PREFACE

This volume was prepared under the direct supervision of S. Everett Gleason, Chief of the Foreign Relations Division, with the assistance of Ralph R. Goodwin in its planning and direction.

All the documentation on the relations of the United States with the United Nations was compiled by Mr. Goodwin, except the compilation on United States policy at the United Nations with respect to the regulation of armaments and collective security which was the work of Neal H. Petersen. Mr. Petersen also compiled the documentation on United States national security policy and on the foreign policy aspects of United States development of atomic energy.

The compilations on foreign economic policy, relief and refugee problems, and international civil aviation policy were the responsibility of Mr. Goodwin.

Marvin W. Kranz, a former member of the staff, compiled the documentation on United States foreign financial policy, on the United States response to the world food shortage, and related problems.

The compilation on Antarctica was the work of William Slany.

The Publishing and Reproduction Services Division (Jerome H. Perlmutter, Chief) was responsible for the technical editing of this volume.

PRINCIPLES FOR THE COMPILATION AND EDITING OF "FOREIGN RELATIONS"

The principles which guide the compilation and editing of Foreign Relations are stated in Department of State Regulation 2 FAM 1350 of June 15, 1961, a revision of the order approved on March 26, 1925, by Mr. Frank B. Kellogg, then Secretary of State. The text of the regulation, as further amended, is printed below:

1350 DOCUMENTARY RECORD OF AMERICAN DIPLOMACY

1351 Scope of Documentation

The publication Foreign Relations of the United States constitutes the official record of the foreign policy of the United States. These volumes include, subject to necessary security considerations, all documents needed to give a comprehensive record of the major foreign policy decisions within the range of the Department of State's responsibilities, together with appropriate materials concerning the facts which contributed to the formulation of policies. When further material is needed to supplement the documentation in the Department's files for a proper understanding of the relevant policies of the United States, such papers should be obtained from other Government agencies.

1352 Editorial Preparation

The basic documentary diplomatic record to be printed in Foreign Relations of the United States is edited by the Historical Office, Bureau of Public Affairs of the Department of State. The editing of the record is guided by the principles of historical objectivity. There may be no alteration of the text, no deletions without indicating where in the text the deletion is made, and no omission of facts which were of major importance in reaching a decision. Nothing may be omitted for the purpose of concealing or glossing over what might be regarded by some as a defect of policy. However, certain omissions of documents are permissible for the following reasons:

- a. To avoid publication of matters which would tend to impede current diplomatic negotiations or other business.
- b. To condense the record and avoid repetition of needless details.
- c. To preserve the confidence reposed in the Department by individuals and by foreign governments.
- d. To avoid giving needless offense to other nationalities or individuals.
- e. To eliminate personal opinions presented in despatches and not acted upon by the Department. To this consideration there is one qualification—in connection with major decisions it is desirable, where possible, to show the alternatives presented to the Department before the decision was made.

1353 Clearance

To obtain appropriate clearances of material to be published in Foreign Relations of the United States, the Historical Office:

- a. Refers to the appropriate policy offices of the Department and of other agencies of the Government such papers as appear to require policy clearance.
- b. Refers to the appropriate foreign governments requests for permission to print as part of the diplomatic correspondence of the United States those previously unpublished documents which were originated by the foreign governments.

INTRODUCTION

In accordance with the principles stated in the preface, the editors of this volume have attempted to document major areas of United States multilateral diplomacy. The United States, however, also participated in the work of many other international conferences and international organizations in the year covered herein. The record of such activity may be conveniently consulted in: Participation of the United States Government in International Conferences: July 1, 1945-June 30, 1946, Department of State Publication 2817, Conference Series 95; Participation of the United States Government in International Conferences: July 1, 1946-June 30, 1947, Department of State Publication 3031, International Organization and Conference Series I, 1; International Agencies in which the United States Participates, Department of State Publication 2699. Summaries of over-all United States participation in the various organs of the United Nations during the calendar year 1946 may be found in The United States and the United Nations: Report by the President to the Congress for the Year 1946, Department of State Publication 2735. A standard reference source is the weekly Department of State Bulletin.

ORGANIZATION AND ARRANGEMENTS FOR THE CONDUCT OF UNITED STATES RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED NATIONS

Editorial Note

On December 19, 1945, action was completed by the Congress of the United States (79th Congress, 1st Session) on S. 1580, An Act "To Provide for the Appointment of Representatives of the United States in the Organs and Agencies of the United Nations, and To Make Other Provision With Respect to the Participation of the United States in Such Organization" (short title, the "United Nations Participation Act of 1945"); and the bill was approved by the President on December 20, 1945 (59 Stat. 619). This became the statutory basis for United States participation in the United Nations.

501.BB/12-2145

WASHINGTON, December 21, 1945.

MY DEAR MR. STETTINIUS: It gives me great pleasure to appoint you as the Representative of the United States to the United Nations with the rank and status of Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary and as the Representative of the United States in the Security Council of the United Nations.²

¹ Mr. Stettinius was a former Secretary of State of the United States. As Secretary he had headed the United States Delegation at the United Nations Conference on International Organization, held at San Francisco, April 25-June 26, 1945 (see Foreign Relations, 1945, vol. 1, pp. 1 ff.); and had been the premier United States signatory of the Charter of the United Nations, signed at San Francisco, June 26, 1945 (see 59 Stat. (pt. 2) 1031, or Department of State Treaty Series 993). Although Mr. Stettinius at this time (December) held the position of United States Representative to the Preparatory Commission of the United Nations, which body was sitting in London (see Foreign Relations, 1945, vol. 1, pp. 1433 ff.), he was unable to attend the meetings of the Plenary Commission because of illness; this letter was addressed to him at The White House.

In carrying out the important duties of your office you will act in accordance with my instructions transmitted by the Secretary of State or in such other manner as I may direct, and in particular any and all votes which may be cast by you as the Representative of the United States in the Security Council will be in accordance with such instructions. You will also be guided by the provisions of applicable legislation, in particular the United Nations Participation Act of 1945.

The importance of the success of the United Nations organization cannot be overestimated and the responsibility which this Government bears for contributing to that success is a significant one. I am confident that you will discharge your duties in the same distinguished manner in which you have performed the functions of other high offices which you have held in our Government and that you can count upon the fullest cooperation of all officers of our Government.³

Sincerely yours,

[HARRY S. TRUMAN]

501.BB/12-2145

President Truman to The Honorable Edward R. Stettinius, Jr.

WASHINGTON, December 21, 1945.

MY DEAR MR. STETTINIUS: I am pleased to inform you that I have appointed you one of the representatives of the United States to the first part of the first session of the General Assembly of the United Nations to be held in London early in January 1946.⁴ A complete list of this Government's Delegation is enclosed herewith.⁵

³ It is of interest to note that the position of Representative of the United States at the Seat of the United Nations (short title to be used in this series: "United States Representative at the United Nations") was all but in abeyance during the organizing period of the United Nations at London; and it was not until March, 1946 that the office was fully activated. While at London Mr. Stettinius functioned almost exclusively as Representative of the United States in the Security Council, or as Representative of the United States to the General Assembly.

Attention is invited to the practice of this series in which the designation "United States Representative at the United Nations" is used for the principal United States officer at the Seat of the United Nations at all times regardless of the position in which he may be functioning at the time.

⁴ The organization of United States representation to the General Assembly of the United Nations was provided for in Section 2 (c) of the United Nations Participation Act which read in pertinent part: "The President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall designate from time to time to attend a specified session or specified sessions of the General Assembly of the United Nations not to exceed five representatives of the United States and such number of alternates as he may determine consistent with the rules of procedure of the General Assembly. One of the representatives shall be designated as the senior representative." On December 19, 1945 President Truman sent to the Senate the nominations of the following persons to be "Representatives of the United States of America to the first part of the First Session of the General Assembly of the United Nations to be held in London, January 1946": Edward R. Stettinius, Jr.;

The United States representation at the first meeting of the General Assembly will be headed by the Secretary of State as Senior Representative or by you in his absence.

In so far as the General Assembly will deal with matters covered by the report of the Preparatory Commission, the representatives of the United States will be expected to support the recommendations made therein unless the position of the United States on a particular recommendation is reserved, in which case the representatives will be guided by my special instructions. I am, however, authorizing the Senior Representative, after consultation with the other representatives, to agree to modifications of the Preparatory Commission's recommendations which in his opinion may be wise and necessary.

In so far as matters may arise which are not covered by the report of the Preparatory Commission, I shall transmit through the Senior Representative any further instructions as to the position which should be taken by the representatives of the United States.

I have instructed the Senior Representative to act as the principal spokesman for the United States in the General Assembly.

You, as a representative of the United States, will bear the grave responsibility of demonstrating the wholehearted support which this Government is pledged to give to the United Nations organization, to the end that the organization can become the means of preserving the

Senator Tom Connally, Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee; Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg, ranking minority member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee; and Mrs. Anna Eleanor Roosevelt, widow of the late President Franklin D. Roosevelt. The nominations of Representative Sol Bloom, Chairman of the House of Representatives Committee on Foreign Affairs; Representative Charles A. Eaton, ranking minority member of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs; Mr. Frank C. Walker, ex-Postmaster General of the United States; Mr. John Foster Dulles, prominent international lawyer; and Mr. John G. Townsend, Jr., ex-United States Senator, as Alternate Representatives were submitted by President Truman to the Senate at the same time. All nominations were approved by the Senate on December 20. (Department of State Bulletin, December 23, 1945, pp. 1018 and 1019)

At the same time, on December 19, the President informed the Senate that "At my request the Secretary of State [James F. Byrnes] will, for at least a portion of the session, attend the initial session of the General Assembly" (Department of State Bulletin, December 23, 1945, p. 1018). This was done under provision of Section 2 (e) of the United Nations Participation Act which stated that "Nothing contained in this section shall preclude the President or the Secretary of State, at the direction of the President, from representing the United States at any meeting or session of any organ or agency of the United Nations." Because it was not necessary under Section 2 (e) for the President to nominate the Secretary of State as a representative to the General Assembly, only four names were submitted to the Senate for confirmation as "representatives" although five persons were nominated as "alternate representatives".

Letters of appointment dated December 21, 1945 were sent to all the representatives (including the Secretary of State) and alternates. The letters were virtually identical in all cases except for paragraphs 2 and 5 where changes were made appropriate to the position of the addressee in the Delegation structure. (501.BB/12-2145) international peace and of creating conditions of mutual trust and economic and social well-being among all peoples of the world. I am confident that you will do your best to assist the United States to accomplish these purposes in the first meeting of the General Assembly.

Sincerely yours,

[HARRY S. TRUMAN]

*Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs
(Hiss) to the Acting Secretary of State (Acheson)*

[WASHINGTON,] December 21, 1945.

Designation of Alternate Representatives to the General Assembly to act in place of absent Representatives

Mr. Rothwell ⁶ thought that you wanted a supplemental letter to the letters of appointment covering the above subject. Miss Evans ⁷ was not certain just where you had left the matter. I hope that you will not feel that a supplemental letter is necessary.

It seems to me wiser and safer not to raise this question but to rely upon the order in which the Alternate Representatives' nominations were sent to the Senate as determining the order in which they will fill any vacancies that may occur among the five representatives. The order of the Alternate Representatives is: Messrs. Bloom, Eaton, Walker, Dulles and Townsend. This seems to be the general assumption and also the proper order of succession. I think that to raise the subject specifically in a letter is to magnify it unnecessarily.

The matter may prove to be academic anyway as we are trying to make arrangements for the American Alternate Representatives as well as Representatives to have the right to sit in the Assembly at the plenary sessions. In general we have tried to minimize the distinction between the Representatives and the Alternate Representatives and the letters of appointment were drafted with this in mind. We plan to have the Alternates as well as the Representatives at all delegation meetings and the terms of the letters of appointment give them equal voice in delegation discussions, even vis-à-vis the organization. The distinction will be minimized because the Assembly's rules of procedure permit persons other than the Representatives to attend committee sessions, which will be the principal activity during the period we are in London.⁸

⁶ C. Easton Rothwell, Assistant to Mr. Stettinius, and at this time designated to be Secretary General of the United States Delegation to the General Assembly.

⁸ No other documentation has been found on this question, but it may be noted that the practice of the United States Delegation at London both within itself and in its external relationships was to draw no distinction between Representatives and Alternate Representatives.

¹⁰ The United States Delegation with the exception of Secretary Byrnes and Representative Eaton sailed from New York on the Queen Elizabeth on December 30, 1945, arriving at Southampton and London on January 5, 1946; the first Delegation meeting at London (there were meetings en route) was held on January 7. Secretary Byrnes departed from Washington by air on January 7 and arrived in London on January 8; he remained with the Delegation until January 25 when he returned to Washington also by air. The presence of the Delegation in London was required until the end of the first part of the first session of the General Assembly on February 14.

¹¹ There was attached to the United States Delegation an advisory and expert staff and administrative support group, 10 of whom (on the advisory side) were officers from the armed forces and 9 were from other government agencies. The Department of State group was headed by 5 senior advisers, a principal adviser, and a secretary general.

¹³ By law the members of the United States Delegation were styled "Representatives" and "Alternate Representatives". Much confusion existed from the beginning as to the nomenclature to be used in describing members of national delegations to the General Assembly. Although the term "Delegate" enjoyed widespread popularity among all delegations, including that of the United States, the official style for United States members was and remained "Representative".

¹⁵ Except for the period when Secretary Byrnes was in London, Mr. Stettinius was functioning in a three-fold capacity: as United States Representative at the United Nations, United States Representative in the Security Council, and Senior United States Representative to the General Assembly.

Editorial Note

For its diplomatic effort at London the United States Delegation had behind and in support of it the United States record established at the meetings of the Preparatory Commission of the United Nations at London in November–December, 1945 and the planning operation organized concurrently in Washington within the Department of State itself. The latter was centered chiefly within the Office of Special Political Affairs, where, under the direction of Mr. Alger Hiss, the Director of the Office, experts drafted and re-drafted background papers, briefing papers and position papers, all finally pared down to three “books” containing the full recommendations resulting from the meeting of the Preparatory Commission, annotated agenda for each of the organs of the United Nations, and twenty-nine position papers establishing the United States position on as many substantive issues; these briefing books are located in the IO files; certain of the papers are printed at appropriate places in these volumes.

¹⁶ Messrs. Achilles, Bohlen, Coville, Drew, Hare, Schoenfeld, Thompson, Wadsworth, and Wendelin were designated in a United States Delegation Secretariat document of January 10, 1946 as “Political Advisers” (IO Files, document USSEC/14). In a memorandum of January 12, 1946 to the Secretary of State the Principal Adviser (Hiss) described the political advisers as “assigned to necessary work in connection with the relations of the American Delegation with other Delegations” (501.BB/1–1246).

This relatively simple preparation was matched by the uncomplicated program which the United States Delegation took to the first part of the first session of the General Assembly at London. The overriding objective, as stated by Mr. Stettinius, was that "of bringing the United Nations into operation"; and it is not too much to say that the principal United States effort at London went into matters involving launching of the Organization itself. This is traced in other pages of this volume, and, in printing here and in the general volumes of subsequent years, the record of general United States relations with the United Nations as an international organization, the emphasis is and will be placed on documenting the United States position with regard to constitutional and organizational questions vitally affecting the membership, structure, and functioning of the United Nations itself as a political institution.

United States policy planners though hopeful of a quick (perhaps 3-week) organizational meeting of the General Assembly nevertheless went to London anticipating General Assembly or Security Council consideration of certain substantive (that is, non-organizational) problems, and with an established United States position on some twenty-nine such issues. The major question raised at London involving the maintenance of international peace and security, aside from the problem of the international control of atomic energy covered elsewhere in this volume, concerned Soviet-Iranian relations; United States policy at the United Nations regarding this issue is comprehensively documented in Volume VII, pages 289 ff. Likewise though with lesser and varying degrees of emphasis such problems as were raised at London regarding Greece, Indonesia, Spain, and Syria and Lebanon are treated in other volumes of Foreign Relations for 1946; and similarly in years following 1946 such issues will be located in the appropriate regional volumes. The degree of comprehensiveness with which a given regional problem at the United Nations is documented in this series is determined by the position occupied by the United States in the United Nations diplomacy of the question, with due regard to the relationship of that issue to a vital United States national interest.

The documentation created by the United States Delegation at the first part of the first session of the General Assembly is found in the IO files. It is a slim collection by any standard, whether judged by the momentousness of the occasion or by the great mass of paper previously issuing from United States delegations at the planning conferences at Dumbarton Oaks and San Francisco or from United States delegations at later sessions of the General Assembly.

*Draft of Proposed Memorandum From the Deputy Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs (Ross) to the Secretary of State*¹⁷

[WASHINGTON,] January 28, 1946.

Placing of the Iranian, Greek and Indonesian cases¹⁸ upon the Security Council agenda by Iran; the Soviet Union and the Ukraine raises for the first time the question of responsibility within the Department for the initiation and execution of policy and action in such matters.

Before the Delegation sailed for London the possibility that Soviet-Iranian relations and the Indonesian situation would come before the Security Council was foreseen. As a consequence position papers on these two matters were prepared (USGA/Gen/21 and USGA/Gen/26).¹⁹ The Division of International Security Affairs initiated the drafting of these position papers and had the benefit of the collaboration of the several geographic offices in doing so.

The sharper focus of the problem resulted from the receipt on January 22 of a telephone call from Mr. Joseph E. Johnson²⁰ from London requesting a position paper on Greece and a supplement to that on Indonesia. In response to the requests of this office IS began the preparation of a position paper which could be transmitted to London. Because of the way in which the Greek situation and that of Indonesia were inter-related with the Iranian situation the draft paper necessarily dealt with all three matters. Before this telegram could be completed news was received of your departure from London for Washington and in that circumstance SPA notified Mr. Johnson that the material prepared in response to his request was being held pending your return.

From the time of the Departmental reorganization of December 1944 (see Department of State Bulletin, December 17, 1944, "Supplement", pp. 775 ff.), when the Office of Special Political Affairs was charged with the formulation and coordination of policy and action in matters relating to "the establishment of the proposed United Nations Organization and relations with that Organization" (ibid., p. 784), that Office had been involved mainly in a planning-type operation. "Collaboration" with the geographic divisions, as required by the original Departmental order, and hitherto a somewhat academic question, now, in January 1946, with the United Nations actually in being, suddenly assumed an intensely practical and pressing character.

²⁰ Chief of the Division of International Security Affairs and member of the expert advisory staff attached to the Delegation.

The receipt on Saturday of Delun 141²¹ from Mr. Stettinius requesting the advice of the Department as to whether the position taken in the Indonesian position paper was unchanged further complicated the situation. The action copy of this telegram was referred to SPA and it in turn referred it to IS for the preparation of a draft reply. Such a reply was prepared in collaboration with officers of SEA, NOE, and EE. However, the instructions which it is understood Mr. Stettinius received from you before your departure made it unnecessary to dispatch this telegram, with the exception of the sentence stating that the position remained unchanged as developed Saturday evening.²²

It is the belief of this Office that the effective formulation of U.S. policy regarding substantive matters upon the agenda of the Security Council can be brought about by collaboration among the geographic offices concerned and the Office of Special Political Affairs and its several divisions. Formulation of proposed policy can be performed best when full information bearing upon the matter at issue is available. Since information vital to the formulation of the U.S. position is frequently available only in your office the question arises as to how to establish and maintain effective channels for the flow of that information in both directions.²³

In order to assure that the cases appearing before the Security Council²⁵ are thoroughly worked out in advance from the point of ²¹ Telegram 927, January 25, from London. It read: "In view of Ukrainian action in drawing attention of Security Council to the situation in Indonesia, advice is requested from the Department as to whether there is any change proposed US policy as set forth in memorandum of December, 1945, prepared for incorporation in US Delegation UNO Book Three." (501.BB/1-2546).

²² Despatched as Department's secret telegram 913, Undel 125, January 26, to London. It read: "Instructions set forth in memorandum USGA/Gen/26[29] remain unchanged." (501.BB/1-2546).

²³ In a covering memorandum of January 29 to Mr. Ross and to Robert M. McClintock, Special Assistant to the Director of the Office, Mr. Blaisdell wrote: "The attached rough draft . . . is being forwarded to you for discussion purposes only. I will be in touch with you later . . . on the whole question raised by this draft memorandum." In a marginal notation directed to Mr. Ross, the Special Assistant (McClintock) wrote: "This raises a very basic issue which might better be handled orally. I agree with Mr. Blaisdell's view: my only query is as to method of approach." (501.BC/1-2846) view of the policies of the U.S., it is essential that some machinery of coordination be set up between the geographic offices and SPA which deals with specifically UNO matters.

I would suggest, therefore, that the Directors of geographic offices and of SPA designate some person in the office, possibly the Deputy Directors, to coordinate this work in relation to cases falling within their geographic areas so that when a given case is under preparation involving U.S. position with reference to one or the other of the geographic areas, the political aspect of the question as well as the specifically UNO aspect will be fully covered. I shall undertake to notify the geographic offices as far in advance as possible of cases which are to appear before the Security Council or which are likely to be brought up and will also be glad to assist any working groups which may be set up in regard to any specific case. If the Directors of the offices will notify me of the names of the persons they designate for this purpose, a meeting might be arranged in which to discuss the procedure.

*Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs
(Hiss) to Mr. Bohlen*

[WASHINGTON,] March 19, 1946.

As you know, we very strongly favor the type of coordinating group suggested in your memorandum of March 14 to the Directors of the geographic offices and to SPA. Our thinking has been running along the same lines and we have tentatively spelled out the coordinating process like this:

1. The desk officers in the geographic divisions and the appropriate officers in IS and OA will continually be analyzing possible situations which may develop into UNO matters. We assume these officers will keep constantly in touch with each other in this work and will communicate their thinking to their division chiefs and through them to the offices to which they are responsible.

2. The coordinating group suggested in your memorandum of March 14 I assume will want to appoint working teams on various specific cases, composed of officers from the appropriate geographic offices or divisions and from SPA and its divisions. The coordinating group may want to review the papers prepared by such teams, develop basic criteria for guiding the process of arriving at decisions on which matters are to be brought before the UNO and by whom, and also on the types of matters that are not considered appropriate for UNO. Your suggestion that a person be designated in each geographic office and in SPA for this purpose is an excellent one, and either Jack Ross or I will be present at each meeting.

Memorandum Prepared in the Office of Special Political Affairs

NOTE ON THE ARRANGEMENTS FOR THE U.S. DELEGATION²⁶ TO THE UNITED NATIONS AS OF MARCH 20TH

(Provisional—For General Informational Purposes in SPA Only)

Schedule of Secretariat Operations

The Office of the Delegation at 250 West 57th Street (corner Broadway) fifth floor, was opened by Easton Rothwell, Executive Secretary on March 19, 1946. The office will be in full operation on Friday, March 22. Delegation staff problems and liaison with New York will be maintained in Room 165-S (Ext 2532) through Mr. Power²⁷ until 5:30 p.m. Friday, March 22. Thereafter, the Delegation offices may be reached via the telephone tie lines from the Department. Tie line connections may be made through the Chief Operator, Ext. 811.

Most of the Delegation advisers and staff will be quartered in the Pennsylvania Hotel and Henry Hudson Hotel.

Delegation Reporting

The following plans and arrangements for the exchange of information between the U.S. Delegation to UNO in New York and the Department have been agreed upon :

1. The New York group will have the status of a Mission. It will, therefore, as in the case of any of our Missions abroad, be kept informed through infotels of relevant information reaching the Department in cables. Security considerations do not permit the transmission to the New York staff of copies, or the actual text, of cables received in the Department.

²⁶ Note may be taken of the ambiguity in the official styles at this time, the same name, "Delegation", being used to describe both the periodic United States representation to the General Assembly of the United Nations and the permanent United States representation at the seat of the United Nations. It may be noted further that neither usage had any statutory basis but represented an ad hoc development. There was in effect only one "Delegation" at London, the delegation present for the meeting of the General Assembly, but after the establishment on March 19, 1946 of the Office of the United States Delegation to the United Nations there is a certain confusion at times, particularly during the period from June onwards, as to which "Delegation" is being referred to in United States documentation. This situation continued until April 1947 when the offices at New York were officially designated a "Mission".

2. The Daily Top Secret Summary will be made available to Mr. Stettinius; the Daily Secret Summary to such members of the New York staff as have a status comparable to that of a Director in the Department; and the Weekly Review to the appropriate senior officers in New York. Arrangements have also been made for the New York staff to receive all the various press summaries, opinion analyses, etc., prepared in the Department.

3. Two series of information telegrams from New York are planned: (1) an unclassified series which will receive general distribution, including distribution to other interested Government agencies and will be transmitted to our Missions abroad via the Radio Bulletin; and (2) a classified series which will be distributed to the interested officers within the Department and to the War and Navy Departments and which will provide the material for the Secret Summaries and for the infotels to the field. There will be no direct communication between New York Mission and U.S. Missions abroad.²⁸

4. There will be daily courier service by air between Washington and New York, leaving Washington at 3 p.m. and New York at 9 p.m.²⁹ There will also be two direct telephone wires, equipped at both ends with automatic recorders and two teletype lines, one of which will have security safeguards.

5. Mr. John M. Patterson will be responsible for the information and reporting work in New York. Mr. Patterson was previously with PL and was a member of the United States Delegation Secretariat at the recent London meetings. He will have three assistants: Charles J. Merritt, Eugene Rosenfeld and Mrs. Sarah Hodgkinson.

The Information Officer of SPA³⁰ will be responsible for keeping both the New York staff and our Missions abroad informed of such developments as come within the jurisdiction of SPA. The whole question of the division of reporting work between SPA and the other

Offices of the Department is to be discussed at the Information Service³¹ Committee meeting on Thursday.

6. An annotated agenda of UNO meetings scheduled,³² together with topics to be discussed and personnel requirements will be kept current by the Delegation and transmitted regularly to the Department.

Documentation Exchange

International Secretariat documents as well as Delegation documents will be transmitted regularly to the documents section of SPA by the Delegation. Such documents and Delegation documents will be circulated to the interested officers of the Department and other government agencies by the documents section of SPA.

The documents symbols used for Delegation documents and SPA documents intended for transmittal to the Delegation will be similar.³³ Both will be similar to the numbering system used by the International Secretariat.

The Delegation and Department will refer private individuals and organizations to the International Secretariat for copies of UN documents.

³² The status of United Nations activities in New York at this time is interestingly described in a memorandum of "informal comments" drafted by Louis K. Hyde, Jr., of the Delegation. Pointing out that there were four main centers of United Nations activities in New York, one at the United States Delegation, Fisk Building, 250 West 57th Street, "near Columbus Circle", and the other three focused in United Nations Organization centers at Hunter College, at 610 Fifth Avenue at 49th Street, and at the RKO Building on the Avenue of the Americas, he wrote (for the information of Departmental officers) that "development of organization in the social and economic fields is almost non-existent. . . . By contrast, the political and security setup is much further advanced and promises to be so for some time to come. This is natural because of the imminent initiation of the Security Council session . . . members of the Secretariat seem to be arriving almost daily from London. . . . At Hunter College the general atmosphere was a blend of a windup of Naval training (Hunter College was a WAVE Center), civilian students coming and going, and carpenters, painters and telephone men miscellaneously circulating among confused-looking newly-arrived delegates and staff members of the United Nations." (IO files, document SD/INF/4) For documentation regarding the establishment of the temporary headquarters and permanent seat of the United Nations in the United States, see pp. 60 ff.

³³ Both the Delegation Secretariat and the Department (SPA) began early to issue what the Delegation named a "Key to Document Symbols" series (series US/ADM/ for the Delegation and series SD/ADM/ for the Department; these two series contained other administrative data also). In general, documents prepared in the Department or the Delegation (relating to United Nations affairs) were set up with symbols parallel to those established by the United Nations Secretariat, the United Nations Secretariat symbol being prefixed by "SD" (Departmental documents) or "US" (Delegation documents) as the case might be. Thus, with regard to a United Nations Secretariat paper concerned with the First Committee of the General Assembly, where the Secretariat symbol was "A/C.1", the symbols for comparable documentation in the Department and the Delegation would be respectively "SD/A/C.1" and "US/A/C.1".

[WASHINGTON,] March 20, 1946.

Subject: Matters which may come before the Security Council

It has been determined that there shall be formed State Department teams on various matters to be brought before the Security Council. Mr. Charles E. Bohlen has been appointed Special Assistant to the Secretary to direct these teams. The Director of each geographical office and of SPA will appoint representatives to work on the various teams as necessary. Mr. Joseph E. Johnson has the responsibility of acting for Mr. Hiss in this connection. Each of the geographical offices has appointed a United Nations liaison officer.³⁵

Contact with the geographical offices on the following list of problems has been made by Mr. Kopper and work started. IS personnel should continue this work as follows. Please note that primary responsibility as between IS, OA and DA is also indicated.

1. The Iranian situation	IS	SKCK
2. Indonesia	IS	JS
3. Syria-Lebanon	IS	BGB
4. Greece	IS	BGB
5. Polish forces in northern Italy	IS	WA
6. Spain	IS	HJ

These officers should check with Mr. Kopper immediately as to the status of the work on each problem. Mr. Kopper will turn over the ³⁵ This group almost immediately acquired the name of United Nations Liaison Committee. Incomplete minutes of the meetings of this committee from its fourth meeting on April 17, 1946 are found in the Department's unindexed files in Lot File 55-D429, Box 9978. Although the dates of the second and third meetings are known to be March 29 and April 5 respectively, there is no record of the first meeting date.

[WASHINGTON,] March 20, 1946.

DIVISION OF RESPONSIBILITY BETWEEN OA AND IS ON MATTERS WHICH MAY COME BEFORE THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AND THE SECURITY COUNCIL

It is the primary responsibility of SPA within the Department to initiate, to schedule, to assign and to carry through to completion and approval or adoption positions on problems coming before the organs of the United Nations. It is desirable for each organ of the United Nations to be served by a single division of SPA which would be conversant with the problems and technically familiar with the procedures of the organ that it serves. Thus, IS should be equipped to handle all matters coming before the Security Council, OA to handle all matters coming before the General Assembly, and DA to handle Trusteeship Council matters.

In the normal case, there will be no overlapping in the work of IS and OA. There are some cases, however, where under the Charter the Security Council and the General Assembly are both necessarily concerned with the same subject matter.

In connection with the maintenance of international peace and security, the General Assembly, under articles 11 and 14 of the Charter, may make recommendations concerning the principles of cooperation in maintaining peace (including the principles governing disarmament and the regulation of armaments), concerning any question relating to the maintenance of peace and security, and concerning the peaceful adjustment of any situation likely to impair the general welfare or friendly international relations. These last two powers are subject to the provisions of article 12 which recognizes the primary responsibility of the Security Council for the maintenance of international peace and security in disputes and situations requiring prompt and effective action.

The admission, suspension and expulsion of members is the responsibility of the General Assembly upon recommendation of the Security Council (Articles 4, 5 and 6).

Moreover, regional problems, arrangements and agencies, for which in general OA has primary responsibility, involve matters of interest to all the principal organs of the United Nations.

Accordingly, both OA and IS have an interest in such matters in order to be equipped to serve the United States representatives on the the two organs.

In order to minimize the duplication of effort between the staff of OA and IS and to provide the geographic desks and other offices in the Department with a single contact within SPA, the following procedure is proposed :

(1) Matters relating to the Maintenance of International Peace and Security.

On matters relating to the maintenance of international peace and security, primary responsibility for the coordination of the United States position will be assigned to IS in cases where it is anticipated that the matter will come before the Security Council and to OA where it is anticipated that the matter will be first discussed in the General Assembly or where general political conditions exist which if permitted to develop might create a situation or dispute before either organ.

Determination of the allocation of primary responsibility shall be made by agreement between the appropriate Associate Chiefs of the two divisions. Such determination should be made as soon as either division first becomes aware of the potential issue and SPA should be informed thereof.

The division having primary responsibility would be in close contact with geographic desks and other interested divisions of the Department. It would keep the division having secondary responsibility informed of the progress in the preparation of the case, and would in general consult with such division before taking any action. There should be close contact between the officers in the two divisions, so that in the event that a particular case is first brought up in the Security Council or the General Assembly contrary to prior expectation, the division serving that organ would be able to make effective preparation and presentation with the collaboration of the other division.

To the extent that it is possible, only one division, namely, the division to which primary responsibility is assigned, would be in contact with the geographic desks, ORI, and other interested divisions within the Department, although in general there should be prior agreement between OA and IS on specific assignments outside the Office—ORI, for example. This may not always be possible as in cases where IS is concerned with a problem in a geographic area which may be brought before the Security Council and OA is making a study of the general overall political developments within that area. In such cases, the officers in OA and IS should be alert to make clear to the geographic desks the nature of and distinction between their respective lines of work.

(2) Admission to Membership.

OA shall have primary responsibility to coordinate the U. S. views on the question of admission to membership generally and with respect to the admission of each particular applicant.

IS will be kept informed of and collaborate in such coordination and, when the policy is formulated, will be responsible for its transmission to the U. S. Representative on the Security Council in the light of the procedures of the Security Council.

(3) Suspension and Expulsion of a Member.

The same division of responsibility shall apply as in the case of admission to membership.

(4) Agreed Assignment of Matters relating to the Maintenance of International Peace and Security Presently in Prospect.

In a conversation between officers of OA and IS, the assignment of primary responsibility was agreed to in respect of the following matters which may come before the United Nations:

1. The Iranian situation—IS
2. Indonesia—IS
3. Syria-Lebanon—IS
4. Greece—IS
5. Polish forces in northern Italy—IS
6. Spain—IS
7. Manchuria—IS
8. Turkish Straits—OA
9. Turkish-Soviet Frontier—OA
10. Independent [Independence?] movements in Indochina—OA, DA
11. India—OA
12. Indochina border dispute—OA
13. British forces in Egypt—IS
14. The Argentine situation—OA
15. Admission of Albania—OA
16. Soviet forces in Bornholm—IS
17. Korea—OA
18. Sarawak—OA
19. Transjordan—OA, DA

In addition, OA is preparing general papers on the broader aspects, historical and political, of the general situations of which the above specific cases are current manifestations. For example, papers are in process of preparation on the political aspects of the presence of foreign troops in various areas throughout the world and on the political significance of the extension of Russian influence in the Middle East.

*Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs
(Hiss) to the Secretary of State*

[WASHINGTON,] March 21, 1946.

In addition to your party which, I understand, will include yourself and two others, it is recommended that the following officers be authorized to proceed to New York to assist the United States Representative on the Security Council at the meetings commencing March 25, 1946:

IS	Harding Bancroft	Adviser on Rules of Procedure and general substantive items.
IS	Dean Rusk ³⁷	Liaison Officer for Military Staff Committee.
IS	Samuel Kopper	Assistant on Iranian case.
NE	George Allen and Clyde Dunn ³⁸	Advisers on Iranian case.

I hope to be able to attend for perhaps the first week of the meeting to give such assistance as may be necessary in a general advisory capacity and especially to help work out and coordinate relationships between the Stettinius mission and SPA. It is also recommended that Mr. Paul Taylor accompany the above-named group as an adviser on the problems of admitting new members, with special reference to the Albanian request,³⁹ and also to observe the operations of the Security Council and the Secretariat for purposes of assisting the work of SPA and its divisions.

The above personnel will furnish advice and technical assistance to the U.S. Representative on the Security Council and will serve in addition to the personnel permanently or temporarily assigned to Mr. Stettinius's staff. This is according to the basic working agreement on which the Stettinius staff is founded, namely, the staff in New York will regularly be supplemented by specialists from the Department of State. In this connection two officers from the Department who already have been assigned to the Mission are:

Charles E. Bohlen—General political advice.

Joseph E. Johnson—Chief of IS, general technical advice.

³⁷ Dean Rusk, Assistant Chief of the Division of International Security Affairs.

³⁹ For documentation regarding this subject, see pp. 357 ff.

It occurs to me that you may also wish to consider asking Mr. McDermott ⁴⁰ to be in New York during the period that you will remain there.

It is expected that certain of the group of personnel going from the Department will return to Washington at or before the completion of the Iranian case, and experts in other fields will attend the meetings for other matters coming before the Council.

Reference your memorandum of March 22 on the subject of personnel attending the Security Council.

Mr. Joseph E. Johnson, Chief of the Division of International Security Affairs, was sent to New York to attend the meetings of the Committee of Experts ⁴¹ which began on Wednesday, March 20. Mr. Stettinius has definitely counted on Mr. Johnson's being available in New York on indefinite detail from the Department for general responsibilities relating to Security Council meetings. I have just found I will not be able to go up on Sunday as I have made an appointment along the lines you and I discussed yesterday for Monday afternoon. For this reason, it seems all the more important that Mr. Johnson remain on in New York even though he may not be needed for direct assistance to you.

Mr. Rusk, who dealt with Joint Chiefs of Staff matters in the War Department during the war with the rank of Colonel, is our principal liaison officer with the Military Staff Committee members. ⁴² Mr. Stettinius has felt it important that he be in New York on a more or less regular basis for this liaison work so long as the Military Staff Committee is establishing its organization and dealing with the important question of the agreements for supplying of forces for the Security Council. ⁴³

Subject: Information to U.S. Delegation in New York

The Policy Information Service is responsible for the sending of information telegrams to Mr. Stettinius in New York. This information is equivalent to the infotels which go to the principal missions abroad. However, in regard to cases actually pending or about to appear before the Security Council, it is believed that the geographic offices should be responsible for communicating any information bearing on such cases received in the Department to the U.S. Delegation in New York. This would apply particularly to telegrams which although referred to in infotels should be repeated in full to the U.S. Delegation because of their immediate bearing upon a case before the Security Council. The Code Room can repeat any incoming message from missions abroad to New York on notification from the appropriate desk officer.

At Mr. Ross' suggestion I discussed the establishment and work of the United Nations Liaison Committee with Mr. Peurifoy.^{44a} I explained to him very briefly the objectives which we had in mind and the favorable reception of the Committee in the Department indicated by statements of Mr. George Allen and Mr. Hayden Raynor.⁴⁵

Mr. Peurifoy said that Mr. Acheson had expressed some concern as to whether or not we were doing enough work on questions which are likely to come before the Security Council. I replied that a number of teams were working on these questions and that each week the Committee goes over the work of the teams and decides which issues should be given a priority, adding new items and deleting items which no longer seem likely to come up.

⁴⁴ Addressed to the Directors of Geographic Offices—European Affairs (Mathews), Near Eastern and African Affairs (Henderson), Far Eastern Affairs (Vincent), American Republic Affairs (Briggs).

^{44a} John E. Peurifoy, Special Assistant to the Under Secretary of State (Acheson).

⁴⁵ G. Hayden Raynor, Special Assistant to the Director of the Office of European Affairs.

Mr. Peurifoy would like to receive notice of these meetings, agendas and minutes and expressed an interest in attending when possible.

Mr. Peurifoy stated that Mr. Acheson had indicated a need for a complete cross-indexing of Security Council Journals. Mr. Peurifoy had discussed this with Mr. Hiss and Mr. Ross and had asked Mr. Gange⁴⁶ to work up such an index in collaboration with indexes received from Mr. Rothwell⁴⁷ in New York. Mr. Peurifoy felt that such an index should not be part of the Under Secretary's office but should be on a Departmental basis.

I indicated that IS had already started work on indexing Security Council proceedings as they relate to the interpretation of various articles of the Charter,⁴⁸ and that IS is particularly interested in the type of index mentioned by Mr. Peurifoy.

It was left that IS would contact Mr. Gange or Mr. Rothwell on this question of indexing.

Weekly Progress Report to the Undersecretary. (This memo confirms discussions with representatives of the divisions of SPA.)

In accordance with these discussions, it is planned to have SPA issue a Weekly Progress Report for the use of the Undersecretary covering the major developments in the field of United Nations affairs. The report will include major accomplishments, discussion of new problems or activities which will require policy decisions by the Department, and a brief status report of pending problems or actions.

The report will cover activities of the United States Delegation, developments in SPA, and reports from the field.

Each division of SPA will designate one person who will be responsible for reviewing regularly the activities of his division and submitting a weekly report to the SPA Information Office (Mrs. Hartley). The report will be due by noon Friday of each week.

⁴⁷ Mr. Rothwell at this time was Secretary General of the Permanent Delegation in New York.

⁴⁸ The "binder" completed by IS on this subject may be found in the IO files.

⁴⁹ Addressed to the Division Chiefs of SPA and to the Acting Policy Information Officer (Mrs. Hartley).

⁵⁰ Internal evidence suggests that this memorandum was written about mid-April but in any case before April 25.

Mrs. Hartley will assemble the material from the divisions, from the office of the Director, from the United States Delegation, and reports from the field and will compile the final report which will be ready for submission to the Undersecretary by the close of business on Monday of the week following. Arrangements will be made to make copies of the final report available to the divisions for their information.

Memorandum by the Secretary of State

CONFIDENTIAL

[WASHINGTON,] April 20, 1946.

ORGANIZATION AND OPERATION OF THE UNITED STATES MISSION (UNM)
TO THE UNITED NATIONS, NEW YORK ⁵¹

1. Appointment of and Instructions to Representatives

The "United Nations Participation Act of 1945" (Public Law 264) provides identical methods of appointment and instructions for (1) the U.S. [UN?] Representative of the United States at the seat of the United Nations and in the Security Council, (2) the Representatives of the United States in the Economic and Social Council, and (3) the Trusteeship Council.* Each is appointed by the President (Sec. 2). The Act also provides that each will receive instructions from "the President transmitted by the Secretary of State unless other means of transmission is designated by the President" (Sec. 3). It is anticipated that, as in the case of other chief diplomatic representatives of the United States, these Representatives will work on the general basis of instructions from the Department.

Instructions from the Department to the New York Mission will be distributed directly to the Representative for whom they are intended. To facilitate this procedure instructions ordinarily will be marked "For Stettinius" or "For Winant," as the case may be.

2. Principal Responsibilities of the Respective Representatives and their Staffs

It is assumed that the U.S. Representatives at the seat of the organization will work in close collaboration. Within this framework of collaboration each Representative has special responsibilities as contemplated in the Participation Act.

*In view of the special nature of the work of the Commission on Atomic Energy, relations with the U.S. Representative on the Commission are not covered in this memorandum. [Footnote in the original.]

The U.S. Representative at the seat and in the Security Council is primarily responsible for representing the United States in the work of the Security Council and sub-organs that it may create, and for appropriate relationships with U.S. representatives on the Military Staff Committee. As provided in the Act he will be assisted in these responsibilities by a Deputy Representative in the Security Council appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Deputy will sit for the Representative in the latter's absence. It is also anticipated that the political counsel of the Deputy may be found useful by the Representative on the Economic and Social Council and the Trusteeship Council and that this relationship will grow and strengthen itself in the course of time although the Representatives on these two Councils, as indicated below, each will have his own staff of advisers and technical assistants. The functions of the U.S. Representative to the Security Council in his capacity as U.S. Representative at the seat are discussed under point 3, below.

The Representative of the United States in the Economic and Social Council will have full responsibility for representing the United States in the work of the Economic and Social Council and sub-organs that it may create and for carrying on appropriate relationships with the work of specialized agencies related to the Economic and Social Council.

The Representative of the United States in the Trusteeship Council will have similar responsibilities with respect to the work of that Council.

It is expected that each of these Representatives will be responsible for the organization of his own staff of advisers and technical assistants and the direction of its work. The Department will consult with each of the Representatives in the selection and organization of their staffs. Most of these staffs will be provided by detail of officers, as needed, from the Department, the Foreign Service, or other government agencies inasmuch as the budget for the Mission is extremely limited insofar as advisers and technical assistants are concerned.

3. Additional Responsibilities of the U.S. Representative at the Seat

As provided in Public Law 264, the Representative of the United States at the seat not only serves in the Security Council but is expected to perform "such other functions in connection with the participation of the United States in the United Nations as the President may from time to time direct" (Sec. 2(a)). A number of these additional functions already have developed as indicated immediately below, and others will no doubt develop in the future.

a. Relationships with the United Nations and Its Secretariat on General and Administrative Problems

For example, there will arise questions concerning the budget of the United Nations, the organization of its Secretariat, requests from the Secretariat for assistance in employing United States personnel, matters concerning the temporary and permanent site of the United Nations, communications between the Department and the Secretariat which are not of primary interest to the Representative on the Economic and Social Council or on the Trusteeship Council, etc. All of these will be the daily business of the United States Representative at the seat, and his staff.

b. General Services of the Mission

It is also expected that the U.S. Representative at the seat will have responsibility for organizing and operating the Secretariat of the Mission. To facilitate the work of the Mission and assist the various U.S. Representatives to the United Nations, it will be helpful for the Secretariat to furnish all of them with the services ordinarily required by a United States Mission; if the other Representatives so desire, it should be possible for them to make mutually satisfactory arrangements along these lines with the U.S. Representative at the seat. These common services might include, for example, such services as press relations, office space, supplies and equipment, communications, transportation, administration of stenographic force, and the filing system.

c. Annual Budget of the Mission

It is expected also that the U.S. Representative will be responsible for preparing for submission to the Department the annual budget of the Mission. In this connection he will, of course, prepare estimates for his own staff on Security Council matters and such staff as he requires for work with the Military Staff Committee group, and also for the Secretariat of the Mission. He would receive from the Representatives on the Economic and Social Council and the Trusteeship Council their budget estimates so that they could be submitted as part of the budget of the Mission. A single common budget can then be submitted which will facilitate review as a whole by the Department, the Budget Bureau, and the Congress of the expenses of participation by the United States in the United Nations under the terms of the United Nations Participation Act of 1945.

4. Delegations to the General Assembly

The roles of the U.S. Representative at the seat and in the Security Council, his Deputy and the representatives in the Economic and Social Council and the Trusteeship Council, at meetings of the General Assembly, will need to be defined at the time of each session of the Assembly in light of the appointments by the President of the Delegations to those sessions. Irrespective of the makeup of the Delegation itself it may develop that the Deputy may usefully serve as the chief political adviser to Assembly Delegations in order to ensure continuity of political contacts with those delegations which have permanent representation at the seat of the organization and to facilitate coordination of American policy in the Security Council and in the Assembly.

5. General Administrative Provisions

All budgetary and administrative matters of the United States Mission to the United Nations, New York, should, of course, be handled in conformity with policies and standards established by the Secretary of State in appropriate Departmental regulations. The policy and procedures with respect to the recruitment and employment of United States Nationals for service with the United Nations Secretariat, if any, should be established by mutual agreement between the Secretary of State and the Secretary General of the United Nations.

Memorandum by the Associate Chief of the Division of International Security Affairs (Bancroft) to the Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs (Hiss) ⁵²

[WASHINGTON,] April 22, 1946.

Subject: Transmission of Material from Washington to the U.S. Representative on the Security Council

The several teams of the Department of State under the jurisdiction of the United Nations Liaison Committee are presently engaged in the preparation of background material and policy position papers on questions which, it is anticipated, may arise in the Security Council.

Before a question has actually been brought to the attention of the Security Council, the policy position is formulated only in general and indefinite terms. Most of the work at this stage consists of the assembly and organization of the relevant background material.

Questions arise accordingly not only as to at what stage of the preparation the United States Representative on the Security Council should be furnished with appropriate material by the Department but also of the manner in which this material should be prepared and cleared at various levels of authority in the Department.

⁵² Although the exact status of this memorandum is not clear, it throws considerable light on the thinking and practice of the Department at the time on the problem of documents liaison between the Department and the Permanent Delegation and on the status of background and position papers prepared in the Department for the use of the Delegation in New York.

It is obvious on the one hand that the U.S. Representative should be kept informed of the development of the situations which are potential Security Council cases as well as of the progress of the work being done in Washington.

On the other hand, events in some cases develop so rapidly that it would be dangerous for the State Department to crystallize its position and transmit it to New York when the underlying facts are fluid. Furthermore, in certain instances, it may be desirable for the U.S. Representative on the Council to be able to say simply that he does not have the necessary facts in his possession and must refer to his Government for instructions.

In the light of this discussion, the following general rules are submitted for the purpose of establishing working practice:

1. Until a case is actually brought to the attention of the Security Council, papers prepared for the benefit of the United States Representative should be designed primarily for background use.

2. While usually it will be advisable for such papers to state the United States position and policy applicable to the specific case and, in so far as is possible in advance, the initial position to be taken in the Security Council, such guidance should be couched in general terms and it should be indicated that it is subject to change in the light of the receipt of new information or in the light of conditions existing at the moment when the case is presented to the Council. When a case covered by a preliminary background memo becomes active in the Security Council the statements on U.S. position, policy guidance, and initial position to be taken in the Council contained in the background paper will be confirmed or amended by instructions.

3. The level at which such background papers should be cleared in the Department before transmission to New York should be decided on a case to case basis. Generally, it should be borne in mind that as the papers are primarily background in nature it may often be unnecessary to clear them in the Department initially at a level above that of Office Directors. On all cases, however, involving specific countries, papers either for background or action and instructions must be approved by the geographic divisions and the Director or Deputy Director of the Geographic Office or Offices concerned. The papers or the accompanying instructions should indicate in each case the level at which clearance has taken place.

4. Instructions either separate or accompanying the papers should indicate in each case to what extent, if any, our representative in the Security Council can disclose the United States position or policy contained in the paper to representatives of other Governments in informal preliminary discussions.

5. The weekly progress reports on the status of preparation of the potential Council cases should be regularly transmitted to New York.

WASHINGTON, April 22, 1946.

DEAR ED: I have been giving thought to the question of the organization and operation of our mission to the United Nations as a result of our various talks on this subject and conversations I have had recently with Mr. Winant.

It seems to me that it is important that this matter be clarified. Accordingly, I am sending you the attached memorandum on that subject as expressive of my views.⁵³ I would appreciate it if you would bring this study to Mr. Winant's attention when he arrives in New York.

I will of course be glad to have any comments which occur either to you or to Mr. Winant on this subject and I recognize that the whole question must be subject to developments as we gather experience in this field.

Sincerely yours,

[JAMES F. BYRNES]

501/5-1846

The United States Representative at the United Nations (Stettinius) to the Secretary of State

NEW YORK, May 18, 1946.

DEAR JIMMIE: I have given a great deal of thought to the memorandum which you sent me recently expressing your views on the organization and operation of the United States Mission to the United Nations. I regret that I am forced to the conclusion that the plan to set up several autonomous missions in New York without provision for central coordination has serious disadvantages.

From the standpoint of orderly administration and necessary correlation of policy and operations in the various fields, I believe the plan will prove unworkable. It will impair the strong, well integrated participation which our Government should assure to the United Nations. My judgment is based upon what I believe are fundamental requirements for the most effective representation of the United States in the United Nations and is without regard to any personal consideration of my own or to other personalities.

I have always conceived of our representation as a unified mission to the United Nations of which the United States Representative would be the head. I believe this is necessary in the interest of efficient and effective operations. Such centralized responsibility is in line with the organization of our missions abroad. It is consistent with the fact that the activities of the United Nations and our participation in them cannot be separated into security matters, economic and social matters, trusteeship matters, etc. There are problems in the economic field that affect the Security Council and the Trusteeship Council. Similarly, there are problems involving the Security Council and the Trusteeship Council which affect the Economic and Social Council. The United Nations recognized this fact after long and serious consideration by establishing a single Secretariat for all organs, headed by a Secretary-General with over-all responsibility.

It seems clear to me that the intent of the Participation Act of 1945, as passed by Congress, is to establish a unified mission under the United States Representative at the seat of the United Nations with ambassadorial status. This is definitely indicated by the statutory title of the United States Representative and by the broad functions authorized for this office. I continue to believe that this conception is sound and necessary.

Furthermore, the concept of a unified mission was followed in setting up the original budget of the Delegation, which must carry it to July 1947. As developed in the Department and the Bureau of the Budget and as approved by Congress, this budget provides for a single servicing and administrative organization. It assumes that the United States Representative, after consultation with the other representatives, will see that their needs are cared for through the central organization. This assumption is workable only if the United States Representative is regarded as the chief of mission, with clear authority to make necessary administrative decisions. He could not do this on the basis of the proposal that "if the other representatives so desire, it should be possible for them to make mutually satisfactory arrangements along these lines with the United States Representative at the Seat".

In case the other representatives avail themselves of this principle to set up separate services and administrative arrangements, the result would be a wasteful duplication of effort which the United States Representative would be without authority to prevent. This result would seriously jeopardize Congressional approval of future budgets of the mission.

Equally important from a practical standpoint is the effect which may be produced in our relations with the United Nations by separate and uncoordinated representation in the various fields. I recognize that the determination and coordination of policy is in the first instance a responsibility of the President and the Secretary of State. In order to give full effect at the seat of the United Nations to the basic coordination achieved in Washington, however, there must be comparable coordination in the day-to-day dealings of the United States representation in New York with the various organs of the United Nations.

While I cannot emphasize too strongly my conviction of the need for a unified mission headed by the United States Representative, I am fully aware that wide latitude must be accorded to the other representatives. As I visualize the relationships between the United States Representative and the other representatives, no question arises as to his interfering in any way with the carrying out of their responsibilities in their respective fields.

The United States Representative should facilitate in every way the activities of the other representatives—in the selection of their own professional staffs, and in their direct dealings with their colleagues, both in Washington and in the United Nations. His relationship to them should be primarily that of cooperation and collaboration. At the same time, I believe the principle of maximum freedom and mutual assistance must be accompanied by the vesting of authority in a responsible chief of mission to render basic administrative decisions and to coordinate major differences of view in order to assure the carrying out of the foreign policy of the United States as determined by the President and the Secretary of State.

This is the tested principle of sound organization which, after years of experience, the United States Government has found essential to the successful operation of all our missions to foreign countries.

With best wishes,

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD R. STETTINIUS, JR.

501/5-1846

WASHINGTON, June 8, 1946.

DEAR ED: I was very glad to receive your letter of May 18 setting forth your comments on the memorandum I sent you recently concerning the organization of our United Nations mission in New York.

You have contributed so much to the United Nations that I know you will always be interested, and you must feel at liberty at all times to give us your advice. We will need it and we will want it.

Because I am sure that your interest and concern in the United Nations have not been affected by your resignation and because I hope to continue to benefit from an exchange of views with you on this and other subjects, I am writing now in some detail in answer to your letter of May 18. My thought is that you may wish to submit this letter to Mr. Johnson with your comments. I have directed Department officials to continue their consideration of the several suggestions made by you.

It was certainly not my intention in the memorandum I sent you to set forth a plan for several autonomous missions in New York without provision for central coordination. The memorandum recognizes the need for collaboration among the various U.S. Representatives at the seat of the organization. Similarly, it recognizes the principle of central coordination to the extent that application of this principle seems feasible at the present stage in the evolution of the New York mission.

As I pointed out in my letter of April 22, this whole question "must be subject to developments as we gather experience in this field".

The Security Council first met in New York on March 25, the Economic and Social Council less than two weeks ago, the Trusteeship Council has not yet been organized. Little more than two months have passed since we first organized the Delegation in New York. I have thought, and still think, that it would be a mistake to attempt to lay down any hard and fast lines of organization at such an early stage in the evolution of our representation to the United Nations.

On the other hand, it occurred to me after our various talks on the subject that a useful purpose would be served by putting my views down in memorandum form with the object of evoking your comments and those of others concerned. In this way, we would be keeping abreast of the evolutionary process and in a position to make adjustments in the organization as we gathered experience and as developments might warrant.

The memorandum I sent you, therefore, set forth the bare facts of the provisions of the United Nations Participation Act with regard to the various United States Representatives provided for therein and the simple, basic responsibilities of each to the extent they can be envisaged at this time and in the present state of organization of the New York mission.

In his capacity as Representative in the Security Council, the basic responsibilities of the "representative of the United States at the seat of the United Nations" are clear. However, any additional responsibilities which he may have are not defined in the Act, either explicitly or, in my view, implicitly. As pointed out in my memorandum, the Act merely provides that the representative at the seat "shall perform such other functions in connection with the participation of the United States in the United Nations as the President may from time to time direct." It is with particular reference to these "other functions" that I feel we must be guided by experience.

