a Commonwealth program of technical and economic assistance designed to raise standards of living and by so doing to ameliorate those conditions favoring the spread of Communism. In the United Nations ever since its founding Australia has played a role and exerted influence out of proportion to its size and material resources. We have recognized that United States interests would be served by the large scale development program which Australia is now undertaking. We have signified that interest through our support for the recent $100,000,000 World Bank loan to Australia [3] and for the Bank's acceptance in principle of further participation in the Australian development program. The Australian program of assisted immigration involving the movement of 2,000,000 persons to Australia during the next ten years is complementary to our own objective of resettling surplus European populations. All of these factors, with their political implications, are material to the consideration of whether or not United States interests would be served by acceptance of an Australian military mission.

I should mention that this proposal bears only a superficial resemblance to the Australian request in late 1948 to accredit a military representative to the Secretary of Defense. The present proposal does not involve such accreditation and is not, therefore, subject to the objections which were then raised to accrediting individuals to the Secretary of Defense. Furthermore, circumstances in 1948 were much different from those existing today both as regards United States-

[3] Regarding the loan under reference here, see footnote 11 to the Report Prepared by the Department of State, p. 211.

Australian relations and the general world situation. United States interests would not then have been served by acceptance of the Australian proposal, and Defense and State were in agreement that the proposal not be accepted.

Officers of this Department are prepared to discuss this matter in more detail with officers whom you may designate for that purpose. I hope that early agreement in principle to the acceptance of the mission can be obtained with its exact nature, size and terms of reference, to be worked out with the Department of Defense.

Sincerely yours, DEAN ACHESON

UNITED STATES RELATIONS WITH BURMA[1]

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Ambassador at Large (Jessup)[2]

CONFIDENTIAL [RANGOON, February 10, 1950?]

MEMORANDUM OF CONVERSATION WITH PRIME MINISTER THAKIN NU—FEBRUARY 8, 1950—RANGOON

Participants: Thakin Nu—Prime Minister of Burma
Philip C. Jessup—Ambassador at Large
William M. Gibson

The Prime Minister, after introductory remarks, asked questions concerning Formosa and Vietnam. The Ambassador replied in general terms and then asked the Prime Minister whether he was encouraged about conditions in Burma today. "They are very much improved over a year ago," he answered, "when it was my candid opinion that the Burmese Union would go to pieces." Conditions had improved to the extent that he was about to undertake a trip to a northern province which had only just been liberated from the Karens who had held it almost continuously since the granting of independence. One third of the province is still in Karen hands, but the Prime Minister feels they are "bottled up."

In answer to Ambassador Jessup's questions about economic affairs, the Prime Minister admitted that normal trade was at a standstill because of the war. Rice exports which he claimed had totaled five million tons per year in normal times would only amount to one million tons this year. 1,500,000 tons were exported last year. (Note: these figures do not agree with those furnished from other official sources and are in each instance from 200,000 to 500,000 tons too high.) The Prime Minister expressed confidence over the work of the Rice Commission and told of how impressed he had been with an exhibition of an American tractor which could sow one acre of rice in ten minutes. He felt that the ancient Oriental system of wooden plows and manual labor would have to be replaced by modern methods.

The Ambassador asked about conditions on the northern frontier and was told that as yet no Chinese Communists had formally violated the Burmese territory. "They are now paying attention to Indochina," the Prime Minister stated, "but will probably come in later." Ambassador Jessup asked whether Nationalist troops had sought refuge in Burma as they had in Indochina and was told they had not but there were some still unaccounted for who might. The Prime Minister recounted how he had at one time recently been approached to meet some "Chinese Communist leaders" and after declining had found out that they were in fact local Chinese opportunists passing themselves as communists in order to ingratiate themselves with Peking and get on the bandwagon. The populace in the region concerned became panicky and the Prime Minister was obliged to send a "company of troops" to give the people reassurance. The single company had in fact done just that, he claimed. The Ambassador asked whether there were any communist groups at the frontier. There were not many, the Prime Minister replied explaining that he did not believe they would take the form of identifiable soldiers but would rather infiltrate gradually in the classic fifth column manner. A well-known Burmese Communist was known to have been in Peking recently in an official status. It was not known whether he had returned to Burma.

The Ambassador asked whether the Burmese Government had had any recent messages from Peking regarding recognition. They had not and the Prime Minister explained that as Peking had replied to Burma's offer of recognition in such an arrogant manner the Burmese had chosen to ignore their message. There had been no messages since. (Note: This conflicts with the Foreign Minister's comment that a second "all honey" message had been received.[3]) He further stated there had as yet been no trouble with Chinese minorities in Burma. There were stated to be 40,000 Chinese in Rangoon. They are more aggressive than the Chinese in Thailand and maintain their ties with China to the full and never become citizens.

Ambassador Jessup inquired whether a peace settlement with the Karens would result in the automatic resolution of other pressing problems. The Prime Minister felt that all other problems were minor in comparison, and that if peace were restored they could all be solved in a short time. Ambassador Jessup asked if the solution was purely a military one. The Prime Minister replied that it was, but that he was nevertheless insisting that legitimate Karen demands be met. His task was a difficult one for he had the Burmese public, strongly anti-Karen, to account to as well. He had strong opposition in the people, some of whom were convinced that as long as he was around bloodshed would continue. The Prime Minister felt that his primary duty to Burma was to convince the people that without national solidarity they would never maintain true independence. He referred to his speeches on this subject, copies of which were furnished.

The Ambassador asked whether there was any current interest in Burma in the question of a Southeast Asian Union. The Prime Minister referred to the earlier Pakistan–Ceylon–India–Burma Union which the Burmese had been enthusiastic about, restricted as it was to four members. Pandit Nehru, however, felt that it would be grossly misunderstood and would antagonize Russia. The idea was therefore abandoned. The Prime Minister enlarged on this point stating that his Government felt that "China was too big to become a satellite of Russia." It was his conviction and that of his Government that any agreements which might be misunderstood by the Chinese as any form of alignment against her should be studiously avoided.

Ambassador Jessup asked about the Philippines. The Prime Minister replied that they had, frankly, acted in a slipshod manner and only in conjunction with Chiang Kai-shek before consulting any other Southeast Asian nations involved. The Prime Minister explained that the Gimo was very unpopular with Burmese leaders. They considered his government a very corrupt one, and hence any move for Burma to join an association in which he took part would be misunderstood and very unpopular.[4]

The Prime Minister asked whether the Ambassador knew Nehru. In replying the Ambassador mentioned among other things that he had formed an impression from the press that the Commonwealth was very anxious to be of assistance to Southeast Asia. Is this true? The Prime Minister replied that he hadn't yet been fully informed but was sure the matter was under consideration.

"Will peace solve all your problems?" Ambassador Jessup asked. It would to a large extent but not without foreign advice and help following the restoration of peace. The Ambassador observed that heretofore Burma had not welcomed foreign capital. Were they prepared to do so now? The Prime Minister replied that they were; that their past disinclination was the result of many years of foreign exploitation. Now as an independent country they could afford to accept foreign capital but would have to move slowly and had no intention of doing otherwise. Ambassador Jessup asked if this meant that the time was approaching "in the near future" when foreign capital would be accepted. The answer was yes.

In answer to the Ambassador's request that the Prime Minister leave with him any thoughts which he wished to have transmitted to Washington, he stated that it was his impression that the United States was genuinely interested in the rehabilitation of Southeast Asia and that only outside aid would solve SEA problems after the restoration of peace. "If you wish to give a thought to this when you get home and present it to your Government, you will be doing us a great service." Ambassador Jessup replied that any assistance would have to be tied in with the United Nations and such aid as might be forthcoming from the Commonwealth. He explained that Point Four was not yet law and would be entirely dependent upon Congressional appropriations.[5] He mentioned the anticipated participation of private capital.

Finally, the Prime Minister expressed a hope that a Burmese Commission, primarily concerned with financial affairs, would soon be able to visit the United States. Ambassador Jessup indicated that his Government would be pleased to receive such a request and trusted the Prime Minister would specify the exact functions of the Commission, its membership, etc.

Policy Statement Prepared in the Department of State [1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] June 16, 1950.

BURMA

A. OBJECTIVES

It is to the interest of the US that there be a stable government in Burma, oriented toward the US and the Commonwealth and capable of restoring internal order, of resisting Communist pressures and of advancing the social and economic rehabilitation of the country.

B. POLICIES

The process of political and economic distintegration which set in a few months after Burma achieved independence on January 4, 1948 continued during the past year. Recently government forces, aided by a quarrel between the White-Flag Communists and the Peoples Volunteer Organization (PVO), succeeded in capturing Prome, which had been established as the capital of the combined White-Flag and PVO rebel factions. The PVO leaders are now negotiating for peace with the Government, but the Communist forces have not been destroyed and are still active in harassing government lines of communication and keeping large areas of the country in a state of insecurity and unrest. This is a situation which can be exploited by Communist China.

[1] Policy statements on various countries were prepared and updated periodically within the Department of State.

Primary responsibility for providing the advice and the military and financial aid Burma needs in order to stabilize itself should properly rest upon the UK and the Commonwealth. It is our policy to conduct our own Burma program in such a manner as to complement their efforts by giving such assistance as the US may be better able than those countries to provide.[2]

We have been carrying out limited Information and Exchange of Persons Programs in Burma. We are now planning to expand these programs; and we are also developing technical assistance and military aid programs adapted to the present situation in Burma. In this connection, the Department sent to Southeastern Asia and to Burma in the spring of 1950 a mission headed by Mr. R. A. Griffin to make recommendations for specific US assistance projects which will be useful in carrying out our over-all policies in the area.

Political Issues. These proposed assistance programs have three main political objectives. The first is to overcome Burmese suspicion of foreign assistance and advice which has been to a large extent responsible for the failure of the UK and the Commonwealth to provide effective military or financial assistance to Burma up to the present time. The Burmese are slightly less suspicious of the US than they are of their former British rulers, and the Burmese Government has officially expressed an interest in obtaining US technical advisers. It is hoped that US technical assistance and exchange of persons programs will enable the Burmese to ascertain the value of US advice and that it is sincerely given for the best interests of Burma. The resulting increased Burmese confidence in US advisers will provide a means of influencing the Burmese Government properly to utilize the various types of foreign aid made available to it, not only by the US but by the UK and the Commonwealth as well. We should also encourage the Burmese to accept foreign advisers, particularly those which can be made available by the UK, the Commonwealth or the UN.

The second political objective is to increase the domestic prestige of the present Burmese Government. The Government depends for support upon the Socialist Party, which has a large majority in Parliament. Since April 1949, however, the top Socialist leaders have declined to hold ministerial portfolios because they consider it politically inexpedient to be personally responsible for the Government's failures to revive the prosperity of the country. The Government is run, therefore, by a kind of caretaker Cabinet. This Cabinet, under the leadership of Prime Minister Thakin Nu, Deputy Prime Minister Ne Win and (until his resignation in January 1950 to accept the Acting Chief Justiceship) Foreign Minister E Maung—none of whom are members of the Socialist Party—has somewhat modified the earlier visionary policies of extreme Socialism and chauvinistic Nationalism. These men have publicly expressed their realization that Burma needs foreign capital and technical assistance to insure her future economic development and foreign military aid to restore internal order. They are becoming more and more aware of the danger to Burma which is represented by the Communist victory in China and the rapid extension of Communist control over Yunnan.

If this present Cabinet can, with the help of American technical experts, initiate and successfully carry out a few economic development and public welfare schemes, its policy of looking to the US and the Commonwealth for aid might gain popular acceptance. The Government might gain more positive support from the Socialists as well as the adherence of a greater proportion of that mass of the Burmese people who have been generally confused and disgusted by all the present political factions in Burma.

The third political objective is to increase the capability of the Government militarily to defeat the Communist insurgent groups and to defend Burma's borders against Communist infiltration or invasion from China. With a few negligible exceptions, the burden of outside military assistance to Burma has thus far been borne by the UK and the Commonwealth. It is our intention that these countries should continue to assume this responsibility. However, the present critical significance of Burma's military situation has made it desirable to obtain authorization to provide military items which are unavailable from UK or Commonwealth sources, but which would forward the Burmese Government's operations against domestic insurgents, in reestablishing internal law and order, or in safeguarding the frontiers. On May 12 the President approved an allocation of $3.5 million for funds available under Section 303 of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949 for grant military assistance to Burma.[3] This approval is based on a recommendation by the Department of State and supported by the Department of Defense that the US supply ten Coast Guard cutters to the Burma Navy. It is also desirable to obtain Congressional authorization for reimbursable US military aid to Burma. The Burma Navy is better trained and is more efficient than the other Burma armed services and is, therefore, best able to make effective use of any aid we may give.

It has been decided that we should provide training opportunities in the US for a few officers of the Burmese Armed Forces and, in response to a request made by General Ne Win to our Military Attaché at Rangoon, the Defense Department is trying to find a suitable opening for a Burmese Army officer in one of our Army schools.

The insurgent groups in Burma present their own special and rather obscure policy problems. The ideal solution of the Karen Peoples Volunteer Organization and Army mutineer insurgencies would be negotiated political settlement which would reunite these non-Communist insurgents with progovernment forces in a strong combination capable of successful resistance to Communism. US aid if successful in raising public confidence in the Government might be instrumental in disposing the non-Communist insurrectionary groups to seek peace terms.

The most serious of these non-Communist insurgencies is that of a majority faction of the Karens, a minority ethnic group which is striving for an autonomous or independent state. Although many of the Karens, who number about 2,000,000 out of a total population of about 18,000,000, have not become involved in the revolt that broke out in January 1949, and some have consistently been loyal supporters of the Government, racial antagonism between the Karens and the Burmese majority race has become increasingly bitter. The sympathy for the Karens which is felt by the other minority ethnic groups—the Chins, Kachins and Shans—has also weakened the loyalty of these groups to the Government. The danger which derives from this situation is greatly increased by the fact that the best soldiers in Burma are the Karens, Chins, and Kachins. General Ne Win, Deputy Prime Minister and Commander-in-Chief of the Burma Armed Forces, is particularly bitter toward the Karen insurgents, against whom he has directed his main military efforts. On March 19 his Army captured the Karen rebel capital, Toungoo, 175 miles north of Rangoon on the Sittang River. The Government, having demonstrated its superiority, may now be willing to attempt a peaceful settlement with the Karens. If this happens, there may be an opportunity for the US, the Commonwealth, or the UN, to offer the services of a conciliator.

A special aspect of US relations with Burma is the strong pro-US and UK attitude of all these ethnic minorities. They actively helped the US and UK prosecute the war against the Japanese in Burma; and they could be relied upon in the future as centers of resistance or of potential clandestine operations by the US and UK in Burma in the event the country falls to the Communists. It is therefore important that we try to retain the friendship of these groups even while we are giving economic and military aid to the Government. To do this we must constantly stress the advantages of US aid for all the peoples of Burma and urge that the majority race make peace with the Karens and try to build a spirit of mutual cooperation among the several minority factions.

There is much less bitterness between the other insurgent groups and the Government. These groups are the two Communist parties, the Peoples Volunteer Organization and some army mutineers. The latter two are not Communists but have been, for domestic political reasons deriving from conflicts of political personalities, sympathetic to the Communist rebels. Fortunately, however, most of the PVO has now split away from the Peoples Democratic Front which they had formed in coalition with the White-Flag Communists. This split, which resulted from the White-Flag Communist attempts to tighten their control over the PVO, has caused the PVO to undertake peace negotiations with the Government and has resulted in the fall of the Communist capital at Prome.

The most significant contact of the US with Burma has been for many years the work of American Christian missionaries in that country. The Government has announced a policy of discouraging any expansion of foreign missionary activity and it has placed severe limitations on the issuance of visas to foreign missionaries. The Government has incorporated Judson College, formerly operated by the American Baptist Mission, into the University of Rangoon. The Government has not yet fulfilled the agreement it made with the Mission to pay compensation for the Mission's share of the Judson College real estate. A considerable portion of other American missionary properties, which are valued at more than $20,000,000, have been under requisition since the end of the war. Rentals have been paid for some of these properties, but not for all of them, so that the action of the Burmese Government could be considered a temporary use rather than appropriation. Some of the missionary property has been damaged by looting and by military action during the course of the insurrections. Our Embassy has formally requested the Burmese Government to protect American missionary property from such depredations; but the Government has been unwilling, or in many cases obviously unable, to comply.

Bilateral treaty relations between the US and Burma are based upon those treaties and agreements between the US and the UK which applied to Burma before independence and which are considered as continuing in force under the terms of Burma's independence arrangements with the UK and those agreements which have been concluded directly between the US and Burma. The following agreements only have been concluded directly between the US and Burma to date: air transport agreement, educational exchange (Fulbright) agreement, agreement for the exchange of official publications, and agreement regarding settlement for surplus property. The US and Burma conducted bilateral tariff negotiations at Geneva in 1947, the results of which were incorporated into their respective schedules in the GATT. It is considered desirable that further negotiations of new treaties and agreements be undertaken to fill existing gaps in our treaty relations and to replace US–UK treaties and agreements which are no longer entirely appropriate in view of Burma's statehood.

In support of its objective in Burma the US should continue and expand its information and cultural exchange programs contributing to a better understanding by the peoples of Burma of Western democratic traditions and striving to dramatize the fact that Communism in Burma would mean ultimate totalitarian rule under Soviet control. The Department has recommended an expenditure of approximately $400,000 from funds available under Section 303 of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act for a considerably expanded information and exchange program. Under the terms of the Fulbright agreement there has been established a United States Educational Foundation in Burma. Fifteen American educators and research scholars have gone to Burma on grants made by the Foundation. They have been highly successful in creating among Burmese with whom they worked a better and more cordial understanding of the US. The Foundation has paid intercontinental travel expenses for twelve Burmese students coming to study in the US and scholarships have been granted to 35 Burmese nurses to study in the Seagrave Hospital (American) in Burma. The work of the Foundation will be continued and enlarged upon as political conditions in Burma permit.

Economic Issues. Political stability in Burma requires the rehabilitation and improvement of its economy, particularly in the fields of agriculture (to increase rice production), mining (to obtain more strategic materials in world short supply and to provide Burma with a means of earning dollars), transportation facilities and industries for processing domestic raw materials. Unfortunately, however, rehabilitation in Burma has now practically ceased. During the period after the re-occupation of the country by the British in 1945 until early 1948, when Burma received its independence, the reconstruction and rehabilitation of Burma's economic life made slow but fairly steady progress. Since that time, however, economic conditions have deteriorated gravely, as a result not only of civil strife but also of shortages of foreign exchange, increased military expenditures and lack of qualified civil servants. Production and exports have declined, causing a reduction in foreign exchange earnings, the major share of which is now required for the purpose of maintaining currency backing. At the same time, import needs for consumption, rehabilitation and military purposes have increased or remained unchanged.

Although Burma's rice exports are only about half as large as they were before the war when Burma was the largest world exporter of rice, 80% of the country's foreign exchange earnings are now derived from this product. Since the discontinuance of the IEFC rice allocations system in January 1950, Burma has succeeded in selling most of its 1949 exportable surplus of rice at a two pound per ton price increase.

As a member of the sterling area, Burma obtains most of its supply of dollars and other hard currencies from central reserves in the UK, drawing more dollars from the pool than are earned by its trade and paying for these dollars in sterling. Hard currency purchases are relatively small because of the very limited amount of sterling available to Burma for this purpose, and also because dollar allotments are limited by the British to "essentials", strictly defined.

The US may be able to assist in stimulating progress toward rehabilitation by carrying out a program of economic and technical aid along the lines recommended by the Griffin Mission. The Department in cooperation with ECA is working out such an aid program for Burma to be operated by an ECA Mission with money available from unexpended China aid funds. The program is expected to require the expenditure of about $12 million for the first year. A draft economic and technical assistance agreement between Burma and the US is now being finalized and it is anticipated that we will be ready to begin negotiations with the Burma Government in the very near future. We should also utilize as fully as circumstances permit the potentialities of the Smith–Mundt and Fulbright Acts for the exchange of technical personnel and students between the US and Burma.

In accordance with the fundamental concept of our Point 4 Program, the capital investment required for rehabilitation and development should be sought from private enterprise. The Burmese Government has recently announced its desire to attract foreign private investments and to participate in the Point 4 Program, especially in the field of mineral exploitation. However, in view of present disturbed conditions in the country, it is unlikely that any appreciable amount of private foreign capital will enter Burma. As conditions improve, the old British firms which had been active in Burma in the pre-war and immediate post-war periods will probably be the first private foreign commercial enterprises willing to commence operations in Burma.

Present unsettled conditions make it extremely uncertain that projects could be presented which would qualify for Export-Import Bank financing. Burma is not a member of the International Monetary Fund and Bank and, therefore, is not eligible for financial assistance from that quarter. If Burma should apply for membership, we would recommend favorable action on the application.

Burma trades largely with India, the UK and China, and only to a very limited extent with the US. Accordingly, there will probably be little direct US influence on Burmese foreign trade practices. Because of its dollar shortage, Burma has been forced to place severe restrictions on imports from hard currency areas. Although recognizing this necessity, it is our policy to encourage Burma to conduct its trade according to the ITO Charter and the principles of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, to which it is a contracting party.

US representatives at Rangoon should at favorable opportunities encourage the Government of Burma to prohibit the production of opium for nonmedical purposes and to discourage the opening of licensed shops where drug addicts may obtain opium. The US urges Burma to join with other opium-producing countries in supporting provisions for limiting opium production in the new convention now being prepared under the UN.

C. RELATIONS WITH OTHER COUNTRIES

Burma has extended recognition to the Chinese Communist régime but this recognition has not yet been acknowledged. The Burmese Government policy on China is to take no action which would unnecessarily antagonize the Chinese Communists. Burma is fortunate in not having a large immigrant Chinese minority. The total number of Chinese living in Burma probably does not exceed 300,000, and the Government is rigorously limiting further Chinese immigration.

The Socialist left-wingers under the leadership of U Ba Swe, Secretary-General of the Burma Socialist Party, are pro-Mao Tse-tung, having announced at various times their gratification over Mao's victories in China and the conclusion of the Communist Sino-Russian Treaty. The Rangoon branch of the Chinese Democratic League has been inconspicuously but assiduously cultivating Socialist left-wingers. However, the Moscow propaganda output on Burma backs the insurrectionary Communist parties and denounces the Socialist supported Government of Burma as an imperialistic tool. It seems probable that the Chinese Communists will assist the Communist-rebel factions in Burma in an attempt to overthrow the present Burmese Government by force, and at the same time try to weaken Burmese resistance to Communism by subversive propaganda, and by penetrating and deliberately misguiding the Socialist Government.

The Burmese Government is worried about its long and partially undefined boundary with China. Border incidents frequently occur which could provide a pretext for Chinese Communist invasion into Burmese territory. In the event of a decisive Burmese Government victory over the domestic Communist insurgents, it is possible that the Chinese Communists would try to occupy the Shan State of Kengtung, which is remote from Rangoon but which provides access to Thailand and Indochina as well as Burma.

A committee of Commonwealth ambassadors at Rangoon was established in May 1949 under UK initiative to study the Burmese Government's requests for a sterling loan and military equipment. Some military equipment has been supplied by the UK, India, and Pakistan; and these countries have been joined by Ceylon and Australia in granting the Commonwealth loan of £6,000,000 to be used for domestic currency backing. The UK contributed £3,750,000. There was considerable political opposition to this loan in England. The UK is now reported to be giving favorable consideration to supplying, on a reimbursable basis, arms and equipment for ten battalions of frontier troops. The British Foreign Office anticipates that these troops would be mainly, if not exclusively, Chins, Kachins and Shans, and it expects that, should Burma fall to the Communists, these troops would remain loyal to the British connection and would provide a base for British clandestine activities or guerrilla warfare against the Communists in Burma.

The Burmese Government has announced its gratitude to the UK and the Commonwealth for the help and sympathy which they have given thus far; but suspicion of British motives and resistance to any thought of return to the Commonwealth is still strong and widespread in Burma. The British on the other hand seem inclined to the opinion that failure to settle the Karen dispute, combined with the dwindling military capability of the army and the persistent Burmese refusal to tolerate British or Commonwealth advice in any matter, renders the entire Burma situation practically hopeless.

Although some friction has developed between Burma and India over the issues of strict Burmese limitation on Indian immigration and Burmese plans to nationalize agricultural lands in Burma which are owned by absentee Indian landlords, Burma's traditional ties with India and Burmese admiration for Nehru have kept Indian-Burmese relations on a friendly basis. The growth of Indian power and influence among Asian nations causes some uneasiness in Burma which lies, rich in natural resources, on the eastern frontiers of this overpopulated colossus. Nevertheless, the Burmese feel they have a great deal more in common with the Indians than with the British; and Indian participation in the Commonwealth efforts to help Burma has allayed to an important extent characteristic Burmese distrust of British intentions. In conjunction with the Commonwealth aid plans India supplied some 200,000 rifles for the Burma Army during the past year and also participated in the Commonwealth loan to the extent of £1,000,000.

Apparently regarding Pakistan as a counterbalance to growing Indian power, the Burmese Government has maintained the most cordial relations with that country. General Ne Win, Deputy Prime Minister, and U E Maung while he was still Foreign Minister, visited Karachi last year en route to Rangoon from Washington and London. They have discussed military aid and trade relations with officials of the Pakistan Government. Burma and Pakistan exchange Ambassadors, and the Pakistan Ambassador is a member of the Commonwealth Committee in Rangoon. Pakistan participated in making the Commonwealth loan to Burma to the extent of £500,000.

The Burmese Foreign Minister said during his visit to Washington last August that because the races of Indochina are more congenial to the peoples of Northern Burma than are the Chinese, he fears subversive Communist penetration from Indochina more than from China. He said he believes that Ho Chi Minh is a Communist and that he hopes the Bao Dai Government will succeed. However, the Burmese Government is not prepared publicly to express approval of Bao Dai.

The agreement between the Burmese and Russian Governments early in 1948 to exchange Ambassadors has not been implemented, and there has been no contact between the two countries. A Burmese trade delegation has visited Czechoslovakia and a Czech delegation visited Burma. The Burmese were favorably impressed, but there has been no further development of this relationship. Moscow propaganda labels the present Government of Burma as an imperialist tool and Burma's independence as fictitious. This line occasionally arouses intense Burmese indignation but in general seems to make little permanent impression on Burmese attitudes toward the USSR.

Burma was admitted to the United Nations on April 19, 1948. It has thus participated in the second special session on Palestine and the third and fourth regular sessions of the General Assembly. It has not taken a particularly active role in any of these sessions, although its Foreign Minister was elected Vice-Chairman of the Sixth Committee in the fourth regular General Assembly. While ordinarily receptive to the views of the US, the Burmese delegation generally has avoided taking a position on issues arising out of the east-west conflict except toward the end of the Paris session and again after the arrival of the Foreign Minister at the fourth General Assembly. Its over-all orientation is with the Asian states and the underdeveloped countries. During the period when U E Maung was Foreign Minister, Burma could be depended upon to follow the lead of the US in important issues.

D. POLICY EVALUATION

The basic question in analyzing the adequacy of our Burma policy is whether the development of a reasonably stable political situation and the reorganization under Burmese leadership of an adequately functioning economy can be completed soon enough to make possible successful Burmese resistance to the impending Communist effort to bring Burma under Communist domination.

The very weaknesses in the Burmese situation which we are trying to help overcome are the factors which obstruct the success of our policies—suspicion of the motives behind foreign aid, political immaturity which renders the Burmese people and their leaders susceptible to Communist propaganda, lack of trained administrative personnel to back up any large-scale economic aid program, social disintegration which has reduced the country to a chaos of warring factions. Thus US policy cannot of itself guarantee a solution of the Burmese problem but must be regarded merely as a technique whereby we may be able to contribute to the gradual overcoming of these weaknesses in Burmese national life.

We cannot judge the effectiveness of this policy until we have had an opportunity to observe whether our aid programs are having a favorable impact upon conditions in Burma. Burmese attitudes toward our technical aid projects will be far more significant indicators of the success of the projects than the degree of their efficiency in achieving specific economic objectives.

The Burmese people have reacted favorably to the exchange of persons and information programs we have thus far undertaken in Burma. Government officials have expressed interest in obtaining assistance from the US under our proposed Point 4 Program. The Griffin Mission expressed its belief that an American aid program in Burma could win new and great good-will in Burma if it were jointly administered with the Burmese by capable, hard-working, patient US personnel.

The British have agreed with our analysis of the role US technical assistance can and should play in Burma and they have acquiesced in our assertion that the UK and Commonwealth should continue to accept the primary responsibility for military and financial aid. To this extent our policy of encouraging their acceptance of primary responsibility has succeeded. If in view of Burmese anti-British and anti-Commonwealth attitudes, the British become convinced either that the Burmese situation is utterly hopeless or that the US would accept the primary responsibility should the UK withdraw, then the UK and the Commonwealth assistance to Burma might be expected to dwindle rapidly. If the British withdraw from Burma, the US will probably have to step into the breach; and we must, therefore, prepare as rapidly as possible for this contingency.

Another contingency which should be anticipated is the provision of substantial military assistance by the Chinese Communists to the Burmese Communist insurrectionaries. The proposed expanded information and exchange of persons programs to be carried out with Section 303 funds would prepare the US to meet an intensified Communist propaganda drive in Burma; and our proposed economic and technical assistance programs should give the US a favorable position in respect to any intensified Communist effort to gain the friendship of the present Government and the non-Communist population of Burma. However, if the Chinese Communists give strong military assistance to the Burmese Communists and if the UK and the Commonwealth military aid to the Government forces is not correspondingly stepped up, it will probably become necessary for the US considerably to expand its present plans for military assistance to Burma.

If Burma and Indochina can be held against Communism, we can probably hold all of Southeast Asia. If either Burma or Indochina falls, Siam would probably follow; and Southeast Asia would be practically defenseless against the onrush of Communism. We are moving as rapidly as possible to find out how much US military and economic assistance is really needed and can be used effectively in Burma and to supply that assistance at the earliest possible date.

Memorandum by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (Hare) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] July 1, 1950.

Subject: Danger that Chinese Communist Troops May Enter Burmese Territory

I should like to invite your attention to telegrams No. 947 of June 28 from New Delhi and No. 369 of June 29 from Rangoon [1] in which our Ambassadors at those posts report on the danger that Chinese Communist troops may enter Burma to disarm elements of the Chinese Nationalist Army which had retreated into northern Burma from Yunnan.

Telegrams from our Embassy in Rangoon during the past few months have reported varying estimates of the numbers of Chinese Nationalist troops present in Burma. These estimates have ranged from 2,000 to 5,000; and it is, therefore, believed that the figure of 20,000 cited in New Delhi's telegram of June 28 is in error.

In response to a request from the Burmese Prime Minister, Thakin Nu, Prime Minister Nehru of India has instructed the Indian Ambassador in Peking to endeavor to dissuade the Chinese Communists from entering Burma and to give the Government of Burma time to disarm the Nationalist troops.

Nehru suggested to Thakin Nu that he request the American Government to ask Chiang Kai-shek to instruct the Chinese Nationalists in Burma to permit themselves to be disarmed and interned by the Burmese Government. The telegram of June 29 from Rangoon reports that the Burmese Prime Minister has now officially requested our

[1] Neither printed.

Ambassador to inquire whether the US Government would use its good offices in asking the Chinese Nationalist Government to issue instructions to the Chinese Nationalist forces in northern Burma to lay down their arms and allow themselves to be interned by the Government of Burma.

Although the Burmese Chargé d'Affaires in Peking has received assurances that the Chinese Communists would not send troops into Burma to disarm the Nationalists located there, the Chinese Communists have apparently given these assurances only on the condition that the Government of Burma disarm and intern the Chinese Nationalists. The Burma Government had previously indicated optimism regarding its ability to disarm these troops, but the Burmese Prime Minister states in his letter to Nehru that the Chinese Nationalist troops are now assuming a belligerent attitude and conducting themselves as an occupying force.

I understand that the Department has also been approached by the Chinese Embassy in Washington with an expression of concern from the Nationalist Government about the welfare of the Chinese Nationalist troops in Burma and a request that this be transmitted to the Government of Burma.

Recommendation

It is recommended that

(1) You call in the Chinese Ambassador to inform him of the approaches made to us by the Governments of India and Burma and ask that he transmit to his Government the request of the US Government that the Chinese Nationalist troops in Burma be instructed to lay down their arms and permit themselves to be interned by the Government of Burma. It is suggested that you emphasize to the Chinese Ambassador that the presence of these armed Nationalist troops surrender, they will be well treated and no reprisals will be Burmese territory. It is also suggested that you invite the attention of the Ambassador to the assurances given to our Ambassador in Rangoon by the Prime Minister of Burma that if the Nationalist troops surrender, they will be well treated and no reprisals will be taken for past resistance.

(2) The attached telegrams be sent to Rangoon and New Delhi instructing our Embassies to inform the Governments of India and Burma of the action we have taken and to transmit to the Government of Burma the Chinese Nationalists Government's expression of concern for the welfare of the Nationalist troops in Burma.[2]

On July 7 Rusk called in Ambassador Koo of China and informed him of the United States position as indicated in recommendation (1). On the same day telegrams were sent to Rangoon and New Delhi reporting the substance of Rusk's interview with Koo. A memorandum of Rusk's conversation with Koo (not printed) is in file 793.54/7–750. CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, July 28, 1950—2 p. m.

79. In view increasing seriousness fighting between Burm Govt Forces and Chi Nationalist troops Kengtung Dept considers desirable you inform Chi Govt our growing concern re this situation and renew our request that immed instrs be issued Chi Nationalist troops in Burm lay down arms and permit selves be interned by Burm Govt. Burm Govt has given us rptd assurances troops wld be well treated and invited officers US Emb Rangoon to visit internment camp.

You may inform Chi Govt that US Amb Rangoon was again approached on this matter by Burm Govt on Jul 25.[2] You may say we consider presence these troops in Burm does not constitute mil advantage but in fact plays into hands of Commies. Necessity Burm Govt directing its mil efforts to combatting Chi Nationalist troops is weakening its mil drive to defeat domestic Commie insurgents and Karen rebel factions. If by the activities Chi Nationalist troops in Kengtung these insurgents are enabled regain some of the ground they have lost, the internal polit stability of Burm will be endangered. We believe stability of Burm is vital to security of Southeast Asia.

You may also say it has been learned that Burm Govt may appeal to UN on Jul 29 for help in dealing with Nationalist troops. It is believed that such an appeal wld be most embarrassing to Chi Govt and that in order to avoid such embarrassment we believe desirable that immed instrs be issued their troops in Burm to accept disarmament and internment by Burm Govt.

Shld Chi Govt ask for identification troops involved you may say understand there approx 2200 composed of elements 8th Army, 20th Army, and 278th Regiment of reconstituted 93rd Div.

Dept official spoke to Chi Amb in foregoing sense Jul 27. FYI Amb seemed impressed particularly by mention of possible reference to SC and indicated he wld communicate Formosa urgently.

FYI in response request made by Burm PriMin to US Amb Rangoon Dept called in Chi Amb Jul 7 and asked him send his Govt US request that Chi Govt instruct its troops Burm permit themselves be disarmed and interned by the Burm Govt. On Jul 25 Chi Amb informed Dept his Govt appreciated US viewpoint but desired gain a little time before taking action. However, in view Burm Govt plans bring matter before UN by Jul 29, immed action appears necessary.

Comment: Fact that MDAP Mission will take into consideration special Anglo-Burmese military relationship appreciated by Fonoff, which clearly hopes be kept fully informed our intentions re furnishing Burma any mil aid. Fonoff, for its part, apparently intends provide us with fullest info available re Burmese arms position. Fonoff attaches great importance to coordination US–UK efforts particularly in view difficulty accurately determining Burma's mil needs as result GOB's persistent failure supply adequate background info and refusal Ne Win cooperate with BSM. Fonoff feels these two factors are crux of mil aid problem.

is that Burma cld not hope resist invasion by organized mil forces but that Burmese army shld be strong enough maintain internal security, protect communications and repel border raids and minor infiltration. According UK estimates, Burma now has arms sufficient for 26 battalions and when supply under 1949–50 annual demands submitted last August is completed it will have equipment for 9 additional battalions.

There is continued confusion over special Burmese request of May 17 for "re-equipment" 30 battalions and maintenance requirements for three years (not two as Glass previously told us). Responding to Fonoff inquiry, Brit Emb Rangoon has reported that May 17 request is in addition to annual demand for maintenance requirements for 30 battalions to be submitted, according customary procedure, in about month's time. Fonoff now wondering whether mistake has been made in duplicating maintenance demands or whether Burmese really thinking now in terms total 60 battalions (the 30 included in May 17 request being new battalions in spite Burmese use term "re-equipment") as reply from Brit Emb seems indicate. Fonoff querying Brit Emb again on this point.

No decision has yet been taken re May 17 request and Fonoff continuing try clarify what Burma actually wants and needs in way mil equipment. Meanwhile, Fonoff considering policy decision on following lines:

a. Pending decision on Future BSM, important consideration from UK viewpoint is to avoid antagonizing Ne Win in any way likely prejudice outcome this question; therefore, UK will endeavor postpone showdown on arms supply until at least end of year.

b. UK will agree now to furnish Burmese with equipment for four new battalions, treating this as special demand requiring urgent consideration and ignoring condition that GOB first furnish adequate justifying info.

c. Re remainder May 17 request, UK will inform Burma that any further demands this nature for additional mil equipment must be included in annual request, which will be treated in ordinary way, or else submitted as special request thru Commonwealth Ambs Comite supported by adequate info justifying request.

d. Meanwhile, UK will continue with efforts make available special items (armored cars, radio equipment, etc) which have been recommended by Ambs Comite and for which there appears to be clear and urgent need.

Comment: Foregoing represents tentative views reached at Fonoff working level and given us in confidence by Glass. While we gather it substantially represents position UK likely adopt, no decision by Fonoff has yet been reached.

The Chargé in China (Strong) to the Secretary of State

SECRET PRIORITY TAIPEI, August 11, 1950—8 p. m.

242. During call on Foreign Minister with Rankin [1] this morning, Yeh opened discussion of Chinese troops in Kengtung, said Burmese attitude unreasonable, had launched six ground attacks plus calling in six British planes from Singapore; air attacks by British planes ended all hope for grounding arms by Chinese troops. Reported earlier request for more time and said Chinese Government striving get them out of Burma into Yunnan. Small advance party returned Yunnan already to determine safe place cross boundary and operate.

Yeh claimed Nationalist Government had carried on negotiations with French to permit them enter Laos, but after initial favorable attitude, French changed mind and refused. Also said had negotiations with Thai Government for ammunition supply (to be paid for in US dollars) to enable troops return Yunnan, but after considering proposal for ten days Thai refused.

In meantime one of rebel Burmese groups sent emissary and proposed Chinese troops join them in attack against Moulmein (not clear from Yeh whether Chinese troops still considering proposal). Rebels have supplied Chinese troops with ammunition to enable them continue resisting Burmese Government forces.

Yeh admitted communications with Chinese troops very slow but hoped have illicit radio established soon in Chiengmai area of Thailand. Have had many communications with General Li Mi in Hong Kong and Bangkok but Li Mi threatened resign commission if ordered to try persuade troops surrender. Officers of Li Mi have made much trouble with Chinese Embassy Bangkok, demanding money and supplies and diplomatic support. Li has been ordered remove troops to Yunnan soonest but Burmese Government must give safe-conduct to Yunnan border and ammunition must be provided from some source to enable them resist Communists (even if ammunition provided, no one can guarantee troops will proceed Yunnan).

If case brought to UN, Chinese Government can say troops refused obey orders, can tell Burmese go ahead take military measures to overcome them and can state would welcome UN forces take action.

I pointed out that actually Chinese Government had no control over troops; Yeh concurred. Also doubtful Li Mi will cooperate fully with Chinese Government.

[1] Karl L. Rankin, formerly Consul General at Hong Kong, had recently arrived in Taiwan to assume the position of Chargé d'Affaires ad interim and Minister in Taipei. Mr. Strong, as Chargé, held only the rank of First Secretary.

Another possibility is that troops might agree enter Thailand and accept being disarmed by Thai Government, but this would take time, again.

Yeh seemed adamant against ordering troops lay down arms in Burma. There are doubtless internal reasons here for his attitude. Although I again pointed out very sound reasons for Burmese action and demand, and US concern, Yeh inclined place blame on Burmese Government.

Placing problem before UN will solve nothing quickly because no existing force can control these Chinese troops.

94. ReEmbtel 86, August 13.[1] Without specifying whether or not General Ne Win was aware of development set forth in Taipei's 6 August 12,[2] Prime Minister warned me last night General Ne Win still pressing for resort to UN. Prime Minister, however, categorically refused on grounds his "promise to me" not to take such action unless and until new developments compelled reconsideration, in which case he would give me ample notice. Prime Minister nevertheless expressed fear that during his forthcoming ten-day absence from Rangoon on visit to Delta, Ne Win might, as acting head of government, initiate UN action on his own. Prime Minister, therefore, suggested that I make every effort in my scheduled visit with Ne Win today persuade latter do nothing precipitate.

Accordingly during my call on Ne Win this morning accompanied by Army Attaché, I reviewed in considerable detail numerous steps taken by US Government find satisfactory solution Kengtung situation, stressing this done at request of GOB and out of sympathy for latter's position. I then acquainted him contents Taipei's 6, August 12. To my surprise he said this was first he had heard of this development. Like Prime Minister, he stated that if these orders issued and carried out, this would be entirely satisfactory. (Note: This encouraging since Chinese orders do not conform exactly with previous Burmese insistence that KMT troops submit interment.) Although Ne Win stated he had not yet received any reports from Kengtung which indicated orders had been received or acted upon, he acknowledged communication difficulties, and stated he would closely watch developments next three or four days and keep Embassy informed. Meantime he would advise me of any suggestions how our good offices might be of further use.

Ne Win next stated he personally reluctant resort UN because of possible embarrassment this might cause friendly powers, but extremists were pressing hard for such action on grounds aggression should be opposed whether in Korea or Burma. He hoped, therefore, that Taipei's orders would promptly be carried out. Comment: (1) Prime Minister version Ne Win's attitude at variance with latter's own remarks to me. (2) This interview reemphasizes importance sincere effort by Taipei Government make known its orders to all KMT units involved and to desirability getting these orders and its good faith on record in case question eventually comes before UN.

Ne Win disclosed that aside from new group approximately 400 along Yunnan border (Embtel 83, August 12 [3]), only about 200 KMT troops remaining in Kengtung, but these well-armed with new equipment including radios. Bulk of original estimated 2,000 together with families have crossed into Thailand but have not been disarmed or interned by Thais. Few if any known to have entered Indochina. Ne Win reemphasized urgent necessity, therefore, for Thailand immediately take effective action prevent KMT troops reentering Burma or further assistance through Thailand to those still in Burma (Embtel 74, August 10 [3]).

Indian Ambassador told me yesterday that under instructions he had informed Prime Minister that GOI considered inadvisable Burma resort to UN this stage.

Fundamental to our policy in Burma is prin that we shall not press upon Burmese assistance or advice which is not sought by Burma and cordially received by them. We cannot run slightest risk of any incident which might imply Burma disapproval of MDAP Mission's visit to Rangoon or of any assistance which US might at any time have in mind.

Under present circumstances, MDAP Mission shld proceed with its plans for countries other than Burma. If there is any substantial change in attitude Rangoon before Mission leaves general area SEA, it might be possible to work in quick last-minute visit Rangoon but present opinion here is that Rangoon is out unless Bur Govt actively and cordially seeks such visit.

You may use ur discretion as to best way to inform Bur Govt of change of Mission's plans. You shld not fall into any commitment as to later visit. If you need to take matter in stages, you might say casually that Mission was instructed to proceed immed to Bangkok and Manila in connection offer of troop aid to UN forces in Korea made by those countries.

Emb Rangoon will understand that US Military assistance for Burma other than river boats will be delayed indefinitely as result of failure to receive Mission. We do not wish this used as argument to Burmese to receive Mission; this is for info Emb only. There are far too many onerous demands upon US for assistance to permit us to force assistance into unwilling hands. Perhaps Brit Mission must serve as sole channel outside military assistance Burma. River boat aid can proceed without Mission visit Rangoon.

Sir Derick Hoyer Millar, Minister, British Embassy
Mr. H. A. Graves, Counselor, British Embassy

I referred to the articles that had appeared in the press on our policy in regard to Formosa. I stated that in fact our policy remained unchanged. I summarized this policy as follows: We hope that Formosa would not fall into the hands of the Communists. We had been giving some economic aid to Nationalist China. The Nationalists still have some funds and might purchase further supplies for shipment to Formosa. We would not allow heavy items, such as bombers and heavy tanks, to be shipped to Formosa. We did not intend to become engaged in the defense of Formosa, however, and we had no plans to send a big military mission there. With respect to shipments of military supplies, I said there would be some borderline cases and we would endeavor to keep the British informed about these.

Hoyer Millar said that the British would be very grateful for any information. They were naturally interested to see that no supplies which could be used to attack Hongkong fall into the hands of the Communists. They had themselves been guilty with respect to the shipment of some tanks but this was now straightened out.

Hoyer Millar referred to press reports of a decision of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and of the National Security Council on this question.[3] I confined my comment to saying that the Joint Chiefs of Staff had expressed themselves on some aspects of the situation and that the National Security Council had only considered this matter in connection with some other problems it was considering. I agreed that we would keep the British informed on shipments of major military items to Formosa.

Cantel 3. As new arrival Taipei I am being given the "treatment" by Formosan Independence "Movement". Conversations with Peter Huang and Philip Ng and perusal of their propaganda have served only to establish their utter lack of realism, absence of any militant and armed popular foundation, and complete reliance on US to achieve their aims and assure their livelihood forever.

It seemed desirable to attempt to straighten out their thinking in relation to China scene as to US, and to prevent misconception as to nature of any personal relations with me.

In brief, they were told in friendly manner, as my personal opinion, that Formosans themselves, unarmed, could not get rid of Chinese now on Island; US would require several divisions of troops plus supporting naval and air forces to take and keep control over Island, a responsibility which we are not prepared to assume; for time being any hope for independence lay with Nationalists not with Communists, and thus measures designed weaken Nationalists merely served increase chances Communist control, so Formosans must recognize facts, not avoid them, and they should not forget that Formosa fits into large pattern from which it cannot be separated arbitrarily; and although US sympathetic to Formosan aspirations, there were very few grounds for optimism now and foreseeable future.

With steady economic deterioration rather certain, we feel we must be prepared to face more and more pressure and arguments from Formosans unless we now take and hold to a line of friendly but positive regret, both here and in Hong Kong. Disabusing them of false hopes now may avert more violent resentment later, by getting them used to the idea that probably nothing can be done for them under present circumstances.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Secretary of State

CONFIDENTIAL WASHINGTON, January 5, 1950.

Subject: Formosa Problem

Participants: Senator William F. Knowland
Senator Alexander H. Smith
The Secretary of State
Mr. Jack K. McFall[1]

Senator Knowland and Senator Smith called at my office this morning and we discussed the Formosa issue for about an hour and a half.

I opened the conversation by stating that I felt it proper to review briefly the general considerations entering into the Formosa problem. First I called attention to the fact that, to all intents and purposes, all of continental China was now to be written off as there did not appear any possibility of further effective military resistance to the Communist regime on the mainland. I called attention to the fact that I had had repeated conferences with the British, designed to point up to them the desirability of maintaining a nonrecognition policy of Communist China but that in spite of those representations the British had decided their interests lie in the direction of recognition.[2] Consequently I felt that the statements I was to make should be placed in the framework of the realization of the fact that Burma, India, Great Britain, New Zealand, Australia, Canada, and doubtless a large number of other nations would be recognizing the Communist regime before the passage of any considerable period of time. I made it clear that our standing in the eyes of the Chinese at the moment had reached a nadir which was

[1] Assistant Secretary of State for Congressional Relations.

[2] On January 6, 1950, the Government of the United Kingdom announced its recognition of the People's Republic of China as the de jure Government of China and stated its readiness to establish diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China. For documentation on the United States Government's decision not to recognize the People's Republic of China, see Foreign Relations, 1949, vol. IX, pp. 1 ff. Material on the recognition question during 1950 is contained principally in Department of State decimal file 793.02.

somewhat comparable to the same state of disaffection in which the Russians were held some 21 years ago. I pointed out that to all intents and purposes Manchuria and outer Mongolia were firmly under Russian control, achieved as the result of a long-time design, and that inner Mongolia and Tsinkiang were also under a less severe measure of control. I stated, however, that as far as the rest of China was concerned Russian control as such had in no way been consolidated and that I felt the Soviets were going to encounter increasing difficulties by way of their program of subjugation. My reasons for this view were amplified.

I then briefly reviewed country by country the present situation in Burma, Malaya, Siam, Indo-China and Indonesia, indicating, that with the exception of Burma, there are encouraging signs of varying degree on the horizon in each of these areas.

I next reviewed the history of the Formosan question, pointing out that Formosa was essentially a Chinese territory, the control of which was interrupted by the Japanese for a period of some 40 years and that in recognition of this inherent right of ownership of the island by China both the Cairo and Potsdam Declarations reaffirmed such right.[3] I pointed out that if one wanted to be legalistic it could be argued that in sheer legality Formosa would not be a part and parcel of China until a stipulation to that effect had been made in the Japanese Peace Treaty. In further elaboration of this point I said that legal arguments of somewhat kindred nature with only a difference in party in interest could be made as regards the Mandated Islands in the Pacific, the Kuriles, and Korea; but for my part I preferred to deal with the sheer realities of the situation in each one of these cases, namely, that it makes little difference what might be done by way of formal documents, the fact remains that all of these areas fall in the same category as far as their administration and control are concerned by having had their fate morally sealed by some form of prior agreement. I then stated that if we accept the thesis that to all practical purposes Formosa historically has been a part of China—that it is part of China today and must in all morality continue to be a part of China—we are next confronted with the situation as to what, if anything, is to be done about the existing situation. In essence, I replied to my own question by stating that as I view the picture we are confronted with the necessity of making a choice that ultimately would lead us to adopting one of two alternative courses of action; We can take the position either that we will fight, if need be, for the retention of the island under our aegis, or in the absence of such a position we must be prepared to accept what now appears to be the real possibility of its collapse.

[3] See Foreign Relations, The Conferences at Cairo and Tehran, 1943, p. 448, and ibid., The Conference of Berlin (The Potsdam Conference), 1945, p. 1475.

As regards the first alternative, I stated I did not believe it was in the interest of the American people to hazard a war over Formosa; and secondly, that the mere statement of our intention to so hold the island would be completely defeative of the general line we had been taking and the philosophy we had been preaching of self-determination of all countries and areas in Asia. I emphasized my strong feeling that such a move would play right into the hands of Russian propaganda which could exploit to the fullest the point that such actions give the lie to our protestations of an absence of any imperialistic design in our motives. I reiterated that we simply cannot afford, by overt moves on our part, to place ourselves in a position where we would have difficulty in answering the charge that we were moving in the same orbit of imperialistic design that Russia is following today. I remarked that in my opinion any such move on our part would be greeted by all of the other countries in that area with whom we are trying to work in instilling ideas of responsible government with a sense of revulsion and with an attitude that our deeds were belying our words. I then stated that it would be possible for us to take this view, of course, only if the area in question were one that our highest military authority had deemed to be not of vital importance to the security of the United States. Following this up, I made the statement that the Joint Chiefs of Staff had made such a definition and that while I acknowledged that the highest military authorities would look with considerable concern should a foreign power occupy Formosa, nonetheless the retention of Formosa has been defined to be not of vital importance to our security.

Senator Smith mentioned at this point that he had spoken to Ambassador Stuart just before his heart attack and the Ambassador had indicated he felt that we must devise some means to prevent Formosa from falling into Communist hands. The Senator followed this observation with a statement that he wondered why the advice of men on the spot like General MacArthur[4] and Admiral Radford,[5] both of whom had expressed to him very strong feelings that under no contingency should we permit Formosa to fall into Communist hands, had not been taken into account. I replied to this observation with the statement that there were always differences of opinion among military personnel as to the strategic importance of practically any place which one could select in the world and therefore it was necessary in such matters to accept the considered judgment of the Joint Chiefs of Staff who were charged with the responsibility of resolving our military potentials and strategy in terms of a worldwide outlook.

At this point I proceeded to develop the strategic aspects of Formosa, pointing out that it was only 40 miles nearer to Okinawa than the mainland of China and only 160 miles nearer to the Philippines than the China mainland—both of them distances that have no significance in terms of airpower today. Next I called attention to the military and financial resources which the Nationalist government has on hand today to meet the threat of any possible invasion from the mainland. I averted to the fact that the population of Formosa, is about 6½ million, to which a million individuals have been added in the form of the large Nationalist Army, plus a 100,000-man airforce and a 30,000-man Navy, not to mention about 700,000 refugees from the mainland. I stated I felt China had sufficient financial resources to buy whatever military equipment and replacement material might be needed to meet any threat of invasion which might come from the Communist forces on the mainland, provided that the political situtaion in Formosa did not decay to a point where the invasion could be successful because of the sheer inability of the Nationalist government to make its men fight and prevent defections of both men and materiel of the Air Force and Navy. I reaffirmed my position that we should continue to supply the needs of the island for fertilizer and to carry on the rural rehabilitation program, but that anything further than that by way of increased military assistance or military advice is regarded as unnecessary on our part and would be defeative of the principles of non-intervention which we had been endeavoring to espouse.

[4] General of the Army Douglas MacArthur, Supreme Commander, Allied Powers (Japan), and Commander in Chief, Far East.
[5] Adm. Arthur W. Radford, Commander in Chief, Pacific.

Senator Knowland at this point called attention to the fact that all ECA aid other than the fertilizer and rural rehabilitation programs had been stopped; that the funds available for a reconstruction program had been frozen and that he felt strongly this was a mistake. Senator Knowland also stated he could not share my view that the situation internally in Formosa was nearly as bad as he inferred from my remarks and that to the contrary he left the island with the impression that there was quite a high state of morale among the armed services as well as the Formosans, and that if we would give a proper measure of both military and economic aid the situation could be saved. Senator Knowland was particularly critical of my statement that I considered the 100 million or 150 million dollars left in the financial coffers to be sufficient to meet their needs, saying he felt it was essential for the Nationalist government to retain those funds as a backing for their currency and that he was unable to understand why we would continue to aid England to build up her reserves when apparently we took the view that it was not necessary for Formosa to have any financial reserves at all.

Following this phase of the discussion I took occasion to read from a memorandum all of the military equipment and ammunition that had been sent to Formosa during the past calendar year from the U.S. as well as from other sources.[6] Senator Knowland stated that in his opinion the Nationalist armies were not adequately armed on either Formosa or Hainan as his investigation disclosed that much of the ammunition and a good proportion of the guns were of ten or twelve years of age and of a vintage that we would have disposed of for our own purposes five years ago. I countered this statement with the observation that they would probably have the same kind of ammunition that the Communists would have in the event they would endeavor to invade the island.

At this point Senator Smith interjected the remark that he did not understand why the State Department had forbidden him and Senator Ferguson to go to Formosa. I stated I had looked into the charges that the State Department had frustrated Senator Ferguson's movement into Formosa and that the Department had had absolutely nothing to do with the matter at all; that his failure to reach Formosa was due rather to his inability to secure proper plane transportation to take him there. Senator Smith then stated he had seen the wire himself which counseled him not to proceed to Formosa. I thereupon told Senator Smith I would look into it immediately as it was certainly done without my knowledge.

In conclusion, I stated it was my view that inasmuch as Formosa was not of vital importance from a strategic standpoint, the United States had much more to lose than to gain if we were to take any military action, or adopt a policy of military assistance that would lead to military involvement, designed at holding Formosa, and that distasteful as the possibility was that the island might well be occupied by the Communists at some time in the future, we must concede the possibility and not compromise our entire position in the Near East by doing deeds that would give the lie to our words.

I next suggested that it would be well to clarify the situation on the publication of the confidential inter-Departmental paper on Formosa.[7] I emphasized that this paper was just one of hundreds of similar papers constantly being issued with the design of giving government employees holding responsibility for explaining world and area developments and happenings a proper line of comment and explanation in the context of our foreign policy and national interest if and when any such developments and happenings occur. If, therefore, the contents of the paper were to be viewed fairly in terms of its purpose and design, I stated that I could not view the directions given therein to be in any way damaging to us but rather that it was sensibly contrived to protect our world prestige should the possible eventuality of the fall of Formosa become a reality.

[6] On January 3, Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs W. Walton Butterworth had forwarded to Mr. Acheson a memorandum, not printed, listing the most significant military items shipped from the United States to Formosa during the past 13 months. The memorandum also covered the status of military equipment on the island. (794A.5/1–350)

Senator Knowland thereupon quoted several excerpts from the paper and stated that he was amazed at the "spirit of defeatism" contained in the passages and that in his opinion it showed that the Department was taking an indefensible attitude on this issue and was endeavoring to encourage others to take and propagate the same view. I firmly disavowed this interpretation by stating that the Senator was reading the passages entirely out of context and reaffirmed my previous statement that proper management and stewardship required us to keep responsible government officials informed of proper "slants" for them to take in the interest of securing a press reaction that would explain developments to the world in a fashion that would serve a maximum advantage to our world position and prestige. I repeated that the direction given was on an "as, if and when" basis and was not intended to encourage any propaganda efforts before the fact on the part of anyone. As an example, I cited the fact that we had prepared a paper [8] of similar nature at the time of the recent Philippine elections, pointing out the nature of the position that should be taken by responsible government officials in commenting on the election of the Philippine President. The paper was prepared in such a way as to give them a proper course of action to follow in meeting any of the three possible election results that would flow from the selection of any one of the three presidential candidates. Neither Senator Knowland nor Senator Smith made any request of me to look at the paper.

At this point Senator Knowland stated that in all respect to me he must reiterate that he felt the State Department was pursuing a policy of grave danger to the American people and that he considered the issue to be one of paramount importance. He said he felt it his conscientious duty to endeavor to acquaint the American people with what he regarded to be a fatal policy I was espousing which we would live to rue and regret.

Senator Smith concluded the observation by stating he was disappointed that no opportunity was afforded for any consultation on this matter, as disclosed by the fact the President was in the act of issuing a policy on Formosa [9] without either him or Senator Knowland having been consulted before the policy was given to the public. Senator Smith stated he felt there was a real possibility that this action might affect his future attitude of support of a bipartisan foreign policy.

Courteous but restrained goodbyes were offered by those present.

Editorial Note

On January 5, President Truman issued a statement regarding United States policy toward Formosa; for the text, see Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: Harry S. Truman, 1950, page 11. The President reiterated American support for the Cairo Declaration of December 1, 1943, which had proposed restoration of Formosa to the Republic of China. He indicated that the United States had no desire to establish military bases on Formosa at the present time and would not provide military aid or advice to the Chinese forces on Formosa, although economic aid would continue. In addition, he said that the United States Government would not pursue a course which would lead to involvement in the civil conflict in China.

Secretary of State Acheson, on the afternoon of January 5, held a news conference at which he provided background and elaboration on the President's statement; for the text of Mr. Acheson's remarks, see Department of State Bulletin, January 16, 1950, page 79.

SECRET SHANGHAI, January 5, 1950—5 p.m.

National Security Council statement broadcast over VOA January 2 re aid to Nationalist Government in Formosa case [1] was great relief to Shanghai Americans who had become mystified and jittery over past week's deluge of distorted "news" from Washington (e.g. Contels 14, January 3 and 46, January 4) [2] and statements by prominent individual Americans seeming to constitute evidence of official government policy decision for all-out military aid to maintain Nationalist control of Taiwan.

Connally's December 29 statement [3] as first reported (re US recognition to depend on Chinese Communists observance International Law and accordance protection foreign nationals) was of nature to have produced excellent American and Chinese (other than extreme pro-Moscow) reaction. Such potential effects were immediately nullified however, by Connally's subsequently reported observations re possible military mission to Taiwan and preference Japanese to Communist rule; and, with various ensuing reports, local reaction has grown worse and worse.

Local press, ignoring National Security Council's statement, still continues play up recent sensational "news re American aid KMT Taiwan", including references to 250 tanks, 16 warships and large new credits being "given to KMT". Aside from press clamor, matter is creating furor alarm disappointment in liberal and moderate Chinese circles friendly to US. Officer of Consulate General who dined last night with 3 close Chinese friends, local Democratic League leaders Han Ming, Peng Wen-ying and Chu Kao-yung, was subjected to barrage of anxious questioning by all 3, who declared that question of Taiwan and US China policy has now become the major worry of great body of Chinese who support new regime and seek friendly relations with America. Han, who has press connections, stated that all yesterday he was besieged with telephone inquiries as to significance of press stories from his Tsinghua College club friends and others who have such trust in America that they would normally discount any newspaper allegations. Peng remarked earnestly that: "If America keeps Taiwan from new regime, it will lose all China itself in terms of goodwill of Chinese people". Exaggeration, but not without some basis.

Our size-up of Chinese Communist aspect of Formosan question as seen by many observers here is about as follows:

Dramatic crescendo of publicity and preparations demonstrating new regime's irrevocable determination to "liberate" Taiwan has been a major feature of this political scene recent months. With each easy mainland conquest by PLA narrowing down remaining field toward Taiwan, Gimo's[4] last lair, build-up of confident expectations, publicized commitments, economic pressures and stage-setting operations for its "certain conquest" has increased in scale and tempo.

By late summer press was already alive with talk re need winning island. Painful punishment inflicted on new regime by blockade and airraiding staged from Taiwan and Chusan Isles, together with injured pride frustration over delays setbacks in taking them by army which could in all other respects convince nation of its invincibility, gave violent stimulus to already firm decision that Gimo's Formosan base must be liquidated. Propaganda potentialities of each rumor of American aid to that base, adroitly interwoven with "proofs" of America's will to favor and rearm Japan (an equally explosive subject for quick-rousing popular ire), were fully exploited—hereby greatly assisting Chinese Communist propaganda drive to put across "lean to Russia" policy and at the same time helping further to make, of Chinese Communists Taiwan liberation commitment, even more of tiger from which could be no dismounting or retreat.

By end September build-up had reached point where official Chieh Fang Jih Pao on one day (29 December) carried 3 separate news items on urgency taking Taiwan (circular to troops exhorting them prepare for task, and speeding up of Taiwan liberation specialized training for "certain" PLA units, including Taiwanese Youth Corps). Conquest of Fukien and South China further increased heat of Taiwan-ward pressure and propaganda; and collapse of Nationalists final Szechuan and Yunan holds (together, possibly, with international considerations such as Russian, UN and recognition factors) have brought project to fever pitch.

Up to November signs suggested that Chinese Communists, fearing effect it might have on their recognition and UN prospects and perhaps hoping for possible early peaceful turnover, disfavored getting material Soviet help for difficult amphibious operations required for forcibly taking Taiwan and intervening Tinghai. Passing of time, however, and successive costly failures of expeditions recently launched on Tinghai have brought their loss "face", their grim determination and their anxiety over magnitude task to point where use Russian aid seems more likely. Rumors of such actual and possibly impending Soviet help (intensified by Mao's Moscow visit)[5] have grown rapidly and appears fairly certain that at least some Soviet military or naval technicians have been for several weeks assisting in Ningpo Staging Area. Recognition by British and other West European nations might make Chinese Communists less apprehensive re using Russian help. In any case it seems clear that the longer Chinese Communists are stumped by obstacles preventing their taking Taiwan by storm and/or internal subversion, the more they are likely accept Soviet military help—and, with such help, a strong spearhead of Soviet influence in Taiwan which might not otherwise readily develop (especially if expedition leadership designation continues to rest on Chen Yi,[6] whose believed antipathy to Moscow control has been reported in Contel 26, January 3).[7] It is, indeed, possible that, if substantial Russian aid has to be accepted because of firm maintenance KMT resistive power, reported Russian suspicions of Chen may force his replacement by more amenable general or at any rate his closer surveillance by pro-Soviet commissars.

[6] General Chen Yi was Mayor of Shanghai and Commander of the Third Field Army of the People's Liberation Army, People's Republic of China.

[7] Not printed; for a summary, see telegram 6, January 5, to Peiping, infra.

While Department doubtless has fuller information, Consulate General's information at least sufficient to indicate clearly that effort and expenditure have gone and will go into Chinese Communists "Operation Taiwan" (including preliminary Tinghai phase) on scale which for Communists must be relatively as great as invasion North Africa was for Western Allies. Fleets are being built and assembled, oil stocked, armies trained, soldiers taught to swim, etc. Large proportions of nation's budget and army specifically allocated to project. Chen Yi has been explicitly designated leader to fulfill mission, importance of which was revealed by fact that Chen's first act on returning here from Peiping was inspection of Ningpo Staging Area. There is good reason believe that equal thought and effort have gone into Chinese Communists underground program aiming to win Taiwan through popular uprising and buying off of KMT armed forces (a task which, if adequately financed, might well prove much easier and cheaper than military expedition). Within recent weeks virtually every important Chinese Communist pronouncement has declared, with increasing stress and irrevocable commitment tone, the necessity and certainty of taking island. Liberation Taiwan has, in fact, been publicly announced as nation's paramount immediate mission on which PLA's and new regime's reputation and entire resources are staked. Completeness of commitment to undertaking well illustrated by fact that few days ago officer of Consulate General, while walking through small village near Shanghai, came upon rural wine-assisted celebration by mixed farmers soldiers which centered around display of paper battleship labelled "Liberator of Taiwan".

In short, there would seem no avenue left for Communist retreat. Either they gain Taiwan; or, goaded by bitter humiliation and by Kremlin propaganda, they must keep it ever before Chinese people as China's great Irredentist issue and perpetual cause for anti-American vehemence. Well to remember that Taiwan Irredentism is not Communist monopoly but popular Chinese national issue; and that during KMT period as now slightest rumors of designs to admit American or returning Japanese influence in Taiwan brought chauvinistic outbursts in press and student circles (which were most convenient to Soviet intriguing in Manchuria and Sinkiang). Any talk that KMT is holding Taiwan for a new Chinese regime which it will re-impose over mainland would find no popular response here, as great bulk of Chinese population, however they may dislike Communists, have not slightest expectation or desire of "old gang" being able to return and rule.

Against this background, it appears to most observers here, including ourselves, that every seeming indication (however false) of American intention to underwrite Nationalist Government's hold of Taiwan or to return island to Japan plays directly into hands of Moscow dictated propaganda. Great majority of Chinese (including at least important minority of Chinese Communists) have strong sentiment against being tied exclusively to Russia in peace and even stronger opposition to being tied to her as ally in war against US. Potentialities of our exploiting these feelings very great. (Contels 4782, November 14, 5250, December 16, and 5308, December 19).[8] Most local observers feel that they could be best exploited by appropriately timed recognition, which would establish trade and other contacts whereby prestige of American technical excellence and some slight influence on Chinese thought might be maintained, and that in any case they can certainly not be exploited in the face of statements from Washington suggesting that US intends maintain Nationalist Government on Taiwan or give island to Japan. Such statements, in lieu of helping along tide of anti-Russian feeling, are clearly of character to slow such tide and to increase extent to which Russia would be able to dominate and use Chinese (including collaboration on Taiwan) in peace or war.[9]

With skillful handling, Peiping's alliance with USSR might be reduced to dubious asset if not actual liability for Soviets; but such objective can hardly be achieved against talk of American aid to Gimo. Difficult for Americans here to understand how strategic value of Taiwan could be so great as to outweigh long term gains to be derived from exploitation of Chinese good will toward US and rising anti-Soviet sentiment, which at very least could greatly lessen China's peace or war value to Russia, and which at best might convert China to Titoism frankly open to American advances.

Even official statements such as that of National Security Council, revealing extent of modest economic or technical aid which American Government considers continuing to give Nationalist Government are hard enough to explain to local communities which admittedly see things in narrow localized perspective. Reaction of Chinese circles and American community to recent stream of false reports as to American Government policy (twisted versions of official releases, statements by prominent individuals, rumors, fabrications, attributions of official status to Chennault[10] actions, etc.) can accordingly well be imagined. Unfortunately, Americans as well Chinese and Europeans are quick to seize on such "evidence".

(Illustrative of prevailing mood of jittery apprehensiveness and ease with which credence given to most unlikely tales is recent rumor that FBI investigating missionaries who chose remain in China, which was based on statement made in jest at American Association meeting by person recently returned from US who jokingly queried whether missionaries were afraid to send in petitions to State Department recommending recognition because of possibilities FBI investigation).

We, of course, do not venture contention that dangers of helping Nationalist Government in Formosa should necessarily prevail in Government's determination of American policy against opposing considerations of which Consulate General lacks background for adequate appreciation, though we feel it duty to report, as we have attempted above, our estimate of such dangers for due consideration. We do, however, voice hope that Department will keep in mind the desirability of issuance official policy statements such as that of National Security Council whenever their need is indicated by spate of sensational distorted news such as that under reference.

Memorandum by the Acting Secretary of State to the President [1]

SECRET WASHINGTON, January 10, 1950.

Subject: Chinese Communist Intention to Requisition U.S. Government Property in Peiping

Problem

What steps the United States is prepared to take in reaction to the Chinese Communist notification of intention to requisition by January 13 the former military barracks area of the American Consulate General compound in Peiping.

Discussion

On January 6 the Chinese Communist military authorities at Peiping issued a proclamation announcing their intention to requisition the former military barracks areas of foreign governments by January 13.[2] On January 7 these authorities addressed a communication to the American Consul General directing him to send a messenger with authority to turn over the American military barracks area in accordance with the proclamation.[3] A similar communication was sent to the French and the Netherlands Consuls.

The Department instructed the Consul General at Peiping on January 7 to send a communication to the Chinese Communist "Foreign Minister" pointing out that this Government acquired the right to use for official purposes the land in question in accordance with the

[1] The Department of State file copy bears the notation: "Approved 1/10/50 Harry S. Truman."

Protocol signed at Peking on September 7, 1901,[4] between China and eleven foreign powers and that this right was reaffirmed in the Sino-U.S. Treaty of 1943,[5] under which this Government relinquished its extraterritorial rights in China. He was instructed further to point out that this land and the buildings thereon were being used for official purposes and that the so-called military barracks mentioned by the Chinese Communist military authorities had long since been converted into an office building and used as the office of the Consulate General.[6]

Our legal position in this case seems unassailable. Desirable as it would be to construct a common front for joint or parallel action with the other western nations directly or indirectly affected, such action is faced with obvious and perhaps insuperable difficulties. To capitulate to the demand would invite similar and progressive actions by the Chinese Communists against our people and other official property in Peiping and elsewhere in China. Since we do not have direct access to the Chinese Communist "Foreign Minister", negotiations, even if considered desirable, are impracticable. The remaining alternative is to inform the Chinese Communist authorities of our intention immediately to close all of our official establishments in Communist China if the Peiping authorities proceed in their expressed intention and move to requisition or to occupy the premises. In this connection, we should recognize that such action on our part might well be playing directly into the Russian hands.

Recommendations

Our first objective should be to attempt to enlist British support in constructing a common approach to the Chinese Communist authorities on the basis of challenging the proclamation under which the order of requisition is based. In recognition of the limitations of time and the obvious difficulties in the way of securing agreement to such common action, the British Government should at the same time be requested to instruct its officer in charge at Peiping to convey personally to the Chinese Communist "Foreign Minister" a statement making the following points on behalf of the U.S. Government:[7]

(1) The U.S. Government is prepared to close all of its official establishments and withdraw all official personnel from Communist China if the requisition order is carried out;

(2) The U.S. Government is prepared voluntarily to return to the Peiping authorities the glacis property to the west of our consular

The Ambassador in India (Henderson) to the Secretary of State

SECRET NEW DELHI, January 10, 1950—11 a. m.

44. Deptel 914, December 19.[1] K. P. S. Menon, Foreign Secretary, commented as follows to Donovan[2] on January 9 re GOI policy towards Tibet. India has no intention now of raising question political status of Tibet nor does it desire make issue this question. Basis of Indian policy will be as heretofore: Recognition of Chinese suzerainty provide Chinese recognize autonomy Tibet. India to give diplomatic support to Tibet to enable it to retain its autonomous status and Menon indicated that if Chinese give any indication of refusing recognize autonomy Tibet, India would raise question Tibet's political status. However, he emphasized India wished to leave matter alone and would not initiate any conversations with Chinese re Tibet unless compelled do so by Chinese actions.

India has for some years supplied Tibet with small arms and ammunition for military use for which Tibet has paid India. India will continue to supply small arms including Bren guns and ammunition and Menon indicated that such supplies would in light of recent events "be expedited". He said Tibet had asked GOI to send two officers to train Tibetan troops. GOI had declined this request but had told Tibet it could send officers to Gyangtse where Indian Army has for some years maintained small detachment troops. Tibetan officers could receive training there. GOI has received no request or indication Tibet wishes establish liaison office in India. I asked Menon what possible GOI reaction would be to such request and while his reply was not categorical he indicated GOI would not look with favor upon such request since it wished to maintain status quo diplomatically which had obtained since the joint India-British-Chinese treaty of 1914 re Tibet.[3]

Hinton, Communist China in World Politics (Boston, Houghton Mifflin Company, 1966), pp. 278 ff.

GOI looks with disfavor on any attempt Tibet join UN because it raises issue of Tibet's status and could not possibly succeed. While Tibet has not approached India re this matter Menon said Tibet had approached UK and had been discouraged.

Menon said UK High Commissioner had drafted note to Tibetan Government re question of Tibetan mission to England and Tibet's request for general support from Britain re its claim for recognition as independent nation. Menon said draft note evaded issues raised and used phrase "British Government was giving consideration to questions raised in consultation with GOI". Menon sent for UK High Commissioner and told him this was "neat way of passing the buck to India" and at Menon's insistence the phrase "in consultation with GOI" was deleted from note. Menon then pointed out to High Commissioner that England still has responsibilities towards Tibet and that India had no intention of assuming all British responsibilities re Tibet.

Menon professed to know nothing of proposed Tibetan mission to US other than what we had told him.

To summarize GOI wishes maintain its present position re Tibet and has no present intention raising any questions re Tibet with Chinese Communist Government. According to Menon, a point which he emphasized several times, GOI wishes avoid "any provocative action" re Tibet. Nevertheless GOI will question diplomatically any action by Chinese which infringes on Tibetan autonomy. Menon emphasized any military ventures in Tibet were ruled out.[4]

Assume both Communists and Soviets desire hasten day when Communists shall have representation UN and be able sit in on Japanese treaty. This view truly probably not shared [garbled group] national Communist quarters, there would be more rabid elements possibly desirous see USA humbled and crippled much as possible regardless international considerations. Army elements probably included in this group. As reported previously it has been rumored Commies desirous pushing foreign missions from ex-Legation quarter. This would be in line old Chinese desire manifested on various occasions in China moving in on well-built foreign structures and causing foreigners, including missions, build elsewhere at considerable expense, with profit going to Chinese.

It is theoretically possible that if we are ousted from ex-Marine compound we can still save main, quartermaster and Sankuanmiao compounds and, basing case on circumstances ex-Marine compound was requisitioned by force and contrary to treaty provision, in due course with establishment relations stage comeback and try recover ex-Marine compound. It is however axiomatic that withdrawal from whole of premises Peiping would be followed by occupation entire property with result that recovery of compounds not excluded from action would be difficult, whereas if we stay we still possess enough land to be used mission. This possibly realized by Communists extremists and by those who desire oust Foreigners from ex-Legation quarter, and it may therefore be their design or willingness that matter lead to our complete withdrawal. How well we could carry on in truncated form would depend upon attendant circumstances.

Actual invasion consular premises is, of course, serious matter and it may be Communist leaders have failed realize office is located in ex-Marine compound and that when this information duly considered in higher echelon, policy will be adjusted accordingly. Believe, therefore, present situation merits consideration by Department advisability closing office and removal personnel if even part of our premises occupied, this on two grounds: (1) Reduction of our usefulness which would follow upon still hypothetical application of new disabilities and (2) fact that we should probably be in better moral and legal position both vis-à-vis Chinese population and Communist authorities if we were to protest and withdraw entirely upon such infringement of our rights, thus putting full responsibility on Chinese authorities in being able in due course to demand full restitution, than if we protested but remained after having been forcibly ejected from main part of holdings by Communist military. In event that we sit tight we may lose some moveable property but could ultimately hold Communists fully responsible. We wld, therefore, be most grateful to your honour if you wld kindly render every possible assistance to our Mission on their arrival in Washington."

Dept believes that arrival such mission US wld present complicated questions re status and treatment and fears that publicity attendant overt move this nature might hasten Chi Commie action against Tibet. Finally, although type and nature aid not specified, Dept considers it unlikely US wld be prepared this time extend aid Tibet, particularly in view attitude GOI respecting Tibet and key position India with regard Tibet. Dept accordingly believes discussions Tibetans may wish with US Govt better conducted with Emb New Delhi than in Washington.

Unless you see objection, Dept desires that you orally acknowledge to Tibetan Rep Delhi receipt by Pres and Secy of Tibetan ltrs referred to above expressing appreciation and that you endeavor dissuade Tibetans from sending proposed mission emphasizing disadvantages Tibet resulting such move this time and pointing out greater desirability using Emb Delhi. Dept suggests you discuss matter with Brit and GOI Reps enlisting their assistance discouraging proposed mission if ur opinion this wld be helpful.

[1] Not printed, but see footnote 1 to telegram 25, January 10, to Peiping, p. 275. Telegram 22 forwarded information on coordination of plans with the British Government in the proposed approach to the Foreign Ministry along the lines of the recommendations contained in the memorandum to President Truman, dated January 10, p. 270. Mr. Clubb was to make available to the British Chargé a copy of his own letter to Chou En-lai, after presentation of which to Chou or the highest available official, the Chargé would make a brief oral statement emphasizing the intention of the United States to withdraw its diplomatic personnel from China if the consular compounds were taken over. (125.7146/1–1050)

Sent by regular messenger to ensure delivery. Will report re return messenger.[2]

Prefaced note with following introduction: "Under instructions, I have tried today to obtain an interview with Your Excellency, or with other high ranking official of your Ministry, for the purpose of communicating personally and urgently an important communication from my government. I was referred to the Peking municipal Aliens Affairs Office, but the nature of the matter is such that it does not fall within the presumed jurisdiction of the Aliens Affairs Office. I therefore cannot but use this means of communicating to Your Excellency the message in question, as follows:"

The Secretary of State to the Chinese Ambassador (Koo)

WASHINGTON, January 13, 1950.

MY DEAR MR. AMBASSADOR: I have received your letter of December 23, 1949 [1] presenting a Memorandum from your Government which requests extension by the United States Government of certain types of military and economic aid to the island of Taiwan. Your letter of January 3, 1950 [2] which transmitted supplementary memoranda in this connection has also been received.

With reference to the request of your Government for United States military assistance, your attention is invited to the public statement made by the President on January 5, 1950 [3] regarding the position of the United States Government with respect to Formosa, a copy of which is attached.

The Economic Cooperation Administration is carrying on a program of economic assistance to Taiwan with funds made available by Section 12 of Public Law 47 (81st Congress),[4] and it is intended that this program continue in accordance with the authorizing legislation. Careful attention has been and continues to be given within the United States Government to the question of how United States economic assistance might contribute to a vigorous and effective effort by the Chinese Government to create and maintain stable economic and political conditions on Taiwan. The requests for economic aid made by your Government will be taken fully into account in this continuing process of review and implementation.

Sincerely yours, DEAN ACHESON

Editorial Note

On January 14, the Department of State issued a press release announcing its intention to prepare instructions for the withdrawal of all United States official personnel from Communist China. This action resulted, following the return by Communist authorities of Mr. Clubb's letter of January 12 addressed to Chou En-lai, from the entry of police and civilian officials of the People's Republic of China into the premises of the American Consulate General in Peiping at 9:50 a. m. on January 14, local time (8:50 p. m., January 13, Washington time). Memorandum of Conversation, by the Ambassador at Large (Jessup)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL TAIPEI, January 16, 1950.

After lunching with Governor and Madame Wu[2] on January 16, the Governor and I retired to an ante-room where we proceeded with our discussions. We were accompanied by Chargé d'Affaires Strong and Mr. Gibson.[3]

Wu opened the interview by stating that Taiwan can be saved and that it will not be given up to the Commies. He described the Taiwanese as being very patriotic by instinct and not at all given to Communism. During the Japanese occupation there were 101 uprisings in 51 years. The Taiwanese thus proved their opposition to alien rule and this may explain partially their aversion to Communism. All other Chinese territory has always had Commie minorities but not Taiwan. The Taiwanese are emotional and the Japs took advantage of this in their policy of divide and rule. The Japanese gave them no responsibilities.

At the time of the Chinese restoration the Taiwanese were divided into three groups: 1) those who worked with the Japanese in order to make a living but were not collaborators, 2) the patriots who went underground and wanted the Island restored to the mainland, and 3) the patriots who left, went to the mainland and worked from there.

The Taiwanese gave those in group three a hearty welcome upon their return but their enthusiasm later changed because of: a) corruption, b) the bad discipline of the troops and police, and c) the monopoly of high offices by mainlanders. Wu explained that the Central Government had to rely on group 3 because they knew nothing of those in groups 1 and 2. They could not be sure of them until they were tested.

The elections after restoration were not really free because practical considerations made it impossible. They (the Central Government) were thus forced to rely even more on Group 3. They thus took office promptly and are, in great part, still in office. Wu described the uprising of February 1947 as being as much against them as against the Chinese.

In order to correct present ills there must be three steps taken: 1) political reform, 2) economic reform, and 3) military reform.

Under (1) the Central Government must assure that more Taiwanese take positions in the Government and take a United Front with the Central Government. Next they must eradicate the privileged classes and open Government owned industries to the Taiwanese. They must permit freedom of opinion. The press is now free, persons must be made free. The secret police must be purged. Free elections must be held as soon as possible. They must be timed properly to avoid any danger of coinciding with an attempted invasion.

Ambassador Jessup asked if the press is permitted to criticize the Central Government and was told it could with two exceptions: 1) it must not be pro-Communist, and 2) it must not divulge military secrets.

Regarding economic reform Governor Wu spoke of the need for more production, free enterprise and land reform. In regard to the latter he has written General MacArthur to ask for guidance in putting into effect a land reform program based on that used in Japan. Dr. Wu spoke of the desirability of putting a social security plan into effect.

The big snag in political and economic reform Wu stated is that they will be ineffective without military reform, the military budget is a very important item; the top men in the military are incompetent. They are not bad but are simply ignorant of modern means of warfare. The young officers, American and British trained, are much more capable but are powerless. The top military chiefs do not, for instance, even know what radar is, they have never seen it.

The caste system in the army and navy was described as very bad. The lower ranks cannot speak to the top ranks; their superior military knowledge must therefore remain useless.

The Gimo is aware of all this according to Wu and would like to do something about it but he is very proud and surrounded by people who fail to tell him the truth.

Wu's final conclusions were that:

1) Taiwan is not beyond hope, 2) as U.S. policy is definitely anti-communist the U.S. must do the following with regard to Taiwan:

a) Furnish economic aid, b) permit the Government to use a part of this economic aid to employ foreign military advisers. These men can break up the military clique and advise the Gimo and his officers that they must give up any thought of reinvading the continent (purely political in motivation in the first place and not really serious) and concentrate on defending Taiwan, then concentrate on the training of a small but effective force. Wu felt this policy could be followed without disturbing our policy regarding Formosa as recently stated by the President.

Dr. Jessup asked questions concerning the provincial and central government budgets. Wu explained that a limited portion of the provincial government tax receipts goes to the Central Government, that this limit is soon reached and cannot be surpassed as there simply isn't any more money. Wu claimed that he has been supported by the Gimo in his refusal to exceed the limit after being pressed to do so by the Central Government.

CONFIDENTIAL TAIPEI, January 16, 1950.

We called on the Generalissimo at 4:00 p. m. at his summer home at Tsoashan. Mr. Strong told the Foreign Minister [1] that our whole group would call, this having been decided upon to give the meeting an informal social character rather than a confidential interview. The Gimo's house is located quite high in the mountains but only about a 20-minute drive from the center of Taipei. There was one pillbox with one sentry in one of the many curves of the mountain road, and we saw a few soldiers about but there was no great display of military protection. We were greeted by Ambassador James Yu, Chinese Ambassador to Rome, who had been on their Delegation at the last UNGA and who had previously been one of my students. Although someone else had been supposed to interpret, he had arrived late and Yu interpreted. Consul Edward Martin told me later that on the whole the interpretation was quite accurate and that there was no evidence of any attempt to color either my statements or the Gimo's. The Gimo and Madame Chiang came in shortly and we were seated so that I could talk with the Gimo while Mrs. Jessup talked with Madame

[1] George K. C. Yeh.

Chiang. After the usual exchange of pleasantries in which I gave the Gimo the message of greeting from Sigmund Rhee,[2] the Gimo began to ask a detailed series of questions about Japan. His central interest was the question of communism in Japan and his firm conclusion was that after the Occupation forces were withdrawn there would be great danger that Japan would go communist. He wanted to know about the extent of economic recovery, about the success of the land reform, the general lot of the farmer now as compared to prewar, the state of the export trade and particularly wanted to know about the rice supply, the amount we were contributing for the importation of food stuffs and the increase in the population. It was particularly in terms of the increase of population and the shortage of food that he based his conclusion that Japan was likely to go communist. I gave him as accurate a picture as I could of the progress of SCAP in the various reforms and the conviction of SCAP that communism was well under control. I told him particularly about the lack of success of the Soviet indoctrination of the returned prisoners of war. It seemed evident that the Gimo was determined to believe that the communists would take over in Japan. He asked me also about my present trip and the various places I was going. He talked about the British recognition of the Chinese communist regime and asked me what I thought of their policy. I told him that I could not undertake to comment on British policy either to defend it or to attack it. I said, however, that it did seem to me that regardless of what one thought of their policy of recognizing the Chinese communists two factors had to be kept in mind. One of these was that the British Government is clearly opposed to communism in the whole world situation. The second is that the British in the light of their history and traditions clearly did not ignore the importance of the Far East. The Gimo said that his interpretation of British policy was that they wanted the final fight against communism to take place in Asia rather than in Europe, and that their recognition of the communists was designed to strengthen them to the point where the final clash would come in Asia itself. I tried to make sure that the interpretation of these remarks was accurate and it seemed clear that the Gimo was talking in terms of motivation of British policy and not merely in terms of a diagnosis of its results. Although the Gimo referred from time to time to the assistance which the Russians were giving to the communists, he did not talk so much in terms of the Soviet Union as in terms of communism. The Gimo had already stressed his view that communism presented a world problem and that the struggle with world communism would probably be settled in Asia, particularly in China. He said that he could not agree with my interpretation since the British recognition of the communists would undoubtedly strengthen them throughout Asia and would thus contribute to the success of communism throughout the world. In order to make sure that there was no misunderstanding, I repeated that I was not attempting either to attack or to defend the British recognition policy and that whether the Gimo's estimate was correct it seemed to me that the other two factors were basic in British policy as a whole. There was considerable sparring since it seemed to me that the Gimo was trying to lead the conversation to a point in which he could argue that further American aid to him was the only way in which the world could be saved. He said that he hoped I would convey to President Truman his view that the situation in China was the crucial one in the world struggle against communism. At one point in response to his saying that he hoped the United States would realize the communist menace, I told him there was no question that we recognized the world problem of communism. I told him that we had to face that problem not only in Asia but also in Europe and the Middle East, in Africa and in the Americas. I pointed out that there were necessarily short-range and long-range problems which had to be solved. (Mr. Martin told me later that the idea of "long-range problems" did not get over in the translation.) As the Gimo commented on the probability of the communists sweeping over Southeast Asia if not checked in China, I asked him whether the large Chinese communities in the Southeast Asian countries had turned communist and whether anything was being done to hold their allegiance. Again there was some confusion in the translation, but the Gimo's general idea was that, if the communists were successful in China, one could not expect the overseas Chinese to stay loyal since they would of course follow the events on the mainland. He seemed to have no concept whatever of the possibility of influencing the opinions of these groups.

He insisted several times that he considered my mission to the Far East of great importance and said that I had the responsibility of determining whether China would be free or not and whether there would be peace or war. I pointed out to him in general terms the broad extent of the special consideration the United States was giving to the problems of Asia and the Far East and spoke of our conference in Bangkok.[3] The Gimo was very particularly interested in knowing when I would be back in Washington. He asked for details concerning the further stops on the trip and how I planned to return to America. I told him that I expected to be back there the first part of March. In the course of the conversation, I was watching for indications of the Gimo's familiar view that war between the Soviet Union and the United States would break out soon. While much of his conversation was along this line, he did not say anything very definite on the subject before I stated that, while we were combating communism throughout the world, we did not believe that the solution was to be found through war and we did not expect war with the Soviet Union. Not in direct reply to this but rather soon afterward, the Gimo in again commenting on the danger arising from the loss of China suggested that war was bound to come "in a few years."

Just before it was time to break up the interview after an hour and a half, I talked briefly with Madame Chiang. She began at once with great bitterness to speak of the British recognition. She likened it to Munich and thought it was motivated by the search for the almighty dollar. Madame spoke with bitter contempt of the view that recognition had nothing to do with approval or disapproval. I tried to point out the general thinking in the views of some governments on the recognition question, but it was of course clear that there was no use in attempting to argue with her.

The Gimo seemed to be in excellent health. There is no question of the closeness with which he holds all the lines. For example, Mr. Jen* who lunched with us at K. C. Wu's told me that he had twice talked with the Gimo before he had agreed to accept K. C. Wu's invitation to serve as Commissioner of Finance of the Provincial Government. Jen wanted assurances that his financial administration would not be blocked by politics and that the Gimo would not appoint or defend people except on the basis of merits. (I was quite impressed with Jen. He is the one who had charge of the rice rationing in Shanghai when K. C. Wu was mayor. Mr. Strong told me that he considers he is as honest and as competent as his conversation indicates. He is evidently trying to do a good job and particularly to control inflation.) A variety of other incidental comments and bits of information further indicated the Gimo's wide range of political activity and control.

SECRET NEW DELHI, January 20, 1950—10 a. m.

88. 1. Following receipt Deptel 32 January 12 I called on Foreign Secretary Menon to obtain Indian views re Tibetan desire send mission Washington. Menon said in his opinion despatch such mission would serve no purpose. He hoped, however, we would not suggest Delhi as venue for discussions. If discussions would take place here there was danger wide publicity. Communist Government would probably charge that Delhi was becoming center of conspiracy to effect separation Tibet from China and might speed up plans for conquest Tibet. I asked him for suggestions as to where meeting between Tibetan and American representatives might take place. For US refuse to see Tibetan representatives at all, might have extremely depressing effect. He agreed it would be preferable for Tibetans not to be completely discouraged in their efforts to fortify their position against possible Chinese Communist invasion but said he could make no helpful suggestions as to place of meeting.

2. I learned from UK High Command [Commissioner?] that several days ago he received from London instructions to send through Indian MEA radio message from Hector McNeill [1] to Tibetan Government UK hoped Tibet would reconsider its decision send mission to UK; such mission could achieve nothing since there was no possibility admittance Tibet in UN and since UK not in position extend direct assistance Tibet. In response my question High Command said adjective "direct" used merely to soften negative tone of message. Message also indicated UK could not, even if in position to do so, aid Tibet without consultation with other interested powers.

3. He received today through Indian MEA communication from Tibetan Government replying to his preliminary message sent early this month (Embtel 1484 December 1).[2] Tibetan Government said even if no possibility admittance in UN it was sending mission UK to ask for aid against threatening Chinese Communist invasion, such mission had already left Lhasa and it was hoped it would be granted courteous reception by UK Government.

4. Regardless receipt this message UK Command was forwarding McNeill's message to Lhasa in hope Tibetan Government would stop its mission somewhere en route. If mission was not stopped new decision as to UK attitude must be reached when it arrived in India and requested UK visas.

5. Both High Command and we believe mission to US has also started on its journey and is traveling with UK mission.

6. In circumstances we suggest Department authorize us call in immediately informal representative in Delhi of Tibetan Government and ask him inform Tibetan Government US not at present in position lend effective aid to Tibet; that in opinion US Government arrival in US just now of Tibetan mission might be harmful rather than helpful to Tibet since it might strengthen hand of elements advocat-

[3] The Department of State sent the following reply in telegram 88, January 27, 7 p. m., to New Delhi: "Dept approves suggestion para 6 ur 88 Jan 20 and desires you convey msg orally Tibetan Rep soonest possible." (793B.02/1–2050)

Since the Tibetan Representative had departed from New Delhi, the message had to be transmitted through the Indian Representative in Lhasa (telegram 168, February 4, from New Delhi; 793B.02/2–450). Mr. Henderson subsequently reported that the message had been delivered to the Tibetan authorities in Lhasa who stated that they had already given instructions to have their mission discontinue preparations for departure for the United States. The Tibetan authorities also expressed considerable disappointment that no aid would be forthcoming from the United States. (telegram 194 from New Delhi, February 10; 793B.02/2–1050)

89. Reference Deptel 25, January 11.[1] During my discussion with Foreign Secretary Menon January 14 re Tibetan proposal send mission US (Embtel 88, January 20), I told him we had had under consideration for some months advisability sending party to Lhasa and asked for GOI views. I said that we did not at this time wish to make any move re Tibet which might render more difficult success present GOI policy of encouraging Tibetans to preserve autonomy without at same time stimulating Chinese Communist moves against Tibet. Menon replied that he would "think it over" and inform me at later date. Last night he told me he had discussed question with Nehru.[2] Nehru said that Indian Government of course would not put any obstacles in way of despatch of an American party to Lhasa and would treat such a party with appropriate courtesy. Nehru added, however, he felt that to send American party at this time "would do more harm than good." He felt chief disadvantage to despatch such party would be that it might hasten Communist invasion of Tibet.

As Department previously informed, we also feel despatch of mission under present delicate conditions might precipitate Communist incursion Tibet and, therefore, recommend that, particularly in view discouraging attitude Indians, plans send mission Lhasa be deferred for present. One of reasons which impels us take this stand is that if mission is sent contrary to Indian recommendations and Chinese Communists do in fact invade Tibet, Indians would be quick place blame

The Consul General at Peiping (Clubb) to the Secretary of State

TOP SECRET PEIPING, January 20, 1950—3 p. m.

157. ReContel 151, January 19.[1] As regards Communists requisition property foreign governments Peiping offer following further analysis motivations:

British ConGen informs me his Foreign Office telegram authorizing extension recognition on January 6 was sent Embassy Nanking en clair January 5. Matter had been publicly mooted for month and Communists, therefore, fully informed in advance pending recognition. Placards proclaiming requisition were printed showing preparation. Communist posting placards prior date January 6 were then fully apprised fact UK was recognizing that date. Dumb show of posting and taking down placards and omission order to British, therefore, seem to have been designed as intimation other governments they could keep property as quid pro quo recognition.

Opinion this office has been and remains that Communists desire American recognition for both political and economic reasons. Posting proclamation at first glance possible effort Communist military to commit other government organs such as Foreign Office irrevocably in advance. Denouement indicates, however, that more probably decision use this strategem was reached in high Communist council. If plan truly is of three months standing even Mao Tse-tung concerned.

Presumably Communists unassured in advance of success, but prob-

[1] Not printed. In this telegram, Mr. Clubb reported information from a reliable source to the effect that Chou En-lai himself was directly responsible for the plan, drafted as long as 3 months ago, to requisition the foreign consular property. The motive allegedly was to force recognition, with the Communists being interested in American recognition most of all. Mr. Clubb's letter to Chou En-lai of January 12 was said to have been completely misinterpreted; the fact that the letter was written in Chinese by a foreign hand gave rise to the belief in the Foreign Ministry that it was a bluff by Mr. Clubb designed to scare the authorities out of the takeover plan. When the Foreign Ministry discovered that the American Government meant business in the withdrawal of its personnel, heavy gloom descended and guarded criticism and discontent were voiced at the consequences of the requisition. At the same time, the local official who extended extra time to the Consulate General during the evacuation of the premises was reportedly punished, since his superiors felt that his action had deprived the local authorities of the chance to get as much loot as possible. (602.0093/1–1950) ably had envisaged three alternative developments: (1) speeding up American recognition, (2) withdrawal Consulate to main compound with Americans humiliated and prestige reduced, while Communists could claim "victory over imperialists," (3) at worst, complete withdrawal of Consulate from Peiping. It seems improbable Communists anticipated present consequences, that is, complete withdrawal from China.

With Communists decision carry out plan, therefore, by hypothesis approved in highest echelon, and especially since committed publicly, they felt under compulsion proceed per schedule. They could still, of course, have taken exit from their predicament by occupation glacis and Johnson Hall as offered by USA. Information contained Conreftel purporting Communists believed American note was bluff, evolved by myself, must be considered suspect. Chou En-lai and others know enough of American practice to realize communication was genuine. True, our translation and writing of Chinese translation may have puzzled them (who have different ideas of security from our own) but it would be daring stretch imagination for them conclude that I was bluffing. In same way, one must look askance at report that person who granted time extension has been punished for act: although extension was first granted, then withdrawn, and granted again, our logic tells us Communists really desired we clear out all movables, thus obviating any responsibility of [on?] their shoulders that regards.

French ConGen was offered extension time but only after his staff had worked all night January 13 and 14 and cleared out compound before p. m. January 14. That contacts report was informed, however, is shown by his knowledge of note which unknown to most of conference itself.

In other terms, it seems unlikely that move was engineered by Soviets or pro-Russian Chinese Communists with aim getting our withdrawal from China, or that Communists realized possibilities serious backfire leading to serious ultimate loss for their economic program. Particularly, this office has already noted possibility Communists, with aim further self-justification, might demand "expulsion" from China of Consulate officials nonrecognizing states. Note, however, from Contel 151, January 19, that thus far, Communists have only indicated that it is immaterial to them whether we go or stay. Standard for judgment Communist motives immediate future can be tentatively set up as follows:

(1) If Communists shortly impose distinctly heavier restrictions on Consulate officials nonrecognizing states or demand our "expulsion" from China, there is added reason to believe pro-Soviet elements have top hand and are assiduously continuing with burning of China's boats behind it.

(2) If, however, Communists limit themselves to impression indifference to our presence or absence, their attitude can be taken as indication only acute case sour grapes; and

(3) If, finally, there begins some leak reports purporting "military got out of hand," "Mao was away in Moscow [2] and junior official made mistake" or "Communists think USA has taken matter too seriously," it can be deduced Communists are suffering real regrets. Whether report contained Conreftel is first "leak" seems unlikely, but if others of same nature appear in relatively near future from "informed sources" pattern Communist desires international field would soon be discernible.

Note Communist difficulties: note particularly Communist recognition Vietnam regime Ho Chi Minh [3] may cause French take umbrage. Netherlands Government can hardly view present situation with equanimity. British Consul General per instructions his Government on January 16 called Foreign Office, referred to Chou En-lai reply to British recognition and said British Government considered exchange note tantamount establishment diplomatic relations and asked Foreign Office confirmation this understanding. To date in nonreceipt. At Moscow, Mao probably trying resist sweeping Soviet demand. In China itself famine is growing acute. Communist problems are in short increasing in grand intensity and they will soon learn all walls are not reduced by Communist trumpets. Communist political passion is undoubtedly to play great role "liberator of Asia," and USSR can be expected play on this theme, but Mao stands in danger returning from Moscow despoiled of certain sovereign rights and at same time disappointed re desire Soviet aid for China's hungry masses and shattered economy.

Re radio report American protest being sent Communist Government (unreceived this office, presumed being sent by British channels) offer opinion USA should settle for nothing less than full restitution of or stiff compensation for requisitioned property (note here Communists themselves included Glacis property in area designated "former American barracks"). Communists have legal escape in technicality that property was requisitioned not confiscated. They, moreover, stated in both proclamation and semi-official news item January 18 matter on restitution of buildings would be undertaken. They further deny vehemently if vainly requisitioned offices American Consul. In circumstances believe situation might well be exploited by my seeking interview Foreign Office after, but only after, lodging protest for clarification matter in point. Timing could well be set after date Mao's return from Moscow, say month hence, when full shock presumed

[2] Mao Tse-tung was in Moscow in connection with negotiations on the Sino-Soviet Treaty, signed February 14, 1950; see p. 311.

[3] President of the Democratic Republic of Viet-Nam; for documentation on Indochina, see pp. 690 ff.

Moscow machiavellianism will have been felt in nationalistic Communist circles and famine become more acute still. If interview granted, our attitude could be set forth clearly as being that treaty in question was valid, that American Government regards requisition as illegal and improper by international law and comity, that requisition, however, was in any event fixed to period of "military exigency", that, therefore, it is assumed and expected that Peking regime will effect restitution to American Government its rightful property at an early date, that upon such restitution American Government will be prepared turn its attention again to question recognition. Success problematical, but submit that American Government has nothing lose by this process and that if theory previously advanced by me is valid, would be our gain and possibly China's if matter in point were satisfactorily adjusted (Contelad 374*e*), it is to be granted that, if USSR is successful, pattern in China will probably continue be such as might lead us with reason feel ourselves economically and politically well out of it, relieved of that much burden and freed for more fruitful efforts elsewhere. But China situation is still uncrystallized and there is still much popular sentiment in favor USA rather USSR, disillusionment with USSR can be expected increase. Feel we should continue exploit all possibilities in situation pending our departure.

TOP SECRET SHANGHAI, January 21, 1950—8 p. m.

346. Chou Ming-hsun (M. H. Chou) during call made on St. Louis [1] January 19 ostensibly to discuss ECA assets disposal matters, made what seemed to be genuine feeler on behalf General Chen Yi, whose agent Chou has been purporting, with apparent basis, to be. (See ConGen tels [2] re initiation present Shanghai ECA assets disposal plan for background re Chou.) Chou's approach was briefly as follows:

Chen Yi is increasingly "fed-up" with Moscow's influence over new regime. Foresees possibility of split in CCP developing some time following Mao's return from Moscow, with China-first elements arrayed against pro-Soviet faction. Should such split occur, the China-first elements will depend militarily upon Chen Yi and, it is expected, General Liu Po-cheng,[3] who is also anti-Moscow and has closely cooperated with Chen. General Lin Piao [4] would probably be military mainstay of pro-Moscow faction. Attitude of General Yeh Chien-ying [5] still uncertain; might take either side.

Chen feels that he could, even without Liu's help, hold East China (Shantung to Fukien) against combined other Communist armies for six months before requiring outside aid.

Meanwhile Chen's political position is not too secure. During his visit Peiping he was severely taken to task on various aspects of his handling Shanghai situation—most of which centered around basic general thesis that he had been too moderate; and he was virtually held prisoner Peiping for over month. He is, however, still designated leader of Chusan–Taiwan liberation campaigns.

For some time Chen and his group have been considering approaching American quarters, and few months ago plan to have Chen or his representative seek talk with MacArthur was actually discussed. In view impending withdrawal from Communist China of American Government personnel, Chen now anxious to complete, before such withdrawal is effected, groundwork for some means maintaining contact with American Government. While Chou was not entirely clear re this point, he indicated that first step contemplated was arranging some code for communicating through commercial facilities to designated person in US.

St. Louis, while listening to these statements, repeatedly pointed out that he was not a proper person for Chou to approach on such matter, and he suggested that Chou approach the ConGen directly through Chase. Chou eventually said that he or more likely Hsieh Hsin-tung (S. T. Hsieh, described in ConGen ECA tels and more recently revealed to us as "Chen Yi's nephew and most trusted intelligence agent") might call on Chase shortly.

Next day (20th) Chou again called on St. Louis. Said he and Hsieh had meanwhile ascertained from Chen that Chen would not be averse to discussing matter with ConGen officer through intermediary, but that he wished first consult views of General Su Yu (Chen's chief military subordinate now in Nanking) [6] and was accordingly sending Hsieh to Nanking to see Su. (Incidentally, Chou took the occasion to tell St. Louis that Su "is man to keep eye on"; man of wealthy Shantung background, who, by his fearlessness, likeable personality and carefree offer of entire wealth to Communist cause, won friendship of a powerful Communist general in Shantung; spent year and half in Communist military academy; and now enjoys great popularity as well as reputation of being one of best Communist strategists).

Reverting to line of his original approach, Chou told St. Louis that split in Communist ranks on Moscow control issue is actually developing, which may well "crystallize" when Mao returns to Peiping. Chou also made remarks indicating that Chen is interested in knowing whether there might be any disposition on part American Government (a) to provide assistance to Chen in event of open intra-Communist conflict; and (b) to withdraw recognition of Nationalists in Taiwan and to help in getting such Nationalist leaders as Chen Cheng [7] out of Taiwan picture. (Chou failed to develop this point clearly. Incidentally he revealed that Chen Yi is as bitterly determined as other Communist leaders that Generalissimo and his "four families" [8] must be completely eliminated from political stage.)

Re Mao, Chou (whose information we believe reflects at least some access to inside Communist circles) said that Mao will probably return to Peiping only when Russians "get good and ready" to let him return; and that Mao is in difficult position. Chou indicated, in harmony with reports received by ConGen from several other good sources (whose details we hope report shortly), that Moscow talks are basically centered around Mao's efforts to line up Soviet financial economic assistance as opposed to Kremlin's counter pressure to get Mao first tied up with political commitments affecting China's sovereignty and resources as prerequisite to Russian economic aid. According to Chou, Mao is seeking (a) financial aid equivalent to 5 billion US dollars, "in addition to" (b) machinery and other capital equipment, and (c) Taiwan invasion equipment (mainly planes), while Russians thus far have only offered 5 billion dollars value for all three categories combined. On political side, Soviet demands include: control of Port Arthur, Dairen, Tsingtao, Chefoo and Haichow; and far-reaching Chinese concessions to "minority groups" (i.e. races including so-called Manchurians who of course are actually nearly all Shantung and Hopei Chinese) "in the five provinces" including presumably Tibet, Sinkiang, Inner Mongolia and Manchuria (where such groups predominate). Comment: this last demand would seem most plausible, most clever and most significant as its acceptance would greatly facilitate complete domination of peripheral China by USSR, which, except in case of Manchurians, would probably become popular "saviour and champion" in eyes of minor races concerned.

[7] General Chen Cheng, Chief of Staff of the Chinese Army, had resigned as Governor of Taiwan in December 1949; in March 1950, following the return to the Presidency of Chiang Kai-shek, Chen Cheng became Premier of the Republic of China.

[8] Reference is to the Chen, Chiang, Kung, and Soong families.

(Chou said that Communist split in general follows age lines, with most leaders over 40 taking China-first side and those under 40 tending more to Moscow.) (Han Ming recently confirmed accuracy of this observation.) Chou quoted Chen as stating that, when time came, he would find it relatively easy to weed out from his command, by permanent separation or temporary details to other fields, those key officers who are not loyal to him.

As on previous day, St. Louis reiterated that Consul General rather than he should be recipient of Chou's statements.

In evaluating Chou's statements, Consul General feels that three very important points are involved: (1) authenticity of Chen's approach through Chou; (2) vital importance of approach to American Government if it is genuine; (3) extremely precarious position and vulnerability of ConGen and other American Government personnel in becoming involved in any negotiations or even sustained contact with Chou whether or not approach is genuine.

Both St. Louis and ConGen have strong reason believe that Chou's approach is genuine. Admittedly Chou seems a hard-boiled operator, with a secret agent political broker background, probably cold-blooded, unscrupulous. He has, however, by his very effective assistance to SRO (stopping their labor troubles overnight, etc.) demonstrated that he must almost certainly have—at least to considerable degree—the confidence and backing of Chen Yi, which he has claimed to have. Moreover, as indicated in Contels 26, January 3[9] and 99, January 5,[10] evidence that Chan Yi is oriented toward Titoism is by no means confined to assertions by Chou (who by the way was the first unnamed source cited in Contel 26, January 3). While our information from other sources has not yet gone so far as to suggest that Chen has actually reached point of preparing for action, it has provided increasingly strong grounds for belief that Chen is anti-Moscow; that he is ambitious, vigorous, strong-willed and extremely popular; that his political position has been rendered precarious because of reprimands given him while in Peiping (and possibly because of Mao's fear of Chen's ambitions and popularity); and that he would be a logical leader for any anti-Moscow movement that might develop.

In view, however, of our dangerous current situation, ConGen feels that such "belief" that Chen's approach is probably genuine is not enough, and that some infallible proof that Chou is Chen's authorized spokesman should be required by us as a condition to any cognizance by us of Chou's approach. Chen can certainly find a way to provide such infallible evidence without undue risk; and we propose to insist upon it when opportunity is presented. In this connection, Chou asserts that General Wedemeyer [11] and Admiral Charles Turner Joy [12] were once closely associated with him and would certainly vouch for him. Would appreciate Department's making urgent inquiries through Army and Navy to verify this. As jog to memories, Chen [13] is about 57, stocky powerful build, rather ruddy complexion.

ConGen further feels that, even when authenticity of Chen's approach is established, ConGen should for safety of staff and local Americans generally, divest itself as quickly as possible of all connection with matter and be in a position to advise Chou that further contact with American side should be transferred to Hong Kong. (Upon receiving certain proof of authenticity of Chen's approach, ConGen could then easily supply password or other means whereby Chen's representative could identify himself to Hong Kong ConGen or such other quarter as Department might designate.)

Department's advice is urgently requested.

PRIORITY

335. Eyes only Amb Bruce. Dept has recd from several sources interim reports regarding Stalin[1]–Mao negotiations which, while viewed with reserve, may serve very useful propaganda purpose if skillfully released for publication in such a manner that appearance of material cld not be traced to this govt. Info for release is contained in fol nrd paras:

(1) Mao Tse-tung seeking (a) equivalent one billion pounds sterling financial aid; (b) machinery and other capital equipment; (c) equipment, primarily planes, for use in invading Formosa.

(2) Sovs demanding (a) full control of strategic ports Chinwangtao, Haichow, Chefoo, Weihaiwei and Tsingtao in addition to Port Arthur and Dairen; (b) far-reaching concessions by Chi Commies to "minority groups" in border territories of Sinkiang, Inner Mongolia, Manchuria, Northwest (Mohammedans) and Tibet; (c) labor force from China of 500,000 men; and (d) increased shipments of grain and foodstuffs from Manchuria.

(3) Moscow negots have apparently just begun in earnest fol arrival Chou En-lai and staff consisting of experts in trade, finance heavy industry and political and military affairs.

(4) Interesting speculate why Mao did not attend publicized meeting between Stalin and Chou. Was he ill, was he trying to disassociate himself from drafting of an unequal treaty, did Stalin intentionally exclude him or is he under hospitable detention?

(5) Simultaneous presence in Moscow of Mao, Chou and Nieh Jung-chen [2] pose question what happening in Peiping. Does Chu Teh [3] have sufficient authority and leadership restrain Liu Shao-chi [4] and pro-Kremlin clique in absence more patriotic figures? This regard, interesting note that three principal Chi negotiators now in Moscow—Chou, Neih and Li Fu-ch'un (Vice Chairman of Northeast Peoples Govt and one of founders of Fr branch of Chi Commie Party)—all recd significant portion education in France.

(6) Is China being sold out in Moscow while political puppets of Kremlin in Peiping are consolidating their position, undermining new regime and betraying revolution?

(7) Results Moscow negots when publicized will undoubtedly appear on surface non-injurious to Chi interests and nationalistic aspirations. Unequal clauses of treaty or agreements, which will impose "made in Moscow" fetters on Chi people, will appear only in secret protocols.

Dept desires that above material be planted as soon as possible because we cannot be sure when negotiations in Moscow may be completed. Paris appears to be best place from which story might originate. Means taken to plant above info are obviously of utmost importance as misstep cld boomerang on us with serious results. Matter is therefore one to be handled with extreme delicacy and discretion.

Three possible techniques occur to Dept. One is to plant info through cutout with a correspondent of a Fr or Swiss paper which can be depended upon to carry full story. Dept views this course with misgiving because of security risks. Second possibility is to plant story through cutout with Sulzberger.[5] Feasibility of this depends upon whether you have adequate cutout for such purposes.[6] Third course is asking someone on ur staff, perhaps Tyler,[7] to give story directly to Bill Stoneman.[8] While Stoneman is regarded as entirely trustworthy, it seems to us that such a story might emanate with some awkwardness from him, inasmuch as he does not pretend to cover the globe as Sulzberger does and because he is so evidently respected and trusted by the Emb.

Dept leaves to you decision regarding which method to use. We have discussed this matter with Bohlen [9] and suggest that you restrict discussion of this matter among ur staff to Tyler, Bonbright [10] and Chipman.[11]

Whichever course you follow obviously there will have to be some plausible explanation as to source of info. "Well-informed sources out of Eastern Europe" is probably as good an identification as any.

Once story is printed, Dept will exploit it vigorously through Voice and other media directed primarily to Far East and secondarily to other areas. If this plan is successful, addtl info may be transmitted for similar treatment.

As use of Wade–Giles romanization for Chinese place and personal names might indicate other than Eastern European source, Dept suggests use of English romanization of Russian transliteration all Chi names. The Consul General at Shanghai (McConaughy) to the Secretary of State

TOP SECRET PRIORITY SHANGHAI, January 26, 1950—6 p. m.

430. Eyes only for Secretary. ReContel 346 January 21 and Deptel 127 January 25. At request of Chou Ming-hsun transmitted through St. Louis, Chase met Chou evening 24th at St. Louis' apartment where Chou, aside from discussing ECA matters (separately reported by St. Louis), made approach statements to Chase, in presence St. Louis, summarized as follows:

New regime faces extremely serious situation. KMT for first ten years gave China very good government which maintained effectively stabilized currency and economy. KMT's fall resulted from economic collapse developing during Japanese invasion and postwar. New regime will similarly fall unless it can stave off economic ruin. Since take-over Shanghai, JMP currency has depreciated fifteen times. Nation's food situation serious; much distress in interior. New regime must get financial economic help and get it quick. No other way out. Hence Mao's urgent trip to Moscow and attempts to obtain "5 billion US dollars worth of rubles or dollars or any currency with which to buy imports and bolster economy". But quid pro quo for such aid must be disastrous political concessions. Appearance Moscow of Chou En-lai with NE and trade economic officials presumably means that Mao and Stalin reached agreement on main terms. If so, Mao may be "finished" when he returns, because Chinese public would never support humiliating concessions to USSR. No matter what Mao may have promised Kremlin, important determinant is people's attitude, not Mao's commitments.

Despite propaganda, friendly feeling toward America of Chinese people is deep, widespread, most Chinese realizing that America alone has consistently pursued unselfish policy toward China. This feeling cannot be changed in few months or years. Decades of Japanese occupation of parts of China and Korea with massed Japanese personnel and propaganda failed subdue it. How can Russians suppress it with "few hundred advisors" in short period?

Care taken in Communist press to show that new regime's seizure of American Government property Peiping involved "barracks alone" and not move against American Consulate General, though attacked by Americans as lie, was significant as indication of authority's awareness of strength of pro-American sentiment and need for respecting it.

Chinese public is inherently suspicious, hostile toward Russia. Even of Communist leaders and key men, only 30 percent are pro-Moscow; 30 percent are actively opposed to control by Moscow; and balance 40 percent are unprepared to accept it. "In other words, 70 percent are against subservience to Kremlin." All-out pro-Moscow group is headed by Liu Shao-chi, other leaders including Li Li-san.[1] "Mao is not 100 percent pro-Moscow", while Chou En-lai and Tung Pi-wu[2] are among those definitely opposed to Kremlin control.

Political leaders who oppose Moscow domination include Chu Te, Chen Yi, Liu Po-cheng and Nieh Jung-chen ("an important key man")—all Szechuanese. General Kuo Tze-hua, Chen Yi's subordinate in control of Tsingtao area Shantung, has also been especially disturbed over economic crisis, trend of events and Soviet penetration Shantung. These and other like-minded Communist military leaders have been organizing since about three months ago a "New China Movement". It is mostly concentrated in Szechuan and the Chekiang-Kiangsu-Kiangsi-Anbwei region—that is, in Chen Yi's and Liu Po-cheng's military spheres. (Chou said that Peng Te-Huai [3] is also on anti-Soviet side, but that Peng's hands are tied by fact that all his chief subordinates are Moscow men). As reported, Chou previously described Yeh Ching-ying's attitude as uncertain, and Lin Piao as pro-Moscow. The New China Movement is basically one of Nationalism, free of Russian or other orientation: "China for Chinese, Russia for Russians, America for Americans". Movement has already opened office in Hong Kong and is opening another in Manila.

[1] Minister of Labor, People's Republic of China, and member of the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party.
[2] Vice Premier, State Administrative Council, People's Republic of China.

China military situation now reversed. KMT once held lines and points and Communists surrounding intervening areas. Now Communists hold lines and points, and areas are held or threatened by elements which, while not KMT are hostile to pro-Moscow policy and could give most useful support to "New China Movement's" regular military forces. (St. Louis states that in previous talk Chou indicated he had been and still is officer of guerrilla organization in Tai Hu Region, which, while not pro-Communist, has not yet been resolutely dealt with by Chen Yi because, aside from being strong anti-KMT, it provides independent force which Chen might usefully employ in future.)

Movement looks to possible action some time following Mao's return after "sell-out" to Moscow. However, such action now stymied by Taiwan factor. Generalissimo's continued possession of Taiwan, supported by US recognition of Nationalist regime, aside from being great nuisance factor, poses constant threat (sword Damocles) over new regime by leaving ever open possibility of US-backed comeback effort by Generalissimo or henchmen. Until this threat is removed once for all, Communists must hang together and anti-Moscow faction could not think of forcing Moscow control issue to showdown fight. First immediate objective of all Communists, anti as well as pro-Moscow, is to take Taiwan and end with finality all possibility of political comeback by Generalissimo or his "four families". Chen Yi's New China group would accordingly welcome, in addition to such indications as President Truman's recent statement regarding Taiwan, formal withdrawal of American recognition of Nationalist Government.

Current gathering at Shanghai of East China Military and Political Commission members, including General Kuo Tze-hua, provides convenient opportunity for number of new China Movement leaders to discuss "Mao's visit Moscow" and, Chou seemed to imply, possible action following his return.

Concluding his statement, Chou said that, in light of the considerations he had described, Chen Yi and his group are anxious to set up, before American Government personnel leaves China, some means of contact with American Government.

After listening without substantive comment, Chase said that Chou's statements seemed susceptible of two interpretations. Either they were in the nature of information and views to be regarded as coming from Chou on Chou's initiative, or they were meant to represent Chen Yi's statements conveyed through Chou as Chen's spokesman. If latter were case, Chase explained (with considerable effort to avoid offense and point out mutually beneficial reasons) that he could not regard statements as coming from Chen or report them to Consul General McConaughy as such unless he first had infallible evidence of Chou's representative capacity.

Chou replied that he realized such evidence would be requested and asked what sort evidence Chase had in mind. As starter, Chase (choosing the proposal which had my preference among several possibilities which Chase had previously discussed with me) suggested that General Chen, whose military command area includes Shantung, might arrange for the release of two American service men Smith, Bender [4] from captivity and their departure from China. Remainder of talk was devoted to discussion of (a) ways in which this might be accomplished and in manner to definitely prove Chen's hand and Chou's representative capacity and (b) possible supplemental or alternative means of providing needed proof, including perhaps, if agreeable to Chen, actual meeting between Chen and Chase.

Chou's response indicated he felt such solution of Smith–Bender case by no means impossible of arrangement. His chief concern seemed directed to (a) embarrassment that might be caused Chen in event of publicity indicating that release of men had been accomplished through personal intervention by Chen at Consult General behest and (b) possible need for assurance that American Government would pay for the two men's fourteen months' upkeep expense plus any travel expenses. Chase said it was his personal belief that American Government agencies would do what they could toward limiting publicity if men's release were pledged and effected, and it was brought in discussion that there would in any case seem to be no reason why public need discover [4] Chief Electrician William C. Smith, United States Navy, and Master Sergeant Elmer C. Bender, United States Army, had been detained by Communist Chinese authorities since their disappearance in the Tsingtao area on October 19, 1948. how release was arranged. As to payment of men's expenses, Chase said this was question for reference to American Naval Authorities. Talk ended with statement by Chou that he would see Chen on points discussed.

Interesting sidelight of discussion was an interjected spontaneous query by Chou whether it would be regarded as proof of his capacity as Chen's spokesman (which he later admitted would not be proof) if he were to bring about the priority granting by the police of exit visas to any ten Americans whom Consul General might specify. In view of this and previous experiences of SRO, we repeat one thing seems certain: Namely that Chou, whether or not Chen's authorized spokesman to the extent claimed, possesses powerful backing somewhere, which might be of use to Consul General in event of serious troubles in connection Consulate General's closure and departure Americans. Believe, however, that this should not blind us to possibility that Chou's advances could mask ulterior sinister motivation on part of Chen Yi or other Communist quarters, such, for example, as desire involve Consul General in "espionage scandal" or move to uncover American Intelligence system. In latter connection, pertinent to note that, according to St. Louis, Chou has never once indicated that Chen desires set up underground contact in Shanghai or any other point in Communist China, but has always mentioned such places as Manila, Hong Kong, Japan and even continental US.

Even though Chen's approach may be authentic and nonsinister (as we continue believe probable), there still remains question how serious is his intention of combatting Moscow domination and whether he is primarily interested in that or in getting US withdrawal of recognition of Nationalist Government with view to thereby hastening Nationalist collapse and his bloodless occupation of Taiwan. Our guess is that both factors probably involved.

Suggest that, at least pending ascertainment regarding Chen's willingness undertake Smith–Bender release, VOA soft-pedal the case.[5]

Soule and Frankel have been kept fully informed. (Chase).

The Consul General at Shanghai (McConaughy) to the Secretary of State

TOP SECRET Shanghai, January 27, 1950—7 p. m.

447. Eyes only for Secretary. ReContel 430 January 26. In call made morning 26 January St. Louis, Chou Ming-hsun, after some discussion ECA matters, said he had reported his talk with Chase to Chen

Yi. Said that Chen's initial reaction was of querulous tone. Quoted Chen as stating that Chase seemed trying impose conditions and stipulations which Chen could not put himself in position of accepting.

According to Chou, Chen then declared he had not wanted anything in nature of secret contact or underground arrangements; that, if contact were wanted with American Government, "People's Government" could always telegraph Secretary of State requesting opening office at Shanghai or other point. (An assertion very difficult to reconcile with Chou's previous statements to St. Louis and Chase re Chen's envisaging open split in new regime and desiring to lay his own line direct contact with American Government before American Government personnel left Shanghai.)

As to Smith–Bender case, Chou quoted Chen as stating following substance:

Chen had already made inquiries, and preliminary report received indicated that men were actually making reconnaissance flight over combat area on behalf KMT: were forced down and one of men slightly wounded, given immediate medical care, have been confined in "officer's quarters" at small village near Tsingtao and given best food available for PLA troops. Despite nature of this report, Chen's group wants maintain as good relations as possible with Americans. If ConGen or Naval Attaché wants submit request for his personal intervention, Chen willing to entertain request and it might well be possible as goodwill gesture to arrange release, which should not be difficult matter "provided men were still held some place within Chen's command area". If they have been moved to some other area, for example Mukden, problem would be more difficult as request would then have to be referred to some other commander. Chen therefore is ascertaining present whereabouts of men.

According to Chou, Chen also remarked that, although relations with America very difficult at present, there exists much goodwill toward America among Chinese people including even his own top subordinates; and that it is his desire aim help maintain such goodwill.

In reporting Chen's reaction to Chase's statement re need for evidence of authenticity of Chen's approach through Chou, Chou appeared in real unhappy frame mind which St. Louis felt probably attributable to Chen's having indicated to Chou some dissatisfaction over manner in which Chou had represented Chen's position and views. Some of Chou's remarks led St. Louis suspect that Chen may have displayed to Chou some surprise and dissatisfaction over apparent character of relations which Chou had established with St. Louis and Chase. St. Louis also thinks likely that Chou may actually have, unwittingly or wittingly, misinterpreted Chen's approach in some manner; or at least that Chen for some reason felt it expedient to charge Chou with so doing. Further possibilities that Chen (conceivably worried over quality of ConGen's security) may have become suddenly nervous and decided "pull in his horns" while gauging situation further, or that he had just received some new information re Mao's Moscow mission which rendered his plan for establishing contact with American Government less urgent or less desirable.

Believing it would be inadvisable for Chase to take initiative in seeking another meeting with Chou, we propose as next step having St. Louis, at his next "ECA" talk with Chou, explain, as he has already done to some extent, that Chen seems to have misunderstood Chase's meaning; that there was no thought of imposing conditions on Chen; that idea is merely to find way of establishing identity of Chen's representative, which is normal precaution as much for Chen's protection as for our own; that there is no insistence on any particular way; that Chase would be glad to have Chen suggest any way which would provide necessary evidence; et cetera (all of which had been already stated by Chase).

Meanwhile we are expressing appreciation of Chen's readiness to consider request for Smith Bender release and taking advantage of his offer. Developments in this regard will henceforth be reported a separate matter lower classification levels.

Soule and Frankel informed. (Chase)

Two evil forces, Kremlin-dominated Chinese Communist Party and decomposed, corrupt KMT have organization and leadership sufficient be considered political entities China. A third group potentially capable uniting democratic, liberal China is mentioned but no concrete evidence its existence found.

CCP rules China. Axiom "who controls armies rules China" true today as has been for centuries. CCP controls PLA five million strong. PLA 70 to 80 percent former KMT turncoat units, being indoctrinated Communist propaganda. Estimate, with exception minor regional revolts, will remain loyal People's Government while government feeds it and Commander political-military areas remain loyal. CCP vigorous, youthful, arrogant political libertine which has imposed its will China by force arms, selected international Cominform for companion, Stalin for leader. Majority Chinese apathetic its rule. CCP leaders fanatical international Communists. Chinese claim party wins support first because of youth and enthusiasm; second it requires subordinate quislings, [garbled group] the people with reasonable honesty; third close liaison with China's unscrupulous northern neighbor promises peace China which Chinese seek and many believe must be obtained through such relationship; fourth many Chinese believe socialism necessary for progress of nation. Chinese state new government losing support because first Chinese fear northern neighbor believes Stalin having raped China of Manchuria, Inner Mongolia, parts Sinkiang, possibly most North China may satiate desires and scorn CCP leadership; second CCP failed better economic conditions; third many CCP leaders are ignorant, unable act intelligently; fourth working man finding his condition worsened rather than improved; fifth "Kan Pu" [1] resorted to extremes in mistreatment people in country. Chinese have been ruled by force, and recent years by corrupt, dictatorial, one party government. To expect Chinese people to suddenly rise discard present rulers is "to satisfy hunger with painted cakes". Most Chinese agree to recognize deal with CCP on international scale would be run risk continued insults abuses of ignorant officials. US should recognize CCP for what it is—deal with it as evil force in world that cannot be ignored, stand ready assist China, if any popular movement rises that holds hopes annihilating it.

Contacts believe (corrupt, decadent, almost defunct) KMT which forced flee mainland for refuge has forfeited all claim to leadership of China. Atrocities it inflicted on people prior withdrawal won hate Chinese. KMT purposeless but sometimes destructive air raids and blockade against China are to Chinese like someone pounding on festered boil. Such annoyances add dislike of Chinese for former master and used as effective propaganda building hatred for US. Chinese who hate Communists and hope for change frankly state KMT must rid itself Generalissimo and his corrupt, [garbled group] ancient henchmen if it desires return China. They claim KMT had opportunity reform, assert itself, produce new able leadership worthy Chinese peoples, but failed China, disappointed US. They state KMT under leadership Generalissimo and followers is political party that holds no promise or hope to China. Chinese friends state further US support of KMT and its faulty leadership will lower prestige of US in China and Far East.

Chinese hope for split in Communist Party and combination of one or more Chinese military leaders, and liberal KMT military leader like Sun Li-jen [2] produce new leadership necessary save China and establish true democratic government.

US policy properly oriented but should not close door. Increasing continued efforts required convince Chinese US, Western democracies are the genuine friends China. Acts which appear hostile to Chinese, as distinguished from Chinese Communist Party, will decrease friendship for US.

Economically Communist People's Government deteriorating. Communist leaders claim 1950 will be worst year. Millions are admitted by party leaders on verge starvation. Qualified observers handicapped by lack accurate information, believe economic conditions worse than leaders realize and doubtful government can weather storm. Without economic aid from USSR, with starvation, economic failures, with proof Russian designs on Manchuria, Inner Mongolia, Chinese anti-foreign spirit may assert itself in an anti-Russian movement. US should be prepared, ready support exploit such movement. Generalissimo, followers anticipate such movement and appear be best organized force oppose Communists but they earned hatred of Chinese. US should avoid being placed position where it forced support this unpopular leadership. Chinese state impossible new liberal leadership take root grow China while USSR backs Communists and US backs Generalissimo. Debatable if new leadership strong enough oppose Communists will blossom if given opportunity. It apparent that it will not come forth while majority Chinese believe it hopeless because it cannot expect support from outside China and must oppose both Generalissimo backed by US and Communists backed by USSR. If US withdraws recognition KMT Government as government China, result will place US in position where it can either recognize libertine Communist People's Government, or encourage new leadership which may blossom with hope defeating communism when economic crisis places severest tests on new People's Government in February or March 1950.[3]

"Consulate General feels that Soule's summary of consensus of interviewed Nanking–Shanghai Chinese (transmitted in Contel 514, February 1) merits study as excellent appraisal of general trend thinking and convictions of average intelligent Chinese. Consulate General's impressions gained from its own Chinese contacts closely correspond to Soule's observations.

"Consulate General notes, however, that as verified to us by Soule, the sentence "CCP leaders fanatical international Communists" appearing in early part of telegram should not be construed as "all CCP leaders" but rather as those leaders who constitute faction presently dominating CCP policy. Majority of Consulate General's as well as Soule's Chinese contacts take view that there is important group of CCP leaders definitely opposed to Moscow control, which group, although thus far unable dictate major policy. has considerable potential power. Memorandum by John P. Davies of the Policy Planning Staff [1]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] February 2, 1950.

One can conclude from Shanghai's telegram No. 447 [2] that the feelers allegedly put out by General Chen Yi (Communist Commander for East China) and our response to them have come to naught, at least for the time being. The unsavory middle man, Chou, may have fabricated out of whole cloth his reports that Chen Yi was contemplating revolt in alliance with other Communist elements dissatisfied with increasing Soviet control in China. On the other hand, Chou's story to us may have had considerable foundation in fact at the time he approached us but in the meantime Chen Yi has for any of a number of reasons become much more cautious.

One learns after long dealing with China affairs that the facet of Chinese character perhaps most confusing and exasperating to the logical Western mind is a tendency toward irresponsible garrulity. In attempting to analyze the Chinese situation, the Western observer must deal with a plethora of reports and rumors, some of which are surprisingly candid and accurate, others highly embroidered and many which are plausible but airy concoctions of private political enterprise.

In these circumstances, the safest course for the Western observer is, while always keeping an open mind and not losing the faculty of wonder, to rely primarily on analysis of the larger political, economic and sociological developments and from that move to tentative conclusions regarding the reactions of individual Chinese in this broader framework.

Against such a background, we may conclude with respect to Chen Yi's alleged overtures, which now appear to have vanished into thin air, that the objective facts of the situation in China are such that by spring or summer of this year, two major forces will be influencing the thinking and behavior of the individual Chinese Communist leaders, including Chen Yi. One is that Soviet imperialism will probably become more onerous in its exactions on Communist China. The second is that Communist China will feel with increasing severity its present food shortage and general economic difficulties. The pressure of these events will tend to inspire nationalistically-inclined leaders in the CCP to break with those elements in the leadership who have sold themselves out completely to the Kremlin. Whether this will mean an open split in the leadership and an attempted coup d'état we cannot now prophesy. All we can say is that if there is to be a revolt against the Chinese Stalinists and if there is to be any hope that such a revolt will be successful, it will have to come from an alliance of military men like Chen Yi with some of the more nationalistic political leaders in Peking. We should, of course, be ever on the alert for symptoms of such a break-away and should judiciously do all within our power to foster such a split.

reports and rumors which we have recd and possible lines of speculation are presented separately. Ur contact may use material as he sees fit. This approach is designed to develop relationship toward more normal forms of background fill-in in which correspondent is left free to make his own analysis. Protection of real source however still of utmost importance.

1. Reports: Moscow negots have been dragging due largely Chi resistance. Mao said to have been highly dissatisfied with attempted exactions on China and to have been pressing hard for return Dairen, Port Arthur. Even rumored that Chou told Sov delegation he would resign rather than accede to their demands as presented. Sov demands reported earlier for control five Chi ports additional to Port Arthur, Dairen were reportedly scaled down to take effect only in event war. Mao rumored to have received msg from Chu Teh supporting Mao position that agreement must be acceptable to Chi people who are becoming agitated over sovereignty issue.

2. Speculation: In this oriental bazaar bargaining Kremlin is probably discovering Chi Delegation least submissive it has had to deal with in all its experience with "peoples democracies". It wld not be surprising if Stalin is finding it necessary to retreat from his original asking prices involving demands openly infringing China's sovereignty. Kremlin may well have reconciled itself to more modest, slower-moving and disguised forms of aggression.

3. Reports: Rumors suggest Soviet Delegation has more recently been concentrating on three types of demands: (a) introduction of Sov advisers into China (b) insistence upon so-called minority rights in Manchuria, Sinkiang, Inner Mongolia and Tibet, and (c) sending large numbers Chi laborers to USSR.

4. Speculation: Negots having descended from asking prices to hard bargaining, these three sets of demands are probably being traded against Chi demands for extensive econ assistance, milit matériel, technical milit aid and release from obligations to send grain to USSR at time China facing catastrophic famine.

5. Reports: Sov "advisers" have already been extensively introduced into China, particularly in field of communications. Sov advisers have technically done an excellent job toward rehabilitating railroads. In addition to communications, Kremlin is most vigorously seeking to press advisers into fol categories: secret police, party and milit.

6. Speculation: Kremlin's interest in advisers is not purely technical. This technique, reminiscent one of principal features Japan's 21 demands on China, is directed at bringing Chi party and Govt apparatus completely under Stalinist control. Soviet interest wld seem to be much less in giving technical advice than in obtaining listening posts and points of influence and, eventually, control. How far penetration has gone in secret police is not known. In party, it is unlikely penetration has gone into rank and file; rather it has concentrated on propaganda arm to affect younger elements of party. Commie armies are, of course, major target. Penetration there is presumably by NKVD and polit commissars in guise training officers. However, Russians have probably met most political resistance in army which of peasant origin and feels it won civil war by strength its own arms and cost its own blood.

7. Reports: Last spring and summer when Chi Natl Govt in full retreat south of Yangtze, Sov Govt energetically pushed negots with Nats Sinkiang for commercial and trade agreements giving Sovs extensive concessions and exclusive privileges.[2] When Sinkiang turned over to Peking, Ili group Sov controlled and holdout from Nationalist provincial regime was incorporated into Commie provincial admin. Seifutdin, Sov trained Ili leader now deputy governor Sinkiang, with Sinkiang delegation, called to Moscow to participate in negots. Peng Teh-huai, Commie northwest milit commander not fully trusted by USSR; accordingly Kremlin has through Liu Shao-chi Stalinist elements in Peking leadership arranged to have Peng surrounded by Chi whose first loyalty is to USSR not China. Burhan, present governor Sinkiang declared at about time of Seifutdin's departure for Moscow that Sinkiang is everlastingly and indivisibly a territory of the People's Republic of China and that the races and people of Sinkiang will like steel steadfastly unite with their brothers of the nation. Ili troops holding back on incorporation in Chi Commie armies despite Peking's announcement of their assimilation.

8. Speculation: Sov negots with Chi Nats at time when it evident Chi Commie control of Sinkiang imminent and inevitable suggests Kremlin unwilling depend entirely its domination Peking insure free hand Sinkiang. This view supported by reported Sov displeasure at incorporation Ili group, which Kremlin doubtless was grooming to take over province, in Commie provincial admin.

Sinkiang is mosaic racial groups and conflicting interests. Principal protagonists have been still are Russians, Chi and Turki racial group with latter basically hostile to first two. Russian policy under Czars and Sov alike, as relative strength Chi and Turki-Moslem groups fluctuated has been to support weaker faction thereby redressing balance and exacting as price its support concessions favoring expanding Sov penetration and control. In present situation with ambitious Commie Govt at Peking seeking restore Chi control over Sinkiang, Sovs appear be fol familiar pattern by supporting Turki autonomy.

Question control Turki and other racial groups in Sinkiang thus becomes major problem Moscow negots. In view his background, Seifutdin probably called Moscow by Kremlin support its demands on Chi for concessions to Turki group, probably including introduction Tashkent-trained personnel into civil govt and continuance autonomous Turki milit formations. Burhan declaration coming as it did at time Seifutdin mission likely inspired by pro-China elements CCP to strengthen hands Chi negotiators resisting this demand and counter effect Seifutdin mission. While argument rages in Moscow, implementation of measures incorporating Ili milit units in Commie forces stalled.

9. Reports: Sovs reportedly pressing for up to 1,000,000 Chi laborers to work in USSR. Rumors that 300,000 such laborers already sent arrived in Siberia from Manchuria.

10. Speculation: Undoubtedly USSR wants large numbers manual laborers and sees in China potential source to replace slave labor formerly supplied by German and Japanese war prisoners now becoming depleted by repatriation and attrition. On this score Kremlin undoubtedly encountering vigorous Chi resistance presumably for domestic Chinese political reasons.

11. General Comment: It is emphasized that treaty if and when announced will probably breathe friendship and cooperation with unpalatable Chi concessions well hidden in secret protocols and agreements.

Pls impress desirability that these reports be credited to some non-U.S. source, preferably Eastern Europe. In case last story, suggestions of East European sources appeared so late in article that it frequently omitted in summaries and rewrites.

Editorial Note

On February 14, 1950, the Governments of the Soviet Union and the People's Republic of China signed a 30-year Treaty of Friendship, Alliance, and Mutual Assistance which was ratified by both sides and entered into force on April 11, 1950. In addition, the two states concluded two agreements and three exchanges of notes. The agreements dealt with (1) the eventual restoration to full Chinese control of the Chinese Changchun Railway, Port Arthur, and Dairen, and (2) extension by the Soviet Union of a $300-million credit over a 5-year period to the People's Republic of China. The major exchange of notes provided for the annulment of the August 14, 1945, Treaty of Friendship and Alliance between the Soviet Union and the Republic of China as well as for mutual recognition of the independence of the Mongolian People's Republic. For the texts of the above documents, see United Nations Treaty Series, volume 226, pages 3 ff. The two other exchanges of notes of the same date—February 14, 1950—dealt with the return to China of Japanese property acquired by the Soviet Union in 1945 and the transfer to China of Soviet buildings in the military compound of Peking.

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Chinese Affairs (Sprouse) to the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Merchant)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] February 16, 1950.

Subject: Chinese Air Force Bombings of American Property at Shanghai

Reference is made to the attached telegram from Taipei (telegram No. 273 of February 15), in which there is quoted the Chinese Foreign Office's reply to our written protests of the bombings of American property at Shanghai.[1]

The Chinese reply is definitely unsatisfactory, but is adroitly worded in an effort to excuse CAF bombing on the grounds that "American property" is being used to further the Chinese Communist military efforts and, while the Chinese indicate that they will not bomb US "oil tanks", there is no assurance that they will not again bomb the Shanghai Power Company.[2]

It seems to me that this issue should be looked at in the larger context of U.S. policy and long-range objectives. If we are to follow the policy outlined by the Secretary at his Overseas Press Club speech,[3] we must look at this in the light of the damage being done to our position in China by the use of U.S. aviation equipment to bomb the Chinese civilian population. The Communists are not slow to take up this theme and we are arraigned before the bar of Chinese opinion in much stronger terms than is the Chinese Government itself. The bombings are fast producing what the Consulate General describes as a state approaching chaos with attendant danger to American residents of Shanghai. If anarchy does prevail and if there are mob actions against Americans, we can be sure that, even though they are instigated by the Communists, the Chinese people as a whole will look upon them as a result of our association with a discredited government, which is indulging in an operation which cannot basically affect the outcome of the struggle against the Communists. It should not be overlooked that the Chinese Government, in effect, exists and maintains its representation in the UN solely because of American support and that it would probably collapse overnight if that support were withdrawn. It seems incredible, therefore, that we permit the Chinese Government brazenly to do the damage to our position in China that it is doing. It is all the more incredible that we do not take stronger steps than we have already taken to make clear to that Government that, if it continues bombing attacks of this nature, we will stop all aid or at least all shipments of military supplies from this country.[4] We cannot afford to let the Chinese Government take us further down the primrose path than it has already led us. I say this in full awareness of the pattern of our own strategic bombing in the past and the real damage Chinese Air Force bombing is doing in Shanghai. But, if we consider that it is in our national interest to have such bombings continue, it is then up to us to encourage it and provide additional planes and bombs to the end that it becomes really effective. We cannot drift between the two courses, as we seem to be doing at present. I feel that the beneficial effect of the President's statement of January 5 [5] regarding Formosa has now been largely dissipated because of these CAF bombings and am dismayed that we seem to lack the foresight to look at this matter in the light of the larger issues.

[1] Neither telegram 273 nor the Chinese note is printed.

[2] The Chinese Foreign Minister gave verbal assurances that the United States power plants in Shanghai would not be bombed again in the near future (293.114/2–1550).

These same considerations apply in the case of our evacuation plans. If the U.S. Navy is willing to sweep the mines from the Yangtze channel and if we can obtain Chinese Communist concurrence in such action, I feel very strongly that we should politely but firmly tell the Chinese Government that we are going to do so. The spectacle of the Chinese Government's being able to call the turn on matters of direct and, in some ways, of vital interest to the U.S. Government is not

[4] On February 17, Mr. Windsor G. Hackler of the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs recorded the following in a memorandum of a telephone conversation with Mr. Acheson:

"At 6:00 p. m. tonight, the Secretary rang Mr. Merchant on the inter-office telephone. When I explained that Mr. Merchant had left the city, the Secretary said that he wanted to leave a message since he might not remember to ask about the matter on Monday.

"He referred to the note which the Chinese had given to us 'telling us to go to hell with our protest on the Shanghai bombings.' The Secretary wanted to ask if this note gave us a chance to get out of Formosa and withdraw aid from the Nationalists.

"I replied that the matter was under active consideration in FE and that an answer to the question would be forthcoming very soon. The Secretary said 'Fine, fine, I just wanted to be sure that you are thinking about it.'" (793.00/2–1750) logical; nor is it warranted when one considers its complete dependence upon the U.S.[6]

[5] See the editorial note under date of January 5, p. 264.

[6] On February 17, Mr. Sprouse's memorandum was forwarded by Mr. Merchant to the Deputy Under Secretary of State (Rusk) under cover of a memorandum, of which the last two paragraphs read:

"It seems to me in continued pursuit of the maneuver of disengagement which has been under way for nearly two years we must expect some apparent confusion in our actions for some little time to come. It is out of the question that we should pursue one or the other policy to its logical extremity since in the first case this would lead us to derecognizing the Nationalists, writing Formosa off and at the earliest possible moment recognizing Peking; whereas the logical extremity of the other would be to reverse ourselves and give all-out military support to the Nationalists regardless of the risk of direct involvement.

"It is necessary it seems to me, however, that we should be clear in our minds in which direction we are moving in order to give a consistent emphasis in our daily actions to the policy which is fundamental. This I take it would be regaining our complete freedom of maneuver and disassociation in the Chinese mind with the Kuomintang as rapidly as events at home and abroad permit." (293.114/2–1750)

In telegram 286, February 20, from Taipei, Mr. Strong reported on a further conversation with Foreign Minister Yeh concerning the Chinese Air Force air raids. The pertinent paragraph of this telegram read as follows:

"I assured him that in my opinion Department would not regard reply as satisfactory for obvious reasons. Yeh then said he thought verbal assurance given in addition to aide-mémoire would have been regarded as solving issue particularly since assurance that power plant would not be bombed again in near future should of course be interpreted to mean it would not be bombed again." PRIORITY

NEW YORK, March 2, 1950—6:57 p. m.

203. Tsiang [1] called on Gross [2] this afternoon and brought up among other things resumption by Generalissimo of Presidency.[3] Tsiang said he was not a member of Nationalist Party or of any other party. He had been striving for "bipartisan or rather tripartisan foreign policy for China." He felt he had been successful in this and that all groups except, of course, Communist had agreed with line Tsiang had been following in New York. Tsiang thought his Foreign Office had retained confidence in him and there were no partisan differences regarding UN issues of concern to China.

Tsiang considered himself as a friend to both Generalissimo and General Li. Up to as recently as three days ago Tsiang and a group of friends had been attempting to "effect a reconciliation" between Chiang and Li. This group was disappointed by failure of these efforts, and Tsiang professed to be puzzled as to the reasons for his failure.

Tsiang said he and Dr. Hu Shih [4] were forming a new "liberal party" of which they were generally considered to be the potential leaders. Tsiang's implication was that this party would not necessarily accept either the Generalissimo or General Li as its leader.

However, with respect to the Generalissimo's recent resumption of the Presidency, he had concluded that the Generalissimo had acted correctly from both legal and political point of view. From Chinese constitutional standpoint, the Vice President succeeded to the Presidency only in event of death of the President. The Generalissimo had voluntarily relinquished the Presidency to General Li, and, according to Tsiang, could upon his own volition resume the Presidency.

From political standpoint, Tsiang feels "General Li is through". He is a man of fine character but politically inept. Tsiang cited several instances of what he considered General Li's lack of political acumen.

Tsiang intends very shortly to make known publicly his views on this matter and said he wished to pass the information to Gross for latter's personal knowledge prior to public release by Tsiang. Tsiang concluded by saying that situation was "most unfortunate and would provided further ammunition to the enemies of China."

Gross expressed appreciation to Tsiang for his frank explanation of his views and made no other comment.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] March 7, 1950.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Chinese Government representatives in Washington have applied to the Department for export licenses for the shipment of 25 M–4 Sherman tanks and of 25 F–80 jet fighter aircraft to Formosa. It is understood that the tanks are being purchased from stocks of the Department of the Army and paid for from the $125 million grants authorized under Section 404(b) of the China Aid Act of 1948. The aircraft would be paid for by the Chinese Government from its own funds and would be manufactured by the Lockheed Aircraft Corporation for delivery by the end of 1950.

In this connection, the British Ambassador expressed to me on December 8, 1949 the serious concern of his Government over the continued shipment of military matériel from the United States to Formosa, particularly the shipment of medium and heavy tanks and aircraft. It was the considered opinion of the British Government that this equipment would sooner or later fall into the hands of the Chinese Communists and be available for use against Hong Kong. The British Ambassador was informed that the views of his Government would be taken into consideration with respect to shipments from the United States of this type of military matériel.[1]

It is not believed that military matériel of this nature should be furnished the Chinese Government, in view of the possibility that such equipment might fall into the hands of the Chinese Communists through defection or capture and thus be available for use by the Chinese Communists against Hong Kong or in the general area of China. The Department is, therefore, not issuing export licenses for the shipment of this matériel to Formosa and it would be appreciated if the Department of Defense would take steps to prevent the transfer of such items to the Chinese Government from its stocks.

This action is without prejudice to the continued shipment of military matériel of other types and to the issuance of export licenses covering such shipments, which will be dealt with in the reply which I expect to make in the near future to the questions raised in your letter of February 14, 1950.[2]

Sincerely yours, DEAN ACHESON

The Ambassador in India (Henderson) to the Secretary of State

TOP SECRET NEW DELHI, March 8, 1950—7 p. m.

301. In accordance Deptel 192 March 1 asking Embassy approach British for specific information regarding GOI military aid to Tibet, following obtained from Roberts, Acting UK High Commissioner yesterday. He requests information be protected with special care as it was given UK by GOI for its use.

1. Tibetan Government has asked and GOI agreed supply:
   38 2-inch mortars.
   63 3-inch mortars.
   150 Bren guns.
   14,000 2-inch mortar bombs.
   14,000 3-inch mortar bombs.
   1,000,000 rounds .303 ammunition.

Ammunition is quantity estimated to be required for one brigade group in action for six months. One complication, however, is that animal transport is only practical means of delivery and foregoing quantity is equivalent to 7,000 mule loads. As insufficient mules available, some or all of 3-inch mortars and ammunition therefore, may not leave India.

2. Foregoing is material increase over small amount provided in past. However, GOI prefers regard this and any future reasonable requests from Tibet as merely continuation routine practice of meeting Tibetan requirements small arms and not as something in nature of military program directed at Chinese Communists.

3. British have no definite information as to what steps GOI have taken reference training Tibetan military units. They have suggested GOI send demolition experts to Tibet but GOI reactions negative as such action might have appeared as part of a plan to oppose Chinese Communists. Roberts professed not to know of plan mentioned to Embassy by British officer in Indian Army to replace present personnel Indian contingent Gyangste with personnel ostensibly regular soldiers but actually qualified instructors.

4. British have constantly encouraged GOI extend military assistance and present assistance being given at their suggestion. They have told GOI that if latter has difficulty sparing equipment in short supply they would take sympathetic attitude towards requests for help. However, GOI has so far not asked British assistance.

British doubt Tibet has any real military plan for resisting organized Communist incursion as Tibetan Army Commanders know virtually nothing of tactics modern warfare. British regard dispatch of military assistance more in nature measure raise Tibetan morale and assist in combatting infiltration and subversion which they regard as greatest present danger than as measure which could conceivably halt full-scale invasion. They point out, however, that if 7,000 mule loads cannot be delivered Tibet from India in one season it would also be difficult for Chinese mount sizeable invasion.

Embassy doubts Tibet in position make use of members [?] military assistance of other types than outlined above until Tibetans have some more advanced military training. Simple demolition equipment and supplies would probably be practicable and useful if GOI permitted transit through India and training in use thereof could be arranged.

GOI reaction to suggestion US collaborate with India in meeting Tibetan needs likely be somewhat unfavorable because (1) GOI itself providing what Tibetans want and can use (2) political undesirability from GOI viewpoint in collaborating with US in apparent joint program directed against Chinese Communists and (3) US has been unable meet GOI's own requests for US military assistance such as tank spare parts.

Sent Department 301, Department pass London.

The Consul General at Shanghai (McConaughy) to the Secretary of State

SECRET SHANGHAI, March 16, 1950—1 p. m.

1110. As we prepare leave Shanghai, ConGen, without attempting comprehensive survey situation submits following by way of our final impression of certain outstanding features meriting attention as highly significant factors conclusively proven by great weight of evidence. As time precludes detailing such evidence, development of points listed is limited to citation few illustrations:

1. Critical near catastrophic economic situation bringing misery to people at accelerating rate. Attested to from all sides, all areas heard—east China provinces (especially Shantung), Peiping, Tientsin, even Szechuan (whence trained agricultural observer, long contact of ConGen reports "food scarce, land unsaleable, taxes oppressive, business stagnant, labor unemployed, widespread misery dissatisfaction"). ConGen's economic reports have stressed this to extent precluding need further developing theme. Sufficient to observe that Shanghai, which all sources agree is "paradise" compared other ports and areas, faces serious almost desperate situation as result bombing, blockade but even more Communists bleeding of business through impossible tax and bond demands, with resulting ruin economic enterprise, unemployment, etc. Bureau of Commerce and Industry now has over 6,000 applications for closure firms. To cite banks alone, of 180 private banks left, 27 have applied to close and China Bank manager states he expects not more than 30 will be open year from now. Severity of tax and bond demands impressively confirmed to officers of ConGen by numerous personal contacts who aghast at amounts assessed them. That these affect even poorer classes shown by first hand report that pedicab drivers must pay 380,000 JMP (over 10 US dollars) per pedicab per month in taxes and assessments. Reported frequency suicides and attempted "get-aways" to escape pressure substantiated by several known instances. Bond collecting methods creating near state terror, with collectors callous to please and taking line that all must contribute in order raise funds for conquest Taiwan and thus save properties from bombing. Situation countryside reported far worse with forced autumn food levies intolerable severity.

2. Swelling tide of popular discontent hostility toward new regime, which has spread here and apparently throughout country with startling rapidity during past two months and seems destined grow pari passu with economic crisis. Confirmed by mass evidence, with testimony generally agreeing that Shanghai discontent, though great, less developed than most other areas. To illustrate:

(a) Many close Chinese contacts of ConGen who less than year ago approved new regime, now disillusioned, disgusted, only hoping for third world war, revolution or other way out. Many sources report similar change attitude affecting great numbers, including many professors other intellectuals. Students (at least older ones) reported increasingly fed up with parading as "childish horseplay."

(b) Manifold reports, whose general accuracy substantiated by occasional well vouched evidence and even press admissions reveal increasing frequency throughout interior of suicides, mass arrests and various forms violence such as burning tax offices (to destroy records), rioting, firing upon farmers demonstrating against taxes food levies, and rampant guerrilla banditry. Increasing reports had in many localities actual Communist control confined to city limits with countryside at mercy of bandits guerrillas of uncertain political affiliation. Tax collectors frequently require armed escort.

(c) Two reliably reported instances violence at Shanghai Communist-organized bond drive meeting, one involving beating up of Communist orator.

(d) Well vouched information that at recent meeting East China regime heads (held following failure their efforts to persuade Peking extend Shanghai bond drive time limit), Chen Yi bluntly declared that new regime's popular support, 20 percent at "liberation", later 60 percent, now sunk to almost nil.

(e) Persistent pressure by its Communist leaders to persuade a local labor union to record its "gratitude" to Mao and Stalin for treaty was sullenly rejected by workers on grounds "why thank anyone with price of rice where it is?" Various other signs incident reveal hostility or apathy toward Moscow alliance.

(f) Two Chinese sources state that brutal abuses by cadre workers at Wukiang, recently revealed in press only, came to light as result of bold protest by Liu Ya-tzu [1] made on basis information sent him by relative in Wukiang. General belief that hundreds similar cases, having no Liu to champion, never published or righted, though official press tends to hint at situation.

(g) Even among Shanghai labor, Communists firmest support, large section is turning against new regime according many sources.

Despite such signs and constant unconfirmable reports of guerrilla peasant uprisings, more responsible sources agree that nothing approaching real rebellion yet existent and all agree however that, if rebellion once broke, it would rapidly gain wide support. Evidence that Chen Yi and/or other Communist military leaders are in mood for actual putsch remains inconclusive. Two points significant, however: (a) all sources agree that, if and when any Communist leaders defect, Chen likely to be first; (b) variously reported that Shantung troops, which comprise bulk of Chen's forces and large fraction of Liu Po-cheng's are becoming restive over disturbing news re desperate Shantung conditions sent them by families. Also persistently reported that Chen's relations with Liu Shao-chi very strained.

Considerable proportion of those hostile to new regime feel that even return KMT would be relief, if our Chinese contacts can be taken as representative. Noteworthy, however, that large majority state that Generalissimo and four families never should or could return.

3. Almost universal popular expectation, at least in Shanghai area, of third world war in near future, this fact constantly impressed upon us by contacts all types and classes.

4. At least in Shanghai area—a pronounced revival of popular friendly sentiment toward Western democracies, notably America, which strangely appears grow despite air raids, in measure with Communists increasingly bitter anti-American propaganda. This noted by many observers and demonstrated by manifold small but cumulatively significant signs and incidents personally noted by members and contacts of ConGen. Evidence indicated America more popular now than at height American prestige in postwar era. While difficult to analyse, probable reasons appear (a) traditional force of friendship toward America, (b) Communists overplay of propaganda to point where it produces skepticism and revulsion re Moscow orientation, (c) economic misery which public now contrasts with better days of American era, (d) general expectation of third world war and American victory therein, (e) preverse liking for underdog, (f) "absence makes heart grow fonder." While not a few thoughtful pro-American Chinese wish America would continue use influence to prevent KMT bombing urban centers utilities as senseless contribution to economic chaos benefitting nobody and aggravating public misery, almost none seek hold America responsible for bombing, and surprising proportion actually welcomes raids. (Realize this represents some departure from past tone of ConGen reports, but we feel fully justified in face of clearly proven trend.) Average man on street seems to reason: third war inevitable, will certainly be won by America; will bring us suffering but quicker end our misery; bombing hastens day; "sooner over the better".

5. New developing phase of basic Communist policy which, apparently reflecting combination of panic over predicament and determination of top Communists to expedite attainment immediate objectives (especially capture Taiwan) as well long range socialization goals come what may, seems chiefly characterized by bulldog tenacity, truculence, indifference human suffering, and ruthless bleeding of private enterprise and property regardless—or perhaps for purpose—their early extinction. Especially evident is their desperate extortion money from every available quarter—including departing American businessmen. Interesting note that virtually all our sources, including bitterest foes of Communists, agree that, in pursuance of their objectives, rank and file Communists definitely possess certain outstanding qualities. Such include: much greater vigor and thoroughness than KMT; general personal incorruptibility (as regards funds and "squeeze") hitherto unknown in China; extraordinary capacity for hard work; eagerness to learn; Spartan austerity; fervent belief in propaganda fed them re America, etc.; unswerving devotion to party objectives. All sources agree that Communists intensely suspicious of non-Communists whether foreign or Chinese and that this greatly aggravates their problem of finding competent administrative and technical personnel. Most sources further agree that, while top Communists tend to have vision, and ability, such qualities decreasingly evident as pass down to lower ranks. There is also general consensus among those who have observed European situation that, tough as they are, Chinese Communists are to this point milder breed than European version. The Chargé in China (Strong) to the Secretary of State

CONFIDENTIAL TAIPEI, April 8, 1950—4 p. m.

566. Latest developments on Taiwan Democratic Association. Called on Yang Chao-chia, provincial commander civilian affairs.[1] Yang stated he associated self with association at this time because did not think it served purpose of Taiwanese in fact might even be dangerous for them; had no popular support; records of most of would-be leaders could not bear inspection. Outside Taipei matter being weighed by potential members who hesitate very much because of this. If leadership good and if platform really appropriate, association would get support.

Yang most anxious work for benefit of Taiwanese but not certain that he would be allowed remain in office or that Chiu Nien-tai, who now adviser to Chinese Government will be able influence government take generous attitude toward Taiwanese. Said wished let me know that leaders of association movement were spreading over island that US Government and I, in particular, backing association and would provide "aid". Chinese Government very suspicious of organization. Yang emphasized bitterness still felt toward mainlanders, fear and oppression which still dominates. Said he regularly has callers who ask him for help in finding members of family or relatives who have disappeared without trace and without legal proceedings. Yang seems honest and fearless and less naive than I once thought.

Yesterday afternoon James Chen called again, said Governor Wu had reversed verbal permission; April 5 sent Peace Preservation Headquarters order jointly signed with Peng Meng-chi[2] that organization meeting to be held evening April 6 not to be assembled and force would be used to break it up if order violated. Response my questions Chen stated some of leaders again approached Wu April 6 and argued Wu should permit organization exist as sign of democracy but Wu, unable refute this argument, merely said he would have to refer matter to Generalissimo. He told Chen I could not and would not advocate to Chinese Government any specific organization. Chen then said Lin Ting-li to approach Chen Cheng on matter. I said if association to exist, its leaders must stand on own feet and not seek shelter of US Government, and thanked him for letting me know latest status.

[1] Yang Chao-chia was Civil Affairs Commissioner in the Taiwan Provincial Government.

[2] Deputy Commander, Taiwan Peace Preservation Headquarters.

Last evening had Governor and Mrs. Wu for one of our periodical private dinners. Right after dinner Wu asked, "how is your Taiwan Democratic Association coming." I told him it was not "mine" and then reviewed latest status as told to me by unnamed individuals. Wu said these not true facts, that his written order to Tsai Pei-huo and Yumi Chien was merely that leaders of association were not publicly to announce formation of association until organization details settled and definite principles decided on. Said he had not forbidden organization meeting April 6. Then he explained he did not favor association because there were several factions within group which would soon come into conflict and this would be bad. Said also leaders were letting it be known US Embassy and US Government strongly backing association and when it was formed US Government would supply money and arms; if these were not forthcoming there would be widespread resentment against US.

Told Wu he would, of course, know such claims silly; furthermore, when US failed supply such association, if it existed, I was sure there would be no real repercussions against US or against me personally. Then said wanted him understand before next remarks that I was not pressing Chinese Government behalf any particular group or organization; US Government in accord with tradition was interested in free self-expression of all peoples and in achievement their legitimate aspirations; Taiwanese had certain local interests apart from mainland; they now had no political parties or other groups for expressing views or representing own interests; KMT had been dictatorship for long time and might not understand legitimate desires and needs this direction. Taiwanese were not in position overthrow Chinese Government by any means and both sides knew it; feeling of Taiwanese against mainlanders strong and deep-seated; if Chinese Government continued refuse permit them have own political organizations, full and united resentment against mainlanders would continue and grow; on other hand if Chinese Government permitted political association, much of energy and combative spirit would be dissipated in internal squabbles which would draw some of attention from "evils" of Chinese Government; in the end three or four organizations might be created which would more or less represent political divisions among Taiwanese; these would have legitimate role in provincial politics, would not be united against mainlanders, and would make good impression outside; Chinese Government should give up Soviet theory that it knows better what is good for Taiwanese than do they themselves; this is perfect opportunity for Taiwanese learn democratic procedures refused them by Japanese; Chinese Government only stood to gain.

Wu responded that if I wanted association to come into existence he would at once tell Generalissimo he favored it and it would be accepted. I again told Wu that he should not mistake foregoing as advocacy of any group or association, that I was fully aware of the limitations of the leaders of Taiwan democratic association and even of mendacity of some of them, but principle I was arguing was something Chinese Government should not take lightly because if ignored it was very possible consequences at future date would be serious.

After further discussion (Mrs. Wu taking my side) including forthcoming local elections which Wu thought should satisfy Taiwanese, Wu finally said he could see it my way and that he would advise Generalissimo permit association be formed. I told him to be sure he took this viewpoint on principle and not because he thought US Government wanted this particular association to exist. Wu said he understood, but I am not convinced even he realizes the paramount necessity for Chinese Government cease alienate self from people and permit people have organizations not completely controlled by KMT.

During conversation, Wu asserted he getting full information on activities of association leaders because of deep rifts among them. Said Tsai Pei-huo completely an opportunist; Lin Ting-li merely a gangster but an influential one; Mayor Wusan Lien [3] a "clean" man who doing his best administer Taipei.

During next few days I shall try quietly to obtain order put out by Wu and Peng. If terms in accord with what Wu told me, means bulk of leaders lacked intestinal fortitude to continue project without full US protection, whereas if they would cooperate and stand together until association founded they could not fail.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Reference is made to your letter of February 14 and to my acknowledgment of February 21.[1] Your letter asks whether the Department of State considers that the United States policy in administering PL 512, 79th Congress,[2] PL 472, 80th Congress [3] and Executive Order 9843 [4] in respect to cash sales to the Chinese National Government is superseded by the President's press statement of January 5.

As stated in my acknowledgment of February 21 the Department of State immediately following the issuance of the President's statement of January 5 regarding Formosa, instituted a review of the activities of this Government concerned with military assistance to the Chinese Government. This review has necessarily been delayed due to concurrent and pertinent developments.

On January 12 at the Press Club I made the following comment relative to the President's January 5 statement: "The materials which are now being shipped to Formosa are being paid for by the National Government of China, and those payments have been made either out of their own funds or out of the remaining part of the $125 million which was appropriated by the Congress. These goods are being shipped at the present time. They are being shipped under export licenses and there is no intention or desire to interfere with their shipment." [5]

I believe that the President in stating that "the United States Government will not provide military aid or advice to Chinese forces on Formosa" intended to preclude the further supply of military matériel from United States stores beyond those in the process of procurement and delivery from funds under the $125 million grants already transferred by the Chinese Government to the Department of Defense. It is my opinion that the statement "the resources on Formosa are adequate to enable them to obtain items which they might consider necessary for the defense of the island" was intended to allow for Chinese Government purchases of military matériel in the American commercial market with its own funds.

If you can concur in this interpretation, it would appear proper that the Department of Defense, when orders currently in the process of procurement and delivery from funds under the $125 million grants already allocated to the Department of Defense have been completed, discontinue procurement for the Chinese Government or the transfer of military matériel from U.S. Government stocks to the Chinese Government. The President's statement would also appear to require that no assistance or advice be given to the Chinese Government in their purchase of any other military matériel.

Sincerely yours, DEAN ACHESON

In the discussion of 1st April regarding the possibility my contacting high Communist leaders for an informal discussion of outstanding Sino-American problems Chang Tung-Sun [5] doubted strongly that the Communists would see me, thought that such contacts would be fruitless in any event and said that he himself nowadays never sought out Communists and was without contacts with them except when they looked him up. Exploratory contacts earlier with Wang Shun-Chih [undeciphered groups] uneasiness on the part of democratic personalities with whom he purports to be in contact as regards any discussion on their own part of the problems of international relations.

Initial approaches seeming infeasible and in any event probably ineffectual I requested the British Embassy to take up the matter incidentally with the Foreign Office in the course of some visit, emphasizing the informal character of that approach noting that the proposal was that such a meeting be arranged if the Communists were willing for the simple purpose of discussing certain aspects of Sino-American relations with the idea of obtaining some clarification of the subject and this was done on 6th April. The Foreign Office contact said that the matter would be referred higher up for consideration. It is of course doubtful whether the Communists side will consent to any such interview. I believe however that any refusal on their part would now be more from fear of committing themselves on questions of high policy than from basic hostility. Both the above informants admitted the gravity of China's present economic situation and Wang stressed the following factors dominating political scene:

The Chinese concern with face, the slow tempo of administration in a system where personnel are both ignorant and afraid to take responsibility, the desire to get rid of foreign influence and even foreigners despite the conflict of this desire with China's economic aspiration. Wang thinks China will shift to a more amenable position but that no right angle turn is probable and the shift would take at least 6 months to one year. Chang opined that Mao and his party as members of the Communist Church fear excommunication and are unable to take a neutral position respecting Soviet Union, that relaxation of Sino-American relations can come only from either amelioration of American-Soviet relations or American victory in war, for economic competence will not be permitted to overweigh the political for Communists. Mao, he said, could not be expected to make any pronounced shift in less than two years. (Mao and company quite possibly are guided in their tactics by expectation of a new world war).

If the above estimates are even nearly accurate, the Chinese Communist regime cannot be expected to adopt a substantially more conciliatory attitude for some time to come. That the harshness of both facts of country's economic position and experience of political intimacy with Soviet Union will particularly affect the overall situation in China no doubt seems logically to be anticipated. Secret

With reference to this Office's telegram of April 9th, 12 Noon, I was yesterday called to the Alien Affairs Office and with reference to my request for an interview at the Foreign Office was asked topic of proposed discussion. I informed them in brief, offered to supply a more definite agenda if desired and the bureau asked that one be sent that afternoon. Before this could be done I was told to call at the Foreign Office. There I was again asked my business which I introduced along lines suggested in Department's March 23rd 7 p. m.[2] whereupon Foreign Office official one Lin believed to be head of Australian American Affairs Section asked me to define particular problems in point. I gave a sketch of political field again along general line indicated and asked whether Lin desired to undertake discussion or that I define economic and social questions as well. I was told to continue, again touched upon highlights giving a few examples of outstanding questions at issue where clarification would seem beneficial. At the end Lin said time was short, characterised what I said as "worthless talk" said Smith Bender which I had used as an example represented no failure on China's part in respect to international obligations (which I had not charged) but a failure of the United States to respect China's sovereignty, brought up Ward's case (which I had left unmentioned) and asked me to explain without waiting for an answer and then said that for so long as United States continued to support Chiang Kai Shek talk of working an improvement in general situation was ridiculous.

The Foreign Office of course knew from the British side the general direction of my aim but could hardly be sure that there was not some concrete proposal in the offing when they got agenda in general terms through Alien Affairs Office they presumably had enough on which to base at least one of their several alternative replies. My definition of terms was called for in the beginning and matter thus made clear. The Chinese Communist policy as explained previously by Wang Shun-Chih and seemingly confirmed by the present instance is patently that if general problem of "support to Chiang Kai Shek" is cleared up by recognition of Peking regime there might be approach to solution of particular problems otherwise not. My own approach was based upon concept that solution of particular problems might be antecedent to an amelioration of the general situation. In the circumstances there was no point of meeting. I did not at either (Grp.Undec.) indicate that my approach had approval of the Department.[3] Clubb.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] April 17, 1950.

Subject: CIA Reappraisal of Formosa

Reference is made to Mr. Butterworth's [2] memorandum of March 27 (Tab A)[3] bringing to your attention the CIA intelligence estimate (ORE 7–50 published March 20, 1950)[3] of probable developments in Taiwan. This estimate covered information received prior to February 20 and concluded, with the intelligence agencies of the Department of State concurring and those of the Department of Defense dissenting, that the Chinese Communists "are estimated to possess the capability of carrying out their frequently expressed intention of seizing Taiwan during 1950, and will probably do so during the period June–December."

There is attached hereto a memorandum from CIA dated April 10 (Tab B)[3] informally reviewing the intelligence estimate referred to above in the light of information received since February 20, 1950. This informal reappraisal generally reaffirms the earlier estimate (a) that no Nationalist regime will effect political and military adjustments sufficient to defend the island successfully against a combination of internal and external threats, and (b) that the Chinese Communists are capable of seizing Taiwan before the end of 1950, and will probably do so. However, it points out that more recent information indicating "an improved situation for the Nationalists somewhat weakens the assurance with which the timing of future events can be forecast." In the latter connection, the memorandum concludes: "The fall of Taiwan, before the end of 1950, still seems the most likely course of future developments, but the possibility of a somewhat longer survival of the Nationalist regime on that island should not be excluded."

[1] A note on the source text by Lucius D. Battle, Special Assistant to Mr. Acheson, indicated that the Secretary had seen this memorandum.

1. Tibetans were undoubtedly chagrined when US among others unable meet their requests for aid and joined in discouraging visits Tibetan missions to Washington, London, Delhi, et cetera. It should be recalled, however, from very outset of Communist threat to Tibet Government at Lhasa had also desired get in touch with Chinese Communists in effort reach understanding (Embdesp 1002, November 22, 1949 [1] and Embtel 18, January 5, 1950).[2]

2. Tsepon Shakabpa was instructed contact Chinese Communists at some point outside China (Embdesp 683, Mar. 27)[2] but British unwilling permit him proceed Singapore or Hong Kong for this purpose. We doubt very much he would proceed Moscow in view his unwillingness (see reference despatch) risk going to China where he would be hostage of Communists.

3. Although sometime ago Indians preferred Shakabpa not come to Delhi lest it appear to Chinese Communists they were intriguing with Tibetans, we are now informed by officials of MEA they would have no objection if Shakabpa and his mission should come here from Calcutta primarily for purpose of talking with new Chinese Ambassador who is expected within next two weeks.

4. We understand Indian supply of arms to Tibet (Embtel 301, March 8) approximates sum total of Tibetan requests and represents as well maximum that could be transported to Lhasa this season and absorbed by untrained Tibetan Army. We believe it was largely result of British encouragement (final paragraph Deptel 380) that GOI decided supply these arms.

5. The concensus in Delhi among officials of those governments particularly interested Tibet is that Communists prefer seek infiltrate and subvert Tibet rather than attempt more expensive military conquest. If they attempt conquest opinions vary widely on Tibetan will to resist. In last several days both Bijaya, Nepalese Foreign Minister, and Jarring, Swedish Minister who has had extensive experience in central Asia, have spoken to us slightingly of Tibetans as fighters and have stressed pacifistic influence of Buddhism. Most observers believe, however, they would resist to best of their ability.

6. We think it likely Tibetan effort ascertain what they may expect from Moscow and Peiping will in end be made through Chinese and Russian representatives Delhi.

7. If and when Tsepon Shakabpa comes here we intend further impress upon him that our failure accede Tibetan request should not be misconstrued as disinterest or lack of sympathy. Should it become clear he will not come here we shall endeavor get discreetly in touch with him Calcutta or elsewhere for purpose having full discussion on situation facing Tibet and US attitude in relation thereto. These officials say that they now believe Chinese Communists will not endeavor to invade Tibet this year; that Chinese Communists have so many other difficult problems to solve they will not wish to take on a task this kind just now. When we suggested that strengthening Tibet's ability to defend might be good way of continuing discourage invasion by Chinese Communists they agreed but took position that such strengthening should be extremely discreet and moderate in scope. Otherwise Chinese Communists might feel their prestige involved and decide that they could not afford permit any area China, including Tibet engage in activities of character defiant to Peiping. Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk) to the Secretary of State

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] April 26, 1950.

Subject: Renewed Proposals by Service Attachés in Hongkong and Taipei for Further Military Aid to Chinese Nationalists

It is believed that you will be interested in a summary of two recent telegrams[1] received from our Service Attachés in Hongkong and Taipei urging immediate assistance to the Chinese Nationalist Government in an effort to hold Taiwan and divert the Chinese Communist military strength from Southeast Asia.

In their telegrams of April 14th and 22nd respectively our Assistant Naval Attaché in Hongkong (with the Air and Military Attachés concurring) (Tab A) and the Assistant Military Attaché in Taipei (with the Assistant Naval Attaché and Acting Air Attaché concurring) (Tab B) state that in view of widespread Soviet aid to the Chinese Communists the chances for a successful defense of Taiwan by the Nationalist Government are very slight. They argue that the Nationalists are now absorbing the major attention and efforts of the Communists' military forces, which if Taiwan falls may be expected to exert full pressure on Southeast Asia. Declaring that U.S. efforts to hold the Indochina–Thailand–Burma line will be very expensive and difficult, they ask that we take immediate steps to maintain the remaining Nationalist military forces in order to gain time for strengthening the defences of Southeast Asia.

The Attachés at Hongkong claim that the Nationalist military forces on Hainan and Chushan Islands "have repeatedly shown the will to fight" and that the Chinese Navy and Air Force "are doing their most effective work since the end of World War II with morale and reliability the highest in years". However, they point out that present stocks of ship and aircraft ammunition and maintenance parts will be exhausted within a few months at the present rate of military activity.

The Assistant Naval Attaché's telegram calls for immediate aid to the Taiwan regime in the form of small shipments of ammunition and plane parts, while the Assistant Military Attaché at Taipei proposes that the U.S. at once announce an unrestricted loan of $10 million a month to the Chinese Nationalist Government, "to be paid as long as Taiwan is held or until such time as a different method of aiding China should be deemed advisable". Both men assert that such steps would give a tremendous boost to the morale of anti-Communist forces. However, the Assistant Military Attaché frankly describes the proposed move as "a pure gamble" which might well turn out to be another "operation rathole".

The message from the Assistant Naval Attaché in Hongkong stated that our Consul General there concurred in his recommendations.

In a telegram of April 22 (Tab C)[2] our Chargé in Taipei said that he did not agree with the recommendations made by the Attachés at that place and had so informed them, giving reasons.[3]

[2] Not printed.

[3] In a letter dated April 20, 1950, to the Director of the Office of Chinese Affairs (Sprouse), the Chargé in China (Strong) made the following observations:

"I am concerned that the representatives of the other agencies of the U.S. Government are lining up solidly behind this regime, are emphasizing the minor improvements and overlooking the major failures, and are not considering the mainland and its potentialities. . . .

"To my present state of mind we might provide greater aid if (or, putting it in the negative, should not provide greater aid unless): (1) the Commies fail to take the Chusans, (2) the economy of Formosa is not expected to be wrecked by bombings, (3) it can gain us considerable vital time in Southeast Asia, and (4) doing so will not conflict basically with our objectives on the mainland as viewed in the light of the present situation. I might add a fifth proviso: if we are about to enter a shooting war. Even this raises questions which I have not taken time to think about. Perhaps a shooting war does not automatically mean immediate large scale aid to the Nationalists.

"I do not believe the foregoing considerations can be met favorably, but I realize my view from here is seriously limited." (794A.5/4–2050) contemplate the supplying of military aid to the National Government in Taiwan beyond the scope of present programs. The verified appearance of many military type planes (in addition to reports that some of them are jet types) on the Chinese mainland has raised the definite possibility of increased and highly effective Russian military assistance to the Chinese Communists, and may prompt further strong recommendations, official and otherwise, for countervailing aid to the National Government.

658. For Department's use only. No distribution. As anticipated, psychological reaction to Hainan defeat is severe.[1] Main outward manifestation is universal criticism of government for making premature victory claim. Real reaction is not outwardly expressed: each mainlander now believes the days of Taiwan are numbered, that loss of Chusans and then of Taiwan is matter of time. Gloom and pessimism generally prevailing are matched by weather which for past three weeks could compete on almost even terms with Chungking's lowering winter skies.

There is no excitement or panic. It is generally believed that Communists unable attack Taiwan for some time. But many persons are already known to be considering how to get out and where to go. Should Chusans fall, mainlanders will feel matter of haven to be urgent. Others will begin to calculate how best to make their peace with Communists.

Reaction of Formosans is not so well-known. It is felt that they will react in several different ways: independence groups will probably redouble their efforts, the poorer classes will probably become more susceptible to Communist blandishments, and upper classes will probably straddle fence.

Despite any qualifying remarks which could be made in regard to situation on Hainan prior to Communist success, remarks which might tend to detract somewhat from that success, facts remain that (1) Communists did cross water barrier to invade defended island, and did so without air and naval support; (2) former Nationalist troops (Fu Tso-yi's)[2] did remain loyal to Communists and performed duty without defecting; (3) there are already stories that defections occurred among defenders; and (4) Communists proved able continue dictate fate of Nationalists.

Thus the pattern of events on mainland held true although element of water was introduced into the formula: after previous victory, lull ensued in which Communists made thorough preparations; during lull morale of Nationalist upper crust rose because of lack of Communist offensive activities; in addition to strictly military preparations Communists utilized time to increase strength behind Nationalist lines including arranging defections; when they picked their own time to hit with intent to win they hit hard and Hainan, comparable to mainland walled city traditionally defended by Nationalists, collapsed like house of cards in a windstorm; Nationalist morale plunged to new low; officials, and families, and officers and families being evacuated to next base further back, in this case Taiwan from which there is no further retreat for a great majority, and where new problems of housing and maintenance will have to be faced.

It appears doubtful that lost of Hainan will be followed by long lull. Communists will wish utilize own heightened morale as soon as possible. Although theory exists that Communists will by-pass Chusans, and attack Formosa soon it seems highly improbable. Whereas Hainan of technical lesser strategic value to Nationalists, Chusans of vital importance. If Communists by-pass Chusans, portion their small navy and air force needed in toto for Formosa campaign would be tied down; Communist troops would benefit from training received in Hainan invasion; air force and navy would benefit from combat experience there; it would further lower morale in Taiwan and enable Communist subvert important segments Nationalist forces Taiwan.

In my opinion Nationalist defenders of Chusans are even more open to subversion than were Nationalist troops in Hainan. Steady traffic with mainland has laid them open to frequent contacts by Communist agents. Although conditions in Chusans may have been superior to conditions Hainan, they are still undesirable, and prolonged relative idleness mixed with tension cannot be favorable to morale.

Communist invasion of Chusans must follow different course from Hainan campaign. Long coastline does not exist; there are no interior Communists to support invading forces. Area is compact with entire perimeter strongly manned. Thus there is no point in numerous small landings; attack must be all-out from beginning with goal of winning on first try. Defeat would set Communists back months, thus they must be sure of success before engaging.

If Communists successful in Chusans they can expect eventual success on Taiwan. Planning, preparation of equipment, building of stockpiles, organization, and training will necessarily consume some time. From May, August weather is a dangerous factor until end of typhoon season in late October or November. Although junks may be used in invasion of Formosa, majoriy of men and supplies will probably be transported in variety of powered vessels from good-sized steamers to coastal vessels to river vessels, LSTs, and landing craft of their own construction, protected by own naval vessels (few and small) and aircraft. Vertical envelopment may occur on small scale.

Should Chusans fall it is difficult to predict course and intensity of internal developments on Taiwan. Mutual distrust will prevail; plots and counterplots will be numerous; many persons will flee; anti-American sentiment will spread; yet it may be expected Generalissimo will hold onto power. There will be tenuous hopes that November elections in US will change US policy before Taiwan's final catastrophe, that Communists will meet unsurmountable troubles on mainland which will require their full military power to combat and thus divert attention from Taiwan, and that third world war will erupt.

These hopes may well be punctuated by CAF and Chinese naval defections.

Loss of Chusans within next month will probably seal doom of Taiwan within nine months thereafter or even sooner, depending on capabilities of Communists, which will be hard to judge. In meantime, Nationalist closure policy will break down, Nationalist naval and air activity against mainland will lessen, and Nationalist Government will probably become almost completely isolated. Internal pressures and Communist air activity may well wreck the economy despite greatly reduced military costs.

To my mind fall of Chusans should be signal for second warning to American citizens to evacuate (on grounds probable air raids and fact Taiwan then an area of military operations) and for early decision by US Government to reduce drastically its establishment in Taiwan. USIS and ECA–JCRR should be liquidated in orderly fashion over period of two to three months (on assumption Communists cannot within that time follow up against Taiwan); attachés should be cut to one officer each service plus one aircraft based elsewhere for supply purposes and possibly for evacuation (attachés should be consolidated on Consulate General premises and have bare minimum ex-enlisted personnel); Embassy and Consulate General should be cut to three officers and three clerks or even better to two officers and four clerks (provided all visas Vice Consuls are suspended); US Government office and living quarters furniture and equipment gradually should be shipped out to maximum degree including cryptographic machines; coding in OTP; final understanding should be reached with Manila Liaison Group on evacuation procedure; if possible some type of hold should be retained on Nationalist Government to prevent interference with these reduction activities and with personnel remaining behind for time being, and all preparations for speedy turnover to British should be completed. As long as attachés remain would seem advisable have diplomatic representative from Department; also useful for protection purposes.

If, by any chance Communists prove content to permit Chusans to wither on vine by merely maintaining air superiority, and consequent naval superiority there, our decisions and actions as outlined above should be taken at such time as that Communist strategy becomes apparent, and at a more rapid tempo.

Perhaps foregoing is too pessimistic a view, but there are few grounds for optimism.

Would be useful for my own thinking to have indication of Department's preliminary views with regard to proposed method and timing of reduction. Believe we should avoid precipitate and undignified flight by taking early and gradual measures.

Shall forward further evaluations in relation to warnings to civilians and own evacuation as events unfold.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Pending a review of the United States military position with regard to Formosa in light of the recent international developments in the Far East, I wish to reserve comment on the provisions of your letters of 7 March and 14 April in furtherance to my inquiry of 14 February [1] concerning the United States policy in administering Public Law 512, 79th Congress, Public Law 472, 80th Congress, and Executive Order 9843 in connection with the transfer of equipment to the Chinese Nationalist Government.

As soon as the above-mentioned study is completed, I shall advise you of my views. In furtherance to our exchange of correspondence on this subject, I have advised the appropriate agencies within the Department of Defense that as an interim measure the provision of military assistance to the Chinese should be in accordance with the following:

a. Assistance may be continued, except for jet aircraft and medium and heavy tanks, on those orders currently in the process of procurement or delivery as of 14 April from the obligated but unexpended funds authorized under Public Law 472, if such transactions are considered desirable by the Department of Defense in the light of applicable military criteria.

b. Transactions which were requested or pending under Public Law 512 prior to 5 January 1950 may be completed, if such transactions are considered desirable by the Department of Defense in the light of applicable military criteria.

Sincerely yours, LOUIS JOHNSON

759. Unexpected evacuation of Chusans[1] by Nationalist Government creates situation almost identical to alternative possibility stated mytel 658, April 27 (by-passing of Chusans by Communists).

Communist resources can now be concentrated against Taiwan solely (whether Chinmen is evacuated or not). How soon Communists can undertake offensive action against Taiwan is matter of sheer guesswork and is dependent on internal developments here as well as on Communist military strength.

In opinion of attachés and myself fate of Taiwan sealed, Communist attack can occur between June 15 and end July. Although probably mid-June too early a date we are not in position prove it, nor is it worth-while arguing whether will occur in one month, two months or three months.

Conference this morning with ECA and attachés resulted agreement internal developments very difficult know and evaluate thoroughly and are equally or more dangerous than external attack. As stated reftel, we feel reduction of American staffs to be matter of greater urgency than would have been case had effort been made defend Chusans. We cannot determine how soon Communist air activity over Taiwan will begin, but it is possible from now on.

My revised recommendations are as follows:

1. Immediate issue formal warning to all Americans leave Taiwan soonest (text to be provided by Department) and passports for entry into Taiwan to be withheld (including Johnston International personnel who due soon to begin well-digging under contract with Taiwan Sugar Company.
2. Immediate evacuation all female employees and remaining dependents in ECA.
3. Commence elimination USIS and ECA–JCRR, and reduction Consulate General staff and attachés. Feel USIS should be terminated completely regardless, but as matter policy, Department may wish continue economic aid as benefit to people on Taiwan. In that event, instead of elimination Department may wish keep very small number ECA staff here as aid supervisors. Moyer [2] recommends sixty percent reduction, or from twenty Americans to eight. I consider this number as too high and would prefer only three or four, if any are to remain. We agree this matter of policy requiring Washington decision.

J. G. White engineers should be cut from ten Americans to maximum of three.

Cut Consulate General staff to myself, Swayne, Albaugh, Bowling, Courton and McCarthy (sole use of OTP will require more code clerks).

Remove cryptographic machines.

Other agencies nominate personnel to remain after reduction. Should be held to minimum consistent with gaining intelligence on Soviets and Chinese Communists, and maintaining historical record military events here. Target date for completion elimination and reduction June 15.

4. Cease issuance exit visas after June 15. Department will note new quota year commences July 1. Taipei as only office able issue preference visas under Chinese racial quota may be swamped with visa applicants after that date. If Department unable concur cessation visa functions, additional officer required here (Pletcher).

5. Clamp down on entries by Chinese into Japan.

6. Tokyo provide by radio summaries of Communist broadcasts containing significant comment on Taiwan.

7. If Pletcher not to remain here, authorize Swayne act as both disbursing and certifying officer. If Pletcher to remain here, authorize Swayne temporary duty Hong Kong, after evacuation, en route Singapore enable him complete accounts in company with Pletcher (who assigned Hong Kong).

Expect take following action soon:

1. Base both attaché planes Hong Kong in order minimize danger from sabotage as well as Communist air attacks.

motion. In view of the number of imponderables in Taiwan situation feel necessary take initial action sooner rather than later. Once cut down to manageable size, we can quickly react to any contingency.

Foregoing involves changes in a few details of recommendations made in reftel, but for greater part conforms therewith.

Am informed Taipei flooded with rumors that US personnel being evacuated at once by destroyer. UP correspondent Robert Miller learned of meeting this morning. In reponse to questions I confirmed meeting and review of newly-created situation sent Department but refused further comment except that do not consider crisis exists now and any future course of action must be laid down in Washington.

View delicacy of matter, suggest Department keep Taipei informed advance of any and all public pronouncements. Initial statement referring evacuation notice can be coupled with specific indication of level at which US activities here to continue. Although danger from internal developments is probably greater than from external attack, Department may deem it wiser omit reference in text of notice to American citizens and Department's initial public release.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. John Foster Dulles, Consultant to the Secretary of State

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] May 25, 1950.

Participants: Mr. Hollington Tong [1]
S—Mr. John Foster Dulles

Mr. Tong said that he had left Formosa on April 26 and had come here via Hong Kong, Paris and London. He expected to be going on to Tokyo and back to Formosa the latter part of June. He asked what could be done to improve relations between the Nationalist Government and the United States and to insure more help in relation to the defense of Formosa. I said to Mr. Tong that I did not think that this was a matter where there was any possibility of any sort of a bargaining arrangement; that I had in all frankness to say to him that there had been both in official quarters and in American public opinion a very complete loss of confidence in the will of the Nationalist forces to fight. The impression prevailed that they had ample material strength to defend Formosa if they would, but that there was grave doubt that they would. Rumors were current that many of the leaders, including the Generalissimo, were already making plans to get away from Formosa to safety and past performance gave credibility to these rumors. I recalled that when Mme. Chiang Kai-Shek was here during the war she had, in a speech to Congress used the expression "God helps those who help themselves". I thought this was a very good time for the Nationalist forces to take that to heart.

Mr. Tong asked whether I thought that if they should defend

[1] Member of the Central Advisory Committee of the Kuomintang and General Manager of the China Broadcasting Corporation.

Formosa for a certain period of time that that would lead to a change of official and public opinion. I said that I could not answer that question, but that I thought that the spirit which prompted it was incorrect. The idea that by fighting for a certain number of months they could then get a certain amount of help was totally false. If they fought they would have to fight because they had something that they really believed in and were willing to sacrifice and die for. That was not something to be bargained about. I referred to Churchill's leadership in England in 1940 and to the struggle of the revolutionists in Cuba. American public opinion had become sympathetic because there was evidence of a cause of liberty in which people believed and for which they were willing to die. If there were evidence of that sort in relation to Formosa, it might or might not affect the United States attitude. Certainly, however, the United States' attitude would not be altered if the only fighting that was done was being done on a time basis for the purpose of winning U.S. support and not because there was a cause of their own which attracted their loyalty.

I said that it might very well be that there was no such cause; that China had not developed the type of National and spiritual loyalties such as prevailed in the Western countries. If that were the case, there was nothing to be done about it.

Mr. Tong thanked me very much for the frankness with which I had expressed myself.

Memorandum by the Special Assistant to the Secretary of Defense for Foreign Military Affairs and Assistance (Burns) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, 29 May 1950.

Subject: Notes on State–Defense Conference Held 25 May 1950

In furtherance to our discussion at the State–Defense meeting held in General Lemnitzer's [1] office on 25 May, I am forwarding my understanding of the points which were agreed upon in connection with (1) policies relating to the provision of military assistance to the Nationalist Chinese Government on Formosa, and (2) organization for the provision of military assistance to Southeast Asia:

1. Provision of military assistance to the Nationalist Chinese Government on Formosa—every step should be taken within existing United States policy to provide assistance to the Chinese Nationalist Government on Formosa. Accordingly:

a. You agreed to take the necessary action within the Department of State to determine whether or not the provisions of the Secretary of State's letters dated 7 March and 14 April, can be broadened.

b. You agreed to take steps within the Department of State to authorize and facilitate the granting of export licenses to the Chinese Nationalist Government on Formosa for military equipment purchased in the United States.

c. Upon receipt of any revised interpretations of policy, the Department of Defense will expedite the supply of that equipment which can be provided under the provisions of Public Law 472 ($125 million program).

d. The Department of Defense will make every attempt to insure that equipment furnished the Chinese Nationalist Government are items urgently required in connection with the defense of Formosa.

e. There should be no change in the application of existing pricing policies applied toward the $125 million program.

[1] Maj. Gen. Lyman Lemnitzer, Director of the Office of Military Assistance, Department of Defense.

f. The Department of Defense in reviewing the situation in Formosa will indicate at an early date its views with regard to the desirability of recommending changes in existing U.S. policy and with regard to contents of Mr. Acheson's letters of 7 March and 14 April.

g. It was recognized by both sides that covert action in support of resistance on Formosa, while of limited possibilities, is authorized by existing U.S. policies and that augmentation and intensification of the covert effort is desirable. You agreed to request Presidential release of such 303 funds [2] as might be required for authorized projects.

Memorandum by the Deputy Special Assistant for Intelligence (Howe) to Mr. W. Park Armstrong, Special Assistant to the Secretary of State for Intelligence and Research

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] May 31, 1950.

For P.A. only. At Rusk's invitation I attended a meeting yesterday (May 30—holiday) afternoon for two hours, with Rusk, Jessup, Nitze, Merchant and Sprouse on the subject of Formosa. Rusk is still working toward raising the question of Formosa, basing his thinking generally along the lines that world opinion and US opinion are generally unhappy at lack of a forthright action on our part in the Far East; that Formosa presents a plausible place to "draw the line" and is, in itself, important politically if not strategically, for what it represents in continued Communist expansion.

Rusk has been drafting and redrafting papers with a view to presenting them to the Secretary. Our Estimates Group assisted in one analysis which is a Tab in Rusk's current documentation.[1] I believe that the representation at this meeting, plus Dulles, constitute the only ones who are aware of this move on Rusk's part. The talks at the meeting were based first on a brief paper in which Rusk pointed [1] Much of the documentation referred to is in files 611.94A/5–3050 and 611.93/6–950. Both of these files contain copies of memoranda from Mr. Rusk to Secretary Acheson, but the file copies are not signed or initialed by Mr. Rusk and there is no indication that Mr. Acheson saw them if they were forwarded to him. An extract from one of these draft memoranda is printed as an annex to this document.

up the desirability of "packaging" three problems: (1) Formosa; (2) Recognition of Communist China; (3) Seating in the UN.[2]

Subsequent discussion explored the various possibilities in the Formosa move, based on Rusk's rather lengthy documentation of past policy, changed circumstances, and alternative courses. The documentation was limited by not having any appraisal of the possible consequences—militarily and politically within the area and throughout the world—of a US move involving force to prevent the fall of Formosa. I urged Rusk to give us a green light on such a study as soon as it was possible to let more people know that the subject was in the wind.

The net result of the discussion was a general agreement to go ahead with the following proposition which Rusk hoped to document that evening to discuss informally with the Secretary today:

The Gimo would be approached, probably by Dulles in the course of his trip to Japan on June 15,[3] with the word that (a) the fall of Formosa in the present circumstances was inevitable, (b) the US would do nothing to assist Gimo in preventing this, (c) the only course open to the Gimo to prevent the bloodshed of his people was to request UN trusteeship. The US would be prepared to back such a move for trusteeship and would ready the fleet to prevent any armed attack on

[2] A memorandum by Charles Yost, Director of the Office of Eastern European Affairs, dated June 1 (not printed), indicated that Mr. Rusk, on behalf of Mr. Acheson, requested assistance from other Offices and Bureaus in the Department in preparation of a memorandum regarding recognition of a government in China and seating in the United Nations; no mention was made of Formosa (793.02/6–150).

A further memorandum by the Deputy Legal Adviser, Jack B. Tate, to Mr. Rusk on June 6 summarized the thrust of Mr. Rusk's and Mr. Acheson's thinking on recognition:

"Your memorandum of June 1 states that the Secretary has asked that consideration be given to the following suggestion on United States recognition policy in regard to China:

> 'to tie our policy on recognition to such realistic and well understood factors as (a) the exercise of de facto control, (b) the consent or acquiescence of the people concerned, (c) attitude toward normal relations with others, including the treatment of foreigners, both official and private, (d) acceptance in good faith of international obligations. The United States should announce that, pending clarification of the situation in China: (1) it takes account of the fact that the Peking regime exercises certain de facto control in parts of China. In accordance with established international law, the United States will therefore hold that regime responsible for the discharge of international obligations wherever in China its actual authority extends; (2) that it (the United States) continues to acknowledge that the Nationalist Government of China is the recognized government with which the United States maintains diplomatic and consular relations.'" (793.02/6–650)

The unsigned memorandum addressed to Mr. Acheson on June 9 by Mr. Rusk dealt with the three questions: Formosa, recognition, and U.N. representation (611.93/6–950). As indicated above, the file copy shows no indication that it was forwarded or that the Secretary saw or acted on it. No policy decision on these three questions was made prior to the outbreak of hostilities in Korea.

[3] Mr. Dulles, whose primary area of responsibility was the Japanese peace treaty, visited Japan and Korea during his trip, June 14–29, but he did not go to Formosa. For documentation on Japan, see pp. 1109 ff.

Formosa while the move for trusteeship was pending. It was generally agreed that the trusteeship would probably have to include Russia and that the negotation over the trusteeship agreement might be extremely difficult and prolonged, but it would give the US a chance to prevent the fall of Formosa under circumstances sponsored by the UN. Such a course, if adopted by the US, would be discussed with the British and possibly others before it was formally taken up.

(Note: My concern, which Rusk accepts as valid, is that the Russians may well welcome a partial commitment of US forces in the protection of Formosa, which would give them an opportunity for pushing the Chinese Communists into a clash with us, aided probably by some direct if unidentifiable Russian effort such as submarines. It is therefore important that as soon as possible we get some considered spectulation, assisted by the military, on what the probable consequences would be of a US commitment of even partial force, such as the fleet, in the area.)

Extract From a Draft Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk) to the Secretary of State [4]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] May 30, 1950.

The United States faces a new and critical period in its world position.

The loss of China to Communists who, it now seems, will work in Asia as junior partners of Soviet Communism has had tremendous repercussions throughout the world. It has marked a shift in the balance of power in favor of Soviet Russia and to the disfavor of the United States.

While that basic fact is generally accepted, no one is yet quite sure as to the precise extent to which that power relationship has been shifted. Throughout the world, in Europe, the Mediterranean, the Middle East, Asia and the Pacific, governments and peoples are intently watching for the next move which will provide a measure of the extent of the power shift, so that they can orient their own policies accordingly.

The barometer most closely watched is that which seems to measure the judgment of the United States itself as to its present power and position in the world. If our conduct indicates a continuing disposition to fall back and allow doubtful areas to fall under Soviet Communist control, then many nations will feel confirmed in the impression, already drawn from the North Atlantic Treaty, that we do not expect to stand firm short of the North Atlantic area—which under the Treaty includes Berlin—and the Americas covered traditionally by the Monroe Doctrine and now by the Rio Pact.

If our conduct seems to confirm that conclusion, then we can expect an accelerated deterioration of our influence in the Mediterranean, Near East, Asia and the Pacific. The situation in Japan may become untenable and possibly that in the Philippines. Indonesia, with its vast natural resources may be lost and the oil of the Middle East will be in jeopardy. None of these places provide good "holding" grounds once the people feel that Communism is the wave of the future and that even we are retreating before it.

This series of disasters can probably be prevented if at some doubtful point we quickly take a dramatic and strong stand that shows our confidence and resolution. Probably this series of disasters cannot be prevented in any other way.

Of the doubtful areas where such a stand might be taken, Formosa has advantages superior to any other. It is not subject to the immediate influence of Soviet land power. It is close to our naval and air power. It is occupied by the remnants of the non-Communists who have traditionally been our friends and allies. Its status internationally is undetermined by any international act and we have at least some moral responsibility for the native inhabitants. It is gravely menaced by a joint Chinese-Russian expedition in formation. The eyes of the world are focused upon it.

If the United States were to announce that it would neutralize Formosa, not permitting it either to be taken by Communists or to be used as a base of military operations against the mainland, that is a decision which we could certainly maintain, short of open war by the Soviet Union. Everyone knows that that is the case. If we do not act, it will be everywhere interpreted that we are making another retreat because we do not dare risk war. If it is inferred that we do not dare take a stand that risks war unless our own citadel of the North Atlantic and American areas is directly attacked, then the disasters referred to above will almost surely happen.

We are not so situated that time is working for us so that it can be argued that we have to buy time. The further losses possible in Indonesia and the Near East would greatly increase the war-making power of the Soviet Union. Quite apart from that, the Soviet Union is increasing its force-in-being, its atomic stockpile and its basic military potential at a rate so rapid that the relative position will be worse two years from now than it is today. That would be so, even though we somewhat increased our own efforts. That also is something that is generally known. In consequence, if the rest of the world feels that we are today afraid to take a stand which would involve a possible risk of war then they would judge that almost certainly we will not take that risk tomorrow unless it is forced upon us by actual attack upon either the North Atlantic or American area.

Admittedly the determination to withhold Formosa from Communists would involve complications with the Nationalist Government and with their elements on Formosa. It would involve spreading of our own military force, and possibly some actual losses. However, these aspects are of a secondary order. It is within our power to solve the political complications if we have the resolute will. Also, these same problems will embarrass us if we allow Formosa to fall. The efforts at evacuation, particularly attempts to evacuate to the Philippines large numbers of Nationalists, will pose new problems and difficulties perhaps as embarrassing as those that would be posed by an affirmative policy. It will not leave a good taste if we allow our political problems to be solved by the extermination of our war allies. That was the Russian solution of General Bor's Polish Army.[5]

Admittedly, a strong stand at Formosa would involve a slightly increased risk of early war. But sometimes such a risk has to be taken in order to preserve peace in the world and to keep the national prestige required if we are to play our indispensable part in sustaining a free world.

Action to be effective must be prompt.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Reference is made to my letter of April 14, 1950 and to paragraph (a) of your reply dated May 6, 1950, regarding the continuation of assistance to the Government of China under Section 404(b), Public Law 472. It is noted that you have advised the appropriate agencies of the Department of Defense that assistance under this legislation may be continued "on those orders currently in the process of procurement or delivery as of 14 April" (exceptions being made in the case of jet aircraft and medium and heavy tanks).

In responding to your request for recommendations regarding further military assistance to China, it was the understanding of the Department of State that all funds on deposit with the Departments of the Army, Navy, and Air Force under the $125 million grants had been definitely and finally committed by Chinese Government requisitions. The Department of State recommended in its letter of April 14 that the material on these requisitions be procured and shipped in order to exhaust the balances on deposit under the $125 million grants.

It was not the Department's view, however, that a deadline should be established for the submission of requisitions by the Chinese Government under the $125 million grants, with the Departments of the Army, Navy, and Air Force refusing to honor new Chinese Government requests.

It is the opinion of the Department of State that assistance by the Departments of the Army, Navy, and Air Force under section 404(b) of Public Law 472 should be continued until all funds allocated to those Departments from the $125 million grants have been exhausted, including not only orders under procurement or delivery as of April 14 but also any subsequent requisitions which the Chinese may submit while these funds remain available.[1]

Sincerely yours, DEAN ACHESON

[1] Under date of June 8, Mr. Johnson sent the following reply to Secretary of State Acheson:

"In furtherance to your memorandum dated 1 June 1950 on the subject of military assistance to the Chinese Nationalist Government, under Public Law 472, I have advised the appropriate agencies within the Department of Defense that the provision of military assistance to the Chinese should be in accordance with the following:

'Assistance to the Chinese Nationalist Government, under Public Law 472, should be continued, except for jet aircraft and medium and heavy tanks, until all funds allocated to the Department of Defense from the $125 million grants have been exhausted, including not only orders under procurement or delivery as of 14 April, but also any subsequent requisitions which the Chinese may submit while these funds remain available.'" Memorandum by Mr. Charlton Ogburn of the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] June 2, 1950.

REMARKS ON THE SITUATION IN CHINA BY CONSUL GENERAL MCCONAUGHY AT THE INTER-DEPARTMENTAL MEETING ON THE FAR EAST

THURSDAY, JUNE 1, 1950, 11:30 A. M., ROOM 5106 NEW STATE [1]

Mr. McConaughy began by expressing the feeling that no one can be dogmatic about the situation in Shanghai. No easy formula for a solution to the problems the Chinese Communists have presented us with can be offered and all proposals for pat solutions must be regarded with reserve. The Chinese Communists themselves present many baffling contradictions. On the whole their record is exceedingly bad from our point of view. There are, however, some signs that they are not ready for a complete break with us. At times they could have taken more extreme actions against us than they did. Some of their actions could even be considered semi-conciliatory. For example, there was the recent release of the three American fliers, Smith, Bender, and McGovern. No explanation could be offered for their having done so. Moreover, after long delays the Chinese Communists did finally allow the departure of American officials.[2] Previously they had allowed the Consulate General to keep its radio in operation for ten months although preventing the dispatch of air mail pouches. In these actions the influence of moderate elements in the party could perhaps be detected. Unfortunately, these elements are apparently being eclipsed as Soviet influence in China grows. Three thousand Russians had arrived in Shanghai by the time the Consulate General closed in April. Despite the increasing power of the pro-Moscow faction in the party, some American businessmen had recently been released. It may be that these inconsistencies in Chinese Communist policy are designed to confuse us. In any case it would seem that the Peiping regime is not yet ready to deport all Americans or to attempt to eradicate all American influence. Meanwhile we should try to strengthen the position of American missionaries and businessmen in China. It is to be hoped that we shall not have to withdraw entirely from the country.

Mr. McConaughy explained that there were a number of points he wished to cover and that he would present them individually.

1. The Chinese Communists are acutely sensitive to foreign criticism. This was manifest in their reaction to the broadcasts of the Voice of America for example. Minor inaccuracies in these broadcasts were invariably picked up by them. They tended to admit to the main charges brought against them in the broadcasts but resented small errors and blamed the Consulate General for them. In accordance with the new nationalism the Chinese must always be regarded as right. There was, for example, the case of an English teacher accused of reprimanding a Chinese student for spitting on the floor; those charged with investigating the incident determined that a Chinese could not be guilty of this fault and found that the English teacher herself had been drooling at the time of the alleged occurrence.