However, it seems to me that there are, even at the present time, a number of basic administrative responsibilities, including the budget and the provision of certain administrative services, which might well be coordinated under the United States Representative "at the seat." My suggestions in this regard were set forth in the last part of the memorandum I sent you. The memorandum clearly recognized that additional functions would, no doubt, develop in the future.

In this connection, I certainly agree with you that the activities of the Security Council, the Economic and Social Council, the Trusteeship Council, and of all the other United Nations organs and agencies are inter-related and that coordination of our participation in all these varied activities is essential. I also agree with you, first, that much of this coordination will take place in Washington, and, as you know, we have effective machinery for this purpose in the Department; and, second, that comparable coordination at the seat of the United Nations should be developed. I agree with you that there should be liaison between the Representative on the Security Council and such Committees as the Military Committee—in fact, with all Committees. However, I believe that our representation to the United Nations is not analogous in all respects to one of our missions abroad, primarily because the basic organization of the United Nations is not analogous to the basic organization of a foreign government with a single executive head. For this reason, and because of the fact that United Nations headquarters have been established in New York, it seems to me that it is going to be very difficult to define rigidly or precisely the degree of coordination of policy which will be required in Washington as compared with New York.

Bearing in mind the relationships to the President of the various United States Representatives as set forth in the United Nations Participation Act, I agree with you that relationships among them should be based primarily on cooperation and collaboration. In the last analysis, far more can be accomplished on this basis than by formal attempts to define authority which are more likely than not, in my opinion, to lead to organizational rigidities. In the process of cooperation and collaboration and as we learn by experience, a particularly large measure of responsibility for improved coordination at the policy level will fall upon the United States Representative at the seat.

Have been hoping to get time to write you a personal letter.

Sincerely yours,

[JAMES F. BYRNES]

P.S. Since you resigned subsequent to your letter of May 18, I am taking the liberty of sending a copy of this letter to Mr. Herschel Johnson who, because of his position as Deputy, is now acting as our representative to the Organization.

[On May 31 the White House released to the press the text of a letter from Mr. Stettinius to the President in which Mr. Stettinius submitted his resignation as United States Representative at the United Nations; President Truman's acceptance letter was released on June 3; for texts see Department of State Bulletin, June 9, 1946, pages 988 and 989. On June 5 it was announced that the President had named Senator Warren R. Austin, of Vermont, to replace Mr. Stettinius. Although the Congress was still in session on that date President Truman did not send Senator Austin's nomination to the Senate until January 8, 1947, it being necessary to await the expiry of the 79th Congress which had enacted the legislation establishing the office of the United States Representative at the Seat of the United Nations (and in the Security Council) and of which Congress Senator Austin had been a member (see Article I, Section 6, of the United States Constitution). The constitutional ban implicit in this situation did not extend to Senator Austin in his capacity as representing the United States at the second part of the first session of the General Assembly. Mr. Herschel V. Johnson, who had been functioning as Deputy United States Representative in the Security Council since May 8 (he had been nominated to the position on April 11 while United States Minister to Sweden), assumed charge of the United States Delegation to the United Nations ("the Permanent Delegation") almost immediately (June 6) after Mr. Stettinius' resignation, although there seems to have been no formal action taken by the Department in this regard.]

I should appreciate your help in getting clearance from the Secretary before he leaves⁵⁴ on the following General Assembly matters⁵⁵

⁵⁴ Mr. Byrnes' departure to attend the Paris Peace Conference was imminent, as the conference was scheduled to convene on July 29 (see volumes III and IV).

which I should like to discuss briefly with you before you take them up with the Secretary :

1. *Committee Assignments of Delegates and Alternates.*⁵⁶ We have worked out the following assignments (copy of agenda giving breakdown of work by committees is attached) :

Committee	Delegate	Alternate
General	Byrnes Austin
Political and Security	Byrnes Austin Connally	(Stevenson)
Economic and Financial	Vandenberg	Douglas
Social and Humanitarian	Roosevelt	Eaton
Trusteeship	(Bloom)	Dulles
Legal	(Charles Fahy)
Administrative & Budgetary	Bloom	Stevenson
League of Nations		Eaton
Headquarters	Austin (assisted by Fahy)

2. Size and Composition of Delegation. We have very carefully worked out estimated minimum needs bearing fully in mind the Secretary's feeling that the Delegation to the London Assembly meeting was too large. Our estimate is based on the following principles:

(a) Representatives of other agencies will not be listed. The principal other agencies concerned are already represented as advisers to Mr. Winant with regard to the work of the Economic and Social Council with which they are primarily concerned. The Economic and Social Council will be meeting at the same time as the Assembly.

(b) United States representatives on the Security Council, the Economic and Social Council or other United Nations agencies will not be ⁵⁶ The composition of the United States Delegation to the General Assembly, nominations to which were approved by the Senate on July 25, was as follows: Representatives, Senator Warren R. Austin, Senator Tom Connally, Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg, Mrs. Anna Eleanor Roosevelt, and Representative Sol Bloom; Alternate Representatives, Congressman Charles A. Eaton, Congresswoman Helen Gahagan Douglas, Mr. John Foster Dulles, and Mr. Adlai E. Stevenson.

Departmental consideration of the composition of the United States Delegation began in early June, the situation being complicated by the absence of Secretary Byrnes from Washington. (He was in Paris attending a meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers.) Relevant documentation in the Department's central indexed files relating to this phase of preparation is as follows: (1) memorandum, the Deputy Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs (Ross) to the Under (Acting) Secretary of State (Acheson), June 11 (501.BB/6-1146); (2) memorandum, Mr. Ross to the Counselor of the Department (Cohen), June 11 (501.BB/6-1146); (3) telegram 3099, Secdel 349, June 26, the Acting Secretary to Mr. Cohen at Paris, June 26 (740.00119 Council/6-2646); (4) telegram 3184, Delsec 640, Secretary Byrnes at Paris to Acting Secretary Acheson, June 28 (740.00119 Council/6-2846); and (5) telegram 3390, Secdel 462, the Acting Secretary to the Secretary at Paris, July 11 (740.00119 Council/7-1146).

The Secretary of State gave "tentative" approval to this committee setup before leaving for Paris for the peace conference. For the committee assignments finally settled upon, see p. 213.

listed. These people will be in New York for their regular assignments and available for consultation. No need is seen, therefore, to list them as members of the Assembly Delegation.

(c) We will rely to the fullest possible extent on existing facilities of the mission in New York. Our estimate of minimum needs includes:

Delegates and Alternates	10
Advisers	24
Political Liaison Officers	8
Secretary of Delegation and Delegation Assistants	8

Taking into account secretarial and other supporting staff required we estimate a total of 100–120 which is very substantially less than the 172 we had in London. If the Secretary approves this general approach, we will work out the details with Mr. Russell's staff.⁵⁷

3. Pennsylvania Hotel. The administrative staff in New York proposes that arrangements be made with the Pennsylvania Hotel to provide in that hotel all living and office accommodations required by the entire United States Delegation. If the Secretary would signify his willingness to make his headquarters in the Pennsylvania we could then authorize our staff in New York to negotiate the necessary arrangements with the management. Given the present very difficult situation in New York, it is essential that these negotiations be initiated without delay.

Memorandum of Telephone Conversation, by the Deputy Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs (Ross)

[WASHINGTON,] August 27, 1946.

Subject: Plans and Preparations of Senator Austin for the General Assembly Meeting

Senator Austin telephoned from Vermont with regard to his personal plans and preparation for the General Assembly meeting in New York to ask if we had any information on the likelihood of postponement of this meeting. The Senator's original plan was to come to Washington for a period of intensive work the day after Labor Day. He still wanted to spend about the same amount of time in intensive preparation before the Assembly meeting but in view of reported uncertainties about the date of the meeting he was at a loss as to how to plan his schedule. He asked if we would try to find out something about this and let him know promptly. I told the Senator that we would certainly inform him as promptly as we get any information ourselves; meanwhile, the only information we have is that Mr. Lie had sent Assistant Secretary General Sobolev to Paris to discuss this matter with the Foreign Ministers.⁵⁸

A general discussion took place on plans for work in the Department prior to the convening of the full Assembly Delegation in New York.⁵⁹
Schedule of Meetings in Department

In particular a schedule for meetings in the Department on preparations for the Assembly was discussed and Mr. Austin suggested that the meetings be scheduled on Friday, September 6, and Monday, September 9 through Thursday noon, September 12, giving him an opportunity to return to Vermont on Thursday afternoon. A schedule was worked out as follows:⁶⁰

September 6—Friday

11:00 United Nations Liaison Committee
4:00 Economic and Financial

⁵⁸ A decision was made on September 8 by the Foreign Ministers at Paris that the General Assembly session would be postponed from September 23 to October 23; for documentation, see vol. III, pp. 313-321, 364-370, 383-390, and 398-404, passim. Regarding a first postponement (made in July) of the General Assembly meeting from September 3 to September 23, see Department of State Bulletin, August 4, 1946, pp. 220 and 221.

⁶⁰ The schedule seems to have been closely adhered to except that there is no record of the meeting scheduled on the United Nations Liaison Committee and the two meetings planned for September 11 were reversed in order. Minutes of the September 11 meeting on the veto problem are printed p. 293; minutes of the other meetings, not printed, are found in the IO files as a collective document, document SD/A/51 (Minutes 1-9).

Documentation

Mr. Austin was given copies of the following two booklets prepared in SPA: Preliminary Papers on Agenda and Organization of United States Delegation, and Preliminary Position Papers, Committee 2, Economic and Financial. He was informed that he would be given similar books on each committee of the Assembly prior to the meetings with officers of the Department.⁶¹

⁶¹ Documentation provided Senator Austin at this exploratory and subsequently scheduled meetings and all other documentation relating to the Department's preparation for the forthcoming session of the General Assembly may be found in the IO files. It may be noted parenthetically that this preparatory documentation is much more extensive and refined both in a general and specialized way than was that for the first General Assembly session at London. The two basic collections are the SD/A (General Assembly) series (1946) which is multisubject in character and the SD/A/Committees 1-6 series (1946) which contains background papers and position papers organized on a committee basis. Such documentation was supplied also to members of the Delegation to the General Assembly as appropriate (e.g., Mrs. Roosevelt would be given a "book" of background and position papers relating to issues concerning the General Assembly's Third Committee, the committee on which she was to serve).

Senator Austin was also furnished with "books" and collections of documents on issues of special interest to the General Assembly, such as the "Headquarters" or "Site" question, and on similarly important questions which were primarily Security Council matters jurisdictionally (such as the veto question and the membership question). These special books, frequently in the form of black binders, are cited in appropriate chapters that follow in this and other volumes.

Minutes of the First Meeting of the United States Delegation, Held at New York, Hotel Pennsylvania, October 17, 1946, 11 a. m.

SECRET

[Here follows list of names of persons (15) present.]⁶⁸

Nature of Delegation Minutes

Senator Austin, in opening the meeting, asked regarding the arrangements for a record of the Delegation meetings. He explained that he did not want the meetings bound by the restrictions which would arise from a stenographic report. It was important that the Delegates have complete freedom of speech remaining free to change their positions as new facts arose from free discussion. The other members of the Delegation agreed that there should be no stenographic report made, but that an officer of the Delegation, in this case Mr. Power, should be designated to prepare minutes.⁶⁹

⁶⁷ Extracts from the minutes of the first Delegation meeting, held on the morning of October 17, are printed infra; in this document are listed the Committee assignments of the Representatives and Alternate Representatives themselves.

[Here follows a statement by Senator Austin to the effect that the basic nature of the Delegation's task was to show the world "that the United States believed in the 'United Nations' Charter". At the conclusion of the statement Senator Austin returned to a discussion of the Delegation's working procedures by observing "that he did not want to be arbitrary in his work with the Delegation, that all delegates should feel free to comment on any statements or positions he might take."]

Composition of Delegation's Committees

Senator Austin explained that great thought had been given to the appointment of delegates to work on particular committees, but that the door was not closed to changes. He urged any delegate who had a strong feeling that he should not serve on a particular committee, or that he should be named to another committee, should raise his voice, if he had a strong, abiding feeling on the subject. Senator Austin then read the following proposed list of committee assignments:

Committee 1	Political and Security	Senator Connally
Committee 2	Economic and Financial	Senator Vandenberg, ⁷⁰ Mrs. Douglas Mrs. Roosevelt
Committee 3	Social, Humanitarian and Cultural
Committee 4	Trusteeship	Mr. Bloom, Mr. Dulles
Committee 5	Budgetary	Senator Vandenberg, Mr. Bloom, Mr. Eaton Mr. Fahy ⁷¹
Committee 6	Legal	Senator Austin, Mr. Stevenson, Mr. Fahy ⁷¹
Headquarters	Committee	Senator Austin
General	Committee

The above assignments were unanimously approved as a tentative list with the understanding that the absent members of the Delegation tion should be consulted on their committee assignments when they arrived.

[Here follows discussion of the problem of selecting the permanent site for the seat of the United Nations.]

Nature of Documentation and Delegation Instructions

Mr. Sandifer explained the nature of the position papers which had been circulated.⁷² He paid tribute to Miss Fosdick, who had been particularly responsible for the excellent preparatory work. The papers set forth the generally agreed position of the Department of State but were not necessarily the final position of the United States Government. They were, in brief, expert evidence, that is, recommendations to the Delegation which might have different conceptions and the position might be changed as circumstances demanded. In some cases, changes might have to be referred to Washington.

Senator Austin pointed out that the Statute providing for United States' participation in the United Nations protected the authority of the Chief Executive in matters of foreign relations. Therefore, any major change in the position of the United States should go to the President actually or nominally, that is, to the Department of State. He emphasized that the exclusive control of foreign policy lay with the Chief Executive.

Mr. Sandifer explained that the vital points had been approved by the President in the sense that they had been cleared with his representatives.

Mr. Bloom stated that his concept was that the Delegation Committees should report to the entire Delegation, at which time it should vote. In case there were serious disagreement among the Delegates, the matter would be referred to the President. He recalled that such a procedure at San Francisco had been highly satisfactory. Of course, he said the President would be informed of the differing views of the Delegates if need arose.

Mrs. Roosevelt observed that in actual practice there were times when matters might come up in a Committee and a Delegate would have to decide how to vote. Although a daily morning Delegation meeting might decide how a vote should be cast, and a Delegate would vote as closely as possible to the instructions, yet an unexpected vote might be taken in a Committee on a point for which a delegate lacked instruction. Then the Delegation might decide that it could not support the delegate's vote. She inquired what redress there might be for this contingency. If something new came up suddenly, in a Committee, the Delegate must be trusted to take a stand in accordance with the recommendations in the current Delegation discussion which would provide the background.

Mr. Bloom remarked that the Delegation generally knew what was coming up each day. Each Delegate would receive his instructions on voting and if anything new came up, he could consult his experts who would be with him. Mrs. Roosevelt said that she was wondering whether the Delegation was to follow the Russian policy of not voting if a vote could possibly be avoided. Mr. Ross remarked that it was always possible to reserve the position of the United States if a Delegate was not free to vote. Mr. Sandifer remarked that it was, of course, clear that the President had selected Delegates in whom he had confidence.

Senator Austin pointed out that the Delegates were statutory officers. The United Nations Participation Act stated that the representatives of the United States in the General Assembly and the Security Council should cast votes directed by the President. If there developed within the Delegation a conflict with a Presidential policy as outlined in the papers presented to the Delegation, Senator Austin said he would have to inquire what the President's position was. He said he could not cast an independent vote nor could the Delegation have an independent position. All were subject to the authority of the constitutional officer, the President, who had charge of foreign policy.

Mr. Sandifer explained the functions of the Advisers to the Delegation, and emphasized the need for security for the documents which had been presented to the Delegates.⁷³

Press Policy

Mr. Bloom inquired what the Committee security arrangements were, inasmuch as he had read in the morning *Times*⁷⁴ the Committee assignments which had just been read to the Delegation by Senator Austin. He wanted to know who had released the story and whether it could be expected that everything which had been said in the morning Delegation meeting was to appear in the press. Mr. Foote⁷⁵ explained that the Times had run a speculation story, assuming the same committee assignments which had been in effect in London. No list had been released to the newspapers. Mr. Bloom suggested that if any news were to be given out, one member of the Delegation should be designated to handle the press.

At Senator Austin's request, Mr. Foote briefly reviewed the press policy of the United Nations, the United States Delegations in London, Paris and the permanent delegation in New York. He recalled that, largely at the instigation of the United States, the London Assembly meeting had adopted a set of principles regarding freedom of information. These principles had opened with the statement that the United Nations "cannot achieve its purposes unless the peoples of the world are fully informed of its activities." Mr. Foote pointed out that the Permanent Delegation had maintained an open press policy in order to secure the widest understanding and support of the Delegation positions. Full background briefing conferences had been held with accredited correspondents, and he recalled that no violations had ever resulted from these conferences, but on the contrary they had contributed greatly to obtaining sympathetic treatment in the press. It was not a matter of influencing the press but explaining the reasons which lay behind the facts and actions.

The Press officers, Mr. Foote explained, did not want to stand in the way of access of correspondents to the delegates. However, talks with the press should be arranged through the press office, whenever possible, or at least the press office should be informed, in order that statements to the press might not be at cross purposes. He pointed out that formal press conferences were not particularly needed, inasmuch as the General Assembly meetings were open. Occasionally, however, the Delegation might want to make statements in a press conference. Mr. Foote urged the extreme usefulness of background conferences on committee work, and said that he would like to be free to call on delegates for such conferences. He noted that the permanent representatives had adopted what he considered to be a wise policy of not giving exclusive statements to correspondents. The press office, he said, would be greatly aided if, when an important statement of policy is to be made, an advance press release could be prepared.⁷⁶

Speeches by delegates outside of the General Assembly should be arranged through the press office, which could handle any necessary

⁷⁶ Between the time of this meeting and the opening of the General Assembly on October 23, Senator Austin returned to Washington to hold last minute policy conferences with Under Secretary Acheson and the Counselor of the Department (Cohen) on Friday evening, October 18, and with President Truman on Saturday morning, October 19.

clearance, so that there could be full assurance that the policy of the Delegation was correctly represented in the speeches.

Mr. Foote reported that Mr. Russell and Mr. Williams were making arrangements with various private organizations for speeches and background conferences by the delegates and advisers.

Mr. Bloom stated that his thought was that following secret Delegation sessions no one but the chairman or press officer should give out public statements. Moreover, as many Delegates as possible should be present, in order to demonstrate harmony within the Delegation. He expected that only confusion would result if each delegate were to go out and make his own statement.

Mr. Foote asked if he would be free to give out the list of Committee assignments. Senator Austin replied that he had no objection, since the purpose of secrecy for the Delegation meeting was to protect freedom of consultation among the delegates.

[Here follow further discussion of press policy and brief remarks on another subject. Mr. Richard S. Winslow, Acting Secretary General of the Permanent United States Delegation to the United Nations, then "briefly explained the internal arrangements and functionings of the permanent staff of the Delegation and offered the services of himself and his staff for the convenience and operation of the Delegation." Senator Austin then made a concluding statement.]

[The functioning of the United States Delegation to the General Assembly, its internal procedures, liaison with the Department, and relations with other delegations, is revealed in the chapters that follow, documenting as they do in whole or in part the thrust of United States diplomacy at the second part of the first session of the General Assembly on those issues in which the United States was involved in major foreign policy decisions. Reference also should be made to the documentation on the question of relations with Franco Spain under "Spain" in volume V. The Secretary of State was preoccupied with the meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers which was being held in New York at this same time; liaison between Mr. Byrnes and the Delegation and his role in the Delegation's diplomatic effort may best be deduced from the documentation on elections to the United Nations organs, the problem of voting in the Security Council, trusteeship, and regulation of armaments, all in this volume. Attention is invited to the immediately following telegram, which throws some light on the subject of relationships between the Delegation and the delegations of the other American Republics.]

Senator Warren R. Austin to the Acting Secretary of State

SECRET URGENT

NEW YORK, October 26, 1946—3 a. m.

[Received 6:59 a. m.]

710. Briggs⁷⁷ from Dawson. Meeting attended by representatives of most American Republic delegations, principally chief delegates, held this afternoon in writing room of General Assembly headquarters.⁷⁸ Uruguayan Ambassador Blanco presided informally. Senator Austin made brief appearance between two important engagements and after gracious opening remarks read prepared statement as amended by you.⁷⁹ After meeting Blanco expressed to me great satisfaction saying Austin's appearance had saved day for him since he had insisted on including United States delegate in invitation implying original proposal had been confine meeting to Latin American delegations. Castillo Najera later told Carlos Hall that Argentine delegate Arce had tried to exclude United States.

Meeting was brief and there was no discussion slates or any other problem before United Nations. Arce spoke briefly to effect that we should not be afraid use word bloc and that American Republics constitute in fact a bloc. He then retired since he was addressing General Assembly leaving Corominas as Argentine representative. Lopez, Colombia, suggested discussion procedure for future meetings but there was no immediate reaction. Nieto del Rio, Chile, spoke very briefly to effect that he disagreed with Arce's remarks regarding bloc which were not in line with Austin's statement. Velloso, Brazil, stressed that American Republics form system and not bloc and suggested that calling of future meetings be left to Blanco. Corominas, Argentina,

⁷⁹ Not printed: Senator Austin's statement was attached to Ambassador Dawson's memorandum. Senator Austin stated in pertinent part: "I feel and you feel that we can justly be proud of the splendid example of international cooperation on a basis of complete respect for sovereign equality offered to the world by our inter-American system. I am confident that the long tradition of harmonious collaboration which characterizes the relations of our countries will persist throughout our work together in the United Nations. The Delegation of the United States is most desirous of maintaining the closest liaison with the Delegations of our sister Republics. . . . However, we must recognize that on specific issues there are bound to be differences of opinion and, where such differences arise, it is of course understood that every American Republic will freely express its individual judgment—here in this General Assembly just as in our inter-American system. . . . I should like particularly to emphasize that we want to consult and exchange our views with you in the closest and most friendly manner, and that we believe that this can best be accomplished through the constant day-to-day contact between our delegations on matters of mutual interest. You know that arrangements have been made for maintaining liaison through Ambassador Dawson and the officers working with him, and we hope that you will make abundant use of these arrangements."

proposed designation four-man committee to handle future meetings. Padilla Nervo, Mexico, strongly opposed stating that meetings should have no formal character which was unnecessary and would arouse suspicions.⁸⁰

Several delegates have asked me for the English or Spanish text of Austin's statement. Please advise me urgently whether Department authorizes this.⁸¹ [Dawson.]

Memorandum by the Deputy Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs (Ross) to the Under Secretary of State (Acheson)

[WASHINGTON,] December 31, 1946.

Referring to your conversations with Senator Austin and Mr. Hiss last Friday the following are the principal points concerning the relationships among our various representatives to the United Nations.

1. So far as practicable these relationships should be based upon the United Nations Participation Act (copy attached).

2. The Act provides (Sec. 2(a)) for the appointment of "a representative of the United States at the Seat of the United Nations". This will be Senator Austin. It was intended when the Act was proposed by the Department that this person would be the principal representative to the United Nations and senior to all other representatives. This is definitely Senator Austin's interpretation of the Act and his understanding of what the President and Mr. Byrnes told him when he was asked to take the job last summer. This interpretation is borne out by the fact that the "Representative at the Seat" is given a higher rank and salary by the Act (Ambassador—$20,000) than the deputy representative in the Security Council (Minister—$12,000) and the representatives in the Economic and Trusteeship Councils who have no stated rank but a salary of $12,000.

3. Under Sec. 2 of the Act, all of these representatives are appointed by the President, subject to confirmation by the Senate.

4. Sec. 3 of the Act provides that these representatives "shall, at all times, act in accordance with the instructions of the President trans-

⁸⁰ Several such informal meetings were held in the period leading up to the balloting in the General Assembly on November 19 for elections to membership on the several United Nations organs. As these were held at times when Senator Austin was occupied with prior appointments, usually meetings of the United States Delegation itself, he was represented by Ambassador Dawson (IO Files, documents US/A/79, 101, 103, 128, 132).

⁸¹ Marginal notation: "Mr. Briggs phoned 'yes' 10/26/46 a. m."

mitted by the Secretary of State unless other means of transmission is directed by the President”.

5. The Participation Act requires amendment in the light of experience during the past year and any ambiguities in the Act affecting relationships among our representatives to the United Nations can probably be clarified in this connection. However, for present purposes it should be enough to establish a few simple, basic principles, leaving details to be worked out in the light of future experience. The basic principles are as follows.

(a) The Department will, of course, continue to be responsible for the over-all formulation and direction of policy.

(b) Our representatives to the United Nations will participate in the formulation of policy in their respective fields. Their principal job, however, and most immediate responsibilities, as distinguished from the Department's job, will be in the execution or carrying out of policy.

(c) Given the close relationship between the work of the various Councils and other United Nations organs, coordination and unified direction at the headquarters in New York is essential as regards both the formulation and the carrying out of our policies.

(d) It is expected therefore that our representatives on the various Councils and other United Nations organs will look to Senator Austin as our “Representative at the Seat of the United Nations” for general guidance in regard to execution of their instructions.

(e) Similarly, in the interest of proper administrative organization Senator Austin should be considered as the administrative head of the mission in New York which has a consolidated budget and joint administrative services.

(f) Finally, it is expected that Senator Austin will be the principal contact for the United States with Trygve Lie, Secretary General of the United Nations, on all matters of mutual concern to the United States and the United Nations as a whole. Our other representatives will be the principal contacts with the Assistant Secretaries General in charge of the Secretariat Departments. It will, of course, also be entirely appropriate for them to have relations with Mr. Lie on matters relating to their particular duties.

GENERAL UNITED STATES POLICY TOWARD THE UNITED NATIONS

I. THE UNITED STATES AND THE UNITED NATIONS: GENERAL EXPRESSIONS OF THE UNITED STATES POSITION

Editorial Note

President Harry S. Truman on March 19, 1946, transmitted to the Congress of the United States the Report of the United States Delegation to the First Part of the First Session of the General Assembly of the United Nations, London, England, January 10–February 14, 1946, which had been submitted to the President by the Secretary of State, James F. Byrnes, on March 1. In his letter of transmittal to the Congress President Truman wrote in part:

“The participation of the American representatives in the actual establishment of the institutions provided in the Charter of the United Nations, and in the initial work of the General Assembly regarding the urgent problems confronting the 51 Members of the United Nations today is vital to all Americans.

“The United States supports the Charter. The United States supports the fullest implementation of the principles of the Charter. The United States seeks to achieve the purposes of the Charter. And the United States seeks to perfect the Charter as experience lights the way.”

This presidential statement of the intent of United States foreign policy and diplomacy in the new dimension of international relations involving the United Nations was one of several notable expressions of official United States views on general aspects of United States–United Nations relations during 1946. II. ACCEPTANCE BY THE UNITED STATES OF THE COMPULSORY JURISDICTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE

501.BF/10-545

Memorandum by the Legal Adviser (Hackworth) to the Acting Secretary of State (Acheson)

[WASHINGTON,] October 5, 1945.

As a result of discussions among interested officers of the Department, there appears to be general agreement that (1) this Government should make a Declaration under Article 36, paragraph 2 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice,¹ accepting the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court and to that end (2) the matter should be taken up promptly and informally with appropriate members of the Senate with a view to bringing about requisite Senatorial approval.

The matter is of immediate interest because (1) it is considered desirable, for its moral effect, that the United States should be able to deposit its Declaration either at the December or the April meeting of the General Assembly, and (2) because of the fact that a Senate Resolution has been filed (copy annexed)² recommending that the President take this action.

The particular Resolution which has been filed has been carefully examined in the Department and appears to carry out the ends which we desire. Certain modifications of form were suggested at a meeting of an unofficial group sponsored by Judge Manley O. Hudson, and we understand that Senator Morse intends to introduce a new Resolution incorporating these changes (annex 2).³

As you will observe from the annexed drafts, the Resolution follows very closely the text of paragraph 2 of Article 36 of the Statute. It thus carries out the intention of the framers of the Statute that states accepting this jurisdiction will be submitting only those carefully defined categories of cases which involve the determination of points of law, the facts necessary to such a determination, and the determination of the remedy in case the petitioner is upheld. In other words, the Resolution envisages the submission of the identical type of case which the United States has always been willing to refer to arbitration upon the failure of negotiations. The position of the United States is safeguarded, on the other hand by the reservation of cases previously arising, of cases which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of this country, and of cases which the parties may agree to submit to other procedures of settlement.

Signature of such a Declaration would thus appear to be in line with our policy, and will give evidence to the world that we are serious in our intention that the International Court of Justice shall play a significant role in the conduct of international relations.

In taking the matter up with appropriate Senators, it is suggested that this be done in terms of subject matter rather than of the particular Resolution that has been introduced. This is of special importance because of the political position of the sponsor of the Resolution.

A question requiring special attention is that of the effect of the Morse Resolution if adopted. The Resolution simply recommends that the President sign and deposit a Declaration. If a Resolution is adopted by two-thirds vote, and the President proceeds to carry out the recommendation, can anyone go behind this action and claim that it was done without the advice and consent of the Senate? It would of course be possible to amend the first line of the Morse Resolution to read: "The Senate hereby advises and consents that . . ." It seems to be agreed that if it is made clear on the floor of the Senate that its action by two-thirds vote is regarded as advice and consent, no further question could be raised. It would also be possible to transform the proposed Resolution into a Joint Resolution of both houses. You may wish to discuss with Senator Connally the Procedural question involved.⁴

⁴ Senator Morse subsequently on November 28, 1945 introduced a revised resolution (S. Res. 196) which incorporated the following changes: one, the first lines were amended to read, "Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the deposit by the President of the United States with the Secretary General of the United Nations. . . ."; and two, the second section incorporating the provisos was re-cast to read:

"Provided, That such declaration should not apply to—

a. disputes the solution of which the parties shall entrust to other tribunals by virtue of agreements already in existence or which may be concluded in the future; or

b. disputes with regard to matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the United States.

"Provided further, That such declaration should remain in force for a period of five years and thereafter until the expiration of six months after notice may be given to terminate the declaration."

- a. The interpretation of a treaty ;
- b. Any question of international law ;

Provided further, That the President be and hereby is requested to furnish the Senate for its information a copy of any declaration filed by him pursuant to this resolution.

The Secretary of State to the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the United States House of Representatives (Bloom)

WASHINGTON, June 4, 1946.

MY DEAR MR. BLOOM: Referring to your letter of April 17, 1946,⁵ transmitting for the comment of the Department of State copies of H. J. Res. 291, a joint resolution "Authorizing the President, on behalf of the United States, to accept and recognize the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice in certain categories of international legal disputes involving the United States",⁶ I take pleasure in transmitting to you the Department's views.

The action contemplated in the joint resolution would be in conformity with Article 36, paragraph 2 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice, which provides :

"2. The states parties to the present Statute may at any time declare that they recognize as compulsory ipso facto and without special agreement, in relation to any other state accepting the same obligation, the jurisdiction of the Court in all legal disputes concerning :

⁵ Not printed.

⁶ Introduced by Congressman Christian A. Herter on December 17, 1945. The proposed action took the form of a joint resolution which "authorized and requested" the President to take action similar to that set forth in the revised Morse resolution. The Herter resolution in its operative part was identical, with minor exceptions, to the Morse resolution.

- "a. the interpretation of a treaty;
- "b. any question of international law;
- "c. the existence of any fact which, if established, would constitute a breach of an international obligation;
- "d. the nature or extent of the reparation to be made for the breach of an international obligation."

It is noted in the first place that by making a declaration under this paragraph, the United States will be bound only with respect to those states accepting the same obligation. The joint resolution would exclude from the scope of the proposed declaration cases which arose in the past or which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the United States, and would leave the parties free to seek some other form of settlement if they so agree. Each of these principles is already explicit in Article 2, paragraph 7, and Article 95 of the Charter of the United Nations.

I have had occasion to consult with the President regarding this important proposal and have consequently been able to reply to previous inquiries concerning the matter by stating that the President and the Department of State favor the making of a declaration accepting the Court's jurisdiction under the above-mentioned Article of the Statute. The Department has stated further that it considers that either H. J. Res. 291, which is the subject of your inquiry, or S. Res. 196 furnishes an appropriate legal basis for such a declaration. I enclose a statement recently issued by the Department on this subject.⁷

The Members of the United Nations have declared in the Preamble of the Charter their determination "to establish conditions under which justice and respect for the obligations arising from treaties and other sources of international law can be maintained." Among the purposes of the United Nations as set forth in Article 1, paragraph 1 of the Charter is the settlement of international disputes "in conformity with the principles of justice and international law."

The United Nations Conference on International Organization, which drafted the Charter, also approved a Recommendation that Members of the United Nations, as soon as possible, make declarations recognizing the obligatory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice according to the provisions of Article 36 of the Statute. The completion of the procedure initiated by H. J. Res. 291 would have as one result the carrying out, by the United States, of this recommendation.

⁷The position of President Truman and the Secretary of State, regarding the general question of making a declaration of acceptance of the Court's jurisdiction and the particular question of a choice of the legal form as raised by the Morse and Herter resolutions, was made public in letters of February 25 and February 23, by the President and Secretary Byrnes respectively, to Mr. Raymond Swing, Chairman of the Board of Directors of Americans United for World Organization, Incorporated. The President's letter was printed in the New York Herald Tribune, March 1, p. 1, and the Secretary's letter in the Department of State Bulletin, April 21, 1946, p. 633. These letters were entered in the legislative record by Senator Morse on July 11; see Compulsory Jurisdiction, Hearings, pp. 14 and 15.

The Department of State concurs in the views thus expressed by the United Nations, first that the establishment of the rule of law is an underlying element in the achievement of international order, and second, that the general acceptance of the Court's jurisdiction in proper (that is to say, legal) cases is an integral part of the accomplishment of this end.

It is, perhaps, desirable to make clear that the passage, above referred to, in Article 1 of the Charter is not to be interpreted as implying that all disputes between states which have accepted the Court's jurisdiction under Article 36, paragraph 2, are to be submitted to the Court for adjudication. It will be noted that the Resolution under consideration, and the provision of the Statute which it seeks to implement, are carefully drawn so as to include within their scope only those cases which are appropriate for judicial action, namely, cases involving legal disputes. Since this country has always supported respect for law, and has carried out this policy by submitting thousands of cases to arbitration, the proposed step has the effect of undertaking an obligation to do that which is already a well-established policy of this Government.

Substantial gains are to be anticipated from this proposed step. The law cannot play an effective role so long as states retain the right to decide for themselves what the law is, regardless of the degree of good faith by which they govern their actions. The appropriate remedy for this situation would appear to be general and genuine acceptance of an international judiciary with powers adequate to enable it to fulfill the elementary function of a judiciary to decide all disputes of law. It is particularly appropriate that the United States should take this action, both because it is a leading advocate of the international system embodied in the United Nations Charter, and because it is a country which has always placed a high value on the law and on the judiciary.

It is to be anticipated that the great majority of the Members of the United Nations will deposit declarations similar to that proposed in H. J. Res. 291. A similar option was provided in the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice, and was exercised by forty-four of the fifty-one states which were members of that Court at one time or another. The Statute of the present Court includes a provision by which unexpired declarations made under Article 36 of the old Statute are continued in force and made applicable to the jurisdiction of the present Court. This provision is, of course, applicable only as among parties to the Statute of the Court. As a result of this provision, it is estimated that some nineteen declarations are continued in force. The probability that many other states will deposit declarations is indicated by the fact that the majority of the delegations at the San Francisco Conference favored incorporating in the Statute a general commitment by which all members would accept the jurisdiction of the Court as to the categories of cases referred to. (United Nations Conference on International Organization, Report of Committee IV/1, Doc. 913, IV/1/74(1), pp. 10-11). In the interest of achieving unanimous agreement, however, it was decided to leave such acceptance to the option of the various states.

In conclusion, I may note that there has been strong sentiment in favor of general compulsory jurisdiction among professional groups in the United States, as indicated by resolutions of such organizations as the American Bar Association, the Federal Bar Association, the Inter-American Bar Association and the American Society of International Law.⁸

⁸ In the legislative process S. Res. 196 was taken up by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations where on June 12 the Chairman of the Committee, Senator Tom Connally, appointed a subcommittee to hold hearings. These took place on July 11, 12, and 15, with Acting Secretary of State Dean Acheson and the Legal Adviser of the Department (Fahy) as the principal public witnesses. A number of witnesses appeared for important private organizations and the following documents were placed in the record on July 11: a letter dated July 8, 1946 from Prof. D. F. Fleming of Vanderbilt University; a statement by Dr. Quincy Wright, well-known publicist; a letter dated July 3, 1946 from Dr. Pitman B. Potter, Secretary, The American Society of International Law, enclosing a resolution adopted at the annual meeting of the Society at Washington, D. C. on April 27, 1946; and a memorandum by Mr. John Foster Dulles (texts of these documents are to be found in Compulsory Jurisdiction, Hearings, pp. 41-45).

During the period July 17-24 the full Committee considered the findings of the subcommittee and it was at this time that a complete discussion of the legal and constitutional issues involved led to the decision that the revised Morse resolution provided a more appropriate legal basis of the proposed declaration, based as it was on the treaty-making process. Regarding this question, it was pointed out in the Committee's Report (International Court of Justice, Report of the Foreign Relations Committee, No. 1835, 79th Congress, 2nd Session, p. 10) that "Inasmuch as the declaration would involve important new obligations for the United States, the committee was of the opinion that it should be approved by the treaty process, with two-thirds of the Senators present concurring. The force and effect of the declaration is that of a treaty, binding the United States with respect to those states which have or which may in the future deposit similar declarations. Moreover, under our constitutional system the peaceful settlement of disputes through arbitration or judicial settlement has always been considered a proper subject for the use of the treaty procedure. . . ."

On July 24 the Committee reported the resolution to the Senate for favorable action.

III. QUESTIONS RELATING TO THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE TEMPORARY HEADQUARTERS AND PERMANENT SEAT OF THE UNITED NATIONS IN THE UNITED STATES; THE PROPOSED GENERAL CONVENTION ON PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES OF THE UNITED NATIONS

PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES PERTAINING TO UNO

Factual Background

Article 104 of the Charter provides that the Organization shall enjoy such legal capacity as it requires for the performance of the functions and the fulfillment of its purposes.

Article 105, paragraphs (1) and (2), provides that the Organization itself as well as its officials and the Representatives of Members shall enjoy such privileges and immunities as are necessary for the performance of their functions.

¹¹ The Declaration by the United States recognizing, in accordance with this resolution, the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice as set forth under Article 36, paragraph 2, of the Statute of the Court, was signed by President Truman on August 14 and transmitted under cover of a note of August 16 by the Acting Secretary of State (Acheson) to the Secretary General of the United Nations for deposit with the Secretary General; for text of the declaration, see Department of State Bulletin, September 8, 1946, p. 452.

In a note transmitting the Acting Secretary's note to the Secretary General, the Acting United States Representative at the United Nations (Johnson) said:

"My action today in depositing this Declaration, accepting on behalf of the United States the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice, is further testimony to the determination of my Government to do all in its power to assure that the United Nations will fulfill the role assigned to it, which is nothing less than the preservation of world peace.

"One of the most elemental functions of the United Nations in the preservation of world peace is the development of procedures of pacific settlement. In these procedures, the role and functions of law is clear. We feel that international law is already sufficiently developed to serve as a guide and basis in international relations. We feel further that the best way of assuring its further development, and the only way of enabling it to fulfill its function, is by referring to a responsible international tribunal all disputes properly justiciable by such a tribunal. "We accordingly look forward to a great development of the rule of law in international relations through a broad acceptance of the function of the Court in the spirit of the Charter." (ibid., p. 452).

¹³ For information regarding the United States Delegation to the first part of the first session of the General Assembly which convened in London on January 10, 1946, see p. 4.

Article 105, paragraph (3) provides that the General Assembly may make recommendations with a view to determining the details of the applications of paragraphs (1) and (2) of the same article, or may propose conventions to the members of the United Nations for this purpose.

The Preparatory Commission, in its Report (p. 60), recommends "that the General Assembly, at its First Session, should make recommendations with a view to determining the details of the application of paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 105 of the Charter, or propose conventions to the Members of the United Nations for this purpose[?]."

The Preparatory Commission also transmits for the consideration of the General Assembly a Study on privileges and immunities and a draft multipartite convention on the same subject, which might be adhered to by all the members of the Organization.¹⁴

The Study has as its purpose the drawing of attention to the various problems involved.

The Convention undertakes to crystallize the various topics in the form of draft articles. It contains provisions which are not in accord with the existing law of the United States, both as to points of major importance and as to subsidiary details. The major points will be considered subsequently in this paper.

Status of the Draft Convention

There has never been a decision by the Preparatory Commission recommending that the Assembly propose such a general convention. The convention was proposed by Canada in a subcommittee of Committee 5, and was espoused by the United Kingdom. It appeared fairly clear to the United States Delegation that it was intended to be a factor in the question of the site of the Organization, then under debate. Various objections to the draft were made both in the subcommittee and in Committee 5, but it was insisted in reply that it was understood that everything was reserved and that this was merely a working paper.

Policy of the United States

It is therefore not a foregone conclusion that a general convention should be proceeded with. There are three particular reasons why it appears undesirable to do so, at least at this time.

1. It is difficult to know at this time just what is required. The situation varies from country to country, depending on the state of their existing law. The basic question still remains open, namely what is the proper method of approach to the problem. This in itself is a complex problem, and it is doubtful whether sufficient time is available at this session to give it the study which it requires. A fortiori, it appears impossible to negotiate the details of a convention at this session, should this course be decided upon.

2. Since any decisions taken on this subject should be consistent with any special agreements arrived at between the Organization and the Government of the United States with respect to the permanent headquarters, and since we consider that the latter negotiations will be carried out in the United States and after the site is selected, the detailed discussion of the general question appears premature at this time.

3. The Office of the Secretary-General has a direct and legitimate interest in this question, since it concerns the status of the Organization and its officials. The legal section of this office is probably in the best position to give this subject the detailed and concentrated study which it requires. Also it is our view that the special agreement on the site will be negotiated, on the side of the Organization, by the Secretary-General.

The United States Delegation should therefore endeavor, first, to have it understood that a general convention is only one of several possible methods of approaching the question, and second, to have the whole question referred to the Secretary-General for study and report.¹⁵

Major Points of Difficulty for the United States Contained in the Draft Convention on Privileges and Immunities Submitted With the Report of the Preparatory Commission (pp. 72-74)

Even though it favors postponing the substantive discussion of these problems, the Delegation of the United States may find itself under the necessity of going on record as to the following major points.

¹⁵ The experts of the Delegation had also prepared a draft statement (dated January 19) for use by the United States member on the Sixth Committee in advancing this position. It was contemplated in the statement that a motion would be made requesting the Secretary-General to undertake studies and formulate recommendations on the whole question in the light of privileges and immunities already available. (IO Files, document USGA/Ia/LeCom./3) Whether this view was ever presented is not clear from available records. The subject was referred by the Sixth Committee to a subcommittee on privileges and immunities on January 24 apparently without any discussion, and on January 28 was reported back by the subcommittee in a document which recommended that implementation of Article 105 should proceed with the formulation of a general convention. (United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, First Part, Sixth Committee, pp. 14, 16 and 44-45; hereafter cited as GA (I/1), Sixth Committee.) At the same meeting on January 28 the subcommittee was charged with the drafting of such a general convention.

Diplomatic Privileges and Immunities (Articles 5 and 6 of Draft Convention)

We agree that Representatives of Members and officials of the Organization shall enjoy immunity from legal process in respect of things done or omitted to be done in the course of the performance of official duties.

The question is whether Representatives and higher officials should be accorded diplomatic privileges and immunities. This would mean, in effect, immunity from all forms of legal process, civil and criminal, and inviolability of residential premises.

The Charter does not provide diplomatic status for such officials, but only requires that they be accorded such privileges and immunities as are necessary for the independent exercise of their functions. The Committee of the San Francisco Conference which drafted this article of the Charter (Committee IV/2) stated in its report that it considered this standard more "appropriate" than that of "diplomatic" status.

The United States takes the position that diplomatic privileges and immunities are not necessary to the independent exercise of functions in connection with the Organization. This is in line with H. R. 4469, recently enacted into law.¹⁶

The position of diplomatic envoys does not constitute a precedent for the Organization. The concept of diplomatic status derives from that of state sovereignty, and the privileged position of the sovereign. It has developed over a period of centuries, and has thus become sanctified in international law.

The situation with respect to the Organization is different. To concede diplomatic status to its officials and to Representatives of its Members would be to create a new privileged class in an age when the tendency is in the other direction. This tendency is exemplified by the decision of San Francisco, above referred to, and by making equal rights a basic principle of the Charter. Unless action of this kind is found to be necessary to the independent exercise of functions in connection with the Organization it would seem wisest to avoid it.

Diplomatic Status of Representatives of Members (Article 5 of Draft Convention)

If member states desire that their Representatives to UNO have diplomatic status, they may themselves make the necessary arrange-(cited as the "International Organizations Immunities Act"), 59 Stat. 669. ments by conferring on them an appropriate title and status vis-à-vis the host state.

If diplomatic status for Representatives is adopted despite our objections, the United States will then have to insist upon a clarification of the categories of officials so affected. (Paragraph 4 of Article 5). In any event it would appear that diplomatic status for delegates and alternate delegates would be sufficient.

Officials of the Organization (Article 6 of Draft Convention)

This article is divided into two parts. Paragraph 2, conferring diplomatic privileges and immunities on the higher officials, has been considered above. Paragraph 1, conferring certain privileges on all officials, is objectionable to the United States in so far as it would exempt American citizens from its own tax and national service legislation (paragraph 1(b) and (c)). It is known that several other countries take the same view.

Freedom from Judicial Process, Requisition and Expropriation (Article 2 (1) and (2) of Draft Convention)

The draft convention provides that the property and assets of the Organization shall enjoy immunity from every form of judicial process, unless waived. The United States law (H.R. 4489) contains a similar provision (sec. 2(b)).

The draft convention next provides that the property and assets shall be immune from "search, requisition, confiscation, expropriation and from any other form of seizure". The United States bill which relates to international organizations generally contained a similar provision in its original form, but the exemptions as to "requisition" and "expropriation" were deleted. The law now provides immunity from search and confiscation. The policy of the United States must therefore be deemed to be in opposition to immunity from requisition and expropriation for international organizations generally as distinguished from the United Nations specifically. (This must be regarded as applying to premises, and not to archives and similar property. There is a confusion of terminology involved, as "inviolability of archives", to which we agree, undoubtedly means that they are free from requisition or subpoena, while "inviolability of premises" means that the local authorities are to stay off, but not that they are immune from expropriation procedures.)

As to premises in general (i.e., of specialized agencies and branch offices of the United Nations Organization as distinguished from the permanent headquarters of the United Nations, which are to be dealt with in a separate agreement), a good case can be made if it is determined to adhere to the Congressional policy. The right of eminent domain is a basic attribute of sovereignty and exists for the protection of the people of the locality in such matters as health, conflagration, communications, etc. It is not to be conceived that the Organization will have any wish to impede the needs of the local authorities in such matters, nor is it to be supposed that the local government will ever exercise its sovereign rights in these respects as regards property of the Organization. Should it not, therefore, refrain from any attempt to invade the local sovereignty in such a basic matter?

It is to be noted that even if the words "expropriation" and "requisition" are deleted in Article 2(2), there will still exist in Article 2(1) a general immunity from "every form of judicial process", which applies to property of the Organization. The same situation came about in our own legislation and is apparently not regarded as involving an inconsistency.

United Nations Passports (Article 7 of Draft Convention)

The United States does not favor United Nations passports. Such documents are regarded as superfluous, especially as most delegates will probably wish to carry their own national passports in addition.

Steps are being taken to obtain a policy directive from the Department. If this subject should come up in the meantime, we should reserve our position.¹⁷

Please consult Visa and Passport Divisions with object of furnishing us with policy statement on United Nations passports (reference draft convention on privileges and immunities, Preco¹⁸ report, page 74). We are inclined to regard them as superfluous especially as delegates and officials will probably wish to carry national passports in addition but as relatively harmless. Since there are other points in draft convention which we must oppose on clear policy grounds, we are less disposed to take strong position on this question. We hope that convention will be referred to SYG and that substantial debate on it will not develop this session. [Hiss.]

Minutes of Meeting of the United States Delegation, Held at London, 20 Grosvenor Square, January 26, 1946, 9:30 a. m.

[Here follow list of names of persons (62) present (see the United States Delegation list, page 5), and a discussion of certain procedural problems. Each member of the Delegation then proceeded to give a review of the activities and progress of the General Assembly Committee on which he was sitting.]

Senator Vandenberg noted that he was making progress in Committee 5 because he now had thirteen votes on his side. He stated that a very shocking action had been taken by Committee 5.¹⁹ He pointed out that the Committee admitted that it had no power to exempt the salary of American employees of the Organization from American income taxes. This could only be done by the Congress of the United States. Nevertheless, the Committee had voted to increase the amount of the United States contribution to the Organization by the amount that was collected in income taxes from the American employees of the Organization. Senator Vandenberg said he thought this was an unconscionable act and he would not submit to it in London or

¹⁹ On January 24 the Fifth Committee had received from a sub-committee, chaired by Senator Vandenberg, a report on the problem of tax equalization in respect of the salaries of United Nations officials. The report read:

"(1) The Sub-Committee believes there is no alternative to the proposition that tax exemption for United Nations Organization salaries is indispensable to equity among its Member nations and equality among its personnel;

"(2) It recommends that, pending this accomplishment, the budget should carry a contingent appropriation to equalize tax payments;

"(3) It recommends that all its files respecting staff contributions plans be referred to the Secretary-General for his information; and that further consideration of the matter be postponed pending his subsequent report and recommendation." (United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, First Part, Fifth Committee, p. 11 [hereafter cited as GA(I/2), Fifth Committee])

At the time that he submitted the report to the Fifth Committee for the sub-committee Senator Vandenberg was recorded as noting ". . . that this was a complex and controversial problem and that the report submitted was the best compromise possible taking into account the divergent views expressed in the sub-committee. The first paragraph had been approved unanimously, paragraphs (2) and (3) had been approved by 7 votes to 2 in each case the adverse votes being those of Australia and France with the United States of America abstaining." (Ibid., p. 11)

Fifth Committee consideration of the sub-committee's report continued into a second day (January 25) at which time successive amendments were moved which changed paragraph (2) to read: "It [the Committee] recommends that, pending this accomplishment, the budget of the Organization should carry a contingent appropriation to refund tax payments and that an amount equivalent to such refunds to employees because of income tax, be added to the budget contributions of the Members whose nationals in the service of the United Nations were required to pay income tax on their salaries and allowances received from the Organization." United States Delegation Working Paper

FEBRUARY [7 or 8,] 1946.

POSITION OF THE UNITED STATES REGARDING THE CONVENTION ON THE SITE

Committee 6 now has before it a draft convention to be concluded with the United States with regard to the site of the United Nations; and a draft resolution relating to the convention. Both of these documents have been referred to the subcommittee on privileges and immunities.²¹

I. THE DRAFT RESOLUTION

The Resolution constitutes an authorization by the General Assembly to the Secretary-General to negotiate with the competent authorities of the United States the arrangements required as a result of the establishment of the seat of the United Nations in the United States. The draft convention is transmitted by the Assembly to the Secretary-General for use in these negotiations as a basis of discussion. The Secretary-General is required to report the results of the negotiations to the General Assembly, which must approve any agreement with the competent authorities of the United States before being signed on behalf of the United Nations.

Recommended United States Position

The Resolution, with a few minor changes mentioned below, is satisfactory to the United States, and it is recommended that the delegation should vote in favor of it.

²¹ For the draft convention and the draft resolution, see United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, First Part, Plenary Meetings, p. 650, appendix II of annex 22 (hereafter cited as GA (I/1), Plenary). These drafts accompanied a report submitted by the sub-committee on privileges and immunities to the Sixth Committee on February 7 (GA (I/1), Sixth Committee, p. 45, annex 3a).

The United States is desirous of seeing to it that no draft convention on this subject is approved by the Assembly at this session, except as a basis of discussion in negotiations. The convention raises many difficult technical questions which cannot be determined at this time but must await the determination of a specific site and actual negotiations with the local state and municipal authorities. We therefore desire to see negotiations conducted by the Secretary-General in the United States after a site has been chosen. The Resolution accomplishes this purpose by authorizing the Secretary-General to negotiate, and transmitting the draft convention to him for use as a basis of discussion.*

It is the view of the United States that it will probably prove preferable not to have a single convention but a series of agreements with the federal, state and local authorities. We should make our position on this point a matter of record. The draftsmen of the convention have strongly adhered to the opinion that a single convention is better from the standpoint of the United Nations, but have been willing not to foreclose the question and have provided for an authorization to the Secretary-General to make "arrangements."

In order not to require every detailed local agreement to come before the Assembly for specific approval, we believe that it would be better if the last paragraph of the resolution were amended to read:

"The General Assembly will, after receiving the report, determine which documents resulting from the negotiations shall require specific approval by the General Assembly before being signed on behalf of the United Nations. Provided: that nothing in this Resolution shall prevent the Secretary-General from entering into any arrangements necessary for the establishment of a temporary headquarters in the United States."

II. THE DRAFT CONVENTION

The Draft Convention now before Committee 6 is more satisfactory to the United States than was the Draft transmitted by the Preparatory Commission.²² However, the present Draft is still unsatisfactory in a number of points. Three of the major unsatisfactory points are:

1. The Draft is unitary in character, i.e. it attempts to regulate all questions in a single agreement between the United States and the

*It would be preferable from the standpoint of the United States if the draft convention were not transmitted at all, since it would give us a freer hand in the negotiations, but the sentiment among other delegations in favor of a draft convention is so strong that there is no possibility of securing a different result. The argument made in favor of the convention is that the Secretary-General must have some guidance from the Assembly in his negotiations. [Footnote in the original.]

²² Report of the Preparatory Commission, p. 75.

United Nations. We believe this to be unsatisfactory both from our standpoint and that of the United Nations. It would mean that the federal government would have to presume to be able to speak for and to enter into detailed agreements with the State and local authorities with regard to numerous local matters such as acquisition of, price of and title to land, immunities from state tax legislation, police protection, public utility services, etc. Apart from serious constitutional objections which may be raised, we believe that this would result in cumbersome and complicated administration and would make minor adjustments difficult. We believe it would be much more expeditious and practical for the United Nations to enter into direct relations with the state and, if necessary, local authorities. In order that the state where the headquarters are located may be able to conclude an agreement with the United Nations, it may be necessary for Congress to give approval to the agreement in order to comply with the United States Constitution. If it appears that such approval is necessary, Congress should be asked to give it.

2. Throughout the convention there are proposals which are not likely to prove satisfactory either to the federal government or to the state government where the headquarters are located. For example, it is proposed that obligation be undertaken to supply additional land apart from the original headquarters site whenever the United Nations wants additional land to construct an airport, railroad station, radio telegraphic station or "other purposes." (Section 8)

Another provision calls for a "guarantee" of means of communication to and from the zone instead of providing there will be no impeding of methods of communication. (Section 19)

Still another provision guarantees the exercise of "all . . . powers" for supplying the headquarters zone with necessary public services which is to receive "an equal priority with the essential services of the United States Government itself" in these respects. Moreover, interruption of such services is to be prevented to the same extent that interruption would be prevented in the case of "services to the essential departments" of the United States Government. (Section 28)

Finally, differences of interpretation are to be referred "to the arbitration of an umpire appointed for the purpose by the President of the International Court of Justice." (Section 39)

3. Certain of the provisions of the Draft relating to the authority of the United States and the United Nations with respect to the zone where the headquarters are located, are unsatisfactory. Thus, one of the sections reads:

"The United Nations may enact regulations making provision of an administrative character for the zone. Any such regulation shall prevail over any provisions in the law of the United States of America which are inconsistent with it. It is agreed that within the zone the protection afforded by the Constitution of the United States to the basic human freedoms of expression, worship and personal liberty shall not be lessened and no form of racial discrimination shall be permitted."