2. The Chinese Communists show an exceptionally strong interest in Southeast Asia. In their evident intention to exert domination in the area they are doubtless egged on by the Soviets. Hong Kong, northern Indochina and Burma are all objects of Chinese irredentism. Their propaganda, however, is aimed at the whole area. They clearly hope to use the Chinese merchants in the various Southeast Asian countries as instruments of their policy, apparently believing that they can win over the merchants despite their bourgeois background. From Shanghai it appeared that there had been some response. The merchants were of course influenced by family motives in their willingness to cooperate with the Chinese Communist regime. Regardless of the character of the government in China, remittances by overseas Chinese would continue to be made to dependents at home. Moreover, the overseas Chinese tend to feel that for the first time there is a regime in China which, whatever its shortcomings, can command respect and assert itself.

[2] All United States diplomatic and consular posts in the People's Republic of China had been closed by April 1950, and official United States personnel had departed that country in late April and early May. (See the Department of State Bulletin, May 15, 1950, p. 755.)

3. In trade the trend in Communist China is toward monopoly. The Chinese Communists evidently intend to monopolize exports first, then imports. Tung and other vegetable oils, bristles, tea, and tungsten are exports which have so far been brought under government control. This control is exercised to reduce the margin of profit to the point at which business is discouraged and foreign exporters are being frozen out. The trend is not one that we can easily oppose by countermeasures. Imports from China can hardly be embargoed on the grounds of their being subject to government monopoly, but perhaps we could take action based upon the deterioration of the quality of these imports. Certainly the quality of bristles being exported from China has deteriorated. With regard to imports into China, the Chinese Communists are setting up companies to act as official purchasing agents, possibly having in mind the institution of overseas purchasing agents on the pattern of Amtorg. They explicitly wish to eliminate the middleman as a needless expense.

4. Reports of deviationism among the Chinese Communists on the Titoist model should be discounted. No break between Peiping and Moscow is in the offing. There is, however some pulling and hauling below the surface among Chinese officials. For instance, there has been some friction between General Chen Yi and the Political Commissar in the Shanghai area. The question has frequently arisen as to whether Chen Yi might not split off from Peiping and take east China with him. However, while Chen Yi is not as extreme in his views as the Moscow clique, he knows what side his bread is buttered on. He may well be in charge of the campaign against Formosa, a successful outcome of which would enable him to consolidate his position and come to a satisfactory adjustment with Peiping. In any event, the monolithic structure of the party is likely to continue. There is no longer any catering to the minority parties such as the Democratic League and the Kuomintang Revolutionary Committee. These have now been incorporated into the Chinese Communist Party and their leaders have been forced to sign anti-American manifestos.

5. Self-examination, as it is called, is encouraged among the Chinese Communists. While the top officials are of course immune to criticism, middle-rank officials are often attacked in the press and reprimanded or cashiered. The tendency may be to increase the efficiency of the regime. The possibility of the regime's bogging down in bureaucracy is a counter-tendency. As an example of the proliferation of bureaucratic controls Mr. McConaughy's own exit permit received the chops of 30 officers in the course of its validation. Although Chinese Communist officials work long hours ungrudgingly for little pay (those inherited from the Kuomintang being less enthusiastic), the bureaucracy already puts a heavy financial burden on the country.

6. The position the intellectuals have taken towards the Chinese Communists is very disappointing. The majority, while perhaps favorable to Marxist theory, are still opposed to Stalinism but make no attempt to use their influence—for example in the schools—to oppose the drift of the regime. They are in fact supine. A minority actively supports the regime and is abetting the takeover of schools by the government. Obviously in some cases self-advancement is a motive. Many of the students who have returned from the United States have defected to the Communists and have become enemies of ours, voicing a real hatred of the United States. Many factors are doubtless involved in their attitude. Among them is probably a deep racial feeling. Some of the Chinese students have perhaps received real or fancied slights while here and been subject to discrimination. Many were perhaps already fellow travelers. However, it is only a minority of the returned students who are virulently hostile toward us. The Chinese Communists readily accept returned students and feel capable through the extensive indoctrination given all classes of winning them over.

7. The decision for us to retain our representation in China for as long as we did was a wise one. As a result we were able to obtain an insight into the structure and objectives of the Peiping regime and the character of individual officials. We were also able to accomplish something in the protection of American citizens. However, the decision to withdraw our officials in April was also a correct one. The situation had become impossible. With Soviet instigation, anti-American acts could certainly be expected to increase. Moreover, with the silencing of its radio our Consulate General in Shanghai was virtually incommunicado and could perform no other useful service.

8. Our missionaries feel that they can hold out in China, their prospects being better than those of foreign businessmen. There is in fact no evidence that the Chinese Communists mean to eradicate religion. On the contrary they profess sympathy for religious freedom. In line with their policy of encouraging the Moslems in the western part of the country and of winning over the Tibetans, they are stressing religious toleration. There have been only scattered instances of mistreatment of missionaries. On the other hand, large churches in Shanghai are now packed during services, very likely as a concomitant of oppression and a sense of crisis. However the new nationalism of the Chinese must be considered, and Chinese pastors in the Christian churches will doubtless have to be pushed to the forefront. It is important for us that the Christian missions remain in China as an evidence of our continuing interest in the country. There is some considerable chance that they may be able to remain owing to the value the Communists attach to the remittances received by the churches and the hospital work and training they conduct.

9. Of the 3,000 Soviets who had arrived in the Shanghai area by April about half were military, consisting for the most part of air force personnel, including the crews and technicians requisite to ground installations. Of the civilians, most were technicians in the fields of engineering, public health, etc. Soviet influence tends to be clandestine. The Russians obviously wish to avoid the limelight. Their quarters are cordoned off from the Chinese public. They avoid a patronizing attitude and evidently wish to be considered as big brothers of the Chinese.

10. Famine in east central and northern China is serious as a result of floods, drought and heavy requisitions of grain by the government. An estimate of the numbers who actually face starvation is, however, impossible to make. Shanghai has suffered an influx of victims of the famine. Those who are able-bodied are put into the work corps while the aged and infirm beg on the streets. With regard to the possibility of relief from the outside, it is obvious that the Chinese Communists will not permit us to provide relief on terms which would possibly be acceptable to us. They have made clear that foodstuffs even if imported for famine relief must pay the usual tax and that foreigners will be allowed no say-so whatsoever with regard to the distribution of such foodstuffs. The summary seizure by the Chinese Communists in March of $17 million worth of ECA supplies which were to have been used in bona fide relief affords an illustration of the Chinese Communist attitude.

In response to a question as to whether a break between Peiping and Moscow or the overthrow of the Peiping regime by internal forces was the more likely to take place, Mr. McConaughy stated that he considered both possibilities highly unlikely. Recently the Chinese Communist ties with the USSR have been strengthened while their regime has continued to consolidate its power in China. In response to a question as to what criteria should govern the Department's decisions with respect to applications by persons seeking passports to China, Mr. McConaughy stated that he believed we should issue such passports when the applicant proved to have a realistic knowledge of the situation in China and to possess emotional stability.

In response to a question as to how many Americans remain in the Shanghai area, Mr. McConaughy estimated the number as 300, of whom the majority are missionaries.

In response to a question as to whether the Chinese Communists had been successful in stemming inflation, Mr. McConaughy noted that the exchange rate of their currency in Shanghai had initially been 1600 to the dollar, had risen to 42,000 to the dollar, but had now been brought down to 36,000 to the dollar. He added that the Communists believing inflation to have been a major cause of the downfall of the Nationalists, were making extreme efforts to control inflationary trends and that in this endeavor they had the assistance of well-qualified financial experts, both from the Communist and Nationalist camps.

In opinion of members of my staff best acquainted with FLR activities, there has been almost no activity on part of its leaders for three to four months, and they constitute no threat to Chinese Government. Leaders have recently been considering cooperation with Government against Communists.

Request Department advise urgently whether it is in order for me to make representations to Chinese Government on case and if so general tenor of approach. "The survivors are expected at Lhasa (?) within one week and Tibetan Government will take every care of them there and on journey to India which they are perhaps better able to do than persons without experience of Tibetan conditions. There have been many baseless allegations by Communists of foreign especially American designs on Tibet and as Tibetan Government are now arranging talks with Chinese Government they are particularly anxious to avoid possibility of further such allegations which proposed visit (?) would inevitably cause. Therefore our party would either meet them en route and never reach Lhasa or they would be held in Lhasa awaiting our party. For following reasons we are inclined believe we should not insist that our party enter Tibet:

877. Source inside Chinese Government recently made remarks on following subjects during long private conversation:

Chinmen Island. Recent Communist shelling destroyed facilities where supplies and troops landed and debarked. Resupply of food hampered and if it were necessary evacuation could not be carried out for estimated 20 days until wharf built. Do not expect Communists attack Chinmen. Although government will withdraw troops eventually, no hurry to do so because lack billets Taiwan (comment: Communist gunfire may interdict beach use for landing supplies from LST and thus necessitate construction wharf outside gun range).

Ground forces. Now total 410,000 on Taiwan and Chinmen. Some 26,000 able bodied males from civilians on Chusans were brought back Taiwan and enlisted in armed forces. Source believes they will be no military value at time needed. Taiwan defenses planned consists of four lines, one on beach, one between beach and railway line, one based along railway lines, and fourth in foothills. Only first two lines will be completed. Final stage will be retreat into mountains and carrying on warfare from there.

Communists. Buying laid-up vessels Hong Kong and Singapore. Using various methods economic warfare against Nationalists such as depressing Hong Kong gold market. reducing price salt.

Nationalist soldiers. Will probably prove willing fight because are convinced mainland holds no living for them now and all information from their homes tells them stay here.

Chen Cheng. Submission of resignation [1] not due proposal increase power of Sun Li-jen (which source says Gimo will never agree to) but result of furor created by failure of SOS general in Chusans (a Chen Cheng man) to bring out military supplies and equipment; he gave precedence to commercial cargo which he and many associates (also Chen Cheng men) were trading to and buying from mainland on grand scale. Sun Li-jen central figure in this discrediting of Chen because Chusan forces accountable to him for much of equipment and supplies left behind and he is demanding they be made good to him or he has inadequate material for Taiwan defense. One of major reasons for recent drop in rice price was loss of Chusans which ended easy means trading rice to mainland.

Gimo. Recently more bitter than ever against US. As is always case when he is in tight spot and things going badly he shouts over telephone and at visitors, and slams objects about his office. Chang Chun is also bitter against US but on other hand states Chinese Government not doing well at all. He is no longer "in the know" on all inner affairs though he spends considerable time with Gimo. This has affected his normal balanced humor because he constantly has to cover up his ignorance of what is going on.

Gold reserves. Now being spent at rate $95,000 monthly. Official reports say about $600,000 left (apart from reserve for currency). Private information corroborates this information. Hopeful of reducing to $70,000 outlay monthly.

Hainan. Debacle caused by leak in Taipei. One division of 32nd Army placed to prevent interior Communists attack Haikow or Hsueh Yueh's [2] rear. When Gimo ordered Hainan evacuation, Hsueh in conference with Chen Chi-tang [3] and Yuhan-mou [4] decided attack Communist landing force with all reserves, which in part were brought up from south by air. Few hours before attack due, CAF scout plane reported could not find the division of 32nd Army containing interior Communists. More planes sent out but could not find this division. While Hsueh still debating what to do, interior Communists sortied from lairs, threatened Haikow and Nationalist rear and forced cancellation attack plans. Division never seen again; believed started march for Yulin, surrounded by Communists and cleaned up to last man. Later investigation revealed Chief of Staff of 32nd Army learned

2. Accompanied by Steere, Gilmore [1] and Forman [2] I received them in chancery and we talked for approximately one and one-half hours. Both sides emphasized fact that conversation was on personal basis and no one was speaking for his government.

3. After usual exchange of greetings and small talk we asked re their plans. They said they wished go Hong Kong to discuss future relationship Tibet with representatives Peiping Government who were to meet them there. Unfortunately although their travel documents were in order they were not permitted to leave because according to UK High Commissioner, UK could not afford recognize Tibetan passport. (Comment: Apparently GOI prevented departure at UK request.) They had talked with UK High Commissioner June 7 and had asked him if UK attitude meant that UK recognized Tibet as under Chinese suzerainty and UK High Commissioner denied that such was significance of UK attitude. Final answer had not yet been received from UK re permission proceed.

4. They asked for our personal advice whether they should negotiate in Delhi, Hong Kong or Peiping. After considerable circumlocution we ventured suggest that Delhi might be most advantageous place for negotiations if agreeable Peiping Government since atmosphere of Delhi probably more friendly to them than that of Peiping or Hong Kong and communication with Lhasa easier.

5. They expressed some doubt re friendliness UK and GOI—of UK primarily because of reluctance to recognize Tibetan passports and of GOI because of Nehru's announcement several months ago that GOI recognized Chinese suzerainty over Tibet. GOI they said seemed prepared hand Tibet over to Chinese.

[1] Eugene A. Gilmore, First Secretary in the Embassy in New Delhi.
[2] Douglas N. Forman, Second Secretary in the Embassy in New Delhi.

6. We pointed out that such interpretation of Nehru's statement may not be accurate; that recognition of Chinese suzerainty did not necessarily mean India was agreeable to loss by Tibet of its autonomy and of Tibet being incorporated in a centralized Communist Chinese state.

7. They emphasized fact of Tibet's difficult position and asked us to describe it to US Government especially its long practically undefended frontier with China, limited defense forces and small amount of military supplies. They hoped through negotiations with Chinese Communists to maintain their freedom but if negotiations failed they expected invasion and without foreign help saw little chance of preserving their freedom.

8. Peiping over radio had offered Tibet autonomy but Tibet did not want autonomy; they wanted to stay as they were. We indicated concept autonomy to a Communist state might not be same as autonomy to states with other forms of government. They apparently seemed aware that if Chinese Communists could get their foot into door in Tibet they would eventually gain full control of country.

9. We explained to them reasons which prompted us to inform Lhasa several months ago that it would be inadvisable for Tibet mission to proceed US in present circumstances and they said they recognized that they had made effort to form closer ties with US too late. They said however they felt confident that in the end they could rely on American friendship and they hinted, although they did not say so openly, that they might approach US again.

10. We described Mackiernan affair to them and they said they had not heard previously of it. They expressed deep regret and asked if they could be of assistance. We replied that in our opinion Tibetan Government was doing everything possible.

11. We asked if they were still interested in obtaining high powered radio for Lhasa (Embdesp 274 February 3)[3] pointing out that certain types radio might require an American technician to install. They said they thought their government was still interested but gave no direct reply re technician. Impression was that they would communicate again with their government in this matter. We made clear that thus far our government had made no decision in this regard.

12. At conclusion conversation they said they were particularly concerned at delay of negotiations because of telegram received from Lhasa to effect that Chinese Communists have made incursions Tibet's eastern borders and captured several villages in one of which was mobile radio unit (Embtel 808, June 5).[3]

Memorandum by the Acting Deputy Director of the Office of Chinese Affairs (Freeman) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] June 14, 1950.

Subject: Request by Chinese Government to purchase napalm bombs with money refunded under $125 million grants.

Attached is a memorandum of conversation [1] between Mr. Johnson of CA and Dr. Wang of the Chinese Embassy, in which Dr. Wang indicates that the Chinese Government desires to purchase napalm bombs and other incendiaries with the refunds now becoming available on OFLC–Chinese Government contracts financed under the $125 million grants.

CA has informed Dr. Wang in response to his query that requests for the expenditure of these refunds should be submitted to the Department in the form originally prescribed under the $125 million grants.

There remains, however, the basic question regarding the desirability of allowing the Chinese to obtain incendiary bombs from the United States Government. When the request for this matériel was originally submitted, in a memorandum dated November 7 [3], 1949,[2] the Department referred it to the Department of Defense indicating that we had no objection to the issuance of the matériel providing the Chinese paid for it with their own funds and shipped it commercially. No procurement action was taken in the Department of Defense because the Department of State subsequently expressed the view that the President's January 5 statement on Taiwan precluded Chinese purchases for cash from Defense stocks. In February the Chinese resubmitted the request in the form of a requisition to Air Force under the $125 million grants, and Air Force indicated that the matériel could be made available. Again, however, no procurement action was taken, because it was ascertained that all funds allocated to Air Force under the $125 million grants had been exhausted. The Chinese are now requesting that the refunded China Aid Act money plus China Aid Act funds remaining in their special account at Riggs Bank be transferred to the Air Force for this purpose. Air Force has indicated informally to CA that the matériel is presently in stock and that it has no objection to complying with the Chinese Government's request.

CA would appreciate your views as to whether the Department should adhere to the substance of its original recommendation and pass along the Chinese request without objection. Questions have been raised from time to time as to the desirability, on psychological as well as strategic grounds, of supplying incendiary bombs to the Chinese Government. While these bombs are essentially an anti-personnel weapon not designed for large-scale destruction of urban areas, they might possibly provide the Chinese Communists with a dangerous weapon for use in attacks on Hong Kong and elsewhere in Southeast Asia. It has also been suggested that the Department take into consideration the adverse psychological and propaganda effect which might result from the use by the Chinese Government of anti-personnel "horror weapons" provided by the United States. On the other hand, the United States has in the past furnished bombs of other types to the Chinese Government; and it has been the Government's policy not to interfere with the desires of the Chinese in disposing of the $125 million grants as long as the Department of Defense was willing and able to make requested matériel available.[3]

[3] On the source text, the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Merchant) wrote a brief comment to Mr. Rusk which read as follows: "Despite the nature of the bomb & the risk it might later be used against Hong Kong or in SEA, I think we should place no obstacle in path of Chinese procurement as desired." Mr. Rusk wrote that he had no objection.

[1] A copy of the Department's paper which was given to Mr. Graves of the British Embassy by Mr. Freeman of the Office of Chinese Affairs is attached to the memorandum of their conversation in file 793B.00/6–1650. The paper stated that Tibet under Chinese control might offer a base for the extension of Communist penetration and subversive activities into Nepal and Bhutan and, eventually, India. Although probably Communist China had the strength to conquer Tibet, comparatively little covert assistance in the form of specialized military instruction and supplies to the Tibetans might make a Chinese military expedition prohibitively costly, particularly if the Western States manifested no extraordinary interest in attempting to alter Tibet's international status.

The concluding paragraph of the Department's paper read as follows:

"By reason of its traditional interest in Tibet and its special relationship with India, the British Government obviously is in a better position than is the United States Government to appraise Tibetan needs, to ascertain the extent of Indian help and to exert influence upon the Government of India to assume responsibility for any necessary action respecting Tibet. In the opinion of the United States Government, however, it would be undesirable, because of Indian sensibilities, for British representatives to refer to any exchanges of views between the British and United States Governments regarding Tibet in discussions which they may have with the Government of India."

set forth position paper this subj prepared for FonMins mtg last month.[2] Brit Emb will transmit outline FonOff for study and comment. Meanwhile rep expressed pessimism personally that Brit Gov wld be willing assume any special responsibility vis-à-vis Indian Gov or even approach GOI respecting Tibet. 605. From Dulles. General MacArthur has given Secretary Johnson and me copies of a memorandum on Formosa dated June 14, 1950,[1] in which he traces the strategic importance of Formosa as well as its importance as a political area to western ideology. He states, "There can be no doubt but that the eventual fate of Formosa rests with the US". His memorandum concludes with the following:

"Formosa has not yet fallen to Communist domination. There are conflicting reports as to the capability and will of the Chinese Nationalist forces as now constituted and equipped to prevent either the military or political conquest of the Island of Formosa. I cannot predict what the cost may be of preventing Communist domination of that island, although I have advised the Joint Chiefs of Staff what the cost may be if such an event transpires. I am satisfied, however, that the domination of Formosa by an unfriendly power would be a disaster of utmost importance to the US, and I am convinced that time is of the essence. I strongly believe that the Commander-in-Chief Far East should be authorized and directed to initiate without delay a survey of the military, economic and political requirements to prevent the domination of Formosa by a Communist power and that the results of such a survey be analyzed and acted upon as a basis for US national policy with respect to Formosa."

In consequence of my discussion with MacArthur concerning this memorandum and his views on the subject, it was apparent to me that MacArthur himself stands ready to undertake the recommended survey. 21. 1. At request Bajpai SYG MEA I called on him noon today. He showed me telegram just received from Pannikar Indian Ambassador to China, main points of which were as follows:

a. Condemnation by Communist Chinese Government of US for latter's recent activities re Formosa and branding of US as aggressor against China should not be dismissed as mere propaganda.[1] Underlying purpose was to enable China, if it so desired, to call on Russia for assistance under terms recent Sino-Soviet treaty in which Russia promised assist China in case latter was victim aggression.

b. Hundreds of telegrams from individuals and organizations were being received by Communist Chinese Government pledging support and condemning US for aggression against China. There seemed to be rising feeling in China that US was using Korea merely as pretext to strengthen armed forces in Far East which would eventually be used to assist Nationalist China against Communists.

c. In Pannikar's opinion GOI should redouble efforts get Communist China into SC so that Russia also could return. Unless SC could begin functioning with Russia and Communist China participating, world might well be drifting to third great war. One hopeful aspect was that Peiping showed tendency differentiate between problem of Korea and that of Formosa. In his opinion Peiping did not wish to become involved in Korean fighting. Its attitude toward Formosa, however, indicated firmness and determination.

2. Bajpai said that although certain allowances must be made for atmosphere in which Pannikar was working, nevertheless he considered that points made in telegram had much force and should not be ignored. He sincerely hoped that in not too distant future Russia and Communist China would be in SC.

3. I said I was wondering what practical benefit would accrue from presence of Russia and Communist China in SC at this stage. It seemed to me they would both be likely adopt SC attitude similar to that which they were taking outside SC. So long as they adhered to their present positions their mere physical presence in SC would not necessarily lessen danger of war. If they were admitted into SC their first move I supposed would be to denounce all actions taken during their absence by SC as invalid and their second move would be to present resolution condemning US for aggression against China. Making of such moves might give rise to considerable bickering and confusion but I doubted they would accomplish anything constructive.

4. Bajpai said there was always possibility that if Russia and Communist China were represented in SC way would be clear for private conversations outside of SC which might solve problem both of Korea and Formosa. He referred to settling of Berlin dispute as example. Another advantage their presence would be that it could no longer be said SC had degenerated into organization composed of group of nations revolving around US and other western powers.

MacArthur advised Ho as follows:

(a) He fully concurs with Washington view that defense of Taiwan should not be weakened at present.

On July 7, Mr. Rusk addressed a letter to Major General Burns on the question of coordination of United States and Chinese plans for the defense of Formosa, the last paragraph of which reads:

"Some question has been raised as to whether General MacArthur should not himself conduct an overall political, economic and military survey of Formosa as a basis for recommendations to this Government on general policy toward Formosa. We understand a proposal along this line was made by General MacArthur to the Secretary of Defense during the latter's visit to Tokyo. We have assumed that if the Secretary of Defense wishes to raise this more comprehensive proposal, that he would do so by discussions with the Department of State or in the National Security Council. In any event, the Aide-Mémoire to the Chinese Government on the use of Chinese forces in Korea was not intended by us as approval of the broader proposal which has not been officially brought to our attention." "1. In view of the continuous and increasing milit movement along the coast of the mainland of China apparently in preparation for invasion of Formosa, the Chi milit command deems it imperative that air and naval reconnaissance shld be continued. Strict orders, however, have been issued not to take any other action.

2. The Chi milit command in Taiwan considers it highly desirable to set up a system of direct communication with the 7th Fleet of the US for the purpose of exchanging info directly and ensuring the quickest possible communication. The Chi Govt, therefore, recommends that the 7th Fleet set up its own system of communication in Taiwan and possibly also assign a ship to be stationed at Keelung for facilitating such purpose.

3. The Chi Navy will continue to exercise the right of visit and search on ships flying the flag of the Republic of China or the Chi Commie flag in territorial waters of China or on the high seas in order prevent Chi ships from carying milit supplies to Commie-held ports.

4. Chi Govt will appreciate it if US Govt wld see its way to make appropriate representations to Brit Govt with a view to preventing milit supplies from being shipped from Hong Kong to Commie-held ports.

5. Chi Govt wishes to call attn of US Govt again to fact that Chi Govt is at present maintaining positions on a nr of islands such as Lintin and Lema Islands off Canton, Kinmen Island off Amoy, Matsu Island off Foochow, Tachen Islands off Chekiang Province, etc. These island positions, together with those on the Pescadores, form part of the defense of Taiwan. They are guarded by considerable nr of ground troops with the support of air and naval forces. The Ambassador in India (Henderson) to the Secretary of State

SECRET NIACT NEW DELHI, July 9, 1950— 3 p. m.

47. 1. At request Bajpai, SYG MEA, I called on him July 9. He read aloud excerpts from telegram just received from Pannikar, Indian Ambassador to China. Following is summary of excerpts as I recall them:

(a) Pannikar had been given for delivery to GOI copy of Chou En-lai's message to SC accusing US of aggression re Formosa.[1] He was of opinion that this message had been sent (1) in order clearly to separate developments in Korea from US action re Formosa and (2) to place SC in unfavorable light in world opinion since SC would be sure to reject Communist China complaint.

(b) He now had impression that Communist China was preparing for attack on Formosa in immediate future even though such attack would involve war with US.

(c) In his opinion problem of Formosa represented most dangerous world war threat. China by invoking Sino-Russian treaty could demand Soviet assistance against US.

(d) At dinner on preceding evening in Soviet Embassy Soviet Ambassador[2] had toasted to early liberation of Formosa.

(e) Soviet Ambassador had told Pannikar that neutral attitude and indifference of most Asian powers towards events in Korea had practically isolated US in its attack on Koreans.

2. Bajpai said GOI was deeply disturbed at prospect of war breaking out between US and Communist China over Formosa and hoped something can be done to avoid it. He read excerpt from telegram just sent to Pannikar asking latter stress to Chinese Communist Government necessity of exercising restraint at this particular time pointing out that lack of restraint migh precipitate world war.

3. Bajpai said he hoped US Government could find some way alleviating strain between US Government and Communist China. War between US and China which Russia now seemed to desire would strengthen Russia vis-à-vis US in Europe and elsewhere. He hoped that for sake of public opinion US could issue public statement on Formosa stressing it had no territorial or other ambitions re this island; that its decision not to permit further fighting to take place between Nationalist forces in Formosa and Chinese Communists on mainland was of only temporary nature and had been prompted merely in order to prevent diversion of efforts halt aggression in Korea, etc.

4. Bajpai said that he wished US would be able issue some encouraging statements re fighting in Korea. Practically all news from Korea seemed to be of discouraging nature and was having considerable effect on Indian public. Information to press explaining current difficulties and expressing confidence in future would be helpful.

5. I agreed with Bajpai's statements set forth in (4) above. Among many Asians success is more effective argument than logic and there is danger that unless some reassurance can be given from high US

34. For Department use only. No distribution. Call on Generalissimo July 8 was pleasant, lasting 75 minutes. Present also were Mme. Chiang, Admiral Kwei and Ho Shih-li. Shen Chang-huang interpreted.

Generalissimo showed real pleasure at Admiral Struble's presence in Formosa [1] and in my call. Was interested in Korean developments and in strength of Seventh Fleet in Formosa area.

Discussed briefly question of liaison and stated had ordered Chou Chih-jou and Chinese Navy and CAF give full cooperation (which Chou and Kwei have done). Brought up question of reconnaissance of Chinese Communist coastal areas and was assured by Admiral Struble that such reconnaissance essential to defense and not objected to. Generalissimo warned against surprise air attack on US vessels and predicted that Communists still intended attack, and would have to do so within next 40 days, attack probably at earlier date within this period rather than later; disagree with Admiral Cooke [2] who believed Communists abandoned invasion plans; Communist preparations for attack completed; Chinese Communists would attack even though they knew they could not win. Nationalists had suffered many defeats in past but learned many lessons.

Admiral Struble indicated need and desire return Formosa near future in order firm up liaison details. Generalissimo recalled that he took over Formosa as Allied Commander of Chinese theater pending peace treaty while General MacArthur took over Japan and other areas as SCAP; now Chinese government was here, but he hoped despite this fact Struble would not feel he coming to foreign territory in visiting Formosa. He stated he has special regard for and real friendship with each US naval commander in Far East; admired Navy particularly because they always willing come to help of friends in need.

Call of 40 minutes on Chen Cheng passed in exchange of pleasantries only.

106. Kapur at Indian Embassy showed Embassy officer July 11 top secret telegram for Indian Ambassador Peiping dated July 10 which refers to intensity Chinese Communist feeling about Formosa and expresses opinion that prolongation hostilities Korea make it more certain than ever "that Chinese Communists will move against Formosa soon". Chou En-Lai's message to Trygve Lie analyzed as arising from Peiping's desire clearly demarcate between Korean and Formosan issues since US step re latter not covered by SC Resolutions. Reference also made to remarks of Soviet Ambassador Peiping who reportedly said Soviets did not desire "widen conflict" and that calmness Soviet people plus neutral attitude Asian nations re Korea may give pause "US desire broaden conflict". On other hand Soviet Ambassador said to have given toast to "early liberation of Taiwan", Kapur used this cable as basis for elucidation now familiar Indian line that US should throw Formosa question into UN before Chinese Communists attack and should also not stand in way of Chinese Communist membership UN. "On Korea you have clear-cut moral case; on Formosa you will not have support world opinion unless you take suggested actions now". He insisted that British position on Chinese Communist membership UN same as GOI's despite Embassy officer's statement that British agree with US that this is not time push that matter. He emphasized feeling of responsibility GOI that as result its unique position Peiping and said he wished we had representative there who could corroborate Pannikar's information. He noted that latter had made no reference in latest cable to Radhakrihshnan's [1] suggestion that Pannikar use his influence restrain Chinese Communists. "Once Chinese Communists take up arms against US forces guarding Formosa, chance of weaning Mao away from Kremlin forever lost".

Re Indian motion that settlement could be reached by obtaining commitments from Soviets and Chinese Communists that they would support SC action restore status quo ante Korea and then bringing Chinese Communists into UN (and thereby ending Soviet boycott), Kapur said that GOI had "something in writing" from Chinese Communists indicating their support this formula.[2]

Tibet which Embassy previously has reported, and that GOI would object to any initiative by another power, particularly the US to extend military aid to Tibet.

2. Embassy's information obtained from UK High Commissioner is that GOI has delivered all weapons (but no more) heretofore asked by Tibetans (Embtel 301, March 8) and that latter were satisfied. We were also told that Indian military training group at Gyangtse had been strengthened.

3. On the other hand, we believe GOI might find it difficult to refuse if Tibetans themselves should request GOI (as suggested in your paragraph 2–f) to allow them to procure in India or abroad additional supplies and equipment they may require to reinforce Tibet's defense. GOI might well have reservations on amounts of such "purchases" but might be prepared to agree to some negotiated figures if convinced Tibetans were ready to take risks of resistance and could defend country with effectiveness.

4. Embassy favors approach to Tibetan delegation as suggested in Department's reference telegram but believes it should take form, under reference to their approach to Embassy (Embtel 887, June 18),[2] of statement we had informed our government of Tibetan inquiry re US aid, and were now in position to tell delegation that US Government had given matter careful consideration and was prepared in principle to give assistance; and that Embassy had instructions to obtain particulars re specific needs and to discuss methods and routes of delivery, et cetera. We believe that early steps should be taken in order that Tibetans might have opportunity to consult Lhasa in advance of any discussion which they might have with Chinese representatives in India now that latter have arrived in New Delhi. We consider it would be essential in approaching Tibetans that we be in position to give definite assurance re US readiness to assist, particularly in financing such material (your paragraph 2–g). We also believe that Department should seek and obtain British support at highest levels for such an approach to Tibetans, as well as their agreement not to inform GOI about matter. Embassy's thought is that if Tibetans request and press GOI for increased aid that matter might be handled or could be developed in such a way as to cause GOI to enter into some form of cooperation.

Wu did not wish discuss matter further but said longest sentence was 12 years and others down to 4 or 5 years, with proviso for earlier release if behavior good. Said that he had advocated this against opposition.

Mistaking purpose of summary, Wu said he strongly advised that no such communication be sent to Chinese Government, that it was all right to give it to him but if sent to government there would certainly be misunderstanding in higher circles. He told me to tell the State Department not to send such a note to Foreign Office. I said that not intended send note, that summary intended merely for his personal information. Entire matter ended there without clarification on question of charges trial, conditions of detention, etc.

From his manner, almost of hostility, it was apparent Wu thought US "interest" had already gone far enough and caused him enough trouble, and that Generalissimo was incensed at signs of US "interference" in matter. In my opinion attitude stems from deep uncertainty over US intentions toward Generalissimo and Chinese Government, fear Formosans have gained ear of US, and feeling that Chinese Government must show Formosans who is boss.

At this stage, further approach on this matter alone might do more harm than good, unless strong position taken.[1]

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In its aide-mémoire of 7 July to the Department of State,[1] a copy of which has been made available to the Department of Defense, the Chinese Nationalist Government has expressed its concern over the military status of certain islands now under its control near the mainland of China. The Chinese Nationalist Government has stated that it is maintaining its position "in Lintin and the Lema Islands off Canton, in the Island of Kinmen off Amoy, in the Island of Matsu off Foochow and in the Tachen Islands off Chekiang Province", and requested the views of the U.S. Government regarding the defense of these Islands. The problem, from the military point of view, is whether these Islands should be incorporated into the area of U.S. defense responsibility as set forth in the President's statement and what action, if any, the United States should take if the Nationalist Government utilizes these Islands to launch attacks against Communist-held areas.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff have studied this problem and have sub-

"The Joint Chiefs of Staff do not consider that United States forces should be committed to the defense of these islands and recommend that the Chinese Nationalist Government be informed that such islands are not included in the area of United States responsibility as set forth in the President's statement of 27 June 1950. Further, they consider that action in defense of these islands is a matter which rests with the Chinese Nationalist Government, and, finally, that offensive action directed against the mainland from these islands may not be supported in combat by military forces based on Formosa or the Pescadores. However, the U.S. Government should not prevent the Nationalists from defending these islands and should not stand in the way of the Nationalists supporting such operations from Formosa."

Memorandum by the Counselor (Kennan) to the Secretary of State

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] July 17, 1950.

I am writing this to express my concern that the position of this Department with respect to the defense of Formosa should be fully clear to the President and the Defense Establishment at this time.

We have an intelligence analysis of July 14 (DIC 138)[1] which gives a disturbing picture of Chinese capabilities, of the inadequate state of our own reconnaissance and of the continued insistence of Chiang on disposing his armed forces with a view to his own political interests rather than the best interests of the defense of the island.

A Communist conquest of Formosa, either by political or military means or both, coming in the wake of the President's statement, would be gravely damaging to our political position not only in Asia but possibly throughout the world. I believe that it would be comparable in its effects to a complete military defeat in Korea.

Should there be political defection to the Communists on the island, in the absence of any armed invasion, on such a scale to lead to eventual Communist control, there would be little that we could do about it; and there is little that we can do to prevent it other than to expedite in every way the turn of military fortunes in Korea to our favor.

But with respect to the military invasion of the island, we do have capability of influencing the course of events directly. Here it seems to me that the important thing for us all to bear in mind, including the Defense Establishment, is that we can rely on no one but ourselves. The Nationalist forces on the island must, in view of their national temperament, their past experiences and their unfortunate leadership, be regarded as wholly unreliable. This is not to say that they will not fight; it is only to say that they cannot be depended upon to fight. We should therefore go on the theory that no sizeable Communist forces must be permitted to reach the island in any circumstances, and that it is solely our task to prevent this. The United Nations cannot give us any appreciable assistance in this respect. Our own national prestige is at stake in the most obvious way and no one is going to help us initially with its defense in this area.

I understand that there has been some ambiguity about the reconnaissance function, and a belief in some quarters of the Military Establishment that we in the State Department had barred effective reconnaissance. I urge that steps be taken immediately to clarify this subject and to see that the understanding reached has the President's approval and is plainly and fully recorded.

In summary, the three things which I think this Department must do are the following:

(1) Make sure that the gravity of a possible reverse in Formosa, from the political standpoint, is clearly and adequately stated to the President and the Defense Establishment;
(2) Similarly, make sure that it is understood that we have only ourselves to rely on in the approach to this problem; and
(3) Make sure that there is no misunderstanding about the problem of reconnaissance, or about any other aspect of the military defense of Formosa, which could lead to charges that the State Department had inhibited operations essential to that defense.

The Special Assistant to the Secretary of Defense for Foreign Military Affairs and Assistance (Burns) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

DEAR MR. RUSK: Your letter of 21 June 1950 [1] requests an indication of the views of the Department of Defense regarding action to be taken on the request of the Chinese Government to purchase 25 F–80(B) jet fighters with its own funds and a further request to purchase F–51 aircraft understood to be surplus to United States requirements.

The Secretary of Defense has recommended to the Secretary of State that, in order to increase the capacity and will of the Chinese Nationalist Forces to fight, the Chinese Nationalist Government should be authorized to make purchases, with its own funds, of any matériel under the control of the United States, including tanks and jet aircraft, provided there is no Service objection to these purchases. Delivery and shipment of such purchases should be expedited by United States assistance.

If the Department of State concurs in the above recommendation, the Department of Defense would have no objection, from an operational standpoint, to the granting of an export license to the Chinese Nationalist Government for the F–80(B) aircraft, or selling surplus U.S. aircraft to them. However, production of the F–80(B) aircraft has been discontinued, and it is expected that the entire productive capacity of this plant will be occupied with orders for more modern types to meet the requirements of the United States Air Force. The F–80(B)'s in the current USAF inventory are similarly required.

A telephone conversation with Mr. McAfee of your office, on 14 July, indicates that the Chinese requirement may be for F–84(E) aircraft instead of F–80(B). The situation regarding F–84(E) or any other later model would be the same as stated above.

The F–51 aircraft are no longer surplus to U.S. needs and, therefore, are not available for sale to the Chinese Government at this time.

The overall requirements of the Chinese Nationalist Government for military assistance are now under consideration within the Department of Defense. In the event that this study reveals a priority need for jet aircraft, the Department of Defense will consider the diversion of such aircraft from our own stocks or from production.

Sincerely yours, J. H. BURNS

The Department of Defense has reviewed the above aspects of our position with respect to Formosa and I recommend that, in order to increase the capacity and will of the Chinese Nationalist forces to fight, the Chinese Nationalist Government should be authorized to make purchases, with its own funds, of any matériel under the control of the United States, including tanks and jet aircraft, either in the United States or elsewhere, provided there is no Service objection to these purchases. Delievery and shipment of such purchases should be expedited by United States assistance.

If you concur in the above views, I request you advise me, as a matter of urgency, so that appropriate measures can be taken by the Defense agencies to implement this policy.[1]

99. Deptel 35, July 15.[1] Following are some of more necessary reforms needed in Chinese Government dealings with Formosans:

Fair distribution and collection of taxes and special levies as between mainlanders and Formosans.

While Nationalist Government restricted to Formosa, greater representation in national affairs for Formosans in view of fact they are bearing greatest part of burden.

Admitting right of Formosans to help defend island, and furthering that right.

Means of recourse to Formosans abused by mainlanders.

Elimination of squeeze by predominantly mainland officials, by providing channel for information which will protect informants.

Differentiation between opposition to government measures and pro-Communism.

Elimination of competing secret police groups.

Cleaning up police and judicial systems, with following specific goals: no arrest without cause and only by regular police (not secret police); families to be informed at once of whereabouts and allowed to provide daily necessities without payment of squeeze; prompt declaration of charges against those arrested; public trial within reasonable time by civil court, not military court; defendant to be permitted counsel; sanitary conditions of detention not unusually detrimental to health, no physical tortures; means of recourse by family or employer to gain information or protest conditions without reprisal.

Any effort by US Government to force Chinese Government into foregoing must be made in company with general approach to Chinese Government on wide range of matters relating to Formosa or must be coupled with positive assurance that in protecting Formosan interests we do not intend unseat Chinese Government or challenge its authority here and will encourage Formosans cooperate with Chinese Government. Between July 20 and 24, high-level and wide-ranging Anglo-American discussions were held in Washington by delegations led by Ambassador at Large Philip Jessup and Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Omar Bradley for the United States and British Ambassador Sir Oliver Franks and Lord Tedder, Chairman of the British Joint Services Mission in Washington, for the United Kingdom. The talks, dealing with problems arising from or magnified by the Korean conflict, were exploratory in nature. The text of the Agreed Joint Memorandum resulting from the talks is scheduled for publication in volume III. For extracts of those portions dealing with the Far East, see volume VII, page 462. The Ambassador in the United Kingdom (Douglas) to the Secretary of State

TOP SECRET LONDON, July 24, 1950—1 p. m.

492. Personal for the Secretary from Douglas. On at least two occasions I have indicated the urgency of attempting to reach some common understanding with the British in regard to Formosa. I want again to repeat what seems to me to be an urgent necessity of making this effort as promptly as possible. Please do not misinterpret this to mean that we should alter the position we have taken. What I am suggesting now is a full explanation of the reasons which have influenced us to take the position that we have taken and combined with an agreed position in regard to both our interim and ultimate intensions. As an example of interim intentions Formosa might be placed in the custody of the UN until peace has been restored, security recaptured and the island disposed of under the terms of a peace settlement with Japan. I recognize of course that this presents difficulties vis-à-vis the Nationalist Government and I do not mean to imply that this example of interim intentions is the only, or even the best, way of clarifying our position but I do mean that we should make every effort as soon as possible to arrive at a common understanding with the British.

Let us suppose that the Chinese Communists attack Formosa and that there will have been at that time no common understanding with the UK in regard to Formosa. It is not unlikely that the more conservative elements of the Labor Party would sympathize with our position but would nevertheless, as they have done consistently since they came into power, give hostages to the less conservative elements of the party. They would probably take this action because the ghost of '31 always sits at every council table of the Labor Party and influences it to take no steps which would result in a division of the party. In this case the hostage would be to refrain from supporting the US. Although, generally speaking, the conservative party would vigorously side with the US in regard to Formosa, there are other non-Communist but mushy-minded groups in Britain that would align themselves with the Labor Government. Thus the UK and US might divide on this important question.

So long as British and US do not see eye to eye, it is hopeless even to attempt to persuade India. Failure fully to explain our stand in regard to Formosa with a view to obtaining HMG's agreement and with a view to persuading India, if this is possible, that our position is at least not hostile to her interests would, if the Chinese Communists attack Formosa and we intervene as we should intervene, produce more than a division between the US and the UK. It will probably also produce a division among the remaining free Asiatic peoples of which India is the principal spokesman.

It is not necessary to elaborate on the complications which would thereby be created except to say that under the circumstances recited and enumerated here, the Chinese Communists undoubtedly, having asserted their right of jurisdiction over Formosa would brand intervention by our armed forces as an act of aggression and would try to invoke the assistance of the Kremlin in accordance with a possible interpretation of the recent Sino-Soviet treaty. What the results would be no one can foresee but under the most favorable circumstances they would not be pleasant.

It may be impossible for us to explain our position to HMG and to arrive at a common understanding but I suggest that we should make the effort and make it promptly. If we are successful we might then be able to muster HMG's power of persuasion and the powers of persuasion of the other members of the Commonwealth, individually and separately, to undertake the formidable task of persuading India of the correctness of our position and even, possibly, of their expressing to the Peking Government the serious consequences that would follow an attempted invasion of Formosa.

I am repeating my conviction about the urgency of this matter because there are a great many evidences of a substantial division of opinion in Britain on question of Formosa. London Times published a letter from Crossman,[1] the New Statesman is hammering at the question and every member of the Conservative Party with whom I have discussed subject, while supporting us, believes that it would be very desirable to arrive if possible at some common understanding with the British. Menzies [2] has indicated the need for such an understanding. A substantial group of fuzzy-minded people but nevertheless decent and insofar as I can tell uncontaminated by Communism called on me Friday [3] and raised the question of Formosa. There are other evidences which it is not necessary to make reference to here but altogether they indicate we may be in serious trouble should the Chinese Communists attack Formosa and should there not be an agreed position with the UK.

112. After transmission mytel 111, July 23, Foreign Minister Yeh telephoned me following which he wished substituted for briefer statement in reference telegram:

[Here follows the quoted text of the statement by Foreign Minister Yeh. It indicated that the Chinese Government would continue to abide by its commitment to the United States on suspension of hostile action against the mainland and shipping on the high seas, but wished to call attention to Communist attacks on the island positions since June 27. To abide by the commitment, the Chinese Government had felt compelled to abandon outer Lintin Island. Chinmen Island, which was considered vital to the defense of Taiwan and the Pescadores, had been bombed twice and an invasion fleet was being assembled on the mainland abreast of Chinmen. Since the Seventh Fleet would not defend the island, the Chinese Government might have to use air and naval support in its defense. Even in the event of its abandonment, such support might be required in the withdrawal to avoid exposure of the 70,000 troops there to Communist air and naval attack.]

As personal comment, Yeh added statement that he could assure US Government that no offensive action would be taken against Communists, that despite reports that attack may be imminent, any action taken will be defensive.

It seems certain that Chinese Government intends withdraw from Chinmen inasmuch as its barrage of warnings about dangers to outlying islands has not altered US position. US will no doubt be made complete scapegoat for all lost positions despite fact that they are indefensible except on short-term basis and have mainly nuisance value.

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, 27 July 1950.

Subject: General Policy of the United States Concerning Formosa

1. This memorandum is in response to your memorandum, dated 6 May 1950,[1] concerning military assistance to the Chinese Nationalists and to your memorandum, dated 14 July 1950,[1] dealing with United States policy concerning Formosa.

2. The Joint Chiefs of Staff have made a reexamination of the United States military position with respect to Formosa in the light of the world situation generally and the situation in the Far East specifically and reaffirm their views that:

a. The island of Formosa is strategically important to the United States (memorandum for the Secretary of Defense, dated 17 August 1949) ; [2]

b. The strategic consequences of a Communist Formosa would be seriously detrimental to United States security (memorandum for the Secretary of Defense, dated 24 November 1948) ; [3]

c. Continued successful resistance on the part of the Chinese Nationalists, particularly in the Formosa area, is in the military interests of the United States (memorandum for the Secretary of Defense, dated 2 May 1950) ; [1] and

d. Future circumstances extending to war itself might make overt military action with respect to Formosa advisable from the over-all standpoint of our national security (memoranda for the Secretary of Defense, dated 22 March 1949 [4] and 17 August 1949).

3. In this connection, the Joint Chiefs of Staff have received the following communication from the Commander in Chief, Far East:

[Here follows the text of the Memorandum on Formosa by General MacArthur, dated June 14, 1950, concerning which see telegram 605, June 22, from Tokyo, page 366.]

4. The present United States position with respect to Formosa is contained in the following statement from the announcement by the President on 27 June 1950:

"The attack upon Korea makes it plain beyond all doubt that communism has passed beyond the use of subversion to conquer independent nations and will now use armed invasion and war. It has defied the orders of the Security Council of the United Nations issued to preserve international peace and security. In these circumstances the occupation of Formosa by communist forces would be a direct threat to the security of the Pacific area and to United States forces performing their lawful and necessary functions in that area.

Accordingly, I have ordered the Seventh Fleet to prevent any attack on Formosa. As a corollary to this action I am calling upon the Chinese Government on Formosa to cease all air and sea operations against the mainland. The Seventh Fleet will see that this is done. The determination of the future status of Formosa must await the restoration of security in the Pacific, a peace settlement with Japan, or consideration by the United Nations."

5. In light of all of the foregoing, and in view of the fact that the state of the United States military position in the Far East, now and in the foreseeable future, will have a direct impact upon the United States position throughout the world generally and in the Far East specifically, the Joint Chiefs of Staff strongly recommend that, irrespective of the situation in Korea, the United States plan to continue the present policy of denying Formosa to communist forces, as least until the future status of Formosa has been determined in accordance with the above announcement by the President. Such planning, however, should not prejudice United States initiative and freedom of action as to possible future courses of action with respect to Formosa.

6. The Joint Chiefs of Staff are cognizant that implementation of the above policy in the future may involve specific requirements for military forces. They would point out, further, that the continuation of a policy of solely defensive measures of a passive nature cannot halt communist aggression. There must come a time, if the expansion of communism under Kremlin domination is to be halted, when adequate forces in being must be provided and placed in position to counter that expansion even though the risk of war be increased. The Joint Chiefs of Staff will take these requirements into consideration in their future periodic recommendations as to the strength and composition of the United States Armed Forces.

7. It is recognized that the Seventh Fleet may not be able to continue to participate in current operations in Korea and at the same time insure the denial of Formosa to communist forces. In any event, the Chinese forces on Formosa must be prepared, within reason, to resist attack. It is imperative, therefore, that the capabilities of the Chinese Nationalist forces be assessed at the earliest possible date; that immediate and positive steps be taken to insure that such of their military equipment as requires maintenance be rendered usable; and that deficiencies of matériel and supplies essential to the Chinese Nationalist forces be met.

8. The Joint Chiefs of Staff are cognizant that Chinese forces on Formosa are in urgent need of matériel and supplies. If these Chinese forces are to be enabled to resist attack, they must be provided with that matériel. Accordingly, the Joint Chiefs of Staff urge that the present United States policy of withholding United States military aid from the Chinese forces on Formosa be so modified, as a matter of urgency, as to permit the granting of such aid, the more urgent needs, now known, to be met immediately and the remainer to be determined from the reports of a military survey team.

9. Complete determination of the needs of the Chinese forces on Formosa can only flow from a comprehensive military survey. The Joint Chiefs of Staff, therefore, recommend that they be authorized to direct the Commander in Chief, Far East, to cause a survey to be made forthwith of the Chinese Nationalist Government's military requirements which must be met if the capture of Formosa by the communists is to be prevented. It is further recommended that the State Department be requested to make the necessary political arrangements for the survey.

10. The Joint Chiefs of Staff recommend that after the authorization for the military survey recommended in the foregoing paragraph has been approved, the Department of Defense and the Department of State offer to General MacArthur the services of the Joint State–Defense Military Assistance Mission [5] under Major General Erskine (Department of Defense), Mr. John S. Melby (Department of State), and Mr. Glen H. Craig (Economic Cooperation Administration), for the purpose of translating the results of the military survey into a military assistance program. The mission should be directed to proceed to [5] For documentation on this Mission, see pp. 1 ff.

Formosa as General MacArthur may desire; thereafter to proceed in accordance with its present instructions.[6]

For the Joint Chiefs of Staff:
OMAR N. BRADLEY
Chairman
Joint Chiefs of Staff

[6] The National Security Council discussed the above memorandum at its 62nd meeting on July 27 with President Truman presiding. The President approved in principle the recommendations of the JCS memorandum subject to agreement by the Secretaries of State and Defense on the specific content and wording thereof (NSC Action 325b).

SECRET

NEW DELHI, July 28, 1950—2 p. m.

221. 1. Bajpai, Secretary General MEA, read to me today excerpt of telegram from Panikkar, Indian Ambassador to China. Panikkar said that highest Chinese officials continued to contend that Korean fighting had been engineered by US and UK in order screen carrying out conspiracy on their part to attack Communist China. As further evidence existence this conspiracy, Chinese officials were now stating that US was entering into treaty with Siam which would enable it to use Siam as base for operations against China.

2. Bajpai said that neither GOI nor Panikkar believed such absurd story; nevertheless he thought it would be useful if he could inform Panikkar what facts were. He asked me if I had information which would indicate that US was entering into defensive alliance with Siam and if so was I in position to let him have sufficient facts for Panikkar's use in convincing Chinese that there was no basis or their alleged alarm.

3. I said I was confident that US Government was not entering into treaty with Siam which reasonable person could interpret as threatening China. I was also certain that such commitments we might make to Siam would be in framework of UN. I was not able to give him with precision information which he could use for passing along to Panikkar. I would however if he desired ask Washington for instructions. I was confident furthermore that in any event before entering into final commitment with Siam, US would inform GOI re its intentions.

4. Bajpai said he would appreciate having such information as US Government would feel itself free to give with indication of the part of this information which GOI could feel free to send to Panikkar to give to Peiping.

5. Department's instructions would be appreciated.

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, 28 July 1950.

Subject: Photo Reconnaissance of Certain Portions of the China Coast.

1. In view of the operational committments of the U.S. Seventh Fleet in Korea and in the Taiwan area, it is considered vital that we obtain advance knowledge of Communist intentions to launch an amphibious assault against Taiwan. Existing sources of information do not ensure that we will obtain the advance knowledge required to defeat such an attack.

2. Current intelligence indicates that sufficient build-up of troops and water lift now exist on the China coast for launching an invasion of Taiwan. Estimates of Chinese Communist air strength indicate that moderate air support would be available for an assault. It is doubtful, however, that information of an imminent attack may be obtained except through photographic reconnaissance.

3. It is recommended that the necessary political clearance be obtained and that the Joint Chiefs of Staff be authorized to direct the Commander in Chief, Far East, to conduct periodic photographic reconnaissance flights over the coastal area of China south of the 32nd parallel of latitude with a view to determining the imminence of any attack that may be launched against Formosa.[1]

For the Joint Chiefs of Staff:
A. C. DAVIS
Rear Admiral, USN
Director, The Joint Staff

[1] In a memorandum dated July 31, not printed, the Executive Secretary of the National Security Council indicated that this memorandum by the Joint Chiefs of Staff had been referred by the President to the National Security Council and the Secretary of the Treasury for consideration and recommendation on an urgent basis.

On July 29, Secretary of Defense Johnson informed Mr. Acheson that he was authorizing periodic photographic reconnaissance over the coast of China south of the 32nd parallel. He stated that Mr. Rusk, in discussions with Defense Department officials, had indicated that the Department of State had no desire to impose restrictions on such reconnaissance flights and he asked Mr. Acheson's confirmation of this position.

On July 30, the following message was sent to General MacArthur by the Joint Chiefs of Staff in telegram JCS 87501:

"You are authorized to conduct such periodic reconnaissance flights over the coastal area of China south of the 32nd Parallel of latitude as you may consider necessary to determine the imminence of any attack that may be launched against Formosa."

The Secretary of State to the Embassy in the United Kingdom [1]

TOP SECRET NIACT PRIORITY

WASHINGTON, July 28, 1950—7 p. m.

522. For Douglas from Acheson. Reurtel 492 July 24. We agree high desirability reaching common understanding with UK on Formosa. Pls therefore urgently discuss matter in gen terms with Bevin [2] for purpose (1) getting US–UK joint position on immed aspects problem, (2) exploring with Bevin UN aspects Formosa question, (3) assuring Bevin we shld welcome further exchange views on longer-run questions on which we might not be able to agree at this time. Your approach shld be made as soon as practicable in view Malik's [3] announcement he wld join UNSC in Aug. and shld reflect clear desire on our part give careful and sympathetic consideration UK viewpoint in our desire find better basis common policy in Far East. We maintain, of course, views expressed Deptel 132 of July 10.[4] Ur presentation shld be along fol lines:

1. Action re Formosa taken by Pres as announced June 27 was for purpose eliminating or reducing risk Comie occupation and mil exploitation this strategically located island in crisis created by Korea attack, to safeguard sea and air flank of forces operating in Ryukyus–Japan–Korea area, and to prevent if possible general extension hostilities into wider areas of Pacific and FE.

Bevin will surely appreciate situation which confronted us in FE at time Korean attack. Demonstration that Sov orbit prepared use organized aggression in pursuit its objectives raised immed problem of other areas likely to be attacked and, indeed, problem as to whether USSR was intent on general war. Our action to neutralize Formosa was attempt to upset if possible any prearranged time tables and to limit fighting to Korea until general security situation could be assessed. We still have no assurances that Communist forces will not embark upon fresh adventures elsewhere.

From mil point of view, western strategic frontier for essential defense areas vital to US rests generally along islands extending from Aleutians through Japan to Philippine archipelago. With Kuriles already in hostile hands, Formosa's location is such that in hands of power hostile to US it wld constitute dangerous enemy salient in very center that part our position now keyed to Japan, Okinawa and Philippines. In event Formosa came into hands Chi Communists and latter made it available to hostile purposes to Sov forces at time US forces heavily engaged in Korea, grave danger wld result for entire US position in western Pacific. Its value to potential enemy is [1] This telegram was repeated to New Delhi as 135 for the Ambassador.

[2] British Foreign Minister Ernest Bevin.

[3] Yakov A. Malik, Soviet Representative on the U.N. Security Council.

[4] For the text of this telegram, see vol. VII, p. 347. In it, Mr. Acheson emphasized the fact that United States action concerning Formosa resulted from the carefully planned aggression which had taken place in Korea and strongly insisted that no benefits should accrue to the Soviet Union and Communist China as a result of blackmail resulting from the North Korean aggression. (795.00/7–1050) shown historically by its previous use by Japan as springboard for mil aggression against areas to south. Further seizure Formosa by Chi Commies at hour when UN forces resisting aggression Korea wld be considerable stimulus to morale of destructive forces in Asia and thus work to detriment US and other friendly states having interests in west and southwest Pacific. Denial of Formosa to Chi Commies was in circumstances an attempt which we had to make as matter of elementary precaution at time of grave uncertainty.

There was in our action no desire to force an answer to the many polit questions connected with Formosa problem; on contrary, it was hoped polit problems on which various govts had divergent views chld be frozen until the security situation cld be clarified. We very much hope Bevin will see the great desirability of our putting longer-range polit aspects Formosa on ice and that we can take common view on immediate need for mil standstill. You shld not imply to Bevin we think mil standstill prevents our strengthening Chi forces on Formosa; in face of very great Chi Commie build-up along mainland coast, 7th Fleet may not be able guarantee Formosa against hostile land and forces on island wld have important role to play in resisting attack.

2. You can give Bevin complete assurance US has no designs on Formosa and specifically has no intention of seizing Formosa unilaterally for US mil exploitation. Our action was not designed as step in any US offensive against mainland nor to place auths on Formosa in position to mount offensive against mainland. Aggravation highly inflamed situation Pacific by hostilities between mainland and Formosa, mil problems connected with Korean campaign, longer-range threat of Soviet-exploited Formosa to security western Pacific, and widespread polit blows dealt free world in Asia by Commie seizure Formosa at this juncture are the real and, we believe, sufficient reasons. In event Chi Commies launch attack against Formosa as they now threaten, 7th Fleet is under instructions perform mission indicated Pres statement June 27. In this contingency, or if Chi Commies intervene in Korea, our desire not to take action against Chi mainland wld have to be reviewed. We do not wish become involved in any way with general operations against Chi and wld seek to limit mil action to minimum requirements UN action in Korea and our determination to deny Formosa to enemy exploitation. If Chi Commies leave Korea alone (which we suspect they are not doing) and if they leave Formosa alone, there will be no fighting between US and Chi Commie forces. Further, Chi Commie attacks on Indo-China, Burma or Hong Kong would also raise very grave questions.

3. Pending settlement of Korean aggression acceptable to UNSC, US must continue patrol of Formosan strait for prevention hostilities between mainland and island. We recognize, however, that unilateral character our action has unsatisfactory aspects and we should be glad to have any further views Bevin has on this. Does he see any point in UN consideration of Formosa? If so, on what basis, in which organ, and how wld he see UN aspects developing? Wld UN consideration of mil standstill re Formosa be embarrassing and create serious differences among non-Soviet world? As we see it, it is unlikely that UNSC cld produce enough votes to pass a res on Formosa (not counting Malik's veto) unless US and UK supported common line in SC. Since USSR or some other Member might bring matter into UN, US and UK shld try to concert positions on this aspect of matter as soon as possible.

4. We do not underestimate substantial nature long-term problems of Formosa question. Foregoing has applied to problems of immediate present. From longer-range view, we shall have to consider applicability Cairo and Potsdam Declarations, Formosa aspects Jap Peace Settlement, and ultimate status of Formosa itself. These questions greatly complicated at present time by fundamental divisions among govts of world as to Chi and recognition question.

There come to mind number of factors, generally unenvisaged at time Cairo Declaration, which lead us not to accept that Declaration as necessarily last word on subj Formosa.

(a) Commitments by USSR in connection with Cairo and Potsdam (e.g. independence of Korea and support of Natl Govt of Chi) have been grossly flouted;

(b) Record of Chi Natl Govt in Formosa, which assumed responsibility fol VJ-Day, has not been satis;

(c) It appears to us to be one thing to turn Formosa over to Rep of Chi as constituted at time Cairo Declaration; quite another to turn it over to Peiping regime which is acting in support of Moscow conspiracy against free nations;

(d) In view drastic change in situation in Chi and hostile totalitarian regime now established Peiping, are democratic countries not entitled to question the turning of Formosa over to such regime without consulting Formosans or applying principles of UN Charter applicable to dependent peoples? These and other aspects of the general problem are fully open to discussion as far as we are concerned, and we believe an early exchange of views with UK wld be helpful.

Dept recognizes complexity problem and importance early US–UK agreement if possible on immediate security and UN aspects without commitments as to longer-range questions.

You might desire explore with Bevin probable significance which policies on Formosa wld have for UK in connection with Brit defense position Hong Kong and Malaya, as well as for general peace Far East. We do not believe Formosa can be limited to a facet of Chi problem; it involves our attitude toward present Commie determination to seize Asia, a determination which US feels we must oppose in the interest our own natl as well as world security.

The Ambassador in the United Kingdom (Douglas) to the Secretary of State

TOP SECRET NIACT LONDON, July 29, 1950—2 p. m.

630. For the Secretary from Douglas.

1. Discussed with Bevin Deptel 522, July 28, in regard to desirability reaching common understanding with UK on Formosa. Discussion got no further than the benefits of having an understanding, for Bevin took the position that, while it was very necessary to arrive at an agreed position if possible, the discussion should be held preferably in Washington. The problem of Formosa, he said, was in a very real sense a problem of the Far East. The Eastern questions of policy were being discussed in Washington. Accordingly, he felt there might be some disadvantages in disassociating discussions on Formosa from the broad context in which they should be held.

I think his position is logical. Don't you agree?

2. Bevin, who has just returned from his rest, seemed tired and mentally quite sluggish. There has been I think, deterioration even since I last saw him in the London clinic.

Sent Department 630, repeated info New Delhi 13 for the Ambassador.

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, July 29, 1950.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Reference is made to your letter of July 21, 1950,[1] with which you enclosed a copy of a memorandum of the same date from the Joint Chiefs of Staff setting forth suggested changes, concurred in by you, in a draft aide-mémoire prepared by this Department [1] in reply to an aide-mémoire of July 7, 1950 from the Chinese Embassy [2] in regard to the mission of the Seventh Fleet.

Following the receipt of your letter, the entire question was discussed between representatives of our two Departments. It developed from these discussions that upon two points, that is, "visit and search" by the Chinese Navy and representations to the British Government with regard to shipments of military supplies, the conferees were unable to reach complete agreement.

After renewed consideration of the matter, this Department now proposes the following text in reply to point 3 of the Chinese aide-mémoire:

"3. The United States Government considers that the agreement of the Chinese Government to the request of President Truman that the Chinese Government 'cease all air and sea operations against the mainland' does not preclude 'visit and search' of Chinese shipping on the high seas under circumstances where such visit and search is related to the defense of territory controlled by the Chinese Government".

---

[2] See telegram 15, July 7, to Taipei, p. 371.

It will be noted that this modified draft restricts operations to Chinese shipping, as requested in the reference Chinese aide-mémoire, but does not particularize on the questions of denial of maritime access to the mainland and offensive operations in mainland territorial waters.

Our most serious objection to the modification made by the Joint Chiefs would be the inclusion of all shipping in the "visit and search" authorization, rather than Chinese shipping only. If foreign flag vessels were to be detained, searched, and possibly diverted, this Government would probably run into difficulty with the British and other members of the United Nations in connection with the general Chinese problem. Indeed, a probable practical effect would be the withdrawal by the British of certain of their naval units now operating in Korean waters to provide protection for their merchant shipping to Chinese mainland ports. The effect of such authorization would also be to enable the Chinese Navy to resume measures to carry out by force or by threat of force the Chinese Government's "port closure" orders, which we have never recognized as being legal, under the aegis of the President's directive.

The Department's draft reply to point 3 is based upon its interpretation of the President's statement of June 27 respecting sea operations by the Chinese Navy. If, however, despite the above explanation of our position, there are military considerations which would make it necessary for us to agree that the Chinese should carry out "visit and search" operations of so extensive a character, I should appreciate being informed of them.

As to point 4, there are specific political reasons which make it desirable to omit from any statement to the Chinese mention of our action vis-à-vis other governments, as would be the case if the clause suggested by the Joint Chiefs were included. The whole question of shipments of strategic materials to Communist China and North Korea is being actively pursued with the concerned friendly Governments. The subject matter and the fact of our approaches, however, are placed in a highly classified category, and it would be inconsistent with our general understanding with those Governments to indicate to outside parties the character of such discussions. There is a high probability that information of this character would become known shortly after communication to the National Government and thus jeopardize our present satisfactory arrangements with the British in this regard.

As this Department attaches a high degree of urgency to an expeditious settlement of these matters, to make it possible that the Chinese Government may be appropriately informed, I should appreciate receiving your views at your earliest convenience.

Sincerely yours, DEAN ACHESON

The Secretary of Defense (Johnson) to the Secretary of State

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, 29 July 1950.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: On 28 July the Joint Chiefs of Staff sent me the following memorandum on the defense of Formosa:

"1. It has been estimated that the Chinese Communists have the capability now of lifting 200,000 armed troops from the mainland to Formosa. In view of the numbers of craft available to the Communists, estimated to be as many as 4,000, the relatively short distances involved, the limited naval forces that can be made available to Commander, Seventh Fleet and their frequent employment in the Korean area, it appears that Communist craft and military personnel might reach the coast of Formosa in sufficient numbers to jeopardize seriously the political and military stability of the Nationalist Government and to cause major defection of its ground forces, and thus to cause the loss of Formosa.

2. The Chinese Communists have announced their intention of capturing Formosa. It is understood to be the present opinion of the Secretary of State that should we fail successfully to defend Formosa, the international political repercussions would be so far-reaching as to be entirely out of proportion to the value of the island itself in our efforts to thwart the advancement of Communism.

3. The Joint Chiefs of Staff consider that the successful accomplishment of the mission assigned to the Seventh Fleet and the denial of Formosa to the Communists is seriously hazarded by Chinese Communist capabilities. This unfortunate position can be corrected in part if the Chinese Nationalists can make timely efforts to defend Formosa.

4. The Joint Chiefs of Staff therefore recommend that:

a. The pertinent part of the President's statement of 27 June be so clarified as to permit the Nationalist Government to employ its military forces in defensive measures to prevent Communist amphibious concentrations directed against Formosa or the Pescadores. Such measures should include attacks on such concentrations and mining of those mainland water areas from which such an assault could be staged.

b. The Government of the United States inform the Nationalist Government that it is free to enhance the security of Formosa by the measures suggested."

The Joint Chiefs of Staff have subsequently informed me that, at their request, General MacArthur has forwarded his views on the above and that he concurs completely with the above recommendations.

I also concur in these recommendations. In view of the urgency of this matter from the military point of view, I propose that, if you agree, I present the foregoing as soon as possible to the President for his approval.[1]

Sincerely yours, LOUIS JOHNSON

[1] The memorandum by the Joint Chiefs of Staff was sent by Secretary Johnson to President Truman who in turn referred it to the National Security Council. It was circulated by Mr. Lay on July 31 with a request for speedy action. (NSC 37 Series)

793.00/7–2950

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, July 31, 1950.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: This refers to your letter to me of July 29, 1950 forwarding the recommendations of the Joint Chiefs of Staff on the subject of Chinese Nationalist military action against Chinese Communist amphibious concentrations along the east China Coast.

I believe that the issues presented by the recommendations of the Joint Chiefs of Staff are of the greatest seriousness and should be discussed by us jointly with the President at the earliest opportunity.

The decision to use the Seventh Fleet to neutralize Formosa militarily in the present crisis was based upon the considerations set forth by the President in his statement of June 27 and in his message to Congress of July 19. We have presented these considerations to a number of other governments in an effort to obtain a measure of international support for a step which had no United Nations sanction and which involves issues on which the governments of the free world have sharply divergent views.

If the Department of Defense and the Joint Chiefs of Staff now consider that their presently available resources are inadequate to carry out their directive concerning Formosa, that conclusion is of the gravest importance and should be brought to the President's attention immediately. When the Department of Defense and the Joint Chiefs of Staff concurred in the decision made by the President regarding Formosa on June 26 (announced on June 27), it was presumably accepted on the basis that the mission could be carried out by the Seventh Fleet as envisaged in the President's statements. If that is not now our capability, it seems to me that we must consider the following principal alternative lines of action:

a. To reinforce the Seventh Fleet as rapidly as possible to permit it to carry out its mission;

b. To recognize and accept the risk of not being able to guarantee a successful result, with the possibility that Chinese forces on the mainland might not attack or that such an attack might be successfully met by available U.S. Naval and Chinese Nationalist forces;

c. To find a suitable way to relieve ourselves of a military commitment which is considered to be beyond our present capabilities.

I am not now urging a choice among these alternatives until we shall have considered the matter together; from a foreign policy point of view, however, the first alternative is by far the most desirable.

With regard to mining operations, it would seem to be clearly within existing policy for the Chinese to mine areas essential to the defense of Nationalist-held islands off the coast of China and for United States and Chinese forces to mine areas off Formosa or the Pescadores. The usual precautions such as notification to international shipping would have to be considered.

The launching of preventive bombing attacks by either U.S. or Chinese Nationalist forces against the mainland or against concentrations in mainland territorial waters, however, would have most serious results and would be unacceptable from a foreign policy point of view. Some of the more important factors are the following:

a. Whether preventive attacks are made against the Chinese mainland by U.S. forces or by Chinese Nationalist forces acting under the umbrella of U.S. naval protection, the international political responsibility of the United States would be the same.

b. We are not at war with Communist China nor do we wish to become involved in hostilities with Chinese Communist forces. Our commitments may already be greater than our present capabilities; the action recommended would extend our involvement.

c. We now face a risk of hostilities between Formosa and the mainland; the action recommended would convert the risk into a certainty by our own decision. The G–2 Periodic Intelligence Report on Soviet Intentions and Activities No. 4, dated July 27, 1950 [1] states "There is no reliable information that an attack on Taiwan is imminent." We understand that reconnaissance thus far has not confirmed reports on unusual concentrations of junks referred to in current intelligence estimates, although it is conceded that reconnaissance has been inadequate as a basis for firm conclusion on this point.

d. The action recommended would place us in a minority of almost one if the matter were brought before the United Nations Security Council and we should be confronted by a major diplomatic problem in our relations with friendly governments.

e. If we or the Chinese Nationalists should now precipitate hostilities between Formosa and the mainland, the probability of Chinese Communist overt intervention with armed forces in Korea or attack on Indochina would be greatly increased. The military advantage of preventive attacks by the Chinese Nationalists against the mainland would have to be weighed, from a United States point of view, against Chinese Communist intervention in Korea or Indochina.

f. Other Members of the United Nations contributing forces for Korea would be under great pressure to withdraw such support if Chinese intervention were afforded a pretext by action taken by us with respect to Formosa.

g. The capabilities of the Chinese Nationalist Air Force to achieve a serious military effect through the proposed action has not been set forth. It would be useful to consider whether we should elect major political and possibly military difficulties in exchange for minor military effect. Presumably if the Chinese Nationalist Air Force had adequate capabilities these would have been revealed at the time of the attack on Hainan or during their operations against the mainland prior to June 27 unless it be true that the Chinese Communists have recently presented much more vulnerable targets.

h. The ability of the free world to resist aggression depends upon moral and psychological as well as upon military factors. If the enemy is clearly and unequivocally branded by our own and world public opinion as the aggressor, the political and military advantages are obvious. Similarly, it seems to me that we should take considerable military risks rather than place ourselves in the role of an aggressor by launching an attack on our own initiative, unless there are overwhelming considerations of national security involved.

There are other elements in the problem which need not be set forth at this juncture. I should greatly appreciate it if you could let me know when you are ready to discuss this matter with the President. Perhaps it would be useful if you and I should go over it further between ourselves before seeing the President, but I recognize the urgency.[2]

Sincerely yours, DEAN ACHESON

[2] On August 2, the Secretary of State communicated the substance of the above letter to the Executive Secretary of the National Security Council in the form of a memorandum registering disapproval by the Department of State of the recommendations in the Joint Chiefs of Staff memorandum of July 28 on the defense of Formosa embodied in Mr. Johnson's letter to Mr. Acheson dated July 29, supra. (NSC 37 Series)

The Secretary of State to the Secretary of Defense (Johnson)

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: This refers to your letter to me of July 29, 1950 regarding photographic reconnaissance over the coastal area of China.[1] I am informed that Assistant Secretary Rusk has informed your representatives that the Department of State has not thus far imposed any restrictions upon U.S. reconnaissance along the China coast and that present limitations were military in origin.

The Department of State desires to facilitate as much as possible the carrying out of the onerous mission now assigned to the U.S. Seventh Fleet concerning Formosa. You will recall that our two Departments recently agreed upon a reply to the Chinese Government concerning Chinese reconnaissance which seemed to offer considerable flexibility to the reconnaissance required by them for the defense of Formosa. The text of that reply follows:

"The United States Government would not stand in the way of air and naval reconnaissance by the Chinese Government, provided such reconnaissance did not involve armed offensive action against the mainland." [2]

As far as U.S. reconnaissance is concerned, we believe that some caution is required in order not to create hostilities with the China mainland, nor to widen the conflict in Korea, nor to place us at an even greater international political disadvantage on the sensitive subject of Formosa. We concur in reconnaissance along the China coast but strongly urge that it be conducted to the maximum extent possible from outside Chinese territorial waters. We recognize that this limitation is difficult to apply along a complex coast line such as that of eastern China and that the possibility of incident or error would accompany such reconnaissance. We believe it important, however, not to give the authorities on the mainland the impression that we are making a serious attempt to penetrate the mainland itself by U.S. military aircraft. We assume, therefore, that reconnaissance along the coast would be limited to that and would not include areas away from the sea where there would be no doubt about a serious infringement of the mainland.

From the foreign policy point of view, it would be desirable for such reconnaissance to be accomplished where possible by fast single planes which, while authorized to defend themselves, would attempt to evade an attack wherever possible. Similarly, reconnaissance by formations of aircraft over mainland territory would create very serious political problems and would subject us to charges which it would be exceedingly difficult to meet.

I recognize the difficulty of reconciling the reconnaissance which would be desirable from a military point of view with international political considerations. If what has been said above does not afford an adequate basis for instructions to the field, I suggest that General Burns and Mr. Matthews or Mr. Rusk be asked to consult immediately about further clarification.

Sincerely yours, DEAN ACHESON

General MacArthur and members of his staff had gone to Taiwan for talks with President Chiang Kai-shek and other Chinese officials on July 31 and August 1. After the meetings, Chiang issued a statement indicating that the talks laid the foundations for a joint defense of Formosa and Sino-American military cooperation (text in Documents on International Affairs, 1949–1950 (issued under the auspices of the Royal Institute of International Affairs), p. 657).

The Secretary of Defense (Johnson) to the Secretary of State

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I refer to your letter of July 29th concerning certain differences between our departments as to a reply to the aide-mémoire of July 7, 1950, from the Chinese Embassy in regard to the commission of the 7th Fleet. On point 4, the question of what shall be said to the Chinese Government regarding representations made to other governments concerning shipment of military supplies, I defer to the political reasons advanced by you and will accept the wording proposed by the Department of State.

With regard to point 3, the exercise of "visit and search" by the Chinese Navy, I would point out that the restriction of this practice to Chinese vessels only, would deny to the Nationalist forces measures within their capability which would enhance the security of Formosa. As you are aware, the Joint Chiefs of Staff consider that the successful accomplishment of the mission assigned to the 7th Fleet and the denial of Formosa to the Communists is seriously hazarded by Chinese Communist capabilities. Under such circumstances, it is my belief that no restriction as to nationality should be placed on the exercise of "visit and search". While "visit and search" as a defensive measure might not normally be expected to result in undue detention and diversion of vessels found to be innocent, should difficulties be generated with other members of the United Nations, appropriate representations could then be made to the Chinese Government.

I am willing to accept the phrase "territory controlled by the Chinese Government", in lieu of "Nationalist territory" as proposed by this Department.[1]

Sincerely yours,

LOUIS JOHNSON

Minutes of a Meeting by Representatives of France, the United Kingdom, and the United States in Paris on August 3, 1950 [1]

TOP SECRET

[For the minutes of the first portion of this meeting dealing with Korea, along with background material relating to these tripartite discussions which took place following a French request for consultations on problems stemming from the Korean crisis, see volume VII, pages 519 ff.]

M. PARODI [2] then turned to the question of Formosa and expressed the view that perhaps the greatest present danger lay in the possibility of the Peking Government entering the conflict over this issue.

MR. BOHLEN [3] presented the United States position on Formosa, pointing out that our action was taken exclusively for security reasons.

[1] The minutes were transmitted to the Department under cover of despatch No. 373, August 15, from Paris, not printed. They represented an informal record of the talks prepared by an officer of the American Embassy.

[2] Alexandre Parodi, Secretary-General of the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

[3] Charles E. Bohlen, Minister in the Embassy in Paris.

The Peking Government had declared its full support of the North Koreans. The President had therefore issued his proclamation on Formosa as a purely military measure to prevent the spread of the Korean conflict to Formosa and if necessary to prevent the island's capture. The President has publicly asserted that we have no interest in Formosa other than to deny it to a hostile force. Accordingly, our action is a matter of elementary precaution. If the Chinese Communists make no aggressive move, the Seventh Fleet will never be used. Mr. Bohlen recognized that because our action was unilateral and not on a United Nations basis, it raises some rather delicate problems, and he invited questions.

M. PARODI expressed the view that while our action was fully understandable from a strategic standpoint, because of its unilateral character it could not be said to be based on the same principles as the Korean action which had the collective support of the United Nations.

Mr. DENING [4] stated that so far the United Kingdom has formulated no position on the question of Formosa.

M. PARODI said that the French have also taken no position.

Mr. DENING said that the United Kingdom does not know what action it would take in the event of an attack on Formosa by the Peking Government. He believes that the Peking Government will not attack Formosa unless instructed to do so by the Soviet Union. He admitted, however, that if it had adequate forces at his command it might be tempted to do so. In his view the question hangs on whether the Peking Government may expect sufficient assistance (for example, planes and submarines) from the Soviet Union to carry out an effective attack.

M. PARODI inquired as to the attitude of Chiang Kai-Shek.

MR. BOHLEN said that Chiang has assured President Truman he will take no aggressive action against the mainland. He has kept his word, although he has been compelled to resist a Chinese Communist attack on the Island of Quemoy. Mr. Bohlen added that in the event that the Peking Government attacked Formosa, the United States would limit itself to action required to defend the island and had no intention of generalizing the conflict to the mainland in the nature of general war with Communist China.

M. PARODI asked whether our position on Formosa was coterminous with the duration of the Korean conflict.

MR. BOHLEN replied that such is the case. Our intention is to neutralize Formosa and to this end our fleet will continue to patrol the Straits of Formosa so long as the Korean conflict continues. Although the future of Formosa raises problems to be decided later, so long as hostilities exist in Korea we will resist any attack on Formosa by force.

[4] Sir Maberly E. Dening, Assistant Under Secretary of State, British Foreign Office.

M. PARODI inquired as to the purpose of General MacArthur's recent visit to Formosa.

MR. BOHLEN replied that MacArthur's purpose was first to determine the military disposition of forces on the island and the status of the island's military defenses, and second to inform Chiang, in connection with the latter's offer of Chinese Nationalist troops for use in Korea, that the United States would prefer to see them retained on Formosa for the island's defense. His visit had no political character.

M. PARODI referred to the danger of a Chinese attack on Indochina and asked Mr. Dening if he would care to discuss the question of Malaya before that of Indochina.

MR. DENING said that there had been great progress in the situation in Malaya but that the United Kingdom did not foresee the possibility of reducing its military commitments there for at least twelve months.

M. BAEYENS [5] discussed the question of Indochina. He said that Chinese Communist troops numbering from 150 to 200 thousand men and composed largely of infantry were deployed on the frontier of Indochina. He referred to the training of Viet-Minh troops on Chinese territory where they are periodically re-equipped and re-armed. The French High Commissioner [6] believes that an offensive may soon be launched by Viet-Minh troops supplied from China. The offensive is envisaged for September after the monsoon period. The High Commismisioner is eager to obtain American air support. So far as any Chinese Communist contribution to Viet-Minh air power is concerned, while Viet-Minh propaganda had talked of twelve pursuit planes, these had not been identified on Chinese territory. The Viet-Minh has no planes in Indochina.

MR. DENING said that it is entirely probable that China would continue within its own borders to support the Viet-Minh and that this was but another manifestation of the technique of aggression by proxy. He expressed the hope that the French would keep him informed as to the prospects of a Viet-Minh offensive.

M. PARODI indicated that French estimates of a forthcoming offensive are based to a large degree on intelligence reports received from Chinese Nationalist sources.

MR. DENING commented that we suffer too much from intelligence from such sources.

M. PARODI turned to the question of Burma.

MR. DENING said that there was no indication of an immediate offensive action by the Peking Government against Burma. He was pleased to note this because any such action would have a serious effect on rice exports from Burma which in turn are of vital concern to Southeast Asia as a whole.

[5] Jacques Baeyens, French Director for Asian-Oceanian Affairs.
[6] Léon Pignon, French High Commissioner for Indochina.

M. PARODI raised the question of Tibet.

MR. DENING said that the Peking Government unquestionably seeks to strengthen its grip on Tibet. He referred to rumors of a Chinese Communist offensive to be launched there in September or October, but he somewhat discounted these rumors because the oncoming of winter would seem to be an inappropriate time for launching an attack. The Tibetans are receiving some arms from India, but it is doubtful whether they would know how to use them. It is also doubtful that India would intervene on Tibet's behalf beyond rendering her small supplies of arms. India and Nepal are preoccupied by the situation but could offer little effective assistance.

M. PARODI raised the question of the Philippines.

MR. BOHLEN said he was not briefed to speak in detail on this subject. He expressed his general understanding that the internal situation in the Philippines while difficult was less acute than it had been and presented no immediate threat. So far as the possibility of external aggression is concerned, we have formal commitments which would be implemented immediately in the event of an emergency. Our present agreements with the Philippines provide us with bases and training areas. Our present position re Formosa would not seem to necessitate the negotiation of additional agreements with the Philippines at this time.

M. PARODI expressed his satisfaction with the information elicited from the discussions. He called the next meeting for August 4, 4 p. m.

Both replied in the negative and General Bradley said he would be opposed to it. They agreed to look into the matter at once. (NSC 37 Series)

Absolutely no information given attachés including Jarrett [2] on talks or on decisions made by MacArthur. During his visit here only event on which attachés included was briefing in war room of Ministry National Defense, as result my request to Struble to include attachés in all doings. According to attachés, briefing included much misinformation Foreign Office. Yesterday contacted Admiral Jarrett direct and stated Generalissimo would receive him. Jarrett made call as requested.

I was not informed of hour of MacArthur's departure, nor was I able to find out in time. Departure occurred an hour earlier than stated in previous plans. As result I was unable be at airfield for departure.

Communication team of some 12 men who arrived here July 31 prior to MacArthur to handle his communications are still here, without orders.

Visit by MacArthur undoubtedly boosted morale on Formosa, especially of ranking authorities. Press looking forward to large military mission from SCAP, demanding military aid as a right, and predicting early world war and return to mainland. Earlier feeling over refusal to use Chinese troops in Korea now soothed. Authorities feel situation well cared for in hands of MacArthur, who will straighten out US policy toward Formosa and Nationalist Government.

Former naval attaché, still here as assistant naval attaché after being relieved by Jarrett, received letter from Admiral Struble reprimanding him for reporting to CNO nature of Struble's conversations here during his visit Taipei July 8 and 9 and stating he (Struble) would determine what to communicate to CNO re his conversations and decision.

Formosa seems to be on verge of joining close corporation to north.

REPORT BY THE DEPARTMENTS OF STATE AND DEFENSE ON IMMEDIATE UNITED STATES COURSES OF ACTION WITH RESPECT TO FORMOSA

1. Without prejudicing United States initiative and freedom of action as to possible future courses of action with respect to Formosa, the United States should continue the present policy of denying Formosa to communist forces.

2. The United States should take steps (a) to assess the capabilities of the Chinese Nationalist forces: (b) to insure that such Chinese Nationalist military equipment as requires maintenance be rendered usable; (c) to meet deficiencies, now known to United States military authorities, of Chinese Nationalist military supplies and material; and (d) in connection with (c) to give certain military grant aid to the Chinese Nationalist forces.[4]

3. The United States Government should make the necessary political arrangements with the Chinese Government and should direct the Commander in Chief, Far East to undertake forthwith a comprehensive military survey of the resources and needs of the Chinese Nationalist forces.

4. Accordingly, the following specific steps should be taken:

a. The Department of Defense should inform the Commander in Chief, Far East that the services of Major General Graves B. Erskine (Department of Defense) and Mr. Glen H. Craig (Economic Cooperation Administration) and their staffs are available to him for the purpose of assisting in the military survey and of translating the results of the survey into a military assistance program.

b. The Department of Defense should endeavor to insure that the services of Major General Erskine and Mr. Craig on Formosa are not interpreted as a diversion of the Erskine Mission from its task in Southeast Asia, possibly through the device of assigning these officers temporarily as individuals to assist a United States Liaison Mission to the Chinese Nationalist Government.

c. The Department of State should assign an officer to assist Major General Erskine and Mr. Craig in their work with the Chinese Nationalist Government.

[3] The JCS memorandum is printed under date of July 27, p. 391.

[4] In a letter dated August 25, President Truman informed Mr. Acheson that he had allocated to the Department of Defense the sum of $14,344,500 from funds made available for "Mutual Defense Assistance" by section 2(a) of P.L. 627, approved July 31, 1950, to carry out the provisions of section 303(a) of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended. The funds were to be used for programs of military assistance for Formosa. (794A.5/8-2550)

TOP SECRET PRIORITY TOKYO, August 3, 1950—7 p. m.

315. ReDeptel 180, August 2 [1]. General MacArthur has advised me that as theater commander his discussions with the Gimo and Chinese military authorities were entirely limited to arrangements for effective military coordination between the American and Chinese forces respectively under his and Chinese Nationalist Government command, as envisaged in the press statement and aide-mémoire,[1] and that he was most meticulous in confining his discussions with Chinese Government officials to military problems of a technical nature. With reference to his main discussion General MacArthur has pointed out that he invited the Army, Navy, and Air attachés of the Embassy to be present and that Strong would undoubtedly be in a position to report the consensus of their views.

As ancillary to his visit General MacArthur told me in confidence of his definite impression of deep resentment in Chinese official circles resulting from what was taken to be an attitude of general hostility on the part of State Department representatives in Taipei. Without entering into any discussion of the relative merits or demerits of the issues which may be involved, he believes there has been a very definite failure to establish a relationship based upon that degree of confidence and cordiality which is so essential to diplomatic success. He is particularly concerned over the adverse effect the continuance of such a situation might have upon his efforts to maximize the military coordination indispensable to the success of joint operations in the defense of Formosa.

You may confirm to Bajpai fact US Govt has authorized grant to Thailand of $10,000,000 for defense purposes; expected agreement with Thailand re grant can in no way be interpreted as part of a conspiracy to attack Commie Chi since it was requested by Thailand to

Moreover, extent of aid proposed is in itself proof it cld be no contribution toward aggression and cld only be considered as marginal defense assistance. You may wish to add that Thai's desire for defense supplies stems directly from her concern over aggressive and imperialistic manifestations internatl Communism directed from Moscow.

SECRET PRIORITY TAIPEI, August 4, 1950—8 a. m.

188. Deptel 95, July 31 and mytel 180, August 3. Following verbal reply by Chen Tai-chu last evening re bombing of junk concentrations on coast opposite Chinmen:

"Since Chinese Communists concentrated troops on coast opposite Chinmen and attempted invade Chinmen, and in view of suspension of military action against mainland, Chinese troops in Chinmen in very difficult position. Recently Chinese Communists landed at Ta Tan and were annihilated and driven back (sic). After that campaign Chinese Communists concentrated large number ships preparing for large scale invasion of Chinmen. On July 30 we received very reliable information that Communist vessels were on point of sailing to attack Chinmen. In view of this situation, CAF was obliged take appropriate action of self-defense for protection of Chinmen."

Chen added that Ta Tan was a probing attack to test resistance for which forces were concentrated on three sides of Chinmen for large scale attempt; Chinese Government got good intelligence and had to go after them; distance too close and would be little chance of stopping them once they set sail.

I remarked I would pass reply to Department but was of opinion it was not very satisfactory.

Rumors renewed that evacuation of Chinmen imminent. May have called off earlier plan to evacuate when heard of MacArthur visit and felt had to bomb to disrupt Communists until could sound out MacArthur.

Yesterday afternoon George Yeh told me he was shocked at Associated Press item that MacArthur had sanctioned offensive action against mainland and requested newspapers state his report had no official confirmation. 193. For Department use only. No distribution outside Department. Foreign Minister Yeh yesterday stated had talked with MacArthur for hour early morning August 1 and had told him Chinese Government would naturally deal with Department on all political matters but if MacArthur wished indicate interest in any specific subject he would be provided information; MacArthur indicated he had no interest in political problems of Formosa.

Much of hour apparently spent in discussing complaint by MacArthur that in FEC Chinese Government was most obstreperous, blocked most of his proposals, and made his work much harder.

Yeh claimed he agreed that in some matters of particular interest to Chinese Government it had been stubborn, for instance re reparations which important to an impoverished government; on these matters attitude of Chinese Government cannot be expected change.

Yeh said that as background on preparations for MacArthur visit, when word received on July 28 conference immediately held at which was decided that Chinese Government would not ask for military aid but would have list prepared in event any member of party asked for it; list finished only hour after arrival of group; MacArthur asked for list after briefing afternoon July 31.

Second decision was not to ask for economic aid because that not in MacArthur field.

Third decision was keep conference strictly on military level.

Yeh criticized briefing because in spots was not straightforward. For example, statement ground forces had 400 trucks erroneous; they have half that number; claim that there are "some underwater defenses" off possible landing beaches is lie because there none now, only plans for them; claim that 700 tanks operable untrue because in examining possibility equipping forces offered for Korea found only 450 operable and some of them questionable.

Yeh then asked Jarrett inform MacArthur of point he had not had time bring up. Prevailing strategy, approved by Generalissimo, was let Communists land and wipe them out on beaches rather than destroying invasion forces at sea before reach Formosa. (This would certainly be of interest to MacArthur and Struble because may mean failure Chinese Navy and CAF do full share in destroying invasion fleet, and ground forces not reliable or mobile enough to risk letting communists ashore in strength.[1])

Minutes of a Meeting by Representatives of France, the United Kingdom, and the United States in Paris on August 4, 1950 [1]

[The first portion of the meeting dealt with Indochina, for documentation on which see pages 690 ff.]

M. PARODI then turned to the question of China and speculated whether Mao is following the Moscow line in a strict manner or is pursuing a somewhat independent course. He said that if Communist China were admitted to the United Nations, its presence there would doubtless contribute to the difficulties of that organization and raise a number of questions. He felt that the admission of Communist

[1] See footnote 1 to the minutes of the meeting held on August 3, p. 407.

China into the United Nations was not an appropriate subject for debate in the United Nations at this time but presumed that it would be brought up in the Security Council in September. He asked for comments on the general problems arising from this question.

MR. BOHLEN said that whether Communist China was strictly following the Moscow line was a matter for speculation concerning which the British, with representatives in China, might be in a better position than we to comment. In our view, there could be no question of the seating of Communist China in the United Nations until the Korean question was settled. He set forth our reasons why we can take no other position. He went on to say that if a Korean settlement were achieved, we could then consider the question of admission of Communist China on its merits. He emphasized the serious effects on public opinion in the United States that would result if we were thought to be paying a price for aggression. He then returned to the question of the place of Communist China in the Soviet world, expressing the view that whereas in certain cases there might be a conflict of national interests with Soviet interests, in all questions of general foreign policy Communist China had followed the Soviet line. At all events, we could not afford to predicate our policy on the expectation of Communist China splitting away from the Soviet world. The future alone will tell to what extent Soviet views will prevail, but we believe that while rifts may appear between the Soviet views and China, this is not likely to be brought about by Western attempts to wean Communist China away from Kremlin control. In short, kindness from the West will not tempt them to break away from the Soviet world. If a break should come, it may be expected to come from within. We would repeat that no policy can be predicated on the likelihood of Mao taking a line in opposition to that of Moscow.

MR. DENING concurred that on all important points of foreign policy the Peking Government had taken the Moscow line wherever there was no peculiarly Chinese interest involved. On the other hand, where China's own interests are involved, the United Kingdom did not expect to see the Peking Government always act for the "beaux yeux" of Russia. He expressed the view that Peking wants a seat at the United Nations and that the Soviet Union has promised to deliver it. However, Malik's policy at the United Nations had not served to help but has merely resulted in removing the question of admission from the agenda. Mr. Dening said that he shares the United States view that the question of the admission of Communist China should not be linked to that of Korea, and that it should not be used as a bargaining counter. At the same time the United Kingdom position is that, taken by itself, the admission of the Peking Government into the United Nations should be decided on its merits. He cited in this connection Mr. Bevin's statement of May 24,[2] that in the British view Communist China should be represented in the United Nations and that no Government should be excluded therefrom because of its politics. In taking this view, he added, the United Kingdom has been influenced by Indian opinion. Although on the merits of the case alone, the United Kingdom would favor admission, it is obvious that in the light of the present international situation, the case could not be considered on its merits alone.

M. PARODI commented that, objectively speaking, the French largely share Mr. Dening's interpretation. They agree that the question of admission cannot be linked to that of Korea and that there can be no bargaining on this score. The negative French vote yesterday in the Security Council against placing the question of admission on the agenda was largely in response to the violence of Mr. Malik's address.[3] The French have always reserved freedom of action on this question, and although they have as yet formulated no definite position, they are, in view of the present international situation, opposed to admission for the time being.

MR. DENING spoke to Mr. Bohlen's statement about the unlikelihood of weaning Communist China away from the Soviet Union. Clarifying the United Kingdom position in this regard, he said that the British believe that the door should be left open to Communist China by the West because unless Mao were assured of some possibility of contact, he might reach the conclusion that there was no other course than to turn himself exclusively to the Soviet Union.

M. PARODI said that France is inclined to share Mr. Dening's view in this regard.

MR. BOHLEN asked if it was the consensus that nobody wished to link the question of admission with that of Korea, or to see Communist China seated at the United Nations prior to a settlement of the Korea question.

MR. DENING said that this did not quite express the view of the United Kingdom. Whereas the United Kingdom was agreed not to link the question of admission to that of Korea, it was in principle for admission on the merits of the case. While conceding that in the light of the present international situation the time seemed inappropriate, he could not honestly assert that in the view of the United Kingdom settlement of the Korean question must necessarily precede the admission of Communist China to the United Nations.

Turning to the question of Formosa, MR. DENING expressed the view that Formosa, juridically speaking, belongs neither to Chiang nor to the Peking Government, and that the question of its juridical disposition can only be resolved by a peace treaty with Japan.

[3] See U.N. document S/PV.482; see also editorial note, vol. VII, p. 525.

MR. BOHLEN expressed general agreement with this point of view and cited the President's statement that "the determination of the future status of Formosa must await the restoration of security in the Pacific, a peace settlement with Japan or consideration by the United Nations."

M. PARODI said that his Government is somewhat hazy on the juridical status of Formosa, and would appreciate it if our delegate to the United Nations would give the French delegate a fuller statement of our views on the question. He then asked whether, in the event of a Chinese Communist attack on Formosa, the United States would appeal to the Security Council.

MR. BOHLEN replied that such an attack would be immediately resisted by the United States Fleet and that there was a good chance that we would bring the matter before the Security Council. He added that this would depend of course on the scope and duration of the attack and that, so far as he was aware, no position had been taken by our Government before his departure with regard to such an eventuality. Referring to the possibility of further Chinese Communist attacks in Asia (and leaving aside Tibet, about which we knew virtually nothing), there appeared to be three possibilities:

1) As regards Formosa, we are not sure whether Communist China will launch an attack. We know, however, that its armies have been in a position to do so for some time. Furthermore, we have reports of Chinese Communist ship concentrations, although these have not been confirmed by our aerial reconnaissance. We know also that the monsoon season is on and that the typhoon season is in the offing. In short, such an attack could be launched but there are no immediate indications as to its imminence.

2) As regards Korea, the Chinese Communists have no special interest in Korea and if left to their own free will, would probably hesitate to take any aggressive action.

3) As regards Indochina, M. Pignon has already given us his estimate of the probabilities for an attack. In sum, we feel that the Chinese Communists will hesitate long before launching any attack which would involve them in a general war with the United States, and this consideration should prove to be the greatest deterrent against any Chinese Communist local action in Asia.

M. PARODI asked if there is any risk of an internal uprising in Formosa.

MR. BOHLEN replied that this is difficult to estimate. Based on past experience, there is no guarantee that there will not be defections among the Nationalist forces on the Island, and although there are some good Chinese Generals there, we are not sure if they are being well used. The assurance that the United States Fleet will respond to any attack is perhaps the greatest deterrent to an uprising, and for this reason the probabilities are against any such eventuality. In any event, there seem to be no grounds for fearing a successful internal insurrection by itself.

MR. DENING supported Mr. Bohlen's view, and said that according to reports from the British Consul in Formosa, there is no likelihood of an internal revolt unless a Chinese Communist attack should occur.

[The remainder of the meeting dealt with a wide variety of countries and areas but mainly with problems relating to Germany. Documentation is scheduled for publication in volume IV.]

such aid. He added that US considered it important that prompt steps be taken now as it would be extremely difficult make aid available in time if Tibet were to wait until invasion had started.

3. Shakapba expressed gratification at US reply, and inquired whether it meant that US in event Chinese Communist invasion would send troops and planes to Tibet's aid. Steere answered that US reply pertained to war materials and finance, and explained that US was not at war with Chinese Communists, did not have enough troops to meet its own needs, and besides it seemed to us that Tibet, with advantages of terrain it enjoyed, needed arms more than it did men.

4. Shakapba said Tibet authorities felt able deal with Communist subversion (through Panchen Lama) but not with Chinese Communist invasion in force unless they had foreign help. Said Tibet was worried about attitude of GOI, intimating they feared India might come to some understanding with Chinese Communists at Tibet's expense. Steere replied we thought India did not want Chinese Communists in Tibet on borders of India and would not go into Communist camp; he pointed out that GOI had recently given Tibet considerable military aid and that it would be difficult for GOI to refuse Tibet authorities both additional aid and cooperation in securing foreign aid in event GOI could not spare material.

5. Steere then outlined procedure laid down by Department, stressing and repeating to assure no misunderstanding, namely, that Tibet should first ask GOI for additional aid and if refused then ask GOI friendly cooperation by permitting passage of aid it wanted to secure abroad. He emphasized essentiality Indian cooperation for effective assistance be delivered Tibet, and necessity Tibet make approach GOI without any indication of US assurance of aid. Shakapba expressed understanding of position, agreed to inform Lhasa and said that about fifteen days would be needed for him to receive reply.

6. Re Khan cooperation: Shakapba said that it could be counted upon if there was assurance foreign aid. By "foreign aid" we believed Tibetans had in mind assurances of aid from GOI, UK and US, although they were reluctant to specify. Impression was gained that they might welcome more foreign technicians and advisers, possibly as an accretion to Indian military mission at Gyangtse.

7. Department's views in paragraph 2, Deptel 104 that not desirable ask details specific needs were followed rather than "following separate message" since Linn had already asked Tibetans for detailed list needs in connection with request directed to him in June. Tibetans referred his request and said still awaiting answer. Shakapba could say nothing definite but promised to inquire re radio transmitter EMC.

8. Tibet delegate showed much interest in possibility of air lift to Tibet, and said authorities could prepare landing fields at Lhasa, Gartok and Chumdo. They inquired whether planes could not take off from Dacca and Rawalpindi (Pakistan), Burma or some other points if India not cooperative. They were not encouraged in these ideas.

9. Re Communist China: Shakapba said Tibet National Assembly had decided Tibet in no circumstances would agree Chinese suzerainty. Said Tibet tactics all along had been to play for time. That was why they had wanted to go Hong Kong. He intimated they had rather welcomed British refusal visas. They were now waiting for Chinese Communist Ambassador to arrive India and would endeavor contact him. In fact, they had initiated first steps that day in Calcutta as a cover for their meeting with us.

10. Steere's mention of Tibetan resistance to aggression in conjunction with US readiness to give aid, was not stated as a condition of aid, but developed naturally from allusion to my remarks to Shakapba in June. We believe that Tibetan frame of mind is one that links resistance so definitely with military aid they must be discussed in separable parts of the same problem. We believe that it would be a great mistake to give aid without some assurance of Tibetan intent to use it.

11. Bajpai, Secretary General MEA on August 3 expressed to me concern at report from Hong Kong to effect General Liu had announced time had come for liberation Tibet. He criticized British for failure to permit Tibetans to go to Hong Kong to talk with Peiping representatives and said he was calling in Chinese Chargé d'Affaires to express concern at threatening developments and to suggest talks with Tibetans before any invasion should begin.

TOP SECRET NEW DELHI, August 7, 1950—10 a. m.

306. Acting United Kingdom High Commissioner Roberts was informed August 5 of action taken by this Embassy as described Embtel 302, August 7. Care was taken to make clear that assurance of assistance resulted from inquiry initiated by Tibetans in June.

Roberts' reaction seemed to be one of great interest as well as satisfaction. He remarked that His Majesty's Government had consistently urged Government of India to give assistance to Tibetans and in fact "all possible aid short of going to war".

Questioned as to what he thought Indian attitude might be in event Tibetans request additional military assistance from Government of India, Roberts said that latter had given Tibet already all assistance Tibet had requested and he thought it unlikely, therefore, that Government of India would reject request for additional aid. He intimated that since Government of India had requested British to replace some of material made available to Tibet that they would probably make similar request in case additional aid given and that His Majesty's Government in such event might wish to discuss subject.

Questioned as to what he thought Government of India reaction would be in event that Chinese Communists invade Tibet, Roberts said he doubted Government of India would take any positive steps except possibly to supply additional arms and ammunition in the event Tibetans should resist with unexpected effectiveness.

Roberts was requested and promised not reveal above action to Government of India.

Extracts of a Memorandum of Conversations, by Mr. W. Averell Harriman, Special Assistant to the President, With General MacArthur in Tokyo on August 6 and 8, 1950

Formosa and Chiang. MacArthur gave me his memo of June 15 [sic] [1] on the importance of Formosa from a strategic standpoint in the defensive system of the United States in the Far East. . . . For reasons which are rather difficult to explain, I did not feel that we came to a full agreement on the way he believed things should be handled on Formosa and with the Generalissimo. He accepted the President's position and will act accordingly, but without full conviction. He has a strange idea that we should back anybody who will fight Communism, even though he could not give an argument why the Generalissimo's fighting Communists would be a contribution towards the effective dealing with the Communists in China. I pointed out to him the basic conflict of interest between the U.S. and the Generalissimo's position as to the future of Formosa; namely, the preventing of Formosa's falling into hostile hands. Perhaps the best way would be through the medium of the UN to establish an independent government. Chiang, on the other hand, had only the burning ambition to use Formosa as a steppingstone for his re-entry to the mainland. MacArthur recognized that this ambition could not be fulfilled, and yet thought it might be a good idea to let him land and get rid of him that way. He did not seem to consider the liability that our support of Chiang on such a move would be to us in the East. I explained in great detail why Chiang was a liability, and the great danger of a split in the unity of the United Nations on the Chinese-Communist–Formosa policies; the attitude of the British, Nehru and such countries as Norway, who although stalwart in their determination to resist Russian invasion, did not want to stir up trouble elsewhere. I pointed out the great importance of maintaining UN unity among the friendly countries, and the complications that might result from any missteps in dealing with China and Formosa.

Communist China. MacArthur would never recognize the Chinese Communists, even to the use of the veto in seating the Communists. He believes it would only strengthen the prestige of Mao Tse-tung's Government in China and destroy what he considers should be our objective: the splitting of the present supporters of Mao Tse-tung and the developing of strengthened resistance movements. He does not believe the Chinese want to come under Russian domination. They have historically opposed invasion from the North. We should be more aggressive than we have been so far in creating stronger dissension within China. . . . MacArthur has not developed any plan of action in China. He believes there are great potentialities.

I emphasized the importance of getting evidence on the participation of the Chinese Communists in supporting the North Korean attack and present operations. There will be considerable support in seating the Chinese Communists at the next meeting of the Assembly. I explained that if we could obtain real evidence of direct support for the North Koreans, this might be the reason by which we could prevent the seating of the Communists on the moral issue involved.

In all, I cannot say that he recognizes fully the difficulties, both throughout the world and in the East, of whatever moves we make in our position with the Generalissimo in Formosa and with respect to China. He believes that our policies undermine the Generalissimo; he has confidence that he can get the Generalissimo to do whatever he is asked to undertake; is prepared to deal with the political problems, but will conscientiously deal only with the military side, unless he is given further orders from the President.

Formosa. He has sent a military mission under General Fox [2] to Formosa to find out the equipment needs of the National troops; it is already clear that they need barbed wire, reinforcing bars for concrete beach defenses, some additional motor transport, so that a defense can be worked out in depth with mobility for the reserves. He is quite satisfied that the military appropriations already available will be sufficient to take care of whatever they need. He has no intention of recommending any military equipment for anything other than the defense of the island, which in no sense would increase the ability of the national army to invade the continent. He regrets [that] the Joint Chiefs' recommendation to permit Chiang's airplanes to attack the concentration of troops and particularly the airstrips on the mainland [?has been overruled], but accepts the decision and will use every means to stop the Generalissimo in [?from] sending out his planes, barring "shooting them down". He is satisfied the Chinese Communists will not attempt an invasion of Formosa at the present time. His intelligence and photographs show no undue concentration of forces, although they are building airstrips. He is convinced that the 7th Fleet plus the air jets from the Philippines and Okinawa, B–29's and other aircraft at his disposal, can destroy any attempt which may be made. He believes that the Chinese National troops can be organized to fight effectively and destroy any Communist troops which might get through. Should the Chinese Communists be so foolhardy as to make such an attempt, it would be the bloodiest victory in Far Eastern history, and would strengthen favorably morale in the East. He does not believe the reports that have been made to Washington of the bad situation within Formosa. He believes, however, that it can be improved, both politically and economically, and hopes ECA will continue its economic work so that Formosa can become increasingly important in trade relations with Japan and in the improvement of the economic life of the Formosans. He explained that his observations were of course preliminary, and he might amend them when he had more information, but he thought there was reasonable political stability, the Assembly of 22 members now included 18 Formosans and only four mainland Chinese. The Budget had been balanced. Currency has been stabilized at 10 to 1 for the dollar. There was only a small black market. Wages and prices had been stabilized. Schools and the judicial system were working normally. Governor Wu (formerly Mayor of Shanghai) has perhaps been largely responsible for improved conditions. People are well fed and clothed and housed, perhaps as well now as they were under the Japanese. There was an air of tranquillity on the island. He considered the ECA work had been good and should be continued. We should see that the distribution got to the people, avoiding, as far as possible, graft.

Formosa. He spoke about the problem of the island of Quemoy. close to the mainland. The Generalissimo claims to have 70,000 men there which is important from the standpoint of eventually landing on the mainland, but has no value to the U.S. The Generalissimo considers Formosa part of China. MacArthur didn't see any evidence of a desire for independence so far, even among the Formosans he talked to, but perhaps that was natural at this stage. There were no soldiers on the street and no curfew. . . .

MacArthur feels that we have not improved our position by kicking Chiang around, and hoped that the President would do something to relieve the strain that existed between the State Department and the Generalissimo. He suggested the President might reiterate his previous statements by threatening the Chinese Communists that he would withdraw in addition to [?withdraw his objections to Chiang's] attacking the airfields on the mainland if the Chinese [Communists] continued to do this work, or to build up their positions. I told him that if he wanted to make that recommendation to the President it was up to him, but I assured him that I would strongly recommend to the President against his doing so. I reemphasized the overpowering importance of UN unity and that this would only give further trouble and give the Russians a chance to develop an entering wedge.

[1] Not printed. It reported on expressions of concern from British officials, including the Acting High Commissioner in India, on probable adverse Indian reactions to receipt of word from Tibetan sources that the United States was extending military aid to Tibet. The British officials felt that the United States should approach the Indian Government directly on this matter. (793B.00/8–1150)

Department telegram 230, August 11, to New Delhi, not printed, authorized the Embassy to approach the Government of India before the Tibetans did so, at its discretion (793B.00/8–1150).

GOI is urgently instructing Panikkar immediately take up with CPG Foreign Minister on firm although friendly lines subject of Tibet urging CPG avoid offensive action against it. In event Panikkar's representations appear likely to be rebuffed, he is authorized to state that India will have to withdraw its support from seating CPG representative in SC. In event of invasion, India contemplates taking matter up in some form with SC. Bajpai has especially asked UK to give India hand for present in order that Indian negotiations with Communist China be on an Asiatic-to-Asiatic basis. TOP SECRET PRIORITY WASHINGTON, August 13, 1950—12 noon.

800. Personal for the Ambassador from Rusk. Reurtel 844 [1] Jessup and I saw Oliver Franks on Aug. 10 and discussed contents Deptel 522.[2] Franks was without instructions and we agreed to take up the matter again as soon as he was ready.

Speaking personally, Franks said that he thought that President's June 27 statement on Korea had been well received by Brit Cabinet but that their first reaction was that the Formosa part of that statement would lead to many complications. After their first reaction, they began to understand the importance of military neutralization, on which the Brit Chiefs had expressed agreement with the US action. Their later anxiety had been caused by MacArthur's visit and by reports of Chi Nationalist bombings of mainland concentrations.

Franks went on to speculate whether there might be some possibility of reducing gap between us on Formosa by finding proper UN formula along with some common understanding on the longer-range development of the Chi question. We pointed out to him that we ourselves were interested in separating the Formosa and Chi questions since we did not wish the disposition of Formosa to be settled simply by deciding the question as to who is Chi. As far as the long-range Chi problem is concerned, we said that our own attitude would be very greatly affected by Peiping's behavior. In the interim, if Chi supports the aggression in Korea (even more so than at present) or acts aggressively against Hong Kong, Indochina or Burma, we did not see how we could establish normal relations with Peiping or favor their admission to the UN. Franks recognized this problem and said that his personal view was that if Communist Chi actively intervened in Korea the UK would "derecognize" Peiping.

During course of conversation Franks asked very directly whether our policy on Formosa was firmly based on President's statements of June 27 and July 19 and whether the UK could accept that with confidence. We told him that two statements referred to were basic policy and that there was no intention to depart from them. I pointed out the difficult problem of applying those two statements to certain borderline questions like reconnaissance, the treatment of Nationalist-held islands along Chi mainland, Nationalist seizure of former Nationalist vessels which had defected to Communists, etc. He said he recognized that the edges would appear blurred at times but that if the mainlines of policy were secure and constant, it might be possible to work something out.

On the question of arms to Nationalists, I pointed out that since Chi Communist authorities had not accepted neutralization concept, had publicly announced that they would attack Formosa and had disposed of their forces on the mainland with that in view, the ability of Formosa to defend itself had a direct bearing upon the possibility of neutralization. Franks stated he could see that certain arms supply might not be a serious problem unless it should assume the nature of preparations for Chiang's return to the mainland, a course of action which would cause deep misgivings in London. I stated categorically that the President's recent action re Formosa was not a stepping stone for US entry into the mainland nor preparation to put Chang Kai-shek back on the mainland with Amer support. I stated that obviously if the Chi Communists attack Korea, Hong Kong or Burma, that whole question would have to be reexamined, to which he agreed.

FYI MacArthur told Harriman he did not believe the Chi Communists will attack Formosa on the basis of their present capabilities. In fact, aerial reconnaissance along the Chi coast has not yet disclosed such concentrations of shipping, junks or other crafts as would indicate that an attack on Formosa is imminent.

If President's action does in fact prevent or postpone Communist attack on Formosa, we believe the effort made to effect a military neutralization and a political freeze was the reasonable line to take, despite the obvious risks. If the UK and India are unwilling to accept a postponement of political issues re Formosa, then we shall be projected into sharp differences which, in the light of the situation on the spot, are quite unnecessary.

We are examining urgently whether there is any basis on which we, the UK and India could get together on Formosa policy remainder this year. For example, (1) military neutralization, (2) determination of ultimate status of Formosa through Jap peace treaty discussions (see London's A–504, July 28)[3] or UN or both, (3) initial determination by GA of the procedures and standards by which it decides between the govts competing for the same seat, (4) application to Chi seating problem of procedures and standards determined upon under (3). This would not involve any question of US recognition of Peiping, would permit the UN to deal with this particular issue on principles which shld apply to all similar cases in the future, wld not turn Formosa over to Communist Chi and wld meet our present essential mil requirements. From gen trend of Franks' remarks, there may be some possibility along this line. Also, Bajpai left impression with Henderson that he might be able to consider some disposition of Formosa other than to Peiping.

Factor of greatest importance in US or, for that matter, UN attitude toward Chi Commies will be conduct of Peiping toward its neighbors and toward internatl obligations. Peiping is at present time co-conspirator with Kremlin on Korean aggression and is actively engaged in plot against Indo-China. If internatl Commie orbit has in fact decided to wage war by all convenient means against non-Commie world, our problem is to alert non-Commie world to nature of danger and not of trying to buy off Commies by token appeasements which cld only increase their prestige without reducing their appetites in slightest degree.

It wld be unfortunate if, at a time when situation as between Formosa and mainland itself appears to be reasonably stabilized, public clamor and political controversy in the West shld force the pace of dealing with present disagreements among friendly govts and create unnecessary dissension at time when solidarity is urgently required. I recognize there are real differences of tactics between UK and India who are attempting to establish normal relations with Peiping and US which carries heavy burden responsibility for meeting Commie threat to security of the Pacific. We accept that it is of utmost importance that we try to find a common policy but we consider that while this attempt proceeds every possible effort must be made by all concerned to prevent this particular virus from affecting our gen relations any more than necessary.

We hope to have something officially approved topside for you on this early next week. [Rusk.]

The Secretary of State to the Embassy in China

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, August 14, 1950—3 p. m.

144. Eyes only for Rankin from Rusk. Fol is preliminary draft instrs on US policy toward Formosa and China being furnished for your info study and comment pending topside consideration here. Dept recognizes complexity and difficulty your assignment and desires to be maximum assistance. Highly restricted distribution this tel essential.

Present draft consists of three parts, (1) Interim policy during crisis created by Korean aggression (2) Long-Range policy applicable when Korean aggression resolved and present internatl tension reduced or at least clarified (3) responsibilities US reps re Formosa.

PART I—INTERIM POLICY

A. See relevant portions President's statement of June 27, 1950.

B. See relevant portions President's Msg to Congress of July 19, 1950.

C. Excerpt from NSC 37/10 dated August 3, 1950:

"1. Without prejudicing US initiative and freedom of action as to possible future courses of action with respect to Formosa, the US shld continue the present policy of denying Formosa to communist forces.

2. The US shld take steps (a) to assess the capabilities of the Chi Nationalist forces; (b) to insure that such Chi Nationalist military equipment as requires maintenance be rendered usable: (c) to meet deficiencies, now known to US mil auths, of Chi Nationalist mil supplies and material; and (d) in connection with (c) to give certain mil grant aid to the Chi Nationalist forces.

3. The US Govt shld make the necessary polit arrangements with the Chi Govt and shld direct the Commander in Chief, Far East to undertake forthwith a comprehensive mil survey of the resources and needs of the Chi Nationalist forces."

D. It is clear from the excerpts quoted above that the mil neutralization of Formosa is basic to US policy during the present crisis. Action of Pres announced June 27 was for purpose of eliminating or reducing risk of Commie occupation and mil exploitation of this strategically located island in crisis created by Korean attack, to safeguard sea and air flank of UN forces operating in Ryukyus–Japan–Korea area, and to prevent if possible gen extension hostilities into wider areas of Pacific and Far East. Demonstration given on June 25 that Sov orbit is now prepared to use organized aggresion in pursuit of its objectives raised immed the problem of other areas likely to be attacked as well as problem as to whether USSR was intent upon gen war. Our action to neutralize Formosa was attempt to upset if possible any prearranged Commie time tables and to limit fighting to Korea until gen security situation cld be assessed.

From the mil point of view, western strategic frontier for the essential defense of areas vital to the US rests generally along islands extending from Aleutians through Japan to Phil archipelago. With Kuriles already in hostile hands, Formosa's location is such that, in hands of power hostile to the US, it wld constitute dangerous enemy salient in the center of that part of our position now keyed to Japan, Okinawa and the Philippines. In the event Formosa came into hands of Chi Commies and latter made it available for hostile purposes to Sov forces at time US forces are heavily engaged in Korea, grave danger wld result for entire US position in the western Pacific. Further, seizure of Formosa by Chi Commies at hour when UN forces are resisting aggression in Korea wld be considerable stimulus to morale of destructive forces in Asia and thus work to detriment of US and other friendly states located in or having interests in west and southwest Pacific. The denial of Formosa to Chi Commies is, under present circumstances, an attempt which we must make as a matter of elementary precaution at a time of grave uncertainty.

On specific points arising from our effort to neutralize Formosa military, the fol instrs are called to your attn:

(1) Telcan June 27 containing text msg to CKS re: mission of Seventh Fleet.
(2) Deptels 30 and 55 re: bombing of Communist airfields and troop and ship concentrations by Chi Nationalist forces.
(3) Deptel 61 re: Nationalist held islands along China mainland.
(4) Deptel 64 re: air and naval reconnaissance by Chi Gov.

E. Also clear from the excerpts quoted above is the desire to suspend during the present crisis the complicated polit questions which arise in connection with Formosa. The directive to the Seventh Fleet did not represent a desire on our part to force an answer to such questions. On the contrary, it was hoped that these polit problems, on which the principal govts have widely divergent views, cld be frozen until the security situation cld be clarified. We consider it of the highest importance that differences as to Formosa not divide the solid world community in dealing with the Korean problem and that the necessity for a mil standstill on Formosa can be widely recognized and supported.

As indicated in the President's msg to Congress, July 19, above, US has no designs on Formosa and specifically has no intention of seizing Formosa unilaterally for US mil exploitation. Our action of June 27 was not designed as a step in any US offensive against mainland nor as step to place auths in Formosa in position to mount gen offensive against mainland with US support. If Chi Commies intervene in Korea or attack Formosa, Hong Kong, Indochina, or Burma, our desire not to take action against Chi mainland wld have to be reviewed. However, we do not wish to become involved in any way with gen operations against Chi and wld seek to limit mil action to minimum requirements of situation created by Chi aggressive action.

Failure of US either to reaffirm or to modify its attitude toward Cairo Declaration derives from desire to leave polit questions re Formosa for the future to the maximum extent possible. The absence of policy declarations on such questions shld not be given polit significance.

F. Our interim policy permits mil and econ assistance to Formosa. In the face of a very great Chi Commie build-up along the mainland coast, the Seventh Fleet may not be able to guarantee Formosa against hostile landing. In this event, forces on the island wld have an important role to play in resisting the attack. In addition, it wld not be in US interests for Formosa to fall by subversion or collapse on the island itself. Under the circumstances, it is our desire to furnish, within a prudent use of available appropriations, certain types of econ and mil assistance to the auths on Formosa. This assistance shld be based upon critical needs known to and accepted by competent US mil auths; it shld be supervised to the extent necessary to insure proper use. Although the situation on the island is such that a considerable margin of error may have to be accepted, every effort will be required to insure that US aid is employed for the purposes for which it is given. So long as the Seventh Fleet has its present mission, it is in our interest to insure insofar as possible that the island is in good order, that admin is reasonably effective, that full attn is paid to the lot and well-being of the Formosans themselves and that US aid not become subj to racketeering. If the Seventh Fleet is withdrawn at some point in the future from its present mission, it is desired that the island be in a substantially better position than it was on June 25.

In conducting US aid programs on Formosa, it is not desired to establish enlarged US participation in and assumption of responsibility for the admin of the island. For example, it wld be unwise for ECA to become involved in any formal joint responsibility with the Chi Govt which might symbolize a US commitment to underwrite the economy of the island. This does not mean that ECA should not be actively concerned with and press upon the Chi such econ measures as are necessary to improve the econ situation on Formosa. ECA shld continue to act vigorously, of course, on all matters directly related to the operation of the ECA aid program itself and apply the gen principle used elsewhere that US aid is contingent upon effective performance and honest effort on the part of the recipient.

G. It is our present intention to continue to maintain dipl relations with the Chi Govt on Formosa and to accord to that Govt and its reps the benefits of that relationship. We do not wish to make any commitment to Chi auths as to how long this relationship will extend into the future. On the other hand, US reps on the island are accredited to the Chi Govt and shld conduct their activities accordingly. Conversely, US reps on Formosa shld insist upon full and proper treatment as such by all Chi auths and should report at once any indication of any tendency on the part of the Chi not to maintain relations on an acceptable basis.

H. The US opposes the seating of Chi Commie reps in the UN or other internatl bodies. This is a matter of US policy and is not to be made the subj of any commitment to the Chi Govt on Formosa. The US will accept the normal parliamentary majorities in internatl bodies on this matter and will accept the result if a majority decides to seat the reps of Peiping. We do not consider that we have a veto on this question in the SC. Our view is that if the permanent members of the SC shld be allowed to exercise a veto on this issue, the SC wld find itself in an absurd position and cld be easily wrecked by a recalcitrant member.

I. Insofar as mil operations are concerned, Formosa is within the area of responsibility of CINCFE, who receives directives on such matters through mil channels. It is expected that CINCFE will designate a senior officer as his rep on Formosa. If at any time this officer requires your assistance in connection with his own duties, you will, of course, afford him all possible cooperation. The success of US policy in Formosa will depend to a considerable extent upon cooperation and mutual confidence among the chief of the dipl mission, the chief of the ECA mission and CINCFE's rep.

J. In addition to the mil advice to be furnished by CINCFE's rep and the econ and financial advice to be furnished by ECA, the Chargé d'Affaires will wish to consider what recommendations and advice the US shld offer on other matters of a polit and administrative nature. In the normal case, you shld consult the Dept on such matters, where time permits, before approaching Chi auths.

Part II—Long-Range Policy

A. It is not possible under present circumstances to provide detailed instrs regarding our long-range policy toward Formosa. It is anticipated that the interim policy outlined above will obtain for a considerable period and that events in the broader world scene will have an important bearing on the Formosa situation.

B. It is US policy to employ polit and econ means to present [prevent] Formosa's falling into Commie hands. At the present time, polit and econ means have been reinforced by the mission assigned to the Seventh Fleet. It will be in the interest of the US, therefore, for Formosa to become politically stable, economically self-sustaining and militarily secure. The achievement of this result will require a more enlightened statesmanship from Chi leaders than has thus far shown itself on Formosa. Chi auths will need a reasonably efficient admin acting under legal processes, the confidence and respect of the Formosan people, the loyal support of disciplined and effective armed forces and internatl approval of conditions on the island.

C. It is not in the interest of the US to restrict its freedom of action by indefinite commitments to the Chi auths on Formosa as to our future policy. Specifically, we shld make no long-range commitments about continued recognition of the Nationalist Govt as the Govt of China, about the Chi seat in the UN, or, particularly, about US support for attempts by the Nationalist Govt to return to the mainland. This does not mean that we may not continue to recognize the Nationalist Govt and support it in the UN; it does mean that our policy shld be based solely on overall US interests and not upon commitments to the Chi Nationalist Govt impairing our freedom of action.

Part III—Responsibilities of US Officials on Formosa

The US Chargé d'Affaires, as ranking US rep on Formosa, is responsible for assuring that all US activities on Formosa (other than CINCFE's mil responsibilities) are coordinated toward the achievement of the fon policy objectives of the US.

In order to carry out his mission with respect to Formosa, CINCFE will maintain on Formosa for purposes of liaison with the Chi Natl mil auths a liaison group under a senior officer with direct responsibility to and channels of communication with CINCFE and such other mil auths as the latter may direct. Such senior officer shld at all times keep the US Chargé d'Affaires generally informed on all matters except those concerning details of mil operation and admin.

The Chief of the ECA mission on Formosa will work in close cooperation with and under the gen policy guidance of the US Chargé d'Affaires. The Chief of the ECA Mission will continue to receive operating supervision from the ECA Administrator and will use his own communication series for that purpose. [Rusk.]

TOP SECRET PRIORITY WASHINGTON, 14 August 1950—3 : 07 p. m.

JCS 88681. From JCS. Your CX 59318[1] intent of Presidential Directive and of our orders "by Naval and Air action" to defend Formosa against invasion or attack by Chinese Communists is to limit our action there to such operations as are practicable without committing any forces to the island of Formosa itself. Joint Chiefs of Staff therefore desire at this time that you make no commitment to Chinese Nationalist Government to base fighter squadrons on Formosa in event of actual attack and that no squadrons or other U.S. forces be based ashore on Formosa unless specific approval has been given by them.

[1] The text of this message from General MacArthur, dated August 4, read in part as follows:

". . . No plans to transfer FEC Ftr Sqdns to Formosa except in event actual attack on Formosa by Communists. However, GHQ survey team as well as representatives FEAF and NAVFE are visiting Formosa to make survey of defense rqmts, and ftr elements from Okinawa and Philippines will make flights over Formosa for both familiarization of FEC pers and morale build-up for population of Formosa. As part of familiarization flights considered highly desirable for small groups of F–80 A/C to land temporarily at one or more Formosa airfields.

"2. Consider foregoing action in consonance with existing directive. It is repeated that there is no current intention to physically transfer air elements to Formosa except in actual invasion by Communists." (Department of Defense Files).

388. 1. I discussed with Bajpai, SYG MEA, today extent to which Peiping might have gone in assuring Panikkar that it had no intention to attack Formosa or to become implicated in present hostilities.

2. Bajpai said Peiping had given no definite assurances to Panikkar about its intentions. In one telegram Panikkar had stated that he had the impression after discussing international situation with Peiping officials that they did not wish to see hostilities extended beyond the confines of Korea. In another telegram he had expressed concern lest Peiping, not wishing to become involved in hostilities just now with US over Formosa might turn its attention for time being to Tibet. On other hand after visiting Shanghai recently Panikkar reported that he observed Communists were building huge airdromes around that city. Bajpai said Panikkar did not know why these airdromes were being constructed. It was difficult to believe that Chinese thought US was planning attack Shanghai. Bajpai added that his own impression from examination of all of Panikkar's reports was that Chinese not likely attack Formosa in near future, but it was impossible say with assurance what it might do.

3. Bajpai said GOI had received no reports from Panikkar even hinting that Molotov or any Soviet official of such high rank had visited China since Panikkar's arrival. (Deptels 228, August 11 and 223, August 10).[1]

1. During conversation with Bajpai this morning on another subject I said that I would like to tell him in confidence re certain exchanges that have been taking place between this mission and Shakapba. Some time ago when Shakapba was in New Delhi he had asked me orally what Tibet had already asked the US Government previously through other channels, that is, whether US Government would be willing to render assistance to Tibet in event of unprovoked military invasion by Communist China. I had forwarded his inquiry to Washington and had recently received reply which I had sent to Shakapba. Reply had been to general effect that if Tibet should be invaded by Communist China or if it was under active threat of such invasion US would be willing to send certain amount military equipment to Tibet if Tibetan Government could arrange for transit such equipment across countries through which it must pass in order to reach Tibet. I told Bajpai that I thought it would be well for GOI to have this information for background in case it should be approached by Tibetan Government.

2. Bajpai said he was grateful that I had given him this information; that he felt it might be preferable for GOI take no action until, or unless, it was approached by GOI [Tibetan Government?] [2]

3. Referring to conversation August 10 (Embtel 343, August 11) Bajpai said that GOI had received message from Panikkar stating latter had approached Peiping officials re Tibet expressing the hope of India that Peiping would not endeavor solve Tibet problem by use

HENDERSON

[3] In telegram 343, Ambassador Henderson informed the Department that Bajpai had told him that Panikkar had been instructed to deliver to the Government of the People's Republic of China a message along the following lines:

"GOI has proved on various occasions its friendly feeling for Peoples Government of China. It had gone so far in this respect at to create ill will against it in certain circles. It was hopeful China and India together could promote world peace. If China should now launch fresh armies of invasion into Tibet, or elsewhere, it might well be contributing to new world war. India particularly anxious that differences between China and Tibet be solved by other than armed conflict. It therefore urged China not to invade Tibet. Stories to effect that Government Tibet was conspiring with British or Americans untrue. Tibetans had no contacts with British or Americans. Only foreign representative in Lhasa was Indian. If China insisted on making unprovoked attack on Tibet, India might be compelled revise its opinion re peaceful intentions China and even take different view re Chinese admission to UN."

Mr. Henderson then made the following concluding observations in his telegram:

"Bajpai when outlining nature of message to me had no notes in front of him. He was, therefore, talking rather loosely. I am inclined to opinion his description of message reflected what lay behind it rather than what was actually incorporated in it. It is difficult to believe that after Nehru has gone so far in basing GOI's foreign policy on friendship with Communist China, he would jeopardize such gains as he had made by sending message so strong character. Regardless wording message, I am convinced Panikkar has been instructed to do his utmost to persuade Peiping not to invade Tibet. If Peiping launches invasion in near future, Nehru may decide that he has been staking too much on hopes of Peiping's tractability and friendship." (691.93/8–1150)

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, August 16, 1950—6 p. m.

257. Eyes only Henderson, ReDeptel 115 July 25,[1] it is suggested that at ur discretion you now take opportunity discuss with Bajpai question Formosa, with primary design ascertain probable Indian reactions to possible clash Amer and Chi Commie forces in event offensive action being launched by Commies against Formosa. Suggest fol line thought:

US of course most desirous avoiding extension present conflict even as is Bajpai himself (as for instance as reported Embtel 95 July 15).[2] Amer action June 27 respecting Formosa was taken purely for reasons mil expediency and was without regard polit future island. Decision whether hostilities Korea are to be localized or will spread southward rests solely with Chi Commies, who will presumably be under pressure

[1] For the text of this message, see vol. VII, p. 466.

[2] Text ibid., p. 391.

Moscow this connection. US itself will of course not undertake enlargement field hostilities Asia or elsewhere, but if Chi commies initiate overtly hostile action in any of Asian danger points, US wld of course be compelled react in appropriate manner. Action wld be with full intent localizing conflict, but as indicated in Emb reftel Indian leaders wld agree further aggravation present situation exceedingly dangerous.

Presumably Chi Commies who have to date refrained from overt participation Korean conflict will continue to do so. If they choose intervene, matter is one for consideration UN. Manner of retaliation against any such overt intervention by Chi Commies by extension hostilities over Korean border into China wld presumably be one for mil consideration under UN mandate. If Chi Commies were to launch hostile action against Formosa while we are engaged in supporting UN action in Korea and thus involve US fleet in hostilities, US wld again first seek localization action, but if Commies undertook intensify and enlarge hostilities we shld even as in Korea be compelled, though against our basic desires, carry retaliatory action to sources from which blows against us stemmed.

If Peiping acts as Commie cat's-paw for extension of mil aggression, it can finally only bring grave damage upon itself, for any mil adventurism by Chi Commies outside their frontiers wld lead inevitably to aggravation internatl conflict now smouldering and ultimately bring in its train destruction China rail, water and highway communications, transportation system and meager industrial base Chi economy. China wld thus be pushed further back to level peasant society and its progress toward modernization be set back decade or more. History Sino-Amer relations past century shows clearly Amer desire is to foster econ progress and social well being China as a nation, but if Commies take up the sword they must be prepared accept consequences.

Same considerations wld be effective and same situation prevail in other danger points around China periphery. Interest US in maintenance stability Philippines well known Indian Govt. Indian Govt itself likewise presumably interested maintenance stability Tibet and Burma (see Rangoon's 34 July 21 to Dept pouched New Delhi).[3] This Govt also concerned with any threat to stability those two areas, but feels India's interest there paramount and wld appreciate receiving expression current Indian estimate existing situation. Amer interest in maintenance stability Far East is conceived as being parallel to Indian interest and our desire is for mutual understanding and close coordination in so far as possible respecting overall problem. US desirous contributing if possible to econ advancement Asia, not to see econ progress retarded by war. US desires give fullest consideration

[3] Not printed.

Indian views on subj and moreover believes that frank exchange views re problems common US and Indian Govts wld be of great usefulness for overall aim of prevention extension present hostilities.

Above shld be used only as suggestive guide for conversation which, as indicated above, you wld undertake only at ur discretion and wld mould with due concern sensibilities Indian leaders. It is specifically suggested you not seek special occasion for this approach but allow it to come up informally and not as "instructions". At this time chief aim wld be obtaining from such discussion good indication re Indian thinking on problem in point. For urinfo however you shld not be restrained in ur discussion by consideration that substance conversation might be transmitted Pannikar at Peiping and even through that channel leak to Chi Commies there. In fact Dept feels such leak might have salutary effect on situation, particularly if North Korean aggressors sustain mil set-back near future.

Urgency matter in point indicated by feeling Dept there is strong possibility Chi Commies launching attack on Formosa during Aug, whether or not aggressors Korean campaign continue advance.

Pls report urgently Dept any adverse reaction you may have this project.

The Chargé in China (Strong) to the Secretary of State

TOP SECRET TAIPEI, August 18, 1950—noon.

273. Eyes only Rusk from Rankin. Deptel 144, August 14 received only yesterday and as yet I have not discussed contents with Barrett and Moyer. Distribution being limited to them and Strong.

Following is therefore initial reaction to be supplemented as necessary after further consideration here:

Part I on interim policy seems to me practically unexceptionable and sufficiently comprehensive. This comment based on assumption that text in reftel for highly restricted distribution during foreseeable future and not to be given to press or allowed to leak without detailed reconsideration. I should appreciate opportunity to comment, in advance of publication, on any important statements to be made.

Part II on long-range policy necessarily leaves something to be desired. Undoubtedly you are fully aware of inherent weaknesses in our position but I venture mention certain considerations which also have important bearing on interim problems. NSC decided sometime ago Formosa could not be held without use of American ground forces which decision served as basis for adoption passive US military policy.

Whether or not that decision entirely justified it recognized necessity of more effective aid than we now prepared to give and implied longer term policy than we have so far adopted. May be questioned whether long-range policy described reftel is adequate to encourage Chinese Nationalist forces to fight effectively in event Communist landings on Formosa and to refrain from turnover in response initial Communist successes. Without US ground forces our position evidently much more dependent on behavior Nationalist forces. But proposed long-range policy could be taken by Chinese Nationalists to indicate our intention help them militarily only for few months until Korean affair settled and Japanese treaty negotiated; then feel ourselves free to recognize Communists and let them cut throats of military and political leaders on Formosa who had collaborated with us. Desirability more positive and comprehensive long-range policy at earliest possible moment seems obvious.

Part III on official responsibilities would be greatly improved by inclusion two sentences somewhat as follows: "The chiefs of the diplomatic mission, the ECA mission and the military liaison group shall keep each other fully and currently informed on all significant political, economic and military matters in order that there may be the closest coordination of all US activities on Formosa. While the three chiefs should not burden each other with unnecesarily detailed information, there shall be in principle no secrets between them." While I anticipate no difficulties whatever with ECA, instructions in reftel could be interpreted by military as allowing them to tell us practically nothing as has been practice to date. Meanwhile they are in position take steps of greater actual political effect than anything Embassy likely to be authorized carry out. Examples are MacArthur's visit, daily flights of USAF jets over Taipei, presence of two US major generals and staffs from Japan and Philippines and constant coming and going other general officers most of whom Embassy hears about only by accident. The Department of State to the British Embassy

The Department of State, having reference to the President's statement of June 27, 1950 announcing inter alia that the Seventh Fleet had been ordered to prevent hostilities between Formosa and the mainland, hereby surveys for the information of the British Embassy the various channels now available to the National Government for the procurement of military matériel in the United States. The attention of the British Embassy is invited particularly in this connection to the circumstance that the Chinese Communists have on numerous occasions within recent weeks re-emphasized their determination to attack Formosa, and have so disposed of their ground forces on the mainland that a Communist attempt to invade Taiwan remains a dangerous possibility in spite of the efforts of the United States to effect the neutralization of Formosa in a military sense. It is logical to assume that the furnishing of certain requisite items of military equipment to the Chinese forces on Formosa would serve as an additional element to discourage such an attack. It is therefore considered necessary to give due regard to any deficiencies that might exist on the island in terms of military equipment in order that the Chinese military establishment located there may act effectively in its own defense. There have, therefore, been introduced recently some modifications into previously existing arrangements respecting the procurement of military matériel, as indicated below.

The United States Government is continuing to provide assistance to the National Government under the $125 million grants appropriated under the China Aid Act of 1948, and various Governmental agencies are procuring matériel to meet specific requests submitted by the National Government.

Under the authorization of Public Law 512 of the 79th Congress, the United States Navy may sell to the National Government equipment to maintain vessels which it has transferred to the Chinese Navy. The United States Navy is continuing to give consideration to National Government requests for purchases of this nature.

The various agencies of the Department of Defense have now been authorized to sell to the National Government any matériel under United States control provided there is no Service objection to such sales. The National Government can thus make cash purchases under authorization of Public Law 329, section 408(e) 81st Congress, and can also purchase surplus matériel if such is available.

The National Government continues to have normal access to the commercial arms markets of the United States.

Under the various authorizations indicated above the National Government is in a position to negotiate for the purchase of any item of military equipment desired.

The United States Government has reviewed its policy regarding the issuance of export licenses to the Chinese Government for jet aircraft and medium or heavy tanks in the light of recent developments in the Far East and the increased importance of Chinese Government defense requirements. After thorough consideration it has been decided that the United States Government cannot logically continue to prohibit the exporting by the Chinese Government of jet aircraft and medium and heavy tanks if such equipment is found to be available in excess of the needs of the United States defense establishment, given the politico-military situation indicated in the opening paragraph above.

In any instance where a purchase is being made through an agency of the United States Government, the needs and commitments of this Government will be taken into consideration prior to the fulfillment of the request.

The above procedures govern purchases by the National Government from its own funds. The United States Government is currently giving consideration to the matter of dispatch of a military mission to survey the defense needs of National Government forces on Formosa with the view to possibly providing some grant aid to the National Government. In the meantime, consideration is being given to the furnishing of military assistance without cost to the National Government on a limited basis and in accordance with established procedures under the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended. The National Government has not been informed of this possible development. The furnishing of grant aid on a program basis, except for possible limited emergency supply action, would not be undertaken prior to the effecting of the aforementioned survey and then only depending upon the recommendations of the military survey mission.

The Department of State is cognizant of the concern of His British Majesty's Government with the matter in point and will not fail to keep the British Embassy informed in respect to developments in this field. It may be stated at this time, however, that the American policy with respect to Formosa is firmly based on the President's statements of June 27 and July 19, 1950 and that there is no intention to depart from the principles enunciated therein. Particularly, the American action of June 27 with respect to Formosa is not to be regarded as a stepping-stone for either an American advance against the mainland, or as a preparation for returning Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek to the mainland with American support.

WASHINGTON, August 23, 1950.

794A.00/8–2450 : Telegram

The Ambassador in India (Henderson) to the Secretary of State

TOP SECRET PRIORITY NEW DELHI, August 24, 1950—8 p. m.

466. 1. During conversation with Bajpai SYG MEA on August 24, he referred to previous conversations which he had had on subject Formosa. He said GOI had received telegram from Pannikar, Peking, stating that latter did not believe Peking has immediate intention attack Formosa. Peking was, however, convinced that Chiang Kai-shek and his group were being supported by US in order to give "legal cover for future aggression against mainland". In Pannikar's opinion it might be possible to persuade Peking not to press issue Formosa if assurances could be obtained from US on one of following alternatives: (a) After Korean situation was eased, US would withdraw protection Kuomintang remnants in Formosa or (b) if UN would accept Peking as sole representative China or (c) if UK, India and other powers which had recognized Peking could give assurances that they would use their influence to see that US did not aim putting forward Chiang legal cover for aggression against it or at keeping Kuomintang remnants in Formosa permanently under US protection.

2. I told Bajpai I was relieved to hear that in Pannikar's opinion Peking had no immediate intention to attack Formosa. I would appreciate it if he could let me have exact wording of appropriate passages from Pannikar's telegram to send to Washington because it was important that in reporting our conversation I be as precise as possible. Bajpai agreed and sent me excerpts later in day.

They read as follow:

"There is no reason to think that China has any immediate intention to attack Taiwan. Apart from all other considerations she feels that her very substantial gains may themselves be jeopardized if a world war now intervenes and confuses issue. Also she realizes that while she has great powers of resistance, she cannot carry on a war against America. Chinese leaders are therefore determined to avoid a war unless they are forced into it by a direct threat to their authority on the mainland.

In my opinion what has caused greatest resentment in China is not so much the military protective measures that America has taken to safeguard her lines of communication to Korea, but the fact that American air and naval forces are giving protection to a clique which claims to de jure government of China and whose representatives under American patronage is representing China in international bodies. I would like to emphasize that Chinese Government are persuaded that ultimate object of America is to bring down People's Government of China.

They are convinced that Chiang Kai-shek and his group are being maintained by Americans in Taiwan and upheld in SC in order to give legal cover for future aggression against mainland. This may be groundless fear but she can adduce many arguments in support of it, such as alliance with Siam intervention in Indochina, MacArthur's visit to Taiwan, America's implacable hostility to Peking Government's claim to seat in SC, etc.

It will be possible to get China to soft pedal this issue of Taiwan, if assurances were forthcoming from USA on one of following alternatives:

First, that once Korean situation has eased, America will withdraw her protection and not intervene to prevent Chinese Government from invading Taiwan and liquidating Kuomintang remnants. Present position would seem to be that while America has disclaimed all intention of annexing Taiwan, she has declared that determination of island's future must await either a peaceful settlement with Japan or a decision by UN. Neither of those could be considered satisfactory from point of view of China as deciding voice, in both cases Chinese fear, will be that of USA. They point out that all other Japanese possessions have been appropriated otherwise and assume the question of Taiwan should also be considered to have been finally settled by Cairo Declaration and not be reopened either at peace negotiations or in UN.

Second alternative which will help Chinese to overlook present irregular position in Taiwan is if UN accepts Peking Government as sole representative of China. That will, in Chinese view, minimize chances of America being able to utilize Kuomintang regime in Taiwan as a legal cover for aggression. It may be pointed out that Chiang has been openly proclaiming that he will go back to China as legal government as soon as the third world war breaks out.

Third alternative would be for British, India and other powers which have recognized China to assure her that they will use their influence to see that America does not aim at putting forward Chiang as a legal cover for aggression against her or keep Kuomintang remnants in Taiwan permanently under their protection."

3. I said that I thought it would be preferable for me not to attempt make other than tentative comments re alternatives suggested. I doubted, however, that US Government would be able to give any assurances re future Formosa at least until policy Peking and its Communist associates in FE would become somewhat more clear. I did not believe US Government would be inclined to give such assurances so long as there was danger that China or Russia might directly or indirectly engage in further acts aggression in FE. It would be difficult militarily for US if, as loyal member UN, it was endeavoring combat Communist aggression in FE while Peking was in possession Formosa. US certainly had no intention move against Chinese mainland so long as Peking Government did not attack Formosa or did not engage in aggression elsewhere in Asia. It was hoped that Peking understood thoroughly that if by acts aggression it should force US into conflict with it, results might be disastrous for it. US had maintained friendly relations with China for many years and valued friendship of Chinese people. Nevertheless in case of Peking aggression US might be compelled to take steps to break Peking's military power by destruction Chinese communications system and industries which could be used for military purposes.

4. Bajpai said he assumed from Pannikar's telegram Peking understood this danger. Pannikar had pointed out that Peking realized that it could not carry on war against US. In Bajpai's opinion Moscow was doing its best persuade Peking to attack Formosa, but Peking was holding back. His opinion was not based on reports from Moscow or Peking, but from his knowledge of way Russians [operate?]. It was objective India prevent Peking from following line desired by Soviet Government.

5. I said that with regard to other two alternatives suggested in Pannikar's telegram there was little for me to say since they called for action either by UN or by various powers which had entered into relations with China. It seemed likely that at least so long as fighting continued in Korea, US Government would continue to oppose admission Peking into UN.

6. Bajpai said GOI hoped that it would be possible for US to give assurances suggested in first alternative and asked if in my opinion it would be helpful for Nehru send special message to Secretary of State on subject. I said I thought it would be preferable at least in present stage for us to handle this matter more informally. I would not like to encourage PM to make suggestions to Secretary of State which US might find itself unable accept. I promised, however, to forward views expressed by him to Department.

479. 1. During my talk August 24 with Bajpai, SYG MEA, he told me telegram had been received from Panikkar Indian Ambassador Peking re Tibet. He had received reply from Peking Foreign Office to his representations made several days previously re Tibet.

2. According to Panikkar Peking's reply was to effect that it must maintain its sovereignty over Tibet; that it did not however wish to have armed conflict; that it therefore had instructed its Ambassador to India to enter into tentative conversations with Tibetan representatives shortly after his arrival in Delhi with understanding final conversations would take place Peking.

3. Bajpai said he was convinced from tenor Panikkar's telegram that Peking did not contemplate at least in immediate future dispatch armed forces into Tibet. He was, however, not too optimistic re future Tibet. He personally thought Peking would insist upon setting up Communist regime in Lhasa which working with Peking would gradually make Tibet integral part China. There was little India could do assist Tibet. He did not know what attitude Tibetan representatives would take. They might well as result preliminary conversations decide it would be useless go to Peking and then fat would be in fire.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Director of the Office of Chinese Affairs (Perkins)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] August 25, 1950.

Subject: Proposed U.S. Action in the UN Regarding Chou En-lai's Letter to the Secretary General [1]

Participants: Mr. B. A. B. Burrows, Counselor, British Embassy
Mr. Merchant, FE
Mr. Perkins, CA

Mr. Burrows called this afternoon at his request to state that the British had given consideration to the draft US statement for use in the United Nations Security Council in reply to the letter from Chou En-lai to the Secretary General. Mr. Burrows indicated in summary that the British thought it would be unfortunate to have the question precipitated in the UNSC in a substantive form before there was a clearer exchange of views between the US and the UK on the Formosa question as related to the UN. He said that the British were anxious to avoid anything being said in the Council which it might later be found desirable or necessary to retract. Mr. Burrows then read from a message from the Foreign Office which recommended that an endeavor be made to play for time in consideration of the Chinese Communist appeal. In order to avoid having the matter become a bone of contention between the two governments, the British Government wished to have full exchange of views with the US. To this end, the Foreign Office was expecting to furnish at an early moment an outline of British views on the subject.

Mr. Merchant explained that Ambassador Austin planned to transmit the American statement to the Secretary General (he perhaps had already done so) for circulation among the Council members; if the question was raised in the Council Mr. Austin would then read the statement. Mr. Burrows indicated that this would be a happier procedure than forthright debate which would be inconclusive and which would likely bring the US in as a party to the dispute.

[1] The letter under reference was dated August 24 and is printed in U.N. document S/1715. It accused the United States of direct armed aggression against the territory of China by its action in preventing the liberation of Taiwan by the forces of the People's Republic of China. The text of the letter was read into the minutes of the meeting of the U.N. Security Council held on August 25 to consider the Korean question by the Soviet Representative, Yakov Malik, who was President of the Council for the month of August. The United States Representative, Ernest Gross, responded by reading a letter from Ambassador Austin to Secretary-General Lie, dated August 25 (U.N. document S/1716), denying the Chinese charge, reiterating the United States position on Formosa, and welcoming United Nations consideration and full investigation of the case of Formosa. For the record of the Security Council meeting, see U.N. document S/PV.490.

Mr. Merchant said it was our expectation to keep the British Embassy fully informed of our thinking on the subject as it developed. Mr. Burrows indicated in closing that quiet treatment for the immediate future and close consultation between the two governments would have the virtue of avoiding the appearance of political cleavage and would prevent the Russians from using the Formosa question as a device to becloud the Korean issue.

The Secretary of State to Certain Diplomatic Offices [1]

SECRET WASHINGTON, August 26, 1950—3 a. m.

Expect considerable press reporting comment and speculation re reported msg Gen MacArthur to Vet. For. Wars Chicago Convention Aug 28 dealing Far East policy Formosa in particular.

President's statement of June 27, his msg to Congress of July 19 and Amb Austin's letter of Aug 25 to SC are only authoritative statements on US policy respect Formosa. They continue to represent our policy. There have been no changes.

For urinfo only pertinent sections purported MacArthur msg as distributed advance text to press fol:

"In view of misconceptions currently being voiced concerning the relationship of Formosa to our strategic potential in the Pacific, I believe it in the public interest to avail myself of this opportunity to state my views thereon to you, all of whom having fought overseas understand broad strategic concepts. To begin with, any appraisal of that strategic potential requires an appreciation of the changes wrought in the course of the past war. Prior thereto the Western strategic frontier of the US lay on the littoral line of the Americas with an exposed island salient extending out through Hawaii, Midway and Guam to the Philippines. That salient was not an outpost of strength but an avenue of weakness along which the enemy could and did attack us. The Pacific was a potential area of advancement for any predatory force intent upon striking at the bordering land areas.

All of this was changed by our Pacific victory. Our strategic frontier then shifted to embrace the entire Pacific Ocean which has become a vast moat to protect us as long as we hold it. Indeed, it acts as a protective shield to all of the Americas and all free lands of the Pacific Ocean area we control to the shores of Asia by a chain of islands extending in an arc from the Aleutians to the Marianas held by us and our free Allies. From this island chain we can dominate with air power every Asiatic port from Vladivostok to Singapore and prevent any hostile movement into the Pacific. Any predatory attack from Asia must be an amphibious effort. No amphibious force can be successful with our control of the sealanes and the air over these lanes in its avenue of advance. With Naval and air supremacy and modern ground elements to defend bases, any major attack from continental Asia toward us or our friends of the Pacific would come to failure. Under such conditions the Pacific no longer represents menacing avenues of approach for a prospective invader—it assumes instead the friendly aspect of a peaceful lake. Our line of defense is a natural one and can be maintained with a minimum of military effort and expense. It envisions no attack against anyone nor does it provide the bastions essential for offensive operations, but properly maintained wld be an invincible defense against aggression. If we hold this line we may have peace—lose it and war is inevitable.

The geographic location of Formosa is such that in the hand of a power unfriendly to the US it constitutes an enemy salient in the very center of this defensive perimeter, 100 to 150 miles closer to the adjacent friendly segments—Okinawa and the Philippines—than any point in continental Asia. At the present time there is on Formosa a concentration of operational air and naval bases which is potentially greater than any similar concentration of the Asiatic mainland between the Yellow Sea and Strait of Malacca. Additional bases can be developed in a relatively short time by an aggressive exploitation of all World War II Japanese facilities. An enemy force utilizing those installations currently available could increase by 100 percent the air effort which cld be directed against Okinawa as compared to operations based on the mainland and at the same time cld direct damaging air attacks with fighter type aircraft against friendly installations in the Philippines which are currently beyond the range of fighters based on the mainland. Our air supremacy at once wld become doubtful.

As a result of its geographic location and base potential, utilization of Formosa by a mil power hostile to the US may either counterbalance or overshadow the strategic importance of the central and southern flank of the US front line position. Formosa in the hands of such an hostile power cld be compared to an unsinkable aircraft carrier and submarine tender ideally located to accomplish offensive strategy and at the same time checkmate defensive or counter-offensive operations by friendly forces based on Okinawa and the Philippines. This unsinkable carrier-tender has the capacity to operate from 10 to 20 air groups of types ranging from jet fighters to B–29 type bombers as well as to provide forward operating facilities for short-range coastal submarines. In acquiring this forward submarine base, the efficacy of the short range submarine wld be so enormously increased by the additional radius of activity as to threaten completely sea traffic from the south and interdict all sea lanes in the Western Pacific. Submarine blockade by the enemy with all its destructive ramifications wld thereby become a virtual certainty.

Shld Formosa fall and bases thereafter come into the hands of a potential enemy of the US, the latter will have acquired an additional 'fleet' which will have been obtained and can be maintained at an incomparably lower cost than cld its equivalent in aircraft carriers and submarine tenders. Current estimates of air and submarine resources in the FE indicate the capability of such a potential enemy to extend his forces southward and still maintain an imposing degree of mil strength for employment elsewhere in the Pacific area.

Historically, Formosa has been used as a springboard for just such mil aggression directed against areas to the south. The most notable and recent example was the utilization of it by the Japanese in World War II. At the outbreak of the Pacific War in 1941, it played an important part as a staging area and supporting base for the various Jap invasion convoys. The supporting air forces of Japan's Army and Navy were based on fields situated along southern Formosa. From 1942 through 1944 Formosa was a vital link in the transportation and communication chain which stretched from Japan through Okinawa and the Philippines to Southeast Asia. As the US carrier forces advanced into the Western Pacific, the bases on Formosa assumed an increasingly greater role in the Jap defense scheme. Shld Formosa fall into the hands of an hostile power, history wld repeat itself. Its mil potential wld again be fully exploited as the means to breach and neutralize our western Pacific defense system and mount a war of conquest against the free nations of the Pacific basin.

Nothing could be more fallacious than the threadbare argument by those who advocate appeasement and defeatism in the Pacific that if we defend Formosa we alienate continental Asia. Those who speak thus do not understand the Orient. They do not grant that it is in the pattern of the Oriental psychology to respect and follow aggressive, resolute and dynamic leadership—to quickly turn on a leadership characterized by timidity or vacillation—and they underestimate the oriental mentality. Nothing in the last five years has so inspired the Far East as the American determination to preserve the bulwarks of our Pacific Ocean strategic position from future encroachment, for few of its peoples fail accurately to appraise the safeguard such determination brings to their free institutions. To pursue any other course would be to turn over the fruits of our Pacific victory to a potential enemy. It would shift any future battle area five thousand miles eastward to the coasts of the American continents, our own home coast; it would completely expose our friends in the Philippines, our friends in Australia and New Zealand, our friends in Indonesia, our friends in Japan, and other areas, to the lustful thrusts of those who stand for slavery as against liberty, for atheism as against God.

The decision of President Truman on June 27 lighted into flame a lamp of hope throughout Asia that was burning dimly toward extinction. It marked for the Far East the focal and turning point in this area's struggle for freedom. It swept aside in one great monumental stroke all of the hypocrisy and the sophistry which has confused and deluded so many people distant from the actual scene."

Memorandum by Mr. Lucius D. Battle, Special Assistant to the Secretary of State, for the Record of the Events of August 26, 1950

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON, August 26, 1950.]

Mr. Acheson met about 8:15 a. m. with Mr. Rusk with regard to the message which General MacArthur had sent to the VFW. The meeting had been called the preceding night. Mr. Matthews, Mr. Jessup and Mr. Webb joined the Secretary in that order.

Mr. Rusk asked me to call Ambassador Harriman and ask him to stop by the Secretary's office on his way to his own office. Mr. Harriman agreed to do this and arrived at the State Department about 8:55. Consideration was given to the message which General MacArthur had sent and to the political problems which such a message would raise.

Mr. Harriman came out and told me that he wanted to see the President prior to the 9:30 meeting which was scheduled. He asked me to call Matt Connelly [1] and arrange for him to see the President before this meeting. I was unable to reach Mr. Connelly but spoke to Mr. Hopkins [2] who told me that he would arrange for Mr. Harriman to come in.

After the meeting at the White House, the Secretary said that the President had raised the question of the message which General MacArthur had sent out. The President then read the message in its entirety, commenting on certain portions of it as he did so. The Secretary did not discuss the message during the course of this meeting. The President referred to the message as having been given to him by Mr. Harriman. The President considered the matter carefully and decided that the only course was to order withdrawal of the message. He instructed Secretary Johnson to issue an order to General MacArthur for the withdrawal of this message.

Following this, there were numerous telephone conversations which are reported separately.

L. D. BATTLE

[WASHINGTON,] August 26, 1950.

Secretary Johnson telephoned Secretary Acheson shortly after the latter's return from the White House meeting. Secretary Johnson said he had been thinking over the order to MacArthur to withdraw his statement to the VFW. He thought that to do so would cause a great deal of embarrassment, and said that the Joint Chiefs of Staff and he thought that a message should go to him stating that if the General's statement were issued "we" will have to issue one stating that it is one man's opinion and is not the official policy of the Government.

Secretary Acheson said he thought that the matter raised the issue as to who is the President of the United States; that MacArthur had made a statement contrary to what the President and Austin have stated was our position on Formosa. Simply to say that the statement is one man's views gets the President and the Government into complete confusion as to what parts of the statement are not the Government's policy; as to whether the Government knew about the statement before it became public; why it is not our policy, etc., etc. The Secretary said he thought there was nothing to do but for the President to assert his authority, and in this way make it clear that the President's stated position on Formosa stood.

Secretary Johnson at this point asked Secretary Acheson if he thought "we dare send him a message that the President directs him to withdraw his statement". Secretary Acheson said he saw nothing else to do.

Secretary Johnson then said he did not understand from the meeting this morning that the President had actually agreed to send a direct order to MacArthur. Mr. Acheson said that it was his recollection that Ambassador Harriman had put forward the view quite clearly that MacArthur should be ordered to withdraw the order, and that the President had clearly agreed that this was the course to follow.

Since there seemed to be doubt in Secretary Johnson's mind and the minds of the JCS that this was the clear decision, Secretary Acheson agreed to call Ambassador Harriman and straighten out the matter.

Secretary Acheson telephoned Ambassador Harriman and reported that he had been talking with Secretary Johnson, who had been discussing the matter with the JCS, who thought it would be very unwise to order MacArthur, and that they recommended sending him a telegram saying that if the message is delivered, they will have to put out a statement that it is one man's opinion and not official.

The Secretary said to Ambassador Harriman that he had thought it clear that the President had agreed with the position which Ambassador Harriman had set forth at the meeting this morning at the White House—that MacArthur should be ordered to withdraw the statement. If Ambassador Harriman had any doubt about Secretary Acheson's understanding, then they should go back to the President. The Secretary reiterated his own view that it was a question of who is President of the U.S., and that when one of the highest army officials say something directly contrary to what the President says, he must be ordered not to do so.

The Secretary said he would like to ask Mr. Harriman (1) whether the President did issue a clear order that an order should go to MacArthur; (2) whether Mr. Harriman still considered this a wise order.

Ambassador Harriman said that he was talking with Mr. Charles Ross [3] at that moment and had told him that the President had said that the order should go to MacArthur and that he, Ambassador

[3] Press Secretary to President Truman.

Harriman, agreed with it fully; that that was the only way to deal with it. Everyone knew that this was going to cause a bad mess at the best. Ambassador Harriman had said that if Mr. Ross thought there was anything wrong about this course, something might still be done. Ambassador Harriman had said to Mr. Ross that he understood Secretary Johnson was going to call up MacArthur. Mr. Ross said he did not think this was sufficient; that there must be something in writing which could be released as soon as anything leaked.

Mr. Harriman said it was very clear in his mind that, unless MacArthur were ordered not to make the statement, there will be confusion all around the world. He did not believe repudiation of the statement after it was made public was the same thing as an order not to make it. The matter was so serious that only drastic measures could cope with it. Repudiation simply could not catch up with the results of the statement. Ambassador Harriman said he was ready, in recommending the order of the President, to face the possibility that it might mean MacArthur's resignation. But to do less would mean that there would be repercussions which could never be caught up with.

Ambassador Harriman said he thought that Secretary Johnson had seen the President for a moment after the meeting.

Secretary Acheson said he would call Secretary Johnson and say (1) that Ambassador Harriman had understood that the President had issued the order to withdraw the statement; and (2) that in Mr. Harriman's opinion that is the wise course; (3) If there is any doubt we ought to reassemble and go over it again.

Ambassador Harriman said that he and Mr. Ross agreed that something should be done here about the Matthews statement also.[4]

Ambassador Harriman asked if Secretary Acheson could find out how the MacArthur message was given out—by the VFW or by MacArthur. Secretary Acheson said he would find out.

The information which the Secretary later conveyed to Mr. Harriman is as follows:

By making discreet inquiries, it was learned that

There is some reason to believe that key newspaper publishers around the country were supplied the complete text of General MacArthur's letter directly. We were unable to find out whether it was sent directly from Toyko or by the VFW. The only formal press release was made in Chicago.

Secretary Acheson then telephoned Secretary Johnson and said he had been authorized by Ambassador Harriman to say:

1. It was Ambassador Harriman's very clear understanding that

[4] Reference is to a statement by Secretary of the Navy Francis P. Matthews, on the previous day, which seemed to call for the launching of a preventive war by the United States.

the President had directed MacArthur by order to withdraw the statement;

2. That Ambassador Harriman thinks that is the right course;

3. That if we are not clear about it, we ought to ask the President to receive his advisers again and discuss it.

Mr. Acheson also told Secretary Johnson that Ambassador Harriman thought that because of MacArthur's prestige the repercussions would be heard around the world, and that without the order to withdraw, we could never catch up with the consequences.

It was agreed that Secretary Johnson would call Ambassador Harriman and ask him to see if the President would see the advisers to reopen the matter.

Very shortly after the above, Secretary Johnson called back and said that when he had hung up from talking with Secretary Acheson (and before he could call Ambassador Harriman, as agreed), the President had called him and had dictated the following order which he said was to go to MacArthur:

"The President of the United States directs that you withdraw your message for National Encampment of Veterans of Foreign Wars because various features with respect to Formosa are in conflict with the Policy of the U.S. and its position in the UN."

Secretary Acheson said he would put this before his staff and call Secretary Johnson back if they had any objection to it.

The Secretary called Secretary Johnson a little later to tell him that he had been studying the President's draft order to MacArthur, and that he thought it covered the matter very well.

Secretary Johnson again raised the question as to whether it was wise to order MacArthur to withdraw, or whether it would not be better to send a message to the following effect:

"The President and I have seen a copy of the statement to the VFW. This statement includes several features in connection with Formosa which are in conflict with U.S. policy and with the position of the U.S. in the United Nations. When queried on this subject this Government must state that this statement is the statement of one individual only and is not the policy of the United States Government." (This may not be an exact and accurate transcription.)

Secretary Johnson said that Deputy Secretary Early [5] had come into the conference and he was very much opposed to sending MacArthur a telegram ordering him to withdraw the statement.

Mr. Early then came on the phone and outlined his views as follows:

It seemed to him that the directive of the President asked the impossible. It was not mechanically possible to withdraw the statement, because it had been received by the VFW, which is a hostile group; it has been given world-wide distribution by them. Its withdrawal would never, in his opinion, prevent its publication, or answer the issue. A directive to MacArthur to withdraw the statement, not being possible of accomplishment, would add fuel to the fire, when the statement is issued. Mr. Early thought if we took the position, which he thought was truthful and factual, that the General had ignored Washington, the Government, the "League of Nations", and everyone here, and that traditionally we grant the right of free speech, and can consider this only as an expression by an individual, we would get off better than by sending a flat directive asking the impossible.

[5] Deputy Secretary of Defense Stephen T. Early.

Mr. Early then brought up the question of handling the matter by having Mr. Sebald talk with MacArthur in Tokyo. He said that he could not believe that MacArthur would have made the statement if he had known what the policy of the Government was. Mr. Early said he was 100% sure that MacArthur knew nothing about it all. He thought it would be worthwhile to get Sebald on the telephone and have him check. He thought Sebald might, by talking with MacArthur and explaining the position he had put us in, get MacArthur to act on his own and withdraw it without a directive.

The Secretary's reply was that since Sebald was a subordinate, he did not think he would be received by MacArthur without a directive from the President.

In response to Mr. Early's general line, the Secretary said he understood that the whole matter would get out. If that is so, the main question is—how does it get out? The Secretary again outlined the confused position we would be in if there was simply a repudiation of the statement if made by MacArthur, with no directive not to do so; whereas if it comes out after the order to withdraw has been sent, the President has asserted his authority, and the position of the US in relation to other governments will be maintained. In answer to the consideration of whether an order to withdraw would be a suppression of MacArthur in his right to free opinion and free speech, the Secretary thought that this would be understood, since this Government has taken a position and high officials of the Government cannot be allowed to make statements opposite to that position. Even though this meant a serious row, the Secretary thought this was the cleanest way to have the matter come out.

Mr. Early still maintained that he thought his proposal would cause less trouble. He suggested that perhaps the President might talk on the telephone to MacArthur. The Secretary replied that this would put the President in the position of suppliant, which he did not think was wise. Mr. Acheson thought also that a written order should be sent and that the decision should not be left to a telephone call.

Mr. Early said he was just trying to get his views across. If Secretary Acheson did not agree, he would not press this further.

(There may have been a little more here, but my impression was that the Secretary hung up without either Mr. Johnson or Mr. Early making any definite commitment one way or other to send the order, or to go back to the President.)

The next conversation was between Messrs. Harriman and Acheson (although who called whom at this point, I am afraid I don't know).

Ambassador Harriman said he supposed the Secretary had talked with Secretary Johnson, and the Secretary said he had; that he did not agree with any of Secretary Johnson's or Mr. Early's views. Secretary Acheson's understanding of the present position was that, since the President had issued a definite order to Secretary Johnson to send the order to General MacArthur, after putting forth their views in a last ditch stand, they were prepared to issue the order.

However, evidently Mr. Johnson and/or Mr. Early had also called Mr. Harriman and expressed their doubts to him and had read him the same proposed message that Mr. Early had read the Secretary. Ambassador Harriman said he was of the opinion that the President should have everybody's views before he takes such a serious step, although he, Ambassador Harriman, was still of the opinion that the course advocated by the Defense people did not make sense. The Secretary said he thought the President had decided and that Secretary Johnson had told him he would not reopen the matter unless Secretary Acheson and Ambassador Harriman also wanted it reopened. He said he would do nothing further about it.

But, Ambassador Harriman thought that, leaving aside the froth of the matter, as the situation stood, the essentials were that the handling of the matter showed disagreement "on both sides of the Potomac", and that the MacArthur statement would plague us through the election. (The Secretary later asked for clarification of what the Ambassador meant by "disagreement on both sides of the Potomac"; i.e., whether that meant that the JCS and the Defense agreed with the substance of the MacArthur statement. Ambassador Harriman said he did not think this was so; that what he meant was only that there was disagreement on how to handle the matter.) In these circumstances, Ambassador Harriman thought it would be well to know that the President had weighed the matter carefully.

Secretary Acheson agreed that the President should not take an important decision without getting everyone's opinion, but he thought that the President had done this.

The Secretary and Mr. Harriman had a good deal of discussion as to whether or not the President should be asked to reopen the matter, during which Secretary Acheson was quite noncommital, and Mr. Harriman seemed disposed to go back to the President. The question then arose as to who should go to the President if it were done; and it was agreed that Mr. Harriman would ask Secretary Johnson to ask the President for further consideration, since it was he who wanted it.

Shortly after this, Mr. Harriman again called and said that before he could call Johnson back, he had talked with the President and found that the President knew exactly what he was doing and what was in Mr. Early's mind. The President had said to Mr. Harriman that he had dictated what he wanted to go and he still wanted it to go.

Memorandum by the Secretary of State to the Under Secretary of State (Webb)

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] August 27, 1950.

As I foresee developments, those who put out the release in Chicago may well let it stand, and then instead of formally presenting the message to the Convention may read the telegram from General MacArthur and issue a blast at the same time.

In the resulting confusion, questions will be asked as to who ordered the withdrawal of the original message and why the original message is regarded as inconsistent with United States policy. The question arises whether the White House today should issue its order, the General's reply and the General's telegram, or whether it should brief the press for release when the news breaks. There may be still other alternatives of action.

Points which might be made either now in order to clarify the press or by me on Tuesday,[1] or both, are along these lines:

1. There can be only one voice in stating United States positions in foreign relations. This is of fundamental Constitutional importance. The President has spoken very clearly and very specifically on the subject of American policy toward Formosa. It is essential that the clarity, sincerity and good faith of our position on this matter—a matter which is now being used to divide the free world—should not be brought in doubt.

The President cannot debate with the General as to who states the United States position the better nor can he debate with the General whether the General's statement supports or does not support the President's position.

The President's statement must stand before the world unconfused and uninterpreted as the official position of the United States.

In the light of this situation if the General's statement is compared with the President's statement, the difference is at once apparent. For instance, the President says in his statement of June 27 that, as a corollary of the action in directing the Seventh Fleet to prevent an attack on Formosa, he was calling upon the Chinese Government on Formosa to cease all air and sea operations against the mainland. There is no suggestion of this idea in the General's statement.

2. In the same statement, the President says that the determination of the future status of Formosa must await the restoration of security in the Pacific, a peace settlement with Japan or consideration by the United Nations. There is no such idea in the General's paper.

3. In the President's message to Congress of July 19, he says that we have no territorial ambitions nor do we seek for ourselves any special position or privileges on Formosa. The General's statement should be read in the light of this pronouncement by the President.

4. In his message the President says that the present military action is without prejudice to the political questions affecting that island and that our desire is that these political questions be settled by peaceful means.

5. The President says that with peace reestablished even the most complex political questions are susceptible of solution, but in the presence of brutal aggression some of these questions may have to be held in abeyance in the interests of the security of all.

Not only in these statements made most solemnly by the President as official statements of the Government but in the official communication which Ambassador Austin as the direct representative of the President made to Mr. Trygve Lie on August 25, Ambassador Austin quoted the President's statements referred to above and said: "These statements and the facts to which they related make perfectly clear certain fundamental points which the people of the world will have clearly in mind."

The fundamental point which Ambassador Austin then listed as the essence of American policy include those which I have referred to in the paragraphs above. It is essential that these fundamental points remain absolutely clear as United States policy amid the dust storm of propaganda which Mr. Malik is raising on this very subject.

The President's action in directing the withdrawal of the General's message was an effort to preserve the clarity of the position of the United States before the world.

It must not be forgotten that General MacArthur is the United Nations Commander in Korea, that the question of Formosa has now been brought before the Security Council of the United Nations, that members of the United Nations have differing points of view regarding Formosa, and that the American position which has been so clearly stated by the President and Ambassador Austin must not be beclouded in any way by any person.[2]

Memorandum by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Merchant) to the Deputy Under Secretary of State (Matthews)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] August 28, 1950.

In accordance with your instructions I asked General Burns this morning urgently to ascertain from the Department of Defense all relevant facts concerning the alleged bombing of three Manchurian cities as charged in Chou En-lai's communication to the Secretary.[1]

Shortly after noon, General Burns read me the text of the attached copy of memorandum prepared by General Vandenberg for Secretary Johnson. After receiving this text I pointed out to General Burns through Captain Murdaugh[2] that the memorandum contained no mention of whatever air activity there was on August 27, the date of the alleged bombing and asked that, if it had not already been done, the Department of Defense urgently inquire of General MacArthur's headquarters what if any US air activity there was in the border areas on August 27.

In my first conversation I had asked General Burns if Defense was planning to issue a denial in addition to that already issued in Tokyo by FEAF and added that this Department would naturally have no

[1] Under date of August 28, Chou En-lai had complained to Mr. Acheson and to Trygve Lie that United States planes bombed and strafed Chinese territory, damaging buildings and vehicles and injuring and killing civilians. SECRET [WASHINGTON,] August 28, 1950.

I refer to the charge made by Communist China concerning alleged air attacks upon three cities—Linkiang, Chi (Tsain), and Talitzu, all located across the Yalu River from Northwest Korea.

I can state that on the basis of information available in Washington, no United States aircraft have at any time attacked the three cities mentioned. General Stratemeyer[4] has specific instructions from the Chief of Staff of the Air Force concerning specific targets to be attacked and General Stratemeyer has reported no attacks in violation of his instructions. Further, strike reports and strike photos indicate that no target instructions have been violated.

In the northwestern area of Korea our air forces have attacked a bridge at Kusong, North Korea, which is at least 38 miles from the Yalu River border. In northeastern area United States air forces have attacked targets at Najin, which targets are located at least 18 miles from the border. All of the targets attacked were positively identified before attack. Post strike photographs indicate damage only in the target area.

United States reconnaissance aircraft have flown in the vicinity of the border of North Korea but by direction have scrupulously remained well clear of those borders. One of our reconnaissance aircraft on the 24th of August, while flying south and east of the Yalu River border but well clear of it, at a position near Sinuiju, reported receiving controlled anti-aircraft fire from gun positions across the Yalu River in the Antung (Manchuria) area. This particular reconnaissance flight carried aboard no bombs. No United States reconnaissance aircraft carry bombs.

HOYT S. VANDENBERG

[3] On August 29, the United States Representative at the United Nations (Austin) informed the Secretary-General that no evidence had been found to indicate that United States aircraft had violated the instructions under which they operated prohibiting them from crossing the frontiers of Korea into adjacent territory. The United States said that it would welcome an investigation on the spot by a Commission to be appointed by the Security Council. (U.N. document S/1727)

On August 30, the People's Republic of China again complained of the killing and wounding of Chinese civilians by United States planes on the previous day (S/1743). The question was taken up by the Security Council on August 31; see editorial note, p. 476.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Merchant)

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] August 28, 1950.

Subject: Formosa

Participants: Sir Oliver Franks, British Ambassador
Mr. Hubert Graves, Counselor, British Embassy
Mr. Matthews, G
Ambassador Jessup, S/A
Mr. Merchant, FE

The British Ambassador called at his request this afternoon on Mr. Matthews and presented two documents which he had just received from London.[1] The discussion which followed was without benefit of Messrs. Matthews, Jessup and Merchant having read the papers which are being duplicated and will be distributed to those receiving this memorandum.

The British Ambassador opened by saying that each of these documents had been covered by a personal letter to him, the contents of which he felt gave him considerable latitude in talking to the Department since they emphasized that the proposals were made in good faith as constructive offerings but that essentially the British Government wanted to arrive at common ground with the United States. He emphasized that he wanted to lay the problem out as he saw it and not in terms of strict instructions from his Government.

Sir Oliver said that the British Government had grave anxiety over the problem of Formosa and United States policy with respect to it. He emphasized that when he said United States policy he meant not what the State Department said alone, which he and his government believed, but the totality of the acts of various parts of the United States Government which in the aggregate comprised the ambit of total United States policy toward Formosa. Sir Oliver said that British anxiety arose from the belief that the United States was out on a limb in that Formosa was the one spot in the Far East where the interest of Russia and China coincided. Moreover, he emphasized that if we were out on a limb the British were out there with us in the sense that no one could doubt that if trouble broke they would be at our side and with us in it. He said his Government further felt that the very real risk which arose from these two elements was that the UK and the US might find themselves at war with China, a situation in which the Soviet Union would in all probability not be directly engaged and where even Soviet implication would be difficult to prove.

[1] Neither printed. Copies of the two memoranda, entitled "Formosa" and "The Likelihood and Possibilities of Overt Aggression by China" are in files 611.94A/8–2950 and 793.00/8–2950, respectively. The latter document concluded that "unless conditions of weakness should offer too great a temptation, the Peking Government is unlikely to regard overt aggression against any state or territory (except Formosa) as in the present interests of Communist China."

The Ambassador said that the British were anxious to go along with us in achieving viable action in the UN. He felt that this required closer agreement between the UK and US on long-term political policies with respect to the future of Formosa and that if this were achieved there would be no difficulty in handling the short-term problem of neutralization during the period of disturbance in the general area. He spoke of their worries over certain actions by Chiang Kai-shek, such as the continuation of the blockade, propaganda leaflet drops over the mainland and the capitalization on the visit of General MacArthur to Formosa as elements which increased the fears of Peiping and increased the tension between the Chinese Communists and the United States.

There was also, he said, the problem of securing general support within the UN and this he felt would require at the least vague references to the acceptances of the principle that in the long run Formosa and China belong together. He kept reverting to the importance of accepting the "Chineseness" of Formosa. When questioned in this connection later he admitted that probably at least as important in the eyes of Peiping as their sense of traditional claim to Formosa was their fear that Chiang Kai-shek would be encouraged and equipped to launch an invasion from Formosa to the mainland and hence the elimination of the latter as a threat might be as effective in reducing present tension as a commitment ultimately to return Formosa to the mainland. In all this he emphasized that he was more interested in giving allegiance to what the Cairo declaration recorded rather than to the Cairo declaration as such.

In response to Mr. Jessup's question as to the possible desirability of a plebiscite which might lead to an independent Formosa, the Ambassador replied that the attraction of such a course was intellectual but that its practical application was "horrid". The Ambassador then said he recognized certain realities, one being that this is an election year in the US and another that the UK also has certain public opinion which it must take into account. This public opinion is not inflamed over the issue but it does impose certain limits on the possible action of the British government.

In summary, Sir Oliver said he accepted that there was no practical possibility of a change in our recognition policy, at least until after the election, nor in the mission of the Seventh Fleet until after the Korean affair was over.

In answer to Mr. Jessup's question whether the British government would be affected by the type of government in China to which Formosa might be returned, the Ambassador gave a "yes and no" answer admitting that the behavior of the Chinese government in control on the mainland should undoubtedly control the timing of any turnover.

Mr. Matthews suggested that in clarification of what at one point the Ambassador described as the ambiguity in all its phases and related actions of our policy toward Formosa, Senator Austin's statement of August 25 in the Security Council should be clarifying and helpful and Ambassador Jessup pointed out the significance of the reaffirmation of this position by the President yesterday in connection with ordering General MacArthur to withdraw his statement on the subject. Sir Oliver agreed, adding that he was not so much worried by our stated policy as how it might be executed.

Sir Oliver reverted to the need of an agreed position of the US and UK, preferably being one to which India could adhere in the UN. Incidentally, he felt the Assembly rather than the Security Council was the preferable forum. He thought that such position as we could work out, and urgently, between ourselves should be discussed in a widening group of friendly nations with a view to securing as wide unanimity as possible before the debate. He mentioned the French, the Pakistani, and the Canadians as other governments which should be consulted early in addition to India.

There was then some further discussion of the pros and cons of a plebiscite and the possibility of Formosa becoming another Switzerland, Mr. Jessup pointing out the fact that self-determination was a principle which presumably the Indians and other Asians approved and that there was some evidence the native Formosans did not desire mainland control.

In closing it was agreed that a further meeting would be held with Sir Oliver on Tuesday afternoon, August 29, (subsequently set for 3:30 p.m.) and that Sir Oliver would discuss the subject and the progress made in the talks today and tomorrow with the Secretary on Wednesday [2] when he sees him.

Before the Ambassador left, Mr. Matthews suggested that the British might think well of the suggestion that they pass on to the Indians a copy of the President's letter to Senator Austin [3] emphasizing the circumstances in which it had been sent.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Merchant)

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] August 29, 1950.

Subject: Formosa

Participants: Sir Oliver Franks, British Ambassador
Mr. Hubert Graves, Counselor, British Embassy
Mr. Matthews, G
Ambassador Jessup, S/A
Mr. Merchant, FE

The discussion of the previous day on the subject of Formosa was resumed at 3:30 this afternoon. Mr. Matthews opened with the statement that while we had not had an opportunity thoroughly to study the two papers which the Ambassador had left with us the previous day, a preliminary reading of them indicated that they were both helpful and constructive.

The British Ambassador at this point reported a conversation of which London had just learned between Panikkar and the Soviet Ambassador in Peiping. Panikkar reported the Soviet as having said that the Chinese Communists would not attack Formosa while that subject was under active consideration in the UN and that they would only make their decision when they saw the treatment which Formosa received in the UN, presumably in the General Assembly, the implication appeared to be that if Peiping was dissatisfied with the UN action on Formosa it would probably thereafter launch its attack.

Discussion then turned to Paragraph 15 of the British paper which it was agreed was an interesting formula and one justifying further exploration.[1] Ambassador Jessup pointed out that he would be in-

[1] Paragraph 15 of the British memorandum entitled "Formosa" read as follows:

"15. Another possible course of action which would hold the present position and deal with the long term to some extent might be the adoption of a resolution by the General Assembly (to avoid a Soviet veto in the Security Council) which would

"(a) recommend that Formosa should in due course revert to China;

"(b) propose that any action to this end should await the pacification of the Pacific area and that in the meantime no action should be taken by anybody to disturb the status quo or use the island as a base;

"(c) establish a Commission to recommend when the moment was ripe for the hand-over and the conditions under which it should take place.

"This would have the advantage that it would not mean abandoning the Cairo Declaration. It might—though this is doubtful—save the Central People's Government's face sufficiently to enable them to hold off. It would also enable a hand-over to be held up until the Communists gave some signs as to their future behaviour in international affairs." (611.94A/8–2950) terested in seeing inserted into it the plebiscite idea to which Sir Oliver Franks indicated his belief that London would be open-minded.

At one point in the discussion, Ambassador Jessup referred to our efforts as being designed to find a common meeting ground somewhere between the opposite extremes of (1) an irrevocable commitment to turn Formosa over to the present Chinese Communist Government irrespective of its behavior and attitude, and (2) attempting to ensure that Formosa did not come under the control of an unfriendly power during a period of world tension. Sir Oliver replied in effect that the most hopeful basis for our two governments reaching an agreed position was not a compromise between these two extremes but a retention of both thoughts. He explained that if we could subscribe to the legitimacy of Chinese claim as China to Formosa then he felt there would be little difficulty on the part of his government in agreeing to the necessity of neutralizing it so long as there was danger in the area and he pointed out the reference in the memorandum to the behavior of the Chinese Communists as a controlling factor in the timing of any turnover. He also said he felt Mr. Bevin attached great store to the removal of any thought or intention of maintaining Formosa as a base for the invasion by Chiang Kai-shek of the Mainland.

After a protracted discussion of various aspects of the British proposal, which it was agreed had merit, Sir Oliver said that he had hoped to be able to discuss Formosa when he saw the Secretary the following day and that what he thought would advance these interchanges more rapidly would be our submission of a piece of paper giving our modified ideas on their formula. This piece of paper could then be referred to the Secretary and to Mr. Bevin as a possible basis for further discussion between them, it being recognized that at this stage, the paper possessed no standing and carried no commitment. Mr. Matthews and Mr. Jessup said that we would attempt to produce such an informal paper and consult the Secretary's wishes in the matter. It was also pointed out that Mr. Rusk was away on a short leave and it was desired that his views be sought before advancing beyond the present exploratory stage.

The United Nations Security Council met on August 29 from 3:00 to 6:30 p. m.; for the record of the meeting, see U.N. document S/PV.492. The Council decided to include on its agenda the item "Complaint of Armed Invasion of Taiwan (Formosa)." The United States voted in favor of the adoption of the item. The Soviet Representative then submitted a draft resolution (S/1732) inviting a representative of the People's Republic of China to attend meetings of the Security Council on this agenda item, but the draft resolution was defeated by a vote of four in favor (India, Norway, U.S.S.R., and Yugoslavia) to four opposed (China, Cuba, Ecuador, and United States), with three abstentions (Egypt, France, and the United Kingdom).

The United States Representative at the United Nations (Austin) to the Secretary of State

SECRET PRIORITY NEW YORK, August 30, 1950—6:18 p. m.

399. Certain considerations re Formosan situation in UN seem to us worth setting down in order to make certain we carry out Department's wishes effectively. We are, of course, aware there are aspects of the Formosan question with which we are not familiar and which may bear upon the course outlined by the Department in instructions received by USUN on Formosan question.[1] As reported in USUN No.

[1] In telegram 183, August 25, the Department had sent the following message to the United States Mission at the United Nations concerning the handling of the Formosa question, following the complaint of the People's Republic of China concerning aggression against Taiwan:

"Confirming Hickerson–Gross telcon fol is text draft res for possible use by you in consultations with other friendly members SC:

"The SC resolves

'to establish a Commission composed of the members of the SC, to investigate immediately the situation with respect to Formosa and to report to the SC on the maintenance of internatl peace and security with respect thereto. The Commission is authorized to conduct its investigation wherever it considers necessary and to consult with any government authorities or individuals whose views are considered by it to be useful in the performance of its task.'" (794A.00/8–2550)

391, August 29,[2] we have explained to all SC delegates (except USSR) view and tactics set forth in Department's instructions. We shall follow up vigorously and consult further with other delegates as soon as they have received their instructions from home. In anticipation of such consultations, following questions will undoubtedly arise upon which we would appreciate guidance either for our own background or for discussion with other delegates, or both.

(1) What is Department's view concerning SC tactics in event resolution establishing commission is vetoed by China [or U.S.S.R.?] or both? This question, of course, assumes we shall succeed in obtaining seven votes in favor of resolution. In this connection we have just been advised by Tsiang that he will vote against commission composed of eleven SC members. Conversation with Tsiang reported separately (ourtel No. 398, August 30).[2] Tsiang renewed his suggestion, reported in ourtel No. 391, August 29, of SC Commission composed of six nonpermanent members and said if such a commission were proposed he would abstain in vote. It seems to us almost certain that Soviet would vote against commission from which they were excluded.

(2) Would Department's view re tactics be affected by likelihood of protracted debate in SC? We believe it may prove impossible to have really limited debate on Formosa for two reasons: (a) Opposition by Chinese Nationalist Government and probable long statement by Soviet delegate, and (b) Debate centering upon Soviet motion to invite Chinese Communist representative to attend SC meetings in which SC is considering establishment of commission. Indications of probable length and nature of such debate was clearly indicated by proceedings of SC at August 29 meeting. Most perplexing aspect of this problem, to which we call Department's urgent attention, is that although US would consider its vote against seating Chinese Communist as not a veto, Tsiang would probably take opposite view and raise possibility of double veto problem. Another possibility which must be taken into account in connection with probable protraction of Formosa debate in SC is likelihood Soviet delegate will table motion of some sort, probably condemning US action re Formosa, calling for withdrawal of Seventh Fleet, etc. Although we would argue that motion to establish commission should be disposed of first, it is unlikely that debate could be limited to such motion. Of course, it would be impossible to limit debate if commission motion failed of adoption, since this would lead to debate upon any Soviet motion along anticipated lines.

(3) What would Department's attitude be re seating Chinese Communist if motion to establish commission were not adopted? Only argument suggested in paragraph 4 of Deptel 192, August 29,[2] is that commission rather than SC should properly hear Chinese Communists. However, if this argument is rendered inapplicable by reason of failure of SC to establish commission, what argument, if any, should we make to oppose seating?

(4) We understand from paragraph 2 of Deptel 192, timing of debate Formosa left to our discretion in light of UK reluctance to take matter up at once. Gross had further talk with Jebb [3] this subject this morning, August 30. Jebb has not yet received instructions but has personal view that SC will be engaged at least through week of September 4 on Korea and on preparation SC report to GA. On Korean item, three procedural questions and three substantive motions remain for settlement: (a) procedural questions—seating of ROK representative (Malik may move to reconsider); USSR motion to seat North Korean: USSR motion to seat Chinese Communists under SC Rule 39; (b) substantive motions—US motions to localize conflict; USSR motion for withdrawal of foreign troops; USSR motion condemning bombings.

We perceive that foregoing tactical questions, although important and sure to arise in our consultations with other delegates, must be considered in context of basic US objectives regarding UN handling of Formosa question and US views concerning ultimate disposition of Formosa. It is these basic issues on which USUN feels it would be most helpful to have guidance.

We have read CFM D–7/2B on Formosa.[4] We assume this will now be revised to take into account SC developments re Formosa past few days. We believe that in consultation with SC delegates during next several days question will repeatedly [arise?] of US views re substance and procedure of longer-range question of Formosan settlement. Some delegates, particularly India, will be more concerned with this question than with short-range neutralization issue. We anticipate great difficulty in consultations looking toward concerting viewpoints of friendly delegates unless we are in position to explain, within limitations of security, our thinking regarding GA or other UN action on longer-range issue. This question is left open in paragraph 5 of Deptel 192 which merely authorized us to explain limited scope of contemplated SC action. Some delegates will wish to know what we have in mind regarding future GA consideration, if any, and we should appreciate instructions on this point.

412. In connection with the Department's consideration of the matter of inviting to the SC table a Chinese Communist representative, I request Department to take into account the following viewpoint to which I hold most strongly.

I believe it would be a great mistake to invite the Chinese Communist to the SC table. I do not believe a representative from Peiping could possibly be of any assistance to the SC in considering any question now before the Council or which may be raised in the Council. It is obvious that primary motive of any emissary from Peiping would be to use the SC as a propaganda forum and to obstruct and divert the orderly processes of the SC. The result of bringing such a person to the table would be to enhance the prestige of his group, to lend fuel to the Chinese Communist campaign to be seated by the GA, and to present to the world a propaganda victory against the US.

The Chinese Communists are of course not entitled under Article 32 to participate in consideration of the Formosa matter by the SC. The Chinese Communist group does not represent a "state" within the meaning of Article 32 of the Charter. Nor would I invite a Peiping representative to the table under Rule 39 of the SC Rules of Procedure. I do not think any person Chou En-lai sent to the Council would be competent for the purpose of supplying the Council with information or giving it any assistance whatever. China is represented at the SC by Dr. Tsiang. The complaint on the agenda involves alleged armed invasion of Formosa. As the accredited representative of China, Tsiang is the best and only reliable witness. The Peiping regime is not in a position to know what is going on in Formosa. The SC can, if it wishes, send a fact-finding mission for a survey on the spot, and no amount of debate at Lake Success would assist the SC to find a single fact. It is certain that if the Peiping regime is permitted to sit at the table, it would supply only debate and would not furnish any facts.

I do not think the SC precedents of inviting complainants can apply in any way to this situation. Major distinction, which makes this case unique, is that the alleged victim of aggression is represented in the SC and states that it does not wish to have any self-appointed spokesman. In any event, it seems to me perfectly clear that the Council is entitled to make up its own mind in any particular situation whether a complainant or any other person is competent to supply it with information or to give it assistance.

For all the above reasons I strongly recommend that I be authorized to oppose the seating of a Chinese Communist representative in consultations with other delegations and to vote against it in the Council.

I believe we should abide by a majority decision, whatever it may be, but I think we should seek to influence our colleagues on the Council to vote against the seating of a Chinese Communist at this time for any purpose whatever.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Under Secretary of State (Matthews)

[Extract]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] August 31, 1950.

Participants: Sir Oliver Franks, British Ambassador
The Secretary
H. Freeman Matthews (G)

. . . . . .

2. Formosa. The Secretary said that frankly he had been so busy in preparation for his hearings that, although he had read the paper left with Matthews [1] and had a very brief discussion with those in the Department concerned with the matter, he had not given adequate thought to this important and complicated subject nor had he discussed it with the President. He said, however, that a paper had been prepared which he would let Sir Oliver read, but did not feel he could let him have.[2] The paper, he said, had been written with paragraph 15 of the British memorandum in mind.[3] It was not designed to be a statement of American views. We felt that paragraph 15 of the British paper did not represent a position with which it would be easy for us to go along. The paper which he had let Sir Oliver read was designed to indicate the sort of approach which, if the British made to us, we would feel deserved our careful consideration. If that sort of an approach were made to us, we would see what we could do to meet it and would endeavor to work out an American Government position with respect thereto. The Secretary then covered the principal points in the attached paper and the thinking that went into them.

Sir Oliver said that he thought the suggested approach was a constructive one and that, while London would be disappointed that we have not gone the whole way of their paragraph 15, he thought they would find the approach helpful. He then asked how he could put the question up to London and emphasized that one of the factors which in past correspondence seemed to be troubling Mr. Bevin personally was the belief that the Americans might be trying to build up Chiang for possible return to the Mainland. He said that he himself was convinced that this was not the case, but anything which would reassure Mr. Bevin on this point, in view of all the confusion abroad about American policy concerning Formosa and attitude toward the Chinese Communist Government, would be advantageous. In reply the Secretary indicated he thought Sir Oliver could say that the paper represented thinking in the Department (not the views of the Secretary of State), and that he could honestly and emphatically assure London that there is a growing soberness on the Hill with respect to Formosa and a realization of the complexity of the problem. The Secretary said he had pointed out a number of pertinent factors regarding China and the dangers of the war spreading in that area and that during his discussion there had been no interruptions or adverse comments. While a few of the more extreme Republicans may still hold their views, he thought they could not carry with them the more serious-minded members of their Party, and that he was much impressed with the developing sober attitude and understanding of the dangers involved. He said he felt that if Sir Oliver could report a similar impression (with which Sir Oliver agreed) it should be reassuring to Mr. Bevin. Sir Oliver said lots of people had hoped that the Formosa problem could be "kept on ice" but this seemed impossible under the circumstances and that therefore the British Government was trying to find the best way to handle the problem with a view to its long-term solution. Matthews said he thought the approach in our paper went a long way toward taking the problem "off the ice" and in the proper direction. Sir Oliver agreed.

Memorandum Prepared in the Department of State

SECRET [WASHINGTON, August 31, 1950.]

The United States and the United Kingdom are agreed that every effort must be made to prevent the spread of existing hostilities beyond Korea. To this end they desire to secure agreement between themselves on a course of action with respect to Formosa which will minimize the risk of an eruption of hostilities between the Island and the Mainland and which will serve as a basis for a common program with other friendly states and command the support of a firm majority in the United Nations.

With these ends in view the following is submitted as a basis for discussion:

1. A concerted effort should be made in the forthcoming General Assembly of the United Nations to secure the adoption of a Resolution which would in substance

(a) refer to the historic Chinese claim to Formosa and state that no nation other than China asserts a claim to sovereignty over Formosa, that both the Government of the Republic of China and the Chinese People's Government publicly maintain China's claim to Formosa;

(b) confirm that, until a settlement of the case of aggression against the Republic of Korea on a basis satisfactory to the United Nations has been achieved and the peace of the general area has been restored, no party shall attempt to resort to force to alter the present status of Formosa nor shall the Island be used as a base for attack against the Mainland;

(c) establish a Commission of the United Nations charged with the responsibility of recommending to the General Assembly of the United Nations an appropriate peaceful settlement of the Formosa question. The Commission in arriving at its conclusions shall take into account the considerations set forth in (a) and (b) above as well as the following two points,

(i) The status of Formosa under international law in the presence or absence at that time of a Peace Treaty with Japan;

(ii) the wishes, as they may be expressed under any arrangements which the Commission may provide, of the inhabitants of the Island with respect to the future status of Formosa.

2. If agreement is reached by the United States and the United Kingdom on 1. above, consultation with other friendly nations should be instituted promptly with a view to securing widest possible support for the proposal in the United Nations.

Editorial Note

The United Nations Security Council met on August 31 from 3:00 to 8:20 p. m.; for the record of the meeting, see U.N. document S/PV.493. The Council agreed to place on its provisional agenda the complaint of the People's Republic of China against alleged United States bombing of Manchuria and then proceeded to debate at great length this and other items on the provisional agenda. The Soviet Representative proposed a draft resolution (S/1745/Rev.1) condemning the raids, but no vote was taken on it. The United States Representative stated that investigations showed that possibly one aircraft might have strafed a Chinese airstrip on August 27. The United States, he said, would welcome an on-the-spot investigation by a Security Council commission and would pay damages if it was found that an attack had occurred. Finally, the Security Council voted to place an item entitled "Complaint of bombing by air forces of the territory of China" on its agenda. The vote was eight in favor (including the United States) to three opposed (China, Cuba, and Egypt).

In the late afternoon of August 31, President Truman held a news conference at which, in response to a query on Formosa, he said:

"The Formosan situation as set out in my various messages is one for settlement—in the Japanese peace treaty with the allies who fought in the Japanese war and with those occupation forces—by those nations that have occupying forces in Japan now. Of course, it will not be necessary to keep the 7th Fleet in the Formosa Strait if the Korean thing is settled. That is a flank protection on our part for the United Nations forces." 524. 1. Bajpai SYG MEA told me August 31 that telegram had been received from Panikkar stating Peking authorities had approached him re alleged bombing by UN forces two Chinese border towns. I obtained impression from Bajpai's remarks that Peking desired GOI support in SC for resolution condemning such action by UN forces and calling for compensation for damage done.

2. Bajpai said GOI had sent Panikkar telegram containing aide-mémoire to be handed Peking authorities. Bajpai read aloud excerpts from this aide-mémoire. Among points made as I recall were following:

(a) If Peking would cease carrying on such extreme anti-US propaganda some of its approaches to UN might be received more sympathetically.

(b) Peking would also gain in world opinion if it would cease making threats to take military action against Formosa and Tibet. It would be particularly advantageous to Peking if it could make "harmonious adjustment of legitimate Tibetan claims to autonomy in framework of Chinese sovereignty".

3. Bajpai said he thought it would be helpful if appropriate spokesmen for UN forces would issue statement to effect that if Chinese towns had been bombed action was unintentional and regretted and after investigation compensation would be forthcoming.

4. Bajpai indicated GOI might vigorously participate in effort seat Peking in coming GA.

FORMOSA

A. AREAS OF AGREEMENT

1. The Cairo Declaration must be taken into consideration in any study of the ultimate status of Formosa.

[1] Complete documentation on the Foreign Ministers meeting and the preliminary meetings is scheduled for publication in volume III. This document was approved on September 1 by the French, British and United States Delegations headed by Ambassador Bonnet, Sir Derick Hoyer Millar, and Philip Jessup, respectively, and referred to the Foreign Ministers who took up the question of Formosa on September 14; see p. 500.

support the present American action in the Security Council. The long-term disposition of the question would best be handled through the United Nations General Assembly.

B. QUESTIONS REQUIRING MINISTERIAL CONSIDERATION

1. Agreement was lacking respecting the relative importance that the Cairo Declaration bore for determination of the ultimate status of Formosa. In the U.K. view the Cairo Declaration is fundamental.

2. There remained open the question of the most desirable long-term political solution for Formosa. Mention was made of various alternatives, including consolidation with the mainland, independence, and UN Trusteeship. The feasibility of a plebiscite was questioned by the U.K. and French delegations. In the U.K. view independence was irreconcilable with the Cairo Declaration and unacceptable to both Chinese parties.

3. Discussion was inconclusive regarding the subject of making the "military neutralization" equally effective in its application to both Chinese parties. In the U.K. view certain actions of the National Government since June 27 were inconsistent with the President's declaration.

4. The question of whether, and how, action in the UNSC and UNGA could get sufficient support from other governments to bring about a solution led to no conclusion. In the U.K. and French views chances of success would be increased by (a) the issuance of a unilateral and/or multilateral statement reiterating the Cairo Declaration respecting the future of Formosa and (b) the implementation of the President's statement of June 27 in a manner to bring about an effective bilateral "military neutralization".

5. There remained open the question of the procedure and action to be adopted in the event of a Chinese Communist attack against Formosa prior to some settlement through UN action. It was suggested that the present process in the Security Council could be continued, with a new orientation.

6. The precise manner in which the matter should still be pursued in its immediate phase in the Security Council, and in its later stages in the General Assembly, remained an open problem, but with general agreement that the matter was at present in the proper channels and that future action could be determined in the light of events.

TOP SECRET PRIORITY WASHINGTON, September 1, 1950—7 p. m.

330. Ur conversation with Bajpai Aug 24 re Pannikar's interpretation of Chi Commie attitude illuminating. It wld be very helpful to know how much of Pannikar's report is based on info conveyed to him by Peiping auths and how much is merely his estimate of their thinking. Dept suggests that, if you have not already done so, you review with Bajpai President's Aug 27 letter to Austin transmitted New Delhi same date. At discretion continue ur conversation with Bajpai this subj along fol lines.

US Govt is not irrevocably committed either to support or opposition any particular polit group in China. Altho Communism is repugnant to Amer way of life, our primary concern with other nations is that they act internationally in accord principles and purposes set forth UN Charter. US in past century has maintained friendly relations with all ruling Chi Govts. For first time in more than century US lacks both consular and dipl reps in mainland China. Amer policy consistently has opposed domination or dismemberment China by any power or powers. This remains keystone of US policy re China. US as loyal member UN is bound to oppose aggression in Asia and elsewhere. US policy therefore purposes [proposes?] also that China shld not engage in aggression against its neighbors in Far East, thereby threatening peace and progress. Peiping regime has manifested only bitterest hostility toward US. This hostility cld hardly be deliberate choice of Chi people as whole. Our own attitude toward Peiping regime results not from any basic prejudice, but rather is logical consequence of actions and attitudes of that regime itself. US views with deep concern indications that China is falling under domination of a fon power and Peiping rulers harbor aggressive intentions against China's neighbors. If there are doubts that Peiping regime is in fact independent govt these doubts arise from overt actions and utterances of that regime. If US as well as China's immed neighbors are alike apprehensive of Chi Commie open or covert aggression, this apprehension arises from Chi Commies own acts. To take case in point, had Peiping joined majority of nations in condemning North Korean aggression, or had it at least refrained from associating itself with that aggression, our attitude might now be different.

It is not US opposition that is or has been real obstacle to reps of Peiping regime sitting in UN, but rather the fact that US doubts and misgivings discussed above are shared by majority of free nations of world, and the fact that Peiping's internatl behavior and attitude toward internatl obligations make suspect Peiping's bona fides. Peiping cld, of course, take concrete measures to lessen these doubts whenever it might wish.

Measures by US pursuant to President's statement June 27 were undertaken for urgent milit reasons to avoid direct threat to security Pacific area and to US forces performing their lawful and necessary functions relating to UNSC resolution on Korea. They were designed to localize conflict Korea. It was made explicitly clear that those measures comprehended not only prevention of attack on Formosa but its milit neutralization with 7th Fleet insuring cessation air and sea activities from Formosa against mainland.

Peiping regime has publicly rejected concept of neutralization by announcing its determination to seize Formosa by force notwithstanding US efforts to neutralize it and by continuing preparations for offensive attack. In these circumstances and in view of heavy commitment of US forces in Korea, US may provide such limited milit matériel as might be required meet deficiencies in defense of island. Note this wld be for defense alone, not aggression against mainland.

Measures undertaken by US are without prejudice to settlement by peaceful means of long-term polit status of island, as is evidenced by readiness US to have question Formosa considered by UN. These measures are not to be interpreted as stepping-stone for US entry into mainland or preparation to put Nat Govt back on mainland with US support. US values highly its friendship with Chi people and Commie China need not fear US milit action against China unless it lends itself to indirect or direct aggression against neighboring countries, in which case US wld, of course, have to consider its obligations under UN Charter, as well as its own interest in the security of the Pacific. Wld be interesting to know why, if Peiping regime finds present state Sino-Amer relations unsatisfactory, they still acting along old lines.

Long history US relations with China and President's statement of July 19 respecting Formosa constitute eloquent testimony that we neither have been nor are preparing any aggressive action. Our support on Aug 29 for including on SC agenda "Complaint of Armed Invasion of Taiwan" is further strong evidence our good faith. Note finally that President in press conference Aug 31 said it will not be necessary keep 7th Fleet in Formosa Strait, if Korean affair is settled.

It wld be of considerable interest to Dept to get further reaction from Bajpai re matter, and particularly to receive any indications he may have on reasons for Pannikar's assurance that Chi Commies desire peace and are resisting Sov pressure to attack Formosa and thus become involved (for Sov ends) in hostilities with US.

Editorial Note

In the course of a radio and television report to the American people on the situation in Korea on the evening of September 1, President Truman expressed the hope that the people of China would not be misled or forced into fighting against the United Nations or the American people. He went on to say that the future of Formosa should be settled peacefully by international action and not by the decision of the United States or any other nation alone. The United States, he said, did not want Formosa for itself, and the mission of the Seventh Fleet was solely to keep Formosa out of the Korean conflict. (Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States: Harry S. Truman, 1950, page 609)

337. Eyes only Rusk from Rankin. Urtel 204, August 31 arrived at same time with press report of President's statement that if Korean question settled no need retaining Seventh Fleet in Formosa area. While this statement obviously subject various interpretations, depending opinions re date and nature eventual Korean settlement, we must expect many Chinese Nationalists to take it as confirming fear described penultimate sentence paragraph re Part II in mytel 273, August 18. Unless we can establish greater degree mutual confidence with whatever government may be in power on Formosa I believe only prudent hold serious reservations re chances either hold Island militarily against attack or carry out successfully ECA program envisaged mytel 331, September 1.[1] Mutual lack of confidence seems to me close to root of our difficulties with Chinese during recent years. I hope, therefore, that early occasion may be found to allay fear mentioned above which President doubtless had no intention of aggravating.