In the draft transmitted by the Preparatory Commission, the United Nations were given a much more extensive power to enact regulations setting aside provisions of the law of the United States. This would obviously have been altogether unacceptable to the United States since it would, in effect, have given the United Nations a blank check to set aside constitutional provisions or the civil or criminal law of the United States. The present draft is less objectionable and its intention appears to be only to permit the United Nations to enact regulations relating to such matters as speed limits, use of streets and other matters of a police nature. Other problems of this type relate to immigration, police protection, use of headquarters zone as a refuge, etc.

4. The Draft has appended to it an Annex which contains provisions relating to the immunities of the Organization, its staff and representatives of Member governments. These provisions are to follow closely the parallel provisions of the Draft General Convention on Privileges and Immunities now under consideration by Committee 6. The most significant objection to these provisions from the standpoint of the United States is that they confer immunity from taxation and from national service obligations on citizens of the United States who are employed by the Secretariat. We object to these on the ground that we do not desire to see the creation of a privileged class of our citizens.

There are also other objections to some of the provisions, such as the extension of diplomatic immunities beyond the point provided in our own legislation and the provision of a United Nations passport.

Recommended United States Position on the Draft Convention

The United States should abstain from discussing or voting upon any of the provisions of the Draft Convention for the following reasons:

1. It would be inappropriate for the United States as one of the parties to the Convention to place itself in a dual position by participating in the framing of a draft as a United Nations member.

2. The United States would run a serious risk of committing itself to the draft in advance of negotiations if it took any part in the discussions. Any argument against unsatisfactory provisions might be held to imply acceptance of provisions against which no objections were taken. No formal statement of reservation would be sufficient to dissipate this risk.

For these reasons, it is recommended that the United States representatives in Committee 6 and its subcommittee should, at the outset of discussion of the Draft, make a statement along the following lines:

“Since the proposed Convention will become the subject of negotiation between the United Nations and the United States, the delegation of the United States wishes it to be understood that it will take no part in the discussion of the provisions of this draft and will abstain from any voting with respect to it. This position is taken because it would clearly be inappropriate for the United States to occupy a dual position in these negotiations and attempt to sit on both sides of the table. It should also be clearly understood that in abstaining from discussion and voting, the United States does not commit itself to any provision of this draft or with respect to any provision to be contained in any agreement or agreements which may eventually be concluded with the authorities of the United States or of any state or municipality thereof.”²³

(It should be understood that this policy of abstention²⁴ with respect to the Draft Convention regarding the Site does not apply to the Draft General Convention on Privileges and Immunities. The United

²⁴ At this time there was frequent discussion within the United States Delegation whether the policy of neutrality should be continued (particularly in the Delegation's meetings on February 5, 6 and 8), the Delegation being considerably agitated over the high cost factor implicit in the report and recommendations of an interim inspection group that the permanent site be located in the North Stamford-Greenwich (Connecticut) district (for the report see United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, First Part, I—Permanent Headquarters Committee; II—Interim Committee for the Selection of a Site for the Permanent Headquarters of the United Nations, pp. 31 ff., annex 1 [hereafter cited as GA (I/1), Headquarters Committee]). Senator Vandenberg obliquely gave voice to the Delegation's feelings in a meeting of the Fifth Committee on February 7, when, during the Committee's consideration of the Organization's budget, he said in pertinent part: “When initiating policies, delegations should always think of the bill which would have to be paid. The United States had deliberately refrained from taking any part in the discussions as to the site, but when the Inspection Group returned [from the United States where it had been examining sites from January 5 to February 2] with the proposal that a site of 45 square miles should be acquired in a most expensive area, such an idea could only be described as fantastic.” (GA (I/1), Fifth Committee, p. 49) For the legislative history of the site question in the Interim Committee appointed by the Preparatory Commission on December 22, 1945 and the ad hoc Permanent Headquarters Committee established by the General Assembly on January 26, 1946, see GA (I/1), Headquarters Committee; see bracketed note, p. 76, for subsequent developments.

Mr. Walker said he would like to have instructions from the Delegation. Committee 6 was ready to send to the Assembly the rapporteur's report on the general draft convention on privileges and immunities. The French and British had spoken against Mr. Walker's reservation on the subject of tax exemption and military deferment.²⁶ The Russians also had reserved their position on military deferment. The French Delegation was determined that this convention, including the tax exemption and military deferment features, be made a provisional rule for the next session of the Assembly to bridge the time gap until the convention had been generally ratified. The British and French had said that in view of its obligations under the Charter the United States had no right to reserve its position on tax exemption and military deferment. They felt that United States citizens in the Secretariat should be thought of as UNO citizens and could not do military service.

Mr. Walker thought if the United States position was going to be consistent with its obligations under the Charter that the Senate would have to go along on tax exemption and deferment but he did not wish to tell the Senate what to do. Senator Vandenberg said those were rightly questions for the United States Senate and that before Mr. Walker's proposal was reached, Senator Vandenberg will have opposed the report of Committee 5 on the question of tax exemption. The Senator said he was going to call Committee 5's recommendations on tax refunds,²⁷ the nearest thing he had seen to "perpetual motion".

²⁵ United States Delegation working paper of January 19, p. 60.

Mr. Pasvolsky observed that member states under the Charter each had to decide on the privileges and immunities question. Mr. Hiss thought it depended on the power of Assembly Delegates as to whether there was authority to bind members to Assembly decisions on privileges and immunities. Mr. Hiss thought there was not sufficient authority in the United States Delegation. Mr. Pasvolsky thought Mr. Walker's reservation was in order and Senator Connally said Mr. Walker would stand on it. Mr. Hiss cited Article 105 of the Charter, paragraphs 1, 2 and 3. Mr. Hiss said perhaps Delegates from countries with parliamentary governments might have authority to adopt the privileges and immunities convention as a provisional assembly rule but that the United States Delegates did not have such authority to bind the United States Government in that manner.

Senator Vandenberg thought Mr. Walker had to stand on his reservation and that probably Mr. Walker as well as himself would get licked in the Assembly. The Senator observed that his point, however, did not come up under this convention but that Committee 5 had tried indirectly to get around the tax exemption question as raised in the convention.

Mr. Hiss thought Mr. Walker's position with respect to a reserva-²⁷ For the proceedings in the Fifth Committee on February 8 in which the Committee reversed its previous recommendations regarding tax refunds and extra assessments, see GA (I/1), Fifth Committee, pp. 50 and 51. In supporting a motion that would have this result Senator Vandenberg emphasized to the Committee that unless such a course were adopted the Committee would be endorsing a position "directly opposed, not only to the constitutional rights of the United States Congress, but also to Article 105 of the Charter which expressly asserted that on such questions the General Assembly could only make recommendations or submit conventions. If the present text [providing for tax refunds] were endorsed he would be forced to raise his objections in the General Assembly". The motion for amendment which was offered by the Netherlands delegate was approved by 13 votes for, 8 against. The new text then read: "In the case of any Member whose nationals in the service of the Organization are required to pay taxation on salaries and allowances received from the Organization, the Secretary-General should explore with the Member concerned methods of ensuring as soon as possible the application of the principle of equity amongst all Members" (ibid., p. 50).

tion was strong and that Congress had covered the subjects dealt with in the convention on privileges and immunities satisfactorily.²⁸

[On February 13 the General Assembly took up the report of the Sixth Committee which included in pertinent part the recommendations and draft resolutions with accompanying texts of (1) a general convention relating to the privileges and immunities of the United Nations, and (2) a special convention between the United States and the United Nations regarding arrangements pertaining to the location of the seat of the United Nations in the United States; for the report of the Sixth Committee see GA (I/1), Plenary, pages 642 ff., annex 22. For the proceedings in the General Assembly relating to the adoption of the report and the two resolutions on February 13 see ibid., pages 448 ff.; Senator Vandenberg's remarks at this time regarding the provisions in the general convention relating to exemptions from taxes and national service obligations have already been noted in footnote 28, below; regarding the special convention Senator Vandenberg confined his remarks to a statement that the United States would abstain from voting "because the special Convention is one to which the Government of the United States will be a party, and we consider it would be inappropriate for us to prejudge the case here" (ibid., page 455). For texts of the resolution and accompanying draft general convention on privileges and immunities of the United Nations, see United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, First Part, Resolutions Adopted by the General Assembly during

²⁸ The United States reservation was entered into the Report of the Sixth Committee to the General Assembly (GA (I/1), Plenary, p. 642, annex 22) which the General Assembly considered and adopted on February 13. The United States position was reaffirmed by Senator Vandenberg during the relatively brief discussion on the floor, in which he said "I rise only to make the position of the delegation of the United States perfectly plain in regard to the reports of the Fifth and Sixth Committees. We have reserved our position in respect of tax immunities in regard to the reports of both Committees. [For text in pertinent part of the Fifth Committee's report to the General Assembly see GA (I/1), Plenary, pp. 607, 608, and 612.] The Constitution of the United States gives the American Congress sole power to exempt American citizens from taxation. . . . The delegation of the United States also reserves its position in respect of national service exemptions under the general Convention reported by the Sixth Committee. This again is due to the fact that the Constitution of the United States permits no authority other than the American Congress to deal with this matter, and we are not in a position to prejudge that ultimate consideration." (GA (I/1), Plenary, pp. 454, 455)

The position of the United States on the two issues of exemption of United States citizens in the service of the United Nations from national service and taxation in the United States was re-affirmed by the United States Government at the second part of the first session of the General Assembly (at New York, October-December, 1946); see United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, Second Part, Fifth Committee, p. 382, annex 11c, "Convention on the privileges and immunities of the United Nations: Categories of officials to which the provisions of articles V and VII shall apply: Report of the Joint Sub-Committee of the Fifth and Sixth Committees".

1512. Undel 208. For Hiss from Ross. Undel 157, Delun 104.²⁹ Following reactions to proposed UNO passport received from Passport and Visa Divisions:

(1) Passport Division considers it highly undesirable for US to consent to permit an international organization to decide who is or who is not a United States citizen or to document any person as a citizen of US. Passport Division notes that under existing US law only Secretary of State may issue and cause US passports to be issued. Passport Division considers that UNO officials should bear passports issued by countries to which they owe allegiance, when traveling internationally on United Nations or any other business but suggests that when UNO officials are traveling on UNO business they could in addition be issued credentials certifying to their official status in the organization and of the fact that they are traveling on business of the organization.

(2) Visa Division advises that it does not see how Dept can recognize passports issued by international organizations except as documents showing status of bearers as officers or employees of such organizations. Visa Division notes that a passport is a document of identity and nationality and therefore may properly be issued only by a government which recognizes and certifies bearer as one of its nationals with a right to return, even as a deportee, to the national territory.

Visa Division also finds objectionable provision of draft convention which appears to remove diplomatic or consular discretion in granting or refusing visas to aliens claiming to be officers or employees of UNO and gives them a priority over all other applicants at each office by prohibiting any delay in granting visas. Visa Division observes this would make granting of visas largely a ministerial function and there would be little reason for requiring visas in such cases. This does not mean however that Department should favor abolishing visa requirements.³⁰

WASHINGTON, March 20, 1946.

MY DEAR MR. LIE: I am transmitting to you herewith a copy of the International Organizations Immunities Act which grants certain privileges and immunities to international organizations designated by the President, together with a copy of the Executive Order of February 19, 1946 designating the United Nations as an international organization entitled to the privileges and immunities granted by the Act.³²

I wish to take this opportunity of assuring you that it is the policy of this Government to keep this Executive Order in effect with respect to the United Nations until it is superseded by such permanent arrangements as may be agreed to between the United Nations and this Government with respect to the legal status of the United Nations in this country.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES F. BYRNES

*The Secretary of State to the Governor of the State of New York

WASHINGTON, March 20, 1946.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR DEWEY: In connection with the establishment of the temporary headquarters of the United Nations in New York City and the possible establishment of the permanent headquarters in Westchester County, New York, a number of questions will arise regarding the privileges and immunities of the United Nations, the members of its Secretariat and Delegates of the Member States.

The International Organization Immunities Act grants certain privileges and immunities which have been made applicable to the United Nations by the Executive Order of February 19, 1946. Copies of the Act and of the Order are enclosed. The Act applies, for the most part, only to relief from provisions of federal law. There will undoubtedly be some questions that will have to be considered regarding relief from the operation of state and local requirements. I would greatly appreciate it if you would authorize your Attorney General to discuss this matter with representatives of the Secretary General and officials of the Department.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES F. BYRNES

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Acting Assistant Chief of the Division of International Organization Affairs (Halderman)

[WASHINGTON,] April 9, 1946.

Participants: OA—Mr. Stokes
Mr. Maktos
Mr. Reiff
Mr. Halderman

Le—Miss Whiteman
RP—Mr. Bevans

The purpose of the meeting was to give preliminary consideration to action to be taken with respect to the General Convention on Privileges and Immunities approved by the General Assembly and opened for adherence.

It was pointed out that an instrument containing the same provisions as the General Convention is attached as an annex to the Draft Convention between the United Nations and the United States with reference to the permanent headquarters, and that this instrument was intended to take effect until the General Convention is concluded.

The possibility was suggested of having this annex come into force as a protocol, accompanied by legislation necessary to give it effect. It was suggested that Congress might be more amenable to the proposals if it were first presented as a provisional arrangement. On the other hand it was suggested that the General Convention does not contain measures of a drastic character, and that it should not necessarily be anticipated that Congress would find it objectionable.

The other principal proposal as to timing was that the General Convention should be proceeded with at once. It was thought that the psychological effect would be good if the United States adherence could be concluded by the September meeting of the Assembly. It was also suggested that final action on both the General and Special Conventions should be taken at once instead of going through the procedure twice. This question was left open.

It was agreed that whichever approach is followed, it will be necessary to prepare authoritative answers as to the extent to which the Convention involves a change in existing legislation. It was agreed to undertake a study of this in OA and RP, and also to consult with interested divisions in the Department. When these studies are concluded, they can furnish a basis of discussion for the next meeting. At that time other officials of the Department will be invited, with a view to arriving at recommendations for subsequent procedure. It was considered that that would also be the appropriate time for undertaking consultations with other interested departments and agencies of the Government.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Carl M. Marcy of the Division of International Organization Affairs

[WASHINGTON,] April 29, 1946.

Participants: SPA—Mr. Hiss and Mr. Ross
OA—Messrs. Maktos, Stokes, Halderman
Reiff and Marcy

The meeting was held to discuss the draft commentary prepared by OA on the Draft Site Convention. The following matters were discussed:

1. There was discussion as to whether a treaty could be concluded between the United States and the United Nations. It was generally agreed, in line with the conclusion reached by Mr. Halderman in a memorandum on the subject, that such a treaty could be concluded.

2. The question was raised as to whether the substance of the Site Convention should be incorporated in a treaty or in an executive agreement, concluded with the consent of Congress. It was pointed out that the United Nations apparently prefers a treaty. It was felt, however, that there would be many advantages to having the agreement an executive one approved by a joint resolution since that method would bring the House of Representatives into active participation and since supplementary legislation will be necessary. Furthermore, it would be much easier to amend a joint resolution, in the event that is necessary, than to negotiate a new treaty.

3. It was agreed that the comments on the Draft Convention should be revised so as to leave open the question of whether the agreement will be a treaty or an executive agreement.

4. The question was raised as to whether the legal effect of an executive agreement is the same as a treaty. This question has been examined from a number of points of view, but will need to be re-examined with the site agreement in mind. Thus, it may be necessary in this agreement for the United States to relinquish jurisdiction over United States territory—query whether an executive agreement, with or without state consent, can do this?

5. There was considerable discussion of the extent, if any, to which a state may need to be a party to any agreement between the United States and the United Nations in view of the likelihood that some jurisdiction may be relinquished. It was pointed out that the Constitution requires the federal government to have state consent before the federal government can take jurisdiction over land which it acquires by purchase or by condemnation, and that when the federal government transfers its title to a third party, jurisdiction over the land reverts to the state. The question was raised as to whether this was true in the field of foreign relations, since, under the doctrine of United States v. Curtis-Wright Export Corp., the Supreme Court took the position that in the field of foreign relations the United States can do anything that a sovereign state can do. It was agreed that this question needs further examination.

6. Mr. Stokes outlined the inter- and intra-departmental conversations which have thus far taken place. He pointed out that in connection with the acquisition of land for the Organization, Mr. Flournoy³³ had suggested the possibility of creating a corporation to act for the benefit of the United Nations. It was observed that although the idea of a corporation might be difficult to “sell” to the United Nations,

it presented possibilities which should be kept in mind as the negotiations proceed.³⁴ to President Truman*

SECRET URGENT

NEW YORK, May 13, 1946—5 p. m.

[Received May 13—4:48 p. m.]

171. In light of the intimate and private conversations you and I have had on the question of the site of the United Nations, I am bringing directly to your attention the critical situation that has now arisen. I am sending a copy of this telegram to Acheson in order that you may have the benefit of his views.

The uncertainty of some top delegates and high officials of the United Nations as to whether the United Nations will remain at its present temporary location in New York beyond September has created a very serious problem. The decision to come to New York for a 3- to 5-year interim period was reached, you will recall, at the General Assembly in London. Dissatisfaction with temporary arrangements in New York during the past weeks has given rise to increasing speculation by delegates and United Nations Officials that the decision will be reviewed in the September Assembly. There is talk of moving away from New York and even of returning to Geneva. Any move to leave this country would, in my judgment, have serious repercussions upon the United Nations and would seriously damage the prestige and influence of the United States.

New York authorities are prepared to spend more than 3 million dollars to help set up interim facilities for the United Nations. They ³⁴ During April, May, and June the Department engaged in an intensive study of the legal and constitutional problems pertaining to a site agreement between the United States and the United Nations which would spell out the conditions governing the acquisition and control of the permanent headquarters of the United Nations. Numerous working and position papers were drafted and a draft agreement was drawn to reflect United States thinking. Within the Department this activity tended to center in the Division of International Organization Affairs and in the Office of the Legal Adviser, while outside the Department close liaison was established with the Department of Justice where several papers were formulated on that aspect of the situation involving Federal-State relations. These papers are scattered throughout the Department's central indexed files, particularly the 501.AD file, and in the IO Files, specifically in series SD/Le/1-, SD/HQC/1-, and a 1947 background book entitled "Arrangements Respecting Permanent Headquarters of the United Nations" (hereafter cited as "Background Book"). Appropriate information from these papers and the United States draft of the convention itself were passed on to the United Nations Secretariat in the course of preliminary and informal exchanges in May.

Exchanges between the Department and the Secretariat resulted in an agreement by May 23 to start formal talks in Washington on June 10.

are ready to go all out to help solve housing, transportation, and other problems and to make the United Nations stay in New York a success during a 3- to 5-year interim period. For obvious reasons, they are reluctant to spend such a large sum or make long-term arrangements if the General Assembly decides in September to shift the temporary headquarters to another location. If New York withholds or curtails its support, plans for the September meeting will be imperiled. This result would greatly strengthen the present inclinations of some people to move the interim headquarters elsewhere.

I am firmly convinced that the time has now arrived when the Federal Government must give strong support and assistance to working out plans for remaining in New York throughout the 3- to 5-year interim period. When the decision to come to New York was reached in London, the United States offered to assist in every way possible. May I have authorization to inform Secretary General Lie and other delegations represented on the Security Council that the United States Government firmly supports Lie in arrangements for temporary headquarters in New York for the interim period 3 years. Support from the United States will strengthen Lie's hand in dealing with other delegations and with New York authorities. May I also be authorized to confirm to Lie and to other delegations that the Federal Government will give fullest possible assistance to the United Nations and to the City of New York in obtaining temporary housing facilities, transportation, and other essentials. New York authorities assure me that federal funds will not be needed, but it is clear that White House backing will be required to persuade federal agencies to make needed federal facilities available.

On the question of the permanent site of the United Nations, I believe we should continue to maintain the neutral position we have held thus far. The need for our full support and assistance on the interim location is so critical, however, that I am convinced we must act immediately in order to avoid a damaging situation in which several million dollars may be spent on interim facilities that would be used only for one meeting of the General Assembly.

STETTINIUS

501.AD/5-1446

Memorandum by the Acting Secretary of State to President Truman

WASHINGTON, May 14, 1946.

Subject: Mr. Stettinius' telegram of May 13 with respect to Interim Headquarters of the United Nations

The Department has followed with some care the problems which the United Nations has had to face in establishing its temporary headquarters in New York. We agree that the only practical course, in order to ensure the success of the meeting of the General Assembly scheduled for September 3, is to continue in effect the decision reached by the General Assembly this past February to have the interim headquarters located in New York for a period of at least three years. It is understandable that the New York authorities will not be able to make the necessary considerable outlays which will be required to assure the success of the next Assembly meeting unless they can be confident that the United Nations will remain in the New York area for at least three years. Consequently we recommend that you authorize Mr. Stettinius to support the General Assembly decision and so inform Mr. Lie, the Secretary General, and the other Delegations to the Security Council whose support is desired.

We also recommend that you authorize Mr. Stettinius to confirm that this Government will give all appropriate assistance to the United Nations in connection with arrangements for temporary headquarters. This latter recommendation will involve action by this Government from time to time of no inconsiderable importance. We can anticipate that we will be asked to grant priorities for residential housing construction for members of the Secretariat, to make available surplus Army and Navy transport equipment, and the like. We feel it important in the interest of the United States in carrying out our policy of full support to the United Nations that the Federal Government be prepared to assist in such instances as these. In order to ascertain promptly the specific types of assistance which the Federal Government may be called upon to give, we recommend that Mr. Stettinius be asked to obtain from Mr. Lie a specification of contemplated requests for assistance.

A message from you to Mr. Stettinius in response to his telegram under reference, drafted along the foregoing lines, is attached for your approval.

DEAN ACHESON

SUGGESTED DRAFT TELEGRAM TO MR. STETTINIUS³⁵

In response to your telegram of May 13, I am very glad to authorize you to inform the Secretary General that the United States Government will firmly support him in his effort to carry out the General Assembly's decision to establish the temporary headquarters of the United Nations in New York for an interim period of three years.

³⁵ This draft, signed by President Truman, was dispatched to Mr. Stettinius at New York as telegram 59, May 14, 5 p. m.

You are also authorized to confirm to Lie and to other delegations that the Federal Government will give all appropriate assistance to the United Nations in connection with arrangements for temporary headquarters.

However, in order to enable the Federal Government to assist, it is essential to know in specific terms exactly what assistance the United Nations wants from the Federal Government. If you will discuss this also with Lie, we will be in a better position here in Washington to determine procedures in order to provide assistance with minimum delay.

The Under Secretary of State (Acheson) to the Director of the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion (Snyder)

WASHINGTON, May 22, 1946.

MY DEAR MR. SNYDER: I refer to the President's letter of May 18³⁶ asking you to assume a coordinating responsibility with respect to Federal assistance in the establishment of temporary headquarters of the United Nations in New York.

This is a critical situation accompanied by severe criticism of the alleged failure of the Federal Government to grant the assistance which, as the host State, it should have accorded.

I enclose a memorandum giving the necessary background on the situation and outlining some of the problems that may be anticipated. Immediate action is required with regard to:

1. Prompt approval of necessary construction projects and the granting of priorities for materials involved in reconversion of the ³⁶No letter dated May 18 has been found in the Department files. The carbon (blue) copy of a proposed letter dated May 17 is attached to a memorandum to the President from the Acting Secretary (Acheson) (also dated May 17) (501.AD/5-1746). Presumably the text of this copy is the same as that actually sent to Mr. Snyder on May 18. In it President Truman, after setting forth the text of his telegram of May 14 to Mr. Stettinius, informed Mr. Snyder: "These arrangements will include the granting of priorities for materials, the making available of physical facilities controlled by the Federal Government, and such other steps as may be necessary not only to provide the United Nations with adequate office space, conference rooms, assembly hall and other facilities to be used by it, but also to assure adequate housing and transportation for members of the Secretariat and the delegations of the Member Nations."

"In case of any differences of opinion as to the appropriate steps to be taken, I request you to exercise, by the issuance in your discretion of appropriate directives, the full powers which have been delegated to you under applicable statutes and executive orders. In any case where, in your opinion, action should be taken by any officials of the Federal Government in this matter which they are unwilling to take and which you are not authorized to direct, I would appreciate your bringing the matter to my attention for decision."

Relevant documentation regarding the implementation of this cooperative effort at different levels in Washington and New York is found in File No. 501.AD.

Sperry Gyroscope Plant at Lake Success, Nassau County, Long Island, the New York City Building at the World's Fair Grounds, Flushing Meadows, and construction of a 550 unit housing project at Jamaica, Long Island.

2. Making available to the United Nations for the purpose of temporary housing of members of the Secretariat between now and approximately May 1, 1947, Fort Totten at Bayside, Long Island, now occupied by an ATC unit.

3. Providing necessary equipment for the maintenance of adequate transportation facilities between residential centers, the Sperry Gyroscope Plant, and Flushing Meadows.

The other Federal agencies which seem to be involved in this matter are the War Department, Navy Department, Civilian Production Administration, National Housing Administration, Public Buildings Administration, War Assets Corporation, and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

I suggest that you designate a member of your staff to take general charge of this operation. Mr. John C. Ross and his associate, Mr. I. N. P. Stokes, have been given the responsibility in the Department for following all matters relating to the headquarters of the United Nations and they will be glad to furnish all possible assistance. I suggest that whoever is to act for you in this matter get in touch with them.

Sincerely yours,

[DEAN ACHESON]

MEMORANDUM

Subject: Assistance to United Nations—Temporary Headquarters

Background

1. The General Assembly of the United Nations voted on February 14, 1946 to establish the interim headquarters of the United Nations in New York City pending final decision concerning the location of permanent headquarters. At the same time it was determined that the permanent headquarters should be in Westchester County, New York, and/or Fairfield County, Connecticut, but this decision is subject to reconsideration as explained below in paragraph 9.

2. In view of the fact that the United Nations Security Council was scheduled to reconvene in New York on March 21, representatives of the Secretary General decided on March 6 that the facilities immediately available at Hunter College in the Bronx would best suit the needs of the United Nations for temporary headquarters. Construction was started immediately, Secretariat offices were installed at Hunter, and the Security Council held its first meeting as scheduled on March 21. Since then the Security Council has continued to use these facilities, the Secretariat has expanded its staff to a total of approximately 800 and various commissions and committees have used the Hunter facilities for meeting purposes.

3. During the month of April it rapidly became apparent that the Hunter College facilities would be inadequate for the needs of the United Nations. The Secretary General, Mr. Trygve Lie, is the chief administrative officer of the United Nations and clearly has the responsibility and the authority to decide the best location within the New York City area for location of the temporary headquarters and to make all necessary physical arrangements. The Secretary General, after consultation with New York City authorities and other interested groups has now decided that the Secretariat offices, meeting rooms for the Security Council, Economic and Social Council, commissions and committees should be located at the Sperry Gyroscope Plant, Lake Success, Nassau County, Long Island, and that the United Nations Assembly should meet in the New York City Building at the World's Fair Grounds, Flushing Meadows, Long Island. The next meeting of the Assembly is scheduled for September 3; the Security Council will remain in continuous session; other Councils, commissions and committees will continue to meet periodically. It is intended that office space for the various delegations to the United Nations will also be provided as required at the Sperry Plant.

4. It would probably be generally agreed that the arrangement described in Paragraph 3 is not an ideal one. Both the Sperry Plant and the New York City Building are some miles distant from Manhattan and from each other, and transportation will be a very difficult problem particularly since many of the delegations will maintain their office and residence headquarters in Manhattan. There will also be a number of difficult operating problems resulting from the physical separation of parts of the whole United Nations organization. Housing for members of the Secretariat and of the delegations will also be a very difficult problem but this problem would exist regardless of location.

5. On the other hand there are substantial advantages in the selection of the Sperry-Flushing Meadows location. For one thing the Sperry Plant is very modern and readily adaptable to use for offices and meeting rooms with large possibilities for expansion as may be required. The New York City Building at Flushing Meadows lends itself very well for adaptation as a large Assembly meeting hall without substantial cost to the United Nations. On the whole, careful investigation indicates that the Secretary General's decision is the wisest one that could have been made in a very difficult situation.

6. This decision having been made, Secretariat and more particularly city authorities have been severely critical of the failure of the Federal Government to assist adequately in making this decision effective so that it would be possible to establish the United Nations in the new location on an operating basis before the Assembly meeting on September 3. The city authorities have obligated the city to spend more than $2,000,000 in preparing the Flushing Meadows buildings for the General Assembly, and in many other ways, with particular reference to housing, they are making outstanding efforts to achieve the desired results. However, a week ago the city reached the conclusion that they simply could not undertake the obligations involved without assurance on two points: first, that the Federal Government would get behind the project and assist in every way possible and, second, that all parties concerned would agree that the arrangements contemplated would stand for a three-year interim period subject to renewal for an additional two years.

The Secretary of State to the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives (Bloom)

WASHINGTON, May 22, 1946.

MY DEAR MR. BLOOM: I am now in a position to reply more fully to your letter of April 24, 1946, transmitting for the comments of the Department of State copies of H. Con. Res. 143, a concurrent resolution "To provide for United Nations passports."³⁷

While I concur in the desirability of permitting travel in times of peace in all states Members of the United Nations or indeed in any portion of the world in which conditions are not abnormal, I consider that it is desirable that American citizens be documented by this Government. Moreover, Section 1 of the Act of July 3, 1926 provides that the Secretary of State may issue passports, or cause them to be issued by certain officials, under such rules as the President shall prescribe, for and on behalf of the United States "and no other person shall grant, issue, or verify such passports."

In the cases of persons who are officials or employees of the United Nations, a United Nations credential may be recognized as a certificate of the status of the bearer as such an official or employee, but a national passport may also be required in most instances, if obtainable, for the purpose of establishing the identity of the bearer as a national of the country to which he owes allegiance, there being no such status as that of a national of the United Nations.

The determination of American citizenship is at times a very difficult problem and should be made as far as practicable in the United States where evidence of citizenship is usually available. Without a passport issued by the Secretary of State or under his authority, an American national traveling abroad would be likely to have difficulty in establishing his identity and nationality for the purpose of obtaining protection or assistance from American diplomatic and consular officers.

Since the United Nations is not a government, it has no national territory to which bearers of its passports may be permitted to return after travelling in other countries. Deportation of an alien from the United States can generally be effected under our laws only to the country of which the alien is a citizen or subject or to the country from which the alien came to the United States, which latter country is usually unwilling to accept the alien as a deportee unless he is a citizen or subject of such country. So far as nonimmigrant travel is concerned, the Government of the United States could not accept into its territory the bearer of a United Nations passport who does not have definite assurance of being able to return to the country from which he came or to enter some third country after a temporary sojourn in the United States. It is not believed that the member states would consent to have the United Nations issue a travel document which required each member state to accept the bearer into its territory, as this would involve a question of interference in matters of purely domestic concern to each member state in connection with its immigration and nationality laws, a power specifically withheld from the United Nations by Article 2, Section 7 of the United Nations Charter.

If the proposed measures should be adopted United Nations passports might be obtained by nationals of one member state for the purpose of carrying on objectionable political activities in the territory of other member states, but, according to the provisions of the proposed Resolution, these passports would have to be "honored" by the latter states. In such a case, even if the objectionable activities were directed by the government of the bearer's country, it would be difficult to hold that government accountable, since the bearer would be traveling under the sanction of a document issued by the United Nations.

Since there is no apparent necessity for the United Nations to issue passports, and since there are valid and serious objections to such issuance, I am of the opinion that it would be highly undesirable for this Government to propose the course of action suggested in this bill.

The Department has been informed by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the submission of this report.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES F. BYRNES

SECRET US URGENT

NEW YORK, May 28, 1946—6 p. m.

[Received 7:47 p. m.]

244. In a private conversation last evening, Dr. Quo³⁸ said that he and Sir Alexander Cadogan³⁹ had been discussing the question of diplomatic immunity for the representatives of the Security Council.

He said he realized, of course, that granting immunity to 3,000 people of the International Secretariat was a serious problem. He wondered whether it would not be possible for the top representatives on the Security Council to be granted diplomatic immunity immediately just as if they were attached to Embassies in Washington. Later, Sir Alexander Cadogan spoke to me about the same subject, saying that the present system was a great nuisance. I assured both Sir Alexander and Dr. Quo that I would take the matter up immediately.

I appreciate that this request raises a number of problems. Would you please let me know what I may reply to these requests?⁴⁰

Editorial Note

Formal negotiations for a site convention began in Washington on June 10 between representatives of the United States led by the Legal Adviser of the Department of State, Mr. Charles Fahy, and a United Nations team headed by the United Nations Assistant Secretary General for Legal Affairs, Dr. Ivan Kerno. One representative each from the State of New York and the State of Connecticut also attended. In a statement issued to the press on June 11 entitled "Negotiations on Legal Arrangements for United Nations Headquarters" the Department of State emphasized that the negotiations were confined to legal matters and did not concern the question of where the actual site would be located; see Department of State Bulletin, June 23, 1946, page 1078.

³⁸ Dr. Quo Tai-chi, Chinese representative on the Security Council.

³⁹ United Kingdom representative on the Security Council.

Seven meetings were held between June 10 and June 18 and resulted in a draft text described as a "convention/agreement". The exact form of the instrument was left undetermined pending a decision on the part of the United Nations officials as to whether an agreement authorized by a joint resolution of the United States Congress would be a satisfactory arrangement from their point of view. In this connection Mr. Fahy on June 13 handed to Dr. Kerno at the latter's request a memorandum indicating in what respects an executive agreement approved by joint resolution of the Congress would have the same constitutional validity as a treaty. Minutes of the meetings of June 12-18 and other relevant documentation including the June 20 draft text and the June 13 memorandum are found in the "Background Book"; the June 20 text is also printed as United Nations document A/67, September 1, 1946 (found in United Nations depository libraries).

Subsequently the Legal Adviser described the contents of the draft text as follows: "Stated broadly, the principal provisions of the draft Agreement are as follows:

"1. It provides that the United States will acquire land, by condemnation if necessary, for transfer to the United Nations, (Section 3);

"2. It authorizes the United Nations to establish its own communications system and to establish an airport, (Sections 7 and 8);

"3. It provides that the area owned by the United Nations shall be inviolable, i.e. the area shall not be entered by federal, state, or local officials of the United States in performance of their duties except with the consent of the Secretary-General of the United Nations, (Section 10);

"4. It provides that federal, state, and local law of the United States is to apply within the zone except as otherwise provided in the agreement, (Section 15);

"5. It provides that regulations made by the United Nations for the purpose of establishing conditions within its area appropriate for the execution of its functions shall be operative within the United Nations area, and that any federal, state, or local law of the United States inconsistent with such regulations shall to that extent be inapplicable within the United Nations area (Section 16);

"6. Except as otherwise provided in the Agreement, the federal, state and local courts are to have jurisdiction over acts done and transactions taking place within the United Nations area (Section 17)." (Memorandum, the Legal Adviser to Mr. George T. Washington, Assistant Solicitor General, Department of Justice, August 15, 1946, document 6a in "Background Book")

Letters regarding the negotiations with accompanying draft text were submitted for comment during July and August to the Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the Attorney General, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of War and the Administrator of Civil Aeronautics; the texts of these letters and the replies are found in Section 5 of the "Background Book". This step was taken in preparation for the final negotiations for a site agreement between the United States and the United Nations, when a firm decision had been made on the location of the site for the permanent headquarters.

WASHINGTON, July 30, 1946.

EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to refer to the letter dated June 10, 1946 from the Secretary-General⁴¹ with which he enclosed five copies of the English and French texts of the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations. The Secretary-General asked what steps the Government of the United States of America has taken or intends to take in order to give effect to this Convention and expressed the hope that pending accession to the Convention, the American authorities will take into account the provisions of the Convention in their relations with the United Nations.

I am pleased to inform you that the Government of the United States of America now has the Convention on Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations under study. I shall communicate with you in the near future regarding the specific steps being taken with reference to the Convention.

Your Excellency's attention is invited to the International Organizations Immunities Act, approved December 29, 1945 (Public Law 291, 79th Congress 1st Session), two copies of which are enclosed. This legislation, as applied to the United Nations by Executive Order No. 9698, February 19, 1946 (11 Federal Register 1809), extends to the United Nations and its personnel many of the privileges, exemptions, and immunities for which provision is made in the Convention on Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations.

Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

WASHINGTON, July 30, 1946.

MY DEAR MR. KERNO: This will confirm the understanding of the State Department regarding the proposed agreement between the United Nations and the United States with respect to the establishment of the permanent headquarters of the United Nations.⁴²

The attached draft⁴³ embodies the changes in the document originally submitted to the Secretary-General by the General Assembly which have resulted from the extremely helpful and friendly negotiations recently held between representatives of the United Nations and the Department of State, in which representatives of the States of Connecticut and New York also participated.

An effort was made in these negotiations to reach a form of agreement which would be suitable regardless of the location and size of the headquarters, on the theory that, before the agreement is actually executed, the details which must be worked out after determination of the location and size would be incorporated in an annex. Very satisfactory progress has been made in this respect, but it seems unwise, for two reasons, to approve this document definitely now as representing agreement between the Secretary-General and the Department of State.

In the first place, the significance of several provisions of the proposed agreement cannot be adequately determined except in the light of specific locations which may be under consideration and with the benefit of consultation with representatives of the particular communities affected. This is especially true with respect to such matters as loss of local tax revenues and the effect on land values of the proposed option to acquire additional land in the defined "zone".

In the second place, although the Committee named by the General Assembly to assist in the negotiation of the agreement is no longer in session, the Headquarters Commission is continuing to explore with various local officials many of the legal problems which may be involved. These discussions are almost sure to shed new light on various matters which are covered by the proposed agreement and to result in suggestions for mutually agreeable modifications.

It is understood that the attached draft agreement will be included in the report of the Secretary-General to the General Assembly as representing the result of the negotiations to date; that it is to be regarded as an unfinished draft, with respect to which both parties remain free to request modifications in the light of various factors which may be developed as particular locations come up for specific consideration; that the Secretary-General's report including this document will be made public; but that all copies of the draft agreement which are released either by the United Nations or by this Department will be plainly marked so as to indicate that it is an unfinished or working draft only and has not been finally approved by either party.

Allow me to express once more my appreciation of the friendly spirit, devotion to the ideals of the United Nations, and keen understanding of the many problems involved, which have been shown by you and your associates and the members of the Negotiating Committee in the course of our discussions of this subject.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES FAHY

The Acting Secretary of State (Acheson) to the Acting United States Representative at the United Nations (Johnson)

[WASHINGTON,] July 31, 1946.

The Acting Secretary of State refers to telegram No. 244, dated May 28, 1946, concerning a conversation with Dr. Quo and Sir Alexander Cadogan during which the question of diplomatic immunities for representatives to the Security Council was discussed.

There are enclosed for the information of the Acting United States Representative five copies of Senate Bill No. 2472 (79th Congress, 2d Session),⁴⁴ to amend Public Law 291, the International Organizations Immunities Act. It will be observed that the proposed amendment is designed to give the Secretary General and the Assistant Secretaries General of the United Nations and principal resident representatives of Members and certain of their staffs the same privileges, exemptions, and immunities as are accorded diplomatic envoys of foreign governments. This amendment will, if enacted, give effect to Section 19 of the General Convention on Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations, and to Section 27 of the June 20, 1946 draft Convention/Agreement between the United Nations and the United States of America (SD/A/NC/8).⁴⁴

It would be appreciated if the Acting United States Representative would bring this legislation to the attention of the Assistant Secretary General for Legal Affairs of the United Nations as well as to the attention of such resident representatives of Members as may be interested.

There are also enclosed five copies of Public Law 291, which, as implemented by Executive Order 9698, February 19, 1946, but without the proposed amendment, confers many privileges, exemptions, and immunities upon alien officers and employees of international organizations, upon aliens designated by foreign governments to serve as their representatives in or to such organizations, and upon the families and servants of such persons. Among other privileges, exemptions, and immunities are exemption from federal income tax upon salaries earned in the United States, customs courtesies upon initial arrival, and immunity from suit and legal process relating to acts performed in official capacities. Persons of the above categories are also entitled to the same privileges, exemptions and immunities as are accorded under similar circumstances to officers and employees of foreign governments and members of their families so far as alien registration, fingerprinting, and registration of foreign agents, are concerned.

The privileges and immunities given by the International Organizations Immunities Act are not of course "diplomatic" privileges and immunities, but until such time as the proposed amendment becomes law it appears that representatives of Members must rely on Public Law 291 for such privileges, exemptions, and immunities as they may claim. The Acting United States Representative is authorized to use the information in this instruction in any way he deems appropriate.

[WASHINGTON,] August 1, 1946.

Participants: Mr. Fahy—Le
Miss Whiteman—Le
Mr. Halderman—OA
Mr. Marcy—OA

At Mr. Fahy's request, the meeting was held in his office to discuss steps which the Department of State should take in connection with the Convention on Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations.

After some discussion, there was agreement that it would be proper to submit the Convention to Congress for its approval by a joint resolution. There was also agreement that the Department of State should submit the Convention to the Bureau of the Budget for clearance prior to submitting it to the Congress. It was agreed that OA would, in consultation with Le and RP, prepare the necessary communications.

*The United Nations Assistant Secretary-General for Legal Affairs.

NEW YORK, 2nd August 1946.

MY DEAR MR. FAHY: I acknowledge with thanks the receipt of your letter of July 30th, and the enclosed copy of the draft instrument relating to the establishment of the permanent headquarters of the United Nations.

It is also my understanding that the draft instrument does not, at this stage, represent a definitive agreement between the Secretary-General and the Secretary of State, and that further discussions may be needed when a specific location is chosen as the site of the permanent headquarters. I am certain that you share my hope that it will be possible to hold these further discussions during the forthcoming session of the General Assembly, with a view to submitting a definitive text before the Assembly adjourns.

It is the intention of the Secretary-General to report on this matter to the General Assembly and to transmit the present text with the explanation that it represents the results of negotiations to date and that a definitive text will be prepared at a later date, probably during the course of the session.⁴⁵

In publishing the text, the Secretariat will use the following caption: "Working Draft—Not as yet finally approved by either party". I would suggest that a similar caption might be used on any text released by the Department of State.

May I thank you again for the close and helpful co-operation which we have had from you and your associates, and in particular the broad comprehension of the needs of the United Nations which you have shown in our negotiations.

Sincerely yours,

IVAN KERNO

*The United Nations Assistant Secretary-General for Legal Affairs

NEW YORK, 6 August, 1946.

MY DEAR MR. FAHY: The United Nations Secretariat is receiving an increasing number of questions from Delegations accredited to the United Nations with regard to privileges and immunities accorded in the United States. These questions, which are of growing concern to us, will be disposed of when the general convention on privileges and immunities and the convention on the site come into force. However, it is apparent that a considerable interval will elapse before these instruments can be made effective. In the meantime, the convening of the General Assembly will most probably cause increasing difficulties in this regard. While the United States legislation has proved helpful, experience has shown that it is incomplete, and that some further regulation is necessary.

I should like to propose to you that consideration be given in the very near future to the conclusion of an interim agreement on privileges and immunities which might contain certain of the provisions in the general convention, and in the draft convention on the site. Such an interim agreement might have a duration of six months to a year.

I should very much appreciate having your views on this proposal.
Sincerely yours,

IVAN KERNO

MY DEAR MR. KERNO: I have received your letter of August 6 proposing that consideration be given to the conclusion of an interim agreement on privileges and immunities to contain certain of the provisions of the general convention on privileges and immunities of the United Nations and of the convention on the site, pending their coming into force.

In reply, I am pleased to state that should the United Nations Secretariat indicate to this Department the specific privileges and immunities which are desired, and which may not now be obtained under the "International Organizations Immunities Act", Public Law 291, 79th Cong., 1st sess., approved December 29, 1945, sympathetic consideration will be given by the Department to the matter.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES FAHY

[For an opinion furnished to the Secretary of State by the Acting Attorney General (McGranery) at the request of representatives of the United Nations as to whether an agreement (regarding a site convention) would have the same binding effect as a treaty in superseding inconsistent State and local laws, see text of letter from Mr. McGranery, dated August 20, in Department of State Bulletin, December 8, 1946, pages 1068 ff.

The Acting Attorney General stated, in conclusion, “. . . there can be no doubt that the proposed agreement, if executed pursuant to congressional authority, will supersede incompatible State and local laws. As the Supreme Court stated . . . ‘It is inconceivable’ that State constitutions, State laws, and State policies ‘can be interposed as an obstacle to the effective operation of a federal constitutional power. . . .’”

The Legal Adviser forwarded a copy of this opinion to Mr. Kernon in a letter of August 26, with the observation that, “In view of the Acting Attorney General’s definite opinion that an executive agreement executed pursuant to authorization by a joint resolution of Congress would have the same force as a treaty, I assume that the United Nations will regard the choice between an executive agreement and a treaty as a matter for determination by the United States in accordance with its own constitutional requirements and governmental policies.” (501.AD/8-2646).]

(Hiss) to the Acting Secretary of State (Clayton)*

[WASHINGTON,] September 3-9, 1946.

There is attached a draft letter to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget ⁴⁶ requesting the usual clearance for sending to the Congress a letter concerning our accession to the Convention on Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations which was adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations in February 1946. This Convention is open for accession by all states members of the United Nations. It is designed to implement the provisions of Articles 104 and 105 of the Charter of the United Nations which provide that the Organization and its employees and representatives to the Organization are to enjoy such privileges and immunities as are necessary for the fulfillment of the purposes of the United Nations.

We have discussed this matter with Mr. Fahy and he is in agreement that, even though Congress is in adjournment, the Convention should be transmitted to Congress. This will protect us when the General Assembly meets in late September against any charges of delay in taking steps looking toward United States accession to the Convention. The matter is especially important in view of the fact that the United States is host to the United Nations.

The draft letters to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House review our problems in connection with granting privileges and immunities not only to the United Nations but to other public international organizations.⁴⁷

Attention is particularly invited to Article VII of the Convention which grants the United Nations authority to issue a laissez-passer (let pass). The Passport and Visa Divisions have indicated some doubts as to the wisdom of this Article and have suggested that the article be omitted or that we take a reservation. Copies of their memoranda on this matter are in the underlying file.⁴⁸ The Legal Adviser's Office (as indicated by underlying memoranda⁴⁸) concur with our view that it would be unwise for this Government to take a reservation on Article VII of the General Convention. Such a reservation would defeat the purpose of the provision which is to enable travel on necessary business by officials who because of special circumstances are unable to obtain passports. It should also be noted that the United States is the host state and that the United States Delegation did not make any reservation on this point in voting for this Convention, although it did make reservations on tax exemption and military service. Legal objections to permitting the United Nations to issue a laissez-passer to an American citizen would, of course, be taken care of by passage of the joint resolution attached to the draft letters to the Congress.

Mr. A. H. Feller, General Counsel and Director of the Legal Department, Secretariat of the United Nations, to the Legal Adviser (Fahy) sympathetic consideration to the conclusion of an interim agreement on certain privileges and immunities of the United Nations.

The most urgent questions in this subject have to do with personal immunities. Consequently, it would seem to us most suitable for an interim agreement, such as we have suggested, to include the substance of the following:

Article IV, Section 19 of Article V, and Article VI of the General Convention on Privileges and Immunities, and Article V of the proposed special Convention/Agreement between the United Nations and the United States.⁴⁹

It would appear to be desirable to put these provisions into effect by way of an executive agreement. As suggested in Dr. Kern's letter of August 6th, the duration of such an agreement might be from six months to a year, or perhaps it might remain in force until the coming into effect of the general and special Conventions.

If you find the above proposals agreeable, we would be prepared to submit a draft incorporating these provisions.⁵⁰

Sincerely yours,

A. H. FELLER

Article V of the special convention, entitled "Resident Representatives to the United Nations", based on the draft of June 20, read: "Every person accredited to the United Nations by a Member as the principal resident representative of such Member or as a resident representative with the rank of ambassador or minister plenipotentiary, and such resident members of their staffs as may be agreed upon between the Secretary-General, the United States of America and the Government of the Member concerned, shall whether residing inside or outside the zone, be entitled in the territory of the United States to the same privileges and immunities as it accords to diplomatic envoys accredited to it. In the case of Members whose governments are not recognized by the United States of America, such privileges and immunities need be extended to their representatives, or persons on the staffs of such representatives, only within the zone, at their residences and offices outside the zone, in transit between the zone and such residences and offices, and in transit on official business to or from foreign countries."

⁵⁰ In a letter of September 20 Mr. Fahy responded to Mr. Feller: "In so far as immunities and privileges contemplated by the provisions referred to are not covered by authorization of law, the Department would not be in a position to commit this Government to extend them. However, in specific cases relating to official acts, not covered by existing law, the Department will be pleased in appropriate instances, at the request of the Secretary General of the United Nations, pending the coming into force of the agreements referred to, to commend the request to the sympathetic consideration of the appropriate authorities." Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Controls (Lyon) to Joseph A. Panuch, Deputy to the Assistant Secretary for Administration (Russell)

[WASHINGTON,] September 17, 1946.

[Subject:] Convention on Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations with Particular Reference to Issuance of "Laissez-Passer"—Let Pass

With reference to our conversation this morning, I submit the following as the reactions of PD, VD, and CON to the proposed letters drafted by OA and addressed to Senator McKellar and Representative Rayburn.

I refer to the attached memoranda of Mr. Hiss (SPA) dated September 3-9, 1946 and that of Mrs. Shipley (PD) dated September 10 and other communications.⁵¹

I agree heartily with the opinion expressed by Mrs. Shipley in her memorandum relative to the issuance of a laissez-passer by UN. Also, I wonder whether the proposed authority would not create an undesirable precedent. In these days of international organization isn't it quite possible that we may find ourselves faced with other international organizations desiring to have the same authority; i.e., International Monetary Funds and Bank; the International Labor Office; and possibly the World Federation of Trade Unions? This authority granted by the proposed Convention might well become a rallying point for other international groups to obtain the same privileges.

My ignorance of the operations of the defunct League of Nations doesn't permit me to state categorically that their experience didn't lend itself to requesting its member nations to seek such authority. If such a laissez-passer were unnecessary for the officers of that organization, I cannot perceive of the necessity existing today with UN.

With specific reference to the last paragraph of Mr. Hiss's memorandum of September 3, I admit readily that I lack the imagination to perceive in what manner a reservation concerning the proposed use of authority by the Secretary-General of UN to issue a laissez-passer would defeat the purpose of the provision which is to enable UN officials to travel where, because of "special circumstances" and "unusual situations", they are not able to obtain passports. "Special circumstances" and "unusual situations" are apt to be misleading or, at least, difficult to interpret. To the best of my knowledge all member nations have passport issuing authorities, and I don't understand the necessity for the proposed laissez-passer. At least until such a time as the UN is a going concern in a practical sense I see no reason why we should abrogate any of our laws or regulations, particularly when by so doing no real advantage is gained and abuses may arise. I see no reason for superimposing a new travel document issuing authority on the already established and accepted international procedure. Perhaps if PD, VD, and CON were aware of the problem that this proposal is supposed to solve, and understood the "special circumstances" which prove the inadequacy of the existing procedure, we might have no logical reason to advance in opposition to this proposed concession. We do not feel, however, that merely because no reservations were made formally at the time of its original consideration by UN that the proposed convention should be labeled fait accompli.

We believe that the least the Department can do in submitting the proposed Convention, through the Bureau of the Budget to the Senate and the House, would be to call specific attention to the ramifications arising from the proposals.

PERMANENT HEADQUARTERS CONVENTION

Senator Austin introduced Mr. Fahy, who opened the discussion of problems in connection with the establishment of the permanent headquarters of the United Nations in the United States. Mr. Fahy said that there were two problems involved: First, the question of the precise location of the permanent headquarters; and second, the legal arrangements which would be necessary in connection with the location of the headquarters. So far as the legal arrangements are concerned, Mr. Fahy said that an agreement had been negotiated between the United Nations and the United States which was as complete as it was possible to make it without knowledge of the specific whereabouts of the headquarters area. This agreement was a working draft and subject to change by both parties, depending upon the precise location of the headquarters. He said that the agreement, after completion, would, of course, be referred to Congress for its approval.

Mr. Fahy said that representatives of the States of Connecticut and New York had participated in negotiating the agreement and that when the working draft was completed there was substantial agreement among all parties. Subsequently certain local officials in Westchester County had objected to some provisions of the agreement. Representatives of the State of California have indicated, however, that the agreement is acceptable to them without change. Connecticut representatives also indicated approval of the agreement. Local Westchester objections centered on such matters as the problem of tax reimbursements, options to buy, the supplying of public services, and similar matters. Mr. Fahy said that the United States would want to suggest certain minor changes in the agreement on the basis of comments which have been received from other government agencies. Copies of the draft agreement, during various stages of development, have been sent to the Chairmen and ranking minority members of the Senate and House Committees on Foreign Relations and Foreign Affairs. Representative Bloom said that he had never received a copy.

Mr. Fahy said that the position which the State Department had taken in negotiating the agreement, was that the United States should be generous to the United Nations, making them welcome, giving them the freedom necessary for the accomplishment of their functions, and not to try to restrict their activities by unnecessarily rigid, restrictive provisions in the agreement.

Mr. Fahy pointed out that the advisers hoped it would be possible early in the meeting of the General Assembly to select the permanent headquarters and thereafter, while the General Assembly was still in session, to put the draft working document into a form which could be approved by the General Assembly before its adjourns. The document, with supporting legislation, would then be submitted to the United States Congress.

Representative Bloom asked how long it would take to select the site. Mr. Fahy said that he hoped the selection could be made this session of the General Assembly and that the negotiations regarding the site agreement could be completed this session. He added that it would undoubtedly be several years before actual construction of the headquarters would begin.

TERMS OF REFERENCE OF HEADQUARTERS COMMISSION

Representative Bloom remarked that the terms of reference of the Headquarters Commission confined its activities to Westchester and Fairfield counties. He asked if the Federal Government was going to take land by condemnation. Mr. Fahy said that the condemnation question involved the consideration of where the site should be, that is, whether or not the site should be in an area where it might be necessary to condemn land.

Mrs. Roosevelt suggested that the problems would be considerably simplified if publicly owned land could be taken for the permanent headquarters. She suggested that consideration be given to the former Odgen Mills, Vanderbilt and Rogers estates in the vicinity of Hyde Park, and also to the Harriman Section of the Palisades Interstate Park and the Pound Ridge Reservation. She felt that dispossession and tax problems were serious and valid objections which would be obviated by the selection of public lands or private estates.

Mr. Fahy said that the State Department felt it was unfortunate that the terms of reference of the Headquarters Commission were confined to Westchester and Fairfield counties, but that in view of the position of neutrality which had been taken in London on the entire site question, it had not been possible to intervene to broaden the terms. He said that the Department now felt that the terms of reference should be broadened and that the Delegation should take an active part in giving guidance and help where necessary in the selection of the permanent headquarters.

UNITED STATES ATTITUDE TOWARD SITE SELECTION

Mr. Dulles said that he felt our trouble on the headquarters matter could be traced to our policy of neutrality, that this policy had given the United Nations the feeling that it could take any place in the United States it wanted for the Headquarters. He said this, of course, was not possible because only the United States Government could take property for the use of the United Nations. Mr. Dulles said that this Government must take the responsibility for telling the United Nations where it would fit in best. He felt that it was necessary for the United States to take an active part and tell the Organization when and where we will be willing to exercise the power of eminent domain.

Mr. Fahy agreed with Mr. Dulles and said that was the position we propose be taken. He said that the advisers proposed that the Headquarters Committee of the General Assembly be asked to create a subcommittee, with United States representation, and to make the terms of reference of the subcommittee broad enough so that the United States Delegation, in its assistance to the committee, would not be confined to the Westchester area.

Mr. Ross said he thought it would be useful to have in mind the type of procedure which it was thought advisable for the Delegation to adopt in the Headquarters Committee of the General Assembly on this question. In order to do this he suggested that it may be appropriate to distinguish between the bodies concerned. He referred in this connection to the Headquarters Commission and the Headquarters Committee. The Headquarters Committee was a proposed committee to be composed of representatives of the 51 nations and it was in this committee that the question would be considered in the forthcoming session. The procedure which the advisers have had in mind would avoid a general debate in a plenary session or in the 51 nation committee. He thought that it might be possible to get started on this problem without a long debate and discussion. What the advisers proposed was that as soon as the Headquarters Commission Report was presented to the Headquarters Committee, the Delegation should immediately suggest the creation of a subcommittee composed of representatives from the original member states represented on the Headquarters Commission, plus the United States and two to five additional members. That subcommittee should:

- (a) Study between four and six possible locations.
- (b) Determine which of the possible locations the subcommittee should recommend back to the Headquarters Committee.

Mr. Ross felt that it will probably be necessary, in view of the work which the Headquarters Commission had done, to consider seriously whether or not it was possible to find a site in Westchester. He pointed out that it must also be remembered that New York City was extremely interested in the possibility of locating the United Nations permanently at Flushing Meadows. There was also, he said, the problem of the intensified interest of Governor Warren and other Californians in the possibility of locating the permanent site in the San Francisco area. Mr. Ross said that he believes the delegation must give full consideration to four to six possible sites and that these sites alone should be used as a basis for discussion.

ATTITUDES OF UN MEMBERS TO SITE LOCATION

There was brief discussion of the position of the various countries with respect to the location of the United Nations in Europe or in the United States.⁵³ Reference was made to a circular telegram in which

⁵³ The Department was very much concerned at this time at what was described by Mr. Nelson Rockefeller as "great bitterness in United Nations circles against New York and Federal Government because of our failure to make available necessary office space in accordance with what they claim to be Federal Government's assurances to all delegations three months ago that space would be provided. . . ." (telegram 4992, October 5, from Paris, (501.BB/10-546)). The Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs (Hiss) had already on October 3 written a memorandum on the subject to the Acting Secretary of State (Acheson) in which he referred to "the international implications of failure of this Government to fulfill its commitment, and . . . the extremely critical situation in New York. . . ." (501.AD/10-346)

the Department of State inquired of American missions abroad the reaction of the various countries to this question.⁵⁴

The replies indicated a majority of the members favor location in the United States, although it was not clear that all of those favoring some part of the United States would favor any other section as against a site in Europe.

TOP SECRET

Headquarters Problem

Mr. Ross reported that on the preceding afternoon the Secretary had sent a message expressing his view that in opening the site question consideration should be limited to the Metropolitan New York area and the San Francisco Bay area.

Senator Austin noted that the press had been begging for a position statement by the United States Delegation. He stated that he proposed to give them a statement that would point out the grief involved in removing people from their home. Emphasizing this, he would urge the expansion of the Committee's authority and an enlargement of the Commission's personnel so that examination could be made of other locations around New York. Specifically to be mentioned should be the Flushing and San Francisco sites. He would further advocate that the sites to be considered should be modest in cost. He asked for the Delegation's views on this proposed statement.

Senator Vandenberg inquired whether it was intended to postpone the decision beyond this session of the Assembly.

Mr. Stokes replied that Senator Austin's statement should emphasize the importance of speed.

Mr. Bloom said that he thought the press statement should make clear that sites could be examined within one hundred miles of New York City because in that area were a number of parks which would provide free land.

Senator Austin said he thought it perfectly possible to include these areas and had no intention of doing otherwise.

⁵⁴ Telegram to chiefs of mission accredited to governments of Member States of the United Nations, September 19, 9 a. m., not printed.

Mr. Ross agreed that this was the case and said that there were a number of parks within fifty or one hundred miles of New York which should be examined.

Senator Vandenberg pointed out that in the opening of the proposed statement mention was made only of the New York area.

Senator Austin agreed that it would be desirable to leave out the word "metropolitan", and this was agreed to by the Delegation.

Mr. Dulles stated that he understood the essence of the position was that the United States was going to take an active part in the Headquarters Commission's [Committee's] work and join the Headquarters Commission. Mr. Stokes pointed out that the United States suggestion would be submitted as an amendment under Article [item] 15.

Senator Austin polled the Delegation on supporting the enlargement of the agenda item in the sense of his above statement and it was unanimously agreed that this should be done.⁵⁵

⁵⁵ In a United States Delegation press release (#62) on November 1 Senator Austin announced that the United States Government now planned to "take an active part in assisting the United Nations to reach a final decision on its permanent home at this session of the General Assembly", "in response to what we find to be the desire of other member nations. . . ." With the Report of the Headquarters Commission (United Nations document A/69) in the hands of the Permanent Headquarters Committee on October 31, the U.S. Delegation on November 2 submitted a request to the General Committee that the General Committee recommend to the General Assembly that the item on the agenda of the General Assembly dealing with the selection of a site for the permanent headquarters (item 15) be amended as follows: "Item 15 of the agenda, 'Report of the Headquarters Commission and Appointment of a Planning Commission of Experts (Resolution of 14 February 1946)', is hereby amended to read, 'Report of the Headquarters Commission and consideration of possible alternative sites for permanent headquarters in the New York area and in the San Francisco Bay area which may be available without cost or at reasonable cost; and appointment of a Planning Commission of Experts (Resolution of 14 February 1946)'".

In support of this proposal Senator Austin said in part before the General Committee on November 5, ". . . that, though the United States delegation had formerly believed it should maintain a neutral position on the question, the development of complications and difficulties in the acquisition of a site, and the fact that Congress would probably have to intervene in order to obtain a site, made it impossible for his delegation to stand by as simple observers.

"The report of the Headquarters Commission had been limited to two counties in the State of New York. However, the offer of the City of New York to donate the site used at present for the General Assembly also deserved serious consideration, as did the City of San Francisco's offer of a site, up to three square miles in size in the San Francisco Bay area. Those offers accounted for the phrase 'without cost or at reasonable cost' in the amendment." (GA (I/2), General Committee, p. 84)

For the debate in the General Committee on this U.S. proposal, see ibid., pp. 84-86.

A decision was made on November 7 in a meeting of the executive and political officers of the U.S. delegation that this proposal should be vigorously pushed in the General Assembly plenary debate (10 Files, document US/A/M/8).

The General Assembly adopted the proposal on November 9 with a United Kingdom amendment that widened the area under consideration to include "other parts of the United States of America" besides the New York and San Francisco areas, the United States being in stated opposition to the United Kingdom amendment (GA (I/2), Plenary, pp. 944-952).

Concurrently, the United States (Senator Austin) had on November 7 proposed

854. Report from US representative on committee inspecting alternative sites for permanent headquarters of UN indicates that committee feels Presidio⁵⁶ is best possible site in San Francisco area. Many members of committee feel Presidio is best possible site in US.

Following meeting of committee in San Francisco Sunday morning at which Presidio was fully discussed, the chairman, Zuleta Angel of Colombia, made formal request in name of committee to US representative to ascertain if at all possible before November 30 whether Federal Government is prepared to offer the Presidio. I should greatly appreciate it, therefore, if you would take this matter up with the Secretary of War and the President also if you deem it advisable.

I consider it very important that we make this offer. As you know I have taken a very strong stand in support of keeping the permanent headquarters in the US and of reaching a definitive decision on a specific site at this session of Assembly. In view of our strong position on these points and our policy of active participation in this matter, I feel that the Federal Government should be no less generous than the many American communities and individuals who have made very generous offers of large and valuable tracts of land.

An offer of the Presidio, whether or not the Assembly finally decides to accept it, would also help dispel for once and all the still lingering criticism that the Federal Government has not done all in its power to assist the United Nations in getting settled in the US despite our protestations in favor of keeping the permanent headquarters here. It would also help avert any last move by Russian bloc, in light of Stadnik affair,⁵⁷ for example, to establish headquarters in Europe rather than in US.

in the Headquarters Committee the establishment of a sub-committee which would, first, consider the Report of the Headquarters Commission, and, secondly, after appropriate action by the General Assembly, then proceed to a consideration of alternative sites in the New York and San Francisco Bay areas (United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, Second Part, Permanent Headquarters Committee, p. 107; hereafter cited as GA (I/2), Headquarters Committee). After debate on November 7, 11, 13 and 14 the Committee on November 14 adopted the U.S. resolution as amended by a United Kingdom proposal to include specifically the Boston and Philadelphia areas in the sites to be investigated (GA (I/2), Headquarters Committee, pp. 107-119); for text of the amended resolution, see ibid., pp. 170 and 171, annex 5.

⁵⁶ The Presidio of San Francisco, an United States Government military reservation immediately adjacent to the city of San Francisco, California, and overlooking the entrance to San Francisco harbor (the Golden Gate) and the Pacific Ocean, with an area of about 2½ square miles.

⁵⁷ This refers to the wounding by gun-fire of one of the Ukrainian delegates who happened to be present in a New York City delicatessen store at the time of an armed robbery.

Such an offer would also be consistent with the views expressed by the President and the Secretary [of] State when we discussed this matter in White House as to desirability of making public lands available to UN.

I understand that Charles Fahy has had a study made indicating it would be possible legally to make the Presidio available.⁶⁸

Subject: Permanent Headquarters

SUMMARY OF PRESENT SITUATION

The Subcommittee of the Committee on Headquarters is expected to complete its inspection of sites on Saturday, November 30, and to meet on Monday, December 2, or the following day to consider its recommendations to the full Committee as to the site or sites which it deems best. As far as I have been able to sense the feelings of the Subcommittee, the prevailing opinion in the Subcommittee is as follows:

(1) The best site, considering local conditions only and without reference to distance from Europe, is the Presidio in San Francisco.

(2) The next best site is the Belmont Plateau and nearby lands offered as a gift by the City of Philadelphia and the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

(3) There are attractive sites in the neighborhood of New York, but they are expensive, not immediately adjacent to the City and the local opposition has created serious complications. No one seems to like the Flushing Meadows site which is offered as a gift by New York City.

(4) The sites offered in the neighborhood of Boston are not very suitable for building purposes.

(5) Most of the members of the Subcommittee would rather live in New York or Boston than in Philadelphia, but the beauty and convenience of the site offered in Philadelphia and the generous and clear-cut nature of the offer outweigh this factor.

(6) Our best information is that out of the 54 Member Nations 16 favor San Francisco, 15 favor the East Coast and the remaining 22 either have not decided or do not particularly care and would follow the lead of the United States. Of those favoring the East Coast six would follow our lead in either event. In all probability the site selected will be whichever one the United States favors. If this result is to be achieved, however, it is important that the United States position be made known before a vote is taken in the Subcommittee.

[Here follows a description in some detail of each of the sites examined by the subcommittee with a discussion of the respective merits and draw-backs of each location.⁵⁹]

Memorandum by the Attorney-General (Clark) to President Truman

[WASHINGTON,] November 29, 1946.

You have requested my informal views regarding the proposal to transfer to the United Nations the army reservation known as The Presidio of San Francisco, for use as a permanent headquarters by the United Nations.

The Presidio is located on San Francisco Bay in the City and County of San Francisco, embracing some 1,400 acres. The original reservation was set apart from the public domain by Executive order dated November 6, 1850, and the United States has exclusive jurisdiction over it.

The Constitution provides in Article IV, Section 3, that "the Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States. . . . This provision has been uniformly interpreted as giving the Congress plenary and exclusive power over the disposition of the real property of the United States. 22 Op. A.G. 546: 14 Peters 538.

There is no general statute authorizing the sale or other disposition of army reservations of the character of The Presidio. It has been suggested, however, that sufficient statutory authority in the present situation may be found in the Surplus Property Act of 1944, and that any army post "which has been determined to be surplus to the needs and responsibilities" of the War Department can be disposed of as surplus property. But even if The Presidio, as a matter of law, is subject to disposal under the Surplus Property Act, a question concerning which I have some doubt, the problem still remains of determining whether or not it is in fact surplus. Whether or not such a determination can properly be made is, of course, primarily the responsibility of the Secretary of War. I should assume, however, that additional facilities would have to be established, and appropriated for, to replace The Presidio (which is the site of the Letterman General Hospital) in the event that it is given up by the Army. This would, of course, be a matter to be passed upon ultimately by the Congress.

"The views of certain members of the Sub-Committee are attached as annexes." (Ibid., p. 188)

Without indicating any final view as to the applicability of the Surplus Property Act to the present circumstances, I should like to point out that the entire problem of providing a site for the United Nations will no doubt at some stage have to be considered and implemented by the Congress. If the Congress should not agree with the proposed transfer of The Presidio, it would be within its power to render the transaction largely nugatory, as by imposing conditions upon appropriations made for the benefit of the United Nations. I would suggest, therefore, that the transfer be made contingent upon approval by the Congress. Perhaps it would be possible to obtain the informal consent of congressional leaders, thus enabling you to announce that there was no doubt in your mind that the transfer would promptly be completed by joint action of the Executive and the Congress.

I am taking the liberty of sending a copy of this memorandum to the acting Secretary of State.

Respectfully,

TOM C. CLARK

[WASHINGTON,] December 2, 1946.

Subject: Availability of the Presidio Site as United Nations Headquarters

Participants: Under Secretary Acheson
Senator Austin

At 1:00 p. m. on Saturday, November 30, Mr. Acheson called Senator Austin by telephone and said that he was calling about the above matter which the Senator had raised with Mr. Acheson on Thanksgiving Day.

Mr. Acheson said that the matter had been discussed at the Cabinet meeting and the President had decided that he would do all in his power to make the Presidio available to the United Nations if they should desire to select it for the site of their permanent headquarters. Mr. Acheson went on to point out that there are legal difficulties involved and that these had been discussed at the Cabinet meeting. In order to make the site available by executive action it would have to be declared surplus. The site is probably not surplus as the Army would have to replace it with other quarters. The Attorney General is, therefore, inclined to the view that Congressional approval will be necessary and the President is planning to talk to leaders of Congress about the matter.

Mr. Acheson said that he believed in the light of the President's decision, he is authorized to say that the President will use his best efforts and that the matter will probably require Congressional approval which the President believes will be forthcoming. The President would like to have us reserve the potential rights of Congress in this matter in connection with anything we may say. He, of course, does not wish to do anything he does not have clear authority to do. The President did not decide whether the site should be made available as a gift to the United Nations or by way of sale to the United Nations. He felt that the important immediate question was merely that of making it available to the United Nations. Mr. Acheson said that his own personal preference would be not to be in the position of trying to sell the United Nations anything.⁶⁰

Mr. Acheson went on to say that at the next stage of consideration of this matter by the Assembly, i.e., after the report of the Subcommittee which has inspected various sites, it may be wise for us not to express any preference as between the Presidio and Philadelphia. But this, Mr. Acheson said, is a matter which is up to Senator Austin.

⁶⁰ In a record made of the same telephone conversation at the Delegation headquarters in New York City on the same date the memorandum read at this point: "Mr. Acheson said that they had not reached any very clear-cut decision in the Cabinet yesterday in the matter whether The Presidio should be made available on a gift or sale basis. He said he had argued strongly in favor of an outright gift and he thought the other members of the Cabinet inclined equally to this view." (IO Files, document US/A/Site/7)

⁶¹ At a meeting of United States Delegation on December 3 Senator Austin reported that he had informed the Headquarters Sub-Committee on December 2 of the availability of The Presidio, carefully reserving the powers of the United States Congress in the matter (IO Files, Minutes of the 33rd Meeting of the Delegation, December 3, document US/A/M (Chr.)/31) (the record of Senator Austin's statement to the Sub-Committee is found in the Sub-Committee's report, GA (1/2), Headquarters Committee, p. 174, annex 7).

On the same day (December 2) Senator Austin had made the United States position with respect to The Presidio a matter of public record in a morning press statement (U.S. Delegation Press Release No. 88) followed by an afternoon press statement in clarification of the earlier one (U.S. Delegation Press Release No. 90). In the first press release Senator Austin stated in pertinent part "that I am able to report that the Executive Branch of the Government of the United States would do everything in its power in cooperation with the Congress to make the Presidio available to the United Nations"; he went on to emphasize the constitutional position of the Congress in the matter (IO Files, United States Delegation Press Releases (1946), No. 88). Senator Austin in his second statement emphasized that the purport of the first statement constituted a "commitment and it represents an international act between the United States and the United Nations. . . . I am not going to try to commit the Congress in advance, but it would be a rather surprising situation if the Congress should undertake to repudiate a position taken by the Chief Executive in an international matter of the highest importance as this". Memorandum of Telephone Conversation, by the Acting Secretary of State

Subject: Permanent Site for the United Nations

In connection with a telephone conversation which I had with Senator Austin this morning and which is reported in a separate memorandum,⁶² I telephoned him as follows:

I said that we had talked over in Cabinet meeting the question of what stand he should take on the United Nations headquarters site. The President and the Cabinet agreed that they would like to have him do everything that he could not to take a position between the East and the West, as they believed that it would be very much easier to get Congressional approval of whichever decision is made if we can maintain to the end a position of neutrality. It was also suggested that Senator Austin might make a speech which would point out why we wish our guests to make up their minds, that we think both of these sites are excellent and that we will be happy with either one and will do everything we can to try to carry out the decision. Senator Austin might further say that we think people should not yield in the heat of debate to the temptation to make extreme statements and that everyone should try to get together and go along with whatever decision is voted.

The President said that he did not think the Senator's vote ought in any way to be influenced by the threats of the Russians.

⁶² In a memorandum on the earlier conversation Mr. Acheson reported that Senator Austin "referred to the instructions from the President previously transmitted to him by me that on the question of the headquarters site he should not urge any particular site over another but should follow the trend of the debate and vote with the majority. He said that he was now in a difficult position because as the debate had proceeded [the Permanent Headquarters Committee began its consideration of the Sub-Committee's report on December 4] and the views of the other members of the Committee were expressed it appeared there was no definite trend toward either site and the vote would probably be close to a tie. He would therefore like to know before three o'clock this afternoon what the President wished him to do in this situation, which he pointed out was further complicated by the Russian statement in opposition to San Francisco". (Memorandum of Telephone Conversation, December 6, 501.AD/12-646). The position of the Soviet Union and the Ukrainian SSR on this subject may be traced in the official records of the General Committee, the Permanent Headquarters Committee and the General Assembly. These states seemed to be seriously interested in shifting the temporary and/or permanent headquarters of the Organization to Europe, one or the other having made specific proposals or strong statements to such effect (United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, Second Part, General Committee, p. 84 and United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, Second Part, Plenary Meetings [hereafter referred to as GA (1/2), Plenary], pp. 945 and 946.

The President's advice to Senator Austin was that, if he absolutely had to make a public announcement of his decision, he thought that we should be governed by the attitude of those nations which are most important to the success of the United Nations. He thought that if these nations were taken reluctantly and grudgingly to a site which they did not favor, the result would be unhappy. The President thought that this method of arriving at a decision would probably lead to Philadelphia, as he thought that city was the one favored by the most important countries.

Senator Austin agreed that if he followed this method Philadelphia would be the site he must favor. He said that France was the only one of the European countries which favored San Francisco. China and practically all the Latin American countries and the countries of the Pacific are in favor of San Francisco. New Zealand is an exception to this last statement. Their view in favor of Philadelphia is based on their belief that there is a moral obligation to stay on the East Coast, which the United States [Nations?] assumed when the decision to have the headquarters in the United States was made.

Senator Austin expressed himself as quite certain that he could not put off any longer the announcement of his decision for one site or the other. He said that if he made the announcement he intended to justify his position by a strong statement of the reasons why he was doing so.⁶³

⁶³ For Senator Austin's statement to the Permanent Headquarters Committee on December 6, favoring an East Coast site, see GA(1/2), Headquarters Committee, pp. 135-137. In part it said:

"In view of the pressure brought from all quarters, including other delegations and some officials of the United Nations . . . the time had come when a statement of the United States' position could no longer be postponed. Such a statement was particularly needed on account of the incorrect impression which had become current after the United States declaration that the highly valuable Presidio site could be made available if it was desired as the headquarters of the Organization.

"The representative of the United States of America wished to announce that this Government was not in favour of placing the headquarters on the Pacific coast; it was in favour of situating it on or near the country's Atlantic seaboard . . . that selection . . . had been made solely on the basis of the best interests of the United Nations. His Government had come to the conclusion that the headquarters of the Organization should not be far removed from Europe, which would be the centre of most of the activities of the Organization. In addition, the capital of the United Nations should be easily accessible from the capitals of most of the Member States. He hoped that the Secretary-General would explain to the Committee how the selection of a west coast site would involve additional burdens of transportation and communication. . . . the United States would accept the decision of the majority without rancour." (GA(1/2), Headquarters Committee, pp. 136 and 137)

For the continuing debate on the Report of the Sub-Committee on December 9, see ibid., pp. 141-148. For a resolution offered on that date by the United States that "consideration of the question of which particular site in the United States shall be the permanent headquarters of the United Nations be postponed to the next annual session of the General Assembly. . . .", see ibid., p. 206, annex 8.

[WASHINGTON,] December 10, 1946.

BASIC POINTS OF MEMORANDUM TO DR. ZULETA ANGEL FROM JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, JR.

This memorandum sets forth the terms and conditions of the offer made by me in my letter of December 10.

I have acquired a firm offer from Webb & Knapp to sell to the United Nations within thirty days after December 10, 1946, at $8,500,000 the following property:

Between 1st Avenue and Franklin D. Roosevelt Drive:

- (1) the western portion of the block between 42nd and 43rd Streets
- (2) the four blocks between 47th and 43rd Streets
- (3) two small portions in the block between 47th and 48th Streets.

In addition, the representatives of the City of New York have assured me of their desire and willingness of the City to acquire and give to the United Nations the balance of the block between 47th and 48th Streets.

To make possible the acquisition of this property by the United Nations, should they decide to accept said offer, and to make it the site of the headquarters of the United Nations, I hereby offer to give to the United Nations $8,500,000 on the following conditions:

(a) that the gift shall be made at the time of the closing of the purchase of said property.

(b) that the City of New York should agree to give to the United Nations 43rd, 44th, 45th, 46th and 47th Streets between First Avenue and Franklin D. Roosevelt Drive upon terms which shall permit the United Nations to close any or all of these blocks to all passage and otherwise to use them for its own purposes without restrictions or limitations.

(c) that the City of New York shall agree to acquire and give absolutely to the United Nations the balance of the block bounded by First Avenue, 47th and 48th Streets, and Franklin D. Roosevelt Drive not covered by the firm offer of Webb and Knapp.

(d) that the City of New York give to the United Nations all rights to bulkheads and piers along the river frontage of the East River between 42nd and 48th Streets.

(e) that each of the said agreements of the City of New York shall have been concluded in a form satisfactory to the parties in interest at or prior to the time of the making of my said gift.

(f) to make a satisfactory assurance to my attorney that the said gift will be free of all taxes of the United States and the City of New York or any other tax authority having jurisdiction with respect thereto.⁶⁴

EXEMPTION OF U.S. CITIZENS FROM NATIONAL SERVICE OBLIGATIONS UNDER THE CONVENTION ON PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES OF THE UNITED NATIONS

THE PROBLEM

Section 18(c) of the proposed Convention on Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations provides:

When the Convention was approved and opened for ratification by the General Assembly on February 13, 1946, the United States Delegation reserved its position on this point in so far as it applies to United States nationals on the ground that the question is properly for Congressional determination.⁶⁶ (31st Plenary Meeting, General Assembly Journal No. 31, February 14, 1946, p. 574). In the eleventh meeting of Committee 6 on February 7, 1946, the Ukrainian delegate made the same reservation and called attention to similar reservations by the U.S.S.R. and Byelorussia in the subcommittee which drafted the Convention.

It is anticipated that the Convention will shortly be submitted to the Congress for approval prior to ratification. In the letter of transmittal,⁶⁷ the Department of State takes no position as to whether the reservation should be made definitive, but calls attention to the preliminary reservation referred to above, and states that the Department will express its views on the subject if requested to do so.

The United Kingdom, which was the strongest advocate of exemption from military service, is the only state officially known to have ratified the Convention. This action is understood to have been without reservation.

RECOMMENDATION

1. If called upon to state its position, the Department should oppose the exemption of U.S. nationals from military service, and should favor a reservation as to Section 18(c).

2. At the same time, it would be appropriate if the Department representative were to point out that the opposite point of view which is apparently shared by the great majority of the United Nations, is thus left without a spokesman unless he himself should state the argument, or unless the Committee should request the attendance for this purpose of a representative of the United Nations. If asked to present the argument, he might appropriately place in the record the statement made in support of the proposition at the Plenary Meeting when the matter was discussed. (Statement attached hereto as annex.⁶⁸)

DISCUSSION

The principal argument in support of the exemption from national service obligations is that the existence of such obligations with respect to employees of the Organization is incompatible with the idea of a truly international civil service. (See annexed statement.)

SPA is inclined to feel on the other hand that the question of principle does not really arise in this way. The United Nations does not have the type of international status on which this point of view would have to be predicated. Taking this into account, we do not feel that the needs of the United Nations in this respect are such as to outweigh the responsibilities of citizens to perform military service, which is, in an important respect, the highest and most far-reaching obligation in citizenship.

Since small numbers of men would be involved in any case, we do not feel that the decision should be influenced by considerations of hardship either to the United Nations or to the national defense requirements of this Government.

Mr. Stettinius called the meeting to order at 11:01 a. m. The Chairman stressed the importance of the Delegation's task of bringing the United Nations into operation and expressed the joint determination to do the job quickly and well. He recalled that at the close of the San Francisco Conference a Preparatory Commission had been established as an interim organization pending the coming into force of the Charter. Following a single meeting of the Preparatory Commission at San Francisco, it had adjourned leaving the task in the hands of a fourteen-member Executive Committee which met in London. The Executive Committee had completed its work on November 12, 1945. The Preparatory Commission met on November 23 and in a five-week session had approved most of the recommendations of the Executive Committee.²

The Chairman pointed out that under the recommendations of the Executive Committee and the Preparatory Commission the first part of the first session of the General Assembly was to be a constituent meeting. It was proposed by the Preparatory Commission that there should be a second part of the first session for substantive problems. The Chairman expressed the hope that the second session would be able to open on April 25 at the new site of the Organization.

In answer to a question from Mr. Dulles as to what compelling force there was to restrict the first session to procedural matters, Mr. Hiss pointed to the resolution of the Executive Committee (PC/EX/113/Rev.1, p. 17), which resolution had been adopted by the Preparatory Commission, recommending that the first part should be primarily organizational but would also include consideration of such other world problems as might be raised by any member. The Chairman interposed that it had been emphasized in London that any member could bring up any subject before the Assembly and asserted that the Delegation must go to London expecting to have raised such questions as Iran, Syria, Lebanon, relief, and transportation. Mr. Dulles pointed out that under the rules of procedure any member could have any subject placed on the agenda six days before the General Assembly convenes. Mr. Hiss pointed out that the Preparatory Commission had added the refugee question to the list of questions to be discussed. In answer to a question from Mr. Bloom, Mr. Hiss stated that it was the evident intention to discuss the whole problem of displaced persons under the heading of refugees. Mr. Bloom inquired whether it was not possible under the rules of procedure for the presiding officer to recognize any member on any subject. Mr. Hiss thought this was not the correct interpretation and that the rule referred to meant that any member could speak on any item on the agenda. He pointed out the rule under which an item could be added to the agenda by a majority vote of members present and voting.

Mr. Stettinius reported that he had received a wire from the Secretary of State early in the morning confirming Mr. Byrnes' intention of flying to London, where he would meet with the Delegation. Mr. Hiss expressed the hope that the meeting of the General Assembly would not be a long, drawn-out affair. The British were very hard-pressed for space and were likewise hoping that the meeting would not be a long one. The Chairman expressed his personal hope that the meeting could be concluded in three weeks.

Mr. Stettinius regretted that Mr. Pasvolsky's illness prevented him from speaking and expressed the hope that the Delegation would hear from Mr. Pasvolsky a full review of the history of the United Nations Organization to the present date.

Mr. Stettinius then called on Mr. Hiss to give an explanation of the agenda of the General Assembly. Mr. Hiss explained the provisional agenda for the first part of the first session of the General Assembly as set forth in the Executive Committee Report, pointing out such minor changes as had been made by the Preparatory Commission.³

Regarding the election of the President⁴ of the General Assembly, Mr. Hiss stated that the Department felt that the members would want a European President since the site of the Organization was to be in the United States. Accordingly, the United States had not taken a strong position on the matter. The United States favored as President Mr. Lie⁵ of Norway because he was personally a very fine man with a good command of both French and English, and Norway was a fighting United Nation which probably would not be elected a member of the Security Council. Mr. Hiss reported that there had recently been a strong feeling in London for Mr. Evatt⁶ as President. Latin American members had been reported to be particularly favorably inclined toward him. The view of the Department had been that Mr. Evatt would be a good candidate and that his candidacy should not be opposed. Senator Vandenberg stated that Dr. Evatt should be elected President because for the world he was the spokesman of the small powers, and Senator Vandenberg thought it was important that Mr. Evatt be elected as an indication that the small powers were receiving full recognition.

In answer to a question from Senator Connally regarding the membership of Australia on the Security Council, Mr. Hiss stated that the Department felt that Australia should not be on the Security Council but that Canada should be a member, especially because of its position on the Atomic Energy Commission, and that there should be only one member from the British Commonwealth on the Security Council.

Mr. Hiss explained that the Department still felt that it was only proper that the Organization should want a European since it was to be located in the United States and that, therefore, the Department should not take a strong stand for the candidacy of Mr. Evatt, lest it appear to rub in the non-European character of the Organization. Mr. Dulles questioned whether the choice should be made on the basis of European nationality or whether it might not be better to state simply that the President should be someone other than from one of the Americas. Mr. Stettinius reported to the Delegates that the United States had taken the position in London that it was expected that the President would be a European. Mr. Bloom questioned whether the President was being elected simply for the first part of the first session of the Assembly or whether he was also to preside over the second session. Mr. Hiss said that it was the understanding of the United States that the President elected was to serve for both parts of the first session of the General Assembly. Mr. Stettinius stated the firm conviction that it was better to have a set of officers in both parts of the first session. Mrs. Roosevelt expressed agreement, and stated that she thought it better that the officers should serve for both parts.

Regarding the adoption of the provisional rules of procedure and the supplementary rules of procedure,⁷ Mr. Hiss pointed out that the rules were entirely provisional and that it was expected that permanent rules would be drawn up for the two parts of the first session. Mr. Hiss referred to a suggestion from Mr. Bloom that there should be a select committee of parliamentary experts to advise the Secretary General. This committee could undertake the task of working out an effective compromise between the parliamentary procedures of such states as the United Kingdom, France, and the United States.

Regarding the election of Vice President, Mr. Hiss stated that the United States regarded the important elective posts in the United Nations Organization to be the President of the Assembly, the Secretary General, the members of the Security Council, the Social and Economic Council, and the Trusteeship Council. The seven Vice Presidencies offered additional negotiating positions. The United States did not as yet have any slate to recommend on the Vice Presidents, and the matter could be worked out in London.

Mr. Bloom asked to return to the election of the Presiding Officer, and emphasized that he thought it was important that it should be made clear whether the President was to serve for one or two parts of the meeting because of the possibility of a precedent being established for future meetings. Mr. Stettinius remarked that the whole spirit of the negotiations in London had been that the President should serve for both parts of the session.

Regarding the election of the non-permanent members of the Security Council, Mr. Hiss stated that the Department's position was that there should be elected to the six available seats one Western European member, one British Commonwealth member, two Latin American members, one from the Near East and Africa, and one from Eastern Europe. Mr. Hiss continued that the preliminary negotiations on the slate had already been taken up in London and the United States position on the composition of the slates had been explained to certain states. It had been made very plain in London, and Mr. Hiss wished to emphasize the point, that the United States has drawn up slates which the Department thought on balance would be reasonable, but that for the most part the slates were not to be taken as inviolable and immutable. Since the Charter emphasized equitable geographic distribution of council membership, the Department had thought the states in the various areas should be consulted concerning their wishes and it was the general intention of the United States to support only a state which was supported by its neighbors. For instance, Egypt would be supported for the Security Council in the event that it was supported by the Arab League. In the event that the Arab League supported another Near Eastern power, the Department would have to reconsider its position. The United States needed to keep freedom of choice to be sure in the future that some entirely objectionable state was not put forward as a candidate which we would be committed to support under the geographical formula.

The United States slate for the Security Council consisted of Brazil for a two-year term, Mexico for a one-year term, Canada for a two-year term, the Netherlands for a two-year term, Poland for a one-year term, and Egypt for a two-year term.

Regarding the possibility of the admission of new members⁸ to the United Nations, Mr. Hiss stated that he doubted that any recommendations would be made on this question. The United States had taken the position that it was preferable to take up this question during the second part of the Assembly and there seemed to be no disposition to disagree strongly with this view. The United Kingdom had not continued to press the candidacy of Sweden. In this connection, Mr. Stettinius stated the United States had indicated a preference to admit the five or six nations if any members were to be admitted during the first meeting. Mr. Hiss indicated that Portugal has put forward a desire to join the United Nations; there was also the possibility of Iceland.

Regarding the election of the Secretary General, Mr. Hiss stated that the United States position had been that he should not be a national of one of the Big Five powers in order to avoid the appearance of Big Five domination. The United States had also assumed that since the site was to be in the United States the members would want a European. The Department had informally indicated that Mr. Spaak⁹ of Belgium would be a good choice, but it was possible that he would not be available since he was of Cabinet rank, a possible Prime Minister in Belgium, and would, as Secretary General, have to step out of politics for five years. Mr. Hiss stated that the Department had made it known that the United States would be delighted if Mr. Pearson¹⁰ of Canada were elected as Secretary General, but it was expected that his candidacy would be hampered by the desire to have a non-American as Secretary General. Mr. Dulles inquired whether it was proper that the Secretary General should be chosen on a national basis since the Secretariat was to be of an international character. Mr. Hiss explained the Department's position had been that other things being equal it would be advisable to have a man from outside the Americas. Mrs. Roosevelt inquired what considerations had led to the support of Mr. Spaak. Mr. Hiss replied that perhaps the main consideration had been that Mr. Spaak was well-known and highly-regarded throughout Europe. He had been a leader in the Belgian Government-in-Exile, he was politically strong at home, he had excellent qualities of leadership, and was a man of high integrity. His chief short-coming was that he did not speak English. Mr. Bloom questioned whether a five-year term was too long in case the Secretary General was unsatisfactory and therefore could only be removed with great difficulty. Mr. Hiss pointed out that the question had been debated at great length, that some states had wanted an indefinite tenure, and others had wanted a tenure of ten years. It had been felt that in order to secure the best man it would be necessary to offer the Secretary General a five-year term. Mr. Stettinius reported that he had conducted the negotiations on this question in London during three or four long and difficult weeks which had included many discussions in his own rooms. After delicate negotiations, the Russians and French had been brought to agree to a five-year term of office. This was subject to the condition that the Secretary General could be invited to resign if he proved completely unsatisfactory.

Regarding the election of members of the Economic and Social Council, Mr. Hiss pointed out that the eighteen members to be elected would have to be assigned terms of one, two, or three years in order to establish the annual elections for three-year terms in the future. The United States position assumed that the Big Five would be automatically members. However, in order that the situation should not arise in which three years after the first election all five members came up for reelection, allowing the election of only one other member at that time, it had been agreed that the five powers should be assigned varying terms of office in alphabetical order. Thus, the first three-year terms of the Big Five would go to China and France. The United Kingdom and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics would be elected for two-year terms and the United States for a one-year term.

Regarding the rest of the slate, Mr. Hiss emphasized that it was very tentative, still subject to considerable negotiation. The United States position was that Denmark might be elected as a European member, Iraq from the Near East, and Greece from Eastern Europe, all for three years. There should be four posts for Latin American states. The Department was still waiting to hear what candidates the Latin American states had agreed upon. At the last report, Peru, Chile, and Colombia were generally agreed to and the fourth post seemed likely to be offered to Cuba or Uruguay. The Latin American states were to hold a meeting on January 3, after which news might be available. The United States slate, based on a geographical distribution, had included Colombia, Mexico, Uruguay, and Peru. Now it appeared that Mexico would not be a candidate since it preferred to be a candidate for the Security Council. Mr. Hiss said that the whole question would have to be negotiated again in London. The United States slate proposed two-years terms for the Ukraine, Canada, and Belgium, and one-year terms for Australia, Czechoslovakia, and Turkey.

Mr. Hiss pointed out that the Delegation would be particularly interested in the General Assembly committee report which would be made upon the provisional budgetary, financial, and organizational needs for assessing and collecting contributions from members. Mr. Hiss pointed out that the Preparatory Commission had proposed in addition to the Executive Committee report the setting up of an advisory group of experts for the Administrative and Budgetary Committee of the General Assembly. Generally speaking, the budgetary arrangements were to be left as fluid as possible until the second session of the General Assembly to allow for full study. It has been recommended that a capital fund be established to carry the expenses of the first year's operations. Contributions to this were to be made on the basis of the Food and Agriculture Organization contribution quota under which the United States could pay a maximum of twenty-five percent of the total contributions. Mr. Hiss pointed out that some states wished the United States to pay a larger proportion but some states wished the United States to pay a smaller portion in order to avoid the appearance of dominating the Organization.¹¹ Mr. Sandifer pointed out that it should be clear that the Food and Agriculture Organization basis should apply only to the capital fund; that it was not to be a continuing arrangement. It was pointed out that if any money were left in the capital fund after the first year of operations, that money would probably be used for a building fund. Senator Connally expressed the opinion that unless the United States took a strong position, the United States would be cheated and would be saddled with the entire cost. Mrs. Roosevelt stated that she understood the United Kingdom was paying for the forthcoming meeting, the expenses to be offset in the final accounting. She inquired whether the same held for the expenses of the United States in connection with the ¹¹ For documentation on this subject, see pp. 461 ff.

United Nations Organization. It was pointed out that the United Kingdom payment was to be offset against the general contributions, not against the United Kingdom contribution to the capital fund.

Mr. Hiss pointed out regarding the League of Nations dissolution, that the Preparatory Commission had made somewhat different recommendations from those of the Executive Committee. The non-political functions of the League, such as opium control, health and transport, were to be taken over by the United Nations on a provisional basis. All the buildings of the League of Nations were to be turned over to the United Nations and would probably be used for various groups and commissions. It was pointed out that there was also talk of having regional offices of the Economic and Social Council located at Geneva. The Chairman went on to state that the Russians felt very definitely that the United Nations should not move to Geneva as a temporary site and he thought it very important that there not be any mention of such a possibility. He thought that the Organization should move straight away to the United States to its new site as soon as the meeting adjourned. Mrs. Roosevelt agreed that this was highly desirable.

Regarding the organization of the Secretariat, the United States position was that the Secretary General should be allowed as much discretion as possible, that the General Assembly should merely lay down provisional guides and rules for the organization of the Secretariat, and definite rules should be adopted at the second session upon the recommendations of the Secretary General. Mr. Hiss stated that Mr. Bloom had previously made known to him his very strong feeling that the Secretary General should have complete freedom to choose the Under Secretary General and the Assistant Secretaries General, and Mr. Hiss stated that this was the clear intention of the recommendations. Although the General Assembly would have to approve the Secretariat officers, the Secretary General would have a free hand in choosing them. Mrs. Roosevelt stated that she thought that the Secretariat was an extremely important part of the Organization and it seemed to her that there was a point to be watched very carefully in its organization, more especially with regard to those nations with long and old governmental procedures. She thought it very important that there should be a combination of age groups which would utilize the experience of older men but which might also bring in younger men. She thought that there might be a tendency to unload older personnel from various Foreign Offices who were not wanted by their home governments and who could be sent off to the United Nations as a sort of pension. Mrs. Roosevelt said that she had been pleased to notice the Executive Committee recommendation that there should be a suitable range of ages, but thought it was a point which could be easily overlooked, and should be kept in mind by those who are discussing organizational matters. Mr. Stettinius agreed that that was a very important point.

In discussing the report of the General Assembly Committee relating to trusteeship, Mr. Hiss pointed out that the Mandates Commission of the League of Nations would expire with that body. However, in answer to a question of Mr. Bloom Mr. Hiss emphasized that the limitations upon the authority of the mandatories did not end until Trusteeship agreements had been concluded. Mr. Hiss pointed out that the mandatory powers had agreed in the Charter that mandated territories were appropriate for trusteeship.¹² Mr. Hiss believed that probably the General Assembly would recommend that agreements to place the mandated territories under trusteeship be negotiated before the second part of the General Assembly convened. Mr. Bloom pointed out that some machinery was necessary to carry on certain functions of the Mandates Commission and that there would have to be action on this on the part of the General Assembly. Mr. Bloom emphasized his feeling that this must be done because if the Mandate Commission ended and there were no one to handle mandated territories a very bad situation would result.

Mr. Hiss reported, regarding the site of the headquarters, that the United States position was that the question of preferences [privileges] and immunities and status to be accorded the permanent site was a question which should be dealt with in the second part of the first session, because negotiations on those questions would have to be carried out with the appropriate American federal, state, and local authorities.¹³ Mr. Hiss reported that the general feeling seemed to be that the Organization should be free from taxation on its land and should receive inviolability for its land and buildings. However, public services should be handled by contract and highway police, et cetera, supplied by the state. He reported that some members of Congress had recommended that there be established an international enclave for the permanent headquarters. Senator Connally interjected that the United States could not do this because it would be unconstitutional.

Mr. Stettinius stated that there would be distributed to the members of the Delegation a protest from Mayor Lapham. (Doc, USGA/Ia/4)¹⁴ He stated that he expected Australia and China to be active in reopening discussion on the motion that the headquarters must be in the Eastern United States. Mr. Bloom stated that he thought it was unfair that one-half of the United States should be foreclosed from consideration and he felt that San Francisco should not be cut off. Mr. Stettinius said that he was sure that the question would be reopened, pointing out that when the vote was taken there were eleven members absent, and ten abstained from voting. Mr. Stettinius pointed out that it was important that a site should be chosen which would offer office and hotel facilities for several hundred people who would have to get right to work after the first session adjourned.

Regarding the nomination of judges for the Court of Justice, Mr. Hiss reported that the United States has not attempted a selection among the nominees since nominations do not close until January 10.

It was agreed that the Delegation should not schedule further formal meetings for the moment but should meet informally each morning at 11 a. m. with Mr. Hiss and Mr. Pasvolsky to discuss such questions as the Delegates might have.

Senator Connally presided in the absence of Mr. Stettinius.

Mr. Pasvolsky explained the background of some of the decisions upon which the Charter is based; he outlined some of the more controversial questions in the discussions at the drafting stage and indicated the reasoning behind the decisions on those questions. He referred the meeting to the Chart in the front of Book I¹⁵ as a basis for his discussion.

Mr. Pasvolsky stated that the main structure of UNO was developed and agreed upon after reconciliation of differences in viewpoint. There was the basic question of whether an international organization should be responsible only for peace and security or should in addition deal with other problems including social and economic questions. The United States position had always been that the Organization should handle economic and social problems as well as security questions with a close inter-relationship among the parts of the Organization. This position was based upon the conviction that economic and social cooperation is an essential element of maintaining peace and that, at the same time, peace and security are essential bases for developing economic and social cooperation.

At Dumbarton Oaks¹⁶ there was a great deal of discussion over whether there should be one or two organizations. Whereas the United States and the British preferred a single entity, the Soviet Union wanted two organizations. The Soviet Union took the position that economic and social questions were so important that they should be dealt with separately; they felt that the League of Nations tried to cover too much ground which was one of the reasons for its failure especially as to peace and security. However, the Soviet Delegation ultimately became persuaded of the soundness of our position.

Another basic issue discussed in the early stages of the Charter drafting period was that of the role of the General Assembly as compared with the Security Council. The League of Nations Assembly and its Council (with a limited membership which increased from 9 to 15), exercised similar functions and had similar powers. Those responsible for the development of the United States position in the early stages of the Charter discussions, felt that the League arrangement resulted in "everybody's business being nobody's business"; the League Council, they felt, did cover too much ground. Hence, the Security Council should be limited strictly to security issues, whereas the General Assembly could deal with a range of other and related questions including political stability, and economic and social welfare which bear upon conditions of stability among nations. This conception proved to have a general appeal and since it provided a principal organ with functions limited to security, it assisted the Russians in accepting the United States concept of an organization that would include also other functions for which other organs would be responsible.

Another early question was whether or not the Economic and Social Council should have a restricted membership and autonomous powers outside of the General Assembly, in a manner analogous to the Security Council. It was decided that the Economic and Social Council should have less freedom and independence and should, in fact, operate under the authority of the General Assembly. There were several reasons: (a) Individual nations were ready to go less far in granting authority to an international organization in the economic and social field than in the security field. (b) The General Assembly with its full membership of the United Nations was the appropriate organ to serve as a coordinator in the expanding field of specialized agencies which themselves were expected to be composed of most or all of the members of the General Assembly.

Still another issue was that of the Court's status. The British thought that in view of the United States attitude toward an International Court after World War I, the United States would accept a Court more readily if it were separated from the UNO.¹⁷ There was also a general desire to use the Statute of the old Court under which considerable experience had been gained. General agreement to make the Court a principal organ of the UNO was achieved by giving the Court more freedom for its own internal management than was the case with other organs, yet creating it through the Charter.

Fundamental to the nature of the Organization itself was the question of whether there should be an over-all world organization as the basic structure, or whether, as the British thought at that time, there should be a series of regional organizations capped by a loose world structure at the top. Mr. Churchill and his advisers in the early stages of the discussions preferred the latter alternative. The United States never agreed with that position and felt that while there clearly were functions for regional organizations they should be built within the framework of a world structure, the viewpoint which ultimately prevailed.

Perhaps the most widely known controversy has been that over the voting provisions, and the so-called "veto power".¹⁸ Mr. Pasvolsky recalled that the Security Council possesses all the powers of the League Council and substantially more. He observed that the League of Nations itself operated on the rule of unanimity on substantive questions, with one or two exceptions. Early in the considerations of the Charter, its framers raised the question of whether the time had come for a step forward—away from the rule of unanimity and toward the majority rule principle. The majority system was clearly indicated for the General Assembly, its powers being limited to recommending. However, the Security Council while operating in a limited field was to have substantial power to act. Could for instance the United States be asked to use its troops against its own desires (though obviously not against itself)? In the light of that type of question, the United States was clearly as much interested in the veto power as was the Soviet Union. (Our controversy with the Soviet Union over the question of whether a country itself involved in a controversy should have the right to vote, was a separate question.)

Whereas, under the unanimity rule of the League all Council members had the veto power, it was agreed that in the Security Council a decision could be made by seven of eleven members, which would bind the whole organization in certain cases, requiring, however, the concurrence of the five permanent members. The principal point of consideration was actually less the veto than the fact that decisions of the Council were binding upon the whole membership of the Organization.

¹⁸ For documentation on this subject, see pp. 251 ff.

Mr. Pasvolsky observed that in Mr. Evatt's criticisms of the veto power, Mr. Evatt was consciously playing the part of the gadfly in impressing upon world opinion and upon the Great Powers themselves the responsibility of the Great Powers in the use of the veto. Mr. Evatt fully recognizes that if the veto were abolished the powers of the Security Council necessarily would have to be curtailed.

Another of the basic issues which arose early in the discussions was that of whether there should be an international police force or whether member nations should provide contingents from their own forces. The military advisers at Dumbarton Oaks considered this question at great length, the U.S.S.R. being the principal proponent of the international force. However, the military advisers ultimately indicated that the practical difficulties were insuperable. In response to a question by Mr. Lewis Lorwin, of the Department of Commerce, Mr. Pasvolsky indicated that some of those difficulties included the probability that such a force would have to be supported from some kind of international tax base, international territory would have to be maintained to house, train, and deploy such forces and perhaps world establishments would have to be operated to manufacture arms and equipment. Senator Connally added that he had combatted the idea from the beginning and observed that frictions would have been created wherever such forces were stationed just as frictions had been created during the war by stationing of "foreign troops" in various lands.

Mrs. Roosevelt observed, and Mr. Pasvolsky agreed, that under the arrangements contemplated in the Charter it would be practical for the Security Council to use those forces closest to the seat of trouble. It was observed that this would, of course, be up to the Security Council which can ask some or all of the forces under its control to participate in a given action.

Mr. Pasvolsky also observed that a subsidiary question concerning armed forces was whether there should be commitments by the various nations for limited or unlimited contingents. The United States students of the problem felt certain the contingents would have to be limited and that there would be a substantial advantage in the Security Council's knowing exactly what forces it had available.¹⁹

¹⁹ For documentation regarding this subject, see pp. 712 ff.

Mrs. Roosevelt raised the question of the relationship of the proposed Rio Treaty, announced in today's news reports, to the Charter. Mr. Pasvolksy observed that the basic concept of the proposed Inter-American Treaty had its origins in the Resolution of Habana, 1940, and in the Act of Chapultepec.²⁰ An attack by any state against any American nation will be considered an attack against all, and all parties have an obligation to take some action, and all are obligated to consult although they may or may not act.

The question was raised as to whether an attack, and a threat of attack, are to be considered as subject to the same type of action. Mr. Dulles observed that this question had required a month to settle in San Francisco and had given rise to the famous self-defense article of the Charter (Article 51) which provides that "Nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security.", et cetera. This Article does not, however, permit any nation or group of nations to act in case of a threat or to intervene to prevent a threat of attack until authorized to do so by the Security Council.

Under the proposed Rio Treaty, American nations may act to repel an attack until the Security Council itself takes action, Mr. Pasvolksy explained. In the case of threats to the peace in the Western Hemisphere, the American nations must consult but enforcement action must be authorized by the Security Council. The character and extent of aid in the case of attack is within the discretion of each party. Two-thirds of the American nations must agree to measures to be taken for collective action and those who so vote are obligated to assist. All are obligated to consult in case of attack.

General Kenney raised the question whether under the proposed Rio Treaty, the United States could step in without Security Council consent if, for example, Paraguay were to attack Bolivia. Mr. Pasvolksy pointed out that the United States could do so and that the Security Council could then consider whether it approved the action. Even if all other members of the Security Council decided that they did not approve the United States could, of course, veto disapproval. How-

(pt. 2) 1681; the Resolution of Habana was Article XIV of the Final Act and Convention signed on July 30, 1940 at Habana at the completion of the Second Meeting of the Ministers of Foreign Affairs of the American Republics, held July 21-30, 1940. ever, such an action obviously would put the United States in a very awkward position.

Mr. Pasvolsky emphasized that the proposed Rio Treaty could not modify the rights of the Security Council to act under the Charter or the rights of individual or collective self-defense. He pointed out, however, that if the Security Council should state that it expected to handle a given problem a regional group such as the Inter-American system could not continue its activities independently.

It was also pointed out that the Security Council must be kept informed of steps contemplated by a regional group such as the Inter-American system.

Mrs. Roosevelt observed that presumably the Security Council would know of trouble and potential aggression brewing in any part of the world and would act to head off possible attack. In this connection, she pointed out that she felt that the prevention of the causes of war was a number-one responsibility of the Organization and said that she wondered whether it was generally recognized that the Economic and Social Council therefore has almost as heavy a responsibility in the security field as the Security Council itself. Mr. Pasvolsky pointed out that not only did such responsibility rest with the Economic and Social Council but also with its parent body, the General Assembly. He observed that there are a variety of causes of war—political as well as economic and social. The Economic and Social Council, the General Assembly, and the Secretary General, he said, all should keep the Security Council informed concerning threats to the peace. He pointed out that the power of the Secretary General in this connection is a great advance over the League of Nations in this respect. Mrs. Roosevelt added her observation that one of the great weaknesses of the League was that it could not tackle causes of war.

Senator Connally observed that in his opinion the proposed Rio Treaty should have a strong deterrent effect upon possible aggression by the American nations. He said clearly that the existence of the treaty arrangements could not prove hurtful and might very well be helpful. Mr. Pasvolsky agreed and observed that it imposed an implicit obligation on all countries in the Americas.

Mr. Pasvolsky also outlined briefly the basis of the Charter provisions concerning dependent areas. He pointed out that there are three different types of dependent areas: (a) mandates taken over from enemies of the Allied Powers in World War I; (b) territories to be detached from the enemies of the United Nations in World War II; (c) colonial areas which might voluntarily be placed under trusteeship by the parent countries.

He said there had existed, and he felt there continued to exist, two extreme views on how to handle dependent areas in the United Nations framework. One view held that an international system was not feasible and that a colonial system under independent parent powers was the answer. The opposite extreme was the view that no single nation should take responsibility for any dependent area and that all dependent areas should be held internationally.

Between these extremes lay the idea behind the Charter—a system of international trusteeship for some territories.

In San Francisco it had been agreed that for each territory placed under trusteeship an agreement would have to be negotiated among the “states directly concerned”. The agreements would have to be submitted for approval to the United Nations and the terms thereafter could be modified only by the parties to the agreements. The General Assembly was to be responsible for approving agreements covering non-strategic territories and the Security Council for territories deemed to be strategic.

Chapter XI of the Charter setting forth the declaration of principles regarding non-self-governing territories was, he said, a gesture in the direction of colonial areas in general. While Chapter XI does not carry supervision by the United Nations over colonial areas, it is a self-imposed obligation on colonial powers to live up to the standards set in the declaration and to report upon colonial administration to the Organization.

Mrs. Roosevelt asked what action could be taken by the Organization if the report of a colonial power was not satisfactory. It was observed that the real sanction in such case was public opinion and that there could be discussion in the General Assembly and even a resolution of censure.

The question was raised as to which powers are the “states directly concerned”. Mr. Pasvolsky said that so far as the mandated territories were concerned the Treaty of Versailles was the basis for the United States position that the “states directly concerned” were the Allied and Associated Powers of World War I—the United States, France, Great Britain, Italy, and Japan. The two latter states had, of course, eliminated themselves as enemy states of the United Nations in World War II. It is for the Allied and Associated Powers of World War I (without Italy and Japan) to decide what other states are “directly concerned”. If another state is the mandatory it is a “state directly concerned”. The addition of still others is a subject for negotiation. For territories detached from enemy states in World War II the question of which powers are “states directly concerned” must be settled by peace treaties to be drafted, under the procedure outlined in the recent Moscow communiqué. So far as colonies are concerned, Mr. Pasvolsky said that parent powers would simply prepare an agreement with the proposed trustee which might in any instance be the parent power itself.

Mr. Fortas observed that in certain instances there might be a stronger sanction than public opinion for violations of Chapter XI. He said that perhaps Article 14 of the Charter could be invoked, thus permitting the General Assembly to recommend measures "for the peaceful adjustment of a situation, regardless of origin, which it deems likely to impair the general welfare or friendly relations among nations, . . ."

*Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. Adlai E. Stevenson*²¹

[LONDON,] January 4, 1946.

Ambassador Taquizadeh, Iranian Ambassador to the U.K. and Chairman of the Iranian Delegation of the General Assembly, called on me today to express his hope for U.S. support for election of Iran to a non-permanent seat on the first Security Council. He explained that he assumed that the Middle Eastern states, including the Arab League and Turkey and Iran, would be entitled to at least one representative on the Security Council. He was very humble and very modest and very friendly.

He pointed out that Iran had been the first state in this area to join in the war actively, was the "bridge of victory", that it had put all of its resources at the disposal of the Allies, had suffered from lack of food to support the war effort and in many other respects, and that the service of Iran had been expressly recognized by Roosevelt, Churchill and Stalin at Teheran.

Ambassador Taquizadeh advised me that his government had reluctantly and "with a heavy heart" decided today not to put the Azerbaijan question on the agenda of the General Assembly due to the consultations that were going forward in Teheran with the U.S. and U.K. representatives.²² The view of his government had been that if nothing came of these discussions after approaching the Soviet Union they had no choice except to bring the matter to the General Assembly and had fully intended to request that it be added to the agenda, but at the last moment they had felt that it might only be disturbing it at a critical time in the life of the United Nations and had concluded not to request its addition to the agenda.