I expect avoid trouble with FEC survey group and to spare Department from complaints that score. Have had considerable experience dealing with military and realize one either has authority or has not. In latter case it worse than useless attempt exercise authority. Phrases used in Part III Deptel 144, August 14 clearly mean to any military officer heading survey group that Embassy has no authority over him. Gen. Conklin and I have had friendly discussion this point (without reference Deptel 144 of course); he described our relations as "purely social" which I was in no position deny.

Foregoing does not mean I have changed opinions expressed last paragraph mytel 273, August 18 re what ought to be done. I believe in unity of command, that FEC representatives should make full use of our Service Attachés if only as check on information obtained from Chinese, and that Embassy can fulfill political responsibilities effectively only if conversant with military plans and policies. CONFIDENTIAL PRIORITY TAIPEI, September 2, 1950—7 p. m.

339. Foreign Minister Yeh this afternoon handed me memorandum dated September 2 which was drafted as result of Cabinet meeting yesterday. Text of memorandum follows:

[Here follows the quoted text of the memorandum. In it, the Chinese Government referred to its commitment, in response to President Truman's request to cease air and sea action against the mainland. The Chinese Government assumed that in the event of modification or termination of this arrangement there would be consultation and understanding between it and the United States Government. Should the Seventh Fleet be withdrawn, the Chinese Government felt that the Communists would clearly attack Taiwan and wished to know what steps the United States would then take. The Chinese Government also wanted to call to the attention of the United States Government the fact that suspension of operations against the mainland was allowing the Soviet flow of assistance to increase Communist strength there, while the absence of United States aid to Taiwan was placing the Republic of China in a position of great disadvantage should United States support be withdrawn.]

Yeh said he had no present intention make above memorandum public and would communicate with us in advance in case later decision to do so.

TOP SECRET NEW DELHI, September 4, 1950—noon.

551. 1. I discussed China again with Bajpai, Secretary General MEA, on evening September 3 along lines indicated in Deptel 330 September 1. We discussed various points in considerable detail and in order that Bajpai might be able give more accurate account of our views to Prime Minister, I gave him paraphrase of more important sections.

2. Bajpai considered that contents of this telegram were helpful and asked if there would be objection to despatch of excerpts to Peiping to be used in discussions with Peiping Government. I told him he could use his judgment but he should bear in mind that what I gave him in writing was not a formal document but merely my oral statements reduced to written form. These statements were for information of GOI and should not be considered message from US to Peiping regime.

3. Bajpai referred to President's "Fireside Chat" of September 1 and said in his opinion it was most useful statement made by US re Far East since hostilities began. He was, however, still personally concerned at what reaction in China would be if Chinese Communist delegation should go to Lake Success, apply for admission into GA, and be rejected. The reaction in China would be much sharper than it had been when SC voted against admission Communist China. It would be more humiliating for Communist China representatives on spot to be rejected. Nevertheless, it would in his opinion be still worse for US to refuse visas. He had no sympathy for Communism, or for ideology of Peiping Government. Nevertheless, he was convinced that continued ostracism of Peiping would result in strengthening Russian influence in China and in making more difficult efforts to those free nations which were trying to encourage Communist China to remain independent. He understood, he thought, US position, but he still was of opinion that if pros and cons would be added up unemotionally and balanced it would be found that admission of Communist China into UN would be to advantage free world.

4. Bajpai told me in confidence Rau had been instructed unless some unexpected development should take place, not to vote in favor admission of Communist China into discussion Korean situation. These instructions had been issued on his initiative on ground that India was striving to find solution to Korean problem and presence of Communist China might not at this stage facilitate such solution. Rau would probably abstain.

SECRET PRIORITY TAIPEI, September 4, 1950—2 p. m.

340. Foreign Minister Yeh called me urgently this morning to say that Generalissimo had summoned him and Prime Minister to discuss as yet unidentified news agency report of negotiations between US and India involving China. Report is to effect US offers support project of trusteeship for Formosa in return for India's foregoing sponsorship of Peiping regime for UN membership.

Yeh asked me if I had information on above. I replied in negative and said I did not believe story should be accepted at face value.

adding that word "trusteeship" is being loosely used in press and elsewhere without general realization either of its legal significance under UN charter or practical implications in case of Formosa.

Foreign Minister said he had been giving much same explanation as mine in response to questions he is receiving from various quarters. He deplored unsettling effect of series recent events and reports, whether correct or otherwise, on Chinese Government, armed forces and Formosan population. Understands US readiness have the "aggression" aganst Formosa investigated by UN but fears anticipated arrival UN investigators, including Russians or satellites, would not only serve Communist propaganda ends but would promote unrest among Formosans and possibly cause split in Chinese Government. Democratic elements, he said would wish conform UN decisions however distasteful but military probably would refuse allow Russians or other satellite representatives to land on island. Ostensible reason would be security but more important would be unwillingness swallow arrival of enemy representatives to investigate anything on Formosa when everyone else agrees it is the Communists who need investigating. Bulk of Formosan population would interpret UN investigations as directed against Chinese Government rather than US aggression.

Yeh expressed hope US recognized fact that Formosa today one of most peaceful and stable parts of Asia with state of law and order better even than Hong Kong; also that substantial progress has been made in improving effectiveness of government and economic and military conditions, besides extending democratic processes. Believes it would be most helpful if US Government could take public cognizance these facts and contribute further to allaying uncertainty caused by recent events and rumors by stating definitely that future status of Formosa must await peace settlement with Japan. Alternative time limits involving "consideration by UN" or taking of "international action" are being freely interpreted to mean that any morning people in Formosa may wake up to learn that they have been turned over to some international authority, with reasonable certainty that in resulting confusion Chinese Communists will actually be ones to take over.

Department pass New Delhi; sent Department 340; repeated information New Delhi 2.

Memorandum by Mr. Robert C. Strong of the Office of Chinese Affairs[1] to the Director of the Office of Chinese Affairs (Clubb)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] September 6, 1950.

Subject: Summary of Views on Formosa as of Late August 1950

Politically and militarily, Formosa is on the downgrade. Economically, the island seems to have reached a temporary balancing point which is more easily tipped to the unfavorable side.

A concerted effort seems to be in progress to tighten the personal control of the Generalissimo over political and military affairs while at the same time creating the impression abroad that sincere efforts at self-improvement are under way. Failing to understand the basic reasons for loss of the mainland and deeply suspicious of the intention of the United States Government with respect to himself, the Generalissimo is emulating the control of the Communists over their subjects in order to preserve his personal power.

There is no question that the Generalissimo fears the Formosans and Sun Li-jen, both of whom are receiving too much American support for his taste. He also fears his own party because of the discontent among them over his rule and the increasing importance of Chiang Ching-kuo.

Therefore, exerting his full authority as teacher, head of the party, and head of the Government, the Generalissimo has forced through the party measure which is called reform but which in actuality centers in his elder son great power in police, party, military and political affairs. The several secret police organizations are being unified under his control; the work of political indoctrination and political espionage within the armed forces is directed by him; dealings with overseas Chinese insofar as political and secret affairs are concerned are under his jurisdiction; and the bulk of the propaganda and subversive activities against and on the mainland is in his hands.

The result is a reign of terror, more silken than in other countries or in other times, but nevertheless in progress. Criticism of the Government, even in a mild form, is almost out of question; the critic is in dire danger of being arrested as a Communist and disappearing. There is no such thing as a system of justice, as we know it. Extreme measures are being used to prevent political contacts between residents of Formosa and political and military representatives of the United States Government accredited to the Nationalist Government. In some cases, persons with such contacts have been arrested, in other cases warned, and in others closely questioned. The few who still maintain contact either are approved by the secret police or are courageous and anti-Communist enough to avoid persecution.

In an extension of his famous "divide and rule" tactics, the Generalissimo is playing the Tokyo end of the United States Government for all it is worth, in the expectation that not only will military advantage be gained but also political benefits. Making use of every indication of support by and from General MacArthur, the Generalissimo also plays up the inevitability and nearness of the Third World War and the imminence, as a result, of his triumphant return to the mainland. Although privately it is stated that the purpose of such propaganda is to encourage mainland residents, it is doubtless intended to fix in the popular mind throughout the world the image of the Generalissimo as the only man for the "return", and to prove that he is an essential member of our team.

In playing Tokyo and Washington as two separate, competing entities, the Generalissimo openly shows favor to Tokyo personnel and almost equally openly ignores and undercuts accredited United States Government officials. At the same time he is careful to restrict the contacts of the Tokyo personnel to those individuals who are properly indoctrinated and under strict control.

Encouragement to the Generalissimo in this game has been given unwittingly by General MacArthur, who has played a lone hand with the National Government to the complete exclusion of the Embassy in Taipei. Chinese officials have frequently visited Tokyo without knowledge of the Embassy, nor has there even been an indication of the subject or content of conversations there. No statement or allegation by such Chinese officials to any American officer in Tokyo has ever been referred to Taipei for comment. Such acute observers and shrewd deducers as the Chinese cannot have failed to notice this.

The Chinese armed forces are now in a worse state than several months ago. The intense efforts at political indoctrination of officers, the emphasis on spying on each other by officers and men, the arrest of competent officers on trumped up political charges, the breaking down of the military training program, the strengthening of clique influences, the suspicions between the forces, the suspicions within each force, the hopeless command tangle, the inadequate pay and diet and medical attention, the feeling that the United States is now carrying the baby, and the widespread dislike of and lack of confidence in the Generalissimo combine to paint a very gloomy picture. In addition might be mentioned the failure of the Combined Service Force properly to do its job, the favoritism shown the Armored Force (under the Generalissimo's second son),[2] the lack of mobility of the ground forces, the absence of over-all defense planning and training thereunder, the continuation of incompetent officers in important commands, and the interference by the Generalissimo which adds to the confusion and disruption.

With regard to the economic scene, there is at present a temporary balancing point. Although no effort will be made in this memorandum to make a thorough summary of the economic field it may be said that the economic wellbeing of the Island depends very largely on what the United States does in the political and economic field.

The Chinese authorities have reached the point at which they are prepared, with our assistance, to carry out thorough surveys in various areas, and to switch their efforts from shortrange, stopgap measures to emphasis on longrange problems and decisions. They definitely require American technical assistance to achieve their goals, as well as continuation of ECA participation at the current level.

Apart from ECA (and possible military aid which would reduce foreign exchange expenditures), the factor most likely to affect economic stability is the political attitude of the United States toward Formosa. Although uncertainty as to the future inevitably exists, there is enough confidence to minimize the flight of capital and hoarding of foodstuffs and commodity. Any move by the United States to cut its ties with the Nationalist Government would have most serious repercussions and undo constructive measures previously undertaken.

Results of studies by American experts now in Formosa should be available within the near future. These will go far beyond anything that could be attempted herein.

[2] Chiang Wei-kuo, second son of Chiang Kai-shek, was Commanding General of the Chinese Armored Force.

The United Nations Security Council met on September 7 from 11:00 a. m. to 1:10 p. m. and from 3:20 p. m. to 6:30 p. m.; for the record, see U.N. document S/PV.497. At the request of the United States Representative, who introduced a draft resolution (S/1752) calling for the establishment of a Security Council commission to investigate on the scene the Chinese Communist complaint of bombing of Manchuria, the Council voted by eight (including the U.S.) to one (U.S.S.R.), with two abstentions (Egypt and India), to consider the "Complaint of bombing by air forces of the territory of China" before the "Complaint of armed invasion of Taiwan (Formosa)." The Soviet Representative drew attention to a draft resolution (S/1759), which he had introduced on September 5, calling on the Council to invite a representative of the People's Republic of China to sit in on the sessions dealing with the bombing complaint. The Council then decided that the question taken up in the Soviet draft resolution should be dealt with first. The vote was seven in favor to three opposed (China, Cuba, and Ecuador), with one abstention (U.S.).

352. Foreign Minister Yeh appreciates helpful statements in Deptel 214, September 4. He expressed yesterday hope that more comprehensive and explicit US policy pronouncement on Formosa may be forthcoming but realized this may take time. Meanwhile he is under heavy pressure in Legislative Yuan to explain why Chinese Government was unable obtain UN investigation of undoubted Soviet aggression against China while Russia appears likely succeed in putting across UN investigation of non-existent aggression in Formosa. Yeh asks if any possible way US could help sidetrack Formosa investigation project. Considers it most unsettling single factor at present moment, affecting morale of both armed forces and public. Yeh hinted Generalissimo latest public reference to returning to mainland was effort offset effect of UN investigation rather than indication such action regarded in Chinese Government circles as at all likely. Foreign Minister said he probably will be forced stay here and forego attending GA as planned unless some reassurance received from Lake Success. Said Koo and Tsiang in full agreement with him and all three strongly dislike idea of employing veto. However, their hands may be forced by pressure here unless some other way out can be found.

Department in better position judge various factors to be considered at Lake Success but I agree with Foreign Minister that investigation project is having unfortunate effect here and promises do further harm with no offsetting advantages locally.

The Secretary of State to the United States Mission at the United Nations

SECRET WASHINGTON, September 7, 1950—7 p. m.

224. 1. Dept has given consideration urtel 412, Aug 31. Dept fully aware implications of Chi Commie Rep participation in SC debate even for limited hearing on Formosa item.

2. Deptel 192 [1] indicated that US opposition to SC hearing Commie Rep was on ground that they will have opportunity for hearing before SC Comm of Investigation which will have auth hear anyone it chooses. This remains Dept's position.

3. While we do not recognize the Commies as the Govt representing Chi, we decided that it was in our interest to have the SC air the charges made by them as the complaining party in the case. Inherent in our decision to support inclusion of this question on SC's agenda was the realization that Chi Commies wld be given a hearing at some time in one forum or another before SC cld take final action on the matter. Without such hearing of the complaining party our position might well be interpreted as an empty gesture and wld dissipate the beneficial effect on world opinion of our prompt and unreserved declaration welcoming inquiry. Moreover, unqualified refusal by SC of affording any opportunity to Chi Commies to be heard might offer a pretext to Chi Commies for a claim that UN refused to concern itself seriously with their charges and they wld therefore resort to self help as the only way open to them.

4. This does not mean however that we must support participation of Chi Commies Rep in SC at this stage of debate. In consultations with friendly dels and in the SC you shld take the fol position:

SC has before it grave charges made against the US, a member of UN. The US declared that it wld welcome UN consideration of the Formosa complaint and supported inclusion of the matter on SC agenda. We further declared that "we wld approve full UN investigation here or on the spot. We believe that UN consideration will contribute to a peaceful rather than a forcible solution of that problem". The rational procedure for SC wld be to initiate impartial inquiry with a view to obtaining relevant facts. Debate on merits without prior ascertainment of facts is bound to lead to abuse of SC for propaganda purposes. Those members genuinely desirous to assist the SC in performing its vital function wld agree on such course.

Draft res submitted by Sov Rep demanding condemnation of US (urtel 441)[2] indicates clearly purpose to obstruct SC for propaganda aims and divert it from orderly procedure. This draft res is neither based on facts nor does it provide for ascertainment of facts. It calls for judgment on basis of palpable lies. To support debate on this draft res at this stage before Commission has had opportunity to report the facts to SC wld mean to become accomplice in abuse of this forum for purposes not germane to its legitimate functions. Consequently, US will continue oppose hearing Chi Commies in SC on ground that place for them to be heard is Commission where they will be given full opportunity. When report of SC Commission comes before SC, it will be for SC to determine at that time in light of report and prevailing circumstances whether additional hearing be given to Chi Commies in SC before the Council takes action.

5. FYI Dept hopes that you will be able to explain above position in such a way as not to prejudice the fundamental principle of a fair hearing for any interested party which is inherent in the judicial process and in the procedures for peaceful settlement. Since the inception of UN the US has championed this principle. Indeed, we have been so consistent in advocating this principle that in one instance (Greek case) US joined USSR and its satellite in voting for inviting interested states against opposition of 8 other SC Members (100th mtg of SC, Feb. 10, 1947).[3]

6. Dept desirous obtain early indication how individual friendly Members of SC will vote on proposal for Commission. Above position predicated on assumption that at least seven votes will be available in support of proposal along lines of Deptel 183.[4] If this assumption proves correct we believe SC shld as matter of sound procedure agree to consider first proposal for SC Commission before considering Sov condemnatory res even though latter res submitted first and thus wld normally be entitled to prior consideration.

Memorandum by the Joint Chiefs of Staff to the Secretary of Defense [1]

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, 8 September 1950.

Subject: Formosa.

1. The Joint Chiefs of Staff concur generally with the recommendations set forth in the Department of State position paper dated 28 August 1950 (SFM D–7/2*c*) entitled "Formosa".[2]

2. The Joint Chiefs of Staff, from the military point of view, recommend that the following be incorporated in the position of the United States toward matters relating to the problem of Formosa:

a. Any attack by Communist China upon any of its southern neighbors or upon the Republic of Korea would require the United States to reassess its objectives in Formosa and to reconsider its present prohibitions upon military activities of the Chinese Nationalists;

b. Any political action taken in the United Nations with respect to Formosa should neither directly nor indirectly set up a requirement for the employment of United States military forces without preserving the right of United States decision in the light of the situation existing at the time;

c. If the United Nations should call on the Chinese Communist Government and the Chinese Nationalist Government to desist from hostilities pending study of the problem of the disposition of Formosa and should request the United States to enforce the truce, the theater of the Unified Command under the Commander in Chief, Far East (CINCFE) should be extended to include the Formosan area. The Unified Command must not be restricted as to its actions in enforcing this truce; and

d. The United States should not agree to any United Nations solution for Formosa which might enhance the military position of the USSR in the Far East. United States agreement to the appointment of a United Nations commission on Formosa might well be the initial step in such enhancement, since the commission must consider as one of its possible solutions the annexation of Formosa by the Chinese Communist Government. The strategic consequences of a communist-dominated Formosa would be so seriously detrimental to United States security that, in the opinion of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the United States should not permit the disposition of Formosa to be recommended in the first instance or decided by any commission or agency of the United Nations in which the United States has no voice.

[1] This memorandum was conveyed to the Secretary of State on September 11 under cover of a note from the Secretary of Defense (not printed) wherein Mr. Johnson expressed his general concurrence in the comments set forth by the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

[2] Not printed. SFM D–7/2*c* was prepared for use in the preliminary talks for the Tripartite Foreign Ministers meeting. Its principal recommendation called for the establishment of a United Nations commission to investigate the entire question of Formosa and report to the following General Assembly.

3. The Joint Chiefs of Staff note that all proposals set forth in SFM D–7/2*c* are tentative and do not constitute fixed or final positions. They would request that they be given further opportunity to comment, from the military point of view and in light of the then existing situation, on developments, as they may occur, in the finalization of the general and detailed United States position toward Formosa.

227. Fol are Dept further views on issues raised in urtels 399 Aug 30 and 466 Sept 6 [1] and not covered in Deptel 224 Sept 7.

1. Re composition of the SC Commission to investigate Commie charges we are willing to follow majority preference and wld accept 11 SC members comm or eight-man comm suggested by Tsiang. We believe comm composed of six non-permanent SC members might be too weak. Consideration might be given to five-man comm composed of members outside of SC, e.g., Pakistan, Philippines, Brazil, Australia, and Belgium. While we appreciate Chi Govt's concern about Sov membership on comm we wonder whether presence of one or two identified Russians wld create serious problems. (Urtel 398)[2]

2. With ref to Tsiang's reported intention to veto comm. While we do not have any definite view on this matter at this time we believe real constitutional question arises as to whether US and Chi not required abstain from voting on the establishment of the Commission under the proviso of Art 27 Para 3. In the past we have consistently supported the principle underlying this proviso that party shld not be a judge in its own case. Decision to investigate in this case will be under Chapter VI and might be taken to involve US and Chi Natl Govt as parties. The fact that Commie charges against U.S, seem to allege situation under Chap VII is irrelevant for purposes of this decision. Obligatory abstention under proviso of Art 27 (3) might make it politically easier for Tsiang to accept an 11 member comm, since he cld point out to his

[1] Not printed. It reported that the Chinese Representative at the United Nations (Tsiang) had informed Mr. Gross that the Chinese Government for basic political reasons could not accept the establishment of an 11-member commission to investigate the Formosa question and had instructed him to oppose it (611.94A/9–650).

[2] Dated August 30; not printed. It reported that Tsiang would vote against a fact-finding commission on Formosa which included a Soviet Representative, but was authorized to abstain on any vote establishing a commission composed of six nonpermanent Security Council members (794A.00/8–3050).

Govt that he had no choice and under the Charter had to abstain. These considerations emphasize importance of early indication whether seven members in addition to US will support comm and what Tsiang's final position will be.

3. The basis of our position on Formosa item as given in Deptels 192 [3] and 224 is necessity for obtaining facts. If Tsiang shld find it necessary to oppose proposal for commission designed to obtain facts he might wish to weigh possible repercussions of his position particularly if he is joined by USSR in vetoing res appointing comm.

4. In the event of a veto of proposal for SC comm, since Sov condemnatory draft res (urtel 441) [4] presumably will not receive seven votes and assuming that other proposals are not made in SC the proceeding in SC on this item wld come to an end.

5. Re possibility of Tsiang's taking the view that proposal for inviting Chi Commies to SC is subject to a veto. We believe strongly such proposal is not vetoable under the Charter, San Francisco Statement (Part I Para 2) [5] and ample precedents in SC practice. Since we ourselves will oppose such proposal we hope it will not receive required seven votes and thus double veto problem will be avoided at least at this stage.

6. You state in Para 4 of your ref tel 399 that it wld be most helpful in your consultations with other dels to have guidance on "basic US objectives regarding UN handling of Formosa".

As you know this question will be considered by the three FonMins next week and we do not believe it feasible to express specific views to other dels prior to FonMins mtg. You might, however, indicate in your discretion that we view the aspect of the Formosa problem now before the SC distinct from the question of ultimate status of Formosa. The Chi Commies charges before SC raise issues of neutralization of Formosa. We are studying the long-term aspects and are tentatively inclined to believe that they may best be handled through the GA. For your info only we are sending you by pouch a paper on Formosa resulting from preparatory Ambassadorial level discussions with Brit and French which reflects areas of agreement and sets forth questions raised for decision by FonMins at impending mtg.[6]

The Ambassador in India (Henderson) to the Secretary of State

TOP SECRET NEW DELHI, September 10, 1950—2 p. m.

609. 1. Shakabpa, Tsechag Khenchung, and J. Taringqop Niloqti of Tibetan delegation called on us September 9 for discussion latest developments re military aid and their negotiations with Chinese Communists.

2. Shakabpa stated that Tibetan Government has taken firm decision to meet any Communist Chinese incursion with force. He said that his government wished him to express its deep appreciation of US offer of military assistance. As had been suggested, the Tibetan Government would approach the GOI to solicit its cooperation. A separate mission comprising Surkhang Depon and Khemchung Lobsang Tsewang had been dispatched from Lhasa and would arrive in New Delhi in a few days. To allay suspicion this mission had been designated as trade mission, but its real purpose was to bring full instructions from Lhasa Government and to conduct conversations re additional military aid with GOI. Detailed information re types and quantities of additional military equipment desired would presumably be supplied by new mission. As yet this question had not been raised with GOI by Shakabpa.

3. Re forthcoming negotiations Shakabpa stated delegation had called briefly on Chinese Chargé who had insisted that any conversations concerning future status of Tibet should take place in Peiping. He said no discussion of substantive nature had been had with Chargé and he anticipated that Chinese Ambassador who was expected to arrive few days would also take position that delegation should proceed to Peiping. He stated that Communist Chargé had informed him that although British had refused visas for Hong Kong, he (Chargé) believed that if new application were made visas would now be issued. He did not indicate basis for this belief. Delegation had also called on MinExtAff and on UK DepHiCom. MEA offered no encouragement and advised Tibetans that decision re place of negotiations should be made by parties and that GOI was loath to intervene. Shakabpa said that his call on DepHiCom was purely formal and that substantive matters were not discussed.

4. Shakabpa confirmed that Tibetan Government had received information concerning concentration of Chinese Communist troops at various points along eastern border among which he mentioned Jyekundo, Nagchen, Degegonchen, and Batang. He stated no estimate concerning size of these forces available. He understands that General Liu Po-Chen is commanding part of forces from the district along eastern bank Yangtze River. Delegation has also heard reports of Chinese Communist military preparations in Sinkiang presumably directed against northwestern Tibet, but no official word has been received from Lhasa on subject. Mixed Chinese-Tibetan forces collected along eastern frontier would, in Shakabpa's opinion, be able to operate without further acclimatization, and weather conditions during next five months would not prevent military operations.

5. Shakabpa indicated disappointment at attitude of GOI which had reiterated view that it considered Tibet under Chinese suzerainty but with local autonomy. He said that under terms of British Tibet agreement signed immediately after failure of Chinese to ratify the Simla Convention of 1914, British Government had agreed to withdraw its recognition of Chinese suzerainty over Tibet. Other provisions of this agreement, he intimated, obligated GOI—at least morally—(as successor of British) to participate in any negotiations on this question but he had no anticipation that they would do so. (British have of course repeatedly recognized Chinese suzerainty and Embassy finds nothing in secret detailed historical reviews of Tibetan-Chinese-British negotiations, which UKHC has given us copy, to warrant such interpretation.)

6. Shakabpa requested our opinion as to present attitude of GOI. He was informed that we believed GOI anxious that differences between Tibet and China be settled by peaceful means and that GOI has been urging Peiping Government to negotiate. We did not know how far GOI might be willing to go in giving further concrete aid to Tibet should military need or conflict develop. We suggested position of GOI would probably be clarified in forthcoming discussions re military aid.

7. In response to our questions concerning demands which Peiping Government has made upon Tibet, Shakabpa said no formal demands had been received; that information concerning intention of Communist China Government to "liberate" Tibet had been received chiefly from radio broadcasts and through private channels. He said these announcements included promises of non-interference with local administration and religion, but he was extremely vague and doubtful as to scope of local autonomy which he believed Peiping Government really intends. As regards the aims of the Tibetan Government in the forthcoming negotiations, he was at first reluctant to make positive statement, but finally stated that what Tibet wanted was independence. It seemed obvious that (a) Tibetans fear consequences outright claim or demand for independence, i.e., that it would provoke Chinese Communists and perhaps alienate GOI, but (b) they want to convey impression of their firm intention to achieve this goal, if necessary by fighting all perhaps in ultimate hope of preserving status quo.

Subsequently Embassy heard (from Roberts UKHC) that Tibetan delegation talked to Bajpai September 8 in terms of preserving autonomy but later same day saw Nehru and voiced desire for independence. Roberts indicated GOI would be happy see Tibet autonomy preserved but expressed uncertainty about extent GOI assistance to that end.

The vote was six in favor (France, India, Norway, U.S.S.R., United Kingdom, and Yugoslavia) to three opposed (China, Cuba, and United States), with two abstentions (Ecuador and Egypt).

Editorial Note

The United Nations Security Council met from 3:00 to 7:20 p. m. on September 12; for the record, see U.N. document S/PV.501. Shortly before the conclusion of the meeting, the Council voted on the United States draft resolution (S/1752) calling for an investigation on the scene of the complaint of bombing of Manchuria. It was rejected because of a Soviet veto, with seven in favor to one opposed (U.S.S.R.), two abstentions (India and Yugoslavia), and one member not voting (China). Then the Soviet draft resolution (S/1745/Rev.1) condemning the United States for the alleged bombings was defeated by a vote of one in favor (U.S.S.R.) to eight opposed, with one abstention (Yugoslavia), and one member not voting (China).

One further communication was received by the Security Council in September from the People's Republic of China dealing with a charge of bombing of Chinese territory (S/1808). The United States admitted that an inadvertent attack might have occurred, expressed regret, and offered to pay compensation if an on-the-spot inquiry established that an attack had taken place (S/1813). Subsequently, on October 2, the United States reported that its own investigation indicated an overflight of Chinese territory had occurred on August 27 along with a firing on a Chinese airstrip (S/1832).

No further Security Council meetings were held on this subject. For later documentation relating to United States efforts to settle the matter outside the United Nations, see volume VII, pages 731 ff.

The Acting Secretary of State to the Secretary of Defense (Johnson)

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, September 13, 1950.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I wish to acknowledge with appreciation your letter of September 11, 1950 to the Secretary of State which attached certain views of the Joint Chiefs of Staff on Formosa. While the Department of State is in general accord with the views expressed by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, it wishes to make two comments by way of clarification:

a. It is assumed that any directive which would be issued to Commander in Chief, Far East (CINCFE) in relation to the situation discussed in paragraph 2*c* would be carefully considered by the United States Government in the light of any action taken by the United Nations. Since the situation is hypothetical at this point, it does not seem profitable to attempt to go into details but it would appear unlikely that the United States Government would wish to issue a directive to one of its Commanders without any restrictions whatever on his course of action.

b. The Department of State accepts fully the objective of preventing the enhancement of the military position of the USSR in the Far East, as set forth in the first sentence in paragraph 2*d*. The remainder of that paragraph is concerned with the techniques of negotiation, on which the Department of State will have the views of the Joint Chiefs of Staff in mind. When a matter comes before the United Nations, it is to be expected that the United Nations would use the procedures most adapted to effective consideration of the problem. No single government can guarantee the procedures which might be adopted. It would not be possible to exclude all procedures in which the annexation of Formosa by the Chinese Communist Government might arise. That issue would arise if the matter were handled by diplomatic negotiation, in connection with the Japanese peace treaty, in the United Nations or, indeed, even if the United States should make an effort not to discuss the matter at all. Our purpose must be to meet the issue of Formosa and seek to have it settled on terms agreeable to the United States.

Sincerely yours, JAMES E. WEBB

237. Re urtel 352 Sep 7. In acceptance UN investigation of charge US aggression, due note was taken that complaint was made by Chi Commie regime. Both by precedent and construction of Charter there existed good reason to accept investigation. Any US attempt block consideration of complaint might have been seized upon by Chi Commies as pretext either for aggression in Korea to grave detriment UN position there or for early launching attack on Formosa which it is US policy to prevent. Debatable legal points aside, US attempt to interdict investigation wld have led to open controversy and confusion in SC, wld have reduced our international polit support, and in any case wld probably not have prevented reference question to GA. Great propaganda value vis-à-vis Asia in particular wld have been extracted by Commie bloc from US opposition to investigation, without any corresponding benefit (outside perhaps Formosa) to US, which is now in position reap some advantage from showing baseless grounds of complaint.

Appointment of commission for investigation, which we advocate, wld limit debate in SC and perhaps avoid appearance Commie Reps before latter body.

FYI. Admittedly, such investigation wld diminish flush of Chi Nats enthusiasm which followed US decision prevent attack on Formosa. However, we have not taken position in full support of Nat Govt and grave risks assumed by US in defense of internatl security must in justice to this country have as counterpart freedom for US to offer proof to world opinion that our action not taken either for purpose our own aggrandizement or involvement in polit situation in China. That is in fact the case. Chi Nats might well consider, from standpoint defense of Island, whether our Seventh Fleet action with any attendant investigation by UN wld be less advantageous to them than absence of both. Likewise, we wld question whether Nats morale as result of UN decision investigation wld be lower than it was prior to our commitment Seventh Fleet; if so, interesting commentary wld be provided on relation of their resolution to their capabilities. Re Taipei AP despatch Sep 9, it appears here doubtful Nats wld have preferred Seventh Fleet to keep out of way in order permit hostilities continue. Are they unprepared credit presence Fleet and ltd aid with being counter-balance of at least equal value to Commie moves? Pls comment.

Since indications are that Korean hostilities will be prolonged for considerable period, we are not in position to make comments on future developments, which wld necessarily be speculative and cld not constitute a commitment. Matter is now before UN and to our own thinking this medium offers best possibility in sight for equitable, pacific solution of issue. Chi Govt getting best deal possible in circumstances and shld, as we must, address itself to immed tasks at hand.

EXTRACT FROM REPORT OF INDIAN AMBASSADOR'S CONVERSATION WITH CHOU EN-LAI ON THE 9TH SEPTEMBER

In reply to Pannikar's arguments about the necessity for restraint and in particular for avoiding unnecessary provocation of the United States of America, Chou En Lai had replied that the United States of America were quite as much at fault as China in regard to public polemics and propaganda. The American press was far more outspoken in condemnation of the Chinese Communists than the Chinese press in condemnation of America. Moreover, the Chinese people felt strongly about the bombing of Chinese territory, about the American position in regard to Formosa and United States support for the Kuomintang. While China certainly wished to enter the United Nations and while she had no desire to make the task of friendly governments more difficult, complete silence on her part would be rather one-sided as long as the American press was continuing to attack her. Pannikar concluded this section of his report by recording his view that there would be no immediate change in Chinese propaganda but that he expected the tone to grow gradually more moderate.

Pannikar reported that Chou En Lai had attached great importance to Peking representatives being allowed to sit in at the Security Council when the Chinese complaints in respect of the bombing of Manchuria [2] and the American action in Formosa were discussed. Pannikar had replied that India had made it clear that she would vote in favour and that he had every reason to suppose that the United Kingdom would also do so. Bajpai commented that there was no further action which could be taken on this point.

Formosa

MR. ACHESON opened the discussion on Formosa by stating that the objective was to find a procedure which would minimize the different views and would avoid bringing the Formosa problem to a crisis. Perhaps in this way the crisis would never develop. One possibility would be for a friendly country to raise the question of the future of Formosa under Article 11 (2) or Article 14 of the Charter. A UN committee could then be appointed to investigate the problem and make a report to the next meeting of the General Assembly. In response to questions from the other Ministers, Mr. Acheson pointed out that the United States planned to handle questions about Formosa and Korea in two ways: cases of alleged United States aggression against Formosa and Korea would be dealt with in the Security Council, while questions about the future of the two countries should be discussed in the General Assembly. If, as expected, a charge of United States aggression against Formosa is discussed in the Security Council on September 18,[2] the United States plans to suggest that a commission be appointed to investigate the situation in the same way as on September 7, the United States handled the charge of the Yalu River bombing.

MR. BEVIN explained that his reservations about supporting the United States' proposal on this question were due to a misunderstanding that the United States would attempt to postpone discussion of the subject in the Security Council. Mr. Bevin had thought that such a tactic would create an extremely difficult situation for Sir Gladwyn Jebb, President of the Security Council. Mr. Acheson's explanation had removed any reservations he had.

As Mr. Schuman had no objections, the United States' proposal was agreed upon by the Ministers. Mr. Bevin and Mr. Acheson also agreed on the necessity for close consultation with regard to the procedure for placing this agreed course of action into effect, since the governments had often agreed to a course of action and then found themselves in different positions as a result of different procedures for implementation.[3]

"(1) A friendly state should raise the question of Formosa in the General Assembly under either Article 11.2 or Article 14.

"(2) A U.N. Commission on Formosa should then be appointed to study and make recommendations to the next session of the General Assembly.

Memorandum by the Acting Deputy Director, Mutual Defense Assistance, Department of State (Bell), to the Director of the Office of Military Assistance, Department of Defense (Lemnitzer)

TOP SECRET

WASHINGTON, September 15, 1950.

MEMORANDUM FOR MAJOR GENERAL L. L. LEMNITZER, DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

Subject: Political and Economic Factors Indicating the Amount and Character of MDAP Aid to the Chinese Government.

The Department of State calls to the attention of the Department of Defense the following political and economic factors which will have to be taken into account in determining the amount and character of MDAP aid to be furnished to the Chinese Government.

1. The aid to be furnished, pursuant to the recommendation of the National Security Council, should be designed to contribute to the defense of Formosa, and not to develop the Nationalist military potential for a possible mainland invasion.

2. It should be noted that it is implicit in the attitude of various governments, and explicit in British policy, that our aid should be in the spirit of the projected neutralization of Formosa.

3. Estimates of the scale of grant military assistance to the Chinese Government should take into consideration the will and capacity of the Chinese Nationalist politico-military organization in its present condition (including the Chinese Nationalist military and governmental chain of command as well as the armed services) to absorb and utilize effectively for military purposes United States supplied material. The United States should satisfy itself that the Chinese are willing and able to put to good use all equipment furnished, lest U.S. supplied items be stockpiled on Formosa and possibly seized by the Chinese Communists in the event of an invasion.

4. A careful survey of existing stocks should therefore be a precedent to the final determination of Chinese needs. This survey, which CINCFE presumably has undertaken or will undertake, should include all military supplies and equipment on Formosa, whether now in the hands of the Chinese armed forces, or crated and lying idle under the control of BOSEY, the Central Bank, or other governmental or semi-governmental organizations. Such a survey should reflect the view of the respective United States Service Attachés in Taipei.

5. All shipments under the $125 million grant were consigned to Taiwan after December 1949, at the request of the Chinese Government. Prior to that time approximately 160 million worth of matériel had been shipped, with a substantial portion of these shipments consigned to Taiwan. In addition, the Chinese have been steadily procuring arms from commercial sources in this country with their own funds. There follows a listing of the most significant military items delivered to Formosa during 1949:

Rifles, Cal. .30	123,000 each
Browning Automatic Rifles, Cal. .30	8,800 each
Thompson Sub-machine Guns, Cal. .45	5,300 each
Johnson semi-automatic rifles, Cal. .30	8,200 each
Johnson Machine Guns	880 each
Aircraft machine guns, Cal. .30 and .60	380 each
Guns, 37 mm. and 70 mm.	530 each
76 mm. Howitzer motor carriages	200 each
Sherman tanks (from the UK)	30 each
Light tanks	100 each
Scout cars	100 each
Ammunition, Cal. .30	65,000,000 rounds
Ammunition, Cal. .45	9,000,000 rounds
Small Arms Ammunition (from Spain)	1,000 tons
Rockets, RE, 2.36°	70,000 rounds
Shells, 37 mm.	70,000 rounds
Shells, Mortar	75,000 rounds
Bombs, various categories	17,600 each
Shells, 20 mm. and 40 mm.	44,000 rounds
AT–6 Aircraft	20 each

Indications are that little of this matériel was reshipped from the Island. The Chinese Government also acquired considerable stocks of arms from the Japanese on Taiwan after the war, and claims to have evacuated large amounts of matériel from the mainland, Hainan, and the Chousan Islands as those areas fell to the Communists.

6. The evidence available indicates that the Chinese Nationalists already have at their disposal much, if not most, of the basic matériel required for the Island's defense. If this information is valid, it would follow that any new program of United States military assistance on a grant basis to the Chinese Government should concern itself primarily with the filling of known important deficiencies in spare parts, ammunition, and maintenance equipment or services.

The Acting United States Representative at the United Nations (Gross) to the Security Council

SECRET PRIORITY NEW YORK, September 15, 1950—7 : 27 p. m.

551. Report of developments re establishment of SC commission on Formosa complaint and related matters.

1. Confirming my telecon with Bancroft,[1] I had lengthy, inconclusive discussion with Quevedo (Ecuador) re his government's position on inviting Chinese Communists to table during SC consideration Formosa question. Stating he had instructions from his government to vote in favor of invitation to Chinese Communist representative to attend SC sessions under rule 39, and frankly admitting his strong personal agreement with his government's instructions, Quevedo was anxious to explain reasons for Ecuadoran position. As small L.A. state, which itself had been invaded nine years ago, his government and people attached utmost importance from standpoint of national security that SC door always be wide open to complainants of aggression or invasion. Liberal parties in Ecuador would strongly criticize action by Ecuadoran delegate in SC inconsistent with this fundamental principle. Ecuador went to limit in abstaining on vote to invite Chinese Communist representative to table in connection with the Yalu River bombing complaint and had been strongly criticized for doing so. In that case a way out was found on basis that US had offered to pay indemnity, thereby recognizing its obligation in advance in event of adverse finding by a commission of investigation. However, even this was considered by Ecuadoran Government to be tenuous and artificial distinction.

At the same time Ecuador, fully realizing importance of matter to US and possible bearing upon Korean war, was anxious not to take position adverse to our interests, particularly because of their realization they would be 7th vote. I explained fully seriousness of problem from our standpoint, stressing political and strategic factors leading us to conclusion that it was neither necessary nor desirable at this stage of Formosan case to invite Chinese Communists under rule 39. In addition to outlining points made paragraph 4, Deptel 224, September 7, I pointed out possibly confusing consequences upon Chinese representation issue in GA if Chinese Communist delegation were actually at Lake Success during opening phases of Fifth Assembly. Latter point appeared to impress Quevedo, who was also impressed by argument that we were not advocating denial of forum but rather selection of more appropriate means of taking testimony; i.e., before a fact-finding commission.

Despite all the foregoing, however, Quevedo made clear serious problem his government facing. As way around dilemma, we discussed possibility of postponing SC vote until after Chinese Communist representation issue had clarified itself in GA. Quevedo seized upon this, saying he felt we might be in a better position to discuss the matter again after GA had decided Chinese representation problem one way or the other.

Quevedo reiterated his government's willingness to support fact-finding commission but was unwilling to sponsor resolution on ground it was known to be US idea and hence Ecuadoran sponsorship would simply be assailed as a satellite operation.

Comment: Tactic of delaying vote September 18 appears to us to offer best visible solution for present. Although we have no assurance that Ecuador will indeed change its position, there is a possibility that it may be prevailed upon to do so after GA vote has shown the sentiments of UN majority against taking any action at this time which might enhance prestige Chinese Communists at expense of UN effort in Korea. Ecuador Government would then have added justification for following our lead.

2. Following discussion with Quevedo, I requested Jebb to place complaint of aggression upon Korea as item 1 on the agenda for September 18 meeting, which he agreed to do. Jebb, who had been present at fourth FM meeting on Thursday afternoon, September 14, said that UK and French FonMins favored SC reaching vote upon Chinese Communist invitation at September 18 meeting. Jebb indicated Fon Mins believed invitation would be defeated, apparently being unaware of Ecuadoran position. For the moment I did not think it appropriate to advise Jebb of Ecuadoran position.

Re fact-finding commission, Jebb said Bevin had not considered matter. However, Jebb has talked to Dening and does not think UK will support proposal. Apparent UK objections are: (1) They do not perceive such a commission would serve any useful purpose; (2) It is "not evident what it would investigate"; and (3) UK does not believe commission proposal should be considered or acted upon in absence Chinese Communist representative. Jebb repeated Bevin "had virgin mind on subject."

Comment: It appears from foregoing that in order to obtain UK support, it may be necessary for Secretary to speak with Bevin and to this end I suggest Department brief Secretary without delay. It will be apparent from summary at end this message that without UK support there will not be seven votes in favor of resolution.

3. Bebler (Yugoslavia) advised me in discussion today he had instructions from his FonMin that Yugoslavia could not back proposal to establish 11-member fact-finding commission and would vote against any commission which included in its composition Chinese Nationalist Government representative.

4. Sunde (Norway) "sees no objection to commission" and will vote for it. At my request he agreed to consider sponsorship but expressed doubts that Lange would permit him to do so because Norway did not perceive that "there were any facts in dispute" and was not enthusiastic about the commission idea. Moreover, Sunde assumed idea would be opposed by Peiping regime and would be vetoed by USSR.

5. I discussed fact-finding commission with Chauvel (France) and received his commitment to support.

6. Fawzi (Egypt) advised Hyde today Egypt does not like the commission idea well enough to sponsor it and refused to commit himself definitely to vote for it. At the moment Egypt must therefore be listed in the doubtful category.

7. Blanco (Cuba) advised Hyde view of Cuba was to vote against commission inasmuch as Cuba had voted against placing item on agenda. Hyde persuaded him to reconsider and Blanco agreed to discuss matter with Cuban Minister in NY on Sunday.[2] Accordingly, Cuba must also be placed in doubtful category.

Comment: Summary of apparent voting situation re fact-finding commission.

(a) In favor: US (unless we abstain under article 27), Ecuador, Norway, France.
(b) Opposed: China, Yugoslavia, USSR (probably), UK (probably).
(c) Doubtful: Cuba, Egypt, India (uninstructed with Rau out of town until Monday).

The Chargé in China (Rankin) to the Secretary of State

SECRET TAIPEI, September 16, 1950—4 p. m.

388. Responsive Department's request for comment certain points raised Deptel 237, September 13, following observations ventured in hope of demonstrating Department's and Chinese Government positions much closer together than may have appeared.

1. To our knowledge, no responsible Chinese official and no significant faction public opion would wish Seventh Fleet mission cancelled under present circumstances. Local reaction to President's remarks at press conference August 31 is ample confirmation.

2. Chinese hold above position despite fact that US action begun June 27 has so far contributed to no permanent strengthening Chinese military forces on Formosa, while at same time preventing any interference with concurrent and substantial build-up of Chinese Communist preparations for invasion (mytel 339, September 2, transmitting memorandum from Foreign Minister).

3. There is appreciation in Chinese official circles of US position on proposed Formosan investigation, coupled with hope US will appreciate delicacy of situation here which prospect of such investigation has brought about. While not expecting US actively block consideration of proposal Chinese Government hopeful we will not only avoid sponsoring it but overlook no suitable opportunity to allow project either to die or take innocuous form. Chinese Government instructions to its SC representative simply to abstain if proposal comes to vote is evidence of reasonable official attitude.

4. US course hoped for by Chinese Government scarcely of nature to provide pretext Chinese Communist aggression. In any case, well established Communist pattern of action based upon more substantial motivation and uses tangible or manufactured pretexts almost solely for propaganda.

5. Whatever precise US position with reference to support Nationalist Government, success of Seventh Fleet mission is dependent to important degree on maintenance technical effectiveness and morale of Chinese Armed Forces. NSC decided sometime ago Formosa could not be held without use of US ground forces. Since then, Communist air, sea, land preparations against Formosa have advanced substantially. Evidently, it is more important than ever that US should strive to avoid, and whenever possible prevent steps liable foster uncertainty, alarm, or dissension among Chinese forces, thereby inviting Chinese Communist attack and contributing to its possible success.

Memorandum by the Acting Deputy Director, Mutual Defense Assistance, Department of State (Bell), to the Director of the Office of Military Assistance, Department of Defense (Lemnitzer)

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, September 18, 1950.

Subject: Military Assistance to the Chinese Nationalist Forces on Formosa.

Reference is made to your memorandum of September 16, 1950,[1] same subject, recommending an initial program of U.S. grant military assistance to the Chinese Nationalist Government at a total estimated cost of $9,752,000.

The Department of State is prepared to accept the supply priority recommended by the Department of Defense for this initial list of items to be furnished to the Chinese Nationalist Government, such priority being immediately above that of grant military assistance to Indochina. It should be understood that this priority arises from the mission now assigned to the U.S. Seventh Fleet; if that mission is changed the Department of State would wish to review the priority as between Formosa and Indochina. The Department of State notes with satisfaction that the program will be arranged in such a way as to cause minimum dislocation of supply to the European NATO countries.

The Department of State approves the initial program as specified in enclosure A [2] of your memorandum in the amount of $9,752,000, on the condition that this program conforms with the principles set forth in my memorandum dated September 15, 1950, entitled "Political and Economic Factors Indicating the Amount and Character of MDAP Aid to the Chinese Government". Necessary funds for this program were allocated to the Department of Defense by the President on August 25, 1950.[3]

569. From Gross. At noon today Quevedo advised me he had just received instructions from his government to vote in favor of inviting Peiping representative in consideration Formosan complaint. However, Quevedo added the important fact that he was instructed not to cast his vote today because of the point of view I had expressed to him concerning the unfortunate timing implicit in bringing Chinese Communists to SC on eve of GA opening.

Quevedo agreed that if we managed to avoid coming to a vote on question today,[1] he would talk again with me later in week and discuss the matter in light of GA developments re Chinese representation question. He added to what he had told me before about the difficulty of the position of his government that it did not possess Parliamentary majority at present time and was under very heavy fire from left wing groups who were particularly critical of Quevedo's abstention in vote on inviting Chinese Communists in connection with SC consideration Yalu River bombing complaint. Quevedo added he himself was under very heavy personal attack. At the same time Quevedo stressed desire his government to take full note and account of effect upon US position of inviting Peiping representatives to SC meetings for any purpose at present time.

Later in week it will probably be helpful if Department sent another message to Quito, and we will advise when we think it is timely to do so. [Gross.]

The Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk) to the Governor of Taiwan (Wu)

WASHINGTON, September 19, 1950.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR WU: Your letter of August 18, 1950[1] has been received and I wish to express my appreciation for your comments upon certain aspects of the situation on Taiwan. Ambassador Koo has called upon the Secretary and me since his return and we have also found of considerable interest his own observations on conditions in Taiwan.

Your description of the endeavors being made to carry out free elections was informative and, I must say, encouraging. You are, of course, fully aware of the importance which we attach here to popular suffrage and representative government. While it might be possible theoretically for government to be good, or at least effective, without popular participation, the record shows that government does not in fact continue good for very long without it. Taiwan, particularly because it is of manageable dimensions, affords a happy opportunity for the progressive development of a truly popular government.

The matter of personal and political liberty under the rule of law is equally important and, at the moment, perhaps even more exigent than that of electoral procedures. This is particularly true because of the spotlight now being thrown by international agencies on guarantees of human rights, and the increasing emphasis which the free countries are placing on this aspect of their system as a mark of differentiation between them and those countries which suppress the basic freedoms. I need hardly mention to you the deeply adverse effect which reports of mass arrests and executions by extralegal processes always have in this country. The expression of your particular interest in this question and your intention to use the fullest measure of your influence in orderly and legal procedures is therefore gratifying. In this sort of thing the road is always uphill and the fight for due process of law, even in those countries which have long enjoyed stability, frequently has to be renewed. Here again, as you indicate, any success achieved on Taiwan will be a long step forward for the Chinese people generally.

With reference to your proposal for a $30,000,000 currency stabilization fund, I believe you will now have received my letter of August 25, 1950 commenting on the matter.[2]

It is always a pleasure to hear from you. I send best wishes.

Sincerely yours, DEAN RUSK

[2] Mr. Rusk's letter, not printed, adverted to the lack of sympathy in the Economic Cooperation Administration for such a fund and stated that, in the circumstances, the Department of State did not wish to recommend approval to either the ECA or the Export-Import Bank. The letter concluded with an expression of hope that progress would be made toward stabilization of the Taiwan economy in the coming months with the increased flow of anticipated assistance from the United States. Memorandum of Conversation, by the Director of the Office of Chinese Affairs (Clubb)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] September 19, 1950.

Subject: Projected Submission of Formosan Question to UNGA

Participants: Dr. V. K. Wellington Koo, Chinese Ambassador
Mr. Rusk, FE
Mr. Clubb, CA

Mr. Rusk remarked that there was considerable weakness in our relationship to Formosa, deriving from the circumstance that our action of June 27 respecting Formosa had been unilateral in character. It was important for both Formosa and the United States that readiness be shown to have the matter considered at any time by the UN, this because of the need for international support for the present position. The U.S. considered that the Formosa question should properly be settled by peaceful means. The acceptance of this principle would not prejudice the actual settlement. The acceptance of the principle was the beginning, and pending the working out of that principle there could be maintenance of the status quo. Ambassador Koo should know that it was proposed that the United States Delegation would submit the matter to the UNGA, the U.S. needed international support for its present position, and the consensus of opinion was that the problem could be handled effectively only through the medium of the GA. In the UNSC we were confronted by the threat of a Soviet veto. In the UNGA there might be established a commission for study of the question, with maintenance in the interim of the present status.

Ambassador Koo asked at this point whether such commission would consider the final disposition of the problem. Mr. Rusk said that the basic idea was that Formosa was not to be fought over, that only peaceful means should be used for settling the problem. He realized that there were certain misgivings in Taipei respecting the matter. This was inevitable, but the present situation had in it elements of grave danger and it was necessary to attend to it. It was considered that a long-term solution would be facilitated by introduction of the matter into a parliamentary framework.

Ambassador Koo admitted that there were in fact misgivings in Taipei respecting the question. Mr. Rusk, in further clarification, referred to the President's statement of June 27 and the placing of the Seventh Fleet in the Formosa strait, and observed that the President himself had delineated possible lines for a future settlement. The United States itself was content to put the matter on ice and have it in a frozen state, but both our opponents and some of our friends were inclined to question this freezing. As things stood, there remained the possibility of outbreak of hostilities. This was unacceptable to us and to the American public. It was our desire that the matter be handled by peaceful means.

Ambassador Koo referred to the President's recent press statement that the Seventh Fleet might, in due course, be withdrawn. He assumed that this was an off-hand, unprepared reply. This statement and the proposal that the question of Formosa be submitted to the UN had added to the concern of the National Government. He asked whether the proposed submission of the question to the UN resulted from conclusions reached in the Three Ministers' Conference. Mr. Rusk said that the American action had not been determined by consultation with any other Government: it resulted from a concensus of opinion that this was the best procedure to follow. There was much sympathy for the Nationalists and there was the necessity that violence be avoided. Only so would the Nationalists get sympathy and support for their position on Formosa. He remarked that this was different from the question of Chinese representation and said that other Governments, including friendly Governments, might take differing positions regarding both (1) whether Formosa belonged to China and (2) whether China was properly represented by Peiping or the National Government.

Ambassador Koo asked whether the introduction of the matter into the UN might lead to a prolonged debate of the subject. Mr. Rusk replied that the Formosan problem was hardly a question which could be settled in the present session, that it was probable that it would be necessary to establish a commission to deal with the matter, that the United States particularly was not interested in pressing for prompt action. Mr. Koo asked whether the proposal for the establishment of a commission was based on the concept that it should be for the purpose of performing an inquiry or for observation or whether it was for the purpose of "gaining time". Mr. Rusk admitted that part of the purpose might be to gain time, but observed that it obviously would not be submitted to the UN in those terms. He remarked to Mr. Koo confidentially and not for submission to his Government that no one could state what Moscow planned in the present circumstances, and it was therefore important that tension be reduced by a reduction of possible points of conflict. Respecting Formosa, the United States would fight if the Commnists launched an attack; however, it was to the advantage of both Formosa and the United States if the international community could determine the matter without the occurence of fighting. It was thus that there would be obtained a greater measure of international support. The United States was without an established pattern for the future of Formosa. Likewise we were not indicating what the Chinese attitude should be. It was only felt that there should be adherence to pacific means for the settlement of the questions in point.

Mr. Koo said that there was Nationalist dislike of the visit at this time of any UN commission for the study of the status of Formosa. He asked whether there was a fixed U.S. view on the position the National Government should assume. Mr. Rusk replied, noting that his observation was purely personal, that he thought it would be better tactically for the National Government to welcome a commission, to make Taipei attractive to the visitors, and expressed the opinion that such a visit might, under such conditions, be beneficial to the Nationalists. Mr. Koo remarked that much depended upon the composition of a commission, and Mr. Rusk expressed understanding of the Nationalist point of view. Mr. Koo asked when the question might be brought before the UNGA, and Mr. Rusk said that he thought the Secretary might introduce the subject in his speech in the near future.[1] Mr. Koo said that by accepted procedure the matter would presumably have to be put on the agenda by reference to the General Committee. Mr. Rusk said that he assumed that such might be the case, but that an actual procedural approach had not yet been worked out. Mr. Koo asked whether it was not to be feared that discussion of such a question might show divisions within the non-Communist world. Mr. Rusk expressed the opinion that it was more likely that the procedure would bring about a closing of some of the existing breaches. Mr. Koo referred again to the Foreign Ministers' Conference, asking whether the discussion had had reference to ultimate disposition of the question. Mr. Rusk replied that the question came before the Foreign Ministers only as regards procedure in the UN. Mr. Koo asked whether the French and UK Governments could be considered in line with present American thinking respecting handling of the problem. Mr. Rusk said that no commitments had been made in that regard. It was only hoped that there could be peaceful solution of the problems affecting Formosa.

Mr. Rusk said that the present situation made it all the more important that Formosa follow the way laid down, he thought, by Foreign Minister Yeh, looking toward an improvement of local conditions in Formosa. Mr. Koo said that an effort was being made along those lines, but that of course it would take time.

Editorial Note

On September 20, the United States Delegation to the United Nations General Assembly requested inclusion on the agenda of an item entitled "Question of Formosa" (U.N. document A/1373). On the following day, the Delegation forwarded an explanatory memorandum stating that the General Assembly "should study the general situation with respect to Formosa with a view to formulating appropriate recommendations" (A/1381). Over the objections of the Republic of China, Czechoslovakia, and the Soviet Union in the General and First Committees, this topic was included on the General Assembly's agenda as item 71 and referred to the First Committee. By the time it came up for discussion in that body, on November 15, the worsening situation in Korea caused the United States to request deferral of debate, which request was approved by a vote of 53 to 0, with 5 abstentions (A/C.1/SR.399). See footnote 2, page 573.

Also on September 20, the Soviet Delegation proposed discussion of an item entitled "Complaint by the U.S.S.R. regarding aggression against China by the United States of America" (A/1375). The Soviet Union's explanatory memorandum is printed as U.N. document A/1382. The General Assembly, with the United States voting in favor, agreed to take up this question as agenda item 70. It then referred the question to the First Committee which began consideration at its 405th meeting on November 24 (A/C.1/SR.405).

The Secretary of State to the Acting Secretary of State [1]

Delga 23. Jebb as SC President has set Tuesday, September 26, for next SC meeting with provisional agenda to contain complaint of aggression against Formosa, Dixon report on Kashmir and Egyptian complaint against Israel. General Committee has today recommended to GA that Soviet item including same elements as Formosa complaint be put on GA agenda. Parliamentary situation in SC is that after hour and half translation of Malik's speech on Formosa Soviet draft resolution to hear Chinese Communists would be next order of business. Quevedo (Ecuador) confirms that he would feel impelled to vote in favor of this resolution, thereby supplying necessary seventh vote. According to our information, there would be no inclination to discuss Dixon report or Egyptian complaint.

Under these circumstances and considering the various ways in which Formosa case may develop in the GA with UK already tentatively suggesting GA commission and with at least the possibility that USSR may prefer to debate Formosan case in GA, we believe it not desirable to proceed with debate on this subject at Tuesday's SC meeting and particularly important to avoid vote on draft resolution to seat Chinese Communists.

Therefore, our immediate objective would be to suspend discussion of Formosa item either by making or inspiring an objection to this item on SC's provisional agenda or by motion to adjourn debate.

We would take the following line with friendly SC members in conversations and in statement at beginning of SC debate:

1. We have welcomed SC consideration of this item by voting to place it on the agenda;
2. By suggesting an investigation on the spot, we in effect proposed a commission to look into the charges;
3. Before the substance of this item has been debated or any suggestion of a commission considered in the SC, the matter was placed by the USSR on the GA agenda;
4. We have also supported its inclusion on the GA agenda;
5. Since the GA is now in session, it seems to us confusing to have the identical matter the subject of initial discussions in these two organs at the same time;
6. As the party against whom complaint is made, we are willing to have the matter discussed in either body and, as we have stated, are willing to have a commission investigate the charges;
7. It would create a confusing situation for SC to appoint a commission and have the commission empowered to investigate the very charges which are now before the GA while the GA is discussing these charges;

[1] Mr. Acheson was in New York as head of the United States Delegation to the Fifth Session of the U.N. General Assembly.

8. Although originally we proceed on the theory that the SC might consider the complaint and the Assembly the question of the future of Formosa, we see certain advantages in following the procedure of combining the two which is the practical result of the Soviet action in putting the complaint on GA agenda;

9. If the SC gets into the substance of this question, in those circumstances the GA would not under Article 12 of the Charter be able to make any recommendations.

This general line will give us time to evaluate the Soviet intentions and general atmosphere of GA approach to all aspects of Formosan problems. Perhaps in a matter of days it would become apparent that USSR does not wish to pursue case in SC, in which situation the item would remain one of which SC is seized but no meetings would be held on it. On the other hand, the case might so develop that either with or without Soviet consent we would seek the introduction by a friendly member of a resolution to remove item from SC agenda. If the GA finds itself engaged in hearing Chinese Communist representatives on this or related GA topic, any drive to pursue Formosan complaint in SC may evaporate.

1. Dept believes essential for US as party against whom Chi Commie complaint directed to avoid impression that we are trying to hamper normal course SC proceeding on this complaint.

2. It shld be for the majority of SC to evaluate and decide whether SC shld continue its consideration of the complaint.

3. We have proceeded on theory that SC shld consider Chi Commie complaint of aggression, the GA shld consider the general situation with respect to Formosa under our item "Question of Formosa". Soviets now placed new item on GA agenda covering Chi Commie charges. US supported inclusion of this item.

4. We welcomed SC consideration of Chi Commie item, supported its inclusion on SC agenda and suggested investigation of charges by Commission.

5. As party against whom complaint has been made, US is willing to have charges against it heard in both SC and GA. However, this in our view, would involve unreasonable duplication and create confusion. We believe Members shld weigh desirability that procedure be so designed as to facilitate investigation and resolve charges with minimum waste of effort.

You shld discuss above views with other Dels. FYI Dept does not feel however that US itself in the SC shld make objection to having item continued on SC agenda, or propose that it shld be dropped from the agenda, or advocate any other step inconsistent with basic proposition set forth Para (1) above. It is especially desirable that we retain political advantage gained in first instance by our expression of willingness to have charges considered in accord majority will.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. Eric Stein of the Office of United Nations Political and Security Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] September 25, 1950.

Subject: Hearing of Chinese Communists in the Formosa Case Before the Security Council.

Participants: Conversations separately with USUN—Mr. Noyes [1]
FE—Mr. Stuart [2]

I discussed this morning with Mr. Sandifer [3] the suggestion made by FE last Friday [4] that our telegram to New York should make it clear that "an attempt to bludgeon SC majority into submission to our view that Chinese Communists plaintiffs should not be heard could hardly redound other than to the detriment of US political position." [5] I told Mr. Sandifer that after discussing the matter, we agreed to omit this provision from the telegram to New York. However, I suggested for FE and UNA consideration and alternative language along the following lines:

"We would still consider it undesirable if Chinese Communists were heard in the SC now on their charges in long debate and later again in debate on the same general subject in Assembly Committee under the Soviet item. On the other hand, since we now decided to accept the hearing of Chinese Communists in Assembly Committee on Formosa if they request it,[6] and attempt by us to force our view upon SC majority desirous to hear them in SC, if this issue should arise, would hardly redound other than to detriment to the US political position. Consequently in your discussions with other Delegations you should not connect question of hearing Chinese Communists in SC with question of discontinuing SC debate on Formosa item. Our position should be based on unreasonableness of duplication of proceedings in two UN Organs as indicated in Deptel 312."[7]

[4] September 22.
[5] Presumably the reference here is to language in a draft telegram being considered for transmission to the United States Mission at the United Nations.

Both Mr. Sandifer and Mr. Stuart found this language acceptable. Later on this morning, I talked to Mr. Noyes. He said that in Ambassador Austin's view we should continue the line in the SC that the Communists should be heard in a Commission to be appointed by the SC rather than in the "plenary" of the SC, just as they would be heard in the Committee of the Assembly, and not plenary. Mr. Noyes wondered, however, what we would do if the Council does not have before it a proposal for an investigation commission and decides to continue the debate on the merits. He wondered whether it would be good politics, if it should come to a vote on the invitation, if we voted "no" in the SC today and "yes" a few days later on the same invitation in the First Committee of the Assembly with respect to Korea; would we then give an appearance that we were beaten and changed our mind as a result of the defeat? Mr. Noyes thought that USUN should try to obtain about a week's delay in further debate of the Formosa item before the SC. The meeting will open with about an hour and a half translation of Mr. Malik's last speech and then there is some possibility of the Egyptian opening up on Palestine. If we gain this delay, Mr. Noyes thought we would have time enough to consider whether we should take a consistent line in the SC and GA to ensure that we would not prejudice our position in the GA by our position in the SC.

At that point I read to Mr. Noyes the revised text quoted above and told him that UNA and FE consider it acceptable. Mr. Noyes then asked whether in case it should come to a vote on the invitation in tomorrow's meeting, and seven members supported such an invitation, could the US abstain. I said that only the Secretary could authorize this departure from the standing instruction to oppose the hearing of the Communists, and suggested to Mr. Noyes that he should raise this question with Mr. Rusk who is in New York and possibly with the Secretary. Mr. Noyes said that he was fully aware of the Secretary's commitment to the President on this matter and that he realized that it would take clearance by the Secretary. In response to Mr. Noyes' question, I said that subject to clearance by Mr. Rusk and the Secretary, we would not oppose an abstention if it should become necessary in order to avoid detrimental effect on the US political position. I particularly emphasized to Mr. Noyes that we should not connect the question of inviting the Communists with the question of discontinuing SC debate on the Formosa item. Mr. Noyes fully agreed.

I then checked again with Mr. Stuart who agreed with the following propositions: (a) we should seek delay in the SC debate (b) if delay is impossible, we should continue our line that the Communists should be heard in the SC Commission; (c) if the SC resolves to continue the debate on the merits, the US representative might abstain if a majority is definitely in favor of hearing the Communists, providing that the Secretary and Mr. Rusk agree. I told Mr. Stuart that this was my understanding of Mr. Noyes' view on what should be done, but that Mr. Noyes and myself agreed that no new instructions will be sent from the Department unless he calls me later on this afternoon and requests them.[8]

Editorial Note

The United Nations Security Council met on September 28 and agreed, contrary to the wish of the United States, to vote first on the Soviet draft resolution (S/1732) calling for an invitation to the People's Republic of China, rejecting it by a vote of six in favor to three opposed (China, Cuba, and the United States), with two abstentions (Ecuador and Egypt). The Council then turned to the Ecuadorean draft resolution (S/1817/Rev.1), rejecting that also by a vote of six in favor to four against (China, Cuba, Egypt, and the United States), with one abstention (Yugoslavia). The Representative of Yugoslavia then stated his wish to change his vote to one in favor of the Ecuadorean draft, but the Council adjourned before any further decision was taken. For the record of the meeting, see U.N. document S/PV.505.

On the following day, September 29, the Representative of Ecuador introduced his proposal as a new draft resolution (S/1823/Corr.1), substituting the date November 15 for December 1 for the invitation to the People's Republic of China and the inauguration of debate on the Taiwan issue. After votes on the separate clauses, the resolution as a whole was adopted by a vote of seven to three (China, Cuba, and the United States), with one abstention (Egypt). (U.N. document S/PV.506)

At its subsequent meeting, also on September 29, the Council rejected the suggestion of the Republic of China that the above question was substantive, and thus subject to the Chinese veto, rather than procedural. The vote was nine to one (China), with one abstention (Cuba). (U.N. document S/PV.507)

The complaint of armed invasion of Taiwan was taken up by the Security Council on November 27 in conjunction with the question of aggression upon the Republic of Korea. For related documentation, see volume VII, pages 1237 ff.

The Acting Secretary of State to the Secretary of Defense (Marshall)[1]

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, September 28, 1950.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: There is attached for the concurrence of the Department of Defense a redraft of the proposed reply to the Chinese Embassy's aide-mémoire of July 7, 1950 regarding certain problems affecting the Chinese Government which arise in connection with the President's statements of June 27 and July 19.[2]

[1] George C. Marshall had become Secretary of Defense on September 21, succeeding Louis Johnson.

You will note that the remarks regarding the fourth point mentioned in the Embassy's aide-mémoire follow the wording which Secretary Johnson accepted in his letter dated August 2. The Embassy at Taipei has already conveyed to the Chinese Foreign Office responses cleared with the Department of Defense regarding points (1), (2), and (3) of the Embassy's aide-mémoire.

After further consideration, this Department now proposes that no response be made to point (3) regarding the exercise by the Chinese Navy of the right of "visit and search" since there is no indication that comment is desired. It is the Department's view that the Chinese Government's interpretation of the right of "visit and search" as expressed in this paragraph is not objectionable, in view of the fact that it is proposed to "visit and search" Chinese vessels only. The Chinese Foreign Office has recently informed our Embassy that Chinese naval patrols have been instructed not to interfere with foreign flag merchant shipping on the high seas or in mainland territorial waters. With reference to Secretary Johnson's letter dated August 2, 1950, this Department believes that the United States Government would assume a dangerous responsibility if it suggested on its own initiative to the Chinese Government that "visit and search" be applied to all vessels on the high seas regardless of nationality. The Chinese Government has generally termed its action with respect to the Communist-held mainland ports a "port closure order", and no blockade has been proclaimed. The United States Government has not recognized the legality of the "port closure order". If this Government informed the Chinese that the right of "visit and search" could be extended to all vessels, regardless of nationality, the United States would be in the position of having recognized a state of belligerency in the Chinese conflict and thus might be estopped from denying a similar right to the Chinese Communists.

I believe there are even more important political grounds for avoiding any encouragement to the Chinese Government to attempt "visit

[2] Concerning the Chinese Embassy's aide-mémoire, see telegram 15, July 7, to Taipei, p. 371. The text of the draft proposed reply read as follows:

"Reference is made to the Chinese Embassy's aide-mémoire dated July 7, 1950, setting forth the views of the Chinese Government on certain matters related to President Truman's statement of June 27, 1950, and the mission of the United States Seventh Fleet.

"The United States Embassy at Taipei has already conveyed to the Foreign Office this Government's response, where response seemed required, to the individual questions raised in the Embassy's aide-mémoire.

"With regard to numbered paragraph four of the aide-mémoire, the United States Government has taken note of and shares the concern of the Chinese Government regarding the export of military supplies to Communist-controlled areas of China."

and search" on the high seas of non-Chinese vessels. Were the Chinese Navy to exercise unrestricted "visit and search", the British and other concerned Governments might feel obliged to withdraw some of their naval units participating in the Korean campaign in order to provide escort protection for shipping in the neighborhood of China. Furthermore, as you are aware, the United States Government is at this time endeavoring to obtain support from the British and other United Nations members for its policy of neutralizing Formosa, as outlined by the President in his statements of June 27 and July 19. This task would be made considerably more difficult if the United States took the initiative in suggesting to the Chinese Government that "visit and search" be applied to non-Chinese vessels.

This thinking seems to be in accord with the aide-mémoire of June 27 to Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, sent to give effect to the President's announcement of the same date, stating inter alia that "a continuation of air and sea operations by forces under your Excellency's command against the Chinese mainland or against shipping in Chinese waters or on the high seas would not be compatible with the discharge by the Seventh Fleet of the mission assigned to it".[3]

Sincerely yours, JAMES E. WEBB

[3] The Department of Defense concurred in the proposed aide-mémoire to the Chinese Embassy in a brief note, dated November 15 (not printed), from Secretary of Defense Marshall to Mr. Acheson (793.51/11–1550). On December 13, the Department of State sent an aide-mémoire to the Chinese Embassy, presumably identical with or along the lines of the draft quoted in footnote 2, but the record copy is missing from Department of State files. No further exchanges of correspondence on this subject took place during this period between the Secretaries of State and Defense.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. Robert N. Magill of the Office of Chinese Affairs

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] October 11, 1950.

Subject: Taiwan

Participants: Mr. Raymond Moyer, Chief ECA Mission Taiwan
Mr. Clubb—CA
Mr. Barnett—CA [1]
Mr. Magill—CA

Mr. Moyer called at Mr. Clubb's invitation for a general discussion of the situation on Taiwan, with particular reference to the policy direction of ECA aid. In response to Mr. Barnett's inquiry, Mr. Moyer summarized the ground he had covered in a luncheon conversation with Messrs. Rusk and Perkins on Oct. 6 as follows:

[1] Robert W. Barnett, Officer in Charge of Economic Affairs, Office of Chinese Affairs.

Mr. Moyer had expressed the view that it would be helpful to the operations of the ECA Mission if top Chinese officials could be given, insofar as possible, a definite indication of U.S. intentions and objectives with respect to Taiwan. There has been considerable uncertainty in the Chinese Government since the President's statement about the ultimate withdrawal of the 7th Fleet, and this uncertainty has handicapped somewhat relations between ECA and the Chinese Govt. For its part, the ECA Mission has attempted to be as frank and direct as possible with the Chinese. Regarding the ECA Program itself, Mr. Moyer had pointed out that, as a consequence of larger diversions of cotton and fertilizer from Korea to Taiwan than had been anticipated, there is likely to be a need during this fiscal year for $5 to $10 million dollars more than is available from the $40,000,000 earmarked for Taiwan. He had also drawn attention to the factors indicating that the present level of aid may need to be increased substantially before the end of this fiscal year. Significant economic improvements have been effected within Taiwan which have forestalled the likelihood of an immediate crisis. Nevertheless, a growing shortage of foreign exchange, together with further depletion of gold reserves in the face of continuing heavy military expenditures, may well result in a serious financial situation about the turn of the year which might have to be remedied through some form of ECA assistance.

Regarding Mr. Moyer's suggestion that the Chinese be provided with more definite information on U.S. intentions, Mr. Clubb observed that our ability to provide such information is limited significantly by the facts that the ultimate disposition of Taiwan has been referred to the United Nations and that we are committed to a peaceful solution of the problem arrived at by international agreement. In response to Mr. Clubb's query, Mr. Moyer stated that he was not aware of any Chinese Government plans for further reduction of troop strength on Taiwan, and had the impression that the Chinese believed they had had already cut down on military personnel as much as possible. According to K. C. Wu, an active training program is in progress to prepare all Chinese forces on the Island for combat operations. In this connection, Mr. Moyer observed that there were sharp differences among Chinese officials regarding the question of an eventual effort to return to the mainland, K. C. Wu having told him in confidence, for example, that he personally was not concerned with the return of the National Government as such to the mainland. Mr. Moyer pointed out, however, that there is a psychological necessity for the Chinese Government to advocate return to the mainland as its ultimate objective if the morale of large segments of the mainland Chinese population on Taiwan is to be sustained.

Mr. Clubb asked Mr. Moyer whether he could make any observations regarding Chinese opinion on the following possibilities: (a) achievement of an autonomous status for Taiwan; (b) political changes on the mainland which would make possible integration of Taiwan with the mainland; and (c) some form of political rapprochement between the Government on Taiwan and the Chinese Communist regime as presently constituted. In commenting on these questions, Mr. Moyer differentiated between the opinions of Chinese mainlanders and Taiwanese. Mr. Moyer stated that he had never heard Chinese officials express any thoughts along the lines of points (a) or (c) above. With reference to point (b), Chinese officials generally believe that an acceleration of present difficulties on the mainland will weaken the Communist regime sufficiently to enable their return assisted by the Chinese Army now on Taiwan, possibly capitalizing on a revolt against Peiping by regional authorities. With respect to the opinion of Taiwanese, Mr. Moyer observed that many of them hoped for an autonomous status under US or UN protection. He stated that the Taiwanese were primarily concerned with maintaining the present relatively high standard of living of the Island and would, therefore, be opposed to any arrangement which would make the Island vulnerable to exploitation from the mainland. He added that there is much nostalgia among Taiwanese for the era of Japanese control, and that they probably would not be discontented with the resumption of their previous relationship to Japan. In connection with the status of Taiwanese, Mr. Moyer observed that the local elections now being held throughout the Island give promise of a gradual increase of political strength for the Taiwanese as opposed to the mainland Chinese on the island. He stated that the Taiwanese are participating actively in the elections, are putting up their own candidates, a large proportion of which they consider to be good men, and that they had obtained an arrangement with the Chinese Government to exclude from candidacy existing office holders, many of whom are mainland Chinese.

Mr. Barnett asked Mr. Moyer whether he had observed any developments tending to diminish the Gimo's absolute authority over the Island which he exercised through his control of the Army, the secret police, and the gold reserves. Mr. Moyer stated that he believed that the extent of the Gimo's control was frequently exaggerated and that over the last year or so there had been a substantial increase in the strength of the provincial government. This is illustrated, according to Mr. Moyer, by the fact that the provincial government exercises de facto discretion in a wide range of operational matters, and that K. C. Wu has frequently been successful in his tilts with the Gimo. K. C. Wu, with the backing of C. K. Yen, and Jen, the provincial Finance Commissioner, has brought about the unprecedented achievement of a government budget, and has obtained a commitment from the Gimo that the 1951 budget will not exceed the current level of expenditures. In commenting on the possibility of further progress in reducing the budget deficit, Mr. Moyer observed that, while there undoubtedly was room for improvements in the tax system and its administration, some tax increases had already caused hardship, and additional taxes, if carried too far, might well create extreme resentment and political instability. Mr. Moyer stated that ECA was anxious to give careful attention to the tax system and that a recent visit to Taiwan by a Mr. Moss, a tax expert with SCAP, had been most helpful. It is anticipated that associates of Moss may be able to visit Taiwan for a longer period in the near future. In response to Mr. Magill's inquiry, Mr. Moyer said that Moss and company were detailed by SCAP to ECA Taiwan (i.e. continued on SCAP's payroll while in Taiwan, although ECA paid travel and per diem) and that it was understood that the purpose of this detail was to enable them to do a job for ECA.

Mr. Clubb asked Mr. Moyer whether there had been any basic changes since June 27 in the ECA Mission's thinking regarding the economic aid program on Taiwan. For its part, Mr. Clubb said, the Department considered that policy regarding economic aid to Taiwan remained unchanged pending a clarification of what the long-run US relations with Taiwan would be. He said that it should be recognized that our present relation to Taiwan was a "strange interlude" resulting from military exigencies which would not, in and of itself, justify a fundamental readjustment of U.S. objectives in the economic field. Mr. Moyer observed that ECA was faced with a choice, on the one hand, of continuing a relatively passive role in providing economic assistance to Taiwan versus an effort, on the other hand, to use its position and material resources to the maximum extent possible for the creation of a stable economic base on Taiwan. He stated that ECA was now proceeding on the basis of the second alternative within such policy limitations on relations with the Chinese Government as had been indicated by the Department—thus, ECA's interest in an Economic Stabilization Board and intensive study by experts of Taiwan's economic, fiscal, and administrative problems. Mr. Clubb commented that he saw no necessary conflict between this approach and Department policy regarding Taiwan. Mr. Barnett stated that the policy limitations imposed thus far by the Department on ECA relations with the Chinese Government reflected, in part, the view that assumption by ECA of substantial responsibility for the policy and administrative decisions of the Chinese Government would result in undue dependence by the Chinese on U.S. initiative and guidance and thus, in the long run, impede rather than foster the emergence of a self-sustaining regime on Taiwan. Mr. Moyer acknowledged the validity of this consideration.

Mr. Barnett referred to a recent telegram to ECA Taiwan recommending that a "military economist", which both ECA and the Department had urged that Army assign to Taiwan, should be attached to a U.S. Military Advisory Group on Taiwan rather than to the ECA Mission or the Military Attaché's Staff at the Embassy. He stated that it was his understanding that there is presently no plan for the establishment of a U.S. Military Advisory Group on the Island and suggested that such a "military economist" might best be attached to the ECA Mission in view of the fact that his raison d'etre would be economic rather than military and because, if he were thus assigned, he could be influenced to avoid improper participation in strictly military activities. Mr. Moyer asked whether there would be any objection to the assignment of such a man to Admiral Jarrett's staff. Mr. Clubb stated that this might be the most appropriate arrangement since, whatever the objective of his assignment, his function would be military in character. Mr. Moyer added that his attachment to the ECA Mission would lend a certain military color to the economic program which ECA had thus far been careful to avoid.

Delga 106. There is given below revised UK draft resolution on Formosa upon which Department's views are requested. UK has distributed this draft resolution only to Commonwealth countries and US. UK delegation requests US views on sponsorship of resolution and states it has tentatively reached conclusion that some nation which has not recognized Communist China should be sponsor. UK also desires US views on how soon resolution should be tabled in Committee 1 as it is of opinion that mere fact of making resolution public at early date would have beneficial effect on Peiping regime. USUN officer expressed personal opinion that it would appear preferable to have sponsorship of several countries equally divided among those recognizing and those not recognizing Communist China. Following is text draft resolution:

"Noting (A) That the signatories to the Cairo declaration declared it to be one of their purposes that all the territories that Japan had stolen from the Chinese, including Formosa, should be restored to the Republic of China;

(B) That no legal change in the status of Formosa as Japanese territory has yet been effected, although at the end of hostilities with Japan, China was permitted to assume the administration of the island,

Recognizing that two parties, both Chinese, at present claim the right to administer Formosa, that there have been threats of an armed attack on Formosa from the Chinese mainland and that Formosa has been used as a base for attacks on the Chinese mainland, and that an attempt to settle the dispute by force or the continuance of attacks on the Chinese mainland from Formosa would heighten international tension at a time when the situation in the Pacific area is already tense as a result of events in Korea, and would be prejudicial to the interests of the people of Formosa,

Decides to establish a commission which, bearing in mind China's claims, should study the problem and submit a report to the GA containing recommendations for the future of Formosa. The commission should consult with all governments, authorities and parties concerned, Recommends (A) That, pending consideration of the Commission's report by the GA, there should be no attempt to seek a solution of the issue by force,

(B) That Formosa should not be used as a base for attacks on the Chinese mainland;

Requests all parties (A) to act in conformity with (A) and (B) above;

(B) To render every possible assistance to the commission in the performance of its task."

Memorandum Prepared by the Central Intelligence Agency

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] 12 October 1950.

C. THREAT OF CHINESE COMMUNIST INVASION OF FORMOSA [1]

I. STATEMENT OF THE PROBLEM

1. To estimate the threat of Chinese Communist invasion of Formosa during 1950.

II. CAPABILITIES

2. Despite certain definite Chinese Communist deficiencies in naval and air forces and probably in amphibious training and doctrine, the Communists are now capable of launching an invasion against Formosa with about 200,000 troops and moderate air cover. The USSR could at a minimum furnish tactical advice and technical and logistic support.

3. Although Chinese Nationalist forces are sufficient in number and matériel to defend Formosa, lack of staying power, poor command structure, lack of inter-service coordination, questionable morale and shortages of some types of ammunition make their defense capabilities questionable.

4. Without direct Soviet participation and given strong naval and air assistance by the US armed forces, the Chinese Nationalist defense forces are capable of holding Formosa against a determined Chinese Communist invasion.

III. FACTORS BEARING ON INTENT

5. Indications of Intentions. Frequent official statements of the Chinese Communists have clearly indicated their intention to seize control of Formosa. However, available intelligence does not indicate their intention to do so in the immediate future. An unknown factor bearing upon the intent to invade is the degree of control the USSR is capable of exercising over the Chinese Communists, and the Soviet intent with respect to Formosa.

6. Factors Favoring Invasion of Formosa.

a. The occupation of Formosa would remove the symbol of Nationalist resistance; eliminate a potential source of coordinated opposition to the Chinese Communist regime; and would seriously diminish continued anti-Communist resistance in China and throughout Southeast Asia.

b. Abandonment or continued postponement of an attack on Formosa would result in a loss of "face" to the Chinese Communists.

c. Formosa would provide the Chinese Communists with a small but significant source of foreign exchange, and a potential source of rice, thereby contributing somewhat to Chinese Communist capabilities for economic reconstruction.

7. Factors Opposing an Invasion of Formosa.

a. Success would be improbable.

b. An attack involves the risk of war with the US as long as US forces are interposed between Formosa and the mainland. The Chinese Communist leadership would be reluctant to jeopardize its popular support, domestic achievements, and internal porgram by an attack on Formosa that could lead to retaliatory air attacks on Chinese cities, to a strict blockade of the Chinese coast, to strong economic sanctions, and to protracted warfare that could sap Chinese economic strength.

c. The Chinese Communists face serious domestic problems, including banditry, widespread unrest, guerrilla opposition, economic stagnation, agrarian maladjustments, and the problems involved in consolidating the Communist Party's political control. For these reasons the danger exists that, if attacks should fail or prove unduly costly, the present apparent solidarity of the Communist regime would be subjected to a severe strain.

d. In view of current UN interest in Formosa, the Chinese Communists have some reason to hope for a favorable political solution.

IV. PROBABILITY OF CHINESE COMMUNIST INVASION

8. It is believed that barring a Soviet decision to precipitate global war, an invasion of Formosa by the Chinese Communists will not be attempted during the remainder of 1950.

The Ambassador in India (Henderson) to the Secretary of State

TOP SECRET PRIORITY NEW DELHI, October 13, 1950—5 p. m.

918. 1. I asked Bajpai today whether GOI had confirmation re new reports of Communist Chinese invasion of Tibet. He replied in negative adding that he had yesterday despatched strong telegram to Panikkar, GOI Ambassador in Peiping, on subject. With utmost secrecy he read to me text this telegram.

2. He asked Panikkar again to inquire whether reports of Chinese invasion had any substance and when so doing indicate earnest hope GOI that Chinese would show restraint and patience in dealing with Tibet and would not be hasty in resorting to violence. Panikkar was also informed that if Communist China should indicate that it had already invaded Tibet or that it was planning to do so GOI would be compelled follow up his representation with still stronger approach. It would be pointed out to Peiping that GOI had endeavored to befriend it; that in trying to obtain admission for it in UN, to support it re Formosa, and to assure that it would have appropriate voice in settlement Korea, GOI had aroused displeasure of certain other members UN; that GOI for many years had maintained friendly relations with autonomous Tibet; that it believed it was not unduly interfering in Chinese affairs in suggesting that effecting change in status of Tibet by armed force would not be in interests of international position of China or in that of friendship between China and India for which GOI fervently hoped. Charges that great powers were bringing influence to bear on Tibet were senseless. GOI was only power which maintained representation. At present time there were no British or Americans in Lhasa.

3. Bajpai also read to me memo on subject to Nehru in which he suggested with considerable heat that if it were true that China should now invade Tibet it should be regarded as sign of indifference of Indian sensibilities and lack of appreciation of India's efforts on China's behalf. After India had aroused irritation in US and other countries by supporting China with regard to Formosa, Korea and entrance into UN, and after it had conveyed to world China's insistence that China would intervene in Korea in case US forces should enter North Korea it would be ironical if China instead of intervening in Korea should now invade Tibet.

4. I hope info in this telegram will be closely guarded since leak would cause grave embarrassment.

The Secretary of State to the United States Mission at the United Nations

SECRET WASHINGTON, October 14, 1950—11 a. m.

Gadel 44. With ref Delga 106 Oct. 11 Dept believes Brit draft offers satisfactory basis for Assembly res on item "Question of Formosa". Fol is modified text of Brit draft with our additions and changes:

"Noting (A) that the signatories to the Cairo Declaration declared it to be one of their purposes that all the territories that Japan had stolen from the Chi, including Formosa and the Pescadores, shld be restored to the Rep of China;

(B) that no formal act restoring sovereignty to China has yet occurred, although at the end of hostilities with Japan the Chi Natl Govt was permitted to assume the administration of the island;

Recognizing that two parties, both Chi, at present claim the right to administer Formosa, that there have been threats of an armed attack on Formosa from the Chi mainland and that Formosa has been used as a base for attacks on the Chi mainland, and that an attempt to settle the dispute by force or the continuance of attacks on the Chi mainland from Formosa wld heighten internatl tension at a time when the situation in the Pacific area is already tense as a result of events in Korea, and wld be prejudicial to the interests of the people of Formosa;

Decides to establish a commission composed of the representatives of (specified states) which, bearing in mind China's claim, taking into account the interests of the people of Formosa, and giving consideration to the maintenance of peace in the Pacific, shld study the problem and submit a report to the GA containing recommendations for the future of Formosa and the Pescadores. The Commission shld consult all govts, authorities and parties concerned, including both Chi claimants;

Recommends that, pending the study by the Commission and adoption by the GA of recommendations concerning this problem (A) there be no attempt to seek a solution of the status of Formosa by force, (B) Formosa not be used as a base for attacks on the Chi mainland;

Requests both Chi parties to act in conformity with the recommendation in the preceding para;

Recommends to the SC that it consider immediately any action in contravention of (A) or (B) of above recommendation with a view to adopting appropriate measures for the maintenance of internatl peace and security;

Requests all parties to render every possible assistance to the commission in the performance of its tasks."

In the first operative para beginning with "Decides" insertion of phrase "taking into account the interests of the people of Formosa" is predicated upon our belief that interests of Formosan people shld be mentioned on equal level with China's claim. In addition to China's claim and wishes of Formosans broad interest of UN in peace of Pacific area also a factor to be taken into account.

Rephrasing of first recommendation is drafting change designed primarily to define more clearly the period during which that recommendation applies.

Dept believes desirable that first recommendation of Brit draft be further strengthened. With this in mind Dept has added recommendation referring to SC action as warning to those who might violate recommendation to refrain from use of force.

We assume under Brit draft Commission wld have discretion as to when to report. In view of complexity of problem and need for thorough study all aspects, appears doubtful that final report cld be made before Sixth Session GA.

Dept considers composition of commission extremely important and is giving further consideration this subj. Wld tentatively favor US membership.

Dept agrees with USUN officer (Delga 106) that it wld be preferable to have sponsorship of several countries including some recognizing and some not recognizing Chi Commies. We believe that res cld be submitted to Comite as soon as acceptable draft developed and sponsorship question resolved.

Dept wld appreciate ur early comment on foregoing, including suggestions re composition Commission. Suggest also you obtain views UK Del re modified draft, and inform Dept re any comment made by Commonwealth countries to UK Del on Brit draft.

Mr. Dean Rusk

In a private conversation among the three of us following the larger conference with the President, Mr. Harriman asked General MacArthur whether the subject of Formosa had come up in the President's private talk with General MacArthur at breakfast.

General MacArthur said: "Yes. I told the President that I had supposed that my letter to the Veterans of Foreign Wars had been right down the line of the President's policy. Had I not thought so, I would not have sent it. The President said that he considered that a closed issue. I told him that I also considered it as closed."

The above quotation is almost exact but may vary by a few words. The meaning is accurate.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. John M. Allison, Adviser to the United States Delegation to the United Nations General Assembly

SECRET [NEW YORK,] October 23, 1950.

Subject: Formosa

Participants: The Secretary
John Foster Dulles
Lucius D. Battle
John M. Allison

Mr. Dulles and Mr. Allison called on the Secretary at the Waldorf this afternoon to discuss the Formosan item which may come before Committee I sometime within the next two weeks. Mr. Dulles stated that he had been considering the matter over the weekend and welcomed the chance to give the Secretary his thoughts.

Mr. Allison said that as an introduction to Mr. Dulles' statement, he would like to point out that while there appeared to be general agreement in the Department with the form of the Resolution on the Formosan problem which had been prepared by the UK Delegation, nevertheless as a result of talks with members of the UK and Canadian Delegations it was clear that there was not agreement as to the final ends which it was hoped would be achieved by the passage of the UK Resolution. The Canadians and, to a lesser extent, the UK delegation seemed to assume that there was only one possible answer which the Commission, contemplated in the UK Resolution, could come up with, namely, the handing over of Formosa unconditionally to Communist China. This was not the desire or belief of the US delegation and it therefore was important that agreement he reached on the ends desired so that an unfavorable result would not be obtained by default.

Mr. Dulles then outlined his views on the position the US should take which were substantially as follows:

The US interest in the Formosan problem is a deep and legitimate one and the US feels it has a special responsibility in view of the close connection between the ultimate disposition of Formosa and the conclusion of a Japanese peace treaty which will formally remove Formosa from Japanese sovereignty. The US being the chief occupying power in Japan and the one most deeply concerned in a Japanese peace settlement naturally has great responsibility to see that any solution of the Formosan issue is a sound one which contributes to peace and stability in the Pacific area and the welfare of the people. The US has no desire to cast doubt upon the validity of the Cairo and Potsdam Agreements with respect to Formosa and does not maintain that Formosa should not in due course be formally returned to China. However, the present Chinese Government on the mainland of China is not the one which was in power at the time of Cairo and Potsdam and it certainly is not clear that the people of Formosa desire to be placed in subjection to that government.

It would seem that before a definitive decision is implemented in pursuance of a Japanese Peace treaty, at least the following four points ought to be explored by the United Nations:

1. While it could fairly be assumed at the time of Cairo and Potsdam that the Formosan people would welcome a return to China, intervening changes have been so great that that assumption might not be valid today. In view of United Nations Charter undertakings which overide any inconsistent engagements, it would seem that the United Nations should seek to find out whether, in fact, the wishes of the people of Formosa remain as had been assumed at the time of Cairo and Potsdam and whether or not they desire to become subject to the regime that presently controls the Chinese mainland.

2. If Formosa is to become politically a part of China, should not the arrangement include some provision for autonomy which would reflect the oft-expressed desire of the Formosan people for a measure at least of self-government?

The United Nations is considering this problem in connection with the giving to Ethiopia of political sovereignty over Eritrea and is contemplating a measure of autonomy under a Federal structure. Some such formula might also be explored in the case of Formosa as being consistent with the Charter conception with reference to non-self-governing peoples.

3. Another item of importance which should be considered by the UN in reaching a just solution of the Formosan matter is the fact that for the last fifty years or so Formosa has been a part of Japan and its economy has been integrated with that of Japan. There is still a close commercial connection between Japan and Formosa and consideration should be given to the advisability of maintaining, at least for a considerable period, free trade between Japan and Formosa which would undoubtedly be in the interest of both parties.

4. In view of the strategic position of Formosa and in view of the fact that any attempt by force to settle its ultimate disposition might well prejudice the maintenance of peace and stability in the Pacific area, it is believed that the UN might well give careful consideration to the possibility of permanently neutralizing Formosa in some manner which, while not prejudicing any particular political solution, would nevertheless ensure that Formosa would not be the cause of aggravating great power tensions or even be a precipitating cause of war. It might also be that, pending definitive action, the UN, under its Uniting for Peace Resolution, might promptly send a peace observation commission to Formosa to help preserve the status quo as against breach of the peace.

Secretary Acheson expressed his agreement with the approach Mr. Dulles had in mind and authorized Mr. Dulles to proceed along the lines indicated. It was pointed out that there was one possibility which had not been considered and that if the approach suggested by Mr. Dulles were adopted it would not be possible to consider this other approach which was, in brief, that new leadership might emerge among the non-communist liberal Chinese elements on Formosa, that Chiang Kai-shek might be displaced and that with this new leadership and a certain amount of American assistance it might be possible to make landings on the mainland and in cooperation with disaffected elements there succeed in overthrowing the Communist regime. Both Secretary Acheson and Mr. Dulles agreed that it would be inconsistent with US policy in the UN for this Government to plan to use Formosa as a base for military expeditions aiming at regaining control of the Chinese mainland and it was agreed that this alternative should not be considered at this time. However, if the Chinese Communist regime should take overt action in an endeavor to seize Formosa by force while UN consideration of the matter was going on it would be necessary to review the situation. It was assumed that in the meantime Formosa might be used as a base for propaganda activity and perhaps certain covert contact with resisting elements on the mainland.

With respect to the position of the Seventh Fleet, Secretary Acheson pointed out that its value was primarily psychological in as much as it had not in fact spent much of its time in the Formosa Straits but rather had been in Korean waters. It was agreed that a formal announcement of a withdrawal of the Seventh Fleet would be unfortunate and would appear to be an invitation to the Communists to take over and it was felt that for the present, until the Korean situation had been brought to a final successful close, it would probably be necessary for the orders of the Seventh Fleet to remain unchanged. At a suitable time it might well be possible for the Seventh Fleet without any public announcement to withdraw to its original base at Cavite without creating unfortunate repercussions. It was also agreed that it would be useful to consult the military on this matter and have the benefit of their latest thinking.

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Chinese Affairs (Clubb) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] October 26, 1950.

Subject: Project for Organization of "Free China Committee"

The history of overseas Chinese communities, which are discovered in greatest number in Southeast Asia, is of major relevancy to any study of the desirability of projecting the organization of something on the order of a "Free China Committee". The overseas Chinese contributed substantially to the Chinese revolution against the Manchu Dynasty, gave expression to their interest in the welfare of the motherland at the time when the Kuomintang–Communist Party coalition was driving (1924–1927) toward the overthrow of the warlords, and contributed to the downfall of Chiang Kai-shek by withdrawing their support in the post World War II years of civil strife.

There appears to have been in overseas Chinese communities an initial enthusiasm for a Chinese Communism which first made serious bid for power under the banner of a nationalism opposed to the Japanese control of China. It gained strength from the common disillusionment with the administration of the corrupt Kuomintang and the general hope that the advent of the Chinese Communists to power would represent in China the dawning of a new day when there would be more of probity and efficiency in government and a more rapid progress of the country toward the status of a modern, industrialized state.

The Chinese Communist display of themselves in their true colors in the year and a half since their occupation of Peiping and Tientsin has brought about much disillusionment in overseas communities. This is attested by recent reports from consular offices of the Department of State regarding the celebrations held in local Chinese communities variously on October 1 and October 10, when the non-Communist elements showed surprising strength and vigor in their turnouts. This is not to say that the Chinese overseas communities abroad have any further substantial hope in the future of the Kuomintang. The expression of independence manifested in the non-Communist demonstrations on October 10 was not to be taken as a manifestation of support for the Nationalist cause or for any particular cause so much as a reaction against the extreme policies of the Chinese Communists which, in the eyes of overseas Chinese, are operating to the detriment of the Chinese people and the Chinese State. The demonstrators would presumably sometimes carry Nationalist banners for want of a better one, or as a symbol of their resistance. At the present time there seems to be lacking both in China Proper and abroad ideology, leaders, and organization for a movement of opposition to the Chinese Communists. The "resistance", therefore, still is manifest primarily in the persons of the Chinese bandits and guerillas who are literally struggling for existence.

The advisability of organizing any such "Free China Committee" should be determined only after reference to (a) American overall policy respecting China and (b) the state of Chinese overseas opinion regarding China. American policy faces imminently at least partial new crystallization due to the operation of the following factors: (1) the impending manifestation, positive or negative, of Chinese Communist intentions with respect to Korea; (2) the UN decision regarding criteria for accrediting to the UN of representatives of a member State in which two parties alike claim authority; and (3) possibly, renewed consideration of the question of the advisability of recognition of Peiping. The value to the United States of a "Free China Committee" would obviously be dependent in good part on the political elements currently dominating Sino-American relations.

A native Chinese movement which took on the outward aspect of a committee such as that under consideration could of course do us no harm, and might in fact contribute substantially to the overall campaign against world Communism. It does not, however, at this state appear clear that the overseas Chinese have in them the conviction and determination that would be requisite to make such a general committee a going concern. It is certain that overseas activities can have real effect only in so far as there is a real relationship of the movement with the home-land. There appears to be lacking now any strong connections between the overseas Chinese communities and anything approaching a genuine "resistance movement" in China; it appears, in fact, that there is as yet no integrated resistance force either at home or abroad, and that a "Free China Committee" would therefore be an artificial apparatus introduced into the situation—by the United States. If that is true, it would fail to affect the outcome of the struggle in any substantial way.

It is of course not as yet certain that there are nonexistent the elements of real anti-Communist resistance in the overseas Chinese communities and in China. It is only to be pointed out that, as indicated in Air Intelligence Information Report of July 7, 1950 from Hong Kong,[1] it was early expected that "the overseas Chinese communities in general are expected to serve effectively the interests of a Communist-dominated Government in China" and it remains uncertain that the Chinese communities in Southeast Asia are strong enough to resist the temptation to take the easy way of compliance. Many Chinese in China did just that. The surveys now being undertaken by field offices will shed considerable light on the feasibility of such a project. It is recommended, however, that at least pending receipt of those surveys and collation of that new data we should limit our activities to work with existing organizations, both in Southeast Asia and in the United States. The organizations selected obviously would not serve our purpose well if they were of the Kuomintang machinery. The Kuomintang itself has proven how ineffectual it can be by following the lines of its barnacled policy and there would be little hope of our capturing Kuomintang organizations and molding them to our own purposes for so long as we continue to recognize and support the National Government at Taipei. It would be much more probable that the Kuomintang organization would capture our own efforts in so far as we put them within reach of Kuomintang chapters. The organizations that we should select for our first work would best be, it would seem, Chinese secret societies, Chinese chambers of commerce, and Chinese social organizations designed for non-Kuomintang ends. The framework for action would be the local Chinese community and its relationships with the home-land, China. The aim for the present stage would be restricted to (1) the obtaining of information regarding existing political relationships affecting the Chinese community and the trends in such relationships, and (2) thus, the assessment of the feasibiliay of contributing to such a coordination of native Chinese sentiments as would in turn be of value to the strengthening of the anti-Communist front. Such an effort, it should be stressed, will be of real value only in so far as it can affect the situation in China itself; and, further, such a project could properly be undertaken only with due regard for local conditions, including the attitudes of friendly governments, in the areas of intended action.

American contacts in this preliminary stage could be effected through local Chinese newspapers and other publicity channels which had their ultimate outlet on the mainland and by approaches to Chinese chambers of commerce and social organizations. The experience and information gained through our first contacts would obviously present us with guides for future efforts and the data supplied by consular offices should facilitate further defining of the lines of the subject in point. If events in the eastern Asiatic area so determined, and our research made clear the feasibility, we could then proceed to the next step. The first steps, it is suggested, should be taken carefully and the projected "Free China Committee" would not seem, on the basis of the scanty data in hand, best designed to serve our purposes. Further survey and some initial experience with Chinese overseas thinking and attitudes would seem to be the basic prerequisites.[2]

[2] On October 30, John P. Davies of the Policy Planning Staff sent the following memorandum to Assistant Secretary Rusk:

"I concur in Mr. Clubb's memorandum of October 26, 'Project for Organization of "Free China Committee" '.

"I would only add that to set up a Free China Committee at this stage would probably be to establish a gravy train. Given the almost supernaturally sensitive Chinese nose for this type of institution, we would find ourselves with a typically overflowing Chinese load of passengers, among whom few, if any, would be willing to get out and walk off into the countryside, where the struggle must begin if it is to be won. I would recommend waiting until (a) we discover a handful of selfless, dedicated, hard-bitten souls, and (b) we ourselves acquire some political sophistication about such operations before we undertake to bring a 'Free China Committee' into being." The Ambassador in India (Henderson) to the Secretary of State

TOP SECRET PRIORITY NEW DELHI, October 26, 1950—4 p. m.

996. Totib. 1. ReDeptel 557, October 13,[1] Calcutta informed Embassy October 4 that Konchung Lobsang Tsewang and Rimshi L. T. Surkhang of Tibet Trade Mission were arriving Delhi that afternoon and desired advice from Embassy re military aid to Tibet. Consulate advised them contact Embassy through Shakabpa.