In the circumstances his government felt that it was imperative to be elected to the Security Council and that the opportunity to discuss their problem face to face with the great powers in the Security Council might be of some help; that their Ambassador in Washington had contacted certain people in the State Department and found them sympathetic but due to the Christmas holidays the conversations had not been comprehensive.

He also informed me that Turkey would actively support Iran for non-permanent membership on the Security Council.

I told the Ambassador that I hoped the Arab states, together with Turkey and Iran, would try to agree among themselves upon a candidate for the Security Council, that I understood that Egypt was actively seeking the post, but that so far as I was informed, no commitments had been made and that I felt reasonably confident that my government would consider Iran's candidacy most sympathetically if there was any common agreement on her selection among the Middle Eastern powers. He said he would initiate some talks with the Arab League states and left with an earnest expression of hope that we would find it convenient to give Iran's position every possible consideration.

ASSIGNMENT OF POSITIONS IN THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Attached are a series of tables with suggested alternative distributions of positions in the General Assembly, and a table suggesting the composition of the Credentials Committee. These tables should be considered in conjunction with the notes which follow.

General Principle of Distribution

The President, 7 Vice-Presidents and 6 Chairmen of the main committees constitute the General Committee (total 14).

As a general principle, the distribution of seats should follow the distribution in the Executive Committee [of the Preparatory Commission], i.e., 5 major powers, 3 Latin American, 2 Dominion, 2 Eastern European, 1 Western European, 1 Middle Eastern. This principle is followed in all the attached tables.

President

The U. S. Candidate for President is Lie of Norway. The British candidate is Spaak of Belgium. Many Latin American states favor Evatt of Australia. The USSR may propose Poland. It is assumed that we will not agree to Poland, but may agree to one of the other candidates. In consequence the attached tables are made up on the basis of (1) Norway as President, (2) Belgium as President, and (3) Australia as President.

²³ Transmitted to Mr. Stettinius on January 4 (en route) by Mr. Abe Feller of the United States Delegation Staff of Advisers.

Vice-Presidents

In Tables 1, 2 and 3, the Vice-Presidents are the Big Five, plus Poland and Uruguay. Poland is selected in order to short-circuit a possible Soviet drive for a Polish President. Uruguay is selected because (a) it would be desirable to have a Latin American Vice-President, and (b) as a consolation for Uruguay's failure to be elected to ECOSOC.

It would be helpful for future development of the United Nations if it were possible not to establish the precedent that all of the Big Five must be Vice-Presidents, although it is agreed that all five should be on the General Committee. If at all feasible, one of the Big Five should take a committee chairmanship. Table IV is an illustration of such a situation in which either China or the USA would hold the chairmanship of the Political and Security Committee. In such event there would be three small power Vice-Chairmen. In the illustration Iran (or Egypt) is listed as the third of these posts.

The Russians may raise strong objection to Iran as a member of the General Committee, and may likely suggest Syria. Since Syria is a very small and very recent state and since the French would not be too pleased with such a choice, it is unlikely that Syria would find general favor. We have therefore suggested Egypt as an alternative to Iran.

Committee Chairmanships

The choice of committee chairmanships must be based partly on political considerations and partly on considerations of personal competence. These are difficult criteria to reconcile. The explanation for individual choices appears in footnotes to the Tables.

Latin American States

The Latin American states are allocated 1 Vice-Presidency, 2 committee chairmen and 2 committee vice-chairmen. Before definitive choices are made, they should be checked with the leading Latin American delegations. The reasons for the suggestions here given are as follows: Uruguay for Vice-President and Venezuela for a committee vice-chairman as consolations for failure to be elected to ECOSOC; Colombia as chairman of the Trusteeship Committee because of Zuleta's²⁴ competence; Mexico as chairman of the Legal Committee because of Padilla Nervo's²⁵ competence. It is likely that small Latin American states will object to these choices, since some of them desire to establish a principle of rotation. We recommend that such a tendency should be resisted. The General Committee is important and we should have important states and strong men on it. Colombia and Mexico will be exceptionally helpful because of the great ability and experience of the two men mentioned. In addition the U.S. can count on these men to give it strong and effective support, without any suspicion that they are acting as mere puppets. We have not discovered yet any outstanding men among the smaller Latin American states, and have found at least three delegates from such states who are unacceptable for any important posts. In order to leave some leeway for strong objections to a continuing important role for Colombia, we have suggested Venezuela as an alternative.

Rapporteurs

We have made no suggestions for choice of rapporteurs. It would be advisable to keep these positions open until after the committees have been organized in order to enable a choice to be made on the basis of competence of individuals, and also in order to give a greater leeway for distribution among states after the other posts have been filled.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Principal Adviser to the United States Delegation (Hiss)

[LONDON,] January 8, 1946.

Participants: Mr. Stettinius
Ambassador Eduardo Zuleta Angel, Colombia
Ambassador Luis Padilla Nervo, Mexico
Ambassador C. de Freitas-Valle, Brazil
Mr. Alger Hiss

The call of the three visitors was made on their initiative. They said that they realized Mr. Stettinius was not receiving callers regularly on detailed matters and that they had been selected as a committee to pay their respects to him on behalf of all the Latin American Delegations. They were, however, anxious to take up with him certain points prior to a meeting of the Latin American Delegations.

The point in which they were most interested was whether it would be possible for the Latin American countries to have two Vice-Presidents of the General Assembly and two chairmen of the Assembly committees. Mr. Stettinius said that frankly in his opinion it would not be feasible for representatives of the Latin American countries to be named two of the Vice-Presidents. Mr. Stettinius pointed out that it was generally assumed that five of the seven Vice-Presidents would be representatives of the five powers with permanent seats on the Security Council. This would leave only two Vice-Presidents for election at large and it did not seem reasonable for both of these to be filled by Latin Americans. The three visitors seemed to accept this comment in good part.

In the course of the discussion Mr. Stettinius mentioned that we had received word directly from the Australians that Dr. Evatt is not coming to London for the meeting of the General Assembly. He and his three visitors seemed to feel that this clearly ruled out any possibility of Dr. Evatt being considered for this post. Mr. Stettinius also mentioned that we had been informed indirectly that Mr. Spaak is not available for the position of the Secretary General. There was some discussion as to our preferences for the post of President of the General Assembly in view of the above developments. Mr. Stettinius indicated that since we had originally contemplated Mr. Spaak as a candidate for Secretary General and as we had also been favorably impressed by Dr. Evatt's qualifications for President of the General Assembly that our attitude with reference to this latter position was now not quite the same as it had been during the period of the Preparatory Commission. Mr. Stettinius thought that either Mr. Lie of Norway, whom we had initially suggested for this position, or Mr. Spaak would be an appropriate President. He said that he understood there was a good deal of favorable sentiment for Mr. Spaak and that perhaps he might become a unanimous choice. His three visitors indicated that they preferred Spaak to Lie for this position.

Sir Alexander Cadogan opened the meeting by speaking favorably of the qualifications of Monsieur Spaak. He dwelt upon Spaak's experience as presiding officer, mentioning in particular his serving in that capacity at the Brussels Conference.³⁹ Ambassador Gromyko then said that in preliminary conversations held before he had returned to Moscow there had been two names mentioned, Spaak and Lie. He said the Soviet Delegation now has a definite view in favor of Lie.

Ambassador Koo said that he still felt that either of the two men mentioned would be acceptable, although perhaps on the basis of personal fitness Spaak might be preferable.

Mr. Stevenson said that his position was somewhat like that of Ambassador Koo. He said that he had been the first to mention Mr. Lie but that the disposition of the United States Delegation was to try to reach agreement on this matter with the other delegations. Other delegations including those of the American Republics in their conversations with him have expressed a marked preference for Spaak.

Monsieur Paul-Boncour remarked that Spaak is very experienced as presiding officer.

Ambassador Gromyko then said that he could not accept Spaak and that the Soviet Union has a very definite opinion in favor of Lie. He said he could not consider retreating from his position and that he felt confident that if the five were unanimously to agree upon Lie he could be easily elected.

The discussion then passed to the selection of members of the General Committee of the Assembly. There was general agreement that five of the Vice-Presidencies would be filled by representatives of the permanent members of the Security Council. Mr. Stevenson proposed that representatives of Poland and Venezuela might be elected to fill the other two Vice-Presidencies. He explained that the choice of the delegations from the other American Republics for this position was Venezuela.

Ambassador Gromyko expressed agreement in principle with this view and Ambassador Koo and Monsieur Paul-Boncour also agreed.

At Sir Alexander Cadogan's suggestion there was then specific agreement on Venezuela for one of the Vice-Presidencies. Sir Alexander then asked for similar agreement with respect to Poland. At this point Ambassador Gromyko said he would like to discuss this matter in connection with the Presidency of the Second Session of the General Assembly. He inquired whether the others would agree to Poland receiving that position.

Sir Alexander Cadogan replied that he had not thought about this matter but he found it difficult to commit himself a year in advance. He inquired how this matter affected the question of Poland's selection as a Vice-President now.

Ambassador Gromyko replied that if the selection of Poland as Vice-President now would prejudice her election at the next session he might wish to suggest Yugoslavia instead of Poland as a Vice-President now. Sir Charles Webster said that if Poland were now selected as Vice-President it would not prejudice Poland's candidacy for President of the next session.

Mr. Stevenson expressed his agreement with this point of view.

Ambassador Gromyko then said that he thought the question he had just raised with respect to Poland also would affect the choice of the President of the present session. If Western Europe were to have a representative now, Eastern Europe might be granted a representative at the next session. Mr. Stevenson said that he thought such a proposal was worthy of consideration but he did not think it would be profitable to talk in terms of particular countries. Sir Alexander Cadogan said that it is not possible to say now who will be foreign minister of Poland at the time of the next session. Gromyko at this point agreed to the selection of Poland as a Vice-President at the current session and Paul-Boncour also agreed. Ambassador Koo said that he attached importance to the principle of geographic representation and that he thought there should be at least some rough general rotation of the Presidency, although he recognized that the individual selected was also a matter of importance. With this observation he expressed his agreement to the selection of Poland for Vice-President at the present time.

Sir Alexander Cadogan then brought up the subject of chairmen of committees, pointing out that they also will be members of the General Committee. Ambassador Gromyko said that before proceeding with this subject he wished to point out that the President of the Preparatory Commission had been an American (i.e., from the American Continent), and that the two parts of the first session of the General Assembly are really two sessions, both of which would be presided over by a Western European, whether Spaak or Lie is elected. He said that he wished to make himself clear and that he wished to know the opinion of the others present with respect to the selection of Poland for President of the Second Session. He suggested perhaps two countries might be mentioned in view of the suggestion that we could not be sure who would be foreign minister of Poland at the time of the next session. Cadogan said that he was willing to go so far as to say some geographic rotation would be desirable if a suitable candidate could be found. Mr. Stevenson expressed his agreement with this statement. Paul-Boncour said he thought Ambassador Koo's suggestion was wise and met Ambassador Gromyko's point of view.

The discussion then proceeded to the selection of committee chairman. Mr. Stevenson suggested a representative of Norway as Chairman of the first Committee if Norway is not elected President of the General Assembly, in which event perhaps a representative of one of the Dominions might be selected, perhaps New Zealand. Cadogan said he thought Mr. Fraser, Prime Minister of New Zealand, might be made Chairman of the Trusteeship Committee as he had presided over that Committee in San Francisco. Mr. Stevenson thought it might be desirable to have someone for that Committee who came from a country not interested in trusteeship, for example, a Latin American. Ambassador Gromyko said that he could not recommend Norway as Chairman of Committee 1 as he wants Mr. Lie to be President of the General Assembly. Mr. Stevenson then read the rest of the United States slate, namely, Australia for Committee 2, Czechoslovakia for Committee 3, Panama for Committee 4, Syria for Committee 5, and Uruguay for Committee 6. Sir Alexander Cadogan in turn read a British list which proposed Uruguay for Committee 1, the Ukraine for Committee 2, a Latin American State for Committee 3, New Zealand for Committee 4, Canada for Committee 5, and Egypt for Committee 6.

Ambassador Gromyko said that he had no objection to Fraser personally and that he felt Fraser had been a good Chairman at San Francisco, but that he thought it undesirable to have a representative of New Zealand be Chairman of this Committee. He proposed that the Ukraine be given the Chairmanship of the first Committee. He also expressed doubt as to the desirability of Panama being given the Trusteeship Committee Chairmanship. He expressed no objection to the United States proposals with respect to Committees 5 and 6.

Ambassador Koo remarked that the vast Asiatic Continent had been left out altogether. At this point it was suggested that the posts of Vice-Chairman be considered simultaneously and Mr. Stevenson read the United States list, i.e., Yugoslavia for Committee 1, Iran for Committee 2, Costa Rica for Committee 3, Denmark for Committee 4, New Zealand for Committee 5, and South Africa for Committee 6.

Sir Alexander Cadogan then read the British list as follows: Byelorussia for Committee 1, Chile for Committee 2, Denmark for Committee 3, South Africa for Committee 4, Turkey for Committee 5, and Cuba for Committee 6.

Cadogan suggested that agreement now be attempted on the Chairmanship of the first Committee and Paul-Boncour said that either the Ukraine or Uruguay would be satisfactory to him. Ambassador Koo suggested that Mr. Fraser of New Zealand would be an excellent choice. Mr. Stevenson said that he would be prepared to accept Uruguay, and that although he recognized that Mr. Manuilsky had been a good Chairman during the Preparatory Commission he had some reservation in his mind as to whether a representative of one of the constituent Republics should be Chairman of this Committee. Ambassador Gromyko said that he would like to know Mr. Stevenson's reason for this position. In reply Mr. Stevenson said he was thinking largely of the appearance of things. At this point Sir Alexander Cadogan said he would accept Mr. Manuilsky as Chairman of Committee 1. Mr. Stevenson continued that he thought it would be wise for the Chairman of this Committee not to have too close a connection with any of the great powers and Ambassador Gromyko then inquired as to what he would say to the proposal that one of the British Dominions or a Latin American State be given the Chairmanship of this Committee. Ambassador Koo said he did not think it important whether a Dominion or a constituent Republic was given the Chairmanship. He thought that either Fraser or Manuilsky would be a very able Chairman and he said that either would be acceptable to him. He added that from what he knew of the experience of McEachen of Uruguay⁴⁰ as chairman of a committee of the Preparatory Commission he thought he would be very good, but that Mr. McEachen had not had as much experience as the other two. Mr. Stevenson said that his order of preference of the three men mentioned was Mr. Fraser, Mr. McEachen, and Mr. Manuilsky. Both Paul-Boncour and Ambassador Koo, in reply to specific inquiries from Sir Alexander Cadogan, said they would agree that Norway would be a good choice for this position if Mr. Lie were not elected President of the General Assembly.

The discussion then proceeded to the Chairmanship of Committee 2, and Ambassador Koo recommended India or Iran "for Asiatic reasons". Monsieur Paul-Boncour said that Mudaliar⁴¹ had been very competent as a chairman, both at San Francisco and in the Preparatory Commission. Ambassador Gromyko replied that Mudaliar was a very able man but that he had some doubt as to perpetuating his chairmanship of an economic committee. He suggested the possibility of Denmark. Mr. Stevenson pointed out that another Western European state would upset the balance of the General Committee, remarking that dependent upon the outcome of the election of President of the General Assembly Mr. Lie might be Chairman of Committee 1.

The discussion then proceeded to the Chairmanship of Committee 3. Ambassador Gromyko suggested a Latin American. Ambassador Koo and Sir Alexander Cadogan said they would accept Czechoslovakia for this post. Ambassador Gromyko said he would agree to this if the ⁴¹ Sir Ramaswami Mudaliar, Member of the Executive Council of the Governor-General of India; Head of the Government of India's Delegation.

Ukraine were accepted for the first Committee. Mr. Paul-Boncour said he would agree to Czechoslovakia for Committee 3.

With respect to Committee 4 Monsieur Paul-Boncour agreed with the suggestion of New Zealand. Ambassador Koo suggested Colombia but Mr. Stevenson thought that the Latin American States would not agree in as much as Mr. Zuleta of Colombia had been President of the Preparatory Commission. Ambassador Gromyko said he thought Panama was not a good choice for Committee 4.

With respect to Committee 5 Monsieur Paul-Boncour accepted Canada. Ambassador Gromyko said he would agree to either Syria or one of the Dominions subject to the solution of the question of the Chairmanship of Committee 1. He said that he would like to think further about this matter. Ambassador Koo suggested Iran for Committee 5.

As to Committee 6 Ambassador Gromyko said he would agree to Uruguay subject to the decision with respect to the Chairmanship of Committee 1. He also suggested the possibility of Egypt for Committee 6.

The discussion then proceeded to the non-permanent members of the Security Council and Ambassador Gromyko remarked that as he had said before he left for Moscow ⁴² he favored the following slate: Poland for two years; Brazil for two years; Canada for two years; Syria, Belgium and Norway each for one year.

Mr. Stevenson read the United States list of Canada, Brazil and the Netherlands each for two year terms; Mexico, Poland and Egypt each for one year terms.

Monsieur Fouques Duparc suggested Brazil, the Netherlands or Belgium, Poland, Egypt or Iran, Mexico and Canada.

Ambassador Koo suggested Brazil, Canada, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Iran and Mexico.

Sir Alexander Cadogan said that he did not have the British list with him.

There was agreement among all present upon Brazil and Canada. Sir Alexander Cadogan then inquired whether it was necessary to have two Latin American States in the Security Council and Mr. Stevenson replied in the affirmative. Cadogan then pointed out that Brazil and Mexico appeared on all the lists except the Soviet list. Ambassador Gromyko thought it would be fairer to have only Brazil on the Council as otherwise there would be four states from North America. He also argued that if both Brazil and Mexico were to be elected, the Council would be unbalanced after their terms had expired (implying that two smaller Latin American States would not be properly representative from a security point of view).

(At this point Sir Alexander Cadogan left the meeting and returned with the British list which was identical with the United States list.)

Ambassador Koo asked Sir Alexander Cadogan if the British included the Netherlands on their list instead of Belgium on the assumption that Monsieur Spaak of Belgium would be President of the General Assembly. Sir Alexander replied in the affirmative.

Ambassador Gromyko said that he thought the Netherlands should first make peace at home and then take care of the peace of other countries.⁴³

The meeting then adjourned, agreeing to meet again at ten o'clock the next morning.

Mr. Alger Hiss

Sir Alexander Cadogan opened the meeting by stating that during the course of the preceding evening he had occasion to talk to the representatives of other delegations and had found general agreement on the selection of M. Spaak for the Presidency of the Assembly. He said that the question of the Presidency could not be settled at the present meeting.

He then said that with respect to the Security Council his government still favored the Netherlands, although their position on that might to some extent be affected by the outcome of the election of the President of the General Assembly. Mr. Stevenson restated the position he had expressed at the preceding meeting with respect to M. Lie and Monsieur Spaak and added that as long as there is support for Monsieur Lie and no common agreement among the Big Five for Spaak the United States will vote for M. Lie but that the United States is not attempting to influence the votes of others. Sir Charles Webster remarked that Lie has withdrawn and when surprise was expressed at this statement he said that the morning issue of the Times so stated. Ambassador Gromyko said that the Soviet Union would vote against Spaak and would speak against Spaak. He said that all the discussion about candidates had made a very bad impression on the Soviet Delegation and shows that the five powers are not united. He said that the British press have sung Spaak's praises for weeks and that perhaps other delegations have made commitments. Cadogan objected that his delegation had made no promises. Mr. Paul-Boncour said that it would be regrettable if agreement could not be reached. He inquired why Ambassador Gromyko was opposed to Monsieur Spaak. In reply Ambassador Gromyko said he thought Spaak had been too closely identified with the League, that he was an able man but that there were other factors of more importance. He said that he saw some attempts by other delegations to discredit the efforts of the Soviet Delegation to reach a fair solution and he wondered why there had been no consultation with the Soviet Delegation before decisions had been reached. Sir Alexander said there had been no consultation at all before Gromyko arrived in London. Ambassador Gromyko then said that Spaak himself had the preceding day said it had been agreed he would be selected as President. Ambassador Gromyko said he wanted it to be reported to the foreign ministers of the other representatives present that the Soviet Delegation has received a bad impression because of the lack of cooperation. He referred to the "myth" of cooperation and said he thought this was a very bad beginning and that if there was to be no cooperation the Charter would be a paper document. He added that if the other delegations do not wish to cooperate his delegation would give the same answer. Ambassador Koo said that although he thought either Monsieur Lie or Monsieur Spaak would be a good choice he wished to point out that if Spaak were elected President of the Assembly, Belgium could not be on the Security Council and Norway would receive no recognition.

The discussion then turned to the choice of chairmen of committees and Cadogan said that the choice for the first Committee appeared to be the Ukraine. Mr. Stevenson said that the Ukraine had not been the choice of the United States Delegation but that if it proved to be the choice of all the others he could agree although he had intended to suggest Czechoslovakia for this position and that he would also like to suggest Uruguay instead of Panama for the Chairmanship of the Trusteeship Committee, Committee 4. Ambassador Koo expressed his agreement with respect to Uruguay and so did Monsieur Paul-Boncour. Sir Charles Webster suggested Mr. Fraser as Chairman of Committee 3 and Czechoslovakia as Chairman of Committee 5.

Ambassador Gromyko said he stood for the selection of the Ukraine for Committee 1, Ambassador Koo said that he would agree to that and to Mr. Fraser as Chairman of Committee 3. Cadogan said he would agree to the Ukraine as Chairman of Committee 1. Mr. Stevenson then said that if Gromyko preferred the Ukraine to Czechoslovakia and would agree to the choice of Uruguay for the Trusteeship Committee he would agree to the Ukraine for Committee 1. Gromyko agreed to this proposal.

Mr. Stevenson then asked whether the others present preferred Bolivia or Uruguay as Chairman of Committee 4. Cadogan said that he preferred Uruguay and the others present agreed upon Uruguay as Chairman of Committee 4.

All present then agreed upon Mr. Fraser as Chairman of Committee 3.

Committees 2 and 5 were discussed jointly and Sir Alexander Cadogan suggested India as Chairman of either committee. Mr. Stevenson suggested Norway, Belgium or Denmark for Committee 2 depending upon other developments. Ambassador Koo supported India for either Committee 2 or Committee 5 suggesting that perhaps Committee 5 might be the preferable choice in order to avoid perpetuating Sir Ramaswami Mudaliar in the same post. Ambassador Gromyko said that he could agree to only one British Dominion for a Chairmanship. He did not know how two out of six would look. Cadogan said it would disturb the balance of the General Committee unless there were two Dominions on it. Gromyko then suggested that Poland be a chairman of one of the committees and that a British Dominion be made a Vice-President. Cadogan agreed and suggested that Poland be Chairman of Committee 5 and India receive a Vice-Presidency. Gromyko suggested Poland be Chairman of Committee 2. This was agreed upon tentatively, Gromyko saying that he wished to think over the suggestion that India receive a Vice-Presidency. As to Committees 5 and 6 Gromyko, Cadogan and Stevenson agreed upon Syria and Panama respectively. Koo accepted Panama for Committee 6 but suggested Iran for Committee 5. Paul-Boncour agreed provisionally to Syria and Panama.

On the subject of Vice-Chairmen of the Committees Mr. Stevenson suggested Iran for Committee 1, Denmark for Committee 2, Yugoslavia for Committee 3 and South Africa for Committee 5. Gromyko proposed Yugoslavia for Committee 4. Mr. Stevenson then suggested Denmark for Committee 4, South Africa for Committee 2, Costa Rica for Committee 3, and Czechoslovakia for Committee 5.

Sir Charles Webster then returned to the subject of chairmanships and raised the possibility of Turkey being made Chairman of Committee 5 but dropped the suggestion when Gromyko opposed it.

The discussion then continued with respect to Vice-Chairmanships. Gromyko again suggested Yugoslavia for Committee 4 and added Byelo Russia as an alternative. In the course of discussion on Gromyko's suggestion Cadogan and Webster appeared to agree to both Byelo Russia and Yugoslavia being named rapporteurs of committees.

There seemed to be general agreement on Turkey as Vice-Chairman of Committee 6 but Gromyko wanted the question of the Vice-Chairmanship or Rapporteurship of Committee 4 settled first. He also suggested Chile as Vice-Chairman of Committee 6. Paul-Boncour suggested Luxembourg to which Gromyko agreed if Yugoslavia could be made a Vice-President. Ambassador Koo expressed a preference for Turkey as Vice-Chairman of Committee 6. Mr. Stevenson then suggested Turkey as Chairman of Committee 5 and Syria as Vice-Chairman of Committee 6 but this was opposed by Gromyko who suggested Yugoslavia as Rapporteur for Committee 5 and said he would agree to Luxembourg as Vice-Chairman of Committee 6. Ambassador Koo said that he could accept this proposal.

Gromyko then said that he wanted Yugoslavia and Byelo Russia as rapporteurs. Mr. Stevenson opposed this position.

As the meeting was adjourned Monsieur Paul-Boncour suggested that the election of the President of the General Assembly should be postponed until agreement could be reached among the representatives of the Big Five on that subject. Monsieur Paul-Boncour then suggested that the Big Five agree to the proposal earlier made by Ambassador Koo, that Lie be elected President of the General Assembly and Belgium be put on the Security Council.

Ambassador Gromyko then asked Sir Charles Webster whether Mr. Attlee's address at the opening plenary session would be only a speech of welcome or a political speech defining the British attitude toward the organization. He said that if it would be the latter kind of speech he thought the other powers should also be given an opportunity to speak at the same meeting. Sir Charles Webster agreed to try to find out the nature of Mr. Attlee's speech.

*The Secretary of State to the Acting Secretary of State (Acheson)*SECRET US URGENT

LONDON, January 10, 1946—midnight.

[Received January 11—12:51 a. m.]

337. Personal for the President from the Secretary.

[Here follows discussion relating to the question of the establishment of international controls over atomic energy; for documentation on this subject, see post, pages 712 ff.]

I found that Adlai Stevenson, representing Stettinius, 6 weeks ago had determined that the only available candidate to preside over the first meeting was Foreign Minister Lie of Norway. He had asked the Norwegian Ambassador if Lie would be available and if he would accept. Subsequently he was advised by Norway that Lie would accept.⁴⁵ Stevenson also told Gromyko that US representatives on the Preparatory Commission favored the election of Lie as president of the meeting.

Spaak of Belgium was then being considered for Secretary General. More recently it was determined that Spaak would not be urged for that post and he was urged for President of the meeting. Stevenson advised me that a majority of the convention apparently favored Spaak. However, last night Gromyko told me that he had been asked by the US representatives 6 weeks ago to support Lie; that after consulting his govt he had been instructed to do so. In view of this and in view of the fact that US representative had first approached Norway on the subject, I determined it was our duty to vote for Lie regardless of the outcome of the voting.

Who presided over the meeting was not important but it was important that we should not break faith with two govts. I advised Gromyko that because of what had occurred we would vote for Lie but that we would not seek to influence the votes of other govts. The Soviet delegation nominated Lie. Four states friendly to the Soviets and Denmark seconded. We thought he would receive not more than 12 votes but he received 23 votes.⁴⁶

The Soviets were very much opposed to Spaak. Had Lie received only a few votes, they doubtless would have been humiliated. Having received 23 votes they were agreeably surprised and I am sure they realized that most of those votes came from South American Govts who had learned today of our position and followed us even though we did not ask them to do so.

The matter was handled badly by the friends of Spaak who did not formally nominate him. The Soviets have a right to think that there was a caucus among the delegates when the man they nominated and whose nomination was seconded by 4 or 5 govts, received 23 votes and a man whose name was not mentioned on the floor received 28 votes. Observers will point out this was not done by chance because Spaak was the only person beside Lie to receive votes.

Our slate for the Security Council has been tentatively agreed upon by the Big Five with the exception of one place not yet decided where the contest is between Belgium and the Netherlands. The election of Spaak from Belgium makes me feel stronger for the Netherlands. But before deciding it tomorrow morning, I will consult the members of the delegation.

Ambassador Gromyko at the outset of the meeting proposed that Yugoslavia be substituted for Czechoslovakia for the Chairmanship of Committee 5. This suggestion was agreed to by the others present. Ambassador Gromyko then proposed that a member of the Czech Delegation be selected as Rapporteur of Committee 4. Sir Charles Webster and Mr. Stevenson both expressed disagreement to this proposal. M. Fouques Duparc suggested Czechoslovakia as Rapporteur of Committee 3. Ambassador Gromyko asked why there was objection to a Czech Delegate as Rapporteur of Committee 4 if it was appropriate to have a representative of Uruguay as Chairman of that Committee. At this point Sir Alexander Cadogan suggested a Norwegian Delegate as the Rapporteur of Committee 4 and Ambassador Gromyko suggested that Norway might be given the Vice-Chairmanship of Committee 2 or Committee 1 or be given the Rapporteurship of Committee 1. His suggestions were not agreed to and he then said that if some place were found for Byelo Russia he would agree to Czechoslovakia having the Rapporteurship of Committee 2 or Committee 3. The following tentative list was then suggested as a possible combination of the British and United States proposals:

Committee	Vice-Chairman	Rapporteur
1	Iran	Ecuador
2	Philippines	Czechoslovakia
3	Costa Rica	Netherlands
4	Denmark	Norway
5	Yugoslavia	Greece
6	Luxembourg	Bolivia

This list was not agreed to by Ambassador Gromyko.

The discussion then turned to the non-permanent members of the Security Council.

Ambassador Koo withdrew his objection to Poland. Ambassador Gromyko continued to object to Mexico on the ground that it would mean that four North American countries were represented in the Security Council at the same time.

The question was then raised by several of those present as to whether there would have to be two Latin American countries on the Council for an indefinite period of time. Mr. Stevenson, speaking on this point, said that he felt confident that certainly there would have to be two Latin American countries elected at this time and also at the next election the retiring Latin American country would have to be replaced by a Latin American country.

Sir Alexander Cadogan asked Ambassador Gromyko what country he would propose instead of Mexico and Gromyko replied that he had already suggested Belgium as a member of the Security Council but if the Presidential election had changed the situation⁴⁹ he would like to consult his government on this point and he would propose a postponement of the election of Security Council members.

Sir Alexander Cadogan then suggested that agreement be reached on Egypt as one of the members of the Security Council. Ambassador Gromyko suggested Syria instead of Egypt. Ambassador Koo said that Egypt was acceptable to him provided it was understood that there would not always have to be an Arab State on the Security Council, as contrasted with a state representative of the Middle East and Northern Africa. This qualification was agreed to by the others present and on that basis there was general agreement upon Egypt.

Cadogan then brought up the Netherlands and Mr. Stevenson expressed himself as in favor of the Netherlands. Fouques Duparc agreed to the Netherlands and said that he had dropped his support of Belgium in view of Spaak's election as President of the Assembly. Gromyko said that he still favored Belgium but if there was a general feeling that there had been a change in the situation as a result of Spaak's election he would have to ask for instructions and would want the elections delayed. He again suggested Norway instead of Mexico and then specifically asked that those present request their principal delegates to agree to a postponement of the Security Council elections. He said that he might receive his instructions by Monday but he refused to fix a specific date for the elections to be held. He asked that a reply to his request be given to him tonight or tomorrow morning. Both Cadogan and Koo said that if Gromyko could agree to a fixed date for the elections it would make a postponement of the elections easier from their point of view.

The discussion then proceeded to the slate for the Economic and Social Council. Mr. Stevenson read the United States list as follows:

3 Year Term	2 Year Term	1 Year Term
China	U.K.	U.S.
Chile	U.S.S.R.	Cuba
France	Ukraine	Colombia
Peru	Canada	India
Belgium	Czechoslovakia	Netherlands
Australia	Norway	Iraq

Ambassador Gromyko read the following proposed Soviet slate: Australia, the Netherlands (on the assumption that they are not elected to the Security Council), Canada or South Africa, Iraq, Norway (if not elected to the Security Council) or Ethiopia, Cuba, Mexico (if not elected to the Security Council), or Peru, Denmark, Ukraine or Byelo Russia, Yugoslavia, Greece, Chile, Czechoslovakia, and the five major powers.

Sir Alexander Cadogan then read the British list which was the same as the United States list except he proposed that the positions of Canada and India be interchanged so that India would receive a two year term and Canada a one year term.

M. Fouques Duparc then said that the French list was the same as the United States list except that his delegation felt three seats would be sufficient for Latin America and so substituted Greece for Colombia. He explained that his delegation felt there should be representation for the Mediterranean area, pointing out that it would be important to save a seat for Italy. He said that he thought it would be unfortunate to establish the principle of four Latin American States being entitled to continuing representation on this Council. Mr. Stevenson said he agreed that in due course the Mediterranean area will need further representation and that when Italy becomes a member of the United Nations the situation will have changed. He said he did not think, however, it would be possible at this time to decide at whose expense any change in representation should be made.

Ambassador Koo then read the following list: Peru, Chile, India, Norway, Canada, Turkey, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, the Ukraine, Australia, Belgium, Colombia, Cuba, and the five major powers. He subsequently agreed that the Netherlands should be a member of this Council but without specifying which country on his list he would drop in favor of the Netherlands.

After considerable discussion it was found that there was agreement by all present upon Australia, the Ukraine, Czechoslovakia, Chile, Cuba and Canada. There was also general agreement, except for Soviet reservations, as to Peru, Belgium, Norway, and the Netherlands. (The Soviet reservation with respect to Peru was to the effect that if Mexico were not elected to the Security Council the Soviets would prefer Mexico to Peru; with respect to Belgium, the Netherlands and Norway its reservation was that it would not support any one of these countries for the Economic and Social Council if it were elected to the Security Council.) Four of those present favored India, Gromyko alone being opposed. Three of those present favored Colombia, the French and Gromyko being opposed. Four also favored Iraq, Koo saying that he would have to consult his delegation on this subject. The French and the Soviets supported Greece. China and the Soviets supported Yugoslavia, Gromyko's support of Yugoslavia being stated in very strong terms. The Chinese favored Turkey in place of Iraq and suggested Iran if Turkey were not acceptable to the others. Gromyko suggested the possible inclusion of Ethiopia instead of a fourth Latin American State.

LONDON, January 12, 1946.

[Received January 12—10:48 p. m.]

430. Delun 56. GA today elected Brazil, Australia, Poland, Mexico, Egypt and Netherlands as nonpermanent members of SC, the first three for 2 year terms.

On first ballot taken at morning's meeting 5 nonpermanent members of SC were elected as follows: Brazil (47 votes); Mexico (45 votes); Egypt (45 votes); Poland (39 votes) and The Netherlands (37 votes), 34 votes being required for the necessary two-thirds majority stipulated by the Charter.⁵¹

Previously Gromyko had proposed that election of nonpermanent members of SC be postponed to first of next week in order to permit further consideration and consultation. This motion, which was opposed on floor by US⁵² and UK and supported by New Zealand and Czechoslovakia, was defeated by vote of 34 to 9 with 8 abstentions. Only formal nominations were made by Manuilsky who proposed Brazil, New Zealand and Poland for 2 year terms, Egypt and Norway for 1 year terms and Mexico for either 1 or 2 year term. Both Fraser and Lie, however, stated that their governments were not candidates for SC seats.

Those states receiving votes in addition to 5 elected were Canada (33 votes); Australia (28 votes); Iran (6 votes); Czechoslovakia (6 votes); Norway (5 votes); Denmark (2 votes) and Belgium, Ethiopia, Greece, Luxemburg, New Zealand, Turkey and Yugoslavia 1 vote each. This restricted choice in future balloting under Rule 74 to Canada and Australia and meeting concluded after second ballot which resulted in 27 votes for Australia and 23 votes for Canada.

At afternoon meeting, third ballot failed to result in two-thirds majority for either Canada or Australia but Canadian delegate suggested that election of Australia be made unanimous (Australia had received 28 votes to Canada's 23). Spaak, however, advocated strict adherence to rules of procedure and on fourth ballot Australia received 46 votes and Canada 3, 2 ballots being invalid.

Vote on 2 year term followed, GA supporting by vote of 35 to 5 (US voting negative, Spaak ruling that simple majority vote only required) where first ballot resulted in election of Brazil and Australia, vote on second ballot where choice lay between Poland and Netherlands was tied and Spaak then drew lots under Rule 74 resulting in selection of Poland for third 2 year term.

Following vote on SC membership Koo took floor to express hope that geographic distribution among first nonpermanent members of SC would not be regarded as precedent for future elections since Chinese Delegation felt that at some time in future there should be an Asiatic state as nonpermanent member.

Election of members of ECOSOC followed. First ballot resulted in election of 17 members, Belgium (41 votes); Canada (46 votes); Chile (49 votes); China (49 votes); Colombia (43 votes); Cuba (40 votes); Czechoslovakia (41 votes); France (43 votes); Greece (37 votes); India (42 votes); Lebanon (44 votes); Norway (49 votes); Peru (47 votes); Ukraine (41 votes); USSR (47 votes); UK (48 votes) and the US (47 votes). Voting on second and third ballots between New Zealand and Yugoslavia which had received 31 and 27 votes respectively remained indecisive. Meeting therefore adjourned until Monday.⁵³ First meeting of SC is now tentatively scheduled for Monday afternoon.⁵⁴

Issues relating to selection of Secretary General on which United States position has not yet been taken or if it has been taken, has not been made definitely clear to other delegations.

1. Is the United States opposed to General Eisenhower's selection as Secretary General? If so, the political advisers should impress this upon the other delegations, especially the Latin American Delegations as there is a real possibility of the present movement for General Eisenhower getting out of hand.⁵⁶

2. Does the United States feel that none of the British candidates whose names have been mentioned would be suitable? ⁵⁷ If so, it is presumed that the United States should continue vigorously to press its former position that no national of the Big Five should be selected for the post.

3. Does the United States definitely prefer Pearson or Robertson ⁵⁸ to Lie? We have heretofore taken the position that with the site in the United States we would assume that the organization would wish to have a European as Secretary General if a qualified European were available. This formula, if repeated under present conditions, would tend to encourage Lie's candidacy and would make it difficult, if not impossible, for us to oppose it directly or indirectly. No other Euro-

General Eisenhower's name had been suggested informally by the British Government as early as November 1945; see footnote 43, p. 1478, Foreign Relations, 1945, vol. I. Though the British interest in General Eisenhower continued to the end of the Preparatory Commission period, the Department of State did not encourage the idea; see telegram 13532, Copre 671, December 24, 1945, 9 p.m. from London, ibid., p. 1506, and footnote reference to Department's telegram 11124, Preco 452, December 29, 1945, to London, ibid., p. 1507. Early in January the London press gave considerable attention to the proposed Eisenhower candidacy, and on January 11 in a United States Delegation Press Release (Number 6) Secretary Byrnes made the following statement: "Before leaving Washington, General Eisenhower advised me that he had been informed that his name would be suggested, and in case it was, he wished me to state that he would not be interested, that he intended to continue in the office of Chief of Staff." *Minutes by the United States Delegation of the Five-Power Informal Meeting, Held at London, Claridge's Hotel, January 20, 1946*⁶⁰

Participants: James F. Byrnes
Edward R. Stettinius, Jr.
Andrei Gromyko
Ernest Bevin^{60a}
Wellington Koo
Victor Hoo
Paul-Boncour
Ambassador Massigli⁶¹
Fouques Duparc

Mr. Byrnes called the meeting to order and stated that he felt it was important that the five countries there represented discuss a number of topics inasmuch as they were all interested in them, specifically on the resolution of atomic energy, and the matter of the Secretary General. He said this was not a formal meeting, but an informal exchange of views.

Mr. Bevin immediately spoke up and said "I wish to make clear that while I am willing to have an informal exchange of views, I cannot be committed to anything in this room. My Government must always be free to act according to its conscience." Later on in the afternoon he put it stronger, saying he disliked the five power conversations and hoped he would not have to have them often as it was bad to have secret conferences and would cause resentment in the United Nations. This is totally different from the view he expressed to me when I called on him in September, at which time he overruled Noel Baker and encouraged me to go ahead and have five power exchanges of views which he thought would be helpful.

All the others there stated that they thought it was most useful to have such a meeting and were glad Mr. Byrnes had invited them to come.

Mr. Byrnes then stated he had asked me to be with him inasmuch as I was the United States Representative on the Security Council and the matters we were going to discuss principally involved the Security Council, and also I would be the Chairman of the United States Delegation when he left. He further stated that as soon as the atomic resolution was approved it would be necessary for him to return to Washington, and that might occur any day.

⁶⁰ Drafted by Mr. Stettinius.

⁶¹ M. René Massigli, French Ambassador to the United Kingdom; Delegate on the Delegation of France.

Mr. Byrnes stated that he wished to discuss the matter of the Secretary General. He said that he had not given this matter any thought until he had reached London, but after discussing the whole question with the members of his delegation, he and the delegation had come to the conclusion that of all the names which had been brought forth that Pearson, the Canadian Ambassador to Washington, was the best qualified, and he wished to put forth his name. Mr. Byrnes said Pearson was a young man about 50, was promising, would be able to grow in the job as more responsibilities were given to him, he spoke French well, he had an excellent standing among diplomats and that he had presided well at the recent FAO conference. Mr. Byrnes talked at some length and specifically stated that Pearson was our candidate and was the best qualified man we knew of. He made no reference to the fact that we had been searching for a European and had not been able to find one whom we felt measured up to Pearson.

Mr. Gromyko then stated that he felt that you could not divorce personality from geography, that they had a very high opinion of Pearson and thought well of him and were friendly toward him, but with the site in the United States and taking a Secretary General from Canada, they thought that would be criticized by the European people and the American people, and perhaps not be good for the organization. He said he had advanced the name of Simic⁶² to all the Governments' representatives, and had had a favorable response from some but had received nothing from the others. He wished again to speak for Simic as a likely candidate. He laid great emphasis on the need of a representative from Eastern Europe in this post, particularly inasmuch as the site would be in the North American continent.

Mr. Byrnes then read from the Charter, regarding the qualifications, saying the Secretary General should be an international public servant and free from any influence of any state.

Mr. Gromyko immediately responded that that rule would apply to Simic as much as to Pearson. Mr. Gromyko ended his remarks by saying he would find great difficulty in accepting Pearson for this post even though they had a very friendly feeling toward him.

Mr. Koo spoke up saying that his Government was prepared to accept Pearson, that he was perfectly willing to consider other names if they were brought up, but Pearson was the best which had been brought forth.

Mr. Paul-Boncour stated that he had heard the names of two Ambassadors to Washington mentioned, the Yugoslavian and Canadian, but he wished to call attention to the fact that France also had an Ambassador in Washington and he was a very good man and his name was Henri Bonnet, and he wished to bring his name forth for the post.

Mr. Bevin stated that his Government had decided not to bring forward any candidate for this post and had decided to sit back and study the field as it developed. He said they had considered bringing forth the names of some of their own countrymen who were extremely high in world affairs, but they had decided that would be a mistake and they would bring forth no Englishman for the post. He said that of the names mentioned, he was attracted to Pearson and he was sure his Government would support him.

At this point I spoke up and stated that it was very important that the five reach a conclusion on this matter—that the Secretary General was the next item on the agenda and that presumably we would have to decide in Executive Session on Tuesday, and inasmuch as it required unanimity, no Secretary General could be elected until we five could agree. There was a great discussion then as to whether it would be wise for us to continue consultation until we could agree, or to have a meeting of the Security Council, formal or informal, to take the other six non-permanent members into the discussion. After further discussion it was decided that it would be best to have an informal discussion of the eleven all together. I was designated to talk to Makin, the Australian Chairman, and immediately arrange for him to call an informal meeting of the eleven with only one representative or possibly two from each country tomorrow afternoon at 4:30 at any place which he selected. At that time there would be the same exchange of views which took place this afternoon, and out of that meeting, progress might be expected.⁶³

Memorandum for the Record

[LONDON,] January 22, 1946.

Slate changes were frequently so rapid and dependent on so many different factors that any account can be only a brief condensation. There may nevertheless be some value, for future reference, in a cursory record.

Pursuant to conversations among delegations in the period leading up to the opening of the General Assembly on January 10, which were conducted by Mr. Adlai Stevenson with the assistance of the Political Advisers, the delegation had arrived at a slate of committee officer-ships embodied in USGA/1a/12, January 10, 1946 (which see). A balance among the chairmanships was a course sought by the five permanent members for the purpose of a proper political equilibrium in the General Committee on which the chairmen of the six committees sit with the already chosen GA president (Spaak, Belgium) and seven vice-presidents (the five permanent members, Venezuela, South Africa). The six agreed chairmen were thereupon elected on January 11 as follows:

- Committee 1—Political and Security
D. Z. Manuilsky (Ukrainian SSR)
- Committee 2—Economic and Financial
W. Konderski (Poland)
- Committee 3—Social, Humanitarian and Cultural
P. Fraser (New Zealand)
- Committee 4—Trusteeship
R. MacEachen (Uruguay)
- Committee 5—Administrative and Budgetary Faris al Khouri (Syria)
- Committee 6—Legal
R. Jiménez (Panama)

In arriving at the decision of MacEachen as chairman for Committee 4 the United States had held out against the choice, by an American Republics caucus, of Bolivia for that position.

Although the immediate question was the election of chairmen only, we had at an early date a slate of vice-chairmen and rapporteurs also in mind as follows:

	Chairman	Vice-Chairman	Rapporteur
1	Manuilsky Ukrainian SSR	Entezam Iran	Viteri Lafronte Ecuador
2	Konderski Poland	Lopez Philippines	Salamanca Bolivia
3	Fraser New Zealand	Soto Harrison Costa Rica	Mrs. Frieda Dalen Norway
4	MacEachen Uruguay	Bech Luxembourg	Kerno Czechoslovakia
5	Faris al Khouri Syria	Bebler Yugoslavia	Aghnides Greece
6	Jiménez Panama	Federspiel Denmark	Verzijl ⁶⁴ Netherlands

The listing of Ecuador and Bolivia for rapporteurships was a recommendation of the American Republics group in consequence of negotiations among themselves growing out of distribution of other offices (including specifically the election as chairman of Committee 4 of MacEachen of Uruguay in preference to Salamanca of Bolivia). Shifts as between the particular committee officerships allocated earlier for certain delegations had also been incorporated in this slate by reason of personal competence of members of those delegations. Denmark, for example, preferred that it should have the vice-chairmanship of Committee 6 rather than of Committee 4 because Federspiel, a competent and experienced presiding officer with excellent knowledge of English, is a legal expert rather than an expert in trusteeship matters; and Denmark obtained the assent of Bech of Luxembourg to take the Committee 4 vice chairmanship so that Federspiel might have the Committee 6 vice chairmanship. Similarly Norway's presence on the slate on Committee 3 was a consequence of the fact that the Norwegian delegation preferred that any rapporteurship given to it should be in Committee 3 where Mrs. Frieda Dalen, particularly competent for the work, would be attending.

When approached as to the vice-chairmanship of Committee 1, Iran stated an unwillingness to serve and requested not to be placed upon the slate at all (on the ground that her participation in the Executive Committee should now give preference to other delegations). We thereupon favored making use of Bech's talents on Committee 1, to which he assented.

Committee 6 was the first to meet for the purpose of electing all its officers. Because of the weakness of the chairman and because of difficulty encountered before the meeting in obtaining assent for a Netherlands rapporteur, we were able to get agreement for John Read of Canada as rapporteur and he was duly elected, with Federspiel of Denmark named vice chairman as planned.

Salamanca told us on January 21 that he preferred that if Bolivia were to be given the rapporteurship of Committee 2, the choice fall to Eduardo del Portillo of his delegation. This was generally assented to.

The critical question became the problem of a vice-chairman for Committee 4. Russian assent and the assent of the other five permanent members was obtained for putting Turkey in the position. The Turkish delegation showed no enthusiasm for this assignment, and the British therefore undertook to talk further with the Turks. The British thereafter told us that the Turks would accept. After we asked the British on the morning of January 21 for confirmation of this assurance, they came to us just before lunch and stated that Turkey refused to accept. During luncheon the British tried out the idea of giving this vice chairmanship to China, Iran, or Canada, but did not obtain assent from the Soviet Union. The Committee elections came immediately after lunch. The British nominated Ethiopia for the position and we obtained for it a few supporting statements from the floor by other delegations. No other nomination was made and the Ethiopian representative on Committee 4 was duly placed in the vice chairmanship.

From time to time in the placing of names for nomination in the meetings of the respective committees we were embarrassed by the absence or tardy arrival of delegates who had agreed to place particular names in nomination. In such instances we had to make immediate alternate arrangements with other delegates and managed to be successful in each case.

The complete list of officers (see USGA/1a/15)⁶⁵ elected for the six committees follows:

Committee	Chairman	Vice Chairman	Rapporteur
1	Manuilsky Ukrainian SSR	Bech Luxembourg	Viteri Lafronte Ecuador
2	Konderski Poland	Lopez Philippines	del Portillo ⁶⁶ Bolivia

4	MacEachen Uruguay	Belata Ephrem Tewelde Medhen ⁶⁷ Ethiopia	Kerno Czechoslovakia

*Minutes by the United States Delegation of the Five-Power Informal Meeting, London, Claridge's Hotel, January 23, 1946, 11 a. m.*⁶⁸

SECRET

Present:	The Secretary	Mr. Wellington Koo
	Mr. Stettinius	M. Paul-Boncour
	Mr. Bohlen	M. Fouques Duparc
	Sir Alexander Cadogan	Mr. Vyshinsky
		Ambassador Gromyko

At Mr. Byrnes' request MR. STETTINIUS outlined the result of the informal meeting of the eleven members of the Security Council on Monday in regard to the question of the Secretary General.⁶⁹ He said that the following six names had been suggested:

Pearson
Simic
Rzymowski
Bonnet Lie

⁶⁵ Not printed.

⁶⁶ Mr. Eduardo Del Portillo, Delegate on the Bolivian Delegation.

⁶⁷ Mr. Ephrem was Ethiopian Minister to the United Kingdom and Delegate on the Ethiopian Delegation.

⁶⁹ See footnote 63, p. 163.

He said that it was understood that if no new names were received before midnight, that these six would be regarded as candidates for the position.

MR. VYSHINSKI said that it was the view of his Government that, since the site was to be in the United States, and the basic activity of the organization and many of its branches were to be in Western Europe, the Secretary General should come from a Slavic country of Eastern Europe.

THE SECRETARY said that he had previously expressed his opinion that the person selected for the job would be under obligations to be an international figure and not a representative of any country, and he therefore felt that too much emphasis should not be placed upon the geographic factor. He said he thought that the personal qualifications of the individual, should be the guiding considerations, and that, after discussing with Mr. Stettinius the various names which had been brought forth, and examining the qualifications, the United States Delegation had come to the conclusion that, of those proposed, Mr. Pearson was the most suitable.

MR. KOO said that China attached great importance to this post and thought that every effort should be made to find a most suitable candidate. He also felt that because of his experience and his objectivity, Mr. Pearson would be the best candidate.

M. BONCOUR said that he felt that geographic considerations, while important, should not be the deciding factor since the Secretary General was an international figure who was supposed to have severed his ties with his native country. He said he had mentioned Bonnet because most of the candidates had appeared to be ambassadors accredited to Washington. He said the French Delegation had no very great preference among the persons proposed, but they would have preferred to have seen a statesman rather than a diplomat, perhaps someone who had been foreign minister of his country. This would bring to the post a broader experience than that of a diplomat. He said, for example, that Eden's name had been mentioned, but that since he was not nominated, it was presumed that he was not available for the post. Lie, the Foreign Minister of Norway, would bring this experience to the post, but the drawback in his case was that he did not know French, which was one of the working languages of the organization. He repeated that the French Delegation had no strong preferences among the list proposed but would be inclined to accept any on the list which the others agreed to.

MR. BEVIN stated that Great Britain had put forth no candidate but had they put forth one, it might well have been Mr. Jebb, but after consideration, this thought had been abandoned. The British Government, while putting forward no candidate, felt that Mr. Pearson was the best of those nominated.

AMBASSADOR GROMYKO said he had already expressed the view of his Government on this point, and that, while he agreed that geography should not be the controlling factor, it nevertheless should not be lost sight of; that both the factors of personal ability and experience as well as the country of origin should be considered. He said, for example, that although the Organization would be international no matter in what country it was located, there had been great debate in the Preparatory Commission concerning the site.⁷⁰ He said he had known Mr. Pearson since 1943 and thought he was personally very well qualified for the job, but he felt that, with the site in the United States, to appoint a Canadian would cause legitimate complaint from several European countries on the ground that there was too much American influence. He said that since the specialized agency of the Organization would probably be in Western Europe and especially important meetings would take place there, plus the fact that English and French would undoubtedly remain as the working languages which meant that there would be more English and French in the Secretariat, it was only right that the Secretary General should be from an Eastern European country. It was for this reason that the Soviet Delegation proposed either Simic or Rzymowski, either of whom he felt would be personally well qualified.

THE SECRETARY said he wished to point out that the United States had in no way sought the location of the Organization in the United States. He said he mentioned this fact because he felt that the decision of the United Nations, which, incidentally, had first been proposed at San Francisco by the Soviet Delegation there, to locate the Organization in the United States should not affect other decisions.

MR. VYSHINSKI said he fully understood, but nevertheless the location of the Organization in itself did enter into the matter. He felt that the decision was correct, and he was glad that it had been done on Soviet initiative. He said, however, the Organization wherever located must have living and creative ties with all countries, and in view of the fact that its first function was the preservation of peace, it was very suitable that the Secretary General should come from one of the countries which had especially suffered during the war. While all of the United Nations had done their share, few of them had been reduced to a desert as had Yugoslavia and Poland. This fact, he felt, should be taken into consideration.

Then ensued a general discussion as to procedure, namely, whether to hold a formal meeting of the Security Council to vote on the matter, or to continue informal discussion among the members. It was finally agreed that there would be an informal meeting this afternoon among the eleven members in order to discuss additional candidates and to hear from the non-permanent members. It was finally understood that if this informal meeting failed to produce agreement, the Council would then hold a formal meeting and vote, even if the absence of unanimity among the permanent members rendered the election of a Secretary General impossible. During this discussion Mr. Bevin spoke strongly against the practice of having private meetings, which, he said, led to suspicion and uncertainty.⁷¹

Memorandum by the Principal Adviser to the United States Delegation (Hiss) to the Secretary of State

[LONDON,] January 23, 1946.

The group of Advisers on the American Delegation which has been dealing with the Court slate has met with Mr. Cohen and Mr. Walker and the following decisions have been agreed upon.

The United States will give active support to only one candidacy, that of Mr. Hackworth.

The following nine candidates have been agreed upon, leaving six to be determined. This list is also approved by the Department.

Hackworth (U.S.A.)	DeVisscher (Belgium)
McNair (U.K.)	Klaestad (Norway)
Krylov (U.S.S.R.)	Read (Canada)
Hsu Mo (China)	Zoricic (Yugoslavia)
Basdevant (France)

As to the remaining six seats the group agreed on the following principles:

1. Not more than three Latin American selections. A larger number would be disproportionate to the position occupied by this legal system. Also since it is desired to support two North American candidates (U.S. and Canada), this would give over-representation to the Western Hemisphere. These three Latin Americans will be selected from the following group of five: Podesta Costa (Argentina), Azevedo (Brazil), Parra-Perez (Venezuela), Lozano y Lozano (Colombia), Guerrero (El Salvador). The Argentine candidate, Podesta Costa, appears to have considerable support among the Latin American countries and also from the United Kingdom. We are informed that he is highly capable and that he is pro-democratic and favorable to the United States. Department officials are also interested in this candidacy and are to inform us shortly on the views of Mr. Braden. We are also awaiting the views of the Department on the other Latin American candidates before going further in making selections.

2. An additional candidate from Eastern Europe, Winiarski of Poland has been favorably mentioned by the Department, and we are awaiting further data on candidates from this region. We have not felt it wise to support either (1) Verzijl (Netherlands) who is supported by the British, or (2) Davis (South Africa) who is particularly favored by the British. The first of these selections would mean three Western European Judges in addition to France as against one for Eastern Europe (excluding U.S.S.R.). The second selection (Davis) would mean four Judges from countries representing the Anglo-American system of jurisprudence.

3. To support two candidates giving representation to the Moslem legal system and the Near and Middle Eastern geographical area. Three candidates are considered in this connection: Zafrullah Khan (India), Badawi Pasha (Egypt) and Cemil Bilsel. Further advice from the Department is being awaited before proceeding with these decisions. If it is decided to support only one of these candidates, Spiropolous of Greece might be selected for the vacancy thus created. He is a nominee of the United States National Group.

Court Slates

Mr. Hiss reported that he had circulated a memorandum on Court slates (USGA/Ia/Le Com 9)⁸⁶ and would be glad to receive any comments. He described the present picture as being one in which nine of the fifteen permanent seats on the Court were about settled with well qualified men who came from the proper judicial systems to achieve a balance. He further reported that Secretary Byrnes thought⁸⁷ that, with the exception of the case of Mr. Hackworth, the United States should not tell other states for whom to vote although the United States was announcing its own slate. Of the six places left it was expected that three would go to Latin America. The staff was now awaiting to hear from Mr. Braden⁸⁸ on the possibility of naming an Argentine judge. Senator Connally interjected that if the Delegation in London was to be controlled by Mr. Braden he was not for it. Mr. Stettinius urged that the Department slate be obtained and shown to the Delegation as quickly as possible. If there were objections they could be entered then. He asked what delayed the Department decision pointing out that the Security Council was going through its agenda rapidly. He thought that the Court would probably be before the Council on next Wednesday. He urged that the Department be wired for instructions before that time. Mr. Cohen agreed and urged that the Department be asked to send its best judgment by Monday at the latest.

Mr. Bloom asked whether the Department should not be informed regarding the Delegation's attitude on Argentina. He predicted that the United States might get into a jam if Argentina were placed on the Court slate.⁸⁹ In this he agreed with Senator Connally. Mr. Cohen pointed out that the case was peculiar because the particular Argentine candidate (Podesta Costa) was pro-democratic and pro-American. Mr. Hiss stated that the only question was whether Mr. Braden thought it was wise to vote for Argentina. He pointed out that the Argentine candidate is supported unanimously by Latin American states and he would receive support elsewhere. Mr. Bloom reiterated that the support for Argentina would cause a lot of trouble at home.

Mr. Dulles observed that if he had any responsibility in choosing individual judges and if he had to account at home for his choice then he would have to consider the matter quite carefully and at greater length. He stated he would prefer to have this matter handled on the basis of instructions from the President and the Department of State. Hr. Hackworth stated that he thought the matter was so important that no Delegate should follow instructions blindly because the Statute specifies that judges are to be elected on the basis of qualifications, not nationality. He thought Mr. Dulles should exercise his own judgment.

Mr. Stettinius pointed out that any Delegate could offer advice to him as head of the Delegation but he was not required to take such advice. He said that any Delegate could feel a responsibility but he himself had the responsibility of casting the vote. Mr. Walker said that he was unable to find information regarding the qualifications of the various judges although he had watched the matter carefully. He stated that he would adopt the position that he took the recommendation of the State Department. Mr. Dulles pointed out that both he and Mr. Walker were members of the Bar and that they might be called to account by their Bar Associations when they returned home to explain their vote. Mr. Dulles reiterated that he preferred that the State Department and the President take the sole responsibility for selecting the judges. Otherwise he thought the Delegation must take more time. Mr. Bloom stated that at home people would look at the nationality of the judges chosen rather than at their individual qualifications. Senator Connally stated that the country knows that the United States has been kicking Argentina around and that therefore if an Argentine were elected as a judge it would be taken for granted that he was a member of the other crowd. He stated that in any case it would be hard to explain such a vote. It was agreed that a wire should be sent to the Department by Mr. Hiss asking that the slate for the Court be in the hands of the Delegation by Monday.

Minutes of the Meeting of the United States Delegation (Executive Session), Held at London, Claridge's Hotel, January 26, 1946, 3:00 p. m.

[Here follow list of names of persons (16) present, and preliminary remarks by Mr. Stettinius about the progress of the work of the General Assembly and its Committees.]

Mr. Stettinius reminded the group that Item 7 of the Security Council agenda concerned the Council's recommendation to the General Assembly of a candidate for Secretary General. He said there had been a pause of two days and nights on this question, that it was necessary to get ahead but that as a result of the discussion in yesterday's Delegation meeting he needed to know exactly what the position of the Delegation on this question was and what he should do.

Mr. Stettinius said that he had talked with the Secretary about this matter immediately before the latter left London⁹⁰ and that it had been agreed that:

1. Mr. Pearson of Canada was the first choice of the United States and that the Delegation should hold out for him as long as there was hope of his nomination by the Security Council;
2. If and when it became clear that the nomination of Mr. Pearson was not possible, the second choice of the United States should be Mr. Lie of Norway; and
3. If and when it developed that Mr. Lie could not be nominated, the third choice of the United States should be Mr. Wellington Koo of China.

⁹⁰ Secretary Byrnes left London to return to the United States on January 25.

Mr. Cohen agreed that this had been the understanding.

Mr. Stettinius said that the Secretary had told him that he (the Secretary) had talked with Senator Vandenberg concerning this matter and that the Senator had said he would not object to voting for Lie. Mr. Stettinius said, however, that recalling Senator Vandenberg's statement on this subject at yesterday morning's Delegation meeting, he thought that the whole matter needed clarification. Mr. Stettinius also recalled the statements of Mr. Dulles and Mr. Walker at yesterday's meeting.⁹¹

Referring to the Delegation discussion of the previous morning, Mr. Bohlen said he wished to suggest that in his opinion neither Mr. Lie nor his native country of Norway should be considered as falling within the Russian sphere of influence. Mr. Bohlen observed that the question was not necessarily one of geographical proximity. He said that the only overt pressure that Russia could influence would be through taking action against Norway and this was not to be thought of as a likely probability. He observed that the USSR was not in a position to exercise direct influence on the Norwegian Government itself and that the situation was therefore quite different than if, for example, the Foreign Minister of Poland were to be chosen as Secretary General. Mr. Bohlen said that it was his understanding that Mr. Lie resented any assumption that he was under Russian influence and that Mr. Lie had also stated that he had not been approached by the USSR Delegation on the subject of the Secretary Generalship. Mr. Bohlen also pointed out that the situation would be quite different in the case of a Yugoslav Secretary General but that Norway would not be under USSR influence as much as Czechoslovakia, for example, and indeed the latter was not in the USSR network.

⁹¹ A marked difference of opinion had been registered at the January 25 meeting of the Delegation. This was whether agreement had been reached between the Delegation and Secretary Byrnes on the question of whom the United States would support for the Secretary Generalship, specifically whether the United States should back Mr. Lie of Norway if the candidacy of Mr. Pearson appeared lost. Senator Vandenberg and Mr. Dulles, in effect, voiced opposition to Mr. Lie, holding that "Mr. Lie, as a citizen of Norway located near the Soviet Union, could not be a free agent and would not dare to be a free agent. . . . Mr. Walker said that he did not think the United States Delegation should support Mr. Lie if Senator Vandenberg and Mr. Dulles were strongly opposed to him. . . . Mr. Stettinius observed that Mr. Lie had been the second choice of Secretary Byrnes and that at the last meeting of the Delegation Mr. Stettinius had been authorized to vote for Mr. Lie in case of an emergency. . . ." (Minutes of Meeting of the U.S. Delegation (Executive Session), London, January 25, 1946, document USGA/1a/Del. Min./Exec/3 (Chr), IO Files) Concerning Mr. Stettinius' reference to the last meeting of the Delegation, no Delegation minutes have been found in the Department's files for the period when Secretary Byrnes was in London (January 8-25). An entry in the January 23 minutes of a meeting of the executive and political officers of the Delegation suggests that records may not have been kept, reading, "It was noted with regret that records of certain informal meetings held by members of the Delegation and the meetings of the Delegation itself were not being kept." (IO Files, document USGA/1a/Exec Off/8)

Mrs. Roosevelt remarked that she and Mr. Townsend had arrived at the same conclusions yesterday. She said that in the course of a luncheon conversation with Mr. Lie yesterday she deduced that Mr. Lie was trying to indicate his independence although he did not directly refer to the subject. Mrs. Roosevelt said that Mr. Townsend had independently formed the same impression. Mrs. Roosevelt observed that obviously if Russia wanted to move against Norway any Norwegian, as Secretary General of the organization, would be in a difficult position. But she observed that the same would be true in the case of China. Mrs. Roosevelt added that with United States backing, Norway would be much less apt to fall into the Russian orbit than without such backing.

Mr. Townsend added that he had asked Mr. Lie directly how Mr. Lie thought the question of Secretary Generalship was going and that Mr. Lie had also indicated then that he felt he should be considered as independent of USSR influence. Mr. Bohlen said that Mr. Lie had put the same thought in stronger language the night before.

Mr. Stettinius said he should tell the Delegation that the French Delegation has recently told the Chinese that they (the French) have reason to believe that USSR support will shift to Masaryk⁹² and that then the USSR Delegation, at the final stage, will give the impression that it reluctantly will accept Lie but only if someone else sponsors him. It was pointed out that whereas Mr. Masaryk had said earlier that he was not available for Secretary General he was now coming around to the position that he would be available and that he might even take an Assistant Secretary Generalship. Mr. Dulles said that a couple of weeks ago he had indicated he would accept the latter.

Senator Connally said he would prefer Lie to Masaryk and observed that any one selected will be charged with being under the influence of one of the great powers.

Mr. Stettinius called on Mr. Pasvolsky for his opinion, observing that Mr. Pasvolsky had given a great deal of thought to this subject over a long period. Mr. Pasvolsky said he thought the contest had narrowed itself to Mr. Lie and Mr. Pearson. . . . Mr. Pasvolsky recalled that Mr. Gromyko had told him that he would prefer a Slav for the position and Mr. Pasvolsky said that unfortunately the question of the geographic area from which the Secretary General comes was bound to arise. He recalled also that Mr. Bevin had said that he attached no importance to geography but that Canada was, after all, halfway between the danger spots of Europe and the Far East. Mr. Pasvolsky observed that he himself would prefer Mr. Bruce of Australia to Mr. Koo of China. Mr. Stettinius said he thought Mr. Victor Hoo of China better than Bruce. It was generally felt, however, that the time was past for considering new names.

Mrs. Roosevelt declared she was in favor of sticking to the line that the United States Delegation had taken. . . .

Mr. Pasvolsky said he felt that the only real question was that of who would propose Mr. Lie in case of a deadlock on Mr. Pearson. Mr. Pasvolsky said he felt that the United States should not propose Mr. Lie.

Senator Vandenberg said he was not impressed with what Mr. Lie himself had to say about his independence and Norway's position. The Senator remarked that the more Mr. Lie, as a candidate, had to say on this subject the less impressed he was. He thought it was inevitable that if Mr. Lie were elected the general impression would be that the USSR candidate for the General Assembly who had been defeated in that election actually was getting a better job. He said he would prefer Mr. Koo to Mr. Lie since he did not doubt but that China would turn to the United States in case of action against China by Russia. Mr. Bohlen pointed out that Mr. Lie as a longtime Socialist was not likely to be under Communist influence.

Senator Vandenberg asked why it should be assumed that Mr. Pearson could not be elected. Mr. Cohen said that the basic reason lay in the need for unanimity of the great powers on this subject under the voting rules of the Security Council where the nomination would be made. He said that rightly or wrongly the Russians might well take the counterpart of the views being expressed at this meeting—they might well take the position that any Anglo-Saxon would be influenced by the United States. Senator Vandenberg said he thought the Russians would be correct in that. Mr. Cohen continued that the search was for a compromise and doubted that it would be possible to find a country that would better satisfy both the USSR and the United States than Norway.

Mr. Pasvolsky said that both the United States Delegation and the USSR probably were wrong in ascribing too much importance to the job of Secretary General. He said the Russians ascribed too much political importance to the job and that the United States' viewpoint was wrong in ascribing too much political importance to the choice of a man for the job. He continued that it should be possible to find better candidates among the Big Five than Mr. Koo if the understanding were to be broken that no Big Five national should be a candidate. He said, however, that among the smaller powers only Mr. Pearson and Mr. Lie seem possible, and that the United States group should revise its views on the political importance of this action. He said that from a geographical standpoint since the site was in the United States it was logical to think that the Secretary General should be from Europe. He continued that he was not impressed with Senator Vandenberg's argument that any Secretary General would operate with his country as a hostage. He said that the most serious influence the Secretary General might have would be to affect the speed of the Security Council action. He said, however, that under the rules of procedure likely to be agreed to no individual could hold up a meeting of the Council since any member could request that a meeting be held. Mr. Pasvolsky said he attached more importance to the individual qualities of the Secretary General, his talent for administration, for example. He said that while Mr. Lie had a poor reputation as an administrator that would not be too much of a handicap if the rest of the Secretariat was good enough.

Senator Vandenberg said he thought that rather than overrating the post of Secretary General, the group may have underrated it. He said that he thought the trend of events in Committee 5 indicated that professional European career diplomats expected to make a good thing of employment in the Secretariat. Mr. Pasvolsky said that this impressed him the more with the need to have an able American for Assistant Secretary General in charge of administration and Senator Vandenberg said he thought that might well be.

Senator Connally suggested that the United States Delegation ought to inform Mr. Lie of its position concerning his candidacy, but warned that it should be tactfully done lest too much United States enthusiasm might discourage Russian support of Mr. Lie. Senator Connally said he doubted if the United States could secure the election of Mr. Pearson because of the United States having been selected for this permanent site. He observed that he was therefore against having the site in the United States because it will be repeatedly brought up as an argument for not accepting United States candidates for various positions. He continued that he thought Mr. Lie was the only possibility on the horizon. . . .

Mrs. Roosevelt excused herself from the meeting saying that she felt Mr. Lie was satisfactory.

Senator Connally continued that he was more concerned about USSR influence with Mr. Koo than with Mr. Lie.

Mr. Walker asked Mr. Stettinius if the latter had the impression as a result of yesterday's Delegation meeting, that Mr. Walker was against Mr. Lie. In this connection Mr. Walker said that his remarks at yesterday's meeting were directed rather to the need for unanimity within the Delegation. It was observed that it would almost be a case for the use of the veto by the United States if the USSR insisted upon a Yugoslav for Secretary General and that Russia might feel the same way about a Canadian candidate. Mr. Walker continued that he did not know Norwegian politics but by tradition no country was more independent. He could not therefore believe that Russia would dominate Mr. Lie. However, he did not want to return to the United States with two or three members of the Delegation against the Delegation's choice for Secretary General and recalled that on the way over to London the need for unanimity in the Delegation had been stressed. He also stated that he had been unimpressed with Mr. Koo's work as presiding officer today and felt there was a greater danger from Russian influence being exerted on a Chinese Secretary General than on a Norwegian in the same post.

Mr. Stevenson said he was certain that Russia would accept Mr. Lie. He said that this was certain to be the case although the Russians have consistently stressed the fact that the choice should be from Eastern Europe. He said that in the recent meeting with Mr. Vyshinsky and Mr. Gromyko they had contended for Eastern Europe. Mr. Stevenson said, however, he wondered what would happen if the United States shifted from Pearson to Lie and the latter did not prove acceptable.

Mr. Bohlen asked how firm Mr. Koo was as the third United States choice. Mr. Stettinius said that after today's discussion concerning Mr. Koo he would take the responsibility for dropping him from the United States list. He said that the Secretary had merely agreed to the suggestion of Mr. Koo as third choice and did not feel strongly on the point. Mr. Stettinius said that it was therefore understood that Mr. Koo was dropped and the United States had no third candidate. He said it further was clear that the United States did not want a Secretary General from the Balkans or Eastern Europe nor from France. Senator Connally said that van Kleffens would suit him. Mr. Stettinius said he did not find van Kleffens acceptable and that the choice was therefore down to Mr. Lie and Mr. Pearson and he doubted if there was any chance to elect the latter. He said it was then a question of whether to take Mr. Lie with pleasure or hold out for Pearson and lose.

Mr. Stevenson said he agreed with the thoughts expressed earlier by Mr. Bohlen and Mrs. Roosevelt concerning Mr. Lie but said it ought to be understood that if Mr. Lie were elected it would look like a Russian victory. He said the Delegation should not delude itself that the United States would get credit for Mr. Lie's election. He said in fact there was little to be salvaged and that the public impression would be that the USSR's defeated candidate for the Presidency of the General Assembly won the Secretary Generalship instead.

Mr. Cohen said he saw no reason for putting a less favorable light on the situation than the facts warranted. He recalled that Mr. Lie had first been put up as a candidate for the Presidency of the General Assembly by the United States. Now our first choice for Secretary General would be Mr. Pearson but with the veto in prospect it was necessary to find a compromise candidate. He saw no reason why Mr. Lie was not a logical compromise and that the result would then be that we had neither won a victory nor suffered a defeat. Senator Connally added that it was well known that Russia's first choice was Mr. Simic. It was commented that this first choice had shifted to the Foreign Minister of Poland, Wincenty Rzymowski.

Mr. Cohen continued that in the United States Norway was thought of as having the American type of democracy and that in a crisis Norway might well turn to the United States.

Mr. Dulles said that while he did not know the facts he doubted if the United States had really fought for Pearson; he also did not know whether Russia would really veto Mr. Pearson. Mr. Stettinius said there had already been two informal votes at the 4:30 meetings in the rooms of Mr. Makin of Australia, in which all Delegations represented on the Security Council had spoken. There was, of course, no public knowledge of the veto. Mr. Stettinius continued that as a result of talking with the Secretary before the latter left they had hoped to get a clear vote in one of these meetings but that Australia had upset the plan by opening discussion of various candidates.

Mr. Pasvolsky said that six votes were all that could now be rounded up for Mr. Pearson. Mr. Stevenson said he thought it would be possible to get a 9 to 2 vote in favor of Mr. Pearson.

Mr. Walker asked why anyone thought it necessary to defeat the USSR in this instance and become a dominating force.

Mr. Dulles said he thought the United States' standing would be improved if the United States picked a candidate and fought for him. Mr. Stettinius said he did not know how the United States could have fought any harder, that everything had been done but to ask for a public vote; Mr. Pasvolsky added that the United States had even asked for that.

Mr. Dulles said he had known Mr. Lie for four or five years and had a high regard for him as a person. He felt there was no Russian influence exercised on Mr. Lie personally but Mr. Dulles observed that Mr. Lie had once told him that he had cast a vote because of the presence of Russian troops on Norway's border. Mr. Dulles said the United States did not use its influence in the same way but that in any event he agreed with Mr. Bohlen that Norway was not in the USSR zone and probably would not be penetrated; however, Norway could be placed in an awkward position with sudden deterioration in her trade, finance, et cetera, whereas the USSR could not, for example, exert such serious influence on Canada or on the Netherlands. Mr. Dulles said he thought it was an extremely important factor that the Secretary General would control every appointment to the Secretariat for five years and further that he would be the only individual who could bring situations likely to disturb the peace to the attention of the Security Council. Mr. Pasvolsky pointed out that this provision of the Charter was only for convenience in bringing situations involving non-members to the attention of the Council and that too much importance should not be attached to it.

Senator Connally inquired who could oust the Secretary General under the Charter. Mr. Pasvolsky said there was no provision for this step. Mr. Stettinius pointed out that the Secretary General obviously would go if the majority wanted him to.

Mr. Stettinius said it was clear that Mr. Pearson was the first choice of the Delegation. He then asked whether if Mr. Pearson were vetoed by the Russians privately or publicly, the Delegation should stand by the instructions from the Secretary which Mr. Stettinius outlined earlier in the meeting, making Mr. Lie the second choice of the Delegation, or whether the Delegation should get in touch with the President and the Secretary for new instructions.

Mr. Dulles said he preferred van Kleffens to Lie as more nearly a free agent. Mr. Stettinius said he was against Mr. van Kleffens because of his temperament and the condition of his health.

Mr. Dulles and Mr. Stevenson thought van Kleffens also would be vetoed by Russia and Mr. Dulles said he thought Lie was the USSR candidate from the start. Mr. Stevenson said that in his talks with Mr. Gromyko concerning the Presidency of the Preparatory Commission, Mr. Gromyko made it clear that they looked cordially upon Mr. Lie but thought Poland should have the honor. In subsequent talks Mr. Gromyko had always put emphasis on Eastern Europe but Mr. Stevenson thought he would accept Mr. Lie. . . .

Mr. Stettinius asked if anyone had any further names to suggest.

Mr. Dulles again referred to van Kleffens and said that if the United States was to start by looking for someone acceptable to the USSR the United States might just as well go to the Russians in the first instance and accept their choice. He said he thought the United States should not assume that a veto will be exercised on this issue and doubted if the USSR would use it. Mr. Cohen said he did not like to contemplate the prospect of the veto but after having suggested a candidate and having found he was not likely to be accepted he thought the best course was to settle upon a candidate who was agreeable to both the United States and the USSR. Mr. Stevenson suggested the name of Mr. Evatt of Australia. Mr. Bloom thought he would not be suitable.

Mr. Walker said he thought it might be necessary to stay with Mr. Pearson since there did not appear to be general agreement in the Delegation.

Mr. Dulles said he was prepared to go along with the position of having Mr. Pearson as the first choice and Mr. Lie as the second and would take no public position against it. He said he thought this was a question of individual judgment and not an issue of principle and that it was upon issues of principle that he wanted to be free to disagree.

Mr. Pasvolsky outlined the positions of the members of the Security Council as of Wednesday evening. He said the United States and Brazil were unequivocally for Pearson. China favored Pearson and had given a long statement of its reasons. Egypt had favored Pearson but felt that Lie was a very adequate second choice. France favored anyone on whom the other members of the Big Five could agree, had dropped Bonnet, and expressed a personal preference for van Kleffens. The Netherlands payed tribute to both Pearson and Lie on even grounds. Australia favored Lie as first choice and Pearson as second. Russia favored the Polish Foreign Minister, Wincenty Rzymowski, as first choice and Simic of Yugoslavia as second. Poland agreed with Russia and also thought the selection was a political matter. Concerning the British position, Mr. Bevin had expressed a personal preference for Mr. Jebb, but would be happy, however, with Mr. Pearson. Mexico had dodged the issue and said the big powers should agree and the smaller powers would then make up their minds. Egypt had said the big powers should agree on two or three acceptable candidates.

Mr. Pasvolsky reiterated that if Lie is the ultimate choice his candidacy should come not from the United States but from some other nation and that if the inclination were toward Mr. Lie we should agree. However, at the next discussion with Security Council members we should begin by standing firm for Mr. Pearson.

Mr. Dulles thought it would be possible to get a 9 to 2 vote and Mr. Stevenson added that he felt the United States had not worked hard enough for it. Mr. Pasvolsky thought it would be possible to get 7 votes for Pearson. Mr. Stevenson said that he thought much more could be done with Mexico and that Mr. Nervo had only been told that we were for Pearson without being definitely urged to take the same position.

Mr. Pasvolsky said the real position was that the Russians had vetoed Mr. Pearson and that the United States had vetoed both Rzymowski, Polish Foreign Minister, and Simic of Yugoslavia. He said he thought the British would stand with the United States in vetoing both Rzymowski and Simic.

Senator Vandenberg said that Mr. Stettinius had his instructions and that the only question Senator Vandenberg could see was how long to stand by Mr. Pearson. Mr. Stettinius replied that after yesterday's Delegation meeting he had not felt that the Delegation's position was clear.

Mr. Stettinius asked if any member of the Delegation objected to Mr. Lie if the United States was unable to push through the election of Mr. Pearson. Senator Vandenberg said he thought it was settled but Mr. Stettinius said he did not feel the position was completely clear.

Senator Vandenberg then said his position was the same as Mr. Dulles had expressed somewhat earlier when Mr. Dulles had said that he did not expect to take a public stand against Mr. Lie. Senator Vandenberg said, however, that he would go down with Pearson and when the fight was clearly lost he would go to Lie but that he agreed with Mr. Stevenson that the United States should give all possible effort to the fight for Pearson.

Mr. Pasvolsky suggested that the question should be brought to a vote and Mr. Dulles suggested that we should be sure it was a 9 to 2 vote. Mr. Pasvolsky said a vote might be possible at the next Big Five meetings but felt that the smaller nations should not be put on the spot by requesting them to vote. Mr. Stevenson said he thought that the support of France could be gained for Pearson but Mr. Stettinius said that Mr. Boncour was not likely to take a strong position in view of the current French political crisis.

Mr. Cohen said he thought it was one thing for the United States to vote for Mr. Pearson and another to bring great pressure on others to do the same. He thought the latter course might make agreement on the second choice more difficult and felt that an appeal but no high pressure would be the best course in favor of Pearson.

Mr. Stettinius asked Senator Vandenberg and Mr. Dulles if they would be satisfied if the United States was able to bring the question to a vote, tell friends of the United States how we expected to vote, and if defeated to vote then for Mr. Lie. Senator Vandenberg said he saw no alternative. Mr. Dulles said he thought that would be satisfactory and that while he would have made a tougher fight that fight was not made, and he felt the United States was not going to make an all-out fight for Mr. Pearson. Mr. Pasvolsky said he thought that had been done and Mr. Dulles said he did not see how it could have been done with Mexico still on the sidelines. Mr. Stevenson observed that Mexico had suggested to him earlier that they would like to have an Assistant Secretary Generalship and that he had said that was for future decision. Mr. Dulles asked if some trading could be done with the USSR who wanted an Assistant Secretary Generalship for political and security affairs as he understood it.

Mr. Townsend said he felt that if the United States could not succeed in getting Mr. Pearson elected the Delegation should then vote for Lie and suggested that the United States might talk in advance to Mr. Lie in terms of having a United States national appointed as an Assistant Secretary General. Mr. Stettinius and Mr. Pasvolsky agreed that the United States should have the Assistant Secretary Generalship for administration.

Mr. Stettinius then asked Senator Vandenberg if he was satisfied. Senator Vandenberg replied that "satisfied" was not the right word but that he could not think of the word he wanted. Mr. Stettinius then asked if he objected; Senator Vandenberg did not reply. He said there should be no suggestion of a subsequent partisan political position that would differ from that which had been outlined by Mr. Stettinius.

Mr. Stettinius then stated that he would stand by Pearson and vote for him, and when the break came would shift to Lie.

Mr. Bohlen then suggested that the greater the United States success in lining up votes for Mr. Pearson, the greater would be the appearance of USSR victory for Mr. Lie after Mr. Pearson had failed of nomination.

Mr. Stettinius said he understood the position of the Delegation and that this would be the last meeting on this subject. He would, however, report progress.

Mr. Dulles said that was satisfactory.

Mr. Stettinius said the next Delegation meeting would be at 9:30 Monday morning.

The meeting was convened at the suggestion of Mr. Stettinius to discuss Secretary General and he opened the meeting with a reminder that six names were still in contemplation since the last meeting,⁹⁴ namely, Simic, Rzymowski, Pearson, Lie, Van Kleffens and Bonnet. He suggested that each representative now express himself candidly.

Wellington Koo asked if other names could be offered.

Mr. Stettinius asked the Soviet representatives what their position was since consulting their government. Vyshinsky replied that they had consulted their government and would no longer insist on Simic or Rzymowski but could not accept Pearson.

At this moment the name of Eden was mentioned briefly but I am not sure whether it was suggested by Boncour or someone else. Stettinius said that discussion of Eden raised the question of whether the Secretary General should be a national of one of the great powers and asked for reactions to Lie of Norway.

Boncour was opposed to Lie on the ground that he did not speak

⁹⁴ Refers apparently to the meeting held at Claridge's Hotel, January 23, 11 a.m.; see p. 166.

French. Vyshinsky replied that he was ready to think over the proposal of Lie. Bevin stated that he would have to consult his government and there was some conversation about Lie's good English and the rapidity with which he had learned it. Koo stated that he had previously intimated that if we could not agree on Pearson, he would be willing to accept Lie. Vyshinsky added that he felt he also could accept Lie on his own responsibility. Boncour stated that he would also join in supporting Lie if Lie would accept.

Mr. Stettinius stated that Mr. Lie's Government had intimated that if drafted for this post he would be able to accept in spite of his importance to Norway as Foreign Minister.

Bevin stated that he would not veto the selection of Lie but for the present he was tied by a Cabinet decision and would consult his government Tuesday morning.

Gromyko stated that they would also ask their government to accept Lie as a compromise.

Boncour stated that Bidault would not be here until Wednesday and that he would ask his government by telegraph or telephone.

Vyshinsky stated that on his own responsibility he was now prepared to vote for Lie.

There ensued a discussion as to whether or not the eleven members of the Security Council should be summoned in a formal or informal meeting and advised of the agreement among the five, and when. It was agreed that upon receipt of confirmation from Bevin and Boncour an informal meeting of the eleven members of the Security Council should be held on Tuesday evening, if possible, and the matter presented formally to the Security Council meeting on Wednesday.

It was also agreed that pending agreement by the French and British governments nothing whatever should be given to the press.⁹⁵

[LONDON,] 31 January 1946.

Attached is a telegram ⁹⁶ just received containing instructions from the President as to candidates for the Court whom the Delegation should support.

⁹⁶ For content, see infra.

I think you should now feel perfectly free to inform other delegations of our entire slate along the lines we have previously discussed, i.e., that we are actively supporting only Mr. Hackworth and that as to the other candidates for whom we will vote, we are, of course, glad to notify other delegations of our plans but we are not actively campaigning for any of the other candidates on our list.

Moreover, in the light of prior instructions from the Department, we should in communicating our list to the other delegations say the following with respect to Podesta Costa:

We regard him as a jurist of highest eminence, and also as an outstanding advocate of the principles of law and democracy. We should make it plain that there are no political implications in our choice of Podesta Costa.

The delegation's policy has been to inform the press, after the election, of candidates whom we have supported. I think that the same statement with respect to Podesta Costa noted above should be included in any statement we make to the press or other interested parties.

Court Slates

At the request of Senator Connally, who was presiding, Mr. Hiss read a telegram from the Department from Secretary Byrnes to Mr. Stettinius reporting that the President had stated he would be glad to have the Delegation determine whom they should support for election to the International Court of Justice. However, as the Delegation asked for instructions, he instructed that the Delegates vote for the following: Zoricic, Azvedo, Hsu, Klaestad, Krylov, Badawi, Basdevant, Winiarski, McNair, DeVisscher, Hackworth, Podesta Costa, Parra Perez, Read, Spiropolous. In the event that a second ballot is required, the telegram continued, it would be impossible for the President to know who the remaining candidates were and therefore he authorized Mr. Stettinius to exercise his discretion after the Delegates had been consulted.

Mr. Stevenson said that Mr. Zuleta (Colombia), who professed to be speaking for all the Latin American countries, had called on him the previous day and had shown considerable annoyance that the United States would not support four Latin Americans for the International Court of Justice bench. Mr. Zuleta had talked about going to the Russians in order to secure votes for the candidates. However, he and Mr. Stevenson had parted friends and Mr. Stevenson had found that some other Latin American states did not share Mr. Zuleta's views. Mr. Hiss pointed out that the Permanent Court of International Justice had had three Latin American judges.

Mr. Hackworth reported that Mr. Krylov (USSR) and Mr. Beckett (UK) had asked him for the American Court slate. He inquired whether he was free to give it out now. Mr. Stevenson expressed the opinion that the list had to be made available. Mr. Hiss recalled that it had been agreed that the United States should campaign only for Mr. Hackworth and that the list should be made known. Senator Connally inquired whether there was any embarrassment because several states had suggested Judge Manley Hudson⁹⁷ rather than Mr. Hackworth. Mr. Hiss said that there was no embarrassment and that the position of the United States in favor of Mr. Hackworth had been explained. Mr. Hiss thought that the problems would arise on how many judges should be elected from the various geographical areas. He said he thought that members of the Delegation were free to say what the United States slate was, if they were asked. It should be made clear that a vote was to be cast for Podesta Costa because he was a noted jurist with a wide experience in law and was a firm supporter of democracy. Mr. Hackworth expressed the opinion that the nomination of Podesta Costa was going to raise trouble whatever explanation was made as to why the United States was voting for a man not from a democratic country. Mr. Bloom concurred, stating that he thought that the nomination was wrong. He thought that the American people would not believe anything except that the Government was doing the same old thing with Argentina. Mr. Hiss pointed out that the principle of election to the Court was on the basis of personal competency, not national representation. He stated that he thought that the information should be given out only to other Delegations that asked for it, but not to the press at the present moment. Mr. Hackworth expressed the opinion that the newspapermen would soon get hold of the story from the Delegations to which it was given. The fact that the United States was going to support Podesta Costa would then reach the newspapers ahead of the official American explanation.

⁹⁷ Eminent legal scholar and publicist.

Senator Connally inquired whether the chief alibi was not that the Latin American states wanted Podesta Costa. Mr. Hiss stated that he thought the chief reason for the United States support was that Podesta Costa was thought an outstanding jurist by those who know him. Mr. Stevenson said he thought the Delegation should know that Podesta Costa had twice been offered the post of Minister of Foreign Affairs by the Perón Government and had twice refused. Mrs. Roosevelt inquired whether the Delegation was to take any cognizance of what was being said about Argentina and asked whether anything was to be done about the question at this session. Mr. Bloom said that he was opposed to the choice of an Argentinian and felt very strongly that the people at home would not like it. Senator Connally expressed the opinion that not one person in fifty would know who the judges were for they did not even know the names of their own county judges. Mr. McDermott noted that there were rumors on the AP ticker of a revolution in Argentina.

Court Slate

Mr. Walker said that the United States slate of fifteen judges had been discussed with representatives of the United Kingdom and the USSR and that there was general agreement on twelve candidates on our slates. He said the USSR did not agree with our candidates from Venezuela, Greece, or Argentina but that they had not yet given us three substitute names. He thought the USSR might ultimately agree to Podesta Costa of Argentina, but they wanted very much to have a candidate from Mexico instead of Venezuela and might prefer to have four Latin American judges in order to get a Mexican member. He said that the United Kingdom wanted to replace Brazil with El Salvador and probably substitute Greece for South Africa although they would not insist on the latter change. He said the United Kingdom preferred a judge from India instead of Poland and wanted a Moslem.

Mr. Pasvolsky observed that the USSR had been making a strong political play for support of Mexico. He said that the representative from Mexico in the Security Council the previous night was one of the United States' "worst enemies". Mr. Dulles said that Mexico was "playing" less and less with the United States and more and more with the USSR. Senator Vandenberg said that Parra Perez of Venezuela was the best man on the United States list of candidates.⁹⁸

*Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs (Hiss) to the Acting Secretary of State (Acheson)*⁹⁹

[WASHINGTON,] August 6, 1946.

Subject: U.S. Slates for Election of Members of Security Council, Economic and Social Council, and Trusteeship Council.

THE PROBLEM

At the second part of the first session of the General Assembly which will be convened on September 23, 1946, it will be necessary to elect three states to non-permanent membership on the Security Council.

⁹⁸ For General Assembly proceedings regarding the election by the Assembly of the judges of the International Court on February 6, see GA(I/1), Plenary, pp. 340 ff.

"It is hoped that this memorandum can be discussed in the meeting in your office at 9:30 on Wednesday, August 7, so that it will be available for distribution in the Department and for transmission to Mr. Johnson [Herschel V. Johnson, Acting United States Representative at the United Nations] in New York.

"It is felt that, in the circumstances, any slate prepared now may need to be modified in the light of later developments in actual negotiations just preceding the General Assembly. Accordingly, as a supplement to the attached memorandum, the Membership Team is preparing possible alternative choices." (501.BB/8-646) See memorandum of September 24, p. 197.

Departmental action on the slates question had begun on June 5, at which time the Department's United Nations Liaison Committee had agreed that the Committee's working team on membership questions should have its terms of reference broadened "to consider the entire problem of slates, to prepare background papers, and to formulate policy recommendations in this regard." (Extract from Minutes of Meeting of UNLC, June 5, 1946, File No. 501.BB/6-546) At least six drafts of this paper were prepared between the inception of the project and the final memorandum of August 6; these are scattered throughout several folders in RSC Lot File, 55-D324, Box 10100.

This memorandum was approved by Acting Secretary Acheson on August 15 (memorandum by Durward V. Sandifer, Chief of the Division of International Organization Affairs, to Miss Dorothy Fosdick of the division, August 20, File No. 501.BB/8-2046). It was then set up as a Departmental position paper for the use of the U.S. Delegation.

cil, and six states to the Economic and Social Council, to replace states whose membership will expire in January 1947. If it is possible to establish the Trusteeship Council, it may also be necessary to elect one or more states to membership thereon, in order to attain an equal division between states which administer trust territories and states which do not, in accordance with Article 86 of the Charter. (For present composition of these Councils, see Table, page 3.)^{99a}

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. It is recommended that the United States slate for non-permanent membership on the Security Council be Belgium, Colombia, and Syria.

2. It is recommended that the United States slate for election to the Economic and Social Council be the Netherlands, New Zealand, Poland or the Byelorussian SSR, Uruguay, Turkey, and the United States.

3. If an election to the Trusteeship Council should be required, it is recommended that the United States slate be Egypt, Denmark and the Philippines, in the order named.

4. It is recommended that no commitments for United States support for election to these Councils be made to the representatives of any foreign countries prior to September 5, 1946 and that, whenever possible, commitments be avoided until the United States Delegation to the General Assembly reaches New York. It is further recommended that if such representatives should approach the Department seeking United States support, the Officers concerned should respond in accordance with the following formula:

(a) In answer to all inquiries, it should be emphasized that no final decisions have been made, and that they will probably not be taken until the Delegation reaches New York.

(b) If an approach is made by a representative of a country which the Department plans to support, a statement may be made to the effect that the United States is giving serious consideration to its candidacy.

(c) If an approach is made by a country whose candidacy the United States would definitely oppose, its representative should be informed that there is no present prospect of support for it.

It is further recommended that, unless special circumstances suggest the desirability of a contrary course in a particular case, states which may be admitted to membership in the United Nations at the forthcoming meeting of the General Assembly not be considered for election to these Councils at this time.

DISCUSSION

1. Security Council

Under Article 23 of the Charter, the General Assembly each year elects three non-permanent members to the Security Council for a term of two years, "due regard being specially paid, in the first instance to the contribution of Members of the United Nations to the maintenance of international peace and security and to the other purposes of the Organization, and also to equitable geographical distribution." A retiring member is not eligible for immediate re-election.

Subject to the condition that members be capable of making an important contribution to the maintenance of international peace, the Department, on the basis of the present membership of the United Nations, has considered it desirable to include among the six non-permanent members of the Security Council :

- One member of the British Commonwealth
 - One country from Eastern and Central Europe
 - One country from Northern, Western and Southern Europe
 - Two countries from the other American Republics
 - One country from the Near East and Africa
- (SC-171/8, November 15, 1945).¹

It is to be noted that the above proposed categories provide for appropriate current representation of the Pacific-Far Eastern area in as much as China is a permanent member of the Security Council and Australia by virtue of its election last January to a two-year membership will be a member of the Council during the next year.

This distribution was attained in the elections held at London last January, when Egypt, Mexico, The Netherlands, Australia, Brazil and Poland were chosen as non-permanent members of the Security Council. The first three of these states will retire from the Security Council, in January 1947; Australia, Brazil and Poland will continue to serve for another year.

If the existing balance among the non-permanent members is to be retained, Egypt, Mexico and The Netherlands must be replaced by a Near Eastern or African State, a Latin American State and a Western European State.

Turkey, though originally favored by the Department for the Security Council at this election, has expressed a preference, for membership on the Economic and Social Council. At the same time Syria, which we had preferred for ECOSOC, is apparently the Arab League's candidate for the Security Council. It seems desirable to support this exchange of candidacies between the two countries.

Colombia was similarly slated as a replacement for Mexico, and no change in this selection is recommended. Colombia is favored as a matter of preference, rather than pursuant to commitment, since the United States' vote for Colombia at the Economic and Social Council election last January discharged any previous commitment.

Belgium is regarded as the logical successor to The Netherlands. Although Belgium will retain a seat on the Economic and Social Council for two more years, it is nevertheless considered more desirable to support it at this time for election to the Security Council than Norway, Denmark, or Luxembourg, the other eligible Western European States which are now Members of the United Nations.

2. Economic and Social Council

Under Article 61 of the Charter, the General Assembly each year elects six members to this Council for a term of three years. A retiring member is eligible for immediate re-election.

The current membership of the Economic and Social Council is indicated in the Table on Page 3.

The existing geographic balance in the Council is as follows:

The Five Major Powers

Four Latin American Republics (Chile, Cuba, Peru, Colombia)

Four Eastern European States (Czechoslovakia, Greece, Ukrainian S.S.R., Yugoslavia)

Two members of the British Commonwealth (Canada, India)

Two Western European Countries (Belgium, Norway)

One Near Eastern or African State (Lebanon)

The present distribution of seats differs in some respects from that proposed in the Department before the elections held in London last January, and will probably be further modified as new states are admitted to the United Nations. It is suggested that, in the forthcoming election, the United States seek to change the existing distribution by the election of one additional member of the British Commonwealth and one additional Western European State, to replace two of the four Eastern European countries (not including the U.S.S.R.) now represented on the Council. The resulting geographic balance would be the same as that proposed by the United States representative last January, in conversations with the delegates of the other major Powers at London. (USGA/Gen 30/Conv 14, Jan. 11, 1946).²

This distribution would be attained if the United States, The Netherlands, New Zealand, Poland or the Byelorussian S.S.R., Uruguay, and Turkey were chosen to replace the six members of the Council whose terms expire next January.

The United States should be re-elected without difficulty, in view of the common agreement on the desirability of representation for all five of the major Powers on the Economic and Social Council.

The Netherlands, because it is an important factor in world economy, is suggested as a replacement for Greece. The Netherlands will retire from the Security Council in January.

New Zealand is indicated to succeed Yugoslavia because it voluntarily withdrew from a deadlocked election in the General Assembly at London, thereby permitting Yugoslavia to occupy the last unfilled seat on the Council.

The Byelorussians S.S.R. or Poland is listed for election as the result of a process of elimination. Czechoslovakia will remain on the Council for another year. Generally, except in the case of the major Powers, it is felt that immediate re-election is undesirable, as it would result in deferring membership unduly for many states. Consequently, neither Yugoslavia nor the Ukrainian S.S.R. is included on the slate, and only the two states listed remain for consideration. While Poland is far more important than the Byelorussian S.S.R. as an economic factor, it must be remembered that it retains a seat on the Security Council for another year. When the election occurs, consideration should be given to supporting the Eastern European State whose candidacy the Soviet Union is most actively pressing.

Uruguay, a state whose political, economic and social policies are on the whole favorable from the United States point of view, is the preferred choice to succeed Colombia on the Council. This recommendation, however, is made subject to the possibility that the United States might agree to support some other American Republic chosen as a result of consultation among the delegations of the other American Republics. Before the results of such consultation are fixed, it is recommended that the United States discreetly encourage support of Uruguay's candidacy.

It seems desirable to respect Turkey's preference for membership on the Economic and Social Council and, at the same time, the Arab League's apparent choice of Syria for the Security Council.

3. Trusteeship Council

Article 86 of the Charter provides that the Trusteeship Council shall consist of the following Members of the United Nations:

- (a) those Members administering trust territories;
- (b) such of the five major Powers as are not administering trust territories; and
- (c) as many other Members elected for three-year terms by the General Assembly as may be necessary to ensure that the total number of members of the Trusteeship Council is equally divided between those Members of the United Nations which administer trust territories and those which do not.

The Trusteeship Council can not be established until a sufficient number of states have become administering authorities as a result of the conclusion, by the states directly concerned, of trusteeship agreements for specified territories, and the approval of such agreements by the Security Council or the General Assembly. It is possible that the General Assembly will approve a number of these agreements at its September session.³

If the U.K., France, and Belgium should become administering authorities, the Trusteeship Council could be brought into existence without an election, since China, the U.S.S.R., and the United States would automatically serve as the balancing powers.

If trusteeship agreements for Australia and New Zealand, as well as the U.K., France, and Belgium, should be approved by the Assembly in September, or if some other combination of states should become administering authorities, an election might be necessary. In this event, it is recommended that the United States support Egypt, Denmark and Uruguay, respectively, for the first, second and third elective posts.

Egypt is recommended because it is believed that an Arab State should be represented on the Trusteeship Council in view of the intense interest of the Arab states in the problem of trusteeship, unless Egypt should be elected to the Economic and Social Council.

Denmark is suggested because of the traditional interest of the Scandinavian countries in equal treatment in social, economic and commercial matters, one of the basic objectives of the trusteeship system, and the contribution which Scandinavian nationals might, on the basis of their role in the Permanent Mandates Commission, be expected to make in the Trusteeship Council.

The Philippines are recommended because it seems desirable, in view of their recent achievement of independence, for the United States to support them for some United Nations post and because the Philippine delegate shows a very strong individual interest in trusteeship questions and was very active on the subject at San Francisco and London.

4. Procedure Prior to Elections

It is recognized that these slates constitute optimum proposals from the point of view of the United States. In all probability they will undergo some modification during the course of pre-election negotiations with other countries. This is especially likely in cases where groups such as the Latin American Republics or the Arab League select candidates with regard to which the United States has no special objection. In such cases, after discreet advocacy of its own candidates, the United States Delegation may be well advised to concur in the ultimate decision of the group. It is believed that the procedure and formula outlined in Recommendation No. 4, above, will serve to reduce to a minimum the possibility of misunderstanding, disappointment, and charges of bad faith.

State Department Briefing Paper

[WASHINGTON,] September 4, 1946.

BACKGROUND PAPER

WHETHER UNITED STATES REPRESENTATIVES ON THE COMMISSIONS OF THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL SHOULD BE UNDER FORMAL INSTRUCTION

THE PROBLEM

The Council at its second session⁴ decided that commissions shall be made up of "one representative from each of . . . (12 to 18) . . . Members of the United Nations".⁵ The Council turned down the suggestions of several of the nuclear Commissions that members of the commissions should serve in their individual capacities rather than as government representatives and therefore should not be instructed.⁶ There is no statement to the effect that members of the commissions shall be instructed. The United States consistently has taken the position that better work can be done if members of the commissions are individual experts without instructions.⁷ The question is, therefore:

⁴ May 25–June 21, 1946, at New York; the first or organizing session had been held at London from January 23 to February 18.

"It is felt that the prestige of certain types of commissions will be enhanced if it is clear that they are to conduct their investigations impartially and without undue concern for the political views of particular Member states. Emphasis on the individual capacities of commission members should help to keep commissions to manageable size by reducing the necessity for widespread distribution among Member states. It should in many cases be easier to obtain the services of highly qualified experts and persons of outstanding prestige if they are appointed primarily on the basis of their personal qualifications" (IO Files, USGA/Ia/SH Com/15, January 19, 1946).

Should the United States Government, in the light of the Council's decision, formally instruct representatives on the various commissions in spite of its earlier position.

RECOMMENDATION

It is recommended that United States Members of the Commissions be provided with general instructions covering major issues. They should be given an opportunity to collaborate in the preparation of their instructions. In the Commission meetings the U.S. Members will of necessity speak for the Government of the United States, but they should be free to speak in the light of circumstances and their individual reactions, being guided, of course, generally by their instructions. They would, of course, rarely if ever announce that they were speaking as individuals. They should have the right, for tactical as well as other reasons, to seek special instructions.

DISCUSSION

The United States has based its attitude in the past mainly upon the arguments: 1) That the best men can be obtained for the job and they will do their best work only if they are free from all political interference and pressure and can think for themselves; 2) That the Commissions are necessarily small bodies which must nevertheless consider the interests of the entire world. Governmental representatives instructed to follow the interests of their own country cannot be expected to represent other countries; 3) The presence of the press at all meetings will limit instructed representatives to careful statements as a result of the fear of committing their governments.

On the other hand, it is clear that recommendations must so far as possible, be consistent with policies of governments if they are to be implemented. Members of the Commissions must be familiar with these policies and act on lines generally consistent with them if useful work is to be done.

Moreover, since many of the members will be specifically instructed and will speak with the full prestige of their governments, the United States Members will be at a great tactical disadvantage if they can argue only on the basis of their personal opinions.

Finally, it appears that the maximum of flexibility would be desirable. It is suggested that the recommendation outlined above gives this flexibility and, at the same time, answers the arguments on both sides so far as possible. It will, of course, be necessary for United States Members of the Commission to make it clear when they are speaking as individuals in order to prevent any misunderstanding from arising from the fact that they will be called "representatives".

*Memorandum Prepared in the Division of International Organization Affairs*⁸

[WASHINGTON,] September 6, 1946.

Subject: Alternative Candidates for Council Posts.

I. Introduction

The basic memorandum prepared on the subject of slates for election to the three UN Councils lists in specific detail the states which will be supported by this government for election to all available posts. The United States Delegation to the General Assembly will engage in conversations with other Delegations in New York in an endeavor to secure general acceptance for its candidates. Very probably, however, it will be necessary to alter the proposed United States slates in order to produce a list of nominees which will be acceptable to the United States and will at the same time enjoy a reasonable prospect of election. The present memorandum is designed to provide general guidance as to the priority in which other states should be considered if our original choices for Council posts prove unacceptable.

It is important to note the criteria which must be observed in making selections for the various Councils. Article 23 of the Charter prescribes that, in the election of non-permanent members of the Security Council, due regard should be paid "in the first instance to the contribution of Members of the United Nations to the maintenance of international peace and security and to the other purposes of the Organization, and also to equitable geographical distribution".

The Charter does not prescribe any particular set of qualifications for membership in the Economic and Social Council. It is clear, however, that the economic importance and the economic and social policies of the various states are among the important factors to be taken into consideration in selecting suitable candidates.

No special criteria are set forth in the Charter for election to the Trusteeship Council. The list of eligible states is, however, limited to those who will not already be members of the Council by virtue of their status as states administering trust territories or permanent members of the Security Council.

II. Alternative Choices in Specific Geographical Areas

(a) Latin America

The basic memorandum on the subject of slates contained a statement that the Latin American countries might select candidates of their own for the two Council positions open to them. In that event, the memorandum stated, the Delegation might be well advised to concur in the decisions of the Latin American countries, provided the United States has no special objection to the candidates selected.

If Colombia and Uruguay, our first preferences for the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council respectively, are not supported by the Latin American delegations, the United States would probably have no objections on political grounds to the selection of any other Latin American candidates except Argentina, Nicaragua, Honduras, or the Dominican Republic. These four countries would not be acceptable as candidates for either of the Councils. It is doubtful, however, that any Latin American republics except Colombia, Ecuador, Uruguay, and Venezuela will receive serious consideration as candidates for Council posts at the forthcoming Assembly session.

(1) Security Council.

Belgium is our first choice among the European states to fill one of the three impending vacancies on the Security Council. The Department has been informed that a report that the Belgian Government is unwilling to be a candidate for this post is entirely without foundation. There seems at present to be no completely satisfactory alternative choice for Belgium, although Denmark and Norway are possibilities.

Denmark is not now a member of any Council. It is however, our choice for the second elective post on the Trusteeship Council and for membership on the Social and Statistical Commissions and on the Commission on the Status of Women.

Norway already enjoys considerable representation in United Nations bodies. It is serving a two-year term on ECOSOC; the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the Registrar of the International Court of Justice are Norwegians; and Norway is supported by the United States for election to the Human Rights, Statistical, Transport and Communications, and Fiscal Commissions.

(2) Economic and Social Council.

Denmark would be the logical alternative to the Netherlands for election to ECOSOC. In case Sweden should be admitted to membership in the UN before the elections are held, it would be a highly satisfactory choice for this Council because of its economic importance and its leadership in the field of social affairs.

South Africa would be the logical alternative to New Zealand as the British Commonwealth choice for ECOSOC.

In view of the fact that all Eastern European countries which are members of the UN are now holding or will hold Council posts under our original proposals, it seems impracticable to suggest alternative choices from that area.

(c) Near and Middle East and Africa.

If it should appear that Syria and Turkey, our preferred candidates for the Security Council and Economic and Social Council, respectively, cannot be elected, the United States might possibly be disposed to support Greece or Iran for one of the Council posts.

Greece is now completing a one-year term on the Economic and Social Council and would therefore presumably not be considered for reelection to that Council. Because Greece has twice been involved in matters considered by the Security Council and, at the beginning of September, was still engaged in a controversy before that body, its election to the Security Council might be undesirable. It might possibly be considered, however, for election to the Trusteeship Council if our preferred candidates should withdraw.

As regards the Security Council, the same objection might apply to some extent in the case of Iran. If the situation in Iran should develop favorably, however, so that Iran indicates a sincere desire and intention to act independently, the United States might possibly support Iran for one of the Council posts in the event that a vacancy should develop in our slates.

It seems desirable not to consider Iraq or Lebanon for positions on any of the Councils at this time.

(d) Far East.

The Philippines is not at present a member of any United Nations Council and is in effect our alternate choice for the Trusteeship Council. It is supported by the United States for membership on the Human Rights Commission and the Fiscal Commission of the Economic and Social Council.

The Canadian Embassy to the Department of State

CONFIDENTIAL

CONFIDENTIAL AND INFORMAL MEMORANDUM ON THE VIEWS OF CANADA ON ELECTIONS TO THE SECURITY COUNCIL AND THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL⁹

1. At present the six non-permanent members of the Security Council are:

For two-year term:	Australia
	Brazil
	Poland
For one-year term:	Egypt
	Mexico
	Netherlands.

⁹ Transmitted to the Department by the Canadian Embassy under cover of a letter dated September 26, not printed.

2. The United Nations Assembly in October will elect successors to Egypt, Mexico and the Netherlands. These states are not eligible for immediate re-election.

3. The Latin-American Republics appear to have agreed on Colombia. The Arab states (Egypt, Syria, Lebanon, Saudi-Arabia, and Iraq) have agreed on Syria and have secured the concurrence of Turkey and Iran. It is widely expected that Belgium will be the candidate of the Western European states for the succession to the seat of the Netherlands though there may be strong opposition to a state being a member at the same time of both the Economic and Social Council and the Security Council.

4. According to the Charter (Article 23 : 1), the primary consideration to be taken into account by the Assembly in elections to the Security Council is "the contribution of Members of the United Nations to the maintenance of international peace and security and to the other purposes of the Organization". The secondary consideration is "equitable geographical distribution".

5. In fact, however, at the elections in London in January scant attention was paid to the principle of functionalism and the two governing principles were the sharing of honours and equitable geographical distribution. The first principle means that a state (other than one of the Big Five) should not be a member at the same time of both the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council. The second principle means that various groups of states are each entitled not only to a seat on the Security Council but to agree among themselves on which of them should have the seat. Of the six non-permanent seats five, in the minds of the adherents of these principles, are divided as follows:

Western Europe (1)
The Soviet Zone of Europe (1)
Latin America (2)
Middle East (1)

The sixth seat was at London given to Australia and it is debatable whether this seat is considered as belonging to the British Commonwealth or to the area lying south of China and the Arab states and including the whole of Africa.

6. Regionalism, combined with the rotation of seats among the states members of the regional groups, is likely to produce a weak Security Council. It has already resulted in Syria being chosen as the Middle Eastern candidate. This has been done certainly with little regard being paid "to the contribution of Members of the United Nations to the maintenance of international peace and security and to the other purpose of the Organization". Two years from now it may result in the two Latin American members of the Security Council being countries with little military or economic force to contribute to the preservation of peace.

7. The present system also means that the non-permanent members of the Security Council are not in fact being elected by the Assembly but that the Assembly is merely ratifying the decisions of regional groups. Not all states are members of any recognized regional group and some states which might be useful members of the Security Council will, as a result, be disqualified from membership in the Council.

8. From Canada's point of view the situation is especially serious. Since the United States is always on the Security Council, Canada can make no claim for membership on the basis of equitable geographical distribution. Canada belongs, moreover, to no organized regional group. If Latin America always has two seats on the Security Council, Western Europe one seat, Eastern Europe one seat, and the Arab bloc one seat—only one seat is left over for Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and India and for the other states which do not belong to one of the four regions. The argument will be made that that seat should go to a representative of the vast area lying south of China and of the Arab states and including the whole of Africa.