2. Members of trade delegation called upon me unannounced twelve days later (October 16) and broached subject military aid. Since Embassy officer who has handled matter throughout was absent an appointment was made for delegation call again October 18, 11 a. m. At hour specified instead of delegation letter was received cancelling appointment because "of urgent works" and expressing hope to see me during their next visit here. Embassy had assumed from long delay in opening discussion of military aid by Trade Mission that Tibetans were being inhibited by course their discussions with Chinese or Government of India, or being directly advised by them to refrain from contacting Embassy and we therefore, considered it advisable to await developments rather than to take initiative in matter. We also expected Shakabpa sooner or later would call and bring us up to date or that favorable opportunity might open for sounding Government of India officials. These expectations completely upset, however, by yesterday's departure (Embtel 985, October 25) Shakabpa mission with nothing more than telephone advice from them.[2]

[1] The text of this telegram read as follows: "Has Emb any recent info re intended Tibetan approach to GOI for additional mil aid?" (793B.5/10–1350)

[2] The text of telegram 985 read as follows:

"Member Shakabpa mission telephoned Embassy yesterday to state mission had received instructions from Lhasa to leave for Peiping immediately. All members mission are flying Calcutta today and will spend few days Calcutta and Kalimpong making preparations proceed Hong Kong by air.

"Press reports state no difficulties anticipated over Hong Kong entry permits." (693.93B/10–2550)

3. Embassy officer therefore, called on Menon, Foreign Secretary, this morning and in course of discussion latest developments Tibet raised subject military aid and asked what had transpired while Tibetans were in New Delhi. Menon said categorically Tibetan delegation had never raised question of additional military aid with Government of India. Embassy officer doubted his word but was in no position contradict. In any event Embassy impression from conversations with Government of India and United Kingdom High Commission officials as well as with Nepalese Ambassador is that Tibetans completely lost heart from attitude of Government of India encountered in New Delhi and that this attitude was largely responsible for fact that they failed pursue matter of military aid either with Government of India or the United States. Nepalese Ambassador yesterday informed us that Government of India seemed to be "washing its hands of Tibet" and said that Shakabpa had informed him that position of Tibet was hopeless unless aid could be obtained from Nepal or India. Nepalese Ambassador said that since India was doing nothing Nepal was also helpless.

4. Embassy can only assume in circumstances that question military aid for Tibet is therefore dead, although Calcutta has been requested endeavor contact Tibetan delegation there where they might feel freer talk about what happened in New Delhi.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. John Foster Dulles, Consultant to the Secretary of State

SECRET [NEW YORK,] October 27, 1950.

Participants: H. E. Dr. Tingfu F. Tsiang, China
Mr. John Foster Dulles, U.S.A.
Mr. John M. Allison, U.S.A.

Subject: Formosa

Dr. Tsiang called, pursuant to appointment, to discuss with us the question of Formosa. He said that he was concerned lest our policy of asking the U.N. to send a Commission to Formosa on the theory that it was still a matter of international concern would weaken the Nationalist Government in two important respects: First, it would tend to increase the impression that the Nationalist Government was a "government-in-exile" and this might lead certain wavering nations to withdraw recognition; second, it would curtail the possibility of the Nationalist Government actively conducting and promoting resistance to the Communists on the mainland.

Mr. Dulles pointed out that he believed that the policy of non-recognition of the Communist regime depended more upon disqualification of that regime to speak for the Chinese people than upon the ability of the Nationalist Government now to do so, and that the disqualifications of the Communist regime as a regime which really carried out the wishes of the Kremlin rather than of the Chinese people would not, in any way, be altered by treating Formosa as still subject to treaty or U.N. action. Dr. Tsiang said he recognized the logic of this position, but that as a practical matter he felt that certain countries that were looking for an excuse to recognize the Chinese Communists might seize upon the Assembly action as giving them a pretext for doing so.

As regards the second point, Dr. Tsiang said that the Nationalist Government was not satisfied with a future whereby it might, perhaps, languish on Formosa. The future of any Chinese Government was essentially on the mainland, and he believed that there was a rising tide of opposition to the Communists there, and that it was by no means impossible that there would be large scale revolts and eventually that the Communist regime would lose control. The Nationalist Government would not want to be prevented from promoting this result. It would then be condemned to slow death.

Mr. Dulles said that he thought it must be recognized that any international concern for Formosa would probably make it impractical for the National Government to carry on actual warfare against the mainland or to launch expenditions against the mainland. It would not, he thought, necessarily prevent propaganda and covert activities, and the giving of certain guiding directions, but that active military operations might be out of the question.

Dr. Tsiang said that he wishes very much that the United States would keep an open mind as to the possibility of helping the Chinese Nationalists regain control of the mainland. He did not think this would be as difficult an operation as it seemed, because really the Chinese Communist armies were not a very effective fighting force. They had defeated the Nationalist armies, but that was largely a question of morale and the bad effect of inflation.

Mr. Dulles said that he considered this possibility presently out of the question as he understood that it was the clear judgment of our military authorities that the United States should not engage itself on mainland operations. We had done so exceptionally in the matter of Korea and had taken some serious risks, but Korea as a narrow peninsula could largely be dominated by sea and air power, and that permitted the amphibious operations which had won success. We were not, however, willing to engage in what would virtually be a war against those controlling the Chinese mainland.

Dr. Tsiang indicated that he thought that if Russian help to the Communists could be prevented, then the Communists could be overthrown without the United States becoming engaged, and he wondered whether the United Nations could do anything in this respect. Mr. Dulles stated that he felt that any attempt in this direction would react against the Nationalists as the United States would, of course, have to cut off all military aid to the Nationalists whereas it would be impossible to expect, or to verify, Soviet Union compliance with any such U.N. request.

Dr. Tsiang said that he felt he had to agree with this conclusion. Also he accepted the fact that the United States would not now adopt a course which would commit it to participation in fighting against the Communists on the Chinese mainland.

Mr. Dulles said in recapitulation that Dr. Tsiang had put his finger on the two disadvantages to his Government of the respective U.S. position, namely: (1) Possibly weakening its title to recognition; and (2) diminishing its power of operations against the mainland. On the other hand, Mr. Dulles said, the Chinese Nationalist Government must see the disadvantage of the United States adopting the position that Formosa was part of China which would mean that neither the United States nor the United Nations could do anything in what would be a purely civil war. For the United States to take that position would be widely looked upon as virtually an invitation to the Chinese Communists with Russian help to conquer Formosa.

Dr. Tsiang indicated he was inclined to feel that the advantages of our course outweighed the disadvantages. But he urged that our Government should undertake to hold the disadvantages to a minimum. Mr. Dulles said that he personally also shared this hope, but that he was not in a position to give any future commitments of any kind. He would promptly report the conversation to the State Department and would doubtless have a further indication of the Department's views by the first of next week.

Mr. Dulles in conclusion said that he recognized that the U.N. representative of the Nationalist Government would no doubt, for the purposes of the record, have to continue to maintain that Formosa had become again a part of China. But he hoped that in taking this position he would not involve his Delegation in any vigorous opposition to the U.S. policy.

Mr. Allison, speaking for the Northeast Asian Affairs Division of the State Department, indicated his personal concurrence on the points of view that Mr. Dulles had expressed.

The Ambassador in India (Henderson) to the Secretary of State

TOP SECRET NIACT NEW DELHI, October 31, 1950—9 a. m.

1030. 1. I discussed with Bajpai yesterday afternoon current situation re Tibet, and Tibet, China, and India.

2. Following is summary of some of information which Bajpai gave me re Communist China.

(a) On October 26 telegram drafted by Bajpai was sent to Panikkar in which was contained note for him to deliver to Communist Chinese Government.[1] This note, which Bajpai read aloud to me, was quite strongly worded. It intimated by contrasting statements made by Chinese to Indians re Tibet with present actions of Communist Chinese that latter had acted with certain amount deceit; that Communist Chinese had ignored Indian feelings and friendly suggestions re Tibet; that decision of Communist Chinese to use force in order solve Tibetan problem at time when Tibetan mission was starting for Peiping was "deplorable" and not in interest of China or of world peace. Note further dismissed as without foundation Chinese allegations that an unliberated Tibet presented danger to Communist Chinese security in view of ambitions of great powers in that region.

(b) GOI had made no decision as yet to extent to which Communist Chinese attack upon Tibet would change basic Indian policies. Bajpai intimated that he personally had lost confidence in Communist China but that Nehru would make final decision. My impression is if Peiping should write mollifying reply to GOI note, GOI, although more cautious, would continue endeavor maintain friendly relations.

3. Following is summary of information received re India and Tibet:

(a) Indian representative in Tibet had sent telegram suggesting that his mission be withdrawn since it would appear it could no longer serve any useful purpose in Lhasa. Bajpai's reply, approved by Nehru, instructed India mission regardless of danger to stay in Lhasa. Similarly, instructions to Indian officers giving military training to Tibetan officers in Tibet near India–Tibet frontier were for them to continue their work. Bajpai's comment was "we do not intend to withdraw as though we have no further interest in Tibet".

(b) GOI had instructed its representative in Lhasa to suggest to Tibetans that if they wished to appeal for foreign aid they might care to send message to UN. Bajpai remarked that it would be preferable for a Tibetan to take this matter up direct with UN rather than through India since if India took lead Communist China and Russia would probably drag out old skeleton of Hyderabad.

(c) GOI had also suggested that Tibet order its mission not to proceed Peiping since in light new developments such mission would clearly be working under duress.

(d) India was planning continue to send to Lhasa normal supply arms but doubted that sufficient arms could be sent over road to Lhasa in time to save inner Tibet. I discussed with Bajpai again readiness of US to assist with arms provided GOI would be willing allow them pass in transit across Indian territory. I asked him whether in his opinion such shipment in transit of US arms would embarrass India or would be helpful to Tibet. He said that it was too early yet to venture opinions in this regard. It would be preferable to wait for developments. He thought it would be unwise at this moment for US arms to pass across India to Tibet. Our conversation this connection was extremely informal and should not be considered as request on my part or reply to request on his part.

[1] The text of the Indian note, dated October 26, is printed in Documents on International Affairs, 1949–1950, p. 550.

4. I asked Bajpai what in his opinion US could do at this time that would be most helpful. We wanted to do what we could; on other hand we realized tremendous responsibility which rested on India and did not wish to do anything which might render India's efforts less likely to succeed. Bajpai said that for time being he thought it would be preferable for US to take no action which might give Communist China chance to renew its charges that great powers were unduly interested in Tibet or which might make it appear to Indian leaders that US was endeavoring use Peiping offensive in Tibet in order create rift between Communist China and India. If rift should come, he pointed out, it should clearly come through force of events and not with help of outside powers.

5. I wish renew recommendations contained in paragraph 4 Embtel 1024, October 30 [2] and emphasize importance of our showing understanding and sympathy for India in its present difficulties with China rather than any degree of satisfaction. We must, in my opinion, also be careful not to give Nehru impression that we are trying to use this occasion to draw him into "alignment with western power bloc".

HENDERSON

[2] The text of that paragraph reads as follows:

"For time being we believe we should be cautious in manner in which we greet invasion of Tibet. For us to take 'we told you so' or 'now will you believe us' for 'this should bring India closer towards us' positions could do much harm. It would be better for us to indicate deep regret that Peiping has decided to resort to force in imposing its will on Tibet and that unfortunately this action tends to confirm our doubts that Peiping intends to live up to principles and purposes of charter. We might add that it gives us no satisfaction that recent events appear to give some justification to our doubts re Peiping's qualifications for UN membership. We would be much happier if Peiping by its actions would convince us that our doubts with regard to its purposes and intentions had been misplaced." (693.93B/10–3050)

Memorandum by the Deputy Director, Mutual Defense Assistance, Department of State (Ohly), to the Director of the Office of Military Assistance, Department of Defense (Lemnitzer)

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, October 31, 1950.

Subject: Military Assistance to the Chinese Nationalist Forces on Formosa

Reference is made to the memorandum from Mr. Bell to you, dated September 18, 1950, and entitled as above, in which approval was given to the initiation of a program in the amount of $9,752,000 for assistance to Formosa as submitted by you in a memorandum of September 16, 1950, similarly entitled. Reference is also made to the communication from Mr. Bell to you of September 15, 1950 with the subject, "Political and Economic Factors Indicating the Amount and Character of MDAP Aid to the Chinese Government". The latter document sets forth certain criteria which, from the standpoint of the Department of State, should be observed in the development and execution of any programs of assistance for the Chinese Nationalist forces on Formosa.

It is our understanding that the program hereinabove referred to constituted an initial program for the purpose of assisting the Chinese Nationalist forces on Formosa, and did not purport to be a final definitive program covering all items which the Department of Defense might recommend for delivery to these forces. It is also our understanding that a survey of military requirements on Formosa was made under General MacArthur's auspices and that the initial program, as well as any immediately following programs, would be based on the recommendations stemming from this survey which, I understand, is commonly referred to as the "Fox Survey". In order that the Department of State may have a better appreciation of the amount and general nature of possible subsequent programs for the Chinese Nationalist forces, I would appreciate it if you could promptly furnish us with a copy of the Fox Survey, together with an indication with respect to its present status and as to the probable cost of implementing the recommendations contained therein which are likely to be accepted by the Department of Defense. This information is necessary if we are to make an intelligent application of available funds as among the several possible claimants therefor in Southeast Asia.

We have been advised by your office that the first shipments under the initial program were loaded on October 30, and were expected to reach Formosa in the third week of November. We would appreciate immediate advice as to the consignees of this equipment, the proposed method of delivery and distribution, and the end-use controls which are contemplated, and, in general, any other information bearing on the method by which this military assistance will actually be handled upon its arrival in Formosa.

1042. 1. I discussed Deptel 632 October 27 with Bajpai at noon today and left with him contents first three paragraphs to talk over with Nehru. I asked him when talking with Nehru to make clear (a) we were not suggesting any course of action to GOI since latter bore weight of responsibility for results action or inaction, (b) we merely desired to be cooperative and helpful and (c) if Nehru would like to discuss this matter with me before our dinner on November 3 I was at his disposal. (Embtel 1031 October 31.[1])

2. Bajpai was courteous and apparently appreciative and frank. He repeated in utmost confidence that he personally had almost arrived at opinion that Peiping was mere puppet of Moscow and represented grave danger Asian peace. Reply to GOI note had just come in from Peking[2] (Embtel 1031 October 31). It was not conciliatory. Peiping pointed out that it had informed India of its desire to solve Tibetan problem by peaceful means if possible. It could not afford in context world situation to wait long for Tibetans to make up their minds. It still was prepared to negotiate in Peking for peaceful settlement. Regardless of whether negotiations would take place or other outcome Peking could not tolerate any foreign interference in solution of Tibetan problem which was entirely Chinese internal affair.

3. In reply my inquiry as to whether Tibetan mission planned proceed to Peking, Bajpai said he did not know. Members had gone to Kalimpong to pack their effects and he assumed would receive their final instructions from Lhasa. GOI had recommended that mission not be sent in view Peking's resort to arms.

4. Bajpai asked me what I thought China intended to do. I said that basing myself entirely on actions Communist-controlled states of past, Peking would continue conquest Tibet regardless of Indian sensibilities. After completion it would turn friendly disarming face on India; express its regret at being compelled take action disagreeable to India; reiterate feelings of friendship for India and desire as much closer neighbors to cooperate with India in ridding Asia of last vestiges of colonialism, etc. It would then quietly work out new adventures.

5. Bajpai said such course of action would not be entirely smooth. There would be some rough spots. Peking in order close Tibet entirely to India must order Indian mission out of Lhasa and Indian military training mission out of Gyangtse. It had been definitely decided to leave both missions in Tibet and he was drafting instruction to Panikkar asking latter to inform Peking at once of GOI decision. If Peking would object to presence these two missions in Tibet—and he was sure it would eventually—there would be breach which could not so easily be closed.

6. I said Peking may not concentrate all its efforts on Tibetan front. There was evidence that it was gradually increasing its aid to Ho Chi had personally been deeply disappointed in decision Peking, in spite of its knowledge of Indian sensibilities re Tibet, to launch invasion at time Tibet mission was preparing depart for China for conversations. He believed that friendly relations between China and India were in interests of Asian and world peace. He was concerned at attitude on part Peking which invasion reflected. This attitude, if adhered to, might result in considerable friction in future.

2. I did not think it would be wise at this juncture to say anything which he might construe as attempt to drive any deeper wedge between India and China. I therefore referred to recent statements made in Washington re Tibet [2] and said that US Government also deeply regretted Peking's action. It agreed with India that this action was not in interests of peace. We realized that in view of geographic and historic factors main burden of Tibet problem rested on India. US did not want to say or do anything which would increase this burden; on contrary we desired to do what we could to help. What suggestions, if any, did he have to offer as to what we might do or should not do at this juncture?

3. Nehru said he thought US could be most helpful by doing nothing and saying little just now. Series of announcements by US Government condemning China or supporting Tibet might lend certain amount credance to Peking's charges that great powers had been intriguing in Tibet and had been exercising influence over India's Tibet policies. He had seen reports that Chinese Nationalist Government was planning to present matter Tibet to UN. US could be of service in his opinion if it could prevail on Chinese Nationalist not to do so. Motives of Formosa in this regard would be suspect. Furthermore among charges made by Peking was that Chinese Nationalists had been active in Tibet. Presentation of matter by Formosa would give fresh ammunition to Peking.

4. I obtained impression that although Nehru was not planning to launch crusade against Communist China he had for time being at least lost much of his enthuiasm for Peking regime. Nevertheless, as will be indicated in another telegram he apparently is still convinced that Communist China should be admitted into UN.[3]

Assume it generally appreciated in State and Defense Departments that Formosa holds largest body of anti-Communist military forces in Far East which second in total effectiveness only to UN forces now in Korea. Moreover quality being constantly improved by training which General Sun Li-jen claims already has made one of his men worth two Communist soldiers. While we all hope general hostilities may be avoided it would be inexcusable if lack of inter-agency coordination in Washington resulted in Chinese armed forces not having been provided with their most urgent and comparatively modest requirements prior to possible crisis involving need for these forces on Formosa or elsewhere.

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, November 11, 1950.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The question of Formosa will shortly come before the Political Committee of the General Assembly. The Department of State considers that, if we are to have any chance to accomplish our basic purposes with respect to Formosa, we now concentrate at this stage of United Nations procedure upon (1) the military neutralization of Formosa and (2) an insistence that the question of Formosa be settled by peaceful means. The text of a draft resolution which would accomplish these purposes, to the extent that parliamentary action in the United Nations can do so, is attached for your information. Considerable advantage would be obtained by having a number of delegations, including the United States and the United Kingdom, sponsor a resolution along these lines at an early stage in General Assembly debate.

There are solid advantages in a procedure which does not require the United States or its major friends and allies to commit themselves to hard and fast positions respecting the substantive aspects of the problem at this time. At present, there is a considerable gap between our thinking and that of our major friends. It would be harmful to have these divergences given public prominence. On the other hand, it is very possible that with the passing of time as the intentions of the Chinese Communists respecting their neighbors become clearer and as certain factors in the situation such as the wishes of the Formosans are brought out and given greater prominence, these divergences may be substantially reduced or eliminated.

Under the procedure we envisage, a United Nations commission would spend the first year in studying the problem, in bringing out all relevant factors and in providing an opportunity for a full exchange of views among the governments concerned. The commission would give careful consideration to the respective Chinese claims to Formosa, to the well-being and wishes of the Formosans themselves, and to the valid interest of the international community in promoting peace and security in the western Pacific area. This interest of the world community embraces not only the need for a peaceful solution of this problem where use of force has been threatened; it necessitates taking into account such other factors as the past use of Formosa as a base for military aggression and a possible future use of it for this purpose.

During the course of discussion in the Political Committee the question of the present mission of the United States 7th Fleet will probably be raised and it will be necessary for the United States Representative to deal with this question promptly. A draft statement for the use of the United States Representative is now being prepared and will be cleared with the Department of Defense and the President before being used.

With respect to the composition of the commission, it is believed that in the commission the proportion of members recognizing Communist China should be roughly the same as obtains in the General Assembly (17 out of 60) and that the composition of the commission should take into account the interests of the Asian Governments.

Your special attention is invited to the fact that our present purpose is to insure the neutralization of Formosa pending an extended process of peaceful settlement of the Formosa question. That is based upon the long-standing view of this Government that our primary security objective is to deny Formosa to the exploitation of an enemy. The question arises as to the position if Communist China persists in its intervention in Korea and puts itself in such an aggressive position as to require military action against the mainland of China. The Department of State considers that the procedure we now have in mind would leave the way open for further United Nations action against China which would permit the use of Formosa for operations against China in the event of clear Chinese aggression. We do not believe that we could successfully inject this issue into the Formosa question at this stage but we shall handle the case in such a way as not to foreclose our freedom of action in the event we and the United Nations decide to act against China as an aggressor.

Sincerely yours, DEAN ACHESON

[Enclosure]

DRAFT RESOLUTION ON THE PROBLEM OF FORMOSA

Noting that the signatories to the Cairo Declaration declared it to be one of their purposes that certain territories formerly held by Japan, including Formosa and the Pescadores, should be restored to the Republic of China and that no formal act restoring sovereignty over these territories to China has yet occurred;

Recognizing that two parties at present claim the right to administer Formosa, that there have been threats of an armed attack on Formosa from the Chinese mainland and that Formosa has been used as a base for attacks on the Chinese mainland, that attempts to settle the dispute by force would heighten international tension and would be prejudicial to the maintenance of international peace and security in the area as well as prejudicial to the interests of the people of Formosa; and further

Recognizing that the foregoing considerations raise questions as to the obligations and responsibilities of Members under the Charter;

Decides to establish a commission composed of the representatives of the following States (five to seven) which, bearing in mind the considerations set forth in the preceding paragraphs should study the problem and submit a report to the General Assembly containing recommendations for the future of Formosa and the Pescadores. The commission should consult all governments, authorities and parties concerned;

Recommend[s] that, pending the study by the commission and adoption by the General Assembly of recommendations concerning this problem, there be no attempt to change the status of Formosa by force and that there be neither (a) armed attack on Formosa from the Chinese mainland, or (b) armed attack on the Chinese mainland from Formosa;

Requests all governments and authorities concerned to act in conformity with the recommendation in the preceding paragraph and render every possible assistance to the commission in the performance of its tasks.

Formosa (US/A/C.1/2266).[1]

Mr. Allison stated that Formosa constituted one of the most controversial problems, not only in our own country, but also among our friends in the United Nations. The easiest way to illustrate this controversy was to indicate that of the nations most concerned with the Pacific war—the thirteen states on the Far Eastern Commission—six recognized the Chinese Communists. He pointed out that it had been agreed at Cairo and at Potsdam that Formosa should be Chinese. Pursuant to these agreements, the Chinese army had taken the surrender of the Japanese on Formosa, and China had maintained administrative control over the island. It was now the headquarters of the Nationalist Government. He referred to the President's decision to use the Seventh Fleet to neutralize Formosa at the time of the Korean crisis.

As a result of this decision, Mr. Allison explained, the Department had believed it important for Formosa to remain neutralized, if at all possible. While he did not wish to go into the question of the strategic importance of the island, he observed that there was some controversy on this point from the defensive point of view but no disagreement as to the importance of keeping Formosa out of the hands of any potential enemy of the United States. In the past, Formosa had been used as a base for aggressive operations. We did not want it to be used as such again. There was also a problem of the native population of Formosa—some 7,500,000 people. Their rights had not been fully considered in the past. He noted that when it had been agreed at Cairo to return Formosa to China, it was a different China which was involved.

Mr. Allison stated that the United States had four main objectives in Formosa. First, it desired to neutralize it from a military standpoint. Second, it desired to avoid the necessity of taking publicly, at this time, a rigid position on the substance of the final and ultimate solution of the Formosan problem. The basis for this position lay in the divergencies of the views of our friends on this matter. Third, we wished to provide a mechanism for more thorough study of the Formosan problem and for exchange of views on its solution. In the fourth place, we were anxious to ensure that the ultimate solution of the problem should be peaceful. These objectives were not easy to achieve, nor would they be accomplished quickly.

Mr. Allison drew the Delegation's attention to the draft resolution contained in document US/A/C.1/2266 and explained its provisions. The preamble gave the background of the problem in terms of the Cairo declaration, the present conflict over the right to administer Formosa, the situation in the Far East, and thus outlined the problem. Thereafter, the operative section proposed the establishment of a commission to study the problem and submit a report to the General Assembly containing recommendations for the future of Formosa and the Pescadores. It further recommended that pending this study there should be no attempt to change the status of Formosa by force, and it requested all governments in authority to act in conformity with this recommendation and to render every possible assistance to the commission in the performance of its tasks. He noted that, while there had been some feeling that a date should be set for the report from the commission, in the end it had been decided to leave the timing indefinite so that the commission itself would decide when to make its report. This commission also would hear all parties to the case.

Turning to the possible membership of the proposed commission,

Mr. Allison said that the Department had suggested two factors should be taken into account: first, adequate representation of Asian states; and second, the proper proportion between countries recognizing the Communist Chinese regime and those which had not done so. It was difficult to follow both these injunctions literally. However, the working group had devised a tentative list. We had to consider, among other things, whether the United States and the United Kingdom should be included on the commission or whether it should be entirely made up of smaller states. It was the staff opinion that the United States should be on the commission because this matter was too important for us to permit it possibly to go by default. If both the United States and the United Kingdom were included, there might be a move to add the Soviets and France, although the USSR had taken the position that the Assembly should not discuss Formosa at all. Our present slate included that [the?] United Kingdom, India and Pakistan as the three recognizing states, and the United States, the Philippines, Thailand and Australia, as the non-recognizing states. The views of the Department on this slate had not been received.

Mr. Allison said that it was contemplated that all the above states would sponsor the resolution, together with at least one Latin-American state, perhaps Greece and Belgium, and one or two others if it appeared useful to broaden the sponsorship. It was felt, however, that the membership of the commission should be limited to those countries which were readily seen to have a direct interest in the Pacific area. Sponsorship, on the other hand, could include a wider group, representative of all areas in order to obtain broad support for the resolution.

Mr. Allison explained that we had been in close touch with the British on this resolution. The British had discussed and informally approved this draft, although we did not yet have general approval from the British Commonwealth, Canada being most skeptical, and Australia most enthusiastic. There were some indications that India would support a resolution along these lines. The British had assumed that the big powers would not be on the commission, but were willing to consider this possibility.

Mr. Allison asked the Delegation whether this resolution met the immediate objectives which we had in mind, taking account of the fact that we were not trying to arrive at a final solution, but merely to maintain the status quo on the Formosan situation. He also wished to have the Delegation's views regarding the composition of the commission, particularly the inclusion of the United States. Finally, he would like to receive views with respect to the sponsorship of the resolution.

Ambassador Austin asked whether part of our position would be to oppose debate at this time on the substance of the Formosan question.

Mr. Allison explained that the Department did not wish to have the substance discussed. We had talked this over privately with our friends. The British also did not want discussion since we had different positions, and had agreed upon the importance of confining the present discussion to methods for its further consideration.

Ambassador Austin inquired as to the view of the Chinese Nationalist Delegation and Ambassador Tsiang on this matter. Mr. Allison indicated that the Chinese Nationalists were much concerned about two matters. In the first place, they were concerned that this sort of action might make it easier for waverers to withdraw recognition from the Nationalists and transfer it to the Communists. Debate on the Formosan issue might cast doubt upon the status of the Nationalists. In the second place, the Nationalists did not like the fact that neutralization of Formosa meant that they would have to resign themselves to taking no steps to regain their position on the mainland. Both of these were real problems; we would not be able to satisfy the Nationalists completely on them. Yet this resolution did give the Nationalist Chinese an advantage for a temporary period. It ensured them against armed attack and gave them that much more time to strengthen their own internal position.

Mr. Dulles[2] wanted to assure the Delegation that Formosa had been discussed fully between the State Department and the Defense Department, and there was agreement as to the present adequacy of the resolution from the standpoint of our military program in the Far East. Assistant Secretary Rusk had discussed the matter in detail with Under-Secretary of Defense Lovett. He also observed that a top secret letter had been sent from the Secretary of State to the national Defense Department covering various agreements made with respect to Formosa.

Mr. Dulles went on to say that he had discussed this matter with Ambassador Tsiang. He had made clear to him that regardless of what happened, no further binding commitments could be made by any government to the Nationalist Chinese on the subject of recognition, and that, regardless of whether the United Nations treated Formosa as a subject for international concern, in the case of the United States it would not be a reason for withdrawing recognition, nor would we encourage anyone else to think it was a basis for changing his present position on Nationalist China. He had also told Tsiang, as regards the activities of the Chinese Nationalists, that the only thing which would be suspended would be open armed attack, and that neutralization would not prevent covert activity and communication with the friends of the Nationalists on the mainland. He also had noted that any other course might extend the war so that we would have to fight the Chinese Communists on a total basis. After all, our position would always have to take into account any change in circumstances, such as extension of military warfare.

Ambassador Austin asked whether the draft resolution represented the policy of the Delegation. Senator Lodge [3] asked where there was any statement in the resolution to the effect that it would be abrogated if the general situation in the Far East should change. Mr. Dulles assumed that new General Assembly action would be taken if anything of that nature happened. He would cover this point in his speech.[4] He certainly thought that before the United States used Formosa as a base, or encouraged the Nationalists, there would have to be fresh United Nations action. Any activities now of the United States in the Far East, he understood, could be based on Okinawa, Japan and the Philippines. In answer to a question from Senator Lodge as to whether this proposal had been approved by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Mr. Dulles said that he did not know, but since it had been fully cleared with the Secretary of Defense, he supposed that it also had the approval of the Joint Chiefs. Senator Lodge observed that if this resolution were approved, it would assume we were not going to have a war with China. He hoped that was right. Mr. Dulles said he would not want to introduce a resolution implying on its face that we would want war in the Far East.

Senator Lodge remarked that it was still not clear to him just exactly what we would like to have happen to Formosa. Mr. Dulles said he could provide one answer to this question, but he was not sure that his answer would have the weight of authority. He thought there was no agreed solution at the moment which could be said to be the policy of the United States. He personally had in mind several objectives for our action in Formosa. First, we should effectively neutralize the island; second, we should consider the development of some measure of local autonomy for the people of Formosa, who had always been in a constant state of unrest and oppression, no matter who rules Formosa. In the third place, there should not be any abrupt change in trade relations between Formosa and Japan, where there were two highly complementary economies. Those three things, he believed, the commission would have to take into account. The actual framework of the final solution would, of course, depend on the evolution of conditions throughout Asia. What happened in China would be important. Possibly a temporary United Nations trusteeship might be the right solution for Formosa. So far as he knew, there was no firm United States policy. He thought the United States would go into this commission with an open mind as regards the final result, but having in mind various factors which it would take into account. In addition to those he had already mentioned, the age-old association of Formosa with China had to be taken into account. He admitted, however, that it was difficult to see how all these factors could be woven together. He would be surprised if the commission could come to any decision by the time of the next General Assembly. He referred parenthetically to the fact that the Italian colonies, which were a far less complicated problem, had taken a great deal more time, considering not only the period during which their fate was under consideration in the Council of Foreign Ministers, but also the time—over two years—consumed in the United Nations.[5]

[3] Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, Jr., of Massachusetts, was a United States Representative to the Fifth Session of the U.N. General Assembly.

[4] Reference is to Mr. Dulles' forthcoming speech before the First Committee on November 15.

Senator Lodge inquired whether the United Kingdom, India and Pakistan had expressed their views on Formosa. Mr. Dulles said that India believed that Formosa should be promptly returned to the Communist regime. The United Kingdom said the same thing, but he believed it had its tongue in its cheek. The British appeared to feel that their position in Hong Kong was immune so long as they could persuade the Chinese Communists that they were trying to get Formosa back for them. That was his own interpretation of their position. He did not know Pakistan's position. Senator Lodge observed that the Indian and British views ran directly counter to those of the United States.

In response to a query, Ambassador Jessup [6] said he had nothing particular to add, noting that he had just been away on a two-week vacation. He understood our position to be what Mr. Dulles had described. He believed that it was not a proper procedure, in putting a subject into the United Nations, to say that there was only one solution which we would accept. We had to go to the United Nations with an open mind. We certainly could not start out by saying we would not agree except to a certain solution. There were several possible solutions, as he saw it. All of them might take considerable time to work out. He asked Mr. Dulles whether his speech would make clear that the proposed commission could visit Formosa. Mr. Dulles said that, before the resolution came to a vote, he expected to submit an express provision to that effect or to clarify this point in the debate.

Senator Sparkman [7] recalled that several times in the course of the discussion, reference had been made to changing conditions in the Far East. It seemed to him that once that fact was recognized, it was necessary to inquire as to the urgency of a study of the Formosan problem at this time and why it should not be postponed until conditions were more settled.

Mr. Dulles thought the reason for dealing with Formosa now was to get a certain amount of international sanction for the present United States unilateral action in assigning the Seventh Fleet to defend, or rather to preserve the neutrality of Formosa. This had been criticized in United Nations circles. Just because the situation might be prolonged for a considerable period, it seemed wise to get a United Nations decision to the effect that Formosa was a matter of international concern and that it was to be kept out of involvement in the present Far Eastern crisis by maintenance of its present status. There was a certain amount of subtlety in the resolution to make it acceptable to our Commonwealth friends, but this was the intention, and it did sanction the maintenance of the status quo. Mr. Dulles referred to the statement made by the President at his press conference to a question on the withdrawal of the Seventh Fleet to which the President had responded that it was there to protect our Korean flank.[8] If we maintained our fleet there, particularly if the Korean situation should improve, we would require some international sanction, or otherwise our policy would arouse serious suspicions in Asia. The present situation was in suspense because of weather conditions and the ensuing monsoon season. After February there was another period when an invasion might be possible. It would then become important to have Formosa's neutralization sanctioned internationally.

Senator Cooper[9] referred to the provision in the resolution regarding the interests of the Formosan people. He did not believe that the second paragraph set forth clearly enough their interests. He would have thought that this item could be better covered in a separate provision. Mr. Dulles did not think this would be possible if we submitted a resolution jointly with the British. That was the reason for the present obscure language. The British simply were not willing to accept explicit language on these points. We had in mind some reference to Chapter XI of the Charter in this regard, but the British did not want such an explicit reference on the ground that it tended to prejudge the validity of the Cairo Declaration. If we wrote our own resolution, Mr. Dulles would prefer to spell out more clearly the interests of the Formosan people, but we simply could not do this and get the British to go along. They would not cosponsor a resolution which appeared to suggest that the independence of the people of Formosa should take priority over the Cairo Declaration.

Senator Lodge observed that from the standpoint of American public opinion, the draft resolution was not a very appealing document.

Minutes of the 40th Meeting of the United States Delegation to the United Nations General Assembly

SECRET NEW YORK, November 15, 1950—9:15 a. m.

[Here follows a list of the 47 persons present.]

Formosa (US/A/C.1/2266)

Mr. Allison explained that after yesterday's Delegation meeting, the Staff and Mr. Dulles had discussed further the composition of the proposed Formosan commission. The British had indicated to us their opposition to the inclusion on the commission of either the United States or the United Kingdom on the theory that the whole purpose of this resolution was to lower the temperature in Peiping and to constitute a reassurance to the Chinese Communists. They felt that the inclusion of the big powers might have the opposite effect. We had not agreed to this viewpoint but did not press our view upon the British. We had discussed the matter with the Department, and informed them of the seriousness of the situation, since the British might not serve as co-sponsors of the resolution if the United States were included on the commission, and we had stated the staff view that this was a matter of too great importance for the United States not to be on the commission. Mr. Rusk had discussed the matter at a high level within the Department, and as a result, several definite conclusions had been reached. In the first place, it had been decided that the United States should be a member of the commission. In the second place, it had been decided that the Delegation should endeavor to persuade the British to accept membership on the commission. In the third place, it had been agreed that the inclusion of the Soviet Union on the commission, if this issue were raised, should be opposed on the grounds that it had not been an active participant in the Pacific war and therefore would not have the same interest as the other proposed members of the commission. Sir Oliver Franks, the British ambassador, was being called into the Department this morning, and these views would be communicated to him. Mr. Allison said that Mr. Dulles had also discussed this subject with Mr. Younger[1] last night.

Mr. Dulles said he could not add very much. He had gotten the same impression as that reported by Mr. Allison, namely that the British were afraid that the inclusion of the United States and the United Kingdom would, at the very least, increase the present tension with the Chinese Communists, which they wanted to minimize to the greatest extent possible. They thought that if we both went on the commission it would give credence to the view we desired to be sure of the result of the commission's work.

Ambassador Austin asked Mr. Allison whether he had talked with the member of the Japanese Parliament who had visited the Mission yesterday. The Ambassador noted that he had expressed great curiosity about Formosa. Mr. Allison replied that he had not seen the Japanese gentleman but observed that the final disposition of Formosa would be in the Japanese peace treaty or by some other international action. It had been assumed that in any peace treaty Japan would renounce all its claims to the island. Ambassador Austin wondered whether the Japanese were building up hopes for eventual return of the island to Japan. Mr. Allison did not believe this feeling was widespread in Japan. When he had been there last summer with Mr. Dulles he had seen no evidence of such sentiment, although the Japanese did entertain hopes with respect to certain other islands.

Senator Lodge asked what the situation would be if no resolution were adopted on Formosa. Mr. Allison explained that the situation would be very much the same as it was now, but the passage of a resolution would give an aura of international sanction to what had been a unilateral act on our part in stationing the Seventh Fleet so as to neutralize Formosa.

Mrs. Roosevelt [2] wished to know, as a matter of information, what the status of an agreement like the Cairo Declaration was when a government changed in the meantime, as had been the case in China. She wondered whether it rendered such an agreement null and void. Mr. Allison said this was a legal question to which he did not have the answer. However, he could say that our war-time statements were generally considered to be statements of purpose which had to be implemented after the war. In this connection he cited an article in the State Department Bulletin in which Mr. Byrnes had referred to President Roosevelt's understanding of the situation in approximately these terms. It seemed to Mrs. Roosevelt that the situation had changed entirely when the Chinese Government changed. It would be different if we still had free relations with the new Chinese Government. Until such a time she wondered whether it was appropriate to take the Cairo Declaration into account in a United Nations document.

Mr. Tate,[3] speaking of the legal question involved, said that ordinarily agreements were not abrogated by changes of government; certain agreements were even carried through after a war. If conditions changed so that agreements could not be carried out, then there was reason for trying to get a modification of the agreement. In the case of Formosa, we solemnly pledged that Formosa was to go back to China. He thought this pledge still stood.

For Ambassador Austin, the question was whether in this particular resolution we should give color and substance to the Cairo Declaration by a recital of the facts involved therein. After all, the dominating force in Formosa today was Nationalist China. He wondered whether we could not recite that fact in the preamble.

Mr. Dulles returned to the meeting and said he had just talked with Mr. Rusk again on the telephone about the Formosan question. The Department continued to feel strongly that the United States should be a member of the commission. It did not share the British concern as to its bad effect on the Chinese Communists, who would do what they had planned, regardless of events. Their activities so far reflected long-range planning.

Senator Cooper asked to what item on the agenda this resolution would be addressed. Mr. Dulles explained that the agenda item was entitled "The Question of Formosa" and had been submitted by the United States. Senator Lodge asked why the item had been placed on the Assembly's agenda in the first place. Mr. Dulles explained that it was because we wanted to make the matter of Formosa and its disposition a matter of United Nations treatment like the Italian colonies. Mr. Cohen [4] suggested that it was not only this desire, but also a recognition of the fact that there had been very considerable resentment in the countries which were our allies at not only our unilateral action but also our overall policy with respect to Formosa. He referred in this connection to a London radio report last Sunday which indicated that nearly the entire British press reaction on Formosa, whether from the Right or Left, was unfavorable to United States policy. It seemed that we would not escape the problem if nothing at all were done on Formosa.

Mrs. Roosevelt thought that the purpose of the submission of the agenda item was to make Formosa a United Nations question rather than a question where the United States was simply acting upon its own policy. We were, in fact, getting international approval of our good faith in acting unilaterally in the first instance. Mr. Dulles agreed that the main purpose was to make Formosa a matter for action by the United Nations. He went on to point out that the United States was in an extremely difficult dilemma in Asia. On the one hand, we had to assert our resources with strength in certain areas. When we did that we were accused of resuming imperialistic policies in Asia. We had to take what precautions we could to reassure the peoples of Asia that our power was not being asserted purely from the national viewpoint, but that it was in the interest of the United Nations and of international peace and security in that part of the world for the United States to pursue its present policies. On the other hand, in order to avoid suspicion in this area and to be able to accomplish what the military felt was necessary in the area with a minimum of repercussions, submission of the item to the United Nations seemed to be the best course of action. Mr. Dulles still thought it was the wise thing to do, although he admitted that this course was fraught with difficulties and uncertainties.

Ambassador Austin raised certain questions respecting the text of the resolution. He did not feel that the text set up the issue as it really existed. It did not reveal clearly the claims of the Nationalists, and in his opinion, it seemed to be slanted toward turning over Formosa to Communist China. He did not believe that was the purpose of the resolution, however. Mr. Allison commented that the purpose of the resolution was to find language which would not slant the resolution in any direction. It was intended to be objective. The purpose of the resolution was to postpone decision on the substantive aspects of the question until a report and recommendations were received from the proposed commission.

Ambassador Gross felt compelled to disagree with Ambassador Austin's comment that the resolution was slanted. He regarded the text as well balanced. He knew from what Ambassador Tsiang had told him that he felt Formosa should not be raised as an issue at all. The question how and when Formosa should be restored to China was a very difficult one. Both Chinese Governments would like to see something in any resolution referring to the Cairo Declaration and its statement as to the ultimate disposition of Formosa. These viewpoints could not be taken into account without mention of the Cairo Declaration. The second paragraph of the preamble simply showed the nature of the dispute between the parties.

Ambassador Austin asked whether there would be any objection to the insertion in the appropriate preambular paragraph of a phrase stating that the Nationalist Chinese now occupied and administered the island of Formosa. Ambassador Gross said he would not object to it. However, he thought the Nationalists might, since the phraseology would imply that they did not have sovereign rights in Formosa, and he believed that probably this phrase would create more difficulties than the present language. Mr. Allison commented that its inclusion would ensure that we would have no co-sponsors for our resolution.

Mr. Ross [5] was somewhat concerned by the first paragraph referring to the Cairo Declaration. He thought this set the problem in historical rather than legal terms. The average man in the street might well interpret this paragraph as slanting the resolution toward the restoration of Formosa to Communist China. That paragraph, in his opinion, would make it necessary to explain why we were not doing just that. It was perfectly clear that both Chinese Governments felt Formosa should be a part of China. He believed the interests of China must be conceived under present circumstances as being the long-run interests of the people of China. He was also troubled by the second paragraph which seemed rather negative. The fourth paragraph made the first reference to the future of Formosa. He questioned whether we ought not to try to turn the resolution around and state our objective first—the interests of China and the people of Formosa. Mr. Ross referred to Mr. Dulles's analogy between Formosa and the disposition of the Italian colonies. He thought there was a real difference in this case, however, since the General Assembly had a greater sense of the emergency of the situation. The Assembly might feel that the establishment of the proposed commission was not altogether satisfactory. The fifth paragraph he found rather namby pamby. It was only a recommendation that there should be no armed attack. There was no reference to any sanctions. He thought the resolution might at least authorize the commission to report to the Security Council or the General Assembly any information as to the threat of such an armed attack.

Mr. Allison said that in general he would like to agree with Mr. Ross, but he did not think, as a matter of practical politics, the changes which he suggested could be made. As regards the suggested reference to the Security Council, the Department had originally suggested a provision to this effect. That provision had been objected to by everybody outside our own Delegation. Mr. Allison emphasized that one of the chief purposes of this resolution was to meet very different points of view among various governments, to reduce the possibility of public friction between the United States and its chief allies, and to delay any final settlement for the present in the hope that as time went on, and the motives of the Chinese Communists became more clear, our friends would take on more and more our own attitude with respect to this situation. He agreed that the draft resolution was far from perfect, but we could not maintain our purposes and the support of our friends with any other draft.

Mr. Dulles pointed out that the basic reason for this text was to take the sting out of our present position in Korea so that its effect would not be so bad on the peoples of Asia. If that was not a legitimate objective, we could take Formosa today and do what we wanted with it. That was not considered to be sound tactics. He was fully in agreement with that policy. We could not have it both ways. We could not say it was bad for us to take Formosa by force and then believe that we could get the benefit of United Nations coverage without taking into account the feelings of other members of the United Nations, whose views had to be taken into account. Our desired result would flow from this resolution, he felt sure, but we had to proceed gradually. If we wrote a resolution setting forth our ticket in detail, it would prejudge the case, and we would immediately run into great difficulties. That was the reason why he did not think it wise to write these purposes into the original text. With proper handling in the commission, the United States views and intentions, which were eminently reasonable, would receive the support of other countries. We would destroy our influence and chances for support in the United Nations, however, unless we went to other countries on this problem and stated frankly that it required consideration, that we had no detailed program, but that we wanted them to consider it, along with us, with open minds. Otherwise, we would get nowhere.

[5] John C. Ross, Deputy United States Representative in the U.N. Security Council, was also an Alternate United States Representative to the Fifth Session of the U.N. General Assembly.

Ambassador Jessup thought we should take account of the fact that Formosa had been put on the agenda by the United States. It had been our experience in the Assembly that if we retained the initiative in guiding the discussion, we were more likely to direct a solution along lines appealing to us than if we left the matter to the initiative of others. If we failed to submit this resolution, he believed we risked the adoption of a much less favorable resolution—even, for example, a resolution suggesting that Formosa be turned over to the Communists. He added that in the general Far Eastern situation, time was working on our side. The British position moved constantly toward our position. The policies of the Chinese Communists were bringing this about more and more. If we got a commission established, thereby buying time, he believed we would find that, before the commission reported, very much of the present opposition to our policies would be dissipated, and we would gather strength in the commission for our point of view. He also thought we needed a text which would attract co-sponsors. This text was the result of such negotiations, he understood. Mr. Dulles noted that we had consulted only with the British.

Senator Sparkman did not find any difficulty in the major portion of the resolution, but his first reaction was that the first paragraph started us off on the wrong tack. We announced there something which people would generally construe as the belief that Formosa would have to be turned over to Communist China. He thought it would be better to re-write the preamble without any implication that Formosa was to go to the Chinese Communists. He knew this was not intended, but we were playing with a very dangerous situation as the first paragraph was now drafted. Mr. Allison thought the third paragraph threw the question wide open. The first paragraph simply noted the past statements on Formosa; the second dealt with the present situation; while the third paragraph opened up the question which the commission was to consider.

Senator Sparkman said that he received many letters saying that the Administration was simply waiting for the elections to be over to allow Communist China to come into the United Nations. According to these correspondents, a second thing we were waiting to do was to turn Formosa over to Communist China; the third was to recall General MacArthur. It seemed to him that the general public would think we were moving on the second phase right now if this resolution were submitted. Mr. Allison felt that if there were any inference at all in the first paragraph, it would be that Formosa would go back to the Republic of China, which was the Chinese Government which the United States recognized. Senator Sparkman pointed out that the other co-sponsors would take a different position. He still did not believe this language reflected accurately our position on China.

In answer to a question from Ambassador Austin, Mr. Dulles indicated that the phrase, "Republic of China," was the historical term used in the Charter to apply to the Nationalist Chinese Government. In this connection he referred to Mr. Vishinsky's proposal, in connection with the Syrian-Iraqi resolution adopted with the "Uniting for Peace" resolution, to change the phrase, "Republic of China," to "People's Republic of China."[6] He thought there was no misunderstanding as to the government to which this term applied.

Senator Lodge understood the dilemma in the Far East. On the one hand, we were trying to prevent ourselves from being overrun and, on the other, not to subject ourselves to charges of imperialism. He referred to the fact that last January he had publicly expressed his opposition to the suggestion made by Senator Taft and former President Hoover that the United States should take over Formosa for the very reasons which Mr. Dulles had mentioned. There was nothing further from his mind in the present case than that the United States should write its own ticket. However, he did not believe we should have a resolution for the sake of getting co-sponsors which at the same time would frighten away the American public, since, after all, in this government, public opinion was of primary importance. He believed the first paragraph made the resolution entirely unacceptable to the American public, and he would have to withhold his approval from the resolution for that reason.

[6] For documentation relating to the Uniting for Peace Resolution, see vol. II, pp. 303 ff.

Senator Cooper referred to his remarks at the previous meeting on the lack of emphasis in the resolution respecting the interests of the Formosan people. The text of the preamble, in his opinion, seemed to imply that when the dispute between the two contending governments was decided, Formosa would be turned over to either the Nationalists or the Communists. He wondered whether there might not be grounds for a new decision, either upon the basis of our security, or the interests of the people of Formosa which had not been considered. He referred to the President's statement at the time the Seventh Fleet had been stationed in Formosa, when our position had been tied fully to the Korean war. We were now extending that declaration of the President to provide for the complete alienation of Formosa from China. He wondered whether that might not increase the embarrassment of our position since our Allies had appreciated the original security reasons behind our position in Formosa.

Mr. Dulles referred to the various remarks expressing concern at the reference to the Cairo Declaration in the resolution. The Nationalist Chinese had made the most insistent and urgent plea that we keep as close as we could to the Cairo Declaration. Otherwise, they contended, this resolution would be fatal to the interests of the Nationalists. The Delegation certainly would wish to pay attention to the Nationalists' views since they had indicated that they could not cooperate with us unless the resolution took the Cairo Declaration as its starting point. Their position was that the Cairo Declaration stood, and that final action on the disposition of Formosa was simply being deferred. It was important to maintain good relations with the Nationalists. If the reference to the Cairo Declaration were dropped, we would immediately antagonize them. As regards the independence of the people, the present language was inserted in an effort to meet the same concern that we were not giving the whole problem a new deal and were not implying that an independent state of Formosa should be created, to be alienated permanently from China. Mr. Dulles said that if there were a choice today, he would feel an independent trusteeship for Formosa was the best solution, but at this stage we could not commit ourselves definitely to that solution. He thought that this resolution would be interpreted in some quarters as an attempt to restore Formosa to the Communist Chinese. Any resolution not susceptible of that interpretation would be a resolution bad from the standpoint of the Nationalists and the co-sponsors. The resolution, in its present form, was written just as much to meet the Nationalists' views as anything else, and in that respect, the Nationalists and the Communists alike desired reference to the Cairo Declaration. We had experienced great difficulties with the Nationalists on this point. Mr. Dulles recalled that the British resolution had started out with the statement that whereas the population of Formosa was predominantly Chinese, and whereas Formosa was traditionally Chinese territory, etc., which language would be even more difficult. We were steering an extremely difficult course in this case. If we should decide to submit our own resolution without seeking co-sponsorship, he then believed we would wish to re-phrase this resolution to some extent. However, if the Delegation agreed it was desirable to have co-sponsorship, he thought it would be difficult, if not impossible, to make any appreciable changes in the present text.

Mr. McKeever[7] wondered whether Senator Sparkman's points might not be met by reversing the order of the first two paragraphs. Mr. Tate said that he had intended to make a suggestion along the same line. The first paragraph might then contain a recognition that the two parties claimed the right to administer Formosa as a result of the Cairo Declaration. The second paragraph could refer to the threat of an armed attack; this would set the problem first in terms of the present conflict and second, the threat to the peace.

Ambassador Austin said it was apparent to him that there was strong disagreement within the Delegation, both with respect to the general policy and the text of the draft resolution. All seemed to agree that the resolution was slanted. The Ambassador reviewed the various disagreements which had arisen in the Delegation and inquired whether in this situation it was not wise for the Delegation to request reconsideration of the text of the draft resolution.

Mr. Dulles admitted that our position was very difficult. Formosa was simply one part of our whole policy on the Far East. In his opinion, it was hardly fair to ask the Assembly Delegation to deal with Formosa as a separate matter. He suggested it might be better to report back to the Department the different views expressed in the course of the meeting and let the Department decide whether to treat this subject as a matter which under the law could be one on which the Delegation would be instructed as to how to proceed. It was his guess that the Department would feel, because of the interdependence of this matter with other issues, that it was hardly fair to the Delegation to act independently on this. He personally shared many of the views and concerns expressed by other Delegates and agreed they should be taken into account if this subject were to be dealt with as a matter which was not interlocked with other matters in the Far East. He thought it was best to inform the Department of the Delegation views, to see to what extent these views could be taken into account and then to remove rsponsibility from the Delegation, if the Government itself, desired to introduce such a resolution.

Ambassador Austin said he had always found the Department very considerate of the Delegation's views. We could ask the Department for its opinion on reconsidering the text of the resolution, or at least re-writing the first paragraph, and inform it of the basis for this request. If the Department still desired to put forward a resolution, the Delegation could make clear its view that from the standpoint of public opinion, nothing should be included which would give an erroneous impression that the resolution was slanted in a certain direction.

There was no objection to the suggestion that the matter be submitted to the Department in this way, with a request for as early an answer as possible. Mr. Dulles observed that the matter might arise in the Committee this afternoon.

Delga 290. For Secretary from Dulles. Re Formosa: Formosa matters discussed yesterday and today at delegation meeting. (Re Delga 289, November 15.[1]) At conclusion Austin summed up situation by saying it was apparent to him that there was virtually unanimous opposition on the part of the delegation to the resolution as drafted and that this should be reported to the Department.

The objections raised by Mrs. Roosevelt and Senator Sparkman could probably be met by a redrafting of the resolution which would delete or subordinate the reference to the Cairo Declaration. Objections on the part of Austin, Lodge, Cooper and Ross are more fundamental since they feel that no resolution would be acceptable to the Senate or to American public opinion unless it made clear beyond doubt on its face that under it there could be no turning over of Formosa to Chinese Communists. I expressed the opinion that the differences within the delegation were such that I doubted that there could be anything like unanimity within the delegation on a form of resolution that the British would go along with or indeed that would have much chance of adoption and that if the Department wanted us to go along the lines of the present draft it would be necessary to invoke the legal authority to instruct the delegation.

My personal judgment is that it is unwise from many standpoints to present this item in the Assembly at the present juncture. From standpoint of domestic policy, there is great sensitiveness regarding

Formosa. There is popular belief of a divergence of opinion between Administration and some Republicans and undoubtedly the contemplated action would be misinterpreted as a desire to put the future disposal of Formosa out of the US Government's independent control just in time to prevent the new Congress from asserting its influence upon this most controversial item of American foreign policy. Also, from the purely military standpoint the proposal may have present disadvantages greater than advantages as it now seems that the need of the fleet to protect the Korean flank will persist for a considerable period of time, irrespective of fresh UN action whereas the UN action would have some tendency to make the Chinese Communists feel that they could concentrate their troops in North Korea without fear of possible attack from the Nationalists on Formosa. From the standpoint of relations with the UK and other friendly powers who disagree with us about Chinese Communists we doubt that any co-sponsorship would serve for long to conceal our present underlying differences and that the debate would be bound to bring these differences into sharper relief than if the matter were not publicly dealt with here. Under all the circumstances, recommend that we state at this afternoon's meeting that in view of the rapidly changing and unpredictable situation developing in China since the item was proposed and in view of the prospective discussion of Formosa in the Security Council, we ask that the item in the GA be dropped to the foot of the agenda and that the present consideration be suspended subject to the possibility of taking up the matter at a later date should developments make this seem the wise course in the interest of international peace and security. Austin concurs.[2] [Dulles.]

The Secretary of Defense (Marshall) to the Secretary of State

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, 15 November 1950.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: With reference to your letter of 11 November 1950 concerning the question of Formosa in the United Nations and enclosing a draft resolution, the Department of Defense appreciates your consideration in making available to it the draft resolution and the views of the Department of State in this matter.

In view of the military implications of this problem, and particularly the points raised in the last paragraph of your letter, the letter and the draft resolution have been referred to the Joint Chiefs of Staff for their views and recommendations, as a matter of priority. For the same reason, the Department of Defense intends to reply in substance to your letter, before, it is hoped, a United States position has been officially taken on this matter or a draft United States resolution introduced in the United Nations. Therefore, the Department of Defense requests that such action be deferred until the views of this Department are available.[1]

In this connection, the Department of Defense believes that it may be timely and appropriate for the National Security Council now to review the current position of the United States with respect to Formosa. Accordingly, the Department of Defense, for its part, is considering such action in view of the serious military implications involved in the consideration of the status of Formosa in the light of present conditions in the Far East.

Faithfully yours, G. C. MARSHALL

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. Eric Stein of the Office of United Nations Political and Security Affairs

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] November 16, 1950.

Subject: Formosa

Participants: Mr. Dulles
Mr. Hickerson
Mr. Rusk
Mr. Allison
Mr. Clubb
Mr. Henkin
Mr. Stein

Mr. Dulles stated that in the light of the attitude taken by the United States Delegation to the General Assembly in yesterday's meeting there appeared to be two possible courses of action on the agenda item, "The Question of Formosa". First, we could let this item peter out in this Assembly and not ask for any action, and second, we could abandon the subtle attitude of not stating our views as to the ultimate disposition of Formosa and state frankly several basic principles which we would consider as appropriate framework for a plan for the solution of the Formosa question.

These principles are:

1—The United States, as a principal victor of the war in the Pacific and as the sole occupying power of Japan has great responsibility in the disposition of Formosa;

2—With the exception of the relatively brief period of Japanese domination, Formosa has been part of China for centuries. The history of the island and the ethnic characteristics of the population call for ultimate restoration of sovereignty over the island to China.

3—The restoration of sovereignty can not take place as long as the possibility exists that Formosa may become a base for a new aggression in the Pacific and the object of a bloody civil struggle.

4—The people of Formosa must be given an adequate measure of autonomy and self-government under the sovereignty of China; the relations between Formosa and China must ultimately be based on the consent of the people of Formosa and China.

5—In view of the complementary nature of the Formosan and Japanese economies a long term arrangement should be made insuring a continuation of close trade relations between Formosa and Japan.

6—Formosa should be demilitarized.

The question of Formosa should be made the subject of an inquiry by the General Assembly, not as an immediate problem of maintaining international peace and security but on the same long term basis as the United Nations consideration of the disposition of former Italian colonies. We should further declare, Mr. Dulles continued, that the above principles may not be perfect but, that in our view they provide an adequate framework for a General Assembly inquiry. These principles could either be incorporated in the resolution providing for such inquiry or expressed in our statement introducing the resolution. Under the resolution the Assembly would appoint a commission which would carry out the inquiry. Half of the members of the commission would be selected from among the Japanese treaty powers and the other half from among other members of the United Nations, such as Sweden and Belgium. The commission would study how, when and under what conditions the above principles could be put into effect.

Mr. Dulles suggested that any new draft resolution should not contain a recommendation that there should be no use of force pending an inquiry by the commission; the Defense Department people believe, Mr. Dulles said, that this recommendation would work in favor of the Chinese Communists: they would assume that we shall abide by the recommendation and not permit an attack from Formosa on the mainland pending the study, which would leave them free to shift their troops from the invasion coast to Manchuria and then return them to the invasion coast if and when they decided to invade Formosa in disregard of the recommendation.

Mr. Rusk pointed out with respect to the 5th [6th?] principle mentioned by Mr. Dulles that a neutralization of the island, with some Formosan armed forces on the island for at least nuisance value against an invasion, might be better than a complete demilitarization which would invite invasion.

Mr. Hickerson thought that it is important for a commission to be appointed and that in any terms of reference for the inquiry a possibility shoud be left open for independence or United Nations trusteeship over Formosa.

Mr. Rusk stated that Mr. Dulles' views are of great interest and will be further explored.

Delga 304. Re postponement consideration of Formosan item. At Pakistan dinner last night considerable number delegates expressed interest in "real reason" behind our motion in First Committee to postpone consideration Formosan item and our views in general as to where do we go from here on complex of Chinese items in Assembly and SC. Ross responded as follows:

At beginning of Assembly it seemed probable that Korean war would be successfully liquidated in fairly short time and that UN might then reasonably turn its attention to two constructive programs: (a) unification and rehabilitation of Korea, and (b) initiation at least of consideration of problem of future status of Formosa. Korean Commission was on its way to Korea and would do what it could in light of circumstances in pushing forward towards unification and rehabilitation. On other hand, did not seem wise to us in light of changed military situation in North Korea to plunge into consideration Formosan question. On contrary, seemed wiser to us to play for time pending clarification military situation. Furthermore, pending clarification military situation Korea, it seemed essential maintain protection Formosan flank.

Chauvel, Berendsen, Entezam and Santa Cruz,[1] with whom conversations held, expressed full agreement course taken.

Gadel 117. Fol outlines in greater detail than Gadel 113 Nov. 15 [1] Depts position re El Salvador's request "invasion of Tibet by foreign forces" be added to GA agenda:

1. You should support El Salvadoran request as item of important and urgent character under Rule 15. We have always taken the position that when a complaint of aggression is made to the UN, there should be an opportunity to have the complaint heard and considered if any state so desires.

2. We do not, however, wish to take initiative on this question. We doubt UN can bring effective pressure upon Chi Commie Govt to withdraw or agree to respect Tibet's autonomy. Nevertheless, we think that GA consideration of the problem may be of some value, as propaganda in exposing Chi Commie actions.

3. If India's special interest, due to proximity Tibet and past Brit Empire relations with Tibet, induces Indians to play active role in supporting El Salvadoran request, we would wish to support them. To this end, you should consult with InDel and ascertain UKDel's reaction to Tibet complaint, explaining our position and that we wish consult with UK and India in working out joint position. USDel shld of course avoid giving Indians impression that by this action we are seeking to bring about worsening GOI-Chi Commie relations.

4. We see fol possible advantages from UN consideration:

(a) Propaganda advantage in public debate demonstrating the aggressive tendencies of the CPR Govt and falsity of the position which seeks to justify its actions in Tibet by saying that imperialist powers threaten the country. This might aid us in Korean situation and in hearings on question of Formosa and air force bombings of territory of China. It might assist in marshalling of world opinion against Chi Commie aggressive actions in Far East.

[1] The text of telegram Gadel 113 reads as follows:

"Re Tibet. Confirming instructions telephoned by Hickerson, Dept feels question is one of concern primarily to India and that any leadership given to its management in GA shld come from India. US Del wld therefore fol Indian lead in handling of item and shld consult Indian Del before initiating any action itself. This shld not be construed as suggesting any course for Indians to fol or needling them to take the lead on this item.

"Re Salvadoran proposal inclusion Tibet item GA agenda, US wld of course vote in favor its inclusion in line with our historical policy of not objecting free discussion controversial questions. Indian Del shld be so informed." (320/11–1550)

The text of the Salvadoran proposal is contained in U.N. document A/1453.

(b) FYI India, assuming it wld be a principal proponent of action, wld have a first-hand opportunity to learn what it is like to deal with USSR in matter in which USSR undoubtedly wld be in opposition. A widening breach in India–Commie China and India–USSR relations, probably resulting from active Indian opposition to Chi actions in this case, might induce India to be less neutral and more realistic about Communism in general. Hence India might be more willing to support US on Major issues against USSR and its satellites.

(c) FYI US support of Indian lead wld aid in developing better US–India relations.

The Acting Secretary of Defense (Lovett) to the Secretary of State

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, 24 November 1950.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I refer to your letter of 11 November regarding the question of Formosa, in which you enclosed a draft resolution to be introduced in the United Nations. As indicated in my letter of 15 November, I have requested the views of the Joint Chiefs of Staff on the proposed resolution. Their views, in which I concur, are as follows:

"The Joint Chiefs of Staff feel that the military implications involved in the Formosa situation and in its settlement are of the gravest importance to the United States. Passage of this resolution, as currently drafted, would neutralize Formosa strategically and thus would considerably improve the Communists' strategic position, would release some of their defense forces for build-up elsewhere, and would substantially reduce our own strategic position in the area. From the military point of view, the language in which the recommendation of the resolution is couched, if adopted, would restrict our future freedom of action.

In the event political considerations are overriding, and action must be taken in the United Nations, the Joint Chiefs of Staff perceive no objection to the 'Draft Resolution on the Problem of Formosa' if the penultimate paragraph of the resolution is deleted and if in the last paragraph the words 'act in conformity with the recommendation in the preceding paragraph and' are deleted. Without such deletion it is felt that the resolution, if adopted, would restrict freedom of action in the event the military situation requires that an armed attack against the Chinese Communists on the mainland be mounted. The Joint Chiefs of Staff consider that such limitation would place an undue and unwarranted restriction on possible future military operations and, conversely, they perceive no commensurate gains in exchange."

It is recognized that political relationships in the United Nations may be a consideration of the first importance. However, I strongly recommend that the amendments proposed by the Joint Chiefs of Staff be incorporated in any resolution which is introduced by the United States.[1]

Faithfully yours, ROBERT LOVETT

For the record of the meeting, see U.N. document A/C.1/SR.405. The Soviet Representative introduced a draft resolution (A/C.1/630) inviting a representative of the People's Republic of China to attend the sessions dealing with this item. Debate continued into the afternoon session of the First Committee on November 24; see U.N. document A/C.1/SR.406. Ultimately, after voting down a Chilean amendment (A/C.1/635 and Corr.1) which would have made clear that any invitation to a representative of the People's Republic of China in no way prejudged the general question of Chinese representation in the United Nations, the First Committee approved the Soviet resolution by a vote of 30 to 8, with 22 abstentions (including the United States).

The People's Republic of China was informed of the invitation by the United Nations Secretary-General on November 24 and responded on November 26 by appointing General Wu Hsiu-chuan as its representative in the First Committee meetings (U.N. document A/C.1/636).

On November 27, the Committee resumed debate, with the People's Republic of China delegation entering during the meeting, and heard a long statement by the Soviet Representative condemning United States policy in regard to Formosa and charging attacks by the United States against mainland China, particularly Manchuria. Mr. Dulles responded for the United States, after which the meeting rose (A/C.1/SR.407).

The Committee did not sit again until December 7, at which time it voted to suspend debate on this item in favor of discussion on the question of "Intervention of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China in Korea;" for documentation, see volume VII, pages 1237 ff. The representative of the People's Republic of China then released a statement prepared for delivery in the First Committee, the text of which is printed in U.N. document A/C.1/661. No further discussion took place during 1950 on the question of the "Complaint by the U.S.S.R. regarding aggression against China by the United States of America."

Meanwhile, the U.N. Security Council at its 525th–530th meetings, from November 27 to November 30, had taken up simultaneously the questions of "Complaint of armed invasion of Taiwan (Formosa)" and "Complaint of aggression upon the Republic of Korea;" for documentation, see volume VII, pages 1235 ff. These were the final Security Council meetings for 1950.

Memorandum by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Merchant) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] November 27, 1950.

I believe that our fundamental policy execution with respect to Communist China is confused. The reasons for this confusion are understandable and require no discussion. I feel strongly, however, that the confusion must be cleared away because many of our actions are mutually antagonistic and self-defeating in the absence of clarity in our own minds as to what we seek.

I think this is a time for over simplification of the problem.

Our objective, of course, is to destroy the basis for a durable alliance between the Soviet Union and China. Three policies or courses of basic action could logically advance us toward this objective.

First, we could make an effort to replace the present Communist regime by another Chinese government. The only possible available substitute is Chiang Kai-shek and the National Government. I do not think anyone who knows China believes that in the foreseeable future Chiang Kai-shek could return to the mainland and reinstall himself as the national government unless accompanied by American forces, including infantry, on a scale which the world situation and our military resources would make impossible. Such a judgment, of course, does not exclude the very real possibility that under certain circumstances we might encourage him and within reason support him in making such an effort.

Second, we could seek to change the character of the present Peiping government first to neutrality and then to a neutrality benevolent to us, and lastly to a firm friendship. Such a course would seek to exploit the historic conflicts of national interest between Russia and China, and it would rely on the asserted nationalistic orientation of the Chinese people. It was on this course that from the outset the British launched themselves with more precipitance than judgment. It was this course, I believe, which we visualized we would accept a year ago as a long-term pattern for action. The attitude and actions of the Chinese Communists themselves, however, by this time a year ago had made clear that this avenue was closed.

Third, we could seek to destroy China as a useful ally to Russia by concentrating our efforts on fragmentation. There are powerful traditional and current centrifugal forces at work in China.

The fact that we cannot pursue simultaneously all three of these basic courses or any two of them is self-evident. Obviously, we cannot attempt to wean Peiping from Moscow while we recognize Chiang, nor can we give political assurances to potential defectors on the mainland while we support Chiang for ultimate return to the mainland.

I believe that the third course holds by far the greatest promise of success and should be pursued without regard to the fact that its pursuit would foreclose the other two possibilities. It would not require, however, withdrawal of recognition or support from Chiang on Formosa, nor would it mean that we were abandoning any ultimate hope of a successor government in Peiping which would be anti-Russian. The difficulties are great. Not least of them is the fact that this policy would require heavy reliance on . . . measures, in the execution of which we are still inexperienced and inept. It would also require conscious restraint, e.g., we should not encourage rebellion where the odds of failure were too great.

The decision which I feel is required does not necessarily have to be published. The important thing to my mind is that a handful of men (you, Doc Matthews, Phil Jessup and the Secretary; the JCS, General Marshall and Lovett; General Smith [1] and the President) should be agreed among themselves on one of these three policies and test against it every move before important action is taken.[2]

794. UN Gen Comite voted unanimously Nov 24 to postpone consideration Tibet problem. This action based largely upon Indian Rep's assertion latest note from Peiping to his Govt indicated hope still exists for peaceful settlement.[1] Such settlement, he believed, cld best be promoted by deferring for present placing item on agenda. UK Rep gave as additional reasons postponement desirability consider further whether question Tibet was problem for SC or GA, need for obtaining further info, and obscurity of legal situation.

Fol Comite's vote, Gross said he had supported postponement because India had advised Comite there was still hope for peaceful settlement. Otherwise US, consistent with its policy in UN, wld have voted to place question on agenda.

In pre-mtg discussion Rau informed Gross he was encouraged by "second note" his Govt had recd re Tibet of more friendly character,[2] by statement of CCP Rep on arriving in US,[3] and by CCP release of US POW's in N. Rau read tel from his FonOff stating CCP now indicated willingness negotiate, that their advance has not been beyond boundaries of China and Tibet, as CCP understands them, and that this situation will most effectively be negotiated on bilateral basis outside UN.

Indian Rep's recommendation that Tibet problem be postponed apparently based upon Peiping note dated Nov 16 (urtels 1281, Nov 21 and 1316, Nov 25).[5] Presumably change in position from that

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Chinese Affairs (Clubb) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] December 1, 1950.

Subject: Handling of Formosa Question in the General Assembly

Attached hereto is UNP's telegram giving new instructions to our delegation respecting the handling of the "Question of Formosa" in the General Assembly.[1]

In substance, under the new instructions our delegation would seek to have the question of Formosa dropped from the agenda of this Assembly and to prevent consideration of the question by the United Nations for a year. This constitutes a complete reversal of our position, as outlined by the Secretary in his statement at the opening of this General Assembly and permits the direct inference that we propose to continue the course of action with respect to Formosa which we initiated in June and which has since that date caused considerable uneasiness among friendly governments. The action proposed would, in the circumstances, probably create the widespread impression that we are no longer agreeable to UN consideration of the question on its merits and that we intend come what may to follow an intimate power relationship with the Nationalists on Formosa (Ref. CA's memo of November 22, 1950, subject: Draft Progress Report on Formosa).[2] Even if we have decided upon such a course, there would seem to be strong arguments against giving public emphasis to it until those countries supporting UN action in Korea have convinced themselves that there is no possibility of a negotiated settlement there.

The attitude of the Chinese Communists as recently revealed in Korea and New York probably creates a more understanding attitude on the part of our friends and allies for such a course. However, it is by no means clear that, at the present juncture, we could count upon material, or even moral support from them. It seems likely that, if the Chinese Communists continue their present course, support for a strong U.S. position respecting Formosa may grow. If we wish to have such support we should have the requisite patience and demonstrate a willingness to make concessions to the views of our friends and allies. CA is of the opinion that before the U.S. takes the position set forth in the attached telegram, the views of our friends and allies should be sought.

We must consider the possibility that within the next months there will again be a concentration of Communist strength for an attempt to invade Formosa. If the question of Formosa's status is under study by the UN, this circumstance in itself might tend to deter Communist action; at least, it would enable us to say that in using U.S. forces to oppose the invasion we were maintaining the status quo while the UN is considering the problem. On the other hand it would seem that having ourselves in effect removed the question from consideration by the UN, we would deny ourselves even that indirect UN cover for our action. The weight of these considerations is obviously lessened by developments in Korea during the past week, but it is not yet clear that they have disappeared. Nor is it clear that study of the question of Formosa by the GA would seriously restrict our freedom of action, if hostilities with Communist China should expand.

It is to be considered, further, that the "question of Formosa" must be clarified to a degree before we can expect to achieve any progress toward the signing of a peace treaty with Japan to which either the United Kingdom or the National Government would accord.

CA remains of the view that our interests would be best served by providing for continuing and, at least, nominal study of the question of Formosa by some organ of the General Assembly, such as recommended in the draft position paper on Formosa,[3] unless it is clear that we should, for one reason or another, be unable to support such a line of action without prejudging the proposed study during preliminary debate. If, on the other hand, we should have to take an adamant stand on the substance of the question at variance to the known views of our friends and allies and thereby provide another public evidence of disagreement, we had better permit the matter to drop, providing this, in turn, is agreeable to our friends and allies.

In summary, CA believes that we must exercise the utmost care lest our unwillingness or inability to make the slightest concession to the views of our allies as regards Formosa give new aid and comfort to the USSR in its campaign to isolate the United States in the West Pacific area.

The Secretary of State to the Secretary of Defense (Marshall)

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, December 4, 1950.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Reference is made to your letter of November 15, 1950, requesting the United States to defer taking an official position or introducing a resolution respecting Formosa in the United Nations until the Joint Chiefs of Staff have had an opportunity to comment on the draft resolution enclosed with my letter of November 11 and expressing the view that it might be timely and appropriate for the National Security Council to review the current position of the United States with respect to Formosa.

Consideration of the status of Formosa in the United Nations General Assembly has been deferred through a rearrangement of the order of agenda items in the concerned committee and the views of the Joint Chiefs of Staff contained in Mr. Lovett's letter of November 24 will be given full consideration in formulating any official United States position or draft resolution respecting this question.

The Department of State concurs in the view of the Department of Defense that it would be desirable for the National Security Council to review United States policy respecting Formosa. The Senior Staff of the National Security Council has already discussed this problem briefly.

The present views of the Joint Chiefs of Staff would of course be an important factor in such a study. In this connection, it is noted that the comments of the Joint Chiefs of Staff contained in Mr. Lovett's letter of November 24, 1950 indicate that the military neutralization of Formosa would not, under present circumstances, meet United States military strategic needs. This appears to be a substantial modification of the views of the Joint Chiefs of Staff contained originally in their memorandum of November 24, 1948.[1] It is not known to what extent existing circumstances may have caused the Joint Chiefs of Staff to revise their opinion respecting the strategic importance of Formosa set forth in NSC 37/3 [2] and reaffirmed by the Joint Chiefs of Staff in their memoranda of April 2, 1949 [3] and August 17, 1949.[4]

The Department of State accordingly recommends that the Joint Chiefs of Staff be asked to review their previous estimates respecting Formosa in order that their current views may be available for the consideration of the National Security Council in its examination of the Formosa problem. The present views of the Joint Chiefs of Staff on the following questions would be particularly helpful:

(1) Would denial of Formosa as a base to the Chinese Communists meet the military strategic needs of the United States, in so far as these needs can be foreseen? If not, what are the additional United States strategic needs respecting the island?

(2) If these military needs cannot be met through diplomatic and economic measures, should the United States accept a commitment of its armed forces to insure that they are met?

It is believed that the Joint Chiefs of Staff should consider these questions both from the short-term viewpoint, taking into account special circumstances arising from hostilities in Korea, and from the long-term viewpoint.

Sincerely yours, DEAN ACHESON

Editorial Note

British Prime Minister Clement Attlee and President Truman held discussions in Washington between December 4 and 8, 1950, dealing with a wide range of topics but principally the Far East. For the most part the discussions related to Korea, but the question of China was also taken up. For documentation on the Far Eastern matters, see volume VII, pages 1237 ff.; the talks as a whole are scheduled for publication in volume III. That portion of the joint communiqué issued on December 8 by Prime Minister Attlee and President Truman dealing with Formosa reads as follows:

"On the question of Formosa, we have noted that both Chinese claimants have insisted upon the validity of the Cairo Declaration and have expressed reluctance to have the matter considered by the United Nations. We agree that the issues should be settled by peaceful means and in such a way as to safeguard the interests of the people of Formosa and the maintenance of peace and security in the Pacific, and that consideration of this question by the United Nations will contribute to these ends." Gadel 162. Subject is Question of Formosa in GA. When item comes up for consideration in First Committee USDel should suggest postponment of consideration of this item until the sixth session of the Assembly.

US Rep might refer to statement by Dulles of November 15, 1950 in First Committee [1] and point out that situation created by increased Chinese Communist intervention in Korea which was the reason for our suggestion for putting this item to a later place on the agenda has now assumed critical character. Since the Soviet veto has prevented the SC from dealing with this intervention the General Assembly will have to consider it as a matter of urgency and priority.

US Rep should reaffirm US view restated by Dulles on November 15 that international community has legitimate interest and concern in having Formosa question settled by peaceful means. He should state that, if the Assembly now decides to postpone the item until the sixth session, the Interim Committee will be able if the circumstances warrant to undertake preparatory study in anticipation of GA consideration.

Dept assumes that committee will have to make a decision on suggestion to postpone and send its report to GA for approval. The most advisable course would be, after US Rep makes his suggestion, for Chairman to state consensus of committee is to agree to postponement to sixth session and thus obviate further debate. If that is not possible USDel or other friendly del would have to submit formal proposal for postponement until sixth GA which would be voted upon in committee.[2]

[1] See footnote 2 to telegram Delga 290, November 15, from New York, p. 573.

[2] When the First Committee met on the morning of December 7, the French Representative proposed that item 76 on the General Assembly agenda, "Intervention of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China in Korea," be taken up as a matter of priority. After debate extending into the afternoon session, the First Committee adopted the French proposal by a vote of 42 to 5, with 4 abstentions. (U.N. documents A/C.1/SR.408, 409) The question of the "Complaint by the U.S.S.R. regarding aggression against China by the United States of America" was not taken up by the First Committee again until February 2, 1951 during the resumed Fifth Session of the General Assembly (U.N. document A/1773).

This arrangement satisfied the Department of State which, in telegram Gadel 187 to New York, December 16 (not printed), indicated a preference for postponement without specification of debate on aggression against China rather than a postponement until the Sixth Session of the General Assembly, since the latter course appeared too inflexible and too indicative of a desire for a long term sidetracking of thir question (320/12–1650).

Memorandum by Mr. Richard E. Johnson of the Office of Chinese Affairs to the Director of the Office of Chinese Affairs (Clubb)

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] December 8, 1950.

Subject: Fox Survey Group Report

Attached is a paper summarizing the highlights of the Fox Report,[1] section by section. This summary is believed useful in that it extracts from a mass of detail certain Survey Group conclusions which may be of interest to CA.

It is particularly interesting to note that the Group concludes (page 33) that the Chinese military establishment "although the product of expediency . . . is nonetheless also the product of and consistent with Chinese tradition and, accordingly, should be accepted as that most likely to satisfy the diverse tangible and intangible elements that comprise and motivate resistance to Communist aggression."

This statement, and the Group's failure to indicate that any changes in the Chinese command structure might be in order, are somewhat surprising in view of the generally adverse findings contained in the detailed discussion of the operating efficiency of the individual services. For example, the Survey Group failed to make the requested recommendations for additional aid to be furnished the Army and Air Force if the Seventh Fleet is removed, indicating that "limitations of personnel, training, etc." would tender it impossible for these services to absorb the additional aid which would be required. The Air Force is said to be in a "very low" state of combat readiness, unprepared (in its present state) to provide adequate air defense even in conjunction with the Seventh Fleet. This deficiency is reportedly due in part to a lack of uniform training policies and tactical doctrine. The Navy, it is noted, has no plans for coordination of command, with individual ships apparently wandering about more or less independently. Navy training methods are said to be "generally deficient." Although these deficiencies are noted, the Group's report seems to conclude that the Chinese military organization should be "accepted" . . . as is.

It appears from my fairly hasty reading that the Survey Group's report does not ignore any of the factors mentioned as relevant to military aid planning for China in our letter to Defense dated September 15:

(1) It is expressly stated in the description of the Survey Group's mission as well as in other parts of the report that aid is to be furnished for the defense of Taiwan. The Survey Group says it "studiously avoided" considering requirements for the defense of the Nationalist offshore islands, although it is pointed out that they are important as points of contact with the mainland and that the defense of Formosa is but a "means to an end"—the return to the mainland. The items listed in the "requirements" section (Appendix E) all seem (to my untutored eye) logical enough for defensive operations. The amphibious craft listed in the Chinese Navy's request to General MacArthur are not included.

(2) The report makes frequent reference to the limitations on the ability of the Chinese armed forces to "absorb" US aid, and states specifically that these limitations have been considered in drawing up the requirements of the individual services. As noted above, such limitations made it impossible for the Survey Group to recommend additional aid to be furnished if the Seventh Fleet were removed.

(3) It is stated in the requirements section of the report that needs have been adjusted to reflect assets available through stocks on hand. The Nationalists are said to have "laid bare" their military establishment, willingly opening any warehouse, arsenal, etc., without forewarning for inspection by Survey Group members. The Nationalists' production capabilities have also been taken into consideration in determining requirements (Annex G).

(4) The Survey Group's list of requirments is not limited primarily to "spare parts, ammunition, and maintenance equipment or services", as suggested in our letter of September 15. There are many items of new material and equipment, including approximately 27,000 rifles, 22,000 carbines, 8,000 trucks, 110 medium tanks, 220 fighter aircraft, and a wide variety of new radio equipment. However, under the circumstances I don't suppose the Department is in a position to attack the inclusion of these individual items—described by the Fox Group as "essential" to the defense of Taiwan (with Seventh Fleet support). And if our grant aid program is to be based on the Fox Survey Group's findings, it would be difficult for the Department to find a basis for attacking the overall figure of $158.2 million unless we have specific deletions in mind. In any event, I believe we can withhold comment until we have seen Defense's recommendations regarding grant military aid, which, I understand, will total considerably more, viz: $212 million.

Memorandum by Mr. Richard E. Johnson of the Office of Chinese Affairs

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] December 7, 1950.

HIGHLIGHTS OF REPORT OF FAR EAST COMMAND SURVEY GROUP TO FORMOSA DATED SEPTEMBER 11, 1950

I. MISSION

The Survey Group had a two-fold mission. Its instructions were to make recommendations regarding the need of military assistance to enable the Chinese Nationalist Forces to prevent the capture of Formosa by the Communists, both (1) with and (2) without the Seventh Fleet. However, the Group largely ignored the second phase of its assignment. In the case of the Chinese Army and Air Force, it is stated that the requirements developed on the assumption of Seventh Fleet assistance were "the maximum within the limitations of personnel, training, etc". In other words, the Survey Group appears to believe that the Chinese Army and Air Force are incapable of absorbing sufficient military assistance to defend the Island without the Seventh Fleet, and requirements listed for Army and Air Force are based on the single assumption of continued Seventh Fleet protection. Chinese Navy requirements are shown under both assumptions, with the recommendation that 54 escort vessels and patrol craft be furnished if the Seventh Fleet is removed. Here too, however, the Survey Group appears to have doubts regarding "ability to absorb" sufficient units to defend the Island alone.

II. SCOPE, CHARACTER AND CONDUCT OF SURVEY

Since its instructions were to survey requirements for the defense of Formosa and the Pescadores, the Survey Group "studiously avoided" any consideration of the Nationalists' off-shore islands. However, in stressing the importance of these islands as points of contact with the mainland, the report emphasized that "the Nationalists' will to fight is directly proportional to their hope of return to the Asiatic mainland," and that the defense of Formosa is merely a "means to an end".

The Survey Group reports that the Nationalists "laid bare" their military establishment, willing to open any installations and answer any questions with no forewarning. Their eagerness to cooperate is termed "astounding".

III. DISCUSSION OF FACTORS BEARING ON THE PROBLEM

Surveying enemy capabilities, the report states that it is considered doubtful that the Communists will attempt to launch an amphibious assault against Formosa and/or the Pescadores "in the near future" unless substantial Soviet air and naval forces are made available. The continued occupation of Kinmen and Little Kinmen Islands by the Nationalists hampers Communist egress for a Formosa assault and poses a threat to the mainland. Nationalist garrisons at Ma-tsu and Ta-Chen Islands are of less tactical value, but serve as outposts for contact with guerrillas and for the collection of intelligence. It is estimated that the Communists will attempt to eliminate the Nationalist outposts, especially Kinmen and Little Kinmen, before launching an amphibious assault against Formosa and/or the Pescadores. After examining various geographical factors, the Survey Group concludes that the most likely points for Communist landings on Formosa are between Hsinchu and Tansui in the north and between Tainan and Fangliao in the south. It is estimated that 19 divisions would be employed in the initial landings.

There follows a discussion of the structure of the Ministry of National Defense, the Supreme General Staff, and the four departments of the MND: (Army, Navy, Air Force, and Combined Service Forces), reaching the conclusion that the command structure of MND "appears to be sound", although it has not been battle-tested.

Army

The Chinese ground forces are characterized as an "important deterrent" to the Communist invasion of Formosa. The armored brigade is stated to be the most effective organization of the ground forces "in view of its counterattack potential". Although training is sound and morale appears to be good, infantry divisions are hampered by a lack of automatic weapons and by the wide variety of arms on hand which complicates re-supply of ammunition and spare parts. Effective anti-tank defense appears to be lacking and radio communications are generally inadequate. The Army organization that has been established "is the product of an attempt to reconcile available means with the situation posed not only by the potential enemy but by many interior political and psychological factors". The Survey Group concludes that "units as now disposed will be capable of containing and expelling Communist landings on Formosa if provided with the material aid and personnel assistance recommended elsewhere in this report" (NB: report contains no detailed listing of "personnel" assistance required). This conclusion is presumably reached on the assumption of continued Seventh Fleet protection.

Navy

The Survey Group's comments regarding the Nationalist Navy are far from complimentary. The report states that the Chinese Navy has done little toward the preparation of war or operational plans, with ships generally operating independently and with no specific plans for coordination of command. Of the 41,000 officers and enlisted men in the Chinese Navy, only 15,000 are eligible for sea service. Manpower suitable for naval training is said to be limited and training methods are generally deficient. The report estimates that the Navy would require "many times its present number of ships" to carry out its mission of destroying an enemy armada without Seventh Fleet assistance, but indicates that the Navy is unable to expand sufficiently to absorb these additional fleet units. With the Seventh Fleet present, the Chinese Navy could be used for inshore patrol, dealing with any ships which might get by US units. In this case, it is estimated that the maintenance of operability of presently available Chinese ships is the only requirement. This would involve the furnishing of ammunition, fuel, and certain critical ordnance, electronic, and diesel spare parts, but no new vessels.

Air Force

The Survey Group also describes the Chinese Air Force in unflattering terms. Although Air Force training concepts appear to be sound, the general state of combat readiness is rated "very low". This is due to (1) limited training, owing to the lack of aircraft spares and other supplies, and (2) lack of uniform directives to cover training and tactical doctrine. While morale appears to be good, virtually all pilots lack proficiency in most technical phases of flying, such as instruments, gunnery and bombing. In its present status, the Air Force is not considered to be prepared, either alone or in conjunction with the Seventh Fleet, to provide adequate air defense for Formosa and the Pescadores. However, the Air Force does have the organizational structure and the necessary personnel to absorb and utilize the additional equipment (including 220 fighter-type aircraft) necessary to make it an effective force for the defense of Formosa, "within a reasonable period of time".

Combined Service Forces

It is interesting to note that in its treatment of CSF procurement procedures, the report makes no mention whatsoever of the role of Commerce International (China).

IV. REQUIREMENTS

Requirements (listed in detail in Annex E) are said to represent "minimum essential needs, considering limitations of trained personnel for operation and maintenance, terrain, facilities, etc.," adjusted to reflect assets available through stocks on hand as well as local production. It is conceded that "in many cases" requirements recommended by the Survey Group exceed those estimated by the Chinese Government itself.

V. CONCLUSIONS

"Although the product of expediency, the current organization of the Chinese Armed Forces is nonetheless also the product of and consistent with Chinese tradition, and accordingly, should be accepted as that most likely to satisfy the diverse tangible and intangible elements that comprise and motivate resistance to Communist aggression and should be used as a basis for computing aid requirements. There exist today, within the Chinese Military Establishment, certain major shortages, primarily in automatic weapons, artillery, tanks, fighter aircraft, combatant vessels, motor transportation, signal communications and ammunition, that seriously endanger the defense of Formosa. Various stocks must be built up to an operating level if the Chinese Nationalist forces are to be expected to repel a determined invader. As equipment and matériel are provided to the Chinese, United States technical assistance will be needed. Many additional combatant ships would be required for satisfactory defense of Formosa by Chinese Nationalist forces alone. However, the Chinese Navy, through shortage of trained personnel, is severely limited in its ability to absorb additional units. Should the Chinese Communist Forces launch an all-out amphibious operation against Formosa and the Pescadores, using 19 divisions in the initial lift, the intervention of the Seventh Fleet would seriously cripple the invading fleet but it probably could not prevent a considerable number of Communist troops from getting ashore. Furthermore, the effectiveness of the Seventh Fleet in this operation would be reduced proportionately should it have other commitments at the critical period. On the other hand, the current Chinese Navy, operating alone, would be practically impotent against such an offensive. In either case, a maximum effort on the part of the Chinese Air and Ground Forces would be required to expel the invaders. There can be no significant increase or decrease envisaged in the military manpower available to the Chinese Nationalists on Formosa nor can any significant redistribution among the four services be anticipated. Given material and moral aid, the probability of a successful defense of Formosa by the Chinese Nationalists will be greatly enhanced."

VI. RECOMMENDATIONS

"It is recommended that the attached list of major items (Annex E) and all supporting accessory equipment, maintenance tools and spare parts for ninety days maintenance be furnished to the Republic of China with the least practicable delay. It is further recommended that appropriate United States technical assistance be provided as required by the Chinese Nationalists.["]

VII. ANNEXES

A, B & C:—Detailed review of organization, personnel, training, equipment, etc. of Army, Navy and Air Force.

D. G–2 Estimate of Situation:

This section includes an analysis of Communist troop deployment and capabilities (most of which has become obsolete in the three months since the report was published) and an estimate of the probable nature of a Chinese Communist operation against Formosa and/or the Pescadores (summarized under Part II above).

E. Items required by the Chinese Nationalist Forces

This annex is divided into two sections. Part I, indicates Army, Navy, and Air Force requirements for the defense of Taiwan with Seventh Fleet support, and includes a wide variety of ammunition, weapons, vehicles, tanks, aircraft, radio equipment, and quartermaster, engineer and medical supplies, as well as petroleum requirements for thirty days combat operations. Part II indicates requirements (Navy only) for the defense of Taiwan without Seventh Fleet support, including 4 destroyer escorts, 20 patrol craft, 20 small personnel landing craft and 10 26-ft. motor launches, together with necessary ammunition, weapons, parts, accessories and petroleum.

Note—The Survey Group did not price these estimated requirements, but they have since been priced in the Pentagon as follows (in millions):

Part I	Army	Navy	Air Force	Total
Maintenance and Replacement	$ 3.0	$10.0	$26.4	$39.4
New Equipment	55.0	———	41.8	96.8
Packing, Handling and Transportation	8.0	2.0	12.0	22.0
	$66.0	$12.0	$80.2	$158.2

Part II (additional ships to be furnished if Seventh Fleet is withdrawn): $100 million

F. General Plan of Combined Operations by (Chinese) Army, Navy and Air Force for the Defense of Taiwan (furnished by the Chinese MND and reproduced without change):

"Purpose—In order to annihilate the invading enemy, to hold Taiwan, and to prepare for a counter-offensive on the mainland, the air force will seek to attack the enemy air and naval forces and its ship installations; and the navy will carry out repeated attacks on the ships along the coast line of the mainland, so that the enemy's preparation for a landing operation may be destroyed. In case that the enemy commences his voyage for an invasion of Taiwan, the ground force will concentrate rapidly its superior mobile troops, supported by air and naval forces, to launch severe and determined attacks simultaneously on many fronts so as to destroy the enemy during its initial landing. After the landing enemy is destroyed, some of the points along the coast line of the mainland will be selected as limited objectives for a pursuit landing and the remnants of ships and ship installations will be wiped out so as to dismantle its ability of resuming any offensive."

Note: This statement appears to contradict unevaluated information previously received indicating that MND did not plan to defend the beaches, but would launch its counterattack well inland.

Memorandum by Mr. Robert C. Strong of the Office of Chinese Affairs to the Director of the Office of Chinese Affairs (Clubb)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] December 8, 1950.

Subject: American citizens on the China mainland

Mr. Perkins [1] asked me several days ago to dig into the question of American business men being held hostage in Shanghai and to bone up on it for a possible conference with Mr. Merchant.

Since our telegram 2961 June 19 to London [2] requesting the Embassy there to have the Foreign Office instruct its Chargé in Peking to make representations to the Communist authorities regarding these men, little has been achieved, and the problem apparently remains basically the same.

Discussions held at various times (the latest one November 1) between representatives of the interested companies in the US and of the Department included the possibility of cutting off "duress" remittance by legal action, widespread publicity, some kind of action through the United Nations, use of the Indian Ambassador in Peking to press the issue, employment of the issue as an argument against recognition of the Chinese communist regime.

The approach through the British Chargé has had no apparent result (we might ask for a follow up to his first démarche although the time does not seem propitious), the company representatives as well as the Department considered blocking of remittances a cumbersome and undesirable move, publicity which named names was deemed unwise, our UN delegation pointed out that the Charter left little margin for taking up individual cases, no use has been made of the Indian Ambassador in Peking (and probably cannot be at this time), and the question of nonrecognition now entails much larger issues than the fate of a few men.

It seems to me that we need to consider the problem from a broader view point now that we are in direct combat with the Chinese communists and the chances of extricating ourselves therefrom may be slim. Continuance of hostilities in one form or another will probably lead to consideration of strong economic sanctions and possibly implementation thereof as well as other measures which would have a direct effect on all Americans under communist control on the mainland.

I should like to raise the question, the prospects being what they are (not to mention the possibility of another world war), whether the Department should at this time urge all American educational, philanthropic and business institutions having American representation on the mainland, to order such personnel to attempt to leave for a safehaven, and to make whatever financial sacrifices are necessary to facilitate their departure. To delay, in the hope of a reasonable attitude on Korea on the part of the Chinese communists, would probably waste valuable time in an all too lengthy process. The Chinese communists are quite capable of stimulating our hopes for an extended period without any intention of fulfilling them. If such a measure in large measure fails, we might then consider use of the Indian Ambassador in Peking, provided circumstances are then at all propitious.

With regard to the businessmen specifically, it would appear that the concerned companies are going to have to pay heavily to bail ther men out. At this stage, publicity and UN measures can have little or no effect, and imposition of economic sanctions would at a future date probably preclude necessary remittances.[3]

[3] A manuscript note by Mr. Clubb on Mr. Strong's memorandum reads as follows: "Believe answer to project of general withdrawal should be negative: missionaries and businessmen have been 'warned' repeatedly, only 'hard core' remain, and they were recently presumably warned by British."

An additional note by Mr. Merchant reads: "I think we have done all we could to warn these people in the past. Further advice by us now would appear to risk arousing hopes of our being able to help them get out—and on that we are in fact helpless."

Subject: Information Regarding Guerrillas on the Mainland of China

In view of the possibility that consideration will be given to support and increasing the scope of guerrilla activities on the mainland of China, it might be advisable at an early date to inaugurate systematic efforts to gain the most accurate possible information regarding existing guerrilla (and bandit) forces, including names of leaders, strength, armament, communications, location, methods of operation, means of supply, liaison between or among groups, relations with nationalists (if any) and any other pertinent data.

The Chinese Communists have stated publicly, recently, that 200,000 bandits exist on the mainland, whereas the nationalists say 1½ to 2 million. The nationalists claim great guerrilla activity while the communists recognize the bandits as a nuisance. In each instance the truth may be somewhere in between.

The suggestion which follows would entail considerable work for various of our field offices. It would also run the risk of revealing prematurely a suspicious interest in the guerrilla movement, suspicious to the communists, to the British who would fear our use of Hongkong, and to the Nationalists around Chiang who would fear that we were trying to develop a force to supplant the KMT and siphon off aid which the KMT now receives.

The best approach to the problem appears to be through our Embassy in Taipei, Consulate General in Hongkong, Consulate in Hanoi, Legation in Saigon and Embassy in Rangoon, which would endeavor to obtain official and unofficial information on the subject, in as standard form and content as possible. The various results could then be compared in the Department or by another agency to find where reports agree and where they disagree. Naturally in Hongkong and other posts, efforts should be made to avoid Nationalist-oriented sources in order that Taipei's information would not be compared with that of other Nationalist agents.

As a corollary, Hongkong and Hanoi might prepare a list of organizations and leaders and persons claiming a direct interest in the active opposition to the communist regime, and evaluate them from the standpoint of activity, purpose, possible leadership and utility.

Admittedly the foregoing is a big task, would take some time and would require caution. On the other hand, the undertaking of positive action in this field would require the effort, and our present information is sketchy and most unreliable. We should be able to come up with rather satisfactory data at least on South-Southeast China, which is most vulnerable anyhow from several standpoints.

In such a project, armed services attachés and controlled American sources would be able to pool their efforts under direction of the Chief of Mission or Principal Officer.

circles and among public here until clearer picture available of intended course US action.

Local opinion fails see how further consideration by UNO of Formosan issues can contribute to peaceful settlement and maintenance of security in Pacific unless supplemented by effective and continuing measures to counter Communist aggression. Without such measures, in face unyielding Communist position and avowed intention take Formosa by force further UNO discussion at best would bring no substantial result and at worst produce appeasing compromise opening way for Communists to gain control of island.

There is general appreciation in Chinese Government circles of soundness US policy in continuing maximum use UNO channels, in welcoming discussion of any topic and in avoiding use of veto every possible way. However, no one expects UNO as such to produce and implement practical program of safeguarding "interests of the people of Formosa and the maintenance of peace and security in the Pacific" except as such program is put forward and supported by US. As Prime Minister Chen Cheng said to me last Sunday,[2] "very existence of free world depends upon unity of free nations, which in turn depends upon American leadership. We are all looking for that leadership and stand ready to follow it." By "all" he meant all free nations.

In actual fact US is already embarked on positive course of action re Formosa and its seems to me from this end that Truman–Attlee agreement provides basis to carry it through to logical conclusion. This could be done without fanfare and without doing violence to our UNO and other commitments. It is question of stepping up and clarifying action already underway:

1. While welcoming UNO or other international discussion of "future of Formosa" I believe we should use every appropriate occasion to reiterate and make clear our position that whatever may be said and done we shall resist [use of?] force to change island's status and that its legal position can be settled only by Japanese treaty. These two points are not new but their significance has been beclouded by mention of various less specific alternatives and qualifications involving "international action" et cetera. (Chinese Government now inquires whether US request November 15 to postpone GA discussion of Formosa indicates we will not take initiative in reviving question island's future status during current session.)

2. ECA Formosa program calling for increased aid and assignment of modest number US technical experts should be accelerated in every possible way to produce maximum results at earliest date. This is already in process and most logical and satisfactory aspect of US effort here.

3. Present Defense Attaché Staff of 50 Americans should be expanded to permit detail of qualified officers and enlisted men to various Chinese Army, Navy and Air units where they would advise on training and use of equipment besides keeping US Government informed on Chinese military effectiveness, on their equipment and other needs and on end-use of American aid. This would represent simply expansion of what already being done and need not be heralded as "despatch of US Military Mission". Personnel could be sent as available to meet specific needs signaled by senior Military Attache and would be subject his orders; they probably never would exceed 200. Such action much preferable to setting up formal "mission" with inevitable but unwanted overhead and political implications here and in US.

With foregoing political, economic and military steps we should be well on way to making Formosa capable of resisting aggression, economically self-supporting and, in event hostilities spread, a military asset. Equipping and training forces here should be for defensive purposes; this leaves plenty to be done while avoiding encouragement of independent adventures (mytel 674, November 20).[3] However, when equipped and trained for defense of this island Nationalist Forces could readily fit into possible combined offensive operations in event of general conflict. In this respect we should look ahead as far as Chinese Communists who apparently expected quick North Korean victory last summer but neverthless planned long in advance for use of their own troops if needed.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] December 18, 1950.

Subject: Department's Letter of December 4 to Defense

Mr. Young telephoned Friday and in guarded language said that there were various questions brought forward in the Secretary's letter of December 4 to Secretary Marshall which were unclear to Defense in their implications. It had been originally proposed to have a meeting at lower levels between representatives of Defense and State for clarification of some of those questions—some of which he, Mr. Young, had personally felt perhaps had better not be raised at this time. He now noted, however, that the subject had been submitted to the NSC for consideration. In those circumstances he thought that perhaps the best procedure would be for Defense to present its considerations to the NSC direct, particularly in view of the circumstances that the NSC was scheduled to consider the matter in the relatively near future. Mr. Young said that he, of course, took into consideration the circumstance that Defense would not want to be remiss in failing to reply to the Department of State's request for reconsideration, but it was felt that the problem had best be considered in its over-all aspect so that there might be over-all clarification.

Mr. Young made it clear that he was not setting forth any official position, and I said that I was, of course, not in a position myself to advise him in respect to procedure. I took the opportunity of asking him, however, whether there was general opinion in Defense that the question in point (Formosa) should not be discussed and a position established at the present time. Mr. Young reported that opinion in Defense was divided on the subject.[1]

The Secretary of State presents his compliments to His Excellency the Chinese Ambassador, and has the honor to refer to his note of October 23, 1950, requesting assistance in procuring twenty-five F–51D aircraft which it is understood are to be used by the Chinese Government.

The Secretary of State regrets to inform His Excellency that F–51D aircraft are not available for sale to the Chinese Government due to other requirements of the United States Government for all aircraft of this type.

However, it is understood that a representative of the Chinese Embassy has indicated informally to representatives of the Department of Defense that the Chinese Government is interested in procuring from 50 to 100 F–47-type aircraft, should the F–51 type aircraft not be available.