9. We would be serving neither our own immediate interests or the interests of the United Nations if we were to give support to the view that membership in one Council disqualified a state, other than one of the Big Five, from membership in the other Council. This would mean that Canada would be ineligible for membership in the Security Council until its term on the Economic and Social Council expires in January 1949 (i.e., Canada could not be elected until September 1948). By limiting the choice of candidates for the Councils it would weaken the Councils since they can do their most effective work only if they contain the states which have the greatest contribution to make to the solution of the problems with which they are dealing. Canada should therefore be prepared to oppose any movement which may develop in the Assembly to disqualify Belgium from membership on the Security Council because of its membership on the Economic and Social Council.

10. Should Canada stand for the Security Council this year, one of the main arguments for our standing (even if we expect to be defeated) would be that by so doing we would make clear our opposition to the acceptance of our [four?] undesirable conventions:

(1) The convention that the Assembly can properly disregard in elections to the Security Council the principle of functionalism set forth in Article 23 of the Charter;

(2) The convention that a state is ineligible for election to the Security Council if it is already a member of the Economic and Social Council;

(3) The convention that a number of regions of the world have a right to be represented on the Council by a state designated by them no matter what the qualifications of that state may be;

(4) The convention that only one member of the British Commonwealth, apart from the United Kingdom, should sit on the Security Council.

*Memorandum Prepared in the Division of International Organization Affairs*¹⁰

COMMENTS ON CANADIAN MEMORANDUM ON ELECTIONS TO UN COUNCILS¹¹

Our comments on this memorandum may be grouped in accordance with the four "conventions" with which it concludes.

We agree that the Assembly should not disregard the functional principle, but we consider it equally harmful to disregard the geographic principle. As long as the five Great Powers are in a predominant position on the Security Council, there is no danger of a "weak" Council. We believe that, to be most effective, the Council should include representatives of the major geographic areas and of the British Commonwealth. We should remind the Canadians that it is not only the members of the Security Council, but all UN members, who contribute military and economic force to the preservation of peace. We should maintain, moreover, that a small state which speaks for the entire regional group to which it belongs on major issues wields an influence greater than that represented by its own military and economic strength.

2. "The convention that a State is ineligible for election to the Security Council if it is already a member of the Economic and Social Council."

We do not agree with this thesis as an invariable rule, and the Canadians should be reassured by our sponsorship of Belgium for the

¹¹ Supra.

Security Council at this time. At the same time, we would ordinarily prefer a wide distribution of Council posts among the members of the Organization. It is important that the smaller states, which are already dissatisfied because they play so small a part in UN operations, be granted as much voice as possible in UN activities, although frankly we would not now expect that every small state would some day achieve membership on the Security Council.

3. "The convention that a number of regions of the world have a right to be represented on the Council by a State designated by them no matter what the qualifications of that State may be."

(a) We could not agree that a regional group has an inherent right to demand that other states necessarily respect its choice of candidates from among its own membership. But it is only realistic to acknowledge that regional choices, and logrolling among regional groups, are to be expected. Normally, we would proceed to select our own candidates from the areas concerned and attempt to persuade the appropriate regional groups to accept our choices. If, however, we failed in the attempt, we should be inclined to accept the candidate chosen by a regional group, provided we had no special objection to it as a candidate.

(b) We do not feel that Council members from a given regional area must necessarily, or should always, be members of an organized regional group. In this connection, it may be well to explain generally to the Canadians how the Department came to support Syria for the Security Council, stressing the fact that Turkey was our original candidate.

4. "The convention that only one member of the British Commonwealth, apart from the United Kingdom, should sit on the Security Council."

(a) We should explain to the Canadians that our conception of the proper geographic allocation of seats among the non-permanent members of the Security Council, as determined in the Department prior to the General Assembly session at London, includes one member of the British Commonwealth, in addition to the United Kingdom. We might assure the Canadians that we do not intend to bracket the Dominions with "the vast area lying south of China and of the Arab states and including the whole of Africa." In Africa, this "vast area" involves only two UN members, Liberia and Ethiopia, which we place in the NEA group; in the Far East, the only UN members concerned are the Philippines and India.

(b) It seems to us that the Security Council, which is a political body, should roughly reflect the existing division of political forces. On this basis, we do not see how the British Dominions can expect to occupy more than one seat among them, particularly if only one seat is allocated to the Soviet satellites.

Memorandum of Conversation, by G. Hayden Raynor, Special Assistant to the Director of the Office of European Affairs (Matthews)

CONFIDENTIAL

[WASHINGTON,] October 2, 1946.

Participants: Mr. C. P. Hebert, Counselor of the Canadian Embassy
Mr. Wailes, of BC
Mr. Hayden Raynor, of EUR

[Here follows discussion of the Canadian Embassy memorandum sent to the Department on September 26. "The conversation centered on the four conventions contained at the end of Paragraph 10 of the Canadian memorandum. In our conversation we followed generally the points made in Mr. Popper's memorandum of October 1. . . ."]

After completing our discussion of the Canadian memorandum I referred to the inquiry he had made at our last meeting relative to the make up of the ECOSOC.¹⁵ I stated that we were in full agreement that the economic importance of a state was an important factor in determining the membership of this Council. I quoted to him the pertinent paragraph in our working paper on alternate candidates for Council posts which sets forth this very clearly. I added, however, that we differ from their view on the matter of membership by the Big Five. (Mr. Hebert had suggested that the Canadians felt that only the Big Three should be continuous members.) I stated that we felt, not necessarily because of the importance of all of the Big Five from the economic point of view, but because of the concept of Big Five unanimity on which the United Nations had been built, that the Big

¹⁵ This refers to a meeting held on September 16 at which Mr. Hebert ". . . informed us that he was instructed to ascertain informally our reaction to the following proposal. He stated that they felt that in the economic world Canada and certain other states such as the Netherlands were equally as important as France and China and should be so recognized in the ECOSOC. His proposal is this: The Big Three (the US, UK and USSR) should always have seats on the ECOSOC. Half of the remaining fifteen seats should always be filled from a group of twelve important economic states such as Canada, the Netherlands, Sweden, presumably France and China, Australia, Brazil, etc. Mr. Wailes and I promised to ascertain what the reaction of the Department might be to this suggestion and to talk to him informally about it later." (IO Files: Document US/A/14).

Five should be continuously represented on all major organs of the United Nations.

During the discussion I inquired if Mr. Hebert had received any Canadian views on the makeup of the Trusteeship Council. He indicated that their first preference was for an European state, either Sweden or Denmark, and that if two seats were elected they felt the other seat should be held by a non-European state. He indicated that he had supposed that the South American countries would feel entitled to this seat and that in that event they had been prepared to favor Brazil. He indicated that Egypt would be an acceptable candidate to them for the second seat. As in his previous conversation he indicated a distinct lack of enthusiasm for the Philippines as a candidate and urged that consideration be given to India as a member of this Council but not this year.

Mr. Hebert seemed entirely satisfied with the informal views expressed to him. I think with the exception of Syria that we will find the Canadians and ourselves in quite close agreement in New York on the question of slates.

[WASHINGTON,] October 9, 1946.

SELECTION OF ECOSOC COMMISSIONS¹⁶

1. Results of the Elections

On October 2 the Economic and Social Council selected the members of eight commissions which it had created to work in specific fields. The table appended to this memorandum lists the membership of the Commissions.¹⁷

Thirty-nine of the 51 members of the United Nations have been given places on one or more Commissions. By common consent, each of the Big Five has a seat on each Commission. India is represented on six Commissions. The following states are represented on four Commissions: Australia, Canada, Czechoslovakia, the Netherlands, Poland, the Ukrainian SSR, and Yugoslavia.

¹⁶ At the third session of the Economic and Social Council which extended from September 11 to October 3 the Council determined the terms of reference and composition of the Population Commission and the Fiscal Commission. It then selected the States to designate representatives on all of the now permanent commissions (except the Narcotics Commission, to which the membership had been elected immediately at the London session), namely Economic and Employment, Human Rights, Social, Status of Women, Statistical, Transportation and Communications, Fiscal, and Population.

Eight Latin American States are unrepresented on the Commissions (Argentina, Bolivia, Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Haiti, Honduras, Nicaragua, Paraguay). In the Near Eastern-African area, Ethiopia, Liberia, and Saudi Arabia are without representation. Among the Western European states, Luxembourg did not receive a seat.

Total representation on all Commissions, by regional groups, is indicated in the following table:

REPRESENTATION ON ECOSOC COMMISSIONS

Group	Number of States	Number of seats on eight Commissions
Big Five	5	40
India	1	6
Smaller Eastern Europe	5	19
Latin America	20	19
British Dominions	4	13
Smaller Western Europe	5	12
Near East-Africa	10	10
Far East	1	1

Total	51	120

2. Original Instructions to the Delegation

The basic instructions to the Delegation, as contained in the Position Paper of September 3,¹⁸ called for the inclusion of nine of the smaller Eastern European States on the six Commissions which had been previously created by the Council, as against fifteen such seats for Latin American countries. The lists as chosen gave fourteen seats to the smaller Eastern European countries and fifteen to the Latin American States, with five seats for the Eastern European bloc as against four for the Latin Americans on the Fiscal and Population Commissions, which were created at this session of ECOSOC.

3. Attempts To Reach a Compromise

Following several telephone conversations on the subject, Mr. Hendrick¹⁹ of OA returned to Washington on September 19 from a visit to New York with a description of negotiations which were being carried on with the Soviets, British and others with a view to reaching complete agreement so that the matter could be presented to the Council and voted upon without delay or acrimonious debate. On the basis of tentative commitments which the Soviets were making at that time, it was understood that the margin of disagreement with the Soviets was relatively small; that the Soviet representatives indicated we might have almost as many Latin American countries on the compromise slate as on the original; and that they felt we should lose some Western European seats. No specific information, however, was formally supplied to the Department on the proposed composition of the six Commissions. It was indicated that Mr. Stampar,²¹ Delegate of Yugoslavia and Acting Chairman of the Council, thought that the tentative compromise slate gave too much representation to the Eastern satellites.

On receipt of this information, the Delegation was requested by telephone to state in writing the present position with regard to slates, giving the details as to the composition of each Commission. The response to this request came to us in telegram #595 from New York, September 21.²² This telegram indicated that the Soviets not only would not accept the compromise slate but also were making additional demands which would raise the smaller Eastern representation to 17 seats on the six Commissions (as compared with 9 on the original U.S. list and 13 on the compromise slate).

4. Department's Views on Compromise

As a result of this information the Department's Membership Team held a meeting on September 23 in which it decided that it would reluctantly accept the compromise slate as it had been handed to Mr. Stampar as the limit of its concessions to the Soviets. The Team felt that the representation afforded the Soviet bloc under this so-called "Stampar list" was more than generous to the Soviet bloc on a proportional basis, considering that it comprises only 6 of the 51 UN members. Certain additional changes were authorized, but these would not have increased the representation of the Eastern group. It was stated that, if an agreement upon this basis were unobtainable, the Department preferred that the Delegation revert to support of the original list of candidates prepared in the Department and included in the Position Paper of September 3, and left to the Delegation's discretion the methods to be followed in order to produce a generally accepted slate as close to the original list as possible. (Telegram No. 205 to New York, September 24).²²

5. Department's Opposition to Further Concessions

On September 25 Mr. Hyde²³ telephoned to say that the outlook for any agreement on the slates was dark and to get our reaction on the possibility of making further concessions to the Russians in a final attempt to reach unanimous agreement on the slates. The changes suggested by Mr. Hyde would have raised the representation of the smaller Eastern European countries on the six Commissions to 15 seats as against 13 given to them under the Stampar list and 9 in our original slate. Mr. Hendrick and Mr. Popper told Mr. Hyde that this appeared to give the six UN members in the Soviet bloc a far higher representation than that accorded to any other group or region. They told Mr. Hyde that they seriously doubted the Department would agree to the Russian demands, but that they would inform him more definitely after consultation with the officers concerned. As a result, telegram No. 216, September 27,²⁴ was sent to New York confirming the fact that there was no change in the basic instructions for the Commission slates but permitting a few alterations which would not have increased the representation of the Eastern group. It was specifically stated that the Department did not approve placing Poland on the Economic and Employment Commission.

6. Prospect of Agreement on Favorable Basis

On September 30 Mr. Hyde telephoned us to say that it appeared that an agreement might be reached on the basis of only 12 seats for the Eastern group. It was indicated that the Russians would not insist on placing Poland on the Economic Commission, and that they also agreed that Yugoslavia should receive only three seats on the six Commissions, including the Commission on Women instead of the Transportation Commission. This seemed encouraging, since it indicated we might reach unanimous agreement on a basis more favorable to us than the Stampar list.²⁵

7. Consultation with Mr. Acheson

On October 1 and 2 Mr. Hyde spoke with the Department in four separate telephone conversations during which matters were moving very rapidly. At this stage Mr. Hyde told us that Mr. Winant had received authorization from Mr. Acheson to reach an agreement with ²⁴ Not printed.

²⁵ In a revision of this memorandum drafted on October 14 Mr. Popper wrote at the beginning of this paragraph: "On September 30 Mr. Hyde telephoned the Department from a public phone in the Delegates' lounge at Lake Success. Since he could be overheard by other people, he had to talk in guarded language, and his exact meaning was difficult to ascertain. We understood him to say that it appeared an agreement might be reached on the basis of only 12 seats for the Eastern group. . . ." At the end of the paragraph in the revised memorandum there appeared a parenthetical statement: "(Mr. Hyde has since informed us that what he was attempting to convey was that, if no agreement were reached with the Soviets and a vote were taken, we could elect a slate which contained only 12 seats for the Eastern Group on the six original commissions.)" (501.BD/10-1446) the Russians on the basis of 14 seats for the smaller Eastern European countries on the six original Commissions, plus two seats for the Eastern satellites on each of the two new Commissions (Population and Fiscal). In his last conversations Mr. Hyde gave the impression that the matter was now being handled at Mr. Winant's level and was largely out of his (Mr. Hyde's) hands.²⁶

8. Changes in the Final Stage

During these conversations Mr. Hyde dictated to us the tentative slates as they stood on October 1, before the telephone conversation between Mr. Acheson and Mr. Winant. A comparison of these slates with those finally elected shows that, at the final stage, five seats were transferred from other states to the Eastern group, against one from an Eastern group state to a Latin American state. Norway and Poland were substituted on the Economic and Employment Commission for Egypt and the Netherlands, although the Department had strongly opposed both these changes. Greece had been displaced from the Transportation and Communications Commission by Yugoslavia, and was thus reduced to a single seat on the Commissions. Byelo-Russia had replaced Norway on the Human Rights Commission; the Ukraine had replaced India on the Population Commission and had also replaced Denmark on the Fiscal Commission. As a result of these changes it will be observed that the smaller Eastern European group was limited to one seat on the Commission for Women and the Statistical Commission, which are relatively unimportant from the standpoint of policy. On the contrary, the smaller Eastern European group has three seats on each of the following Commissions: Economic and Employment, Human Rights, Social, Transportation and Communications, and Fiscal, as well as two seats on the Population Commission. On all of these more important Commissions it has at least as many representatives as any other group and in some cases more.

²⁶ In the revised memorandum of October 14 Mr. Popper wrote an additional paragraph in section 7, following this paragraph: "Mr. Winant had in fact telephoned Mr. Acheson and had informed the latter that the Department had suggested limiting the representation of the smaller Eastern European countries on the six original Commissions to 13 seats; that the British were prepared to settle on the basis of 15 seats for these countries; and that he (Mr. Winant) felt sure he could reach an agreement on the basis of 14 seats. Mr. Acheson authorized Mr. Winant to reach an agreement on this basis. In a second telephone conversation, after the event, Mr. Winant said that he had agreed to proportionate representation for the smaller Eastern states on the two new Commissions (Population and Fiscal). Mr. Acheson apparently assumed this to mean that the smaller Eastern group had received two seats on each of these Commissions." (501.BD/10-1446)

[WASHINGTON,] October 10, 1946.

Remarks of Mr. Leroy Stinebower²⁸ at Membership Team Meeting
October 10, 11:00 a. m.

Mr. Stinebower, who had returned from New York a few days previously, discussed with the Membership Team his recollection of the events which had taken place in the process of reaching an agreement with the other members of the ECOSOC preparatory to the election of the members of 8 Commissions by the Council.

Mr. Stinebower stressed the fact that final agreement was reached after Mr. Winant had talked directly with Mr. Acheson by telephone and had received approval for raising the Soviet representation on the 6 original Commissions from 13 to 14 states. Mr. Stinebower took the view that if there was any dissatisfaction with the final results, it should be attributed to a failure to keep Mr. Acheson adequately informed about the problem, as a result of which Mr. Acheson took a decision which was not in accord with the instructions sent to New York by the Membership Team.

Mr. Stinebower also emphasized Mr. Winant's desire to reach unanimous agreement with the Soviets on the slates, as a desirable method of procedure and as a method of possibly gaining sympathetic consideration by the Soviets for our plan for an Economic Commission for Europe. The final agreement, Mr. Stinebower stated came after a long evening session during which Mr. Winant negotiated with the Soviets and the British. At that stage the Soviets were insisting on 15 Eastern European seats on the 6 original Commissions while our limit was 13 seats. Finally it was agreed to split the difference and give the Eastern European bloc 14 seats. Since the Soviet representation on all 8 Commissions thus rose to 19 seats it was considered necessary to raise the Latin American representation 1 seat to preserve parity. Mr. Stinebower understood that the concept of parity had been specifically accepted in these final negotiations. He made the point that the negotiators linked together the seats allocated to the British Dominions and India and that this total too reached 19 seats.²⁹

Mr. Stinebower further stated that no member of the Council appeared to be aggrieved at the result of the elections except Greece, which had only one seat as compared with two for Lebanon. He commented on the fact that there was no sizable dissatisfaction among the four Latin American members of the Council, who had demanded a total of 22 seats for the Latin American states. He also explained the loss of Liberia on the ground that the Big Three considered it was too backward to form [perform] its responsibilities on any Commission.

Mr. Stinebower explained the inclusion of Poland on the Economic and Employment Commission but noted that the Soviets had insisted on this concession as a prerequisite for unanimity. He indicated that Mr. Acheson had approved by telephone the addition of Poland on this Commission as the additional Soviet seat.

Mr. Stinebower further declared that it proved important [impossible] to leave any Commission seat vacant in order to save them for Sweden, which is not yet a member of the United Nations. Finally, he noted that reaching unanimity it was possible to keep countries off the Commissions when we did not wish them seated. In this connection he mentioned specifically how difficult it was to keep the Dominican Republic representative, Miss Bernardino, off the Commission on the Status of Women.

²⁹ In a revised memorandum drafted October 11 Mr. Popper wrote, following this paragraph: "When the Soviets continued to insist on giving still another seat to the Byelo-Russian SSR, we indicated that our absolute maximum allotment for the Eastern group was 19 seats for 8 Commissions. We said that if the Soviets wanted an additional seat for Byelo-Russia, they would have to reduce the representation of some other Eastern state. Eventually the Soviets acquiesced, but this necessitated a considerable reshuffling of seats involving both the Eastern group and other countries." (501.BD/10-1146)

Election of Officers of GA Committees

Mr. Sandifer, in raising this problem, pointed out that while most of the officers who were elected at the first part of the session in London would be present at the current meetings, according to present information, the Chairmen of Committees 2, 3, and 4 as well as four of the Rapporteurs and two Vice Chairmen would not be present. He pointed out that the absence of the Chairman created a problem regarding the composition of the General Committee.³¹ He presented for approval the recommendations contained in Document US/A/26.³² These provided that the United States should support a proposal to elect as the three new chairmen the heads of the Delegations from those States which held the chairmanships in London, and that the United States should generally favor filling the vacancies for Vice Chairmen and Rapporteurs by election of members of the same delegations which held the positions in London.

It was brought out in the discussion that Foreign Minister Olszewski of Poland would probably be adequate as the new Chairman of Committee 2 although his knowledge of French was only fair and he did not speak English. In response to a similar question regarding Ambassador Blanco as Chairman of Committee 4, Ambassador Dawson stated that, although elderly and not in good health, Blanco was an experienced diplomat with excellent knowledge of French and fair knowledge of English, and that he would be adequate as Chairman.

Decision

The four recommendations in Document US/A/26 were approved.

³¹ This subject was discussed informally on October 19 between Mr. Andrew Cordier, Executive Assistant to the Secretary-General of the United Nations (Lie) and Mr. Durward V. Sandifer, Principal Adviser, United States Delegation Staff (Chief of the Division of International Organization Affairs in the Department) and two members of Mr. Sandifer's staff. Mr. Cordier "indicated that Secretary-General Lie was in favor of allowing the vice-chairmen of these committees to serve as chairmen. . . . [Mr. Sandifer] expressed the view that it would be more satisfactory to elect a new chairman from the state holding the chairmanship in London, so that the same distribution of states on the General Committee would be continued and the principle would be recognized that chairmen were elected in part for their individual capacities. Mr. Cordier expressed sympathy with this view and urged that some work be done on it prior to the Thursday morning plenary session when such elections as were decided upon would take place." (IO Files, document US/A/19) The United States Delegation staff had produced two working papers by October 21 which embodied in tabular form the principle of selection of new committee chairmen from the country holding the position at London. (IO Files, documents US/A/24 and US/A/25, neither printed)

Election of New Members to the Security Council

Mr. Sandifer explained that it would be necessary to elect three States to non-permanent membership on the Security Council and presented the following list of candidates:

Candidates	Alternates
Colombia	Any other American republic which the Latin American Delegation may agree upon except Argentina and the Dominican Republic.
Belgium	Denmark or Norway
Syria	Greece or Iran

Mr. Sandifer explained that these countries had been selected after careful consideration in the light of the requirements of Article 23, par. 1, in order to preserve the balance of membership in councils as originally worked out at the London meetings.

Mr. Dulles pointed out that, in view of the method of determining membership on the Atomic Energy Commission, this change in the composition of the Security Council would result in the replacement likewise of three members on the AEC which seemed unfortunate. He raised the possibility of not altering the Commission. Mr. Fahy stated that the question had been explored and it was felt that nothing could be done to prevent the replacement, adding that the new representatives of the AEC would have to be educated on atomic energy problems and they and their governments brought up to date on the development of views within the AEC.³³

The Delegation approved the support of Colombia, Belgium, and Syria as non-permanent members of the Security Council (with the qualification mentioned below with respect to Greece).

Election of Members to ECOSOC

Mr. Sandifer explained that it would be necessary to elect six new members to the ECOSOC to replace those whose terms had expired and presented the following as recommended candidates:

Uruguay
The Netherlands
Turkey
Poland or Byelorussian S. S. R.
New Zealand
United States

Mr. Sandifer pointed out that although this slate would reduce the representation of the Eastern European countries from four to three, the replacement of Yugoslavia by New Zealand had been made in view of the fact that when the elections were held in London, New Zealand withdrew in favor of Yugoslavia with the understanding that she would receive support at the next election. It was generally recognized in the Delegation, however, that this portion of the slate would be likely to create the greatest difficulties.

³³ For documentation on this subject, see pp. 712 ff.

Senator Vandenberg raised serious question as to the exclusion of Greece. He pointed out that she was being removed from ECOSOC, that she was denied a seat on the Security Council, that she had no significant post in any of the commissions, and that she was forced again and again at the Paris Conference to accept adverse decisions. He expressed fear that with such a succession of disappointments at the hands of her allies, Greece would begin to question whether she had made the right choice of partners. The Senator felt that he could not overemphasize the problem in view of the fact that Greece was in such a key position from the point of view of the United States peace pattern.

General discussion followed of possible recommended candidates for whom Greece might be substituted. Mr. Sandifer pointed out that to give Greece a position on the ECOSOC would require replacement either of Turkey or The Netherlands, which would be difficult. Mr. Wadsworth suggested that to a certain degree the position and importance of Turkey is similar to that of Greece.

Senator Vandenberg suggested that it might be possible to substitute Greece for Syria on our Security Council slate but Mr. Wadsworth brought out the point that it seemed possible that a complaint involving Greece might come before the Security Council in the near future and that it might be better, therefore, if Greece were not a member.

Senator Vandenberg and Senator Connally both expressed the view, in which there was general concurrence, that the matter should be brought to the attention of the Secretary.

Decision

At the suggestion of Senator Austin, the Delegation approved the recommended slate subject to a further attempt to rearrange it to include Greece after consultation with the Secretary of State.

Election of Members to the Trusteeship Council

The Delegation then turned its attention to the recommended slate for the Trusteeship Council in case it should be organized at this session. Mr. Sandifer explained that our recommended preference was for Egypt, Denmark and Philippines for the elective positions to the Council in the order named.

With respect to Egypt, Mr. Dulles raised a question as to the political desirability of supporting an Arab State for membership in the light of the Palestine problem. Mrs. Roosevelt and Mrs. Douglas likewise queried whether it was necessary to pick Egypt if only one member was to be elected. The suggestion was therefore made that Egypt might be placed as second choice rather than first.

After some discussion, Mr. Dulles pointed out that the problem was at the present time a remote one in view of the uncertainty as to whether or not the Trusteeship Council would be organized and an elective member chosen at this session. He moved that the matter be deferred.

Decision

The Delegation agreed that a decision on candidates for elective members to the Trusteeship Council should be deferred for the present.

³⁷ Mr. Gore-Booth had first mentioned this to Mr. Raynor on October 21 "unofficially" (IO Files, document US/A/42). Also on October 24, in a general conversation with Mr. Raynor, Mr. Michael Tandy of the British Delegation "... wondered what we would think of the substitution of India for Syria on the Security Council slate. I was non-committal". (IO Files, document US/A/66) Mr. Tandy in a conversation on the same date informed Mr. Robert McClintock of the United States Delegation "... in confidence that the British were considerably disturbed by the pretensions of India for a seat on the Security Council. He said the British were fearful that if they did not acquiesce to the Indian claim 'the Indian Delegation would throw itself in the arms of the Soviet bloc'. Mr. Tandy said that the British Delegation had assumed that if India were to be sponsored for membership in the Security Council it would automatically replace Belgium as a candidate." (IO Files, document US/A/49).

The Government of India broached its candidacy officially to the Department of State on October 23 when Sir Girja Bajpai, Indian Agent General, called on the Director of the Office of Near Eastern and African Affairs (Henderson). Mr. Henderson in his memorandum of conversation recorded that after Sir Girja had stated the position of the Government of India that "Sir Girja then said that he did not know what our position was and whether we had already committed ourselves to some other country to replace Egypt. Mr. Henderson said that it was not our policy definitely to commit ourselves prior to the elections in New York but that the Department had drawn up a provisional slate on which Syria tentatively appeared as a replacement for Egypt. He stated that our slate was drawn up at a time when we were unaware of India's possible candidacy and at a time when it appeared desirable to include an Arab country because of developments in that area. Mr. Henderson added that aside from the question of regionalism, we felt strongly that small nations should receive appropriate recognition on the Council in order to avoid the implication that the Council was being packed with large powers. He went on to say that India certainly could not be included in the category of small nations and that indeed India was on the verge of emerging even from the category of middle powers. He said, however, that there was nothing to prevent reconsideration of our tentative slate, that he appreciated the cogency of India's claim for membership, and that he would be glad to submit the Government of India's arguments for inclusion to the proper committee of the Department for consideration." Elections to the Security Council Senator Austin requested Mr. Popper to report on the recent developments regarding the slates for the Security Council. Mr. Popper reported that the conversations were still in an exploratory stage. It was possible that other preferences would be secured within the next few days, at which time it may be necessary to have more definite decisions. He expected that the question would arise in Committee I at the end of next week. The United States slate was not changed from its previous slate of Belgium, Colombia and Syria.

He added that they had made no commitments to the Indians for next year in case they were defeated this year on the basis that to support them next year would almost be to sabotage the then candidacy of Canada. He also told me that the British Delegation had expressed preference for Poland rather than White Russia for the ECOSOC. He also informed me that he understood Greece had been campaigning among the Latin American Delegations with some success.

He informed me that the British Delegation had discussed at some length whether or not it would be wise to approach the Soviets with the objective of attempting to reach an agreement on the Council slates. He said their decision had been not to attempt this as success would seem very unlikely and it did not seem to them that any very good purpose would be served by such an attempt. He said they felt that it should be unnecessary in view of the Assembly's Rules of Procedure which eliminate nominations from the floor and provide for secret balloting. He did say that he had been instructed to inform the Soviets what the British views are on this matter and to solicit as a matter of information whatever views they might have on it.

Mr. Popper then read the following telegram of October 29⁴⁰ from Secretary Byrnes regarding the Greek candidacy:

“After thorough consideration of all factors involved I have concluded that it would be unwise under present conditions for us to support Greece for SC or ECOSOC. Although desirous of giving US support to Greek Government, I believe Greek membership on SC would not strengthen SC or our position therein and might prove embarrassing to Greece which has already been involved in two cases before SC and if elected would be in vulnerable position in cases involving other powers. Singling out Greece for reelection to ECOSOC would upset desirable geographic balance and would also violate principle of rotation of Council membership. Delegation may wish to consider Greek membership on any new bodies created by Assembly such as proposed Committee for Codification of International Law⁴¹ if size of that body permits or any new group that may be constituted to consider site matters.”

³⁹ V. M. Molotov, Soviet Foreign Minister.

⁴¹ For documentation on this subject, see pp. 525 ff.

Senator Vandenberg said that he had talked with the Secretary about this matter and it was agreeable to him to drop Greece from consideration for the Security Council. He stated that he simply wanted to say in extenuation that Mr. Herschel Johnson⁴² agreed with his point of view, but nevertheless the Senator would withdraw his previous suggestion that Greece should be considered.

Indian Candidacy

Mr. Popper reported that there was a strong tendency to support India for the Security Council developing among the United Kingdom and the Dominions and apparently also from Russia. The Indian Delegation had stated that it had twelve to fourteen votes for its candidacy for the Security Council.

Mr. Popper reported that the Delegation had been advised by the Department that if it was unprofitable to support Syria, India might be supported.⁴³ However, it was not certain whether Belgium or Syria would have to give way to India if a change were necessary. He said that the Department was opposed to dropping Belgium because that would reduce the representation from Western Europe. He said that he thought that it would be better to drop Syria since both Syria and India were from the general middle-eastern region.

Mr. Wadsworth pointed out that it was true that India was tied to the Middle East in the organization of the Department of State and was geographically in somewhat the same area as Syria. However, he felt that the Middle East area itself was a very vital one and should have a representative on the Security Council. The only possible alternatives were Greece, Turkey and Iran. The same argument applied to all three possibilities, that they were under Russian pressure. The Turks did not want to have membership on the Security Council; therefore, the state must be an Arab state. Egypt was now on the Security Council and could not be reelected. Then the next best candidate was Syria. Moreover, Syria had the support of the other Arab states and also of many South Americans. Mr. El Khoury⁴⁴ told Mr. Wadsworth that he had definite assurance of support from Gromyko.⁴⁵ El Khoury had sent his men to talk with each of the Eastern European bloc and found that each had instructions to vote for Syria. Mr. Wadsworth thought that the tide was running to support Syria and India and drop Belgium.

⁴² The Acting United States Representative at the United Nations.

⁴⁵ Andrei A. Gromyko, Representative on the Soviet Delegation.

Mr. Villard said that he agreed entirely with Mr. Wadsworth. He thought the Delegation should stick to Syria. He saw no valid reason for putting up India as a candidate. He noted that it was Russia that was interested in putting that country forward. He thought the reason for that was to eliminate a western state from the Security Council.

Mr. Dulles thought it would be a great mistake to switch from Belgium to India. The latter was a government groping toward independence and had a parlous domestic situation. It lacked a firm government that could speak with effectiveness. Moreover, it was much more apt to be in the Soviet bloc than was Belgium. He noted that at lunch with Mr. Novikov the latter had said that he wanted India on the Sub-Committee on Trusteeship Agreements. Mr. Bloom added that the Russians had suggested in this connection that India would be acceptable to the Arab states.

Mr. Wadsworth said that Mr. El Khoury had come to see him late the previous evening to say that he had talked with the Indians, who had assured him that India was not a candidate if it meant displacing Syria. India wished to replace Belgium or Colombia. Thus, Mr. Wadsworth said, all the countries in that part of the world agreed that Syria was the best choice.

Senator Connally stated that he was all for the Indians, but noted that the lack of experience of India as a nation and its large amount of trouble at home made it questionable for the Security Council. He thought a nation should learn to walk before it tried to run. He did not think that Belgium should be kept off the Security Council.

Mr. Sandifer pointed out that the Delegation had received a telegram from the Department stating that it still supported the slate and wished the Delegation to continue to support it as long as possible. The Department was definitely opposed to India.

Senator Austin inquired whether anyone wished to propose a change in the Security Council slate. Hearing no motion, he declared that the slate remain unchanged.

Yesterday Gromyko asked for a frank discussion of slates for ECOSOC and advanced Russia's emphatic wish for the reelection of Yugoslavia and the election of Byelorussia to succeed the Ukraine. I asked him what priorities he had in the event we could not support both and he refused to express himself but obliquely suggested that if we would support Poland and Byelorussia they might be satisfied.

He also indicated that if he could count on our support for two candidates for ECOSOC they would go along with our slate for the Security Council.

I told Gromyko that I would report the United States position to him at an early date.

He assured me again that his Delegation had not yet discussed the question of permanent headquarters and that he would communicate with me as soon as they had, which he suspected would be early next week.⁴⁶

Dr. van Roijen, of the Netherlands Delegation, telephoned me this morning to say that as the result of a Netherlands Delegation meeting this morning, and pursuant to instructions received from The Hague, it had been decided that the Netherlands definitely desired to be a candidate for a seat on ECOSOC rather than to try for a seat on the Trusteeship Council. Dr. van Roijen added, however, that the Netherlands Delegation did not wish to put forward their candidacy for a seat on ECOSOC unless they were sure of a reasonable chance of success. They particularly wish to know whether they could expect support from the various Latin American Delegations. He said that he would very much appreciate information from the American Delegation along those lines as soon as possible.

He also confirmed the information that on their first vote the British will vote for India, rather than for Belgium.

He also confirmed information from other sources that Belgium is now completely ready to accept the responsibility of membership on the Security Council. This is the first admission to this effect from

Subject: Arab Slate for Councils Elections

1. Mr. Wadsworth and I have been informed, last evening and today, that the Arab Delegations, having received appropriate instructions, have decided unanimously that their candidates are:

Syria, for Security Council
Lebanon, for ECOSOC
Iraq, for Trusteeship Council

2. The Egyptian Ambassador to the United States,⁴⁷ speaking as "the Senior Arab Representative to the United States", made special point of saying he would go all out to plead full election of this slate. Adding that he "was sacrificing an interest of his own country" in thus supporting Lebanon, he urged that that State was a far more logical choice than the Netherlands for ECOSOC, Belgium being already a member. The Netherlands, he felt would wait until next year when Belgium went off, thus maintaining continuity of representation of the Belgian-Netherlands economic union.

3. Mr. Wadsworth and I gather anew that there will be extensive small-power support for this Arab slate, despite any preference we may express to the contrary, unless such expression of preference carry with it strongly expressed definitive opposition to a specifically-named state on the Arab slate. Our understanding of the Department's views is that no such opposition is to be expressed.

Subject: Slates

During a conversation with Mr. Gore-Booth this afternoon at Lake Success I told him that our proposals which had hitherto been described as tentative were now firm. He indicated that the British were in agreement with us with the exception of India rather than Belgium initially for the Security Council. They will undoubtedly support ⁴⁷ Mahmoud Hassan.

India as long as there is a chance for her to be elected, and if and when that should be foreclosed they will switch to Belgium.

I believe there is some doubt as to Uruguay in their mind, inasmuch as Mr. Gore-Booth seemed a bit depressed when I suggested that we were not too pleased over the efforts being made by Argentina in this matter.

United States Delegation Staff of Advisers*

[NEW YORK,] November 13, 1946.

Participants: Messrs. Sandifer
Dawson
Wadsworth
Raynor
Hall
Allen
Popper

An informal meeting was held on November 13, to discuss the prospects of election for our slate for the Economic and Social Council, which we felt to be growing dimmer as a result of developments during the last few days.⁴⁸

The Uruguayan situation was a source of anxiety for the United States Delegation. Ambassador Dawson had minuted Senator Austin on November 1 regarding the problem: "Unfortunately, the Uruguayans have been lamentably inactive in pushing Uruguay's candidacy in spite of the strong encouragement we have given them. . . . I inquired of Blanco [Juan Carlos Blanco, Head of the Uruguayan Delegation] why he or members of his delegation did not take a more active part in furthering Uruguay's candidacy, adding that, as he knew, we had gone to considerable lengths in making known our sympathetic attitude. After some urging on my part, he said that he would talk with some of the other Latin American delegates and particularly with those who are members of the Washington diplomatic corps and consequently his close personal friends." (IO Files, document US/A/96) In reporting a conversation with Señor Blanco that took place on November 4 Ambassador Dawson informed Senator Austin: "In the course of our conversation, Blanco intimated that the United States had not taken a sufficiently strong stand in backing Uruguay's candidacy. I took sharp issue with him and asked him if he were not aware of our circular telegram [see circular telegram of October 1 p. —]. He said that he knew of this but that he thought we could have gone further, particularly here in New York, in inducing countries claiming prior commitments to support Uruguay. . . . I told him that he must realize that we cannot impose a candidacy or exert pressure and that it was my opinion that we had gone considerably further in the case of Uruguay than we could probably do normally." (IO Files, document US/A/103)

It was pointed out that there was a danger that the Netherlands and New Zealand might not be elected as the candidacies of Yugoslavia and Lebanon for reelection were pushed, particularly since the Arab States might not support the Netherlands. It was also noted that no Latin American State might be elected if the American representatives did not reach an agreement on the Latin American candidate they should all support. The desirability of such an agreement from our point of view was stressed. Some disagreement was expressed with the conduct of the Uruguayans in the campaign, first because of their apathy and later because of their tendency to seek outside support by agreeing to vote for candidates not on our slate.

Those present agreed that it was of first importance that we secure all possible support for the Netherlands, New Zealand and Turkey. It was agreed specifically that the Uruguayans should be approached with this in view, in the light of their apparent commitment to the Lebanon. It was remarked that some other Latin American States might have made a similar commitment in seeking support for their candidacies. It was noted that the only way in which our favored candidates—including, of course, ourselves—could be supported under these circumstances would be for such Latin American States to drop the single Soviet satellite included on our slate and to vote for the Lebanon instead.

There was considerable discussion of our attitude toward the Lebanese candidacy. Mr. Wadsworth explained the view of the Arab States that one of their number should be represented on each United Nations Council and stressed the special importance of ECOSOC in linking the Arab States with the United Nations and assisting in the advancement of our Middle Eastern policies. He suggested that the Arab States might have a better claim on our support for one seat than the Latin Americans for their fourth seat on the Council, even though Syria was on our slate for the Security Council.

Mr. Sandifer and Ambassador Dawson remarked that it would be impossible even to intimate that we would not support a fourth Latin American State for election to ECOSOC. Mr. Sandifer also stated that while the Arab States should have proper representation in the organization as a whole, this did not mean that an Arab State must necessarily sit constantly on ECOSOC. It was noted that the Arab representation on the ECOSOC commissions was very satisfactory. Mr. Sandifer also stated that the basic decision on the slate had been made in the Department earlier, and that no changes in the slate could be considered here. Reference was also made to the undesirability of reelecting any member of ECOSOC other than the Big Five.

On this matter Mr. Wadsworth said that the Arab State representatives regarded the Lebanon as the best candidate to act in their common interest, but that if the reelection feature were the only undesirable element in the situation the Arab States would probably agree to substitute Egypt. As to our attitude with regard to the Lebanese candidacy, Mr. Wadsworth said that he was informing the Arabs that we were not supporting Lebanon but were not opposing its election. He was opposed to the exercise of any pressure in this connection.⁴⁹

⁴⁹ On November 19 the members and staff of the Delegation were informed in a Delegation memorandum dated November 18 that the Latin American delegations at a morning meeting on November 18 had definitely settled the question of a Latin American candidacy for ECOSOC with a unanimous decision to support Venezuela, after Mexico had withdrawn (IO Files, document US/A/149).

Council Elections

Mr. Sandifer expected that the greater part of the session would be taken up with the elections to the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council. He recalled that the United States slate for the Security Council was Belgium, Colombia, and Syria. It appeared from present evidence that the latter two would be elected on the first ballot. Other contenders included India, and there was just a possibility that it might be elected on a second ballot. In any case, the United States would continue to support Belgium unless some drastic change in the situation arose on the floor. Senator Austin inquired who might determine how the vote should be cast in that event. Mr. Sandifer replied that Senator Austin should make that decision with the advice of the Political Officers. Senator Austin stated that this matter was settled.

Mr. Sandifer recalled that the United States slate for the Economic and Social Council included the Netherlands, New Zealand, Poland, Venezuela, and Turkey. He noted that Lebanon was a strong contender.

PRIORITY

NEW YORK, November 19, 1946—11 p. m.

828. Elections held in General Assembly plenary session today to choose three members of Security Council and six members of ECOSOC⁵¹ produced following results:

Colombia, Syria, and Belgium were elected to Security Council on first ballot, gaining 51, 45, and 43 votes, respectively. The unsuccessful candidates were India (13 votes), Norway (4 votes), and Canada, Cuba, Greece, and Turkey with one vote apiece.

Only four of the six ECOSOC posts were filled in course of four ballots held after Security Council election. In the first ballot, with 36 of the 54 votes cast as the necessary majority, the US, Venezuela, and New Zealand were elected, with 51, 46, and 44 votes, respectively. Lebanon received 41 votes on the second ballot and was declared elected. In the third and fourth ballots, taken after a luncheon recess, no candidate received the requisite two-thirds majority of the 52 votes cast. General Assembly President Spaak thereupon postponed subsequent voting until the next plenary meeting, which a member of the Secretariat indicated would be held on December 6.

Voting for the remaining eligible candidates in the first four ballots is shown in the table below :

Country	1st ballot	2nd ballot	3rd ballot	4th ballot
Lebanon	35	41 (elected)
Netherlands	33	30	29	28
Turkey	30	32	28	29
Byelorussian SSR	25	22	25	28
Yugoslavia	27	27	22	19
Poland	10	6 (eliminated)

Poland attempted to withdraw in favor of Yugoslavia after the first ballot, but Spaak held that this was not possible under the General Assembly rules of procedure.

On the first ballot, the US voted for itself, Venezuela, New Zealand, The Netherlands, Turkey and Poland. On the second ballot, the US switched its support from Poland to the Byelorussian SSR, acting in accordance with Dept's position paper SD/A 31, of August 6, 1946. After the second ballot, USDel, following consultation with advisers and political officers, decided to vote for the Byelorussian SSR and The Netherlands for the two posts remaining to be filled. Byelorussian SSR was supported on the ground that it was important to give one seat to the eastern group, two of whose members are currently retiring from ECOSOC. The Netherlands was supported rather than Turkey because, after the election of Lebanon, this seemed most nearly in accord with the basis upon which our original slate had been selected and because it seemed undesirable from the standpoint of geographical distribution to elect a second Middle Eastern state to the Council. (Before the elections, commitments had been made to support both The Netherlands and Turkey).⁵²

During the luncheon recess, this information was communicated to the Turkish Ambassador, who stated that he considered the US still bound by its commitment and any departure therefrom a violation of our pledge. As the General Assembly was just about to reconvene for its 4 p. m. session when this news was received, Senator Austin telephoned directly to the Secretary,⁵³ and under his instructions voted on the third and fourth ballots for Turkey rather than The Netherlands,⁵⁴ and voted for the Byelorussian SSR for the second remaining vacancy.

⁵² During the luncheon recess and between the two plenary meetings this Delegation decision was communicated to the following by Mr. Raynor in separate conversations: Mr. Paul Gore-Booth of the British Delegation, Mr. Escott Reid of the Canadian Delegation, Minister Harry Andrews of the South African Delegation, Mr. Paul Hasluck of the Australian Delegation, and Minister Eriksson of the Swedish Delegation (501.BB/11-1946).

⁵³ See footnote 67, p. 237.

During the luncheon recess Gromyko had asked Senator Austin for the support of USDel for Byelorussia and Yugoslavia. After the telephone conversation with the Secretary and before the third ballot, the Senator told Gromyko that we would vote for Byelorussia but that we would not be able to vote for Yugoslavia.

 Mr. Randolph Harrison

Both Mr. van Roijen and Mr. Fack, of the Netherlands Delegation, sought me out to express their deep concern and disappointment over the action of the United States in withdrawing its support from the Netherlands for a seat on the ECOSOC. Mr. Fack said that losing the vote of the United States was bad enough in itself, but since the act of the United States was generally known due to newspaper publicity, he felt that it would undoubtedly influence other nations to withdraw their support from the Netherlands. Mr. van Roijen and Mr. Fack both expressed the earnest hope that the decision of the United States on this subject was not final and that it would reinstate the Netherlands in its slate.

⁵⁴ Mr. Raynor records the following in a memorandum of November 19: "Following Senator Austin's conversation with the Secretary, and in accordance with the Senator's express instructions, I told Dr. van Roijen [of the Netherlands Delegation] that because of a commitment to Turkey we had found it necessary on the next ballot [the third ballot] not to vote for the Netherlands. I explained to Dr. van Roijen that up to this point we had been informing other Delegations that we were voting for the Netherlands and that the time of receiving these instructions did not permit us to inform others of this change. I stated that on the next ballot, in my opinion, this would mean the loss of only one vote to them and should not in itself do any particular harm to their candidacy. I explained, of course, that this decision had nothing whatsoever to do with our relations and high regard for the Netherlands but had been dictated by other broad considerations which he could appreciate. He was most courteous but obviously the information came to him as a serious shock and disappointment." (501.BB/11-1946)

As a result of the discussion in the morning meeting in Mr. Acheson's office I called Mr. Ross and gave him the following information.

It had been the general consensus of the discussion this morning that the United States should support both Turkey and the Netherlands for the remaining two seats on the Economic and Social Council and should, therefore, drop its support for Byelo-Russia. There was unanimity in the recognition of the strategic importance of Turkey and it was felt essential that the United States should, therefore, continue its support for Turkey. Mr. Clayton pointed out the economic importance of the Netherlands, emphasizing especially that the Netherlands could be counted on as a supporter of our important trade policy.⁵⁵ A comparison of economic importance between the Netherlands and Byelo-Russia demonstrated the desirability of the Netherlands, which had just ceased to be a member of the Security Council, being elected to the Economic and Social Council. It was recognized that if we cease to continue our support of Byelo-Russia a probable consequence will be that Byelo-Russia will not be elected and this in turn would mean an unbalance as between regions. (The eastern European region was overbalanced last year because of the unexpected election of Yugoslavia as well as the anticipated election of the Ukraine. Election of the Netherlands and Turkey would mean no eastern European state elected this year. The only eastern European states which would then be on the Council for the next year would be Czechoslovakia and the U.S.S.R.) It was suggested that in as much as the eastern European region had been overrepresented to the extent of one state last year it would redress the balance to have them underrepresented to the extent of one state this year. It was, however, further recognized that Senator Austin had made a commitment to Gromyko yesterday to support Byelo-Russia. It was not clear whether this commitment had been fully complied with by our votes of yesterday or whether it represented a continuing commitment. In any event we had earlier committed ourselves to support Turkey and the Netherlands.

⁵⁵ For documentation on this subject, see pp. 1260 ff.

Mr. Acheson's decision, which he wished communicated to New York, was that while the consensus of the Department's views was that we should support Turkey and the Netherlands the effect of dropping our support for Byelo-Russia upon the Council of Foreign Ministers' negotiations should be considered.⁵⁶ In view of the fact that Senator Austin will be consulting the Secretary further on this whole subject, it was suggested that a final decision should be left to the Secretary who would naturally be in the best position to take into account all the over-all factors.

Subsequently Mr. Ross called me back and said that he was at the moment with Senator Austin who had been considering the Economic and Social Council elections situation in the light of the Department's views as I had earlier conveyed them to Mr. Ross. Mr. Ross said that the Senator considers his commitment to Gromyko of yesterday is a continuing one and not limited simply to the ballots taken yesterday. He said that the Senator feels it would damage his relations with the Soviet Delegation for the United States forthwith to cease its support of Byelo-Russia. Consequently the Senator would like to propose to the Secretary the following procedure: The Senator would inform the Turkish, Dutch and Soviet Delegations, and other delegations also, that we had intended on the fifth vote to vote for Turkey and Byelo-Russia as we had done on the third and fourth ballots. He would then say further that we plan to continue with that program on the fifth vote when it is taken but that if another ballot or ballots were required we will in such ballots vote for Turkey and the Netherlands. Mr. Ross said the Senator felt this would put all parties concerned on notice as to our intentions.

After talking to Mr. Acheson I called Senator Austin and said Mr. Acheson had asked me to convey the Department's views on this as follows: The Senator knows the shading of his commitment to Gromyko. In view of his feeling that a procedure of the kind he has suggested is necessary under the terms of his commitment and to preserve his relations with the Soviet Delegation, we are prepared to go along and would not object to this proposal being recommended to the Secretary by Senator Austin. However, if it were not for Senator Austin's commitment, we would prefer to have us in the next ballot vote for Turkey and the Netherlands. The Senator said that he would convey this message to the Secretary and would talk with the Secretary about the matter.

⁵⁶ The Secretary of State was in New York at this time attending the current session of the Council of Foreign Ministers; see vol. II, pp. 965 ff.

Memorandum of Conversation, by John C. Ross, Senior Adviser to the United States Delegation

[NEW YORK,] November 20, 1946.

Following my telephone conversation with Mr. Hiss on the question of election to the Economic and Social Council slates I went over the points we had discussed with Senator Austin.

Senator Austin felt that to drop Byelorussia at this time would be embarrassing to him in view of the commitment which he had given to Ambassador Gromyko to support Byelorussia.

Gromyko had urged that the United States support Yugoslavia and Byelorussia. The Senator had indicated we could not support Yugoslavia⁵⁷ but would support Byelorussia. Following his telephone conversation with the Secretary just before the four o'clock session of the Assembly yesterday when it was decided that the United States would support Turkey and Byelorussia, the Senator had gone to Mr. Gromyko and confirmed that we would not support Yugoslavia but would support Turkey and Byelorussia.

The Senator and I then tried to find a formula that would give him a fair release from his commitment to Gromyko and which would, at the same time, give some encouragement to the Dutch in line with the views developed in the Department this morning.⁵⁸ It occurred to us that these objectives might be accomplished if we were to make it known to the Russians, the Turks, and the Dutch that on the next (fifth) ballot we would again vote for Turkey and Byelorussia but that if this ballot should again result in a stalemate we would then vote for Turkey and the Netherlands, dropping Byelorussia at this point. If instead of resulting in a stalemate one of these three countries should be elected on the fifth ballot, then we would determine in the light of the circumstances which of the remaining two countries we would vote for.

⁵⁷ The following is recorded in a memorandum by Mr. Ward P. Allen, a Political Officer on the Delegation Staff, of a conversation with Ambassador Vlada Popovich, Representative on the Yugoslav Delegation, on November 26: "... Ambassador Popovich stated that he assumed that the United States was still opposed to Yugoslavia. He remarked that it would be unfair to oppose her and favor Turkey in view of the latter's well-known neutrality during the war. . . . Reaffirming our support for Byelorussia, it was suggested to him that where the United States had to choose among Yugoslavia, Netherlands and Turkey for the remaining post, he could understand that we would naturally favor either of the other two, with whom our relations were excellent and with whom no trouble had arisen concerning airplanes or other matters." (IO Files, document US/A/160) See vol. VI, pp. 867 ff., regarding these references.

We then discussed this briefly with Mr. Sandifer and I discussed this on the telephone with Mr. Hiss. He in turn discussed this proposal with Mr. Acheson and called back, speaking to Senator Austin and telling him that Mr. Acheson's reaction was that if the Senator felt that this proposal was the wisest one in view of the tactical situation then the Department would certainly go along. However, Mr. Acheson felt, subject of course to the Senator's views and the Senator's discussion with the Secretary, that the conclusions reached earlier in the morning as stated in my memorandum of conversation with Mr. Hiss were probably sound.

Senator Austin then telephoned Secretary Byrnes. He read to the Secretary my memorandum of conversation with Mr. Hiss and then explained, as stated above, the nature of his commitment to Gromyko. He then indicated the possible way out and the reaction which Mr. Acheson had to this proposal.

The Secretary made it very clear that despite the conclusions and reasons developed in the Department earlier this morning, he was perfectly clear in his own mind that the decision he had made yesterday for us to support Turkey and Byelorussia was the right one. He made it clear that the considerations he had in mind outweigh those advanced with regard to dropping Byelorussia in order to restore the Netherlands.

With reference to what our position should be after the next ballot the Secretary felt that we should not make any statement indicating that we would then support Turkey and the Netherlands. He said this would be too inflexible and would involve a commitment which we might find it difficult to get out of. He said that we might let it be known that our commitments would stand only for the next ballot. He said that if conditions then change we wouldn't consider ourselves bound. He felt that the Senator should hold himself free.

The Secretary felt that we should inform the Turks, the Dutch, the Russians and the Byelorussians where we stand. He did not seem to feel there was much point in taking the initiative in spreading our position among other delegations, although it was my impression that he felt if other delegations should ask us our position we should be free to state it. In closing the conversation the Secretary said his reaction right now was to stick by Byelorussia, which remark, in its context, seemed to imply quite clearly that the Secretary felt we should stick by Byelorussia, not only on the next ballot but any succeeding ballot.

Mr. Ross called me back and said that Senator Austin had talked with the Secretary and had informed him of the Department's views as set forth in a separate memorandum of conversation of today on the same subject. Mr. Ross said that the Secretary had not been impressed by the Department's arguments. The Secretary had decided that the Senator should tell the other delegations concerned that on the next ballot we will vote for Turkey and for Byelo-Russia and that thereafter we will consider ourselves as not being necessarily obligated to any delegation, reserving freedom of action to determine our vote after seeing the results of that ballot. The Secretary had emphasized the desirability of our maintaining the utmost flexibility. However, Mr. Ross said that it was clear from the Secretary's conversation with Senator Austin that the Secretary's mind is set in the direction of our continuing to support Turkey and Byelo-Russia. Mr. Ross had the impression that it would take considerable in the way of new developments to cause the Secretary to change his view on this.

Mr. Ross said that the Secretary left it to the discretion of Senator Austin as to how many other delegations should be informed of our position. Apparently the Secretary was aware of the fact that it would not be possible to keep our position a secret but had felt it was not desirable to make a public statement of the matter. Mr. Ross said the Secretariat is hoping that further plenary sessions can be postponed until December 6 in order to permit uninterrupted committee work. If further balloting is postponed until then there is certainly every likelihood of considerable inquiry developing on the part of other delegations and of the press as to the U.S. position.

Senator Austin plans to inform Dr. Van Kleffens⁵⁹ at dinner tonight of our position and is sending a note today to Gromyko. In view of the fact that we will continue on the next ballot to support Turkey, the Senator is informing the Turkish Delegation indirectly (I assume through Mr. Villard and Mr. Wadsworth).

[NEW YORK,] November 20, 1946.

If the Netherlands is not elected to the Economic and Social Council, it may be desirable, by way of compensation, to support the Netherlands for the Trusteeship Council whenever that agency is set up. It will be recalled that the Netherlands Delegation at one stage indicated that it might be inclined to stand for the Trusteeship Council rather than the Economic and Social Council.

The successful conclusion of the negotiations with the Indonesians might provide a more favorable atmosphere for the Netherlands candidacy on the Trusteeship Council than would previously have been the case.⁶¹

I would suggest that we consider substituting the Netherlands for Denmark on our Trusteeship Council Slate. The Danes do not appear to have shown any special interest in a position of this sort, and we have had at least one bad experience with an unenthusiastic candidate.⁶² I believe the Netherlands could make at least as good a contribution to the work of the Trusteeship Council as the Danes, and I think it very desirable from our point of view that the Netherlands should not be excluded completely from the United Nations Councils.