The United States Government approves the sale of fifty F–47D aircraft to the Chinese Government under the provisions of Section 408(e) of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act, as amended, subject to the conclusion of arrangements between the Chinese Government and the United States Department of the Air Force covering the details of this transaction, including rehabilitation and preparation for shipment of the aircraft.

If such arrangements are concluded, it would be appreciated if His Excellency would advise the Secretary of State to that effect in writing, enclosing a check made payable to the Treasurer of the United States to cover the total cost of the equipment to be transferred under such arrangements.

This approval will remain valid for a period of thirty days from the date of this note.

There is certainly not inconsiderable body Chinese opinion Hong Kong and elsewhere which would be dismayed and disheartened by surrender of Formosa. Regardless of direction in which predominant

[1] Not printed. This telegram summarized the discussions on the Far East during the first two Truman–Attlee meetings. For the minutes, see vol. VII, pp. 1361 and 1392. With regard to Formosa, the telegram stated in part as follows:

"Under no circumstances would we agree to turn over Formosa as condition for settlement [in Korea]. Brit said Asians now thought we were wrong about Formosa and that our proposed position would further alienate them. We replied that we did not think we should pay price for Asian opinion." (700.00(S)/12–750)

Asian [leaders?] of opinion may lean on this question we feel effect of any type of appeasement of Chinese opinion including Chinese Communists themselves should be considered of overriding importance. Support by rest of Asia of our objectives in UN is obviously desirable but it is rulers of China who today represent dynamic force in Asia and who have already demonstrated by initial defeat UN troops that they dispose of most powerful army in this part of world with possible exception USSR. To yield under pressure and appease them with Formosa or any other concession would simply further confirm Chinese Communist belief in effectiveness of their present policy, dangerously increase their contempt for our military capability in Far East and greatly strengthen and embolden elements in CCP who advocate intimate alliance with USSR.

Peiping would be encouraged to proceed immediately with further aggressive plans in Southeast Asia. Psycho advantage gained by pro-USSR group and corresponding damage to position of moderates in Peiping regime an anti-Communist China within an outside China would be incalculable particularly enormous unorganized group anti-Communist Chinese who would feel abandoned. Surrender Formosa would only further [convince?] Chinese Communists of value close cooperation USSR and far from weaning them away from Soviets as some have suggested would be more likely strengthen bond.

Asian opinion which holds that Chinese should be placated and refrain further aggressive action if appeased with Formosa and recognition is based we believe on erroneous conception of nature Chinese Communists and their degree commitment to Soviet plan world domination. Do believe so long as Communism gaining ground Asia there is no hope whatsoever that Chinese Communists will be satisfied to sit back and attend own internal problems. Their public pronouncements on coming liberation Asia and leading part to be played by CCP therein should be taken seriously as representing their future program. Not until thus far victorious advance of Communism in Asia can be checked will there be any conceivable hope of convincing Chinese Communists it is not China's advantage to hitch their wagon to Russian Star. Since Chinese Communists are playing chief role in Communist aggression in Asia today, advance Communism can hardly be checked except by exerting sufficient military, economic and political pressure against Chinese with view either to displace present leaders China or decisively demonstrate to them that fighting Russia's battles can in long run only bring disaster to CCP and China. If there ever was time when concessions could alter view of Chinese Communist leadership, that time long since past. Mao has packed bit in his teeth.

The Chargé in China (Rankin) to the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs

SECRET TAIPEI, December 20, 1950.

OFFICIAL INFORMAL

DEAR MERCHANT: The Department's telegram 466 of November 27, regarding alleged Nationalist attacks in Wenchow Bay, and our telegrams 711 of November 28 and 805 of December 15 on the same subject,[1] remind me of our exchange of letters a year ago (mine of December 9, 1949, and yours of January 20)[2] regarding resistance activities. On rereading my letter I see no reason to modify any of the statements it contains, but it would seem that the time for more aggressive—perhaps even overt—action has now arrived.

The Wenchow Bay operation of November 20 last was evidently a "guerrilla" affair. I doubt that Nationalist planes were involved and any participation by a naval vessel presumably would have been incidental or unintended. As to the planning and leadership of the operation, the Ministry of National Defense here in Taipei may or may not have been directly involved. Their official repudiation of responsibility may well be technically justified. Probably our Departments of State and Defense would deny any knowledge of or responsibility for various guerrilla activities in South China. I wouldn't know.

The fact is that here in Taipei a committee exists which is supposed to supervise, support and coordinate resistance movements on the Mainland. The Chairman is the Chief of Staff, General Chow Chih-Jou, although in view of his manifold responsibilities it seems doubtful that he could give more than cursory attention to the matter. As a rule, very little is said here about the details of guerrilla activities, and responsible Government officials have expressed to me the opinion that even less should be said. The statement attributed to Major General Lu Wei-hsiang (mytel 805) is therefore rather unusual.[3]

My impression is that the Chinese Government actually is extending a minimum of support and encouragement to resistance movements on the Mainland. The Wenchow Bay affair seems to have been typical of what little is being done. As you know, the Nationalists hold several small islands along the China Coast, of which the only important one is Chinmen, near Amoy. The others, which include Shang Ta Chen and Hsia Ta Chen, are for the most part lightly held and sparsely populated. They have long been resorts of smugglers, and the same methods are in use today. Small vessels transport arms and supplies from Formosa or the Pescadores to these islands, whence the guerrillas or their representatives transfer them elsewhere in still smaller craft. Tangible aid from Formosa at present seems to be limited almost entirely to the resistance groups having access to these islands.

[3] Telegram 805 had transmitted the text of a news story from Taipei on a statement by Major General Lu Wei-hsiang, "commander of strong guerilla unit in Eastern China" but presently in Taipei, who gave details of the Wenchow Bay raid in which more than 2,000 Communist troops were allegedly killed (793.00/12–1450).

While Senator H. Alexander Smith was in Hong Kong just over a year ago, he interviewed a number of persons in my office. Also, he and Mrs. Smith stayed at our house during part of their visit, so I saw a good deal of him. Before leaving, the Senator asked my views as to what should be done in the Far East. I protested that I had been in Hong Kong only a few weeks, but ventured to sum up the consensus of informed opinion, among those whom he had interviewed, somewhat as follows:

1. The United States should draw a line against further Communist expansion in Asia. This did not mean that we should announce and define such demarcation, with the effect of inviting the Communists to undertake aggression against states which were excluded and at the same time daring aggressors to step over the line. It did mean that we should persuade all concerned that any further aggression would be highly dangerous to the perpetrators. Meanwhile, the United States should make secret but substantial preparations to extend military assistance, including direct armed support if necessary, at such points and under such circumstances as would be most effective.

2. Our informational program in the Far East should be greatly expanded and intensified. While the Communists have conquered China largely by the psychological warfare in the fullest sense, we have as yet barely scratched the surface in this field.

3. A highly qualified group should be set up to study and report on the possibilities of supporting what remains in the way of anti-Communist forces on the China Mainland. A year ago it seemed premature to implement such support on an effective scale, if only because strong influences in the United States favored recognition of the Chinese Communist regime and presumably would have blocked any action which might have interfered with a rapprochement. But it was obvious that we ought to be ready if and when the time should come.

It seems clear to me that the time is now. Surely no responsible Americans can retain illusions about the Chinese Communists who are killing thousands of our men in a war of wanton aggression. And only a fatuous optimist can fail to appreciate the extreme gravity of the danger which confronts our country. At the time of Pearl Harbor, and subsequently during World War II, I never entertained a doubt but that we should win. This time I am only certain that we can win through if we exploit to the full every method which promises to help our cause. One of these is the effective support of resistance movements inside the Iron Curtain, and particularly in Communist China.

But we cannot expect to show significant results if we embark on a program of this kind with one or both hands tied behind us. No holds are barred in this game. We must make full use of the potential facilities in Korea, in Japan, in Formosa, in Hong Kong, in the Philippines, in Indo-China, in Thailand, in Burma. These must be coordinated, so that we can take well timed action, as needed, in Manchuria, in Kwangtung, in Yunnan. It probably will be necessary to have a coordinating authority somewhere out here in the Far East. There is the question as to what cooperation can be expected from the British and others, and particularly how the probably unequaled potentialities of Formosa can be utilized. The latter undoubtedly can be most fruitful in obtaining intelligence, in supplying operatives for the Mainland, and in flying arms, supplies, leaflets, etc., to guerrilla bases in connection with "routine reconnaissance." One of the notable weaknesses of present guerrilla operations in China is the virtual absence of supply centers, with the minor exception of the few islands already mentioned.

Finally, if we are to exploit this program fully, we must be prepared to come out in the open at least to the same extent as the Communists. Clandestine operations are all very well, but they are necessarily restricted in size and therefore in effectiveness. By all means, let us operate secretly as far as possible, but when occasion requires we must not handicap ourselves. Certainly we cannot afford to overlook the psychological effect of making known our active sympathy with anti-Communist resistance movements. This probably will require a high policy decision, and the sooner the better so that we may be prepared for any eventuality.

I understand that a good deal of preparatory work has been done during the past year along the lines mentioned above. Now is the time to go into action on an effective scale and to show results. Formosa seems to offer the most immediate opportunities, yet there are no evidences of activity here on our part other than for a certain amount of clandestine intelligence work, punctuated with the occasional swish of a cloak and gleam of a dagger. With none-too-obvious American assistance, for example, raids of varying magnitude could be mounted against the South China Coast from Formosa. Properly planned and carried out, such raids could relieve the pressure on Indo-China and perhaps even Korea. Lines of communication could be cut and valuable intelligence obtained, while opportunities would be afforded for selected officers and men from Formosa to join guerrilla groups, bringing with them money, supplies, arms and other equipment.

When Hanson Baldwin [4] was here the other day he questioned me on the prospects for supporting resistance operations on the Mainland. I replied, in effect, that it seemed to me a most promising field. However, I went on to say that such operations were so foreign to normal American ways and thinking, and our past record in such activities had produced such questionable results, that I doubted whether the United States would implement an effective campaign of this kind in China. In part, my reply was in the interest of discretion, but my doubts are real nevertheless. Unless we do it well, it would better be left undone. We must not expect to succeed unless our hearts are in it.[5]

Best wishes for the holiday season.

[5] Mr. Merchant's reply, dated January 23, 1951, expressed general agreement with the views expressed by Mr. Rankin. It read in part as follows:

"I fully agree with you that time is important, and that if efforts are to be made to embarrass the Communist regime, to divert its attention and energies from other fields, and to weaken to it with the maximum effect, early implementation of a well-considered program is required." The Secretary of State to Certain Diplomatic and Consular Offices [1]

SECRET WASHINGTON, December 27, 1950—1:05 p. m.

The Department is interested in obtaining at an early date as full and concrete information as possible concerning groups on the mainland in armed opposition to the Chinese Communist regime. Information from the field has been of a continuing nature during the past months but there has been no overall program for reporting, no uniformity has been provided for, and satisfactory evaluation has not been possible.

Effective on receipt of this instruction, it is requested that the concerned posts undertake to compile a study of guerrilla and bandit forces on the mainland of China, setting forth the following information in the order given below. Tabular form is preferred.

1. Location.
2. Title used by group, if any.
3. Name of leader.
4. Estimated strength and composition (whether former KMT soldiers, rebellious peasants, professional bandits, secret societies such as Green Gang, Red Spear).
5. Types of weapons possessed.
6. Communications equipment available.
7. Means of supply.

[1] Sent to the Embassies in Bangkok, Rangoon, and Taipei; the Legation in Saigon; the Consulate General at Hong Kong; and the Consulates at Hanoi and Chieng Mai.

8. Liaison with other groups.
9. Relations with Nationalists or other outside elements, if any.
10. Source of the information.
11. Evaluation of the information given.
12. Type and intensity of Communist efforts to suppress respective groups.

Chinese characters should be given for names of leaders and titles of groups.

Overall estimates by areas of guerrilla strength (including potential groups now "lying low") would also be of interest. The Department realizes that in many cases it will not be possible to provide the information called for under each of the foregoing headings but has listed them to indicate the type of information of value and to standardize reporting.

It is suggested that an effort be made in each case to tap official sources as well as unofficial sources provided that in the opinion of the post this can be done discretely [discreetly?] and without the exhibition of undue interest in the subject. It is desired that all efforts connected with the preparation of the study be made insofar as possible in a manner to stimulate the minimum curiosity over the interest of the Department.

Inasmuch as one of the main benefits to be derived from the various studies is an opportunity to compare reports from the various concerned posts which might overlap in their coverage it is suggested that the concerned posts, except Taipei, avoid using sources known to have official relationship with the Chinese Nationalist Government.

In addition to the foregoing study, it is desired that each post submit a list of organizations and/or persons claiming a direct connection with or interest in active opposition to the Chinese Communist regime and evaluate them from the standpoint of reliability, activity, purpose, leadership, and utility.

The Department recognizes that these projects entail considerable effort for each reporting post. It also recognizes that a period of perhaps several weeks may be required for their completion and that this instruction might appear to require the duplication of much of the work done in past months, such as that reported in Hong Kong's despatches Nos. 490 of May 22 and 237 of August 16.[2] The Department does not minimize the attention devoted to this subject previously but wishes to bring its information thoroughly up-to-date.

It is desired that information of spot reporting value uncovered during the compilation of the study be forwarded to the Department without delay. Following completion of the study, spot reporting on this subject should follow the general outline provided above.

[2] Neither printed.

To facilitate completion of both requested studies, it is considered desirable that the assistance of the Armed Services Attachés and Liaison Officers and controlled American sources be utilized under the general supervision and coordination of the Chief of Mission or Principal Officer.

1557. 1. Showed Bajpai today letter from Tibet delegation to UN and asked whether GOI had received similar communication from delegation (Embtel 1554, December 26)[1] and what current attitude GOI reference Tibetan case before UN.

2. Bajpai replied no communication similar character received by GOI from Tibet although there had been informal conversations between GOI officials Kalimpong and Tibet. GOI attitude reference Tibetan case unchanged. If GOI should press Tibetan case just now in UN Communist China would be alienated to such extent GOI would lose all ameliorating influence on Peiping re Korea and related problems. Therefore Tibetan case would remain temporarily in abeyance so far GOI concerned.

3. Bajpai stated great confidence Dalai Lama left Lhasa for India overland about nine days ago and should arrive Gyangtse in few days. GOI endeavoring enshroud departure great secrecy lest he be stopped en route by Chinese Communist scouts or sympathizers. GOI temporarily treating stories his departure as mere rumors. Approximately ten days ago 150 Chinese Communist cavalry unexpectedly appeared vicinity Lhasa. Friends Lama insisted he leave before escape route cut off. Order still prevails Lhasa in which most Tibetan officials continue remain and continue in charge government. Certain however in short time Chinese Communists will have full control over all Tibet, probably with minimum fighting.

4. Lama will probably remain India. GOI will insist, however, that he reside at spot remote from Tibet.

1582. We have been giving considerable thought this end to problem Tibetan case before UN. Thus far seemed preferable India take lead this matter UN. Representatives GOI had repeatedly assured us it intended do so. Now appears views B. N. Rau and other Indian officials who do not wish India make any move in present world context which might offend Communist China have prevailed and GOI continues postpone taking initiative re Tibet in UN. Seems likely Communist China will have taken over Lhasa and have fastened firmly its grip on Tibet before GOI prepared take lead in UN. We seem faced with choice supporting some power other than India taking initiative or of continuing postpone hearing Tibetan pleas until autonomous Tibet ceases exist. We are wondering whether this would be to credit UN. Is it logical for UN which gave Indonesia which was under Dutch sovereignty hearing to ignore Tibet? Will India, for instance, have greater respect for UN if merely out of deference to it, UN gives Tibet no opportunity present case? We do not feel qualified make any fast recommendations because we are not acquainted with all ramifications international situation this particular moment. Nevertheless, we suggest Tibetan question be reviewed before substantive reply is made to letter from Tibetan delegation (Embtels 1554, December 26, 1557 December 27). The Department of State to the British Embassy

AIDE-MÉMOIRE

The attention of the British Embassy is invited to the Department's aide-mémoire of April 29, 1943 summarizing the United States attitude toward Tibet, that is, that the United States had borne in mind the Chinese claim to suzerainty over Tibet, that this Government had never raised a question regarding that claim, and that it did not at that time desire to open a discussion of the matter.[1]

In 1943 likewise, however, the United States sent a mission to Tibet, with the invitation for the mission to visit Lhasa negotiated through the Indian Government and channeled through the British Political

[1] Presumably the date given for the aide-mémoire is incorrect. For the text of a Department aide-mémoire of May 15, 1943, setting forth the position outlined above, see Foreign Relations, 1943, China, p. 630.

Officer in Tibet. At that time no application was made to the Chinese National Government for a permit to visit Tibet.

It does not appear that the United States has ever taken an official public stand in respect to the legal position of Tibet. It is observed, however, that the Chinese claim to authority over Tibet would have been derived through succession to rights exercised previously by the Manchu Dynasty in China. Tibet itself successfully undertook in 1912, after the Chinese Revolution, the expulsion of Chinese troops by force, declared its independence in the same year, and at the Simla Conference in 1914 Tibet was a party to an agreement accepted likewise by the Chinese and British representatives, which provided for the autonomous status of Tibet. It is understood that the Chinese Government's refusal to acknowledge the signature of its representative at the Simla Conference derived from border questions, and was not due to opposition to the proposal that the Tibetans should enjoy an autonomous status. It is recognized universally that Tibet has exercised de facto autonomy from 1914 particularly, to the present date.

The United States, which was one of the early supporters of the principle of self-determination of peoples, believes that the Tibetan people has the same inherent right as any other to have the determining voice in its political destiny. It is believed further that, should developments warrant, consideration could be given to recognition of Tibet as an independent State. The Department of State would not at this time desire to formulate a definitive legal position to be taken by the United States Government relative to Tibet. It would appear adequate for present purposes to state that the United States Government recognizes the de facto autonomy that Tibet has exercised since the fall of the Manchu Dynasty, and particularly since the Simla Conference. It is believed that, should the Tibetan case be introduced into the United Nations, there would be an ample basis for international concern regarding Chinese Communist intentions toward Tibet, to justify under the United Nations Charter a hearing of Tibet's case in either the UN Security Council or the UN General Assembly.

SECRET PERSONAL NEW DELHI, December 30, 1950.

DEAR ELIOT: I wish to thank you for your thoughtfulness in sending me a copy of Mr. Mathews'[2] memorandum of December 14 to Mr.

[1] A note on the source text indicates that this letter was seen by Mr. Acheson.
[2] Elbert G. Mathews, Director of the Office of South Asian Affairs.

Rusk [3] regarding the change in the degree of frankness with which Sir Girja Bajpai discusses with us the activities of the Indian Ambassador at Peiping. I agree in general with the statements contained in the memorandum. I am convinced that Sir Girja's attitude of genuine friendliness towards the United States has not changed. He at times indulges in fits of pique from which he rapidly recovers. He has had these fits for many years, and I do not take them too seriously.

I do not believe, however, that he is giving us as frankly as he did formerly the contents of messages received from Panikkar. A number of reasons, in my opinion, are responsible for this reserve on Sir Girja's part, some of which I shall set forth below.

1. Some of the material which he gave me in confidence, and which I believe he was not authorized to give to me, has on occasions appeared in the American press, particularly Newsweek, with resultant embarrassment to himself and to the Government of India. He therefore does not trust fully the discretion of the Department of State. The person in the Department who is supplying Weintal of Newsweek with secret information from Delhi is doing us and the American Government a distinct disservice.

2. Sir Girja has made it clear to me on several occasions that if the United States Government should be aware of all of the contents of Panikkar's telegrams, United States attitude towards Communist China might stiffen. He therefore is withholding some of these contents, since the policy of the Government of India is to prevail on Communist China and the United States to come together. From various quotations from Panikkar's telegrams which Sir Girja has read to me from time to time, with the understanding that I am not to repeat them to the Department, I am inclined to believe that Panikkar is denouncing the United States in his telegrams almost as much as Communist Chinese leaders, and that Sir Girja does not like for us to know how far Panikkar is going in trying to sell to his Government the Communist Chinese point of view. I have been particularly strict in keeping my word about not repeating some of Panikkar's statements to the State Department, because if I should repeat them in confidence and they should later be published in the American press, I would have no credit left in New Delhi.

3. Another reason for Sir Girja's reserve, in my opinion, is that he believes the United States Government would not relish some of the arguments which India is using in its discussions with Communist China, and it is not easy to tell me part of these discussions without disclosing some of the features which might cause irritation of the United States.

4. It is clear that the British and the Indians are engaging in a number of maneuvers vis-à-vis Communist China with which they do not wish us to be acquainted. We might as well face the fact that the United Kingdom shares much responsibility for India's attitude towards the Far East problem during the last four months, and the

[3] Not printed.

British and Indians do not care to have us know the extent to which they have gone in order to placate the Chinese Communists.

Sir Girja, on a number of occasions, has told me in confidence that he is not at all satisfied with the policies of his Government with regard to Communist China. In fact, I am inclined to believe he is almost as much ashamed of some of the instructions which have gone to Panikkar as he is of some of Panikkar's reports.

An interesting feature of Indian-British collaboration with regard to China is that the British tell us in Washington and London that one reason for their inability to give us full support in our Korean policy is that they must take into consideration the views of their Asian allies and friends. At the same time the British have been making great effort to prevail upon their Asian friends to adopt policies with regard to the Far East opposed to ours. For instance, Sardar Patel [4] told me last spring that Nehru would not have rushed so quickly into the recognition of Communist China if he had not been convinced by the retiring British Ambassador to China, and other Britishers who came to Delhi, that China should be recognized and that the United Kingdom expected to recognize China. Nehru, therefore, according to Sardar Patel, took the position that since under British leadership the whole Western world would eventually recognize Communist China, India should move first. In fact, the British, according to Sardar Patel, told Nehru that they had informal assurances from high American officials that just as soon as a suitable set of circumstances could be brought about, the Government of the United States would recognize Communist China.

During the last month, as you are aware, Mr. Dening, British Ambassador at Large, spent some time in New Delhi. During a chat which I had with him he made no secret of the fact that in British opinion the United States had made a great error in not recognizing Communist China and favoring its admission into the United Nations. He was particularly caustic, in a friendly way, at the American attitude towards Formosa. When I intimated to him that Formosa might be to us what the Suez was to Great Britain, he said that responsible British military authorities did not believe that Formosa had any great military value and that many American military experts agreed with the British military point of view. He said that he had been assured in the United States by high American officials, when he was there some months ago, that after elections the United States would proceed to recognize Communist China and to permit it to take over Formosa. He was afraid, however, that as a result of the elections, internal political exigencies would prevent the Americans from following a sensible course. He also referred to the unfortunate hysteria in the United States and indicated the fact that emotion rather than reason seemed to be dominating the course of American foreign policies.

I have been told by American newspaper men here that in his discussions with Indian journalists Dening followed a somewhat similar line. I do not know what he said to Nehru during his various conversations with the Prime Minister, but I have little doubt that he talked to him in the same way. If he followed such a course in talking with Nehru, he undoubtedly found a sympathetic listener.

Dening was also extremely critical of General MacArthur during his conversations with me. He said that he failed to understand why General MacArthur put the South Koreans in the center of the line during the offensive, because General MacArthur had told him personally in Tokyo that the South Koreans could not be depended upon. He also was highly critical of American military intelligence, as well as the failure of General MacArthur's staff to give proper evaluation to intelligence reports received not only from American but from other sources. While Dening was here, some of the newspapers carried criticisms of General MacArthur of a character so similar to those made orally by Dening to me that it is difficult for me not to believe that he did not inspire them either directly or through conversations with Indian officials.

I am writing this to you in the utmost confidence, with the idea that various members of the Department might be interested in my remarks. I do not want these remarks, however, to be made a part of the Department's files. As you know, I am convinced that unless there can be basic cooperation between the British and ourselves, the world outlook will be extremely dark; and therefore I do not wish to be guilty of sending in material to the Department which might stir up anti-British feelings. Nevertheless, I believe that it would be helpful for members of the Department who have a broad view of the situation to realize that the British sometimes utilize the special position which we help them to hold in South Asia in criticizing our policies and belittling our efforts. I suppose it is sometimes a temptation for the British, when they do not wish to give us offense by opposing some of our policies openly and frankly, to create a screen of opposition to those policies among the members of the Commonwealth and among other countries over which they have influence, behind which they can operate with some effectiveness.

With kindest personal regards, I am

Sincerely yours, LOY

Memorandum by the Deputy Director, Mutual Defense Assistance, Department of State (Ohly), to the Director of the Office of Military Assistance, Department of Defense (Scott)

SECRET WASHINGTON, January 4, 1951.

Subject: Political Criteria Applicable to U.S. Reimbursable Aid to Chinese Nationalists Under Section 408(e) of the MDAA, as Amended.

Reference is made to your memorandum of November 16, 1950,[1] calling the attention of this office to a possible conflict between our recommendations to the Department of Defense regarding political criteria applicable to reimbursable aid to the Chinese Government and those applicable to grant aid to the same Government.

In memoranda dated November 10 and 13, 1950,[2] on the subject of Chinese requests for reimbursable aid, I indicated that certain political factors, set forth in my memorandum dated September 15, 1950, to you should be kept in mind in acting on reimbursable aid requests from the Chinese Government. Included in my September 15, 1950 memorandum was the statement that any program of grant aid should concern itself primarily with the filling of known important deficiencies in spare parts, ammunition, and maintenance equipment or services. Your memorandum of November 16, 1950, above cited, states that this reference is in apparent conflict with the recommendation contained in the letter of July 24, 1950,[3] from the Secretary of State to the Secretary of Defense that the Chinese be authorized to purchase any matériel under United States control, including tanks and jet aircraft. Your memorandum of November 16, 1950 adds that the Department of Defense is therefore assuming that the reference to my September 15 memorandum does not apply.

That part of my September 15 memorandum concerning a limitation of aid to spare parts, ammunition and maintenance spares is of course subject to modification in the light of the facts contained in the Fox Report, as indicated in my memoranda dated November 10 and November 13 above cited.

The Department of State is of the opinion that the following main points made in the September 15 memorandum also apply in general to reimbursable aid to the Chinese Government.

(1) Under existing policy directives, United States assistance should be designed to contribute to the defense of Taiwan, and,

(2) Chinese requests should be considered in light of the urgency of need and a prior judgment in each case that the Chinese military establishment has the intention and capacity to utilize effectively any equipment furnished for the defense of Taiwan.

The Department of State recognizes that each future request for military assistance by the Chinese Nationalist Government will have to be considered on its own merits and in light of the then existing factors bearing on the situation.

The Secretary of State to the Secretary of Commerce (Sawyer)

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, February 3, 1950.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The approval by the National Security Council on December 29, 1949 of NSC 48/2 (The Position of the United States with Respect to Asia), the conclusions of which were signed by the President the following day, does away with considerable uncertainty that had arisen regarding implementation of NSC 41 (United States Policy Regarding Trade with China).[1] Paragraph 48*g* (4) of NSC 48/2 has the effect of reaffirming the principles of NSC 41. The Department of Commerce is responsible for implementing the export control aspects of these two papers in so far as exports from the United States are concerned. The procedure of the National Security Council requires that the coordinating agency, in this case the Department of State, should "notify all departments and agencies of the actions for which each is responsible in implementation of the paper, and ensure that such actions are taken in a coordinated manner." In accordance with this procedure, the following observations may be helpful.

It is my understanding that your Department, by its action of November 4, 1949 and subsequent actions to expand the "positive list" of exports controlled to all countries except Canada, has made substantial progress toward establishment of the export control machinery required. The policy recently reaffirmed calls for further action to bring under control the export from the United States to China and adjacent areas of all 1B list items which the United States Government denies or restricts to the USSR and its eastern European satellites. The question of whether such additional controls are created on a universal basis or made applicable only to China and adjacent areas is immaterial from the point of view of the policy set forth in NSC 48/2.

Paragraph 48*g* (4) of NSC 48/2 sets forth the principles that should govern the application of the controls referred to above and clearly provides the policy basis for unilateral denial by the United States Government of such export applications as are not allowed by its terms.

Your Department has been informed of steps which have been and are being taken to secure the cooperation of Belgium and of the United Kingdom, the Netherlands, and France, with respect to both their metropolitan and Far Eastern territories, in the application of controls over an agreed list of strategic exports to China and adjacent areas. This Department also intends to seek the cooperation of the Philippine Government, although it appears that action by the Philippine Legislature may be necessary before parallel action can be obtained. The Department of Commerce will be notified of the outcome of these efforts.

There is enclosed for your information a copy of a message, drafted jointly by the Departments of the Army and State, that was sent to SCAP on January 13, 1950 [2] advising him of the policy decision referred to above and of the criteria regarding the conduct of Japanese trade with the USSR, its satellites and adjacent areas which are consonant with this and other United States policies.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. Stephen C. Brown of the Office of Chinese Affairs

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] March 9, 1950.

Participants: Standard-Vacuum Oil Company—H. F. Seitz
Caltex Co—Mr. Keany
CA—Mr. Sprouse [1]
CA—Mr. Barnett [2]
CA—Mr. S. C. Brown

Messrs. Seitz and Keany came in at the Department's request to discuss the proposed joint three-company shipments of petroleum products to Communist China. Mr. Seitz had telephoned the day before to request an answer.

After some desultory conversation which took place while awaiting Mr. Sprouse's arrival, Mr. Barnett explained to them that our decision had been made in the light of an estimate of 3.5 million barrels of motor gasoline, kerosene, diesel fuel and lubricating oils required for civilian use in Communist China in 1950. This estimate had been made on the basis of information received from the companies.

Further, our decision had been made in the light of our knowledge and understanding of the difficulties under which they were operating in China. We did not wish to embarrass them in their efforts to protect company properties, continue operations on a minimum basis, and secure exit permits for key personnel.

With these considerations in mind we had decided that we would raise no objection to the three companies jointly shipping to Communist China the minimum quantities of products specified in the proposal; that is, 15,000 tons of motor gasoline, 5,000 tons of diesel and 800 tons of lubricating oils. This was on the understanding (1) that no further shipments by the companies are presently planned, (2) that the Department will be consulted by them prior to planning any additional shipments, and (3) that these shipments will be included in any program of permissible shipments to China for 1950 that may be agreed on with other Governments.

Mr. Keany of Caltex inquired whether these conditions meant that his company's proposed shipment of 35,000 barrels of diesel was "out". Mr. Barnett said that the Department did not intend to reverse its position on that shipment, and since we had raised no objection to it, it would stand so far as we were concerned but amounts under that shipment would be taken in account as representing a part of Caltex's share in future quarterly allowable imports. The conditions did mean, however, that the other two shipments mentioned by Mr. Keany on the same occasion were, as such, "out". Mr. Keany volunteered the information that Caltex did not yet possess a copy of the crude oil contract and that it appeared that operation of the contract might remain in indefinite suspense.

Mr. Barnett explained that we expected very shortly to reach understandings with the British on the question of petroleum supplies to China,[3] and that the Department's decision on the immediate proposal had been made with that in mind. We felt the quantities approved were well within our estimates of permissible quarterly shipments. He asked Mr. Brown to explain what our estimates were and how they were arrived at.

Mr. Brown indicated that on the basis of the minimum estimates of civilian requirements in 1950 received from the companies, we had arrived at the following suggested quarterly quota of permissible shipments for the named products:

Motor gasoline	(42 gallon barrels)	125,000
Kerosene	(42 gallon barrels)	250,000
Diesel	(42 gallon barrels)	300,000
Lubricating oils	(50 gallon drums)	4,200
Lubricating greases		nil

With reference to the figure for lubricating oils, he explained that it was low because we had taken into account company stocks in China, which according to our information were substantial, and in Hong Kong as well. In terms of 42 gallon barrels the figure would be 5,000 barrels, which gave an equivalent of 4,200 50 gallon drums. With reference to greases, our information was that the companies hold 17 months stocks in China, and the zero quota was obvious.

[3] For previous documentation on this subject, see Foreign Relations, 1949, vol. IX, pp. 1002 ff.

In comparing the proposed transaction with these suggested quarterly quotas it had appeared to us that generally it was well within the suggested limits. We objected, however, to the higher figure on motor gasoline because it appeared to represent 6 months' supply at estimated rates of consumption, and preferred to approve only the minimum quantities in the proposal.

Mr. Seitz said that the companies did not propose to ship all at once, and that deliveries would be strung over a period of time. Mr. Brown replied that we were aware of this and had taken it into consideration, and that we had also taken into consideration the fact that two months of the first quarter were now past.

With reference to the question of our estimates generally, Mr. Brown said that we were well aware that Chinese requirements of petroleum products for civilian purposes might change substantially even over a period of one year, and that we realized that they might have to be revised. We would of course appreciate any information the companies might have indicating a need for revision.

Mr. Sprouse agreed that Mr. Barnett and Mr. Brown should prepare an informal memorandum for Messrs. Seitz and Keany summarizing our information regarding stocks in China, our estimates of civilian requirements for 1950, and all other pertinent information. We might at some future date want to discuss it with them. Mr. Seitz said that they would be glad to discuss the subject together with us, but that they could not very well discuss it privately together because of certain possible legal embarrassment it might cause their companies.

Several questions were raised aside from the main topic. Messrs Barnett and Brown inquired whether the Communists had indicated any desire to take over company stocks of aviation gasoline, by purhase or otherwise, to which the reply was that they had not, and had shown no interest whatever in the subject. Mr. Barnett said we would like to know if any approach were made to the companies regarding aviation gas in the future. Mr. Brown inquired whether it would be correct to assume that stocks in China in other than company hands are very small, to which Mr. Seitz replied that he thought this was correct; he did not feel stocks in Commie hands could amount to as much as one month's supply, on the average. He felt the Commie willingness to allow foreign exchange on a cif basis in this transaction, plus an allowance for local currency margin, was an indication that they were feeling the pinch.

Mr. Barnett asked whether Hong Kong was normally a transshipment point for petroleum serving any areas other than China. The answer was that it was not normally used for serving other areas. Mr. Barnett then asked whether the companies could give any estimate of Hong Kong's own petroleum requirements, and whether they had any information concerning the source of Hong Kong Government and British military Hong Kong requirements. Neither Seitz nor Keany could provide information regarding Hong King requirements, but said they thought in practice most of British Government requirements for Hong Kong were supplied by Shell, although the American firms were permitted to bid. In reply to a question, both agreed that from their point of view it was preferable, if possible, to have a single quota set up for administrative handling of shipments to China and Hong Kong (exclusive of British Government requirements). Seitz pointed out it was almost impossible to control transshipments from Hong Kong to China otherwise.

The Secretary of Defense (Johnson) to the Secretary of State

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I am informed that the HICOG has been authorized to license up to 15,000 tons of steel rails for export to Communist China during the balance of the calendar year, and that SCAP was informed of this action. It is understood that this action was taken because the UK had indicated its intention to accept a Chinese bid for the supply of 87,000 tons, in spite of representations made by the U.S. Embassy at London requesting British denial of the transaction.

This lack of accord among friendly countries in the export of highly strategic commodities to Communist areas is unfortunate. The British are well aware of the vital strategic importance of the lines of communications within the Communist areas. It is quite evident that the absence of adequate British export controls is the factor responsible for increasing the security hazard to both our countries.

As you may recall, in his letter of 7 February 1950 [1] to the Secretary of Commerce, the Acting Secretary of Defense noted that "the strategic implications of . . . transportation systems of the communist area are such that from the short-time viewpoint the lines of communication in China, including Manchuria, are a most important means for the consolidation of recent gains and for expansionist activities, particularly in South and Southeast Asia." Recent intelligence reports now indicate that such expansionist activities may be developing. I have noted the concern expressed by the Department of State in its report to the National Security Council (NSC 64) which points out that "the presence of Chinese Communist troops along the border of Indochina makes it possible for arms, matériel and troops to move freely from Communist China" and concludes that Indochina is under immediate threat.[2] Under such circumstances, the Chinese Communists would clearly require adequate transportation to bring troops and supplies to their southern borders.

The Department of Defense is now giving priority consideration from the military viewpoint to the whole problem of the Communist threat to Southeast Asia, with a view to acting upon your suggestion in NSC 64 that "Departments of State and Defense should prepare as a matter of priority a program of all practicable measures designed to protect U.S. security interests in Indochina." In view of the rapid development of the situation in Southeast Asia, it now appears that a shipment of steel rails or any transportation equipment to Communist China might eventually frustrate whatever measures may be decided upon by our respective departments as necessary to prevent further communist encroachment in this area. I therefore recommend for your consideration the following steps:

a. The strongest possible further representations be made to the British to deny the Chinese bid for 87,000 tons of steel rails and that the authorization for export of 15,000 tons given to HICOG be rescinded. SCAP will be advised of the action taken and of the U.S. position in the matter.

b. The Department of State join with the Department of Defense in urging the immediate reclassification of railway transportation equipment to 1A in order to prevent such occurrences in the future.

c. Efforts to obtain parallel action by the British and other participants in the ERP program on controls of exports of all strategic commodities to Communist areas of the Far East be accelerated.

d. As a matter of urgency, the Departments of State and Defense, and other interested government agencies, consult and reach a final and workable understanding of the practical implementation of export policy to China under NSC 48/2 in the light of the situation now confronting the United States in Asia and the U.S. national interest.

Sincerely yours, LOUIS JOHNSON

The Secretary of State to the Embassy in Belgium

SECRET WASHINGTON, March 29, 1950—6 p. m.

422. Re London Embtel 1641, Mar 27, to Dept, repeated Brussels 73.[1] Text Dept memo to be presented Mar 30 by Emb Brussels shld read as follows:

[1] Not printed.

"The US Govt and the Brit Govt, in the course of recent discussions, agreed on the desirability of taking steps to insure that western trade with China and North Korea shld not result in any increase in the mil strength of the Chi Commie regime, and that certain Eastern European countries shld not be enabled to obtain, by transshipment via China and North Korea, supplies of goods now denied them by the Western Govts in direct channels of trade; and it was considered that one essential measure wld be the imposition of controls over the export or re-export to China and North Korea of goods of the highest security significance.

The US already controls the export of such goods from the US to all destinations, except Canada. The Belgian Govt will recall that mtgs were convened in Paris by the Fr Govt most recently in Jan to consider with certain other govts the adoption of a common policy for the denial to certain Eastern European countries of goods to be included in an agreed list. In view of the possibility that such denial might be ineffective if agents of those countries were permitted to obtain such goods freely through China and North Korea, and in view of the dangers to western interests in Asia and the Pacific in permitting the Chi Commies unrestricted access to materials that will directly increase their mil strength, the US Govt suggests the extension of the common policy of control to cover the whole of China, including Manchuria and Taiwan, and North Korea.

The U.S. Govt accordingly hopes that the Belg Govt will be prepared to impose controls over the export or re-export to China and North Korea of goods in the agreed list referred to in the second para above, as it may be subsequently amended by agreement. It is believed that such control shld be for presumptive denial to the Chi Commies and North Koreans of all exports on the agreed list, with the possibility of exceptions on a case by case basis after consultation among the cooperating govts. On the other hand, exports to areas controlled by the Chi Natl Govt, although subj to control and scrutiny, wld be licensed where it served the interests of one or more of the cooperating govts to do so. The US is prepared to arrange that the Belg Govt receive reports on such exports actually licensed by the US Govt.

The US Govt and the Brit Govt have also agreed on the desirability of watching closely, and of exchanging info on, the export to China and North Korea of a selected list of items considered to be of especial importance to the Chi economy. A suggested list is under consideration and it is proposed that its exact composition shld be the subj of later consultation and agreement.

The US Govt is prepared to seek the cooperation of the Govt of the Republic of the Philippines, and it is understood that strategic exports to China and North Korea from Japan are being controlled. It is also understood that the Brit Govt is approaching certain members of the Brit Commonwealth of Nations on the same subject.

A similar communication is being addressed to the Fr and to the Neth Govts which are being invited to cooperate and to secure the coop of the Vietnam, Laos, Cambodian, and Rusi Govts."

493.419/3–2450

Memorandum by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Merchant) to the Secretary of State

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] April 20, 1950.

Subject: Policy Regarding Trade with Communist China

Problem

To determine the treatment to be accorded 1–B exports, particularly steel rails and other transportation equipment, to Communist China under the terms of existing NSC policy papers.

Background

1. Attached for your signature is a draft letter (Tab A) to Secretary Johnson [1] responsive to his letter to you of March 24, 1950 (Tab B).[2] Also attached for your signature is a letter to Secretary Sawyer (Tab C)[3] which would transmit for his information your letter to Secretary Johnson.

2. The letter from Secretary Johnson recommends, in effect, that a previous authorization for export of 15,000 tons of steel rails from western Germany to Communist China be rescinded, that the export from the United States to Communist China of all railway transportation equipment be embargoed, that SCAP be informed of the United States position in this regard and that strong pressure be brought to bear on western European governments for parallel action in controlling exports of all strategic commodities to Communist areas of the Far East. These recommendations reflect Defense views regarding policy towards China which conflict, basically, with those of the Department and represent a challenge to the principles contained in NSC 48/2 ("The Position of the United States with Respect to Asia").

3. NSC 48/2 provides that "the United States should permit exports to China of 1–B items within quantitative limits of normal civilian use and under controls which can be applied restrictively if it becomes necessary to do so in the national interest . . ." (Tab D).[4] Despite the President's recent approval of this policy, the interpretation of this sentence has become an important issue between State and Defense. Defense has recently submitted to the NSC Staff a revision of NSC 41 ("United States Policy regarding Trade with China"), on which the China trade aspects of NSC 48/2 were based, designed to place an embargo on the export to China of a considerable number of 1–B goods, and to increase and subject to very tight restrictions those exports to China for which licenses are required. These Defense proposals would in effect prevent the export to China of a large number of goods that historically have moved in the China trade, and they would appear to represent a policy towards China even more severe than is now pursued towards the Soviet Union and its eastern European satellites. Defense representatives maintain that their proposals are consistent with the intent of NSC 48/2 by reference to the "national interest" clause cited above.

4. The position taken by Defense representatives in the Interdepartmental Advisory Committee structure responsible for actual export licensing decisions has tended to subvert the intent of NSC 48/2. With a view to obtaining a flat embargo on the export of steel rails and other transportation equipment to China, Acting Secretary Early addressed a letter dated February 7, 1950 to Secretary Sawyer recommending strongly that such goods be upgraded from the 1–B to the 1–A list (Tab E).[5] Secretary Sawyer replied on February 17 to this letter, indicating his willingness to have the Advisory Committee structure review the strategic rating of transportation items under control, but suggesting that the importance of multilateral action to effective restriction probably would limit the extent to which U.S. embargoes could be justified (Tab F).[5] Secretary Sawyer's response, while entirely correct, does not dispose of the difficulties created by the basic difference of view between State and Defense with respect to the China problem.

The general issue is most immediately related to the question of steel rail exports from western Germany to China, our treatment of which thus far has produced serious political repercussions in Germany. It is believed that a clear decision on the question of steel rails, the principle of which would apply to the treatment of transportation equipment generally as well as other 1–B exports to China, would go far to correct misapprehensions regarding the implementation of NSC China policy papers. The following analysis is therefore directed primarily to an examination of the steel rail problem.

5. The export of steel rails as a 1–B list item is governed by the provision of NSC 48/2 which calls for licensing of such exports to China in accordance with the normal civilian requirements of that country. The Chinese economy has for decades made use of a few major trunk railway lines for passenger and freight transportation. Inadequacy of rail transport has been a major cause of China's recurring famines. Military campaigns in China, particularly those of the Chinese Communists, have not been dependent primarily on rail transportation. It is unlikely, therefore, that China's imports of railway equipment to meet normal civilian requirements would contribute appreciably to the Chinese Communist military potential. China's imports of steel rails in the mid-thirties averaged approximately 80,000 tons, a quantity sufficient to lay approximately 590 miles of track. In view of the vast destruction of railways in China, annual exports to China of this magnitude would not appear excessive.

[5] Not printed.

6. No effective multilateral agreement has as yet been obtained for quantitative restrictions over exports of 1–B list items either to eastern Europe or to China. Information is exchanged, however, with the U.K. and certain other western European governments on 1–B exports to eastern Europe and such an exchange is in prospect for 1–B exports to China. We intend in the near future to renew our efforts for multilateral adoption of limitative controls over 1–B exports (including steel rails) to eastern Europe and would urge that such progress as is attained by these efforts be extended to trade with China.

7. SCAP has been advised by Defense and State jointly of the principles deriving from NSC 48/2 that should govern Japanese exports to Communist China and was authorized to exercise his discretion in controlling 1–B list exports in accordance with these principles. SCAP was informed that he would be expected to apply as a minimum such export restrictions as were or might be adopted multilaterally. It was believed, however, that SCAP should not be expected to place Japan at a competitive disadvantage by imposing restrictions on exports for normal civilian use within Communist China more severe than are applied by the U.K. and major western European governments.

8. The Chinese Communists have for several months been exploring in a number of countries the possibility of placing an order for about 87,000 tons of steel rails. We prevented Japan and Germany from accepting any such order until NSC 48/2 was approved by the President on December 30, 1949. The general policy guidance referred to above (para 7) was then sent to SCAP. With respect to western Germany, we authorized acceptance of Chinese Communist orders for steel rails but suggested that the quantity be limited to 15,000 tons for the time being. Defense concurred in this action. However, the previous denial and the current limitation of German steel rail exports, in the absence of any parallel action by Germany's competitors, has aroused considerable resentment in Germany. High Commissioner McCloy has urged strongly either that multilateral agreement on steel rail quotas for China be obtained promptly or that western Germany be permitted to accept the entire order if it can be placed there.

9. We believe that an attempt to obtain multilateral restrictions on any 1–B exports to China in advance of western European agreement to 1–A controls for China would seriously prejudice the joint approach we are now making with the British to this end. Moreover, it would clearly be unrealistic to expect that European governments would control 1–B exports to China prior to their institution of 1–B controls to eastern Europe. In the absence of multilateral quantitative limitations on exports of steel rails to China, the continued imposition of quotas on such exports from western Germany to China would not constitute an effective restriction since the orders would undoubtedly be placed elsewhere. The net effect of such action would be to add unnecessarily to the cost of U.S. financial assistance to western Germany and to create increasingly adverse political repercussions among the Germans. Unilaterally imposed quota restrictions on German exports to China might lead to imposition of similar restrictions on Japan for which the above observations would apply with equal validity but with greater significance in view of the very great importance to Japan of trade with China.

10. It is believed that the Chinese Communists' present extreme shortage of foreign exchange constitutes an effective limitation on their import of high cost capital goods. It is estimated, for example, that payment for the rail order in question would require use of 10 to 15% of the present foreign exchange resources of the Chinese Communists. Exchange of information by the principal western suppliers on actual exports of steel rails and other 1–B goods would reveal any movement of excessive quantities should it develop and thus provide a clearer basis for vigorous efforts to obtain multilateral restrictive action.

Conclusions

1. The export to China of all 1–B list goods, including steel rails and other transportation equipment, should, in accordance with NSC 48/2 and NSC 41, be permitted from the U.S., Japan and western Germany for normal civilian use within China unless they are upgraded by the U.S. Government to the 1–A list.

2. Continuing efforts should be made to obtain effective multilateral agreement for limitative controls over the export of 1–B goods (including steel rails) to eastern Europe, with the understanding that we would urge that such agreement, if achieved, be extended to cover such 1–B exports to China within the terms of NSC China policy.

3. U.S. authorities in western Germany should be subject to the same policy and procedural guidance regarding exports to China as is applied to SCAP for Japan. Thus, pending multilateral agreement on 1–B controls for China, the U.S. High Commissioner for western Germany should be permitted discretion in determining permissible exports of steel rails and other 1–B goods for normal civilian use within China, subject to such decisions by the U.S. Government as may be indicated in the light of information exchanged among major western suppliers on actual exports. The Department would, of course, provide such advice and information as may be helpful to the High Commissioner, particularly in determining China's normal civilian requirements.

Recommendation

It is recommended that, in accordance with your responsibility for coordination of NSC 48/2 and NSC 41, you sign the attached letter to Secretary Johnson, which interprets these policies in the sense of the Conclusions above, and the accompanying letter of transmittal to Secretary Sawyer.

If the Department of Defense does not accept this interpretation, it would be necessary, in accordance with NSC procedure, for the issues to be considered by the Council and, if they cannot be resolved there, for the matter to be submitted to the President for his decision.

Concurrences

EE, RA, GEA, E, ER, G (Mr. Rusk), and U (Mr. Webb) concur in this memorandum and the draft letter to Secretary Johnson.

The Secretary of State to the Secretary of Defense (Johnson)

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, April 28, 1950.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I have examined carefully the suggestions which you have made in your letter of March 24, 1950, with respect to licensing action on steel rails, the strategic classification of railway transportation equipment, the negotiation of parallel action, and our export control policy toward China. I have considered your suggestions in the light of the recent developments in the Far East to which you have referred, the world-wide responsibilities we bear and objectives we must seek because of the fact of the cold war, and the opportunity I will have of discussing with the Foreign Ministers of our major western European allies some of the underlying problems which give rise to your suggestions on China trade policy.[1]

If I may deal with the last of your suggestions first, I should like to say that I am in full agreement with you that in the light of the effect upon United States national interest of the situation in Asia, some clarification should be achieved amongst the interested government agencies regarding the practical implementation of export policy to China as it is now embodied in NSC 48/2. It is my view that Communist China should be treated as a satellite of the USSR and controls over exports to that area should be identical in scope and governed by the security principles now applied to the USSR and its eastern European satellites. However, the accomplishment of this objective clearly must, as a practical matter, be modified in those cases where the unilateral denial by the United States would merely surrender the Chinese market to the British or other suppliers.

[1] Documentation of the Foreign Ministers meetings is scheduled for publication in volume III.

I am also in full agreement with you that this Government should make every reasonable effort to obtain the concurrence of the United Kingdom and other of our western European allies in export controls paralleling our own, applicable uniformly to the USSR, eastern Europe, and, now, Communist areas in the Far East.

As you are well aware, we have for some time been negotiating with Canada and the western European countries to obtain their agreement to prohibit exports to the Soviet Union and Soviet eastern European satellites of items the denial of which would affect key sectors of the Soviet war potential economy. These negotiations have resulted in the acceptance by eight countries of substantially all of our 1A items, as well as items defined as arms, for embargo treatment. We have good reason to believe that similar treatment is extended to arms, and to a number of other items, by Sweden and Switzerland as well.

Our negotiating efforts, in which representatives of the Department of Defense have participated, have led to the formation of the so-called "Paris Consultative Group." The agenda of the current and forthcoming meetings of this Group includes such matters as proposed additions to the embargo list (i.e., all items the United States desires to classify 1A), and suggestions made for limitative controls to parallel those now in effect for 1B shipments from the United States. The intergovernmental group is proceeding to consider our proposals as expeditiously as could be expected. I am sure you are familiar with our instructions to our people in Paris, on the 1B control problem; they are contained in telegram No. 1365 of March 29, 1950, to Paris, a copy of which is enclosed (Tab A).[2]

It is my view that these negotiations should go forward as planned. The problem of Communist China should not, at this stage, be introduced into these proceedings. We have, as you know, been discussing bilaterally with the British for some time the question of an embargo on 1A goods for Communist China and we have their agreement to such an embargo, on condition that France, Belgium, and the Netherlands establish similar controls. These three governments have now been approached and there is every prospect of success in this venture. Once this initial agreement is achieved we are confident that this government, in concert with these four western European countries with important trading interests in the Far East, can put China trade controls on the multilateral basis which will have been decided upon for trade with eastern Europe. We will then have a common western security control policy applicable to all countries of the Soviet orbit. While I do not consider it appropriate that the Foreign Ministers, who will be meeting in early May, should concern themselves at this time with the negotiating details, I do intend to find an occasion to place before them some of the considerations which lead us to attach very great importance to the successful outcome of the negotiations now proceeding.

This leads me to the question of controls established by Germany and Japan over exports to countries in the Soviet orbit. As you know, we have tended to hold German controls at a level which is more restrictive, in the 1B category, than that maintained by countries which are Germany's principal competitors, because our objective is to bring the controls of other European countries up to the level now maintained by Germany. In War #98471 of January 13, 1950, we informed SCAP that his controls on 1B should be at least as restrictive as "may hereafter be imposed by the United Kingdom or Western Europe." In practice SCAP's 1B controls have paralleled our own and have been substantially more restrictive than those of the United Kingdom.

I feel certain that you will agree with me that it would be politically and economically unwise, from the standpoint of long-term United States interests, to require Germany and Japan to pursue a course of commercial self-denial which their principal competitors are unwilling to accept as being in their individual and collective interests. Pending the outcome of the negotiations described above, Japan and Germany should, of course, continue to be governed by the guidance contained in War 98471 of January 13, 1950, to SCAP and in the comparable directive from the High Commission to the German Government. It is my opinion, however, that when these negotiations are concluded, the control of exports from Germany and Japan should be conformed to the terms of such agreement as has been reached multilaterally.

When we can see and judge the results of the discussions of the Paris Consultative Group it may be that the importance of common security control policies with our Western Allies will lead us to the conclusion that some modifications should be made in our own security controls. This, however, is not a question which need be prejudged at this juncture. Meanwhile, our negotiators will press firmly towards the successful development of multilateral limitative controls over items for which, in the United States view they are appropriate.

The particular problem of railway transportation equipment for Communist China should, it seems to me, be considered in the context of the foregoing factors in our trade control problem as a whole. The question of the strategic rating which this Government should assign to any commodity must be considered in the light of its possible importance for the Soviet Union, the eastern European Soviet satellites, and the Communist-controlled areas of the Far East, taken together. On this basis we have examined the proposal to reclassify railway equipment to 1A, and have concluded that it does not meet the agreed criteria for this classification, but does warrant the 1B rating now assigned to it, because large shipments to the Soviet bloc might represent a security threat. I am attaching herewith as Tab B [3] a statement prepared by the Department of State and the Economic Cooperation Administration, for circulation in the interdepartmental committees now considering the rating problem, in which our reasons for favoring a 1B rating are set forth.

We have examined carefully your suggestion for rescinding the authorization for export of 15,000 tons of steel rails from western Germany to China as recently approved by the State and Defense Departments and the Economic Cooperation Administration. In view of the fact that steel rails are classified 1B, and in view of the status of our multilateral negotiations on 1B items, it is our judgment that the best security interests of the United States would not be served by requiring the High Commissioner for Germany to reverse his position on this matter. The repercussions which such a reversal would produce in Germany might exacerbate the difficulty of enforcing other and more important aspects of our security program over the longer period ahead.

There is a question of immediate and possibly of critical importance which is posed by the general line of the argument which I have developed. That is the question of the attitude of the United States Government towards shipments of petroleum to Communist China. We have obtained agreement, in principle, from the British with respect to Shell, the principal competitor of the American companies in China, to impose an embargo on shipments to Communist areas in the Far East of aviation gasoline and certain high grade lubricants. Most other petroleum products are rated 1B. Within the framework of our NSC 48/2 policy, we have for some time had an understanding with the major American oil companies, and are now in the process of arranging with the British, for limitation by the companies of all 1B petroleum shipments from off-shore sources to China to amounts consistent with current levels of civilian economic activity in China.[4] It is, I believe, a matter of fact that petroleum products are rarely if ever licensed for shipment from the United States to the USSR and its eastern European satellites. Notwithstanding that fact, I believe that we should continue our efforts to secure cooperation of American and British firms within the framework we have established. As you know, American oil companies have a considerable investment in China and have personnel who, under present circumstances, are at the mercy of the Chinese Communist authorities. Unilateral United States self-denial would turn the market over to the British and expose American personnel and properties to extreme jeopardy. When either of these same considerations exists with reference to other 1B commodities hitherto involved in the China trade, our 1B controls should be applied in accord with the principles now embodied in NSC 48/2 pending the outcome of the negotiations indicated above.

[4] On May 10, 1950, the Department of State sent to the British Embassy a memorandum outlining its position on the subject of an informal system of control for petroleum supplies to China, in connection with proposed exchanges of views between the United States and the United Kingdom on appropriate measures for effecting such a system of controls (493.569/5–1050). The United States memorandum replied to a British memorandum of December 19, 1949. For the text, see Foreign Relations, 1949, vol. IX, p. 1035. No real progress was made on further discussions prior to the outbreak of hostilities in Korea on June 25, 1950.

I am sending a copy of this letter to Secretary Sawyer for his information.[5]

Sincerely yours, DEAN ACHESON

493.119/6–650

Memorandum by Mr. Max W. Bishop of the Office of the Deputy Under Secretary of State (Matthews) to the Ambassador at Large (Jessup)[1]

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] June 6, 1950.

Subject: U.S. Policy Regarding Trade with China

The history of the NSC review of the above subject is briefly:

The President last fall spoke to Secretary Acheson regarding NSC 41 and said that he felt that the policy of NSC 41 was out of date and should be revised. On November 4, 1949, the Secretary requested Mr. Souers (NSC 41/1, November 7, 1949, file attached)[2] to "arrange for appropriate NSC Staff studies of the attached report, as a matter of urgent priority, with a view to ironing out any difference of view that may appear". In the Department's report, it was concluded that because "NSC 41 provides a sufficiently broad scope for a flexible policy, it not be revised at this time". The NSC Staff immediately took up this project and has had considerable number of meetings all without making any substantial progress. In spite of our Secretary's request last November that this be treated as a matter of "urgent priority", I am afraid we have ourselves been somewhat derelict in pushing for the completion of a paper or the submission of differences to the highest level. The differences which are primary among State, Defense, and Commerce, are, I believe, differences of implementation and of interpretation rather than differences of our policies or objectives. In February of this year, I prepared the following brief summary of the State and Defense positions for Mr. Rusk:

"As I see it, Defense position is essentially that the security position of the United States in Asia in particular and in the world in general requires that every effort be made to deny to Communist-China any economic assistance from "non-Soviet sources", that accordingly all trade between the United States and Communist-China in strategic items (new 1A and 1B lists to be prepared specifically for China) should be presumptively denied and should be allowed only in those instances where it can be shown on a case-by-case basis that no benefit would accrue to Communist-China. On the other hand, the Department of State position would seem to be to allow trade covering "normal civilian requirements" in non-strategic items (as presently defined under the 1A and 1B lists drawn up for "East-West trade") and to allow certain other trade, on a case-by-case basis where it would be in our interest to do so or where the trade would not contribute to the military strength of the communist bloc."

As you are undoubtedly aware, this problem is inextricably bound up with the broader problems of United States export controls policies and "East-West trade" policies. I have never been able to understand why FE felt so strongly that we should refuse to revise NSC 41, particularly when the points at issue were those of implementation and interpretation of policy rather than of the policy itself. I would recommend that when this item comes up for discussion at the Consultants' Meeting, you point out that this particular paper has had a long and difficult history, that it is obviously related to other similar but broader problems, that we are making good headway with our efforts to obtain a greater measure of cooperation from our allies in the application of export controls and that we hope for similar success in obtaining more cooperation in controlling exports to China and that in the light of these developments you are considering recommending to your Department that NSC 41/1 be withdrawn and the project dropped for the time being. This, of course, would put us in a rather embarrassing light so far as the formal record goes because of the President's request last fall. You might point out to the Consultants that while the NSC Staff has been unable to make progress on revising the policy, its failure to do so may to a considerable degree stem from the fact that questions of policy are not at issue but merely questions of implementation and interpretation of agreed policies and objectives. While the Staff has been considering this problem, there has been, of course, a continuous exchange of information, views, and suggestions among the Departments of State, Defense, and Commerce, and others interested in the export control program. It has been the hope of some of the officers in the Department of State that the exchange of correspondence between the Secretaries of State and Defense regarding this question would be helpful in clarifying some of the issues. Notice to the NSC that NSC 41/1 was no longer considered by this Department as a proposed paper would remove the requirement that it be treated as a matter of "urgent priority" and would give us a chance to start with a clean slate, either to prepare a new policy paper on trade with Communist-China or to recommend that NSC 41 be considered as out of date and no longer applicable and that economic policy should be governed by the appropriate programs of NSC 48/2—the overall policy paper on Asia.

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, June 8, 1950.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I refer to my letter of February 3, 1950 to you concerning the policy of the United States Government with respect to exports of strategic goods to China and other areas of the Far East, as outlined by the National Security Council paper Number 48/2 dated December 29, 1949. Reference is also made to the Department's letter of April 28, 1950 to Secretary Johnson with respect to the strategic rating of steel rails, a copy of which was sent to you.

As coordinator of policy under NSC 48/2, the Department of State has recently reviewed the situation in China and has reached the conclusion that our previous interpretation of the export control policies toward Communist China outlined in Paragraph 48*g*(4) of that paper should be modified along the following lines.

The Department of State now believes it necessary to apply export licensing controls over strategic materials for shipment to Communist China on a more restrictive basis than hitherto, and in general believes that where application of such criteria can be made effective the export of both 1–A and 1–B materials to Communist China should be governed by the same principles that now govern the export of such materials to the USSR and its eastern European satellites. The following paragraphs outline the general criteria which the Department of State believes should apply, and outline the limits of the above-mentioned qualification with respect to the effectiveness of the resulting controls.

With respect to the export of 1–A materials, the Department of State now believes all applications for shipments of such materials to Communist China should be uniformly denied, as in the case of applications for shipment to the USSR. Formerly the view of the Department was that exceptions might be made on grounds of the national interest.

With respect to the export of 1–B materials, the Department of State now believes that, with two exceptions, the licensing of applications covering shipments to Communist China should be governed by the same principles and criteria that now govern the export of such commodities to the USSR and its eastern European satellites.

The first of these exceptions relates to the question of the effectiveness of unilateral United States restrictions on exports of 1–B materials to Communist China. Where the denial of licenses to American exporters for export of 1–B materials to Communist China would merely divert the trade to alternative suppliers in the United Kingdom or western Europe, and where those alternative suppliers are known to be supplying substantial quantities of the particular items to Communist China, the United States should continue to license exports of such commodities within the limits of current normal civilian requirements in China, subject to the other licensing criteria laid down in NSC 48/2. When there is no clear evidence that such diversion of trade will take place, either because alternative suppliers are known not to be supplying substantial quantities, or because the United States is the sole or almost the sole source of supply of a 1–B item, the licensing standards governing applications for export to the USSR and its eastern European satellites should apply.

The second of these exceptions is the following. When denial of export licenses for shipment of 1–B materials to Communist China would place American nationals or property in China in serious jeopardy, such licenses should be approved within the quantitative limits of current normal civilian requirements.

It is the view of the Department of State that the adoption of the licensing standards outlined in this letter will result in bringing the export control policy of the United States Government with respect to Communist China somewhat nearer to the general policies followed with respect to exports to the Soviet bloc in general, but that it will still permit the licensing of some 1–B exports on a current normal civilian requirement basis, which may, therefore, make necessary estimates of such requirements.[1]

Sincerely yours, DEAN ACHESON

Mr. Freeman, CA

I telephoned Mr. Graves this morning and informed him that the Department was today approaching the two principal American oil companies, Caltex and Stanvac, with respect to shipments of petroleum products to Communist China. I stated that we were requesting both companies to suspend all shipments of petroleum products to Chinese Communist ports for the time being as well as discontinue all discussions of contracts or additional shipments with the Chinese Communist consignees. I indicated that we were quite confident that the oil companies would act in accordance with our request and suggested that the British might wish to take up the matter similarly with Shell.

Mr. Graves said that he would report our action immediately to his Government as well as the suggestion that Shell be similarly approached and would inform me as soon as a reply was received.

In response to his question whether he might state that we would "bring pressure" to bear on the American companies to act in accordance with our request, I told Mr. Graves that, although I was quite confident that no pressure would be needed, I had no objection to his stating that we might apply pressure if such was necessary.

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] July 4, 1950.

Subject: Shipment of Petroleum Products to Communist China.

Participants: Mr. Hubert A. Graves, Counselor, British Embassy
Mr. Fulton Freeman, CA

Mr. Graves called this morning after having seen Mr. Merchant to inform me of the reaction of the Foreign Office to the Department's suggestion that the British consider the advisability of persuading the Shell Oil Company to suspend all shipments of petroleum products to Communist China for the time being. He stated that the Foreign Office had prefaced its reply with the following figures showing Shell exports to the China mainland for the period from January 1 to May 31, 1950:

Aviation gasoline	nil
Motor gasoline	13,000 tons
Light Diesel oil	5,000 tons
Kerosene	6,000 tons
Lubricants	1,000 tons
Total	25,000 tons

Mr. Graves stated that Shell's stocks in China at the end of May totaled something less than 25,000 tons. He pointed out, moreover, that of a total of 625,000 tons of petroleum products which had been exported to China during 1949, Shell's share had been only 82,000 tons.

Mr. Graves then went on to say that the Foreign Office had not stated specifically that it was "persuading" or "instructing" Shell to suspend all further shipments to Communist China. He referred several times to Shell's trade with Communist China as "an insignificant trickle"; he stated that "most careful scrutiny" would be given to all shipments going to Communist China; he assured me that Shell's trade would not be expanded and that Shell would not take the business which would normally go to Caltex and Stanvac; and he pointed out that even if the present level of trade were continued it would mean an increment to the Communists of only 5,000 tons per month.

As an apology for not taking stronger steps in this regard, Mr. Graves pointed out the concern of his Government lest any precipitate steps aimed at the Chinese Communists might provoke retaliatory action against Hong Kong.

Mr. Graves stated that he had discussed this matter briefly with Mr. Merchant and that the latter had recommended that he bring two points to the attention of the Foreign Office: first, that there might be an unfortunate public reaction in the United States should it become known that a British company was continuing to supply the Chinese Communists with petroleum products while the two principal American companies had suspended all shipments; and secondly, that there was a "lively possibility" that the Chinese Communists might enter in Korea on the side of the North Koreans. Mr. Graves assured me that he would pass these two points on to his Government and that he would expect a further reply in the near future which he would then communicate to me.

During the course of my conversation with Sir Oliver today I took up with him the question of oil to China stating that our companies had agreed voluntarily to stop shipments and that we felt that it was important that all shipments be stopped to China, particularly North China. Sir Oliver asked if we were sure that no oil shipments were being made from the United States by other than the companies which normally trade in China. It was stated that we believe this to be the case but that we would check to make certain and would inform Sir Oliver. Sir Oliver indicated that he felt that the military in the U.K. would be inclined to agree with our position on oil, but that the political side would probably be slower, and pointed out that although the U.K. was in complete sympathy with the U.S. on Korea the tension was not as high at present in London as it is in Washington.

Subject: Oil Shipments to Communist China

Participants: Mr. H. A. Graves, Counselor, British Embassy
Mr. R. Burns, Counselor, British Embassy
Mr. K. R. C. Pridham, Third Secretary, British Embassy
Mr. E. M. Martin, RA
Mr. Willis Armstrong, ER
Mr. R. N. Magill, CA
Mr. Wayne G. Jackson, BNA

The British Embassy representatives called at the Department's request to review certain matters relating to British decisions regarding oil shipments to Communist China. Mr. Graves read at length from the cable which the Embassy had received from London, the substance of which had been conveyed to the Secretary and Mr. Rusk over the week-end.

In substance this message stated that the British Government had decided "to interrupt the flow of oil to China from British sources". In carrying out that decision the British Government wished to act in such a way as not to appear to be discriminating against the Chinese Communists, wished any action to be taken by the United Kingdom Government and not by the Hong Kong authorities, and considered any action should be overt so as to protect the Shell Company and its employees by enabling them to say that they had acted as a result of a force majeure and not on their own initiative. Accordingly, the British Admiralty was requisitioning all stocks of petroleum products in Hong Kong, intending to include stocks held by American companies. In addition, they had recalled a tanker which was carrying gasoline to North China.

The British were prepared to have all petroleum products put on the International List I, used in connection with East-West trade and to apply such controls in Hong Kong and Singapore. The British wished to know whether the United States could agree to the adding of petroleum products to List I, to apply List I to China, and whether the United States would take initiative in the matter.

The British also referred to the possibility that oil might go to China from sources outside of the jurisdiction of the countries applying List I, e.g., Indonesia, and wished to know the Department's views on this matter. Mr. Graves left a copy of an extract from their instructions from London, dealing primarily with the List I problem. A copy of the extract is attached.[1]

The British were anxious to act with great caution in giving publicity to this matter and requested that we not make public their decision to shut-off oil to China. Mr. Graves advised that on the morning of July 18 a press release had been issued in London announcing that the British Admiralty had taken over all stocks of British oil in the theater. Mr. Graves left a copy of an extract from the press release, copy of which is attached.[2]

During the course of discussion the problem was raised of shipments to China from sources other than Hong Kong. As a result the British representatives were asked and agreed to attempt to obtain a clarification of whether the British Government considered that the requisitioning of stocks by the Admiralty took care of the problem for the immediate future in the sense that that action would, in fact, effectively interrupt the flow of oil to China from British sources.

With respect to adding all petroleum products to List I various points emerged. Aviation gasoline, additives, blending agents, and lubricants are already on List I. The procedures of the Consultative Committee in Paris were fairly slow and it might take some time for action to be completed there. Furthermore, there might be some difficulties in obtaining satisfactory action through this mechanism of the international list. In summary the Department representatives stated that the United States was not opposed in principle to the addition of all petroleum products to List I and had, in fact, suggested the List I controls now in effect, and proposed other petroleum products be included in List II. Likewise, in principle, the United States would support the application of List I controls to China and had, in fact, been urging it in Paris. The United States was willing to take the initiative in Paris and to cooperate with the British in meeting their general problems. The British had indicated that they wished to have petroleum products added to List I so that they could have a general policy backing for their specific action with respect to China and not appear to be discriminating against the Chinese Communists in relation to other Soviet sphere countries. The Department representatives stated, however, that they would wish to consult their representatives

[1] Not printed.

[2] The text of the attached extract from the press release reads as follows:

"Shell's supplies to China in the first six months of 1950 amounted to some 26,000 tons (all products together) which is less than 10% of China's civilian requirements. This compares with Shell's total trade with China in 1948 of 257000 tons and 82300 tons in 1949.

"This question is now academic in view of the fact that the British Service Departments have found it necessary to take over all stocks of British oil in the theatre (from which deliveries to China are made) for their own requirements in connection with the action being taken in support of the Security Council resolutions on Korea."

in Paris as to what would be the best tactics and procedure in order to achieve the desired objective of a generalized embargo of petroleum to Communist China. They, therefore, proposed to communicate with the United States representatives in Paris to seek their advice, requesting that they discuss the matter with the British representatives in Paris. Upon receipt of this advice the matter would be discussed further with the British.

The British said that it was intended to release petroleum from the stocks requisitioned in Hong Kong as local Hong Kong needs demanded. It would presumably be necessary in time to replenish the Hong Kong stocks. It was agreed that a procedure would have to be worked out so that the United States companies could take part in this replenishing.

The Department representatives said that they had been checking as to the extent of United States controls on petroleum shipments and could reassure the British that shipments were under control and that the United States Government was moving to stop-up potential loopholes by seeking the cooperation of American companies which operated outside the United States. The United States was anxious to cooperate in any way which could terminate petroleum shipments to China at this time.

Reference was made to the matter raised by Ambassador Franks with the Secretary on July 13 which involved rumors of shipments of gasoline to Latin America which were then diverted to China. As a preliminary report, the Department said that it had been impossible to find any substance in these rumors but that a fuller report would be given to the British Embassy in the near future.[3] [3] On August 2, the following memorandum was transmitted to the British Embassy by the Department of State:

---

"Reference is made to recurring rumors that petroleum products of American origin are reaching Communist China through indirect channels, especially by way of Latin America.

"Similar reports have been received by the Department of State from time to time and each one of them has been carefully investigated. No evidence of such transshipment of any petroleum products presently under license control for export from the United States to Latin America has been discovered, and the Department of State is confident that no transshipments of such products in significant quantities have occurred.

"The products under license control for export from the United States to Latin America include aviation gasoline and aviation lubricants, motor gasoline, the higher grades of lubricants of all kinds, diesel and fuel oils, and crude petroleum.

"The lower grades of lubricants are not now under license control for export to Latin America but steps are being taken to place all petroleum products under such control.

"With reference to the activities since June 29, 1950 of American oil companies supplying the Far Eastern market, the Department of State has received assurances from them that they will not sell or ship either to the Chinese Communists or to the North Koreans any type of petroleum product from any source under their control. Moreover, they have assured the Department that they will not sell to any third party suspected of acting as an agent for the Chinese Communists. At the request of the Department, they have ceased all shipments and cancelled all outstanding contracts." (493.009/7–2650)

The Department representatives asked for clarification concerning British measures, other than the Hong Kong requisitioning, which would render an embargo effective. They also suggested that the proximity of Vladivostok and other Soviet ports to Korea warranted action to prevent shipments to those destinations; the United States is already taking such action.

Subject: Requisitioning of Oil Stocks in China

Participants: Mr. H. A. Graves, Counselor, British Embassy
Mr. Wayne G. Jackson, BNA

Mr. Graves called me and referred to the statement in the Foreign Office cable which he read to us on July 18 to the effect that the Admiralty's requisitioning of oil stocks of British companies in Hong Kong would be extended to American companies. The cable stated that it was presumed that the American companies would not object. Mr. Graves said that the action of the Admiralty in dealing only with Shell Company stocks in the first instance had given rise to some comment that the Shell Company had been uncooperative. The British were anxious to extend the requisitioning to the stocks of American companies. While the British Government had, of course, the technical power to take the stocks of American companies, they preferred to find out how those companies would react.

I talked with Mr. Magill in CA who had discussed this matter with the American companies, Caltex and Stanvac. He told me that they understood that the requisitioning was not a taking of title but was in essence a stop order which forbade the companies from making disposition of the petroleum without approval of the Admiralty. In fact the distribution for use in Hong Kong was not interfered with. On the basis of this understanding, the American companies not only did not object to having their stocks requisitioned, but would prefer to be treated the same way as Shell so that they could argue with the Communists that they had no choice.

I relayed this information to Mr. Graves.

The Secretary of Defense (Johnson) to the Secretary of State

SECRET WASHINGTON, 19 July 1950.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The Joint Chiefs of Staff have expressed extreme concern over lack of controls on sources of supply of petroleum products for Communist China, North Korea, and the USSR maritime provinces. I understand that you and the Secretary of Commerce are aware of this problem, and that in effect, shipment of petroleum products from the U.S. to these areas has been embargoed, and that the principal U.S. controlled foreign suppliers, Caltex Company and Standard Vacuum Company in Hong Kong, have voluntarily embargoed all petroleum products to these areas. The remaining large supplier of petroleum products to Communist China from Hong Kong is the British controlled Shell Company. While the U.S. Consul General, Hong Kong, has reported that the Shell Company had informed him that its policy permitted only export of normal quantities of petroleum products to South China, information derived from Department of Defense sources discloses that the Shell Company of Hong Kong intends to ship in the immediate future 13,500 barrels of motor gasoline to Tsingtao and Tientsin. Both of these destinations are in North China adjacent to North Korea and it appears reasonable to assume that these and other shipments to this area will directly or indirectly contribute to North Korean capabilities.

I recommend, therefore, as a matter of urgency, that the strongest possible representations be made to the British Government to obtain from them action to effect embargo on all petroleum products to Communist China, North Korea, and USSR maritime provinces available to them from British controlled sources.

Sincerely yours, LOUIS JOHNSON

The Secretary of State to the Secretary of Defense (Johnson)

SECRET WASHINGTON, August 1, 1950.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The receipt is acknowledged of your letter of July 19, 1950 in which you note the concern of the Joint Chiefs of Staff about the question of controls on sources of supply of petroleum products for Communist China, North Korea, and the USSR maritime provinces, and recommend representations to the British Government to obtain an embargo on all petroleum products to these areas.

On June 29, 1950 the Department of State requested United States oil companies to suspend all sales or shipments for the Chinese mainland of all types of petroleum products which these companies control. This request was based upon the need for making certain that such shipments would not directly or indirectly support the North Korean military forces. The companies promptly agreed to comply with the request, and the Department is satisfied that they understand and are carrying out the objective.

On June 30, 1950 the Department informed the British Embassy in Washington of this action and suggested that the British Government consider making the same request to British oil companies.

Following consultation by representatives of the Department with representatives of the British Government here and in London, the British Foreign Office in London on July 18, 1950 issued a public statement on this question, the relevant portion of which is quoted hereafter:

"This question is now academic in view of the fact that the British service departments have found it necessary to take over all stocks of British oil in the theatre (from which deliveries to China are made) for their own requirements in connection with the action being taken in support of the Security Council's resolutions on Korea."

The Department of State is satisfied that this action by the British Government has resulted in the cessation of all petroleum shipments to Communist China from British-controlled sources.

In order to provide a basis for more effective control, urgent steps are being taken to obtain multilateral support for the embargo of all petroleum products to Communist China, North Korea, and Soviet Far Eastern ports.

Sincerely yours, DEAN ACHESON

893.2553/8–450

The Under Secretary of State (Webb) to the Secretary of Commerce (Sawyer)

SECRET WASHINGTON, August 4, 1950.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I refer to previous consultations between officers of your Department and officers of the Department of State regarding the problem of supplies of petroleum products to China and Korea as it is affected by the present armed conflict in Korea, and summarize below the present status of the question.

On June 29, 1950 the Department of State requested the American oil companies supplying China to suspend for the time being all sales and shipments of petroleum products to North Korea and Communist China from any source under their control. It was made clear to them that the Department wished all such shipments to cease at once even if such cessation meant cancellation of outstanding contracts and possible involvement in subsequent litigation. The companies in question (Standard-Vacuum Oil Company, The Texas Company, China, Limited, and the Cathay Oil Company) gave assurances that they would comply with the Department's request and did in fact terminate all shipments immediately and cancel all outstanding contracts.

At the same time the Department of State informed the British Embassy of this action and suggested that the Foreign Office make a similar request of the Shell Oil Company, which is the other firm normally supplying petroleum products to China and Korea. Following a period of consultation, the Foreign Office notified the Department of State on July 15, 1950 of the intention of the United Kingdom to shut off the supply of petroleum to China from British-controlled sources and stated this objective would be accomplished by having the British Admiralty requisition all petroleum stocks in the Far Eastern theatre from which supplies had been going forward to China. On July 18 the Foreign Office announced that all petroleum stocks in the theatre were being requisitioned by the British Services for their use in support of the United Nations resolution on Korea. The Department of State is satisfied that this action means the complete cessation of petroleum sales and shipments from British-controlled sources to China, North Korea or the maritime provinces of Siberia. The Foreign Office requested, however, that the United States Government preserve secrecy as to the motives of the action, and it is important, therefore, that United States Government agencies avoid any public interpretation of the Admiralty requisitioning.

The Foreign Office further requested that the Department of State take the initiative in obtaining the cooperation of other Governments, including those represented in the secret Consultative Group at Paris, in applying a similar policy of embargo with respect to the supply of petroleum products to all Soviet bloc destinations. The Foreign Office desires this cooperation in order to avoid the appearance of unilateral British action in cooperation with the United States with respect to China, and in order to ensure that all possible sources and transshipment points are adequately controlled. The Department of State has discussed with its representatives in the Paris Consultative Group the most appropriate and effective manner for obtaining the cooperation of the participating governments, and on July 24 they, together with the representatives of the United Kingdom, proposed to the Coordinating Committee the following categories of petroleum products for embargo treatment to all Soviet-dominated destinations:

(1) Crude petroleum
(2) Motor fuel
(3) Diesel oil (all grades)
(4) Fuel oil
(5) Kerosene
(6) Lubricating oils and greases.

On July 28, the representatives of governments participating in the Coordinating Committee reported the concurrence of their governments in placing these categories of petroleum products on International List I which is now applied by all participating countries to China and North Korea as well as to eastern Europe.

The Department of State is also undertaking to secure the cooperation of other American oil companies known to possess production and refining facilities outside the United States, and will undertake to secure the cooperation of other independent offshore producers important in international trade. Meanwhile, an instruction is going forward to United States diplomatic and consular posts in areas which are potential sources of supply or potential transshipment points, requesting them to watch closely for and report promptly any evidences of transshipment of petroleum products of United States origin or of exports of indigenous petroleum products to the Orient.

As you know, the question of placing under license control to all countries, other than Canada, those petroleum products of the above-named categories not now under such control is being discussed in the interdepartmental export-control committee structure. It would be helpful if the Department of Commerce could take such action at the earliest possible date in order that the Department of State may assure the Paris Consultative Group that the United States is effectively preventing any strategic petroleum products of United States origin from reaching Soviet-bloc destinations, whether by direct or indirect shipment.

The Department of State appreciates the prompt and effective handling of the export-control problem that has been demonstrated by your Department in this emergency situation.

Sincerely yours, JAMES E. WEBB

The Secretary of Commerce (Sawyer) to the Under Secretary of State (Webb)

SECRET WASHINGTON, August 10, 1950.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Thank you for your letter of August 4 regarding the export of petroleum products to China and Korea. I am pleased to note that there is a complete cessation of petroleum exports from British controlled sources to China, North Korea and the Maritime Provinces of Siberia. It is my understanding that this cessation also applies to petroleum exports from Hong Kong to the areas in question.

The Department of Commerce is proceeding immediately to put into effect a comprehensive control of petroleum products to assure that the products listed in your letter will be subject to individual license control to all destinations. This will allow us to scrutinize carefully the possibility of transshipment to Soviet dominated destinations. As you know, the United States has not been approving any license applications for Communist China since June 30. All the petroleum products listed in your letter have been classified as 1A, with the result that export licensing will cease to other Soviet dominated destinations as well.

I note that the Department of State is undertaking to secure cooperation of additional American oil companies known to possess production and refining facilities outside the United States, and will undertake to secure the cooperation of other independent offshore producers important in international trade. This additional control is in our opinion necessary to achieve the objective, and we trust that you will be able to obtain such cooperation from all other offshore producers at an early date.

Sincerely yours, CHARLES SAWYER

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. Robert N. Magill of the Office of Chinese Affairs

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] September 13, 1950.

Subject: Control of Petroleum to China, Including Formosa

Participants: Mr. Pridham—British Embassy [1]
Mr. Barnett—CA
Mr. Magill—CA

Mr. Pridham called this afternoon to discuss the problem, reported to us earlier from Hong Kong, of Caltex's efforts to export aviation gasoline from Hong Kong to Formosa. He said that, after the Hong Kong Government had refused a license for this purpose, the Governor had referred the matter to London which in turn had asked the Embassy to inform the Department of the British position.

Mr. Pridham stated that the Foreign Office position is that UK and Hong Kong export controls must be applied with equal severity to the Chinese mainland and to Taiwan as a part of China. He stated that this position is necessary in order to avoid giving the lie to prohibition of petroleum exports from Hong Kong to China on grounds of need by the British armed services—that action inconsistent with this publicly-stated reason might be quite harmful to British interests in view of the delicacy of their relations with the Chinese Communists. Mr. Pridham added that a related consideration was that the accumulation of excessive petroleum stocks on Formosa would be dangerous so long as there was a possibility that the island might be taken by the Chinese Communists, but he acknowledged that this was not particularly applicable to the small quantity that Caltex had desired to export from Hong Kong. He concluded by saying that the Foreign Office hoped that the Department would understand the reasons for the British position and that it would be possible for U.S. companies to find adequate alternatives sources of supply for Formosa.

Mr. Barnett responded that we understood the situation as Mr. Pridham had described it. He observed that there had been a clear understanding during the discussions between the U.S. and U.K. Governments on export controls for China that the U.S. Government would differentiate between Formosa and the Chinese mainland where as the U.K. Government would not be able to do so. He added that, so far as he was aware, the question of alternative sources of supply was not a major problem, but that, if it should become one, we might wish to discuss the matter again with the British. (It was recognized that the problem of alternative sources would not involve availabilities but rather concerned the time factor for urgently needed ad hoc shipments.)

Mr. Pridham then turned to another aspect of the general subject and said that the Foreign Office was rather concerned over reports from Shell that two shipments of petroleum had taken place from Kobe to Tientsin on August 10 and August 6 respectively. He supplied the details of these reported shipments. Mr. Barnett told him that we were not aware of these shipments and would send a query to Tokyo for the facts involved. He added, however, that we had followed up on an earlier report of a petroleum transshipment via Japan to Communist China and had received an assurance from SCAP, subsequent to August 10, that SCAP was taking the necessary steps to ensure that no petroleum products on the U.S. Positive List would be exported from Japan to Commnist China.

Mr. Pridham asked whether there were any other unresolved questions relating to US-UK cooperation in controlling petroleum exports to China. Mr. Magill observed that the only point that occurred to him at the moment was the question of whether road-surfacing asphalt should be included in the petroleum categories on International List I. Mr. Pridham stated that he could not recall the details but that he believed that a Foreign Office opinion in the negative had been received within the last month and relayed to the Department.

(Note: Following the conversation above, Hong Kong's despatch 292 of August 28 [2] on the subject of asphalt controls at Hong Kong was noted. This despatch states that, effective immediately, all asphalt, except asphalt-treated roofing rolls, is prohibited export to China from the Colony.)

UNITED STATES POLICY TOWARD TRADE WITH CHINA

For some months prior to the start of the Korean war, the Department of State has, as a practical matter, considered the policy statement set forth in paragraph 3*f* (page 4) of NSC 48/2 to be the overall policy guide for United States trade with China and in this sense to have, in fact, superseded NSC 41. This policy statement has proven to be a sufficiently flexible statement of policy to make possible a phase of permissive export controls, and the current phase of virtual embargo. It is, in the view of the Department of State, broad enough in its terms to make possible the administrative measures which may be called for by developments in the Far East over the next few months.

For the background information of the members of the NSC Senior Staff, there are attached copies of the following letters:

1. From the Secretary of State to Secretary Johnson dated April 28, 1950.
2. From the Secretary of State to Secretary Sawyer dated June 8, 1950.
3. From the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs to the Assistant Secretary of Commerce dated June 30, 1950.

It is the view of the Department of State that the NSC Senior Staff should not, at this juncture, undertake a review of NSC 48/2 because of the flexible character of the policies in that document and because of the desirability of awaiting the results of the intelligence studies which have been recommended in the foregoing section. The Department of State is, however, at the same time, giving careful scrutiny to NSC 48/2 and to the Secretary's letters of April 28 and June 8 in an effort to restate in the light of the widened multilateral controls for East-West Trade, economic and political developments in the Far East, and relevant domestic, political and economic factors, the United States position on trade with China for consideration by the NSC Staff.

The Department of State proposes to submit to the Council a final progress report on NSC 41 in order to make clear on the record that this paper is considered out of date and superseded by the appropriate policy statements of NSC 48/2.[1]

PHILIP C. JESSUP

493.119/11–2850

Memorandum by the Deputy Director of the Office of Chinese Affairs (Perkins) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] November 28, 1950.

Subject: Standby Economic Control Measures for Communist China

1. This Government is now applying control measures to deny export to Communist China of all Positive List commodities from the United States, has secured the cooperation of the European CoCom countries in applying to China their restrictive controls for the U.S.S.R. and its Eastern European satellites, and has obtained the voluntary cooperation of American business interests in the embargo of petroleum products. These measures, although effective in preventing movement of strategic commodities to Communist China, do not add up to a program of all-out American economic warfare. For that to be accomplished there should be an embargo on all United States exports to Communist China, including those which have no strategic rating, a blocking of all Chinese properties in the United States (with licenses granted for withdrawals by Chinese Nationalist agencies and individuals and perhaps for Americans on the mainland who can demonstrate hardship), an elimination of American flag and American owned shipping from Communist Chinese ports, and an embargo on Chinese Communist imports into the United States.

2. Under the Trading with the Enemy Act[1] these measures can be taken by the United States Government without legislation even though Communist China is not declared a belligerent at war with this country. These measures can be put in effect, either by a comprehensive executive order of the President or by selected executive orders covering parts of the program of control, and violators of the orders would, thereafter be liable to prosecution. To do this requires no longer than the time taken in drafting and clearing the order (or orders) with the various administering agencies (Treasury Department, Maritime Administration of the Commerce Department, Commerce Department, Justice Department). L is now engaged in preparing drafts of such orders.

3. There is considerable scope for applying effective controls upon U.S. economic relations with Communist China without resort to executive orders. The Commerce Department can apply a complete embargo on United States exports to Communist China under the authority of the Export Control Act of 1949.[2] The Commerce Department, the Maritime Administration, and the Federal Reserve Board are prepared to provide to American business, shipping companies, and banks policy advice which the State Department desires circulated, including, for example, a regime that their voluntary cooperation is desired in terminating all economic relations with Communist China. Policy advice of this sort, in the past, has been promptly and willingly accepted.

4. Unilateral application of the above economic measures, in an effort to hurt or punish the Chinese Communist regime, would have marginal effect only and even this would diminish as the Chinese Communists turned from the U.S. to other competing markets for its imports and exports.

5. To determine when, how, or if the measures above should be applied at all the following considerations should be borne in mind:

a. China's economy is not vitally dependent upon foreign trade to maintain operations at present low levels of production and welfare;

b. Application of economic warfare measures by the United States would place in acute jeopardy the safety of the American missionaries in China which are virtually the last and only foothold which the United States retains in China;

c. To impose pressure upon our Western European Allies to join in effective multilateral economic control measures—which is essential for the effectiveness of such a program—would probably impose added strains upon their security position, particularly at Hong Kong and in Indo-China;

d. In any situation short of one where a naval blockade has been imposed, thus committing the United States to a more extreme posture of hostility than economic warfare would imply, the measures listed would deprive the United States of its last remaining method for giving China an alternative to all-out orientation towards the U.S.S.R.

Subject: Trade Embargo on China

Bill Martin of Treasury [2] has just telephoned and asked me to pass on this message to you:

The Treasury feels that if we were to place a trade embargo on China that they would want to act simultaneously in the financial field and to block accounts, financial transactions, etc. He said that it would place us in a unfavorable light, if we were to put on a trade embargo and follow it in a few days with a "financial blocking". I asked whether the President had all the authority that we need for financial blocking. He replied that all legislative authority was in being and that actually Treasury had orders and all the necessary papers drafted and ready to go; but that they, of course, did not want to act without clearing it with the President or with the National Security Council; and certainly would want to act in coordination with any trade embargo or similar economic measure.

Bill Martin said that he thought that you would want to know about Treasury's attitude in considering the question of trade embargo. I agreed heartily with him that it would affect consideration of a trade embargo.

I shall inform Livy Merchant of this conversation as soon as I can get through to him.

Memorandum of Telephone Conversation, by Miss Barbara Evans, Secretary to the Secretary of State

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] November 29, 1950.

Secretary Sawyer telephoned Secretary Acheson and said he was giving serious thought to putting an embargo, or at least controls on everything going to China. He said that State Department people had been consulted by Mr. Blaisdell, but they had not given the Department's opinion to Commerce.

Secretary Sawyer recalled that when the Korean war had started all shipments to North Korea had been shut off, and he thought that now that the Chinese were in, it seemed to him wise to apply the same principle. He somewhat qualified this by saying that they would not necessarily cut off all shipments, but would put everything on the positive list, which would, as a matter of fact, probably result in very little going through.

Mr. Acheson said that his first, off-hand impression was that it would be a good idea.

Secretary Sawyer said that actually very little of importance had been going to China, while we had been getting important amounts of tungsten from them, and were getting some wool and tin. 85% of our shipments to China in the last six months had been cotton; nothing of any military importance had been shipped.

Mr. Acheson suggested that the matter should be talked over with Mr. Symington,[1] since tungsten was involved. Secretary Sawyer did not seem to think that this was necessary, and he said that he thought that the Chinese would continue to ship tungsten, since they have been shipping it to us, even after we had drastically cut down on shipments to China.

Mr. Acheson said he would look into the matter and call Secretary Sawyer back.

493.119/11–2950

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk) to the Secretary of State

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] November 29, 1950.

It is recommended that you reply to Secretary Sawyer on the subject of an embargo on trade with China along the following lines:

The present phase of the Korean matter requires extremely careful handling if we are to hold together United Nations majority behind whatever measures must be taken. This means that we must act to the extent possible through the organization and with full consultation with our principal friends. We expect a veto of the resolution on Korea now before the Security Council.[1] Following that, the matter will probably go to the General Assembly in the next few days. The General Assembly will have to take up the entire question of the political and economic pressures which can be brought to bear upon Peiping to force them to pull back in Korea. We believe this is the proper forum in which to have this matter decided and that unilateral action on our part two or three days before the issue comes before the General Assembly might seriously weaken our chances of getting a solid front in the United Nations.

[1] Reference is to the six-power draft resolution (U.N. document S/1894) introduced in the Security Council on November 10 by Cuba, Ecuador, France, Norway, the United Kingdom, and the United States, which called on the People's Republic of China to withdraw its nationals from Korea and declared that it was United Nations policy to hold the Sino-Korean frontier inviolate. The resolution was vetoed by the Soviet Union on November 30. For related documentation, see volume VII.

If it is necessary for you to discuss this with the Congress, it is suggested that you state that the issue of Chinese aggression and the measures which are to be taken by the United Nations are now before the United Nations. Because of this we believe that we should not take action on our own within the next three or four days along the lines of a general embargo on US–China trade.

Memorandum by Mr. Lucius D. Battle, Special Assistant to the Secretary of State

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] November 30, 1950.

The Secretary received a memorandum from Mr. Dean Rusk on the matter about which Secretary Sawyer called him yesterday afternoon. The memorandum, which was cleared through S/S, concerned the advisability of placing an embargo on China.

Apparently, the memorandum missed somewhat the point which Mr. Sawyer had raised with Mr. Acheson. Mr. Sawyer had asked Mr. Acheson about the advisability of placing certain commodities under export control and then determining whether export licenses should be granted for those commodities when applications were applied for. The Secretary was unable to get in immediate contact with Mr. Rusk and went ahead and called Secretary Sawyer, basing his conversation on the memorandum which Mr. Rusk had sent him. Mr. Sawyer appeared satisfied and said he would talk to the Secretary before any action was taken to place the commodities under export control. He seemed to be interested in the Department's reasoning on the embargo and assured the Secretary of further consultation before any steps were taken. He said that it would be necessary, in the event the items were put on the list, to have publicity on it.

At the 9:30 meeting this morning, the Secretary discussed this matter and it was decided that he should tell Secretary Sawyer that the Department concurred in the placing of these items under control.

Memorandum by the Deputy Assistant Secretaries of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Merchant) and Economic Affairs (O'Gara) to the Ambassador at Large (Jessup)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] November 30, 1950.

Subject: NSC Senior Staff Meeting, November 30, 1950: Treasury Views Regarding Economic Sanctions

A delegation of Treasury Department representatives came to the Department this morning to discuss with Mr. Schaetzel (E),[1] Mr. Sanders (UNA),[2] and Mr. Barnett (FE) our current thinking on economic sanctions for China.

We stated that unilateral economic sanctions would be relatively ineffective in hurting the Chinese Communist regime or its economy and, if taken unilaterally, would seriously prejudice the success of negotiating through the United Nations the multilateral measures which would be measurably more effective, if it became necessary and it were agreed to apply them. We said that we understood that the Commerce Department accepted the Department's view that a unilateral export embargo should not, at this time, be applied.

The Treasury representatives indicated that the Commerce position could easily change under domestic pressure, and that even in the absence of a top governmental decision to embargo might go ahead and apply restrictions by less conspicuous, but equally effective measures regardless of top level rulings.

They said that the Treasury Department would find itself subject to uncontrollable pressure to freeze Chinese properties in the United States were the export embargo applied by either of the above means; that export embargo and freezing were inseparable and that one would require the other.

They said that the President had made a grant of authority to Secretary Snyder under which Treasury was made responsible for handling the national interest where freezing and other financial measures were required.

They said that the Treasury had completed work setting up machinery for freezing and this machinery could be put in motion merely by signature by the Secretary of the Treasury of certain documents which have been prepared and which the Treasury had complete authority to issue.

We told the Treasury representatives that we have had some experience with being under strong domestic political pressure, that the time might soon come when economic sanctions would serve our national interest, but that in view of the delicacy of the Korean crisis and the vital importance, both in Korea and elsewhere throughout the world, of maintaining a unified front amongst the Free Nations, we felt most strongly that the measures being discussed should not be taken except after the Administration had considered their world wide implications for our national interests and national security and had then decided to take them.

[1] J. Robert Schaetzel, Special Assistant to the Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs (Thorp).

[2] William Sanders, Acting Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs.

We recommend that, if possible, you put our views to the Treasury Representative at the National Security Council Senior Staff before its session this afternoon. It would be unfortunate if, at that meeting, you were to find yourself in a minority position as the discussion of this question got under way.

The Treasury representatives made clear that they were not advocating economic counter-measures at this time, but wished us to know what, in their view, imposition of the export embargo implied in the field of our financial policies.

[Annex]

Memorandum Presented to the National Security Council Senior Staff by the Treasury Department

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] November 30, 1950.

Subject: Relation of Embargoing Exports to Communist China and North Korea to Blocking Assets of and Financial Transactions with Communist China and Communist North Korea

1. The Treasury Department believes that the policy decisions regarding export controls and blocking controls are inseparable and consequently must be reviewed simultaneously by the NSC. If the decision of this Government is made to impose an embargo on exports to Communist China, it is the view of the Treasury that parallel action on blocking Chinese Communist assets would be called for.

2. We have no precise estimate of Chinese long and short-term assets in this country nor any precise breakdown between Chinese Communists and non-Communist assets in this country. The total amount of Chinese assets in the United States, including both Nationalist Chinese and Communist Chinese, is roughly estimated to be about $200 million of which less than half is under Chinese Communist control. Imports from China to the United States currently exceed exports from the United States by about $7 million per month, thus providing additional dollar resources to the Communist regime. U.S. exports to China are now about $1 million per month and imports about $8 million.

3. In practice blocking of Chinese Communist assets would probably mean the cessation of direct imports to the U.S. from Communist China since it is unlikely that the Chinese Communists would be willing to continue exports to this country with the knowledge that the proceeds of the exports would be blocked. It is quite possible, however, that Chinese Communist exports might continue to come to this country indirectly through third areas.

THE POSITION OF THE UNITED STATES REGARDING A BLOCKADE OF TRADE WITH CHINA

References: A. NSC 41 Series [1]
B. NSC 91/1 [2]

The enclosed memorandum by the Department of State on the subject is submitted herewith, as recommended therein, for urgent consideration by the National Security Council, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Commerce and the Economic Cooperation Administrator of the statement of policy recommended in the last paragraph thereof.

Also attached for background information in this connection, at the request of the Secretary of Commerce, is an Appendix containing a report by the Department of Commerce of actions taken by the Department of Commerce, in consultation with the Department of State, the Department of Defense and other Government agencies, on trade with China.

It is recommended that, if the statement of policy contained in the last paragraph of the enclosure is adopted, it be submitted to the President for consideration with the recommendation that he approve it as an interim short-term policy and direct its implementation by all appropriate departments and agencies of the U.S. Government.

TOP SECRET WASHINGTON, December 2, 1950.

Subject: Interim Recommendation Regarding a Blockade of Trade With China.

It is requested that the following memorandum be circulated to the Members of the National Security Council for urgent consideration.

There has been considerable inter-departmental study and exchange

[1] See footnote 1 to the memorandum by Mr. Jessup, November 22, p. 664.

[2] The text, dated November 17, is scheduled for publication in volume IV. NSC 91/1 was approved by the National Security Council on November 22 and by President Truman on November 24; it provided for tighter regulation of 1–A and 1–B exports to Soviet bloc nations including North Korea and Communist China.

of views regarding the question of immediate imposition of an embargo on all United States exports to Communist China. The following considerations bear upon the decision as to whether this course of action is now desirable:

1. No exports of munitions or items on the United States Positive List are now being permitted to Communist China;
2. United States imports from Communist China include items of strategic value to the United States;
3. Unilateral United States export embargo would have little effect on Communist China. To achieve the maximum effect of unilateral United States action would require freezing of Chinese assets in the United States and possibly an import embargo on other than the direct shipments from China. Even these combined measures, if taken unilaterally, would not seriously injure the Chinese Communists;
4. Economic sanctions applied by all or most of United Nations countries supporting the Korea and China resolutions would provide an important countermeasure of substantial effectiveness which could be applied against China. Unilateral application of such sanctions prematurely by the United States would, however, contribute to the fear of a large number of friendly governments that the United States intends, at this juncture in the Korean crisis, to take steps, economic or military, which they are not ready to support. This would give the Soviet sphere the satisfaction of witnessing a rift in the unity of the free nations of the world and possibly militate against the achievement of that unity in the Far East and elsewhere.
5. The Department of Commerce is desirous of having a policy recommendation by the National Security Council on this subject.

The situation is an extremely fluid one which, so far as the United Nations is concerned, should be clarified within a very short time. It is, therefore, recommended that this problem continue to be kept under review and that the National Security Council as an interim short term recommendation submit to the President the following statement of policy:

The United States should not at this moment undertake full unilateral trade embargo and financial freezing measures against Communist China.

PHILIP C. JESSUP

Appendix

REPORT BY THE DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE OF ACTIONS TAKEN BY THE DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE, IN CONSULTATION WITH THE DEPARTMENTS OF STATE AND DEFENSE AND OTHER GOVERNMENT AGENCIES, ON TRADE WITH CHINA

UNCLASSIFIED [WASHINGTON,] December 4, 1950.

"Effective 12:01 a. m., eastern standard time, December 3, 1950, General Licenses GRO, GLR, GMC, and GCC, authorizing exportation of any commodity, whether or not included on the Positive List of Commodities (S 399.1), are revoked to the following destinations: Manchuria (including the Port Arthur Naval Base area and Liaoning Province), and China (including the provinces of Suiyuan, Chahar, Ningsia, and Jehol, sometimes referred to as Inner Mongolia; the provinces of Chinghai (Tsinghai) and Sikang; Sinkiang; Tibet; and Outer Mongolia), and Hong Kong and Macao, but excluding Taiwan (Formosa) as described in Schedule C of the Bureau of the Census.

"This order also applies to shipments through United States foreign trade zones to the foregoing destinations. It shall not apply to exportations to the above destinations which have been laden aboard the exporting carrier prior to its effective date."

The effect of this regulation is that all persons and firms wishing to export any commodities to mainland China, Hong Kong and Macao must submit applications for export licenses. It is probable that the additional work-load which this requirement imposes will mean there will be some delay in the processing of most license applications for that area.

The Department of Commerce, through its interdepartmental Advisory Committee on Export Policy, is now developing specific licensing criteria on shipments to China. It may be anticipated that under these criteria only such goods as can be clearly demonstrated to have no strategic importance will be permitted to move to communist China. Shipments to Hong Kong and Macao will be screened to prevent the transshipment to the mainland of goods which would not be permitted to move directly from the United States.

As of this date the Secretary of Commerce and the Economic Cooperation Administrator have approved the statement of policy con-

Memorandum by the Secretary of the Treasury (Snyder) to the National Security Council

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] December 6, 1950.

Subject: The Position of the United States Regarding a Blockade of Trade With China

Reference: NSC 92

The Secretary of the Treasury does not concur in NSC 92 and submits for consideration the following comments.

The Secretary of the Treasury concurs in the emphasis placed by NSC 92 upon the desirability of multilateral action in applying any economic sanctions against the Chinese Communist aggressors. The memorandum, however, fails to indicate what steps are being taken to obtain appropriate multilateral action, or to consider the policies which this Government should pursue in the event that such action appears to be unobtainable, or is too long delayed. The memorandum further fails to deal with the action already taken unilaterally by this Government in the trade field in relation to the problem of applying blocking controls.

It should be emphasized that a trade embargo and a blocking of assets are essentially concomitant parts of a single policy action. To restrict China's imports of United States goods without restricting its ability to transfer dollars so as to import similar goods from other countries is inconsistent. In this connection it must be recognized that the present action of this Government with respect to export trade to China, while nominally one of placing all exports to China on an individual license basis, is tantamount to a de facto embargo upon export trade. The Government is thus now in the position of implementing conflicting policies in the related fields of trade and finance.

While some delay may be possible in implementing financial controls, any such delay in making our trade and financial policies consistent can be justified only on the assumption that we are actively pursuing the objective of obtaining multilateral action, and only so long as there appears to be a reasonable prospect of obtaining early multilateral agreement. This Government should be free to act at any moment that it becomes apparent that either of these assumptions are not justified.

Reference is made to NSC 92 "The Position of the United States Regarding a Blockade of Trade with China" and to your memorandum of December 6, 1950 with which you forwarded the memorandum from Secretary Snyder of the same date on this subject. You will recall that NSC 92 was prepared at the request of the Department of Commerce and was designed solely to put in writing the interim decision which had already been made to put all exports to China under licensing scrutiny but not, at the moment, to put into effect a trade embargo and a blocking of assets against Communist China. It might be more desirable to frame the policy statement in NSC 92 in positive rather than negative terms. I would recommend therefore that the members of the Senior Staff consider urgently recommending that the following be substituted for the policy statement in NSC 92 before it is given final consideration by the members of the Council:

"The United States should continue, for the moment, its present policies regarding the placement of all exports under license to China and the NSC should keep under review the questions of a trade embargo, a blocking of assets of Communist China and action to prevent American shipping from calling at China mainland ports."

C. Memorandum from Dr. Jessup to Mr. James S. Lay, dated December 8, 1950

1. Dr. Jessup's memorandum of December 8 does not address itself to the central problem raised in the memorandum of the Secretary of the Treasury, namely, that this Government is now in a position of having inconsistent trade and financial policies with respect to China. We have placed a de facto embargo upon exports to China and have made this position clear to the public, although nominally exports are subject to individual licensing. At the same time we are permitting China to utilize existing dollar assets and current dollar earnings for purchases in third areas of commodities whose export from the United States to China is prohibited by our trade policy and for other purposes which are likely to be inimical to United States interests. Chinese dollar earnings from exports to the United States were at an annual rate of $154 million in the third quarter of 1950.

2. Dr. Jessup's memorandum gives no justification for continuing with inconsistent trade and financial policies; nor does it comment on the possibility of early action to bring the policies of our allies in line with existing United States policy.

3. A further point which should be noted with respect to the problem of instituting parallel trade and financial controls vis-à-vis China. As stated above, our present trade policy with respect to China is to place all exports on a licensing basis, but de facto the effect is one of an embargo on United States exports to China. If it is desired, financial controls with respect to China might take a similar from, i.e., all financial transactions with China could be placed under individual licensing.

4. There would appear to be no reasonable basis on economic or financial grounds for justifying our inconsistent trade and financial policies with respect to China. If our failure to act in the financial field is questioned, the defense must be based entirely on considerations of foreign policy.

Executive Secretariat Files: NSC 92 Series

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk) to the Secretary of State

TOP SECRET [WASHINGTON,] December 13, 1950.

Subject: NSC 92

NSC 92 states that:

"The United States should continue, for the moment, its present policies regarding the placement of all exports under license to China and the NSC should keep under review the questions of a trade embargo, a blocking of assets of Communist China and action to prevent American shipping from calling at China mainland ports."

This was submitted by State to the Executive Secretary of the National Security Council on December 8 for circulation to Council Members. The Treasury Department could not concur and desires authority to institute standby financial controls parallel to those which have been established by the Commerce Department to control exports. I have stated in Tab A the reasons why we should not now accept the Treasury view on financial controls.[1]

I recommend that you support NSC 92 as now formulated and that you state that the phrase "keep under review" should be understood to mean that while the United States Government should take all necessary advance steps and hold itself in instant readiness to apply severe and comprehensive measures to Communist China embargoing exports, freezing assets, and preventing movement of American shipping to its ports, those measures should not be applied until the NSC has received a report from the Department of State as to whether Mr. Bevin and the Foreign Ministers of the principal Western European countries see in this proposed action by the United States Government consequences which, if taken unilaterally, would seriously endanger our common interests in the Far East and elsewhere in the world.

The following considerations underlie my recommendation:

In Favor of Unilateral Action

The American people, in Congress, in the Executive Branch of the Government, speaking through the press and through correspondence to their Government, are, quite rightly, outraged that Chinese troops are killing American troops and feel that the United States should reply to China's aggression with all means available.

There is no longer any valid basis for the theory that United States interests are served by keeping a business foot in the Chinese door.

The limits upon the effectivenes of unilateral action are obvious but this is not a conclusive argument against taking action which would have some harmful effect upon Communist China.

If the Executive Branch of the Government does not act in this field, Congress may pass legislation which will require action.

---

[1] Tab A was not attached to the source text in the Department of State files. Mr. Rusk, however, had set forth his reasons for opposing the Treasury position in a memorandum of December 13 to Messrs. Matthews, Thorp, and Nitze, which reads in part as follows:

"The Treasury Department would freeze Chinese Communist assets in the United States.

"This would be done under legal authority contained in the Trading with the Enemy Act which has not hitherto been cited unless it was the intention of this Government to undertake economic warfare measures of indefinite duration and very wide scope.

"Even if the Treasury Department permitted limited withdrawals under license for approved purposes, e.g. to finance exports which Commerce decides to license, the freezing would have an impact much wider than export controls and would probably stop transfers of funds to third countries and withdrawals for uses of funds for other than exports.

"The institution of stand-by controls by Commerce still permits the employment of those controls flexibly. The institution of 'appropriate parallel licensing policies' by Treasury would be a freeze of all Chinese Communist assets. For technical reasons this freeze would be regarded as and in fact would be the counterpart of a full Commerce embargo on exports." (493.009/12–1350)

Possible Harmful Effects of Unilateral Action

UNA believes that unilateral economic sanctions by the United States at this moment would embarrass the cease-fire negotiations at Lake Success and jeopardize agreement in the UN on further measures which may have to be taken against Communist China.

Communist China and the USSR might regard application of economic sanctions as having the same relation to U.S. plans and prospects with respect to World War III that the U.S. freezing order on Japanese assets in July 1941 had to U.S. participation in World War II.

The United Kingdom and our other allies might regard unilateral U.S. sanctions, without prior consultation with them and an earnest attempt to secure their cooperation, as an alarming indication of unreliability and disregard of the implications of this action upon their interests, not only in Hong Kong, Malaya, and French Indo-China, but also in the defense of Western Europe.

At the same time, you should inform other Council Members that the Department has already opened discussions with the British and is in process of consulting other interested governments. You can state that the Department intends to report on their views before December 20. A telegram to selected missions is in draft and will be submitted to you for approval.

G, S/P, E, UNA, and EUR concur in this memorandum.

"The United States should not at this moment undertake full unilateral trade embargo and financial freezing measures against Communist China."

2. The Joint Chiefs of Staff strongly object to this anomalous position which permits the giving of aid and comfort to Communist China at a time when that nation is militarily attacking United States armed forces. The policy proposed by the Department of State will not best serve United States security interests and is incompatible with the present United States military effort.

3. In view of the foregoing, the Joint Chiefs of Staff recommend that the United States Government undertake at once full unilateral trade embargo, together with financial freezing measures against Communist China. The agreement of the other free nations of the world for like action should be sought. The non-agreement of these nations, however, should not deter the United States from imposing these economic sanctions against Communist China.

The Secretary said that in regard to the question of economic and financial measures against China the discussion had brought out that the proposed additional measures would have no real effect upon the Chinese but that in terms of United States public opinion the contemplated steps would need to be taken. It was decided that he and Secrecretary Snyder should arrange to put the freezing procedures into effect when they considered it wise. It was noted that Treasury and State had reached an understanding that Saturday,[2] midnight, would be an appropriate time to do this. The Secretary had, however, pointed out in the meeting that if the UN Entezam Committee were in the midst of discussing with us the cease-fire at the time we should not announce action which might give the Chinese the excuse to say that they had turned down the cease-fire because of what we had done.[3] Treasury will be guided by the views of the State Department on that point. ternational sanctions were applied but it was agreed that we probably could not defer our action that long.

The proposed substitute language for the concluding paragraph in NSC 92 was not submitted [4] and there was no agreement upon any particular language of that kind. The agreed action was that the President authorized the Secretaries of State and Treasury to go ahead with the freezing procedures when they decided it was the time to do it.

The Secretary had said he thought it was necessary for us to notify certain friendly governments and there had been no dissent. The Secretary suggested that we might tell them that we were considering this measure. He emphasized the importance of secrecy on the whole question.

The question of using the IMF procedures for purpose of this notification was not suggested at the meeting.

The Secretary stated that reference had been made to a ticker report that there had been a heavy Chinese air attack against our forces being evacuated at Hungnam. General Bedell Smith [5] gave some information on this matter. The Secretary and Mr. Harriman agreed that we must be very careful about the issuance of any orders as a consequence of such action if it is confirmed.

PHILIP C. JESSUP

[4] The proposed substitute language referred to had been drawn up in discussions between State and Treasury Department officials who also took into account the views of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. It reads as follows:

"The United States should establish immediately controls necessary for embargoing all exports from the United States to Chinese Communist destinations, blocking all Chinese Communist assets in the United States, and preventing ships of United States registry from calling at Chinese Communist ports. The United States should notify friendly countries of its intent in this regard prior to three o'clock on the afternoon of December 16, at which time the controls should be applied subject to such exceptions as may, hereafter, be deemed to be in the national interest. These controls should be administered in such a way as not to cause hardship to areas of the Far East under the jurisdiction of friendly countries." (NSC 92 Series)

[2] On December 21, Mr. Lay forwarded to the National Security Council a Progress Report on NSC 92, prepared by the Department of State, which contained the following paragraph:

"The Commerce Department continues to place under control all exports from the United States to Chinese Communist destinations, Hong Kong, and Macao under requirement of a validated export license. Although no license applications are being approved for Communist China, the Department of State has advised the Department of Commerce that it should not, for the time being, announce that all license applications will be denied." The Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Rusk) to Colonel E. P. Kavanaugh of the California Texas Oil Company, Limited

WASHINGTON, December 19, 1950.

MY DEAR COLONEL KAVANAUGH: This is to confirm the understanding reached and the guidance supplied you on December 12 when you met with representatives of the State and Commerce Departments to discuss the Far Eastern operations of the California Texas Oil Company Limited.

We informed you that shipments of all petroleum products from the United States to Communist China, Hong Kong, and Macao will be subject to licensing control. As you are aware, since June, licensing of all petroleum products has been suspended for shipments to Communist China. Since December 3 when all U.S. exports to Communist China were placed under control, exports of petroleum products to Hong Kong and Macao have been suspended. However, a procedure for licensing petroleum products for Hong Kong and Macao is now being developed.

With respect to petroleum shipments to Communist China, Hong Kong and Macao from off-shore sources, the Departments of State and Commerce believe that you should continue to apply the general principles which have governed your shipments to Hong Kong and Macao since June. We stress, of course, the importance of seeing that no shipments whatever be made to Communist destinations. Shipments to Hong Kong and Macao should be confined to amounts hitherto considered to be within the limits of Hong Kong local use and approved transshipment. We approve of the continuation of the restrictive ninety-day levels you have considered to be a maximum for your stock position, but caution you that even this limit may be, at an early time, considered excessive.

The Departments of State and Commerce accept your offer to give us notice of shipments of all petroleum products to Hong Kong and Macao, but do not, for the present, believe that it is necessary for us to give prior approval of individual shipments.

Sincerely yours, DEAN RUSK

munist China. Thus far, there has been very little information which the Foreign Office has been able to pass on, but Mr. Ramsbottom, the Petroleum Officer, has said that all intelligence on such matters is regularly exchanged with other agencies of the United States Government, presumably CIA. The Foreign Office has indicated, however, that it appears deliveries of oil into China have been very small and infrequent so that the country may be becoming low on petroleum stocks.

In a conversation with an official of the Shell Petroleum Company, it was learned that Shell has no knowledge of recent shipments of petroleum into China. The official commented, however, that China's requirements for most petroleum products are now relatively small. Very little gasoline is needed since most of the automotive transport had been converted to charcoal burners. He commented that Shell still retained some stocks in Shanghai, and the Communist Government had made no moves to requisition them. He was unable to state the quantities or the products. He indicated that these stocks were gradually being sold out and that with the proceeds it has been possible to meet the expense of maintaining Shell's staff in China.

The Embassy will remain alert for any further news and pass it on promptly to the Department.

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Northeast Asian Affairs (Johnson) to the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Merchant)

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] December 21, 1950.

Subject: SCAP Policy on Control of Exports from Japan to Communist China and Hong Kong.

In January 1950, State and Army advised SCAP that: (a) exports of 1A items from Japan to Communist China (including Manchuria) and North Korea should be presumptively denied; (b) controls on 1B items exported from Japan to these destinations should be at least as restrictive as might thereafter be imposed by the UK or Western European countries.

In administering security controls on Japanese exports, SCAP directed the Japanese Government to submit to GHQ for validation applications for export of 1A and 1B items. After June 25, 1950 SCAP withheld action on applications for export of 1B items to Communist China but some 1B items were shipped on the basis of previously validated export licenses. On December 6, 1950, SCAP directed the Japanese Government to suspend exports of goods requiring export licenses to the China mainland (including Hainan and other islands under the control of the Peoples' Government), Manchuria, North Korea, Hong Kong and Macao unless new approval of the Japanese Government and SCAP validation is dated on or after December 6. The few export commodities unaffected by the new restrictions are of little importance in trade with the China mainland. In order to permit a continued flow of normal commodities for domestic consumption in Hong Kong, SCAP has indicated that he intends to license export shipments to that area subject to "absolute guarantees" on end-use from the Hong Kong Government representative in Tokyo.

SCAP has urgently requested information from the Department of Army regarding US policy on types of goods to be licensed and how licenses will be processed, indicating that he intends to be guided closely by US policy. He has been kept fully informed of US actions, including the suspension of licenses amounting virtually to embargo on trade with Communist China and the highly restrictive measures adopted by the Department of Commerce on an "interim, emergency" basis regarding exports, including non-positive-list items, from the US to Hong Kong and Macao.

In the first eight months of 1950, Japanese trade with the areas of interest was as follows (in thousands of dollars)

	Imports from	Exports to
Communist China	28, 140	7, 025
Hong Kong	185	19, 147
All areas (GARIOA imports included)	607, 720	457, 678

Japan's imports from Communist China were less than 5% of her total imports in this period, but were important in supplying to Japan coking coal, iron ore, soybeans and salt available elsewhere only at much higher cost. Trade with Hong Kong, which is conducted on an open account basis, is important to Japan principally as a source of foreign exchange earnings. The imbalance is presumably explained by the fact that while a substantial amount of Japanese goods is sold to other parts of Asia through Hong Kong, imports into Japan are largely procured directly and do not move through the intermediary of Hong Kong. The trade with Communist China has been on a compensating basis, and the apparent imbalance is explained by the lag in Japanese deliveries. If deliveries are not made, China will have claims against Japan which will be a cause of future difficulty.

No comments have been received from SCAP on the latest Department of Commerce regulations sent to him for information on December 15. So long as SCAP refuses to license shipment to the China mainland of items subject to export control, virtually no exports will move from Japan to that area. Nevertheless, action by SCAP in conformity with the US embargo would appear desirable. If, as has been reported, the Chinese Communists are embargoing exports to Japan, a parallel decision by SCAP to suspend all shipments to the mainland of China may be safely assumed, if SCAP has not already done so in view of the US decision.

While the current Department of Commerce policy on US–Hong Kong trade may be unnecessarily restrictive for Japan–Hong Kong trade, it is believed that the Department should not attempt to dissuade SCAP from applying equally severe regulations if he considers it advisable to do so, nor from making such modifications as he deems desirable. Discussions on a somewhat more liberal US policy toward Hong Kong are going forward now and the results will be communicated to SCAP in the near future.

Recommendation: It is recommended that the Department not undertake at this time to advise SCAP on policy for control of exports from Japan to Communist China and Hong Kong, and that it leave the decision to SCAP's discretion under the basic instruction of January 1950.[1]

[1] Mr. Merchant appended the following handwritten note to this memorandum: "I agree—at least until US Govt has hammered out a policy for Hong Kong. In any event we shld keep SCAP informed of all developments here."

POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES WITH RESPECT TO INDOCHINA; UNITED STATES RECOGNITION OF VIETNAM, LAOS, AND CAMBODIA AS ASSOCIATED STATES WITHIN THE FRENCH UNION; THE EXTENSION OF UNITED STATES MILITARY ASSISTANCE TO FRENCH UNION FORCES; UNITED STATES ECONOMIC, MILITARY, AND DIPLOMATIC SUPPORT FOR THE ASSOCIATED STATES[1]

751G.00/1–550

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Butterworth) to the Deputy Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs (Rusk)

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] January 5, 1950.

As you requested of Mr. Lacy,[2] there follows a list of primary short-run questions which we face in Indochina:

(1) Recognition of Vietnam: Our present thinking is in terms of de facto recognition as an associated state in the French Union. The British have informed the French that they will give such recognition to Vietnam as an associated state and apparently plan to implement this recognition by raising their Consul General in Saigon to Minister without, however, establishing a Legation. We feel that we should not go beyond what the British and such Commonwealth countries as follow the UK lead are prepared to do and, in connection with the timing, our move should follow theirs.

(2) Methods of strengthening Bao Dai:[3] After recognition we will be faced, together with other countries which shall have extended recognition, with the problem of strengthening Bao Dai whose measure of indigenous support is unknown but probably small. The methods involve consideration of economic support (which probably can be most effective if confined to the technical field save in the case of ECA), military items, and political moves.

(3) The Chinese Border: Organized units of the Chinese communist army are arriving at the Tonkin border. So far they have given no indication of desiring to cross that border in organized units, even in pursuit of nationalist forces. However, it seems probable that the Chinese communists will supply Ho Chi Minh [4] with arms and military technicians.

We do not know the present degree of cooperation between Ho Chi Minh's communist forces in Indochina and those of the Chinese communists. Presumably, however, this cooperation will grow. It seems unlikely that the French will be able to seal the Indochina border.

The Ambassador in India (Henderson) to the Secretary of State

SECRET NEW DELHI, January 7, 1950—1 p. m.

34. I believe that decision of Department outlined in telegram January 5, 2 a. m.[1] re Vietnam is most constructive that could be taken in circumstances. I believe Nehru[2] will not be pleased for UK and US to go ahead in this matter without regard to line adopted by India; nevertheless, I am convinced time has come for US to follow policies in Asia which are in accord with our concept of world situation regardless of GOI attitudes. Our approach towards international situation for considerable period is certain to be quite different from that of India and for us to make no move without protracted attempts at coordination would result in vacillation and would give impression of lack of convictions.

Although according to this morning's press Nehru stated during press conference yesterday there was no present intention of officially recognizing any government in Indochina, his sympathies for present at least are clearly with Ho Chi-minh. Although from this vantage point it would seem that Bao Dai in view of many factors operating against him has slim chance of survival unless forces opposed to further extension communism in Asia display more decisiveness than in past, nevertheless, our recognition particularly if accompanied by greater display of interest in fate of Vietnam should improve Bao Dai's chances and increase respect for us here even among those who disapprove our policy.

23. Deptel 18, January 7.[1] Discussed with Foreign Minister[2] today situation Indochina and question recognition Bao Dai.

I carefully explained Department's thinking re Bao Dai and that Department planning extend some form recognition after French National Assembly ratification March 8 accords. Also advised him of British intention re recognition as outlined Department's telegram.

[1] Telegram 22 to Manila, January 7, p. 691.
[2] Nai Pote Sarasin.

Foreign Minister replied Thailand Government fully aware gravity IC situation. Nevertheless, they felt could not undertake extend recognition Bao Dai until France actually gave Vietnam freedom, independence and Bao Dai received large measure popular support. In absence these developments, Thailand Government and people would continue feel Bao Dai essentially French puppet who would fail because France had not granted Vietnam that independence to which these people entitled. He said that as far as he could see under such circumstances French colonial control IC would merely be perpetuated. He expressed opinion if French really sincere no reason why an accord could not be reached with Ho Chi Minh and other Vietnam leaders as Dutch had done with Indonesians. He also said it seemed to him the situation IC was one which UN might well endeavor solve, and referred to fine work done by UN Good Offices Commission in Dutch-Indonesian dispute.

Foreign Minister's position precisely same as heretofore on this question, but on this occasion he underscored Thailand Government views with considerable emphasis, and very apparent he not influenced by impending UK de facto recognition or our contemplated action. He emphasized in his opinion recognition Bao Dai by French Government would not materially strengthen Bao Dai, if French granted only trappings of independence.

The Secretary of State to the Embassy in France

SECRET WASHINGTON, January 13, 1950—8 p. m.

186. Fol steps being considered re recognition Vietnam at appropriate time after ratification by Assembly of Mar 8 Agreements:

1) Announcement by Sec of de facto recognition of Vietnam as an associated state in Fr Union.
2) Granting of appropriate rank and title to Consul General Saigon. Dept believes rank and title in this case might be similar to that accorded Brit to their rep after de facto recognition.
3) Reply by President to Bao Dai's letter requesting "establishment of relations." [1]
4) Dept studying question according similar treatment Laos and Cambodia.

Reaction of India, Indonesia, Burma, Thailand and Philippines to recognition Vietnam so far negative and prospects not encouraging.

[1] For a translation of Bao Dai's letter of August 31, 1949, to President Truman, see Foreign Relations, 1949, vol. VII, Part 1, p. 74.

You may discuss foregoing with FonOff and request their views as to most desirable way of handling mechanics of recognition.

Dept assumes that Emb, in its discretion, is exercising such pressure as it deems necessary and useful upon Fr to insure earliest possible ratification Mar 8 Agreements.

Fol are Dept's comments on program for Fr action proposed in numbered Para 8, Embtel 5197, Dec 11: [2]

(b) Dept believes transfer Indochinese affairs to FonOff wld be more helpful than transfer from Min Overseas France to simply another Govt Dept. Dept considers change of latter nature wld be interpreted by US public and SEA countries as only change in name of a section of Min of Overseas France. Dept, however, does not believe US can usefully intervene again on official basis. Emb, therefore, is authorized to take such unofficial and informal action as is possible in the circumstances to obtain shift IC affairs to FonOff if possible (if not some agency other than Overseas France).

(d) Dept uncertain how far Fr Govt prepared to go re public statement of evolutionary character of France's relations with Vietnam. Dept inclined to believe statement wld be more effective if it immediately fol ratification. Penultimate para, New Delhi 34 of Jan 7 gives indication of helpfulness of such statement if it includes concrete plan for further evolution of Vietnam.

Dept hopes that "spontaneous" statement by Auriol or Bidault [3] wld, in addition to elaborating Pignon [4] Dec 30 speech and welcoming independent Vietnam within Fr Union, refer to Mar 8 agreements and supplementary accords as basis for independence within union and indicate that Fr desire their liberal interpretation. Dramatic effect might be enhanced by using statement to announce transfer Vietnam from Overseas France to FonOff (which decision according Embtel 5083, Dec 2,[5] might be executive prerogative. If transfer requires some form Assembly approval inform Dept re procedure and timing).

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs (Perkins) [1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] January 17, 1950.

Participants: Ambassador Bonnet [2]
EUR—Mr. Perkins [3]
WE—Mr. O'Shaughnessy

[1] Drafted by Elim O'Shaughnessy, Officer in Charge of French-Iberian Affairs.
[2] Henri Bonnet, French Ambassador in the United States.
[3] George W. Perkins, Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs.

Ambassador Bonnet called today at my request. I told him that I had looked into the questions that he raised with me on January 11 regarding our plan for the recognition of Vietnam.[4] I told him that the steps being considered in this connection were:

1) Announcement by the Secretary at an appropriate time after ratification of the March 8 Agreements by the French Assembly of de facto recognition of Vietnam as an associated state in the French Union.
2) The granting of appropriate rank and title to the Consul General at Saigon. Ambassador Bonnet asked whether the title would be a diplomatic one and I answered in the affirmative. I also said that we would probably consult with the British in this respect.
3) We are considering similar action with respect to Laos and Cambodia.

With respect to his inquiry regarding the possible application of some part of the $75 million fund provided for under section 303 of the MDAP Act[5] I pointed out that the exact status of this fund was still rather vague. I said that it had been given to the President to dispose of and that the various government departments could do no more than make recommendations for its use. I also pointed out that since France was a beneficiary of the Act under title I it might not be possible legally to make use of these funds to the French and should this prove desirable we might explore the possibilities of using the Government of Vietnam as the recipient. M. Bonnet thought that there would be no objection to such a move. I stressed the fact that nothing that I could say in this respect could be considered in any way a commitment to make these funds available for use in Indochina but that we would, of course, be glad to give consideration to any suggestions which the French Government might have with regard to the best manner in which to improve the situation in that area.

M. Bonnet said that he was very grateful to have our views on the steps to be taken toward the recognition of Bao Dai. He stressed the importance of such recognition in strengthening Bao Dai's hand and pointed out the strong proof of the latter's independence that it would represent. He also said that he would secure from his Government some suggestions as to how aid could be given to Indochina.

[4] A memorandum by Perkins of his conversation with Bonnet on January 11 read as follows: "During the course of my conversation with Ambassador Bonnet, he asked me what our intentions were in connection with the recognition of Bao Dai and said he hoped we would be able to recognize him. He also asked if any of the $75,000,000 appropriated by Congress for aid in the area of China would be available for help in Indochina. In reply to both questions I told Mr. Bonnet that I would look into the situation and would get in touch with him." (751G.02/1–1150)

33. Dept concerned by apparent lack of understanding on part of Thai Fon Min that Ho Chi Minh is not patriotic nationalist but Commie Party member with all the sinister implications involved in the relationship (urtel 23, Jan 12). This apparent indifference to the possible success of one of the strongest Commie leaders in Southeast Asia raises doubts in the Dept of the desirability of strengthening the Thai against Commie aggression if the Thai are actually unaware or indifferent to the approaching menace. On a suitable occasion you shld emphasize the foregoing strongly.

For ur info. Apparently this point of view is common among South Asian nations including India, Burma, Indonesia, and the Philippines, as shown in replies similar to yours from posts in those countries. This general indifference or lack of understanding may prove to be disastrous for those nations as Communism relentlessly advances. It is impossible for the United States to help them resist Communism if they are not prepared to help themselves. All for such action as in circumstances and in your discretion you deem advisable.

43. I believe Department under misapprehension re basic reason for reluctance Thailand and probably other Southeast Asian countries extend recognition Bao Dai. Basic reason is detestation by these countries of colonialism and their repugnance voluntarily to recognize any regime which in their minds represents perpetuation of colonial rule. It is my belief if French forthwith granted Bao Dai real independence as Dutch have to Indos, there would be much less reluctance to extend recognition. In my opinion this feeling is so strong in their minds that it completely outweighs danger Ho Chi Minh establishing Communist Government Indo-China. I believe veiled threats from US withhold assistance these Asian countries would have little influence on their thinking or the position they have adopted on this matter.

25. Personal for Jessup [1] from Butterworth. Abbott [2] will have shown you recent Deptels re Indochina and will fill in local details of current situation.

Dept still hopeful Bao Dai will succeed in gaining increasing popular support at Ho's expense and our policy remains essentially the same; to encourage him and to urge Fr toward further concessions.

The start made by Bao Dai, the qualities exhibited by him, and his initial reception seem to have been better than we might have anticipated, even discounting optimism of Fr sources. Transfer of power apparently well received. Fr success in disarming and interning fleeing Chi Nationalists without serious intervention to the present by Chi Commies also encouraging.

However, more recently, marked opposition has been encountered which demonstrates at least that Bao Dai's popular support has not yet widened. Increased Viet Minh mil activity is disquieting. This cld be special effort by Ho, timed to coincide with transfer of power and the arrival of Chi Commies armies on frontier, and to precede Bangkok Conference,[3] or cld be evidence of increasing strength reinforced by hopes of Chi Commie support, direct or indirect.

Dept has as yet no knowledge of negotiations between Ho and Mao [4] groups although radio intercept of New China News agency release of Jan 17 indicates that Ho has messaged the "govts of the world" that "the Govt of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam is the only legal govt of the Vietnam people" and is "ready to establish dipl relations with any govt which wld be willing to cooperate with her on the basis of equality and mutual respect of national sovereignty and territory so as to defend world peace and democracy." Also pertinent are difficulties of Bao Dai's Prime Minister in forming new Cabinet. The projected govt does not yet reflect the breadth of support, or the participation of high caliber leaders and of key fence-sitters, to the extent which seemed possible after transfer of power.

The recent reported demonstration by 150,000 persons in Saigon (Saigon's tel 29) [6] is also significant to extent that it took on character of anti-Bao Dai demonstration, an angle which Abbott may clarify.

Nature and timing of recognition of Bao Dai now under consideration here and with other govts. Fr apparently believe recognition by Western and Commonwealth nations wld aid shift of Vietnam Nationalist sentiment toward Bao Dai. They seem receptive to idea of stating intention to extend further concessions to Vietnam and we will continue to encourage them to do so. Fr hope Bao Dai's Vietnam Govt will then be regarded by well-disposed nations as having attributes of sovereignty while remaining within the framework of the Fr Union.

Brit had intended extend de facto recognition after Ceylon Conference, at which MacDonald [7] urged action endorsing Bao Dai. However, either because of the lack of enthusiasm of some delegations and the opposition of India, or because Fr had not yet ratified Mar 8 Agreements, recognition not yet accorded. Brit had contemplated a two stage program and planned to impress on Fr need to "facilitate" de jure recognition by ratification, by transferring Vietnamese affairs to Fon Ministry, by granting Bao Dai fuller powers in re to dipl representation abroad and in general according him the attributes of full sovereignty.

Presumably Commonwealth will fol UK lead on whichever line is eventually adopted except India, which will continue intransigent, and Pakistan, reported undecided.

Fr ratification expected late Jan. Dept still uncertain nature and extent of evolutionary statement Fr might then make.

Memorandum by Mr. Edmund A. Gullion[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] January 26, 1950.

Subject: Form of Recognition of Viet Nam

Since it is the policy of this government to support a program of Franco-Vietnamese collaboration leading toward full Vietnamese independence within the French Union, it seems to me that the selection of a form of recognition for the Vietnamese government should be governed by three principal considerations: what form of recognition would (a) most strengthen Bao Dai, (b) be best coordinated with the British and other friendly powers, and (c) be more likely to encourage other South Asian nations to recognize.

[1] Mr. Gullion, designated Counsel at Saigon on December 7, 1949, left the United States for Viet-Nam in early February, stopping in Paris en route. On February 13, he was appointed Consul General at Saigon. With United States recognition of the Governments of Viet-Nam, Laos, and Cambodia on February 7, Mr. Gullion became Chargé d'Affaires ad interim.

This memorandum was directed to William S. B. Lacy, Acting Director of the Office of Philippine and Southeast Asian Affairs, and Elim O'Shaughnessy, Officer in Charge of French-Iberian Affairs.

I submit that de jure recognition should be preferred for the following reasons:

1) De facto recognition would damage Bao Dai's standing and prejudice his chances of success. As the French have pointed out to us in their request that we give de jure recognition to Viet Nam, the subtle legal distinctions between de facto and de jure recognition would not be apparent in Southeast Asia and our action would be taken as a grudging acceptance at best. The effect might be gauged from the view of the Indian Consul General in Saigon who has reported that the GOI, which has steadily opposed the Bao Dai solution, could never be expected to go beyond de facto recognition, which he says would probably do Bao Dai more harm than good.

2) De facto recognition, in the popular understanding of the term, would mean that Bao Dai was in fact in control of certain areas and that we recognized him to that extent only. The question would certainly arise, and not only in Communist propaganda, as to whether, in fact, Ho Chi Minh was not in control of a greater area and a greater number of souls than Bao Dai.

3) What we are witnessing in the transfer of power from the French to the state of Viet Nam is in truth a de jure solution—perhaps one which is yet to be fully established in fact. With due observance of legal form the French are handing over sovereignty to an associated state of the French Union. De jure recognition is therefore more consistent with the existing triangular relationship among ourselves, Viet Nam and the French.

4) While the British have not yet indicated finally which form of recognition they propose to extend, they will probably come to the de jure solution. It will be recalled that they had thought of de facto recognition purely in terms of an interim action following the Ceylon Conference but prior to ratification by the French of the March 8 Agreements. We are informed that they intended to give de jure recognition eventually and that they hope to "facilitate" this by urging the French toward rapid ratification and further concessions to Viet Nam. It is understood that all the Asiatic delegations at the Ceylon Conference, with the exception of the Indians, had accepted this position.

5) The British recognize the Chinese Communists de jure. I don't know what form we will eventually use. I do not believe we would want to see Bao Dai receive any lesser recognition than the Chinese Communists and de facto recognition would be considered a lesser recognition.

6) Technically, I suppose that the case for de jure recognition might be better if all the supplementary accords had been ratified and if there had been some form of ratification by the Vietnamese; but to wait upon these formalities would be to lose much of the advantage of our early recognition and might hurt Bao Dai's chances at this crucial time. There is also the question of the French Constitution which appears to limit the exercise of sovereignty in international relations by States within the French Union. It is true that this new state becomes something less independent than a dominion in the Commonwealth or than the Republic of Indonesia, but I do not see why de jure recognition can not be extended to an evolving state at any stage in its evolution, when it is clearly in our interests to do so.

SECRET SAIGON, January 29, 1950—noon.

65. From Jessup. Just returned from Hanoi where read message Bao Dai 27th and left copy in French and English.[1] He made no formal reply and merely asked me to transmit thanks to Secretary. Text carried local press Hanoi morning 28th without comment. Bao Dai handed me comprehensive memo re Point Four and which is being pouched.[2] Introductory part contains surprisingly accurate appreciation both UN and US programs. Memo includes detailed specific requests for aid on which Abbott will report later. Striking aspect is emphasis on need military aid. This gave me opportunity at second interview morning 28th to stress cooperation aspect of whole program and necessity continuing reliance on French. Bao Dai stressed desire close US ties and this theme repeated by other officials in response to which I kept stressing need for cooperation with French also. Our reception was very elaborately planned with tremendous display of special street banners of welcome in English and American flags flying all through city even in parts which were not cleared and prepared for my visit. Gibson[3] remarks preparation much more

[1] In accordance with instructions contained in telegrams 27 and 29 to Saigon (January 21 and 23), neither printed, Jessup delivered the following message:

"The Secretary of State, Dean Acheson, has instructed me to express to Your Majesty the gratification of the United States Government at the assumption by Your Majesty of the powers transferred by the French Republic at the beginning of this year, and its confident best wishes for the future of the State of Viet Nam with which it looks forward to establishing a closer relationship. My Government believes that both the people of Viet Nam and the people of France are to be congratulated on this development.

"The Secretary of State also asked me to express his personal hopes that Your Majesty will succeed in his present endeavors to establish stability and prosperity in Viet Nam, which, Your Majesty may be assured, my Government is following with close attention."

The text of this statement was released by Bao Dai on January 27 and by the Department of State on January 30.

The powers transferred by France to Viet-Nam on the first of the year were set forth in 27 agreements signed by French and Vietnamese representatives at Saigon on December 29, 1949. These conventions dealt with aspects of military, economic, judicial, financial, and cultural affairs, as well as with public works, public health, information, and personnel matters.

[2] The memorandum was transmitted in despatch No. 54 from Saigon, February 11; the enclosure does not accompany the despatch in the files of the Department of State (851G.00/2–1150). The memorandum is summarized in telegram 69 from Saigon, January 31, p. 707.

elaborate and pro-American feeling much more evident than preparation and British feeling when MacDonald was here.[4]

Bao Dai makes favorable impression sincerity and understanding of problems but not of great force or great strength. Chief problem is winning fence sitters to his side. French ratification March 8 Agreements will help but more gestures needed from them. Viets seem to attach great importance our recognition. Although Bao Dai's actual and potential authority somewhat dubious to me, since decision already made to recognize we should move just as quickly as French action permits. Pressure on French in Paris should continue. Have urged our point of view on Pignon and other French officials here. Suggest message of recognition should stress fact it results from their actual achievement independence and our sympathy their national aspirations.

438. Re Lond's 479, rptd Paris 137, Jan 27.[1] Fol comments on recognition Viet Nam shld be passed to Brit:

As Dept understands it the purpose of according recognition to Bao Dai is to give him stature in the eyes of non-communist nationalists elements in Viet Nam and thus increase his following. This being the case recognition, if accorded by U.K. or ourselves, wld appear most effective if given without any strings attached, i.e. the de facto step contemplated by Brit as a bargaining point with the Fr in order obtain further concessions. Dept has come to view that the Fr have for the moment gone as far as they can in according independence. This does not mean of course that either we, the Brit or the Fr shld not continue to view the Mar 8 Agreements as an evolutionary step in the independence of Viet Nam.

We are of course aware of fact that the UK does not have unanimous support of the commonwealth re recognition and that no formula re Viet Nam cld be found at Colombo acceptable to all participants. We nevertheless believe that a straightforward recognition without the qualification of de facto, or for that matter de jure, wld best serve our and UK interests and this viewpoint shld be pressed upon the commonwealth govts. In this connection, it shld be borne in mind that simultaneous recognition will have to be accorded to Laos and Cambodia, whose govts fulfill the requirements for the "de jure" status. The Mao Tse Tung govt on the other hand appears indeed to be a "de facto" form of govt altho it was simply "recognized" without qualifications.

Along the lines above Dept is of opinion that merely to give the UK ConGen in Saigon the "courtesy rank of minister" is a skittish and timorous approach to problem of according diplomatic recognition to Viet Nam which wld tend in large measure to negate the benefits of such recognition. Dept considering making ConGen Saigon a diplomatic agent accredited to all 3 govts with personal rank of minister if this appears indicated.

Note accordingly has been sent to Soviet Embassy and will be released to press tonight.

Undoubtedly action of Soviet Government in recognizing Ho Chi-minh and thereby attacking integrity of French Union will induce violent reaction in France and will make more definite and bitter the alignment of French non-Communist against Communists.

Recent debate in National Assembly upon ratification of March 8 accords in course of which Communists even more blatantly than usual displayed their complete subservience to Moscow and their avowed intention to betray French national interests had considerable effect throughout country in demonstrating that they constitute in effect an alien and seditious organism within this democracy. Also their declared purpose to delay, frustrate and sabotage shipment not only of arms to French soldiers in Indochina but of American military materials to France has met with vigorous response from government which has pledged itself to allow no such interruptions or incidents to occur.

It was under conditions far less insulting than this that French tempers so flared up in 1870 that Bismarck found it easy to provoke a war. No such reaction is to be expected today, but this event will undoubtedly strengthen the will of the people and their government here to resist and contain Communist pressures.

I think it important that our government should stigmatize in strongest terms this act as breach of recognized principles of international relations, and as conducive to creating conditions of disorder threatening to world peace that Russians are always proclaiming with great thumping of breasts to be cardinal objectives of their foreign policy.

We may soon be faced with situation similar to that formerly prevailing in Greece and even in Spain. The March 8 accords should be ratified by Council of Republic on Friday of this week. Our recognition of Bao Dai and of Cambodia and Laos should follow immediately thereafter. After that if any measure of military and/or economic aid to Bao Dai is contemplated it would seem advisable that it be announced at once and extended as soon as possible.

It may well be that grave as are the worldwide implications of this Russian move, one beneficial result may emerge, namely, a quickening of national pride in France which will make a more cohensive and determined policy toward Russia and Communism generally popular.

The Consul General at Saigon (Abbott) to the Secretary of State

SECRET SAIGON, January 31, 1950—10 a. m.

67. At suggestion Ambassador Jessup am furnishing brief summary most important points brought out in conversations he had with French and Vietnam officials.

Pignon stressed particularly strategic importance Vietnam in SEA and fact that French troops IC only military force of importance in entire area. French accordingly feel it is of interest to US and other western powers to assist France both militarily and politically. Pignon, General Carpentier,[1] General Alessandri[2] all stressed that task French troops to defend IC against international Communism as personified by Chinese Communist and not reconquest IC. No specific request for military assistance submitted but General Carpentier described his equipment particularly transport as dating from 1943 and 1944 practically worn out.

Political help desired is recognition Bao Dai and clear indication from US that aggression against IC will not be permitted. General Carpentier in private conversation emphasized that flower of French Army in IC instead of on Rhine and that losses are serious at current rate officer casualties equivalent to number graduated annually from St. Cyr. Mentioned growing dissatisfaction of French public opinion with cost in men and money of IC campaign and resentment of lack of understanding and sympathy for French sacrifices on part US.

In commenting on Ambassador Jessup's exposé of American policy (largely based on Deptel 25 January 20) Pignon said ratification accords in process transfer Indochina affairs out of MOF supported by him and he believed in process of implementation. Announcement re evolutionary nature French policy IC would be difficult because of internal French political situation. Moreover he could see certain disadvantages such statement at this time. He feared it would bring forth new wave of demands from Vietnamese when what was needed was to get down to work and put present agreements into effect. He recognized frankly that further concessions would have to and should be made at some future date.

Carpentier announced that on February 15 Hatien and Rachgia provinces would be turned over to Vietnam Government for pacification in same manner Cambodian provinces turned over last fall. Admitted that these were the two areas where Vietminh strongest but said this would be all the better test of oft repeated Vietnam contention that only thing preventing pacification was continued presence French troops.

In final conversation with Pignon he stressed seriousness Chinese threat and his feeling there remained only few weeks and perhaps only days for western powers to coordinate policy if serious and perhaps disastrous developments to be avoided. This statement and tone it was made in was in sharp contrast to Pignon's usual optimistic and unsensational manner.

Question of establishing Vietnam army and particularly supply of arms therefore figured prominently in conversations with Bao Dai Nguyen Phan Long[3] and Governors Huu[4] Giao[5] and Tri.[6] Fundamental problem is supply of officers and NCO's. Vietnamese admitted they lack trained men but claim for political psychological reasons they hesitate accept French cadres. French unwilling to supply arms for new units unless certain percentage Foreign officers accepted for period till Vietnam cadres can be trained. One school in operation Hue and another opening Hanoi next month. Specific request for American arms and American military mission contained in long memo furnished Ambassador Jessup by Bao Dai the summary of which under preparation.[7] Bao Dai did not insist on this point when Ambassador pointed out difficulties. Nguyen Phan Long spoke particularly of need for light arms for village militia in liberated areas as did Governor Tri.

Bao Dai claimed great bulk of non-Communist nationalists had decided in his favor but were waiting for ratification March 8 agreements international recognition and indication that he was strong enough to protect them from both Communist and French. Claims Ho Chi Minh had received instructions to infiltrate his government at all costs and for this reason he must be extremely cautious in his dealings with resistance. Bao Dai made it clear that he would not deal with Ho Chi Minh or his Communist associates under any circumstances since he was aware of their complete subordination to Moscow from period when he was in close association with Ho immediately following his abdication (which he admitted was voluntary).

Both French and Vietnamese were highly optimistic regarding pacification of Cochinchina. (Nguyen Phan Long spoke of completion in six months.) Also agreed that expulsion Vietminh forces from Tonkin delta nearing completion but Governor Tri worried over relief and reconstruction problem devastated areas taken over (all agreed situation in north Annam bad). French blamed it on ineptitude Governor Giao. Latter blames refusal French to furnish him sufficient arms of good quality.

Reception of Ambassador Jessup extremely impressive and enthusiastic and believe visit has greatly boosted prestige Bao Dai.

The Consul General at Saigon (Abbott) to the Secretary of State

SECRET SAIGON, January 31, 1950—4 p. m.

69. Following is summary of 108-page typed manuscript dealing with Vietnam's needs for economic and military assistance from US presented by Bao Dai to Jessup.

Foreword reviews growing recognition by all nations of need and urgency of economic development backward areas and steps taken by UN and US revealing good understanding differences between UN program and US point 4 and between latter and military aid program. Also, reveals understanding emphasis private capitalists' realization need for Vietnam to do full share in development and need for reforms to counteract Communist propaganda and spell. States purpose manuscript is to place needs and statement of resources Vietnam before US in order to obtain financial and technical assistance for economic revival and pacification.

Preface first emphasizes that Vietnam is advance bastion against "Bolshevist" tide in SEA; second, that struggle of Vietnamese against France has been nationalist struggle for freedom. Emphasizes non-Communist nature, pointing out bulk of population is agricultural which repudiates collectivism, that intellectuals split between supporters of Bao Dai and those awaiting opportunity to declare for him; that even among supporters of Ho only small fraction real Communists and that mistaken nationalists misguided in belief they can work with Communists, but who with attainment of objectives by Bao Dai will become supporters instead of apparent enemies of Government. Political, financial, economic and possibly military aid listed as contributions other nations, particularly US, in attainment independence recognition, admission to international organizations, and protection of northern frontier, the objectives of Government.

Balance of study divided in two parts. Part one states country rich but undeveloped, averring French failed to industrialize except for own benefit. Resources listed as: (1) industrious and abundant population; (2) agricultural resources 5.5 million hectares cultivated land producing rice, corn, rubber, pepper, woods, etc., production of which could be greatly increased by seed selection, fertilization, irrigation, drainage, mechanization, etc.; (3) mineral resources largely undeveloped; (4) various industries largely controlled by French; (5) artisan and skilled labor in specialized fields numbering 1.3 million in 1937; (6) Foreign commerce with active balance prior to war but an increasingly passive balance since the war which threatens economic chaos.

Part two lists needs as: (1) pacification involving: (a) political persuasion faithful application March 8 accords by French to give complete independence and explanation of true Communist aims; (b) military suppression of Communists, which can only be accomplished by Vietnamese, not by French who hampered by inability as whites to engage in guerrilla tactics, their aspect of conquerors, etc. Ho's forces estimated at 100,000 as opposed to 40,000 Vietnamese with inferior equipment. Thus needs listed as equipment for present and increased regular ground forces supporting naval and air forces militia and self-defense corps as well as US military mission to give instruction.

(2) Reconstruction involving war against Communism by war against misery and hunger. Report lists losses since war as villages destroyed, fields uncultivated, destruction livestock, implements, communications, etc. and sets up priority list for immediate rehabilitation needs as: (a) housing; (b) communications; (c) education and sanitation; (d) agriculture; total cost in millions of piasters 135.

(3) Vietnamese participation in existing industry (mines, rubber plantations, cotton, cement, rice, milling, etc. industries); (a) creation of national airline and a maritime transport to include four to six planes and two to four Liberty ships.

Recapitulation requirements:

(1) Equipment for 120,000 regular army with supporting air force, one armored division, one parachute division and 1,000 trucks.
(2) Light equipment for 90,000 militia including rifles, automatic arms, mortars, infantry cannons, pistols, grenades.
(3) Equipment for 75,000-man self-defense corps including rifles, automatic arms, grenades.
(4) Aviation—10 reconnaissance plans, 20 DC–3 transports and 3 DC–4 transports.
(5) Naval 10 LCl, 20 LCM, 10 small craft and matériel.

Conclusion states willing accept suggestions, emphasizes this is first stage of program and that as Government receipts not fixed Vietnam participation not clear. No estimates total cost to US of military aid.

My comments follow: preface and foreword reveal clear understanding role of UN and US in economic aid, understanding US MAP, nature problem of Communism and unique position Vietnam at this stage.

Body of report dealing with local resources built around pre-war and mid-war statistics, some of which no longer applicable, some apparently in error, and others which cannot be checked, but general picture correct.

Section dealing with needs correctly emphasizes importance of pacification and immediate rehabilitation.

Bombshells include plans to obtain direct participation in French-owned enterprises and fact French totally ignored in whole program of requirements. May incidentially add Jessup was most discouraging in talks re US military mission and emphasized need to channel requests for military aid through French.

Apparently study drafted by Tonkinese in view emphasis on Tonkin; however, should be realized that bulk of industrial potential of area is in Tonkin.

Only copy of memorandum available being pouched addressed Jessup.

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Eastern European Affairs (Yost) to the Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs (Perkins)[1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] January 31, 1950.

Soviet recognition of the Ho-Chi-Minh regime in Indo-China, following the precipitate recognition of the Indonesian Republic, seems both significant and ominous. During discussions of Indonesia at the recent UN General Assembly, Soviet representatives described the republican government as a puppet regime and as traitors to the Indonesian people. Soviet propaganda continued to denounce the regime up until a few hours before the sudden recognition.

In Indo-China, Ho has until recently been careful to avoid avowing his Communist connection and Soviet propaganda, while praising the "national liberation movement" in Indo-China, has refrained from treating Ho's regime as a government. Now, however, within a few days after recognition of Ho by the Chinese Communists, the Russians follow suit. This contrasts with the cautious Soviet policy in regard to Greece where, though they supported Markos over a long period, they never recognized his regime as a government.

This Soviet action re Indo-China and Indonesia would seem to indicate, not only the anticipated intention to accelerate the revolutionary process in South East Asia while the area remains in its present fluid and relatively unprotected state, but also an element of competition between the two Communist powers for the leadership and direction of the revolutionary movement in South East Asia. It seems altogether possible that the Soviet action may have arisen from disputes during the present negotiations in Moscow as to who should in fact assume the leadership of this movement. It seems likely that the Soviets may have hoped to direct the movement through the Asian branch of the WFTU, which met last autumn in Peiping, but, finding the Chinese Communists disposed to go ahead somewhat on their own, decided that direct and open Soviet action was necessary.

While this not unexpected competition between the Soviets and Chinese communists for leadership in South East Asia bodes well for the creation of friction between the two and the possible eventual development of Titoism in China, its immediate effects are likely to be unfortunate in that the revolutionary time-table in that area may be speeded up by the maneuvers of each of the two partners to forestall the other.

All these considerations of course confirm the conclusion that Indo-China may now be the focal point of the most intensive and determined Communist pressure. The danger is compounded by the fact that most experts concerned in South East Asia believe that if Indo-China should fall wholly into the hands of the Communists, it is extremely doubtful that Thailand, Burma, and perhaps other adjacent areas, could long be held.

CHARLES W. YOST

Editorial Note

On February 1, 1950, the Department of State released the following statement by Secretary Acheson: "The recognition by the Kremlin of Ho Chi Minh's Communist movement in Indochina comes as a surprise. The Soviet acknowledgment of this movement should remove any illusions as to the 'nationalist' nature of Ho Chi Minh's aims and reveals Ho in his true colors as the mortal enemy of native independence in Indochina.

"Although timed in an effort to cloud the transfer of sovereignty by France to the legal Governments of Laos, Cambodia, and Viet Nam, we have every reason to believe that those legal governments will proceed in their development toward stable governments representing the true nationalist sentiments of more than 20 million peoples of Indochina.

"French action in transferring sovereignty to Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia has been in process for some time. Following French ratification, which is expected within a few days, the way will be open for recognition of these legal governments by the countries of the world whose policies support the development of genuine national independence in former colonial areas.

"Ambassador Jessup has already expressed to Emperor Bao Dai our best wishes for prosperity and stability in Viet Nam and the hope that closer relationship will be established between Viet Nam and the United States."

Problem Paper Prepared by a Working Group in the Department of State [1]

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] February 1, 1950.

MILITARY AID FOR INDOCHINA

I. THE PROBLEM

Should the United States provide military aid in Indochina and, if so, how much and in what way.

[1] This paper was prepared by a working group consisting of representatives of the Office of Western European Affairs, the Office of Philippine and Southeast Asian Affairs, and the Mutual Defense Assistance Program. Copies were made available on the working level to the Office of Military Assistance, Department of Defense.

II. ASSUMPTION

A. There will not be an effective split between the USSR and Communist China within the next three years.

B. The USSR will not declare war on any Southeast Asian country within the next three years.

C. Communist China will not declare war on any Southeast Asian country within the next three years.

D. The USSR will endeavor to bring about the fall of Southeast Asian governments which are opposed to Communism by using all devices short of war, making use of Communist China and indigenous communists in this endeavor.

III. FACTS BEARING ON THE PROBLEM

1. When the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949 was being written, the question of providing military aid to Southeast Asia was examined and it was decided not to include specific countries in that area, other than the Republic of the Philippines.

2. The attitude of the Congress toward the provision of military and economic aid to foreign countries recently has stiffened due to both economy and to policy considerations.

3. At the same time, the Congress has shown considerable dissatisfaction with policies which are alleged to have contributed to the Communist success in China and which are involved in the current United States' approach toward the question of Formosa.

4. Section 303 of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949 makes available to the President the sum of $75 million for use, at the President's discretion, in the general area of China to advance the purposes and policies of the United Nations.

5. Section 303 funds are unrestricted in their use.

6. The British Commonwealth Conference recently held at Colombo recognized that no SEA regional military pact now exists due to divergent interest and that such an arrangement was now unlikely.

7. Communism has made important advances in the Far East during the past year.

8. Opposition to Communism in Indochina is actively being carried on by the three legally-constituted governments of Vietnam, Cambodia and Laos.

9. Communist-oriented forces in Indochina are being aided by Red China and the USSR.

IV. DISCUSSION

1. Indochina has common border with China and Burma, thus making it subject to invasion by Red China.

2. Its population is some 27 million concentrated in the delta regions of the Mekong and Red Rivers. Of the total population, Chinese account for between 600,000 and a million, concentrated largely in the cities.

3. Indochina has an agricultural economy based principally on rice of which it is an exporter. World War II and its aftermath seriously disrupted the national economy. The country presently has an annual trade deficit of about $85 million.

4. There are three subdivisions of Indochina: Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia. An agreement was signed March 8, 1949, between France and Vietnam which provides for the latter to become an Associated State within the French Union. Ratification of the Agreement, followed by the recognition of the Vietnam by the West, is expected in the near future. French policy aims at making Laos and Cambodia Associated States within the French Union at the same time.

5. Governmental stability is poor in Indochina. In Vietnam, less than one-third of the country is controlled by the legal government with the French in control of the major cities; in Cambodia and Laos, the French maintain order but unrest is endemic. Before World War II Indochina was made up of four French Protectorates (Tonkin, Annam, Laos and Cambodia) and the colony of Cochinchina. It was occupied after the war by Chinese troops in the north (Tonkin) and by British and later French in the south. In 1946 a (nationalist coalition) government headed by the Moscow-trained Communist agent Ho Chi Minh consented to the return to the north (Tonkin) of the French upon promises of independence within the French Union. French negotiations with Ho were broken off following the massacre of many foreigners in Tonkin and Cochinchina in December 1946 by Ho's forces. Hostilities have continued to date.

6. The French are irrevocably committed in Indochina and have sponsored Bao Dai as a move aimed at achieving non-Communist political stability. It was a case of backing Bao Dai or accepting the Communist government of Ho Chi Minh. This latter alternative was impossible not only because it would obviously make their position in Indochina untenable but would also open the door to complete Communist domination of Southeast Asia. Such a communist advance would have severe repercussions in the non-communist world.

7. Military operations in Indochina represented a franc drain on the French Treasury of the equivalent of approximately $475 million in 1949. This constitutes nearly half of the current French Military Budget.

8. Ho Chi Minh, a Moscow-trained Communist, controls the Viet Minh movement which is in conflict with the government of Bao Dai for control of Vietnam. Ho actually exercises control of varying degree over more than two-thirds of Vietnam territory and his "government" maintains agents in Thailand, Burma and India. This communist "government" has been recognized by Communist China and the USSR.

9. Most Indochinese, both the supporters of Bao Dai and those of Ho Chi Minh, regard independence from the French as their primary objective. Protection from Chinese Communist imperialism has been considered, up to now, a secondary issue.

10. Unavoidably, the United States is, together with France, committed in Indochina. That is, failure of the French Bao Dai "experiment" would mean the communization of Indochina. It is Bao Dai (or a similar anti-communist successor) or Ho Chi Minh (or a similar communist successor); there is no other alternative. The choice confronting the United States is to support the French in Indochina or face the extension of Communism over the remainder of the continental area of Southeast Asia and, possibly, farther westward. We then would be obliged to make staggering investments in those areas and in that part of Southeast Asia remaining outside Communist domination or withdraw to a much-contracted Pacific line. It would seem a case of "Penny wise, Pound foolish" to deny support to the French in Indochina.

11. The US plans on extending recognition to the newly-created states of Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia, following French legislative action which is expected in early February 1950.

12. Another approach to the problem is to apply the practical test of probability of success. In the present case we know from the complex circumstances involved that the French are going to make literally every possible effort to prevent the victory of Communism in Indochina. Briefly, then, we would be backing a determined protagonist in this venture. Added to this is the fact that French military leaders such as General Cherrière [2] are soberly confident that, in the absence of an invasion in mass from Red China, they (the French) can be successful in their support of the anti-Communist governments in Indochina.

13. Still another approach to the problem is to recall that the United States has undertaken to provide substantial aid to France in Europe. Failure to support French policy in Indochina would have the effect of contributing toward the defeat of our aims in Europe.

V. CONCLUSIONS

A. Significant developments have taken place in Indochina since the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949 was drawn up, these changes warranting a reexamination of the question of military aid.

B. The whole of Southeast Asia is in danger of falling under Communist domination.

[2] Chief of the Premier's Permanent Military Staff.

C. The countries and areas of Southeast Asia are not at present in a position to form a regional organization for self-defense nor are they capable of defending themselves against militarily aggressive Communism, without the aid of the great powers. Despite their lack of military strength, however, there is a will on the part of the legal governments of Indochina toward nationalism and a will to resist whatever aims at destroying that nationalism.

D. The French native and colonial troops presently in Indochina are engaged in military operations aimed at denying the expansion southward of Communism from Red China and of destroying its power in Indochina.

E. In the critical areas of Indochina France needs aid in its support of the legally-constituted anti-Communist states.

VI. RECOMMENDATIONS

1. The United States should furnish military aid in support of the anti-Communist nationalist governments of Indochina, this aid to be tailored to meet deficiencies toward which the United States can make a unique contribution, not including United States troops.

2. This aid should be financed out of funds made available by Section 303 of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949.

Memorandum by the Secretary of State to the President [1]

RESTRICTED WASHINGTON, February 2, 1950.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRESIDENT

Subject: U.S. Recognition of Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia

1. The French Assembly (Lower House) ratified on 29 January by a large majority (396–193) the bill which, in effect, established Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia as autonomous states within the French Union. The opposition consisted of 181 Communist votes with only 12 joining in from other parties. The Council of the Republic (Senate) is expected to pass the bills by the same approximate majority on or about February 3. President Auriol's [2] signature is expected to follow shortly thereafter.[3]

2. The French legislative and political steps thus taken will transform areas which were formerly governed as Protectorates or Colonies into states within the French Union, with considerably more freedom than they enjoyed under their prior status. The French Government has indicated that it hopes to grant greater degrees of independence to the three states as the security position in Indochina allows, and as the newly formed governments become more able to administer the areas following withdrawal of the French.

3. Within Laos and Cambodia there are no powerful movements directed against the governments, which are relatively stable. However, Vietnam has been the battleground since the end of World War II of conflicting political parties and military forces. Ho Chi Minh, who under various aliases, has been a communist agent in various parts of the world since 1925 and was able to take over the anti-French nationalist movement in 1945. After failing to reach agreement with the French regarding the establishment of an autonomous state of Vietnam, he withdrew his forces to the jungle and hill areas of Vietnam and has harassed the French ever since. His followers who are estimated at approximately 75,000 armed men, with probably the same number unarmed. His headquarters are unknown.

The French counter efforts have included, on the military side, the deployment of approximately 130,000 troops, of whom the approximately 50,000 are local natives serving voluntarily, African colonials, and a hardcore made up of French troops and Foreign Legion units. Ho Chi Minh's guerrilla tactics have been aimed at denying the French control of Vietnam. On March 8, 1949 the French President signed an agreement with Bao Dai as the Head of State, granting independence within the French Union to the Government of Vietnam. Similar agreements were signed with the King of Laos [4] and the King of Cambodia.[5]

Recent developments have included Chinese Communist victories bringing those troops to the Indochina border; recognition of Ho Chi Minh as the head of the legal Government of Vietnam by Communist China (18 January) and by Soviet Russia (30 January).

4. Recognition by the United States of the three legally constituted governments of Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia appears desirable and in accordance with United States foreign policy for several reasons. Among them are: encouragement to national aspirations under non-Communist leadership for peoples of colonial areas in Southeast Asia; the establishment of stable non-Communist governments in areas adjacent to Communist China; support to a friendly country which is also a signatory to the North Atlantic Treaty; and as a demonstration of displeasure with Communist tactics which are obviously aimed at eventual domination of Asia, working under the guise of indigenous nationalism.

Subject to your approval, the Department of State recommends that the United States of America extend recognition to Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia, following ratification by the French Government.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs (Perkins)[1]

CONFIDENTIAL [WASHINGTON,] February 2, 1950.

Participants: Ambassador Bonnet
Assistant Secretary Perkins
Mr. O'Shaughnessy—WE

Ambassador Bonnet called today at my request. I told him that in view of the rapidity with which events were moving in connection with the ratification of the March 8 Agreements between President Auriol and Bao Dai I wanted to bring to his attention once again the concern of the Department over the prompt transferal of Indochinese affairs from the Ministry of Overseas France to the French Foreign Office. M. Bonnet replied that his government was aware of our views in this respect and that those views had been made clear to M. Schuman[2] by the Secretary and by officers in the Department to members of his Embassy at various times in recent months. He said that he did not have any recent information in the premises but thought the matter was being discussed in the French cabinet and that consideration was also being given to the handling of Indochinese affairs by a new agency somewhat similar to the British Dominions Office.

I told M. Bonnet that I thought it would be more helpful to Bao Dai in building up the appearance of Viet Nam's independent status if transfer were to the Foreign Office rather than to a specially created ministry. In any case I stressed that the transfer of Indochina's relations from the Ministry of Overseas France was a matter of urgency.

M. Bonnet requested an indication of our latest views on recognition of Bao Dai in view of the fact that the Council of the Republic had ratified the agreements and Mr. Auriol would probably sign the instrument of ratification today or tomorrow. I told him that we were considering recognition at a very early date but added that we thought it was in the best interests of the United States and of Bao Dai for us not to take the lead in according recognition. I indicated that our recognition would probably follow shortly after, or perhaps simultaneously with, the British and I added that it was our hope that one of the South Asian nations might precede us also.

M. Bonnet said that he would not fail once again to bring our views on the transfer from the Ministry of Overseas France to the attention of his government.

At the Cabinet meeting this morning the President asked me to present the question of recognizing the Governments of Laos, Cambodia and Viet Nam, and this I did, giving the background and general appraisal of the situation.

The President then asked for the opinion of each member of the Cabinet. All members present believed that the only possible course was to proceed with recognition although they fully realized the hazards involved.

After considering the advice of the Cabinet, the President directed me to proceed in accordance with our recommendation to him.

Understand British expect to announce recognition Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia this evening or tomorrow. Believe it extremely important our recognition be given if possible today. Under existing circumstances any evolutionary statement impossible at least for present. Auriol's signature was announced here Thursday morning [2] and Department so informed. British had made same representations as ourselves about an evolutionary statement but are going ahead nevertheless with recognition. I have personally on many occasions urged advisability of such statement on Auriol, Bidault, Schuman, Letourneau [3] and others but can assure you that repetition of such request would at present time be useless although we shall continue pressure on this point. Strongly recommend immediate recognition.

585. Parodi received Gullion this morning and in reviewing international situation in Indochina on eve recognition three new states by US and principal Commonwealth powers spoke in following terms:

"US and UK asked two things of us in connection your recognition New Indochina states. First was evolutionary statement. We have not made this statement. Because of situation both in France and Indochina we cannot call our shots. We cannot tell French Parliament that agreements they have just, after much soul searching, ratified are of merely passing value; on eve highly delicate inter-state conference during which allocation of principal economic controls (currency, customs, immigration, etc.) as between France and three states and as between three states themselves is to be made, we cannot afford to kindle unrealistic nationalist appetites whose necessary disappointment by us would have retrograde rather than progressive effects out there at a time when cohesive effort is more than ever necessary. Our intentions are evolutionary as results will show. For instance, we have already told Vietnamese they can establish diplomatic Missions in Washington and London, which constitutes important extension of March 8 agreements. Similar extensions will inevitably follow as justified. Secondly you asked that control of Indochina affairs be transferred from Overseas France Ministry to Quai D'Orsay. This is well on its way to realization and there is agreement in principle that undersecretaryship for the three associate states under Foreign Office will be established. This is of course political and not administrative question. I am hopeful that occasion offered by reshuffling of Bidault Cabinet which is now occurring will not be missed. Events in Indochina have taken a dramatic turn which poses very serious problems for us and for principal non-Communist powers. As I have told your Ambassador, we intend, after profound and thoughtful consideration among ourselves of all elements of situation, to request your views and those of British. Just what form this consultation will take, whether through diplomatic channels or by proposal by us for three way talks, has not been decided."

620. Couve de Murville [1] yesterday asked Bohlen [2] to come to see him in order to give him some further details concerning French thinking in regard to general situation in Indochina with particular reference to forthcoming requests from French Government for the views of and consultation with British and American Governments reported in Embassy's 521, February 2 on this subject.[3]

Couve first said that he was speaking in personal capacity since there was governmental crisis and Mr. Schuman was ill. He said it seems to be the general consensus of French official opinion that the Russians would not have recognized Ho Chi Minh with all the possible consequences diplomatically and politically unless they intended to do what they could within limits to insure his success in Indochina, that this meant in all probability a considerable increase in military assistance to Ho via or by the Chinese Communists. Couve stated that if this should prove to be the case, it was possible that France would find it very difficult to continue to hold the fort in Indochina alone. It was, therefore, their view that the time had urgently come to regard the situation in Indochina not purely from point of view of France but from point of view of its relationship to the entire Asiatic and world situation in the struggle against Soviet Communism. It was with this in mind that French Government intended approaching British and US Governments with view to tripartite consultations and review of entire situation in respect of Indochina. He emphasized it was not a question of some limited aid in military equipment and matériel under MDA program but rather the larger aspects of the problem, political, economic and military, created by the new turn in the Indochinese situation. He said he would welcome any ideas that US Government might have as to best procedure in bringing about some such consultations before the official approach was made, whether in our view such consultations could best take place in Washington or elsewhere and in what form.

He was told that this informal inquiry would be transmitted to Washington and we would inform him of the reply. Bohlen told him that, of course, this was an extremely serious matter and one which would require the most careful consideration on part of US Government because of the far-reaching implications, not only on the situation in Indochina and also Southeast Asia but its effect upon the general strategy of the occidental powers in the present world situation.

This conversation with Couve de Murville, although informal and personal, as he was careful to characterize it, nevertheless, provides a measure of one type of French thinking in regard to the present situation in Indochina, namely, that the situation has ceased to be a matter of concern only or primarily to France but to the entire occidental camp; in particular, the US and UK. His hint of French difficulty in going it alone should, in our view, be regarded as primarily a means of impressing upon us the urgency of the situation in light of possible developments and probably as a means of stimulating increased US military and other assistance in Indochina. There have been no signs that French policy is in process of undergoing any change as result of Russian action although obviously it is clear that their margin is not great in Indochina and an all-out attack by the Chinese Communists or major assistance to Ho could well render their position untenable.

Since the French intend to make a definite official proposal for an exchange of views with the US and UK, if the Department has any views as to what type of approach or suggestion as to time or place of such consultation would be preferable from the French, we can informally pass them on to the Foreign Office.

114. Deptel 79, February 4, noon.[1] I have given lengthy exposition to Prime Minister[2] and Foreign Minister of Department's reasons recognition Bao Dai and views concerning IC situation. Following is summary their views:

1. Prime Minister listened most attentively outline situation IC and particularly to my estimate of danger if IC goes completely Communist now that Ho Chi Minh has aligned himself with Moscow and Peiping. Prime Minister stated in reply he fully aware possibility IC going Communist and danger to Thailand from such development, that Thailand Government has definitely taken decision stand with democracy for freedom and independence, and pursuance that policy he and his government would like recognize Bao Dai since his government anti-Communist. He said nevertheless Thai people were Asiatics and in common with other peoples of Asia, they were desirous of seeing those peoples still under colonial domination achieve real freedom and independence. He emphasized the importance of this consideration in thinking of his government, and pointed out that neither the Thai people nor other peoples of this region were convinced that Bao Dai and his government had real freedom and indepence, nor a large measure of support from the people. He said in these circumstances seemed in best interests Thailand watch developments and delay recognition Bao Dai for time being. In reply my query what he thought should be done insure greater popular support Bao Dai, he replied France must grant full independence or at least issue clear-cut statement indicating further and more complete transfer power and authority to Bao Dai in near future. I discussed separately with him question kingdoms Laos and Cambodia. I pointed out no widespread or active opposition to governments these two states seems to exist, and Laos and Cambodia people are supporting existing governments. I stressed recognition by Thailand these two states, immedately adjacent western frontiers this country, would be great encouragement to them. I pointed out if Communism could be kept out Laos and Cambodia these states might, to some extent at least act as buffer Communist expansion into Thailand. Prime Minister displayed considerable interest this idea but seemed feel recognition Cambodia and Laos tied up with recognition Bao Dai. In conclusion Prime Minister said his Cabinet would give whole problem further careful consideration.

2. In long conversation with Foreign Minister he expressed similar views. He spoke very frankly and said thought we and British were making mistake by recognition Bao Dai. He said did not see that our recognition would greatly strengthen Bao Dai unless we and British prepared give military and economic aid sufficient really turn tide inflict crushing defeat on Ho Chi Minh. He reiterated if Bao Dai given full independence and had popular support Thailand would gladly extend recognition as done in case USI.

3. From above evident Thai Government still not prepared extend immediate recognition Bao Dai. Thinking of Thai Government and, I believe, other Asian governments predicated on their strong opposition to colonialism, strong desire to see countries of Asia achieve their independence and their skepticism regarding French intentions. On latter point Thailand particularly skeptical, if not suspicious, in view their past bitter experience with French. I feel we must not forget struggle for independence amongst Asian countries represents strong and deep-seated ideal which has profoundly stirred them for many years. To them recognition Bao Dai seems to mean perpetuation colonialism and they therefore exceedingly reluctant to do so even in face Communist threat which looms. In other words to them colonialism is a foe they understand and have sought to vanquish for many years, whereas Communism is foe whose strength and evil influence not fully known or grasped.

Thus Bao Dai feels he must proceed carefully and avoid too sweeping amnesty proclamations. Claims Ho Chi Minh will shortly leave IC (if he has not already left) to devote himself to leadership SEA Comintern.

Bao Dai evinced considerable interest in possibilities of US aid and referred to memorandum summarized in mytel 69, January 31. He was eager to consider any details to be raised by US. Gullion said summary of requests received just before his departure from Washington and question of aid under study indicating that while matter had sympathetic interest some of initial request at first sight might appear excessive.

Among reasons why any equipment delivered should go first to Viet troops Bao Dai cited fact that they were sometimes able to obtain rendition of enemy with minimum of bloodshed. He urged wisdom of equiping village readiness contingents on home guard pattern.

1. With respect military situation Pignon said it would be mistake be over-optimistic. Combined effect US–UK recognition Bao Dai and Communist endorsement Ho extremely helpful but lines now drawn sharper than ever before. With present equipment and balance of opposing forces situation could be held but not much more. Weak spot was now Annam where French and Vietnamese spread thin and troops somewhat fatigued. Vietminh making strong effort this area. Pignon had just returned from there where he had extended talks with military and civilian leaders. On other hand situation Tonkin relatively good.

2. When substitution Vietnamese troops for French could be made results were good. Vietnamese satisfactory soldiers when things went well. Limiting factors on substitution were officer training and equipment. Former being slowly overcome; latter pretty much up to US. Recruitment and manpower not problem although French had to insist on careful security screening.

3. In response to question he indicated there had been no substantial reports of consultation between Chinese Communists and Ho. There were unverified reports that this or that Chinese unit was earmarked for thrust into Tonkin. There were slightly more reliable reports of Chinese-equipped convoys destined for VM. It was his opinion that if Russian or Chinese envoys to Ho were actually dispatched they would probably locate in a South China province.

4. Pignon uninformed Gullion's talk with Parodi. Although he an official Ministry Overseas France he was for transfer Vietnamese affairs to Foreign Office now only because effect Vietnamese and world opinion but because situation no longer one for Overseas France. He indicated he and latter not exactly speaking same language at present. Transfer to new Ministry of Associated States would not have same moral effect and besides he foresaw difficulty treating Vietnamese in same package with Moslem states if they became associated powers. Foreign Office solution would require at least a "sous direction" under a "sous secretaire".

5. Time had come for interested powers to examine SEA situation together and as a whole. In city itself considerable interest had apparently been aroused since streets were massed with onlookers. The 26-year-old King appeared sincerely moved at US recognition. He launched into discussion of status his country within Indochina and vis-à-vis France as follows:

Principal theme that although France had in long-run taken proper steps, they did so only on too little and too late basis. He could understand that it was question of pride and face and he realized need for strong France but hoped US recognition and acceptance Cambodia into family of nations would accelerate progress toward real independence. He stated one of mistakes of France lay in giving too little leadership in security matters to local governments. Cambodians had, it is true, been given responsibility for security in the Angkor area by France who now criticized him because contraband trade thrived there whereas if French only knew it, there was three times as much contraband to use in areas controlled by them. Moreover when security measures were left up to him, order prevailed and people could travel in safety.

Completion of supplementary accords with France was being held up principally because of failure to agree on status of judiciary. Cambodians agreed on special status under law for French nationals and on mixed courts but insisted that all courts operate as part of Cambodian judicial apparatus and dispense justice in name of Kingdom of Cambodia and not in name of French Union. (Cambodian communications with French this subject being airpouched.)

King seemed as much worried re security of Cambodia from future Annamese or Siamese encroachments as concerning immediate internal situation.

Cambodia wished send representatives to UN and to US at very early date. He himself looked forward to visiting US soon to express his gratification to President Truman personally. His remarks with respect to Cambodian representative abroad paralleled views expressed in memo given us before our visit by King's representative in Saigon which is being transmitted by airpouch.

With reference to visit by king to US, I intend to explain to his representative in next few days that while visit would undoubtedly be welcome, he should await opportune time.

King looked forward to receiving US aid in some form. He believes stability could come in this part of world only if it were clearly realized on which side US strength and influence lay.

After interview with King Cambodia we talked with Commissaire de la République de Raymond who said chief difficulty was instilling energy and sense responsibility into easy-going Cambodians and that politics tended to be feudal in sense that people grouped around various leaders who in one way or another have achieved preeminence. He pointed out then leaders not of aristocratic origin so no hereditary aristocracy exists and that there are no real political parties with program and continuous policy. He added experiment of turning over complete military responsibility for Siamreap and Kampong-Thom provinces to Cambodians had been reasonably successful although not as much so as Cambodians claimed. Order had been maintained and security was good but at same time not many bandits had been rounded up and area had become a center for contraband arms trade. Cambodians tend to take seriously non-violence part of their strict Buddhism and to depend on persuasion rather than force. Bandits under VM leadership not very amenable to persuasion. Chief problem at moment was smuggling of arms from Siam across these provinces as well as by sea in south. De Raymond not satisfied with Cambodian cooperation in stopping this although no evidence of official collusion by Cambodians. Opposite true in Siam.

Commissaire said land reform problem practically nonexistent as nearly all land owned by peasants. Prevalence of small holdings would require organization cooperatives if mechanization agriculture to be introduced. This would be difficult because of extreme individualism Cambodian peasant and absence any village or commercial organization to use as nucleus. Peasants suffered from usury of moneylenders but to less extent than in other countries Indochina. Inflation had not cancelled out advantage of usurers who were agile enough to keep their rates ahead of it.

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] February 16, 1950.

Participants: M. Henri Bonnet, Ambassador of the French Republic
M. Jean Daridan, Minister Counselor, Embassy of the French Republic
The Secretary
Mr. Livingston T. Merchant, Acting Assistant Secretary, FE

The French Ambassador called on me this afternoon at his request, indicating that the subject which he wished to discuss was Indochina and that it was a matter of some urgency.

[1] Consolidated files of the Office of Philippine and Southeast Asian Affairs, 1937–1952.

[2] Drafted by Livingston T. Merchant, Acting Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs.

Before recapitulating the contents of the attached aide-mémoire which the Ambassador left with me,[3] he stated that he wished to review the attitude of the French Cabinet in the light of recent developments in Indochina. The Ambassador pointed out that the French Government had been engaged for an extended period in a serious and expensive military effort in French Indochina. The Ambassador went on to point out that the recognition of Ho Chi Minh by the Peking and Moscow Governments seemed clearly to indicate that it was in this area that the two Communist powers proposed to take aggressive action. The second development, to which the Ambassador referred, was the ratification by the French Government of the March 8 Agreements, followed by recognition on the part of the United States and Great Britain. He went on to say that the French proposed loyally to carry out the terms of those Agreements and to foster the development of democratic institutions and processes in the three Kingdoms.

At this point the Ambassador made a slightly obscure statement to the effect that the French Government at some point must reach a decision with regard to the recognition of Peking. He said that this decision had not yet been made but he was anxious for me to know that at some point it would be made. I asked him at this juncture what bearing the recognition of Ho Chi Minh by Peking might have on their consideration of recognition of the Chinese Communists. The Ambassador admitted that it obviously was an important factor which would have to be taken into account and asked me if I had some message in this connection for him to transmit to his Government. I made clear that I was making no suggestion but merely attempting to ascertain the present thoughts of the French Cabinet on this point. The conclusion I drew from this side discussion was that the French are not contemplating for the immediate future recognizing Peking but that they do not by any means exclude such action, despite Peking's recognition of Ho Chi Minh.

I then reverted to the Ambassador's statement that the French proposed to foster the development of democratic institutions in Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia and asked him whether or not the French Government had in mind at this time the desirability of making a public statement to the effect that the March 8 Agreements represented only a step in an evolutionary process. I pointed out that the reluctance of certain Asiatic countries such as Thailand, India, the Philippines and Burma to recognize Bao Dai and the Kings of Laos and Cambodia rested apparently on their belief that these three States did not in fact enjoy independence. I said that in our case we had brushed aside this question in making our decision to recognize but that I was extremely fearful, in the absence of some expression of intent or further action on the part of the French, the reluctance of the Asiatic powers to come forward, a development so important for the future of the three States, would persist. The Ambassador replied that France had every intention of fostering the further development of these States along democratic lines, but that he felt quite certain that the Cabinet did not feel that it could make any statement of possible future actions having legal force. He added that it would be unfortunate if suspicion were permitted to grow in the minds of the Vietnamese as well as other Asiatic countries that they had not achieved, in fact, a very high degree of independence within the framework of the French Union. He intimated that a statement along the lines that I had suggested may arouse rather than allay such suspicion. I stated that I thought it might be useful if we could sit down with the French and examine this question further in view of the importance of doing everything possible to assure the future success of these new States. The Ambassador promised to convey the views I had just expressed to Paris.

The ambassador then briefly summarized the three points of his aide-mémoire. He expressed the hope that it would be possible for the United States to make a declaration of solidarity with France in this crucial area of Communist aggression, a statement which he felt would be strengthened by the adherence of the British. I questioned him at this point to ascertain whether the French Government was thinking in terms of a statement such as we had made in connection with Hong Kong, to the effect that armed aggression from outside would be a grave matter and call into play the machinery of the United Nations,[4] or whether Paris was thinking in terms of a commitment on our part in advance to provide U.S. military forces in such an event. The Ambassador indicated that the thought was closer to the former and pointed out that the French Army was in French Indochina and France must expect to continue to bear the brunt of the operation.

The Ambassador went on to his second point, which was military aid, pointing out the hope of the French Government that with Section 303 funds the immediate needs of the French military and Indochina could be supplied. At the same time he stated that his instructions from his Government contained the hope that staff talks could be initiated and that American officers could proceed to Indochina for a joint study with the French military of the supply requirements and the military situation on the ground.

[4] For information on the attitude of the United States with respect to the status of Hong Kong, see pp. 256 ff.

Lastly, the Ambassador stated that the French Government trusted that the United States Government would find it possible to render economic assistance and lighten the heavy burdens of the States of Laos and Cambodia and, above all, Vietnam.

I asked the Ambassador if Ambassador Bruce in Paris had received a copy of this communication. Ambassador Bonnet was not clear on this point though he felt certain our Embassy had been kept currently informed of the development of the thoughts of the French Government on this subject.[5] I thanked the Ambassador for his call and assured him that these proposals would receive our immediate attention.

Following the departure of Ambassador Bonnet the Secretary stated that he desired a copy of the aide-mémoire to be transmitted immediately to the Department of Defense, in fact, not later than tomorrow, and he suggested in the interest of speed it be covered by a note to General Burns[1] from Mr. Rusk.

Secondly, the Secretary desired that our Embassy in Paris should be informed of this démarche and the views of the Ambassador and Mr. Bohlen be solicited. He emphasized that with their familiarity with the situation that we should attempt to exploit their influence to the maximum in order to achieve what we desired the French to do. The Secretary emphasized that our bargaining position disappears the moment we agree to give theim aid. The Secretary added that he felt that in order to give American aid the best chance of success in this situation it should be provided in circumstances where the three States were given the maximum interest in pursuing a course of resistance. He felt that while they should have urged upon them the importance and the desirability from their own point of view of maintaining a close connection with France, that nevertheless they should be in a position where they could in fact, if they so elected, walk out of the French Union at any time.

The Chargé in France (Bohlen) to the Secretary of State

SECRET PARIS, February 16, 1950—9 p. m.

746. Couve de Murville today read to me instructions which were sent to Bonnet last night for an approach to the Secretary concerning Indochina. According to these instructions, this approach is not primarily a request for a three-power conference, although that is mentioned, but direct French request for unspecified large-scale American assistance on a long-term basis.

Bonnet was instructed to emphasize that recognition of Ho Chi-minh by Soviet Union has transformed Indochina into an international factor in the world-wide struggle against Soviet Communism, which may become the most active and immediately threatening sector in the world front. He is instructed to inform the Secretary that "in these circumstances" France has need of aid from her allies, particularly the US, in the political, military and economic spheres, that in the political sphere a common policy should be drawn up which might include a declaration to forestall Soviet or Chinese Communist aggression against Indochina.

In the military sphere the instructions emphasize that the requests about to be submitted for assistance under the 75 million dollar fund will be for immediate needs only and that further military assistance, in supplies and equipment, will be necessary on very much larger scale and for an indeterminate period of time in accordance with plan to be worked out jointly by the Chiefs of Staff of US and France. Long-term economic aid will also be necessary to help economy of Indochina.

The instructions refer to the desirability of calling a three-power conference to consider the broad aspects of the Indochinese situation, but this is apparently regarded as something less urgent than direct approach to the US since Couve said there was no approach to the British at this time.

I told Couve de Murville that I thought this generalized and vague approach to the US alone would merely evoke a series of questions for clarification and was not in my opinion the best way to have initiated the subject, that instructions, as I understood them, seemed to make no reference to what France herself was determined to do nor to contain any concrete program or even any estimate of the extent of long-term aid required. I told him that obviously any question of long-term aid to Indochina could only be considered after there had been a thorough examination of entire situation and implications which such demands would have on heavy commitments the US already has in matter of foreign aid and military assistance. Couve gave me impression that French had not given much thought to role of Great Britain in present Indochinese situation and was unable to give any details of long-term assistance that French Government had in mind, which he said would have to be discussed and worked out jointly, referring in this connection to suggestion in instructions that the US and French military staffs should work out plan.

The instructions to Bonnet were approved by the Cabinet yesterday and therefore must be taken as representing views of French Government. Since, however, they are general in terms and do not specify exact assistance to be requested, this approach appears to be an endeavor to ascertain general attitude of US Government.

We will continue to impress upon French importance of developing concrete and realistic program for Indochinese situation rather than vague, generalized attitudes as evidenced by Bonnet's instructions, and it would be most helpful if when Bonnet makes this démarche Secretary could emphasize this same point, and impress upon him that whatever consideration might be given to assistance in Indochina, primary responsibility in that area is and will continue to be French. The Secretary may care to refer to a statement to that effect which he made to Schuman during three Secretaries meeting here in Paris on November 10.[1]

BOHLEN

[1] In telegram 3922 from Frankfort, November 12, 1949, Secretary Acheson reported the following in connection with the recently completed United States-United Kingdom-French discussions at Paris: "On Indochina I told Schuman we felt that French were on right track with Bao Dai (although perhaps not moving as fast as desirable) and we wanted to be as helpful as possible. I said we would consider sympathetically any specific proposals French cared to make although basically we felt that primary task was French." (893.01/11–1249)

Country Report Prepared in the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs for the Director of the Mutual Defense Assistance Program (Bruce)[2]

SECRET [WASHINGTON, undated.]

MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM FOR INDOCHINA FOR FISCAL YEAR 1951

A. U.S. political and economic objectives in Indochina.

The principal U.S. political objective toward Indochina is to insure the existence of governments in the three newly formed states of Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia which represent the legitimate nationalist aspirations of those Indochinese people who do not desire to see Communist-oriented governments in Indochina.

The U.S. has made strong representation to the French Government to extend liberal terms to the three newly formed states to indicate not only to the Indochinese people but to the neighboring Asian countries and to the world that France is the friend and supporter of legitimate nationalism and recognizes that the era of prewar colonialism is ended. At the same time, the U.S. recognizes that the inherent weakness within the new states does not permit, for reasons both of external and internal security, that French military forces could be withdrawn from Indochina at the present time.

U.S. economic objectives in Indochina are directed toward the support of a program of aid and technical advice which will permit the three newly formed states to establish economic stability and to thereby lessen the danger of communism in the area. At the same time, economic stability in Indochina will assist in the rehabilitation of metropolitan France and therefore contribute directly toward a lessening of U.S. aid to metropolitan France.

1. Both the political and economic objectives in Indochina are extremely important to not only the U.S. position of lessening Communist expansion but urgently necessary towards that end.

2. Special problems of internal security.

a. A political solution is required since it has been demonstrated during five years of French military effort that a military solution alone cannot succeed. The political effort must, however, be backed up by a continuing police-type military action which will enable non-communist oriented governments to maintain themselves in power. Economic problems of rehabilitation must be dealt with concurrently in order to wean away from communist leanings the peoples of Indochina.

b. The Governments of the three new states are willing to work toward the solution outlined in "a." above, but without outside support are unable, due to lack of trained administrative personnel, lack of experience and lack of military strength, to withstand communist aggression, backed up by Chinese Communist or by Soviet assistance.

3. The special problems of maintaining external security rests strongly on the Army of the French Union which has the responsibility in time of emergency or war of maintaining the area against external aggression.

a. Since the Army of the French Union now in Indochina, which includes upwards of 50,000 Indochinese, has been unable during the past five years to effectively stabilize the area against internal communist guerrillas under the direction of Ho Chi Minh, it is obvious that the same forces are unable to protect Indochina from either an invasion by mass of Chinese communist armies or by an increased indigenous communist army which is supplied from outside sources. The solution, therefore, to protect Indochina from either of these threats must rest with military and economic aid from the non-communist oriented countries of the world.

b. The Governments of the three new states appear to be willing to contribute toward non-communist defense of the area but are unable to contribute more, in a general way, than they now supply.

4. Because of the internal weaknesses of Indochina, none of the three new states is in a position to assist other countries in the area which are friendly to the United States, to maintain security.

B. In order to achieve U.S. political and economic objectives, it is recommended that both military and economic aid be given to the Governments of Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia, plus assistance to the Army of the French Union, which will remain the responsible agency for defense.

1. Assistance furnished to the armies of Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia would, it is planned, contribute toward combating communism both within Indochina and against an aggressor. Since the over-all control of military measures would rest with the Army of the French Union, it may be assumed that military aid would be used to achieve U.S. objectives.

2. A military solution would effectively contribute toward appropriate political and economic solutions although U.S. or foreign military and economic assistance would be played up by the communist propaganda agency as a demonstration that U.S. aid was being used to further French colonialism. Therefore, as much aid as possible should be given directly to each of the three new states in order to overcome this propaganda.

3. The three new states cannot improve their military strength without injury to their economies except that additional manpower (without equipment) could be supplied.

4. On the assumption that the anti-communist efforts will be successful in this area, then security needs from their own resources might be supplied to a certain extent by the three new Governments but would probably continue to require for some time direction by local French authorities and probably small amounts of assistance from France.

C. The general nature and extent of proposed military assistance is now being studied by French and Indochinese military authorities, and will be supplied to the U.S. through channels already established.

1. The nature and purpose of U.S. military assistance to Indochina would be psychological, to establish U.S. abhorrence to further communist expansion in Southeast Asia; political, by strengthening the non-communist governments of the three states; and practicable in that both the political and psychological effects are in full accord with U.S. policy for Southeast Asia.

2. While the extent of assistance is as yet unknown, it is expected that it will be more than token and would include material aid and other assistance available only from U.S. sources.

3. Timing.

a. It is essential that military aid begun in 1950 through the French be continued during fiscal year 1951 in order to continue to contain communist aggression in Southeast Asia which has already begun.

b. If aid were not supplied during fiscal year 1951, it appears that communist aggression would successfully swallow up not only Indochina but threaten the remainder of Southeast Asia.

4. The probable duration of proposed military aid is uncertain because of the unknown factors concerning communist plans for the area. However, it is obvious that the more quickly aid can be given the more quickly the threat can be stopped. The slower the aid is in arriving, the more prolonged the effort must be.

D. 1. U.S. political involvement in Indochinese affairs would be expected to be concerned only with advice to France as well as to the three new states and to continuing efforts to orient the neighboring Asian countries towards a non-communist solution for the area.

2. Economic involvement would depend on the successes of both political effort and military aid but should not be expected at this time to include long-term economic assistance.

3. The consequence of withdrawal of military aid before a planned termination date would allow communist domination of Indochina and Southeast Asia.

E. 1. The recipient Governments will welcome U.S. military aid.

2. Adjacent countries will welcome U.S. military aid if it is combined with French assurances that such aid is supplied and utilized for the purposes of maintaining countries whose Governments represent the legitimate nationalist aspirations of the peoples of Indochina and not to reimpose French colonialism control. U.S. military aid should be expected to have a violent reaction from the USSR and satellite countries. However, there does not appear to be any political Asiatic consolidation of opposition against the recipient countries and to the United States except from Communist China and from North Korea whose positions are already quite clear.

The mission was headed by R. Allen Griffin, newspaper publisher and former special assistant on the China Aid Mission of the Economic Cooperation Administration, 1948–1949. The Griffin Mission visited Indochina from March 6 to March 16. For documentation on the mission, see pp. 1 ff.

noon [2] that firm decision may be in process of being taken re military and other aid to Indochina, I thought you might like to have my impressions from conference discussions [3] and talks with Thailand Prime Minister and Foreign Minister during which Stanton, Jessup and I pressed hard for recognition.

It is transparently clear that Asiatic neighbors of Indochina consider Bao Dai a French creation and a French puppet; despite current and anticipated actions of support by US and western powers they prepared sell his regime short, if status Bao Dai remains undrastically modified; even if such changes made promptly, he must exert effective leadership comparable to Ho's.

We should realize that ECA and military aid from US, just as recognition by US, do not constitute "missing components". While absence of ECA and military aid, just as lack recognition, would prove disadvantageous, under present circumstances they are not of primary importance and will not constitute decisive factors. Conference found Gullion's analogy with Greece far from persuasive and, in fact, dangerous delusion.[4]

"Missing component" is further action by French which would place Vietnam in category of independent states.

Accordingly, Griffin mission should receive very precise and careful instructions prior to departure and it would be my recommendation that no ECA or military aid be committed to French Indochina unless France gives requisite public undertakings re further steps leading to status similar to Indonesia. Current French intentions seem epitomized by Parodi's statement to Gullion (intel February 7, 7 a. m.)[5] that "French Parliament could not be told Indochina accord ratified February 2 of only passing value and it would do more harm than good kindle unrealistic appetites in Vietnam which would necessarily be disappointed." Question, therefore, is what are the realistic nationalist appetites which will not be disappointed. [Butterworth.]

The Ambassador in France (Bruce) to the Secretary of State

SECRET PARIS, February 22, 1950—4 p. m.

837. At the request of Parodi, I went over with Bohlen today to see him on the subject of Indochina.

Parodi said he wished to emphasize the very major importance that the French Government attached to the memorandum submitted by Bonnet to the Secretary last night [1] and to re-emphasize and expand what Couve de Murville said to Bohlen last week. He said first he wished to explain the reference which Bonnet made under instructions, although not in the memorandum, to the French intention to sound out Mao Tse-tung on the question of recognition. He said no decision in favor of recognition had been taken, but the French Government considered it wise to endeavor to ascertain what Mao's intention might be in regard to Indochina and that possibility of such sounding had been opened up by an indirect inquiry from the Chinese Communists re possibility of importing rice from Indochina. As to substance of the memorandum, he said the French Government, after the meeting of the Cabinet and two meetings of the Defense Committee which he, Parodi, had attended, had come to the conclusion that they should set forth to the United States Government fully and frankly the extreme gravity of the situation in Indochina from French point of view as a result of recent developments and the expectation that at least increased military aid would be furnished to Ho Chi Minh from Communist China. He said the truth of the matter was that the effort in Indochina was such a drain on France that a long-term program of assistance was necessary and it was only from the United States that it could come. Otherwise, he said, it was very likely that France might be forced to reconsider her entire policy with the possible view to cutting her losses and withdrawing from Indochina. He twice repeated that as I knew from our previous conversations with the Foreign Office, no such possibility had even been considered by the French Government until the recent developments occurred. He said it was not the intention of the French Government to withdraw and actually at the moment the military situation was not too bad in Indochina, but looking into the future it was obvious to them that France could not continue indefinitely to bear this burden alone if the expected developments in regard to increased assistance to Ho Chi Minh came about. Parodi stated that in any event the French Government was confronted with necessity of reducing the present French forces in Indochina by at least 25,000 not only for budgetary reasons, but because additional men were urgently needed in connection with French national military program.

Parodi said the French fully realized that they were confronting the United States with issues of the highest policy and of the most fundamental nature and they were fully aware of the consequences that would flow from a French withdrawal from Indochina and the immediate effect upon the other countries of southeast Asia, even including India, and it was for these reasons that French Government had decided to place the question squarely before the United States.

He said that the full program of military assistance which French Government had in mind would be sent to the Embassy this afternoon.[2] He explained that it had been divided into three sections: immediate, which would list requests which might be met from the $75 million allocated to the President for the Orient, and the other two categories for urgent but less immediate demands based on a long-term program.

Parodi referred to the Secretary's reminder to Bonnet of the importance of a statement from the French Government that the March 8th agreements were evolutionary in character and said that in their view because of the weakness and fragility of the local governments in Vietnam, Cambodia and Laos, declarations of this kind would be more damaging than helpful; that it was the evolutionary process itself, rather than declarations in advance, which would help move these regimes towards greater self-government and stability, adding that it is the intention of the French Government to follow a completely evolutionary process in regard to these three governments, but they were doubtful as to the wisdom of a statement in advance.

I told Parodi that I thought it was very important for us to know very definitely what the intentions of the French Government in regard to remaining in Indochina were; that obviously our estimate of the French determination to keep on in Indochina would have a direct bearing upon our consideration of the possibility of American assistance. In this connection, since Parodi had referred to our action in Greece, we mentioned that American assistance would hardly have been given to Greece had we not had complete confidence that within limits the Greek Government was going to continue to fight; that obviously any program of external assistance was marginal in character and entirely dependent for its success upon the solidity of the base—in this case, the firmness of French policy and actions in Indochina.

Parodi said he was glad to have this observation, because they had been somewhat concerned re the best psychological method of presentation, to which I replied that it was not a question of psychology alone, it was a question of reality and steadiness of French purpose in Indochina that was at issue.

I asked him whether the political declaration to which Bonnet referred meant a tripartite declaration with England, or the United

[2] The proposed program was submitted by the French on February 22 in the form of lists of military equipment desired. These lists, not printed, were transmitted by Mr. Bohlen to Assistant Secretary of State Perkins under a covering letter dated February 24. (751G.5 MAP/2–2450) This program was also submitted to the Department of State by the French Embassy. French requirements were further defined in lists presented in Paris on March 22 and in Washington on March 31, neither printed. Documentation on the various French requests is located in file 751G.5 MAP.

States alone, or US and French, to which he replied the latter in view of the time element. We emphasized to him our personal view that any such declaration could only be considered on a tripartite basis in view of the interests of Great Britain in the area and the impression of divergence between US and the British which any unilateral or even bilateral statement would create.

This telegram was delayed pending the expected receipt yesterday of the French requests which Parodi was taking in for final clearance to Schuman. These requests did not arrive yesterday and we were informed last evening that there may be some further delay. We are not sure whether this means that Schuman has somewhat different views on policy in Indochina than Parodi and Couve de Murville (since approach to us and subsequent developments have taken place in his absence). I am seeing him this afternoon and will be able to ascertain whether or not his views are in accordance with those expressed to us by Parodi.

840. Remytel 837 February 22.

1. Mr. Schuman returned to his office yesterday after an absence of about three weeks and officially resumed his duties today. He seems tired and has not yet fully convalesced from his grippe. He said that he had gathered from Bonnet's despatch that Secretary Acheson had not been favorably impressed by the French suggestion that they might recognize Mao Tse-tung. Schuman stated that nothing had been decided on this point and that it would only be done provided that his government became convinced, after feeling out the Chinese Communist officials, that the advantages to be derived would be substantial, but that, in no case was any recognition contemplated in the near future nor would it be taken without prior advice to the US Government.

2. I told him of the conversation recently had by Bohlen and myself with Parodi in which the latter referred to the speculative possibility of a withdrawal by the French from Indochina.[1] Schuman said that later on the same day he had discussed this matter with Parodi and that this was not the position of the Foreign Office or of the government. Schuman said that he had had no opportunity since his return to discuss this question with the Cabinet, but that he felt that an evacuation of Indochina by the French would mean not only a massacre of French troops and French civilians there, but the slaughter of literally millions of natives who would be accused of having been friendly to the French or to Bao Dai. In addition, and more important, was his feeling that even the suggestion of such a withdrawal would cause the gravest political disturbance in France, would unfavorably affect the situation in the French Union, especially in Africa, would give the Communists and other dissident elements at home and abroad the impression of Western defeatism and would also be a betrayal of the responsibility which France owed to maintain an anti-Communist front in Southeast Asia. He said that he considered Indochina primarily a French responsibility, that he would like to get immediately marginal aid from the US in very considerable quantities and amounts in accordance with the list submitted to US today,[2] in order to improve the efficiency of the French and Bao Dai operations against Ho Chi Minh. He pointed out his belief that the later steps to be taken and any question as to the ability of the French to continue indefinitely their present expenditure of men, money and materials in Indochina would have to be considered in connection with the overall policy to be adopted by the US, the UK and France in regard to a common Far East policy. He thinks it most important that Great Britain should be drawn into such discussions soon after this weeks elections. He has not yet made up his mind as to how, when, and where, he would suggest that they be conducted, but has sent word to Bonnet to be in Paris the beginning of next week to advise him in person of his conversations with the Secretary in Washington.

3. Mr. Schuman believes that important as is the situation in Indochina to the interests of all of us, that it must be considered only as a part of the general problem of opposition to Communist aggression, although, as regards the Far East, he was careful to underline that he considered it the vital point there.

860. Mytels 837 and 840. I saw Bidault last night. He stated:

1. He had to date been opposed and expected to remain very skeptical about any advantages to be derived by France from the recognition of Mao Tse-tung. However, he thought it advisable to feel out Chinese Communists and ascertain what they might profess themselves willing to do in exchange for recognition. If then any deal were suggested that appeared at least on surface advantageous to France, government would consider whether or not any confidence could be placed in agreement with Mao, which he personally doubted.

2. Withdrawal by French from Indochina had long been pet project of Communists as well as of some Socialists. It was unthinkable for many reasons, amongst others that in France itself it would immediately provoke an "insurrection". France was carrying burden in Indochina which he hoped would be lightened by assistance from other powers interested in combating Communism in Far East but even in absence of such assistance, she could not nor did she intend to lay it down.

3. Our two governments seem to be talking at cross purposes as to what is meant by the term independence for Indochina and what an evolutionary statement should contain. The French expect Indochina to remain within French Union and are willing to grant further concessions as Vietnamese show themselves capable of taking over additional responsibilities and of safeguarding their own security interests. Time-table idea does not strike him sympathetically for chief evidence of alleged French imperialism is presence in Indochina of French troops, withdrawal of whom cannot be fixed in point of time.

4. He believes neither in US nor in Asia does public realize how extensive has been grant of powers to Indochinese nor how sincerely French would like to have these peoples take over further responsibilities as they are able to, and thus relieve France of its ungrateful and exceedingly expensive task there. He thinks French Government has been most inefficient in its propaganda on this subject and hopes to do something that will clarify situation.

In connection with above and other conversations we have had recently, especially one yesterday with Pignon, whom I regard as competent and enlightened administrator, we are preparing study on pros and cons of "evolutionary statement" idea which has domestic, political and North African implications, as well as those bearing on SEA scene.