An alternative possibility would be to substitute the Netherlands for Egypt. This could be justified on the ground the Arab states were already represented on both the Security Council and ECOSOC, and on the ground that it is not politically expedient for us to support an Arab state for the Trusteeship Council in view of the Palestine situation.⁶³ In this connection it should be noted that, a few days ago, the Arab states agreed that Iraq would be their candidate for this council. We have always considered Iraq unacceptable.

for the Netherlands in the pending election of states to the Economic and Social Council. In addition to an excellent restatement of Netherlands general qualifications on economic grounds for the place, Mr. Reuchlin stated that there were important political reasons why the United States should support the Netherlands. He said that the U.S. Government is interested in seeing the Netherlands Parliament approve the recently initialled agreement with the Indonesian leaders⁶⁴ and he fears that if we do not support the Netherlands for ECOSOC, it may cost the agreement votes in Parliament. I told Mr. Reuchlin that I felt that the Netherlands had an excellent case for membership on general grounds but that his complicated political arguments frankly left me a little cold.

I told Mr. Reuchlin that last night Senator Austin had informed Mr. Van Kleffens that the U.S. would vote for Turkey and Byelorussia on the next ballot and that thereafter we would consider ourselves completely free to vote in any way we considered wise. Mr. Reuchlin brightened perceptibly and said that he assumed that this meant that we would vote for the Netherlands. I replied that his assumption was incorrect; that the statement meant exactly what it said and that our vote would depend upon circumstances at the moment.

Subject: Turkey's Candidacy for Economic and Social Council

The Turkish Ambassador,⁶⁶ after calling by special appointment this morning on Senator Austin regarding the subject noted above, called on me with a view to asking that I make careful memorandum of his views in the matter.

It was, he said, a matter to which he attached "much importance"; he had spoken "frankly and in all sincerity" with Senator Austin. He had marshalled his ideas clearly and presented them substantially as follows:

"Turkey appreciates highly American support for a seat on ECOSOC; but, in all frankness, there appears to be a contradiction between principle and practice in extending such support. In practice two wrongs have been done Turkey, one before the elections of last Tuesday and the other during the balloting.

"The result of the second wrong was that Turkey was not elected. It had received 30 votes on the first ballot, 33 on the second. Only 3 more were needed for the election. It was American action and only American action which prevented Turkey receiving on the third ballot well over the 36 votes needed for election.

"To explain these two wrongs:

"The first was when in the thinking of the American Delegation, the seat held by Greece was considered to be a European seat. The elections in London had given two seats to Near Eastern countries, Greece and Lebanon. Turkey posed its candidature for the Greek seat. This was told the Department of State several weeks ago. We thought at the time, as apparently did the Department, that Egypt would be the Arab candidate to replace Lebanon.

"What later happened seems to have been that the American Delegation decided not to support Lebanon for reelection and, consequently, to support Turkey for the Lebanese seat and the Netherlands for the Greek seat. But we were supporting an Arab state and the Arab states were supporting us. Obviously this could not be for the same seat. What the American Delegation did in fact do was to support us for a seat which did not exist. It was clear some time ago that an Arab state (Lebanon by choice of the Arab states) would hold that one seat. The American Delegation, in reality though not by intention, voted for two seats, Turkey and the Netherlands, for the Greek seat.

"What then should be American action in the face of the resulting situation? The essence of solution appears to lie in returning the Greek seat to its original setting. If this be done, the American and an ample number of other Delegations will support Turkey. This involves, of course, "dropping" the Netherlands; but, when a wrong is to be righted, the best approach is to return to first truths.

"Senator Austin has said that he will vote for Turkey on the next ballot; but he appears to feel that further than that he cannot commit himself. I feel that, if he adopts my premise, we shall be elected on that ballot; but I do not agree that, if there be need for further balloting, he should not support us all the way through.

"Elsewise, the American Delegation would simply be saving appearances: One vote for us, then a shift to Netherlands. If this were to become known, as these things do become known, the Netherlands election would be assured.

"Let us assume that Byelorussia is elected on the next ballot, with Turkey and Netherlands running a close second and third and Yugoslavia a poor fourth. Then, for the next balloting, Yugoslavia would have to drop out of the race; and it would be between Turkey and Netherlands. That is just the moment when support for Turkey would be most needed; when the issue as to Turkey's succession to the Greek seat would have to be faced most squarely.

"Now for the second wrong. That was when, after the first two votes, members of the American Delegation spread the word—and I have it from several Latin-American colleagues—that it would vote for Netherlands and Byelorussia on the ground that Lebanon, a Near Eastern State having been elected, it felt it need no longer support Turkey.

“Fortunately, the wrong was partially righted by Mr. Villard’s twelfth-hour intercession;⁶⁷ but it came too late to do more than bring about the stalemate with which the Assembly was faced. We were saved, but not elected as would assuredly have been the case had the third vote not been prejudiced by the earlier circulated word of American renunciation of support for Turkey.

“What now should be done? The answer would seem to be the same as to the first question, i.e., support Turkey to the end and let it be known that that is to be done. Elsewise, an odd sort of conclusion would seem to be forced on us, i.e., that we would have a better chance of election were we to become a Soviet satellite.

“As a last comment, remember that the Russians asked you to support their satellite candidate. Did you ask that in return they support your candidate Turkey? We do not ask for the Russian vote, nor do we ask you to ask for it; but, were they to give it, it would prove that they can be amiable towards us, and that would be all to the good. We simply submit these thoughts for your consideration.”

I assured the Ambassador that I had taken careful notes of his exposition and would prepare a memorandum thereof for Senator Austin and Mr. Henderson, as he had requested.

Subject: Economic and Social Council Elections

Our abandonment of the Netherlands is having a most unfortunate, although natural, reaction on them. Reports reaching us by the “grapevine” indicate that members of the Netherlands Delegation have been stating to other people that this illustrates that the United States can not be depended upon, that it is unfortunate that a friend who has proved himself a true friend should be thrown over because of pressures of a “nuisance type”, and that they wonder if it is worth standing ⁶⁷ No documentation is provided here on a sharp disagreement that arose at this time within the United States Delegation Staff of Advisers as to whether Mr. Henry S. Villard (Adviser, Political Officer, and within the Department the Deputy Director of the Office of Near Eastern and African Affairs) was consulted in the Delegation’s decision to drop Turkey from the United States slate on November 19 between the second and third ballots (memorandum by Mr. Popper, November 21, 501.BB/11-2146, and memorandum by Mr. Villard, November 25, 501.BB/11-2546). It is stated in Mr. Villard’s memorandum that Senator Austin’s decision to consult with the Secretary of State by telephone at that time was due to an intervention in the situation by Mr. Villard after he had had a talk with the Turkish Ambassador, a successful intercession in the event as the Secretary directed that Turkey’s name be restored to the United States slate; see telegram 828, November 19, from New York, p. 226.

by a country if an unpredictable reaction of this type may be expected in return.

It is my opinion that our decision to vote for Byelorussia and Turkey on the next ballot is tantamount to the election on that ballot of Byelorussia, assuming that the Soviets are normally keen on the matter. If they do display normal keenness, they can be expected to concentrate the votes now distributed between Byelorussia and Yugoslavia in favor of Byelorussia and thus elect Byelorussia.

If this comes about the next ballot would then be between the Netherlands and Turkey. As I understand it, decision has already been made in favor of Turkey as between these two. If my analysis, therefore, is correct, as I see it we have already abandoned the Netherlands.

In view thereof I am raising in the Department the question as to whether it would be advisable to support the Netherlands for the Trusteeship Council. If this is done we must have a decision on a very firm basis because it would be even more than the goodwill of the Dutch can be expected to understand to repeat the ECOSOC experience on another Council election.

I think it is very important that we make a prompt decision as to what we will do on the second ballot. Until such decision is made I do not think it is wise for us to talk on this subject with other Delegations. In fact, I think that if we have indeed abandoned the Netherlands that it would be better to confine this act to ourselves alone and not damage the position of the Netherlands further by telling other Delegations of our action.

Our reasons for preferring Netherlands to Byelorussia as candidate for ECOSOC are set out below for your consideration when subject is next discussed by Secretary and USDel: (1) Among remaining candidates for three-year membership on ECOSOC, Netherlands is only state willing and able to collaborate wholeheartedly in creation and implementation of ITO, in our view, most important tasks to be undertaken by ECOSOC. (2) Netherlands has demonstrated unswerving fidelity to western democratic principles in all organs UN and Van Kleffens has made particularly notable contribution to work of SC. Subject: ECOSOC Slate—The Netherlands

1. In addition to the reasons advanced in Department's 293 of November 22 for preferring Netherlands to Byelorussia with which I fully agree, I submit the local situation must also be taken into account. It is as follows:

a. We have just as much of a commitment to the Netherlands as we have to Turkey or Byelorussia (I do not believe at this stage of balloting that we really have a commitment beyond the next ballot to anyone).

b. The Netherlands "hat would not be in the ring" except for the fact that her name appeared on our slate.

c. We have told other delegations from the beginning that the Netherlands was a candidate in whom we were especially interested.

d. As late as during the luncheon recess on the day of the election we campaigned actively for the Netherlands.

e. In addition to supporting our policy strongly over the past year in the Security Council and elsewhere, Netherlands has been one of our few supporters here in the General Assembly on such matters as Relief and Contributions to the Budget. It could have been counted on to go down the line with us on Spain (perhaps the only European state to do so).

2. I am not urging in view of decision already taken that we vote for the Netherlands rather than Turkey, but that if Byelorussia is not elected on the next ballot that on the following ballot we vote for the Netherlands rather than Byelorussia.

certainly vote for Turkey on the next ballot but that our course of action after that, if further balloting were necessary, had not been finally decided.

Mr. Esin then said that he wished to urge the United States Delegation not to mention the position described above in conversation with members of other delegations. He said that the element of uncertainty as to our course of action following the fifth ballot would only cast doubt in the minds of those whose support Turkey was endeavoring to enlist in its candidacy. He referred particularly in this connection to the Latin American States, and said that the lack of a clear cut attitude on our part would only weaken Turkey's case.

I assured Mr. Esin that the United States Delegation had in fact adopted a policy of not discussing its position on the two remaining Economic and Social Council seats pending final clarification of our intentions.

Mr. Esin also urged that when we had finally made up our minds on the slate, which he hoped would be to support Turkey all the way through, we would notify other delegations of our decision. He felt that this was especially important in the case of the Latin Americans, who would probably follow the United States' lead and whose vote might well be the deciding factor in the situation.

They were hopeful that the United States, British and Soviet Delegations might come to some agreement which would result in the prompt election of one eastern European and one other state to the remaining seats on the Council. I told Brigadier Williams that as far as I knew no such informal arrangements as he mentioned had been made. Brigadier Williams said that he would continue his contacts with other Delegations and inform me of the results of these contacts. He said that he believed the Secretary-General might advise Mr. Spaak, if there were no final results from the next ballot, to postpone subsequent balloting until there had been a further opportunity for informal consultation among the Delegations.

He also said that he understood that there was some thought of proposing the Netherlands for a seat on the Trusteeship Council in order to console them for a possible defeat in the Economic and Social Council balloting. He, however, understood that the Netherlands did not desire a seat on the Trusteeship Council at this time, although they might wish to be a candidate for the Council in some future year.

The Netherlands Ambassador called today to discuss US support for the election of the Netherlands to ECOSOC and to discuss informally the Netherlands-Indonesian Agreement. Dr. Loudon pointed out that he was in New York when it was learned that the US had abandoned its support for the Netherlands as a member of ECOSOC and that he had consequently instructed Mr. Daubanton and Mr. Reuchlin, his Ministers in Washington, to voice the protest of his country to the State Department. The Ambassador expressed official disappointment at our move and said that the Netherlands regarded itself as a more important nation economically than Turkey. I observed that the US fully appreciated the economic importance of the Netherlands and the support which the Netherlands was expected to give to our proposals for broadening the bases of world trade. I explained, however, that the election of Lebanon had confused our position since it left us with three candidates for two positions. I added that the matter was being handled personally by the Secretary and that it was my understanding that the Secretary was discussing our position with Senators Austin, Connally and Vandenberg this afternoon. I advised the Ambassador that if his Government wished to discuss the matter further it should be taken up in New York.

U. S. SLATE FOR TRUSTEESHIP COUNCIL

1. The Problem

On October 22 the Delegation deferred action on the Trusteeship Council slate recommended by the Department of State pending developments in Committee 4. That slate consisted of Egypt, Denmark, and the Philippine Republic in the order named.

As the prospect now appears good for action on a sufficient number of trusteeship agreements⁷² to make it possible to establish the Council at this session of the Assembly, it is necessary to establish a slate which the Delegation will support in the election. The number of members to be elected will be either two or four depending upon the number of agreements approved.

2. Recommendations

(1) The following slate is proposed for consideration as a result of consultation among the Advisers principally concerned with this matter. The question is concurrently under consideration in the Department of State.

First seat—Iraq
 Second seat—Netherlands, or Brazil, or Denmark
 Third seat—Philippine Republic, or Brazil, or Denmark
 Fourth seat—Brazil, or India, or a Soviet satellite

(2) If a full slate is not elected on the first two ballots the Delegation should be given authority to cast its vote in such a manner as to produce the closest possible approximation to our desired slate.

[3.] Discussion

(1) The substitution of Iraq for Egypt is based upon the decision of the Arab states to support Iraq as their candidate. The votes controlled by the Arab League may be important in securing the two-thirds majority in the Assembly necessary to approval of the trusteeship agreements.

(2) a. Support for the Netherlands has been suggested in the event that it is not elected to the Economic and Social Council and if it desires to be a candidate.

b. Brazil is an active contender for a seat on the ground of the contribution it could make to the Council as a Latin American state with experience in the administration of undeveloped tropical territory. It is believed that it could secure a number of votes in the Assembly for approval of the trusteeship agreements. Brazil will remain on the Security Council for another year.

c. Denmark is suggested because of the desirability of including a progressive country interested in equal treatment in social, economic, and commercial matters. The Danes have not been approached on this subject and have given us no indication that they would be interested in the post.

(3) The Philippine Republic, a newly independent state, has shown a consistent interest in trusteeship problems and desires a seat on the Council.

(4) In view of the heavy representation which the Western democracies will have on the Council, it might be desirable from the point of view of adequate balance to support India or a Soviet satellite. This might be particularly true if no Soviet satellite is elected to the Economic and Social Council this year.

*Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs

[WASHINGTON,] December 4, 1946.

Mr. Dulles⁷³ called me from New York this morning and said that he had just learned from Senator Austin that consideration was being given to our supporting the Netherlands for the Trusteeship Council. He said that he understood the background of this proposal and appreciated the motives which lead to it; however, he said that he thought it would completely destroy the chances of getting the Trusteeship Council established at this session for the following reasons:

The Soviets, the Chinese, the Indians and others have been asserting that the proposed trusteeship agreements are merely devices by which the colonial powers will make the trust territories colonial dependencies. Consequently their tendency is to defeat approval of the trusteeship agreements unless the administering powers agree to far-reaching amendments. The proposed administering powers, in turn, are clearly not willing to go very far in accepting major changes. The strength of our position has been our insistence upon the desirability of some form of trusteeship supervision which can only be accomplished if agreements are approved and the Trusteeship Council established. We have pointed out that unless the agreements are approved there will be no international supervision. This, we say, should not be satisfactory to those claiming to be the chief advocates of the interests of dependent peoples.

Mr. Dulles says that if word gets around that we are going to support the Netherlands for membership on the Trusteeship Council this would assure the Council having a majority of the colonial powers and would let the Soviet-Chinese-Indian bloc oppose the approval of the agreements more effectively on the ground that no good could be expected from creation of such a Trusteeship Council in any event. Mr. Dulles said he felt so strongly about this point that he might have to drop out of representing us on trusteeship matters if we were to support the Netherlands for the Trusteeship Council. He said he had only just heard the point this morning and that he feels Senator Austin now thoroughly understands his views.

I explained to him that the Senator had been discussing this very point with the Secretary and that I did not know what, if any, decision the Secretary had reached. He said that he would himself get in touch with the Secretary.

I pointed out to Mr. Dulles that the proposed Netherlands action in granting autonomy to the East Indies had seemed to remove much of the stigma of their being a colonial power. Mr. Dulles disagreed and said that in the work of the Trusteeship Committee of the General Assembly the Netherlands have supported the colonial powers 100 percent, much more so that [than?] we ourselves have. Consequently they are in the Assembly completely identified with the colonial powers.

I said that I would call his views to the attention of others in the Department.

Mr. Dulles added that at the moment, unless some such development as our committing ourselves to support the Netherlands for the Trusteeship Council occurs, he is optimistic as to the prospects of establishing the Trusteeship Council at this session. Consequently he considers the issue a real and current one.

Trusteeship Council Slates

Mr. Sandifer recalled that in the previous discussion on the Trusteeship Council slates the decision had been postponed since it was not certain that there would be a Trusteeship Council. Now, however, it appeared that a Council would be set up and our slate must be ready. He recalled that earlier the Department's slate had been Egypt, Denmark and the Philippines. However, on later consideration, the following recommendation had been drawn up (US/A/169) : ⁷⁴

"2. Recommendations

(1) The following slate is proposed for consideration as a result of consultation among the Advisers principally concerned with this matter. The question is concurrently under consideration in the Department of State.

First seat—Iraq

Second seat—Netherlands, or Brazil, or Denmark

Third seat—Philippine Republic, or Brazil or Denmark

Fourth seat—Brazil, or India, or a Soviet satellite

Mr. Dulles said that whether there were enough agreements negotiated to establish a Trusteeship Council depended largely upon what the Council was going to be like when it was set up. He said there would be a lot of log-rolling in order to get the agreements passed. It was very apparent that there was no desire to have a Trusteeship Council if it was to be dominated by the colonial powers. He pointed out that one-half of the Trusteeship Council was to consist of administering authorities and, since the Council operated by a majority vote, if another colonial power were added to the Council there would be a majority of colonial powers. He thought that if that kind of a Council were to be established there would be no Council for there would be no agreements concluded. Specifically, he thought, placing the Netherlands on the Council might prevent the creation of that body.

Mr. Dulles agreed that it was vital to have an Arab member on the Council in order to have the necessary agreements concluded, since the Arab bloc plus the Soviet bloc was an important factor. Iraq had handled itself very well in the Trusteeship Committee. Originally, he had opposed Iraq because of its attitude on Palestine but now he thought it was necessary to elect it to the Trusteeship Council.

Mr. Sandifer pointed out that Iraq was the choice of the Arab states.

Senator Austin noted that Brazil was very anxious to be elected. Mr. Dulles said that he would like to see Brazil on the Council. He noted that Mexico always voted with Russia in Committee IV. Ambassador Dawson noted that Brazil was the only country which had made a strong plea for membership. Mr. Gerig noted that Cuba was actively competing.

⁷⁴ United States Delegation Position Paper dated December 4, p. 242.

Mr. Dulles said that he favored the list in the position paper US/A/169 with the elimination of the Netherlands and also provided that there was a Latin American state which would bring to the United States position the votes it needed. Senator Austin commented that he thought that if Brazil were assured of our support it would work for the United States.

Mr. Sandifer pointed out that Brazil was on the Security Council and had another year to serve on that body. He thought that on the face of it, that raised the question as to whether it was desirable to give another Council seat to Brazil, or wanted to elect some other Latin American state. Mr. Dawson commented that Cuba and Peru were both possibilities, but they were both on the Economic and Social Council. He noted that Argentina was not pushing its candidacy.

Mr. Raynor said that he would be agreeable to eliminating the Netherlands, provided it was placed on the Economic and Social Council slate in the next ballot. He thought Mr. Dulles' arguments were cogent for not supporting the Netherlands for the Trusteeship Council. He noted, in passing, that the reason the Netherlands had pushed its candidacy for the Economic and Social Council was because it had learned it was on the United States slate.

Senator Austin polled the Delegation on eliminating the Netherlands from the Trusteeship Council slate and this was unanimously approved.

Senator Vandenburg urged strongly that the Netherlands should be put on the Economic and Social Council slate, because he said the Netherlands was being thrown out the window in the Assembly's selections. Senator Austin agreed, and said that the Delegation should think over whether it wished to substitute the Netherlands for Turkey or Byelorussia.

Mr. Dulles inquired when the information might be passed to Iraq that the United States would support it for the Trusteeship Council. Mr. Sandifer replied that he thought the Department could be consulted quickly during the morning. Mr. Dulles said that since he had given the Secretary a memorandum on the question, he thought that clearance could be quickly obtained. He requested that the matter of handling the tactics of informing the Iraq Delegation should be left to him and Mr. Wadsworth.

Senator Austin reported that Brazil came around to see him every day to inquire how he was progressing with the Brazilian Trusteeship Council candidacy.

Mr. Sandifer said he would like to have the Delegation's reaction as to whether India or a Soviet satellite be supported for the fourth seat. Mr. Sandifer apologized for the use of the term "Soviet satellite" in Document US/A/169. Mr. Dulles thought the word "or" in the phrase "India or a Soviet satellite" was superfluous. The choice for the third seat should also be decided between Denmark and the Philippines, Mr. Sandifer said.

Mr. Gerig pointed out that if the Strategic Area Agreements of the United States were approved, there would be four elected Members on the Trusteeship Council. In answer to Mr. Dulles' question, he said that he thought the Assembly could elect members to fill those seats on a contingent basis.

Mr. Allison said that the Far East Office of the Department felt very strongly that the Philippines should be supported for a Trusteeship Council seat. If there were to be four elected members, the office would like the Philippines to have the third seat. The Department felt that the Philippine Republic should be included as a new country, recently free, and because the Far East was represented only by China. Also the Philippines badly wanted to be a member. Mr. Allison said that General Romulo⁷⁵ frequently asked him about his candidacy.

Mrs. Roosevelt said that she would like to see Denmark rather than India on the Council. She thought the Philippines should be selected. Mr. Raynor said that he would like to see slate consisting of Denmark and the Philippines. Mrs. Roosevelt continued that the Danish Representative on Committee III was an extremely able person. She thought that the Danish background would be useful in the Trusteeship Council and that it would bring a healthy note to its discussions, whereas India would probably not do so.

Senator Austin polled the Delegation and secured unanimous approval for the Trusteeship Council slate as follows:

First seat: Iraq
 Second seat: Brazil
 Third seat: Philippine Republic
 Fourth seat: Denmark

The meeting adjourned at 9:30 a.m.⁷⁶

⁷⁵ Ambassador Carlos P. Romulo, Head of the Philippines Delegation.

⁷⁶ In telegram 928, December 5, 5:30 p.m., from New York, the tentative slate approved by the Delegation was named, a brief summary given of the Delegation's discussion, and the Department's "views on the subject" requested "at earliest convenience". In the fourth paragraph of the telegram Senator Austin stated that "Although point was not specifically discussed, it is apparently consensus of delegation that, if a full slate has not been elected after the ballots, delegation should be given authority to cast its vote in such manner as to produce closest possible approximation to our desired slate." (501.BE/12-546)

In telegram 308, December 6, 7 p. m., to New York, the Acting Secretary of State (Acheson) informed the Delegation that "Although preferring Philippines as candidate for one of first two seats, Department approves slate recommended in your para one on basis Delegation's estimate of importance of proposed TrustCo [Trusteeship Council] slate to issue of obtaining wide GA support for approval of pending trusteeship agreements and consequent establishment TrustCo. . . . *Memorandum of Telephone Conversation, by the Acting Secretary

[WASHINGTON,] December 6, 1946.

Senator Austin called me this morning and asked for my advice on the following three matters:

[Here follows discussion of the question of finding a site for the permanent headquarters of the United Nations.]

The second point on which he wished instructions was the question of our support of Turkey, the Netherlands or Byelo-Russia for a place on ECOSOC. He said that under the direction of Secretary Byrnes there had been transmitted to Turkey and Russia a statement of our intention to vote for Turkey and Byelo-Russia on the next ballot and then consider ourself free to take whatever course the situation convinces us we should take. He said there were three situations that might develop on which he would like our advice. However, as our conversation progressed, he mentioned only two.

The first is the question of what he should do in case of a deadlock on this ballot.

The second situation he foresaw was the election of one country, perhaps Byelo-Russia, leaving our decision to be made as to which of the other two we should vote for on succeeding ballots. I told him that he must ask Secretary Byrnes how this question should be handled. We understood that the number one country on which we should center all the way through was Turkey. It was not yet understood that Mr. Byrnes wished us to advise Turkey that we planned to do so. Senator Austin said he would have a talk with Mr. Byrnes about this point.

As between the Netherlands and Byelo-Russia, we understand that Mr. Byrnes wishes to support Byelo-Russia because of the wide considerations of policy. We understand, however, that he does not wish to make our position known to the Russians. Senator Austin said that he would try to see Secretary Byrnes and get his specific instructions on this point.

[Discussion followed on the third subject named by Senator Austin. It concerned an informal proposal by Mr. Lie for a Deputy Secretary-Generalship of the United Nations.]

[NEW YORK,] December 8, 1946.

Dr. van Royen⁷⁷ told me in greatest confidence this noon that Belgium wished to resign its seat on the Economic and Social Council in order to enable the Netherlands to have a place on this Council. He asked me if I would check with our charter constitutional experts in an effort to ascertain whether or not in their opinion there was any way this could be accomplished without opening the whole matter up to new elections which might conceivably develop in neither Belgium nor the Netherlands being on the Council.

After checking with our experts I informed Dr. van Royen that as we saw it Rule 88 which called for a by-election was the only rule applicable and that therefore as much as we would like to see the solution worked out, we were unable to select the method which would avoid the risk mentioned above. He then told me that the latest thinking in the Belgian and Dutch Delegations on the subject was to put the matter up frankly to the Assembly asking for a vote on a hypothetical basis as to whether if Belgium resigned the Assembly would elect the Netherlands. This is not a final decision and is subject to further consideration between the Belgian and Netherlands Delegations.⁷⁸

[WASHINGTON,] December 13, 1946.

Mr. Gerig⁷⁹ telephoned this morning to say that the Delegation was considering the slate for elections to the Trusteeship Council. Its present slate, approved by the Department, consisted of Iraq and Brazil. Ambassador Dawson and Mr. Hall⁸⁰ had reported, however, ⁷⁷ Dr. J. H. van Roijen, Representative on the Netherlands Delegation.

⁷⁹ Benjamin Gerig, Adviser on the United States Delegation Staff, and within the Department, Chief of the Division of Dependent Area Affairs.

that Mexico was rapidly becoming a more important candidate than Brazil. The Mexicans were campaigning actively, and claim to have obtained sixteen of the Latin American votes and the six Arab votes. Senator Austin felt so deeply committed to Brazil that he could not switch his vote to Mexico if Brazil did not withdraw its candidacy. The question was being considered, therefore, as to whether the Delegation should now vote for Brazil on the first ballot but not campaign for the Brazilian candidacy. If the first ballot revealed that Mexico was in the lead the Delegation might then switch its vote to Mexico on the second ballot. Mr. Gerig asked that I consult ARA on this matter.

I subsequently telephoned Mr. Miner⁸¹ of SPA since he has been handling the slate question. Mr. Miner said that he had received similar information from Mr. Popper in New York but had been unable to consult ARA on this matter. Mr. Miner asked that I check with Mr. Gerig to make sure that Mr. Dulles would have no objection to the selection of Mexico since Mr. Hiss had previously understood that Mr. Dulles was not satisfied with the Mexican approach to trusteeship questions. I then telephoned Mr. Gerig who said that, while the Delegation had had some doubts about Mexico early in the Assembly, the Mexican representatives in Committee 4 had been very helpful throughout the discussions, whereas, the Brazilian representatives had contributed absolutely nothing. On the question of monopolies, only Mexico and Uruguay had supported the United States position. Mr. Gerig did not think, therefore, that Mr. Dulles would have any objection to the selection of Mexico. I gave this information to Mr. Miner who said that he would consult ARA as soon as possible and prepare a telegram on the Department's position.

I asked Mr. Gerig whether any consideration had been given to the contingent election of two additional seats to the Trusteeship Council in order to anticipate approval of the United States trusteeship agreement by the Security Council. Mr. Gerig said that nothing had been done on this point and that he felt it was too late to raise it in the Plenary Session.⁸²

⁸¹ Robert G. Miner of the Office of the Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs.

⁸² The Department replied in telegram 321, December 13, 7 p. m., that it had "no objections to Gadel supporting Mexico instead of Brazil for TC, if Gadel considers such action desirable, and provided previous commitment to Brazil discharged". (501.BB/12-1346)

With the adoption by the General Assembly of seven trusteeship agreements on December 13 (see pp. 544 ff.) the conditions requisite for the constitution of the Trusteeship Council were fulfilled, and the Assembly proceeded to entertain a resolution submitted by the Fourth Committee calling for the same (GA(I/2), Plenary, pp. 1266 ff.). Final action was deferred until December 14 when the General Assembly elected Iraq and Mexico to the two seats on the new Council available on an elective basis; see ibid., pp. 1320 ff.

This action by the General Assembly completed the establishment of the last of the principal organs of the United Nations and so of the Organization itself.

Amendments to the redraft of the provisional rules of procedure for the Security Council proposed by the Soviet representative.⁸⁶

⁸³ Alger Hiss, Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs in the Department of State. For documentation relating to the organization and arrangements effected for the conduct of United States relations with the United Nations, see pp. 1 ff.

⁸⁴ Harding F. Bancroft of the Division of International Security Affairs. At this time the United States Delegation to the United Nations (hereafter referred to as the Permanent Delegation) was being organized in New York and Mr. Bancroft was about to be detailed there as an adviser on matters relating to the Security Council with specific reference to the work of the Committee of Experts.

⁸⁵ The Committee of Experts was established by the Security Council on January 17 to draft permanent rules of procedure for that body. It was composed of a representative of each of the eleven members of the Security Council, and at this time the chairman of the committee was the Chinese delegate, Mr. Yuen-li-Liang.

At the last meeting in London on February 8 delegates of the Committee were asked to be prepared, upon the re-convening of the Committee in New York in March, to submit any new rules of procedure, or revision of rules then in use, in which they might be interested. When the Committee did reassemble in New York on March 20 it was presented with a memorandum dated March 18 from the Secretary-General of the United Nations entitled "Statement on the Rules of Procedure of the Security Council". Among other things the Committee was invited by the Secretary-General to consider the importance of the distinction between “Rule 31. Should the Security Council consider a dispute, provided for by Article 33⁸⁷ of the Charter, a party to the dispute shall abstain from voting in accordance with paragraph 3 of Article 27⁸⁸ of the Charter.

Should the Security Council consider a situation provided for by Article 34⁸⁹ or any other dispute which does not fall under Article 33, all the members of the Security Council are entitled to participate in voting.

The decision of whether the question under consideration by the Security Council is of procedural nature and also of whether the question under consideration is a dispute or situation and whether this dispute is of the nature referred to in Article 33 of the Charter shall be regarded as accepted if it is voted for by seven members of the Security Council including the concurring votes of all the permanent members of the Security Council.[”] “dispute” and “situation” with reference to the voting procedure of the Security Council under Article 27, in the light of the experience of the Security Council during the sessions in London in January and February. It was at this point that the Soviet proposal was presented. It may be noted parenthetically that in the Department of State meanwhile a rather general approach was being taken to the whole question of rules of procedure.

The Soviet proposal was printed as Committee of Experts document S/Procedure/17, March 22, 1946 and the Secretary-General's memorandum as document S/Procedure/12, March 18, 1946; the Secretariat memorandum is printed in SC, 1st yr., 1st series, Suppl. No. 2, pp. 8 ff., annex 1b.

The Russians submitted four proposed rules of procedure, both amendments to existing (provisional) rules and wholly new rules. Only the rule relating to voting under Article 27 (proposed Rule 31) is considered here.

⁸⁷ Article 33 states: “1. The parties to any dispute, the continuance of which is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security, shall, first of all, seek a solution by negotiation, enquiry, mediation, conciliation, arbitration, judicial settlement, resort to regional agencies or arrangements, or other peaceful means of their own choice. 2. The Security Council shall, when it deems necessary, call upon the parties to settle their dispute by such means.”

⁸⁸ Article 27 reads: “1. Each member of the Security Council shall have one vote. 2. Decisions of the Security Council on procedural matters shall be made by an affirmative vote of seven members. 3. Decisions of the Security Council on all other matters shall be made by an affirmative vote of seven members including the concurring votes of the permanent members; provided that, in decisions under Chapter VI, and under paragraph 3 of Article 52, a party to a dispute shall abstain from voting.”

⁸⁹ Article 34 reads: “The Security Council may investigate any dispute, or any situation which might lead to international friction or give rise to a dispute, in order to determine whether the continuance of the dispute or situation is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security.”

12. For Ross⁹⁰ and Blaisdell⁹¹ from Johnson.⁹² There is set forth below a memorandum of conversation between Mr. Lawford,⁹³ U.K. Delegation and Mr. Joseph E. Johnson :

I called on Mr. Lawford at the Savoy Plaza on the evening of March 26 at his suggestion to discuss the work of the Committee of Experts.

He began by saying that Sir Alexander's⁹⁴ instructions in general envisaged close cooperation with the United States Delegation, and in the course of the discussion, he made this even clearer by reading an instruction relative to the proposed Soviet amendments.

[Here follows discussion of the Russian proposals for Rules 19, 32, and 33, which are not being considered here.]

On the third Soviet proposal,⁹⁵ Mr. Lawford said that they had requested instructions and legal opinion. He read to me extracts from the legal opinion, which he commented did not help a great deal. He indicated that he thought that Section II (2) of the Four Power statement at San Francisco⁹⁶ put us in a rather difficult position on ⁹⁰ John C. Ross, Deputy Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs.

⁹¹ Donald C. Blaisdell, Associate Chief of the Division of International Security Affairs.

⁹⁵ Proposed Rule 31.

⁹⁶ For the Statement by the Delegations of the Four Sponsoring Governments on Voting Procedure in the Security Council, June 7, 1945, issued by the United States, the United Kingdom, the Soviet Union and China at the United Nations Conference on International Organization at San Francisco, and subscribed to by the Delegation of France, see Department of State Bulletin, June 10, 1945, p. 1047. For documentation concerning the San Francisco Conference, see Foreign Relations, 1945, vol. 1, pp. 1 ff.

The two parts of Section II of the Four Power Statement read :

"1. In the opinion of the delegations of the sponsoring governments, the draft Charter itself contains an indication of the application of the voting procedures to the various functions of the Council.

2. In this case, it will be unlikely that there will arise in the future any matters of great importance on which a decision will have to be made as to whether a procedural vote would apply. Should, however, such a matter arise, the decision regarding the preliminary question as to whether or not such a matter is procedural must be taken by a vote of seven members of the Security Council, including the concurring votes of the permanent members."

this matter. He then read a three point attempt to define the dispute prepared in the Foreign Office which he said he would give me a copy of as soon as he could because on this point particularly they had been instructed to work very closely with the U.S. (No mention had been made of working with anybody else!) Copy attached.

I commented that one idea we had was that it might be possible to get agreement on lumping disputes and situations so that neither the party who brought a dispute or situation to the attention of the Council nor any member or members named as being involved, could vote. This would, of course, have to be adopted by general agreement, presumably by unanimity.

As to procedure for handling this matter, Mr. Lawford said that Cadogan had told him that he thought it important for the committee to discuss the question first and that any high level or Big Five negotiations should only be held after committee discussions. Indicating general agreement with this, I said that while I had not taken this up with Mr. Stettinius yet, I thought the best procedure might be to have a general discussion in the committee, of this issue, and that I was prepared to say that in my opinion such a rule as paragraph 3 of rule 31 would be a violation of the spirit of the Yalta formula.⁹⁷

Mr. Lawford and I both agreed that it was most important, in dealing with rules which either incorporated or expanded articles of the Charter, to make sure that no violation of the Charter occurred in dealing with them.

United Kingdom suggestions for rules dealing with the definition of a dispute (prepared in Foreign Office and handed to J. E. Johnson by Mr. Lawford under instructions March 27; see memorandum of conversation between Mr. Lawford and Mr. Johnson on March 26.)
Begins:

(A) Definition of a "dispute".

In deciding under Chapter VI of the Charter whether a matter brought before the Security Council by a state is a dispute, or a situation, the Security Council shall hold that a dispute arises:

(1) If state or states bringing the matter before the Security Council, and the state or states whose conduct is impugned, agree that there is a dispute;

⁹⁷ For the "Yalta voting formula" agreed upon by the United States, United Kingdom, and the Soviet Union at the Crimea Conference on February 7, 1945, see Foreign Relations, The Conferences at Malta and Yalta, 1945, p. 682, or Department of State Bulletin, March 11, 1945, p. 394; references in this text are to the Dumbarton Oaks Conference Draft of the United Nations Charter. This formula was incorporated into the United Nations Charter as Article 27.

(2) Whenever the state or states bringing the matter before the Council allege actions or intentions of another state are endangering, or are likely to endanger, the maintenance of international peace and security, and state or states which are subject to these allegations contest some or all of the facts or inferences to be drawn from the facts;

(3) Further, if a state bringing a matter before the Council alleges that another state is violating the rights of a third state and the latter supports the contention of the first state, then the third state shall also be deemed to be a party to the dispute.

(B) Submission of cases in writing.

Any state bringing a dispute or situation before the Security Council shall furnish a full written statement of the grounds of fact and law on which its case is based, for circulation to members of the Council before the discussion is opened. Ends. [Johnson.]

[NEW YORK,] March 28, 1946.

COMMENTS ON THE "DISPUTE" AND "SITUATION" PROBLEM⁹⁹

Purposes of Article 27(3) of the Charter Are Clear

As Mr. Noyes demonstrates in his memorandum of March 23¹ (first two paragraphs of item 2), it is clear that the purpose of the abstention provision in Article 27(3) was to avoid having any Power a judge in its own case.

However, it does not follow from this that every determination of whether a particular case is a dispute turns upon this objective. There can be other distinct but valid reasons why a member nation may wish to insist that it is not a party to a dispute.

⁹⁸ Presumably Mr. Hiss was in New York with the Permanent Delegation at the time he drafted this paper.

⁹⁹ This subject insofar as it related to the voting problem had been under study at the Permanent Delegation from the time the Delegation was established at New York in mid-March, with specific reference to the issue between the Soviet Union and Iran to be considered by the Security Council when it re-convened at New York on March 25; see vol. VII, pp. 289 ff.

From the point of view of the abstention provision in Article 27(3) there would be good reasons for insisting that the determination of whether or not a dispute exists, and who the parties to that dispute may be, should be determined by procedural vote. Certainly no permanent member of the Council could argue with good grace that it should have the right to veto a determination that it should not vote in questions arising under Chapter VI.² On the other hand, from the point of view of the substantive determination (for other purposes of the Charter) of whether a particular case is or is not a dispute, there is good ground for the argument that this should not be regarded as a matter of mere procedure. The apparent impasse which results from these considerations is of significance only insofar as it affects the determination of who may and may not vote on particular motions. The impasse was solved at London by the British and French representatives waiving any right to vote without admitting that the matter was a dispute. This experience indicates a practical reaction to the problem which might be generalized.

Suggested Formula for Determining Abstention

On the basis of the foregoing analysis, it would appear that a solution would be found by concentrating on defining by rule those who should abstain in specified situations. The rules might recite the purpose of the abstention provision in Article 27(3) along the lines indicated above, and then provide that to give effect to these provisions the principle of abstention should apply in cases analogous to disputes, i.e. where charges are officially preferred by complaining State regardless of whether or not the case is technically a dispute for the purposes of the Charter. Obviously the abstention provision would apply in any case which is technically found to be a dispute. However, where no finding that a dispute technically exists has been made, the purposes of the abstention provision, Article 27(3), can best be effectuated by a determination of qualification to vote separate and apart from a determination of whether a particular case is a dispute. This separate determination would not involve a debatable interpretation of the Charter, that being generally agreed to by hypothesis if there is agreement as to the purposes of the abstention provision in Article 27(3). Consequently, this determination may appropriately be made by a procedural vote.

² Chapter VI of the Charter is concerned with the pacific settlement of disputes and relates therefore to the conciliatory function of the Council as contrasted with the Council's "policeman" function under Chapter VII (action with respect to threats to the peace, breaches of the peace, and acts of aggression).

This is, in effect, exactly what occurred in London in the Syrian-Lebanese case by reason of the voluntary action of the British and French representatives.³ There, there was no technical finding that a dispute existed, and the British and French Governments might very well have resisted any such finding for general purposes of the Charter. At the same time they recognized that they should not participate in voting in the case; made no assertion that they had a right to veto any decision that they should not vote; and, therefore, in substance preferred to be guided on this point by majority sentiment of the Council.

Course To Be Followed If the Above Proves Unacceptable

It would seem that even if the above suggestion proves unacceptable in the Committee of Experts, it would still be valuable for us to have presented it in order to clarify the basic issue involved and to try to separate two distinct concepts that are involved. If it is not accepted, we will probably have to free [face?] frankly the fact that we have reached an impasse on the determination of voting qualification; but if the general purpose of the abstention provision, Article 27(3), receives general agreement, an impasse may prove to be not too important. It would then be plain that no permanent member which insisted upon vetoing a resolution whose sole purpose was stated to be the disqualification of that member from voting would be placed in a most untenable position vis-à-vis world opinion, and this would also apply to votes by that member cast on subsequent substantive resolutions under Chapter VI. This result would salvage all that can practically be salvaged in the event of impasse in any event and would prevent the opprobrium to which the Council would subject itself if the matter were left at the impasse stage with no procedure settled for an indefinite period.

In other words, if the suggestions proposed above are not accepted, our next course will simply be to agree to rules of procedure which do not specify the nature of the vote required in determining, for the sole purpose of settling voting qualifications, whether a dispute exists. Such rules would of course still leave open voluntary action of the kind taken by the British and French in the Syrian-Lebanese case, thus still making it possible to settle the issue of voting qualifications without determining whether a dispute exists—which would mean effectuating the purpose of Article 27(3) in situations as well as all technical disputes.

THE EFFECT OF ABSTENTION FROM VOTING

Article 27(3) provides:

"3. Decisions of the Security Council on all other matters shall be made by an affirmative vote of seven members including the concurring votes of the permanent members; provided that, in decisions under Chapter VI, and under paragraph 3 of Article 52, a party to a dispute shall abstain from voting."

It should be noted that the Charter provides that a party to a dispute shall abstain from voting. It does not expressly provide that if a party to a dispute is a permanent member, its concurrence shall not be required. Yet it is clear that the intent of the Charter is that such concurrence may be dispensed with when a permanent member which is a party to a dispute abstains from voting as it is required to do under the Charter.

If a permanent member's concurrence is not necessary when it is required to abstain from voting, there would seem to be no sound reason why its concurrence should be required if it voluntarily abstains from voting.

There was it is true some informal committee discussion in San Francisco that looked the other way, but this discussion was never publicized nor were any authoritative decisions communicated to the Conference at the time the Charter was adopted.

There certainly is no compelling reason for requiring the concurrence of a permanent member if it voluntarily abstains from voting. Every legitimate interest of a permanent member is protected when it is given the right to register its nonconcurrence. If it fails to avail itself of the opportunity granted and deliberately abstains, it should be deemed to have waived its right of concurrence.

There may be many matters on which a permanent member may not wish to vote in the affirmative and still may not wish to exercise its veto. It is absurd to insist that a permanent member must veto a proposal if it cannot vote for it.

If a permanent member deliberately withdraws from participation in any proceedings of the Council, it cannot be urged that it was intended to give it the right to stop all further proceedings until it chose to return. While the hope was expressed at San Francisco that no member would withdraw from the Organization, yet it was conceded that a member could withdraw if it wished. Yet it was never suggested that the withdrawal of a permanent member would put an end to the Security Council. But that is exactly what would happen if the abstention of a permanent member is considered the equivalent of a negative vote on every substantive question.

The requirement that seven members of the Council must vote affirmatively to make any substantive decision is a requirement that cannot be waived. It was placed in the Charter to prevent action by a rump Council. But the concurrence of the permanent members was a special right given to the permanent members in view of the special responsibilities they assumed. To retain that right, the permanent member must be present and register its nonconcurrence.⁵

Memorandum by the Counselor of the Department (Cohen)

[WASHINGTON, April 8, 1946.]

THE DETERMINATION OF THE RIGHT TO VOTE

Article 27(3) of the Charter provides that in decisions under Chapter VI a party to a dispute shall abstain from voting.

There is no express provision in the Charter determining whether a matter constitutes a dispute or requires a determination of that question before the issue arises as to the right of a party to vote on a particular issue.

In these circumstances if the right of a member of the Council is challenged, it would seem that the Chairman in determining initially the right of the challenged member to vote should determine (1) whether the matter before the Council is a dispute and (2) whether the member whose vote is challenged is a party to the dispute. The Chairman's determination can of course be overruled by the Council by a procedural vote. All decisions of the Chairman are procedural and no decision of the Chairman should require a substantive vote to overrule.

To require a substantive vote to overrule the Chairman would obviously place excessive power in the hand of the Chairman.

⁵ A notation by Mr. Hiss on the transmittal "chit" reads: "paper 1 doesn't consider [question] of US Govt commitment to others of Big 5", a possible reference to the June 7, 1945 Statement of the Four Sponsoring Powers.

To require a substantive vote to sustain the Chairman in a case of this kind would make it impossible to disqualify a member from voting in a dispute to which it is a party without its consent. Such a result was obviously never contemplated by the framers of the Charter.

The Charter is clear and explicit. It provides that a party to a dispute shall abstain from voting under Chapter 6. It does not say that a member may vote unless the Council affirmatively determines that it is a party to a dispute.

When, therefore, a member's right to vote is challenged, the Chairman must rule whether or not the member has a right to vote under the Charter. If the Chairman's determination is not satisfactory to the Council, it can be overruled by a procedural vote.⁶

[WASHINGTON,] April 12, 1946.

Joe Johnson reported on the telephone this morning that the Committee of Experts, through the use of subcommittees, expects to complete its consideration of the Rules relating to the conduct of business this week. Meetings have been held regularly twice a day by the Committee and two meetings are scheduled for today.⁷

Accordingly, there is every likelihood that early next week the Committee will commence and perhaps complete its consideration of the Rules relating to the determination of a dispute v. situation and relating to the determination of who must abstain from voting under Article 27, 3.

Although Joe Johnson has done all he can to retard the Committee's excessive haste, he has not been able to control it.⁸ I suggested to him that in such circumstances he should make every effort to obtain agreement among the Committee members to the United States desiderata on the question of abstention from voting by parties to a dispute; and that we were hoping to clear a statement of such desiderata with Mr. Hiss and Mr. Cohen today. In the meantime, the memoranda prepared by Mr. Cohen and Mr. Hiss on the question could serve as a basis for his arguments.

⁷ The first phase of the work of the Committee of Experts in New York ended on April 5 when the Committee submitted to the Security Council a report recommending the adoption of 23 rules of procedure regarding meetings, agenda, representation, and credentials, and secretariat. Intended to replace or supplement rules 1-15 of the provisional rules of the Security Council drawn up by the Preparatory Commission and adopted by the Council during January-February, the report also proposed the adoption of a supplementary rule regarding communications from nongovernmental sources. The Security Council on April 9 adopted the new rules, with minor amendments; these were incorporated into United Nations document S/35 (see SC, 1st yr., 1st series, Suppl. No. 2, pp. 15 ff., annex 1c). Rule 30 of the February rules (voting) became Rule 27 in the April 9 rules.

The members of the Committee who are the proponents of excessive speed are the Soviet and French representatives. The basis of their position is that their experts on procedure will not be in New York long and they want to get the job completed before they go.

It might now be appropriate for Mr. Stettinius to have an informal conversation with Mr. Gromyko⁹ and M. Bonnet¹⁰ with a view to slowing down the processes of the Committee. He could very appropriately point out that the work of the Committee of Experts should be continuing in nature, and that to adopt Rules on such important subjects as are now before the Committee without adequate consideration would serve in the long run to retard rather than to expedite the work of the Security Council.¹¹

Committee of Experts . . .

⁸ A comprehensive program for the work of the Committee of Experts as regards rules of procedure was outlined in a memorandum of April 3 drafted by the Associate Chief of the Division of International Security Affairs (Bancroft); by April 9 it had been approved within the Department and was ready for transmission to the Permanent Delegation (501.BC/4-946).

⁹ A. A. Gromyko, Soviet Representative on the Security Council.

¹⁰ Henri Bonnet, French Representative on the Security Council.

¹¹ No record of such an approach by Mr. Stettinius has been found in the Department's files.

The next document discussed was S/Procedure/51,¹⁴ a group of additional rules proposed for inclusion in the chapter on conduct of business. These were originally part of a list submitted by the U.S. representative¹⁵ and which were discussed by a three-man sub-committee appointed April 11. . . .

The U.S. representative, at the close of the meeting, explained that during the course of the meeting he had received new instructions from his government concerning Rule A¹⁶ (S/Procedure/51), which had already received general agreement in substance from the committee. Since his government had raised important questions of principle relating to it, he requested that the committee defer final approval of Rule A for several days;¹⁷ this was granted. . . .

In general, after discussion with Mr. Cohen, we feel that you must make it clear to the Committee that its agreement on any rule of procedure must be regarded only as tentative and not binding on the United States. In other words, your acceptance as a representative on the Committee of an agreed rule of procedure is an ad referendum acceptance and is subject to approval here.

We still retain our view that controversial rules should not be discussed prematurely by the Committee of Experts and would therefore prefer the Committee to consider rules which are susceptible of prompt agreement and do not involve Charter interpretation.

We are not prepared to recommend Rule B set forth in the earlier telegram as the firm position of the United States Government. However, it can be used to promote discussion in the Committee of Experts or elsewhere and may be helpful in your efforts to persuade the other members to the view that a permanent member may abstain from voting on the Council without exercising a veto.

The question of the matters before the Council to be decided by a procedural vote or by a substantive vote is one that should be considered by the Committee of Experts in its entirety and not in its application to a single case. We would recommend that the Committee could usefully consider an inventory of matters which should be determined by the Council by substantive and by procedural votes. This would enable the Committee members to see the problem as a whole and to evaluate the extent to which Council action must be taken by one or the other types of vote.

We suggest that Rule C be used as a first step in discussion only if the Committee determines to proceed to the immediate consideration of Rule 31, proposed by the Soviet representative or another specific rule dealing with other problems set forth in Rule C. [Hiss.]

74. Daily Secret Summary
Committee of Experts

The bulk of the day's discussion attached to the Soviet proposal to amend Rule 31 (Item 3; S/Procedure/17). At the outset, Professor Stein, the USSR representative,²⁴ contended that the present rules on voting now in force are not precise enough, and that his amendment was intended to clarify the voting procedure using as the juridical basis the four-power declaration at San Francisco and the Charter itself. "The text is clear," Professor Stein said. "It should be adopted or rejected as you like."

Mr. Hasluck, the Australian representative, then questioned Stein as to what his amendment meant when it referred to, in paragraph two of his proposal,²⁵ ". . . any other dispute which does not fall under Article 33 . . ." Stein replied that the Charter enabled the Security Council to discuss many types of disputes although its principal responsibilities related to those under Article 33.

Chairman Liang, giving his interpretation of the legal status of "disputes", concluded, after a detailed analysis of the Charter's references to disputes, that it would not be in accordance with the spirit of the Charter to limit the application of the abstention clause of Article 27, Par. 3, to disputes brought up under Article 33.

Mr. Johnson, U.S. representative, agreed with the chairman's remarks and added that he could not in any case accept a rule of procedure limiting the obligation to abstain from voting solely to the type of disputes referred to in Article 33. The Egyptian representative, Mr. Saba, associated himself with the chairman's and Mr. Johnson's remarks, as did the U.K., French, Brazilian and Polish representatives.

Prof. Stein then said that since it was agreed that there were two types of disputes it was necessary "from the logical viewpoint" to distinguish between these two. The Council's first duty is to distinguish between the two, and the second duty, after they have made a distinction is to decide whether the parties to the dispute should abstain from voting. He was not convinced that the voting process should be the same for both distinct types of disputes.

²⁴ Professor B. E. Stein had replaced Mr. Orekhov on March 28 as Soviet delegate in the meetings of the Committee of Experts.

It was agreed that under Article 34, the Council first must decide to "investigate any dispute . . ." and second, must decide "whether the continuance of the dispute . . . is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security."

Liang agreed that there could be a distinction in disputes but added that they had different consequences. However, these had no bearing on the voting procedure, and Article 27(3) was effective in both cases. Johnson enlarged this point and stated that since a party to a dispute should not be a judge in its own case, a permanent member of the Council should not have the right to prevent determination of what particular class of dispute exists.

The committee discussed this problem further but adjourned at 1:00 p. m. until Tuesday, April 16, without coming to a decision. Since the Security Council meets at 11:00 a. m. Tuesday, April 16, the committee will probably meet at 3:00 p. m. Tuesday, for continued discussion on the Soviet veto proposal, and probably will take up immediately Paragraph 3 thereof.

In the course of Sunday, April 14, and Monday, April 15, U.S. representative Johnson informally and confidentially presented copies of the suggested U.S. revision of Article (A)—(S/Procedure/51)—relating to announcement of votes²⁶ to his U. K., China, U.S.S.R. and French colleagues on the committee of experts, in the order given.

In each case Johnson made it clear that this was a suggestion on which the U.S. would like comments. He referred specifically to the two discussions in San Francisco on this point among representatives of the Big Five, and explained that this background was the reason for showing copies at this time only to representatives of the permanent members. Lawford and Chaumont²⁷ made no comment on the substance. Liang thought China would accept the concept of abstention. Stein, while he made clear the need to talk to Gromyko, said that he personally was not in favor of forcing a state to vote if it wished to abstain. This is perhaps significant in light of the fact Johnson told Stein in detail of Lavrentiev's position at San Francisco.

Johnson also discussed with Lawford and Liang the proposed rule relating to parties to a dispute (Department's urtel 18).²⁸ Both Liang and Lawford had doubts as to whether there was sound legal basis for this procedure. Johnson has not yet had time to discuss this matter with Chaumont and Stein.

Discussion on the Soviet proposal (S/Procedure/17) was then resumed and dealt with paragraph three of item three.²⁹ Liang pointed out that this paragraph actually consisted of three parts:

1. Whether the question under consideration by the Council is one of procedure shall be approved by a vote of seven members of the Council including concurring votes of all the permanent members;
2. Whether the question under consideration is a dispute or a situation shall be approved by a vote of seven members of the Council including concurring votes of all the permanent members;
3. Whether the dispute is of the nature referred to in Article 33 of the Charter shall be approved by a vote of seven members of the Council including concurring votes of all the permanent members.

General agreement was reached on point one, since it stemmed directly from the San Francisco declaration by the Big Five.³⁰ However, several members contended that it was not necessary to spell out such a rule since the San Francisco declaration existed to guide the Council.

The Polish representative pointed out that some questions were obviously procedural and others obviously substantive, therefore a rule stating exactly which questions were procedural should be drawn up. Johnson (U.S.) declared he would like to see each question labeled as to whether it was procedural or substantive and the rules of procedure drawn up accordingly. Lawford (U.K.) agreed with this, saying his government would like clear, comprehensive and automatic decisions as to whether voting should be on a procedural basis or not. Hasluck (Australia) said everyone recognized that there was a clear division on most questions as to whether they required substantive or procedural vote, but that the committee should try to reduce the middle ground of doubtful questions to an area as small as possible. These would have to be settled by ad hoc decisions.

²⁹ Paragraph 3 reads: "The decision of whether the question under consideration by the Security Council is of procedural nature and also of whether the question under consideration is a dispute or situation and whether this dispute is of the nature referred to in Article 33 of the Charter shall be regarded as accepted if it is voted for by seven members of the Security Council including the concurring votes of all the permanent members of the Security Council."

The committee then proceeded to the second part of the problem. Hasluck questioned what the political effects of rules drafted on this problem would be, since a party to a dispute, if unscrupulous, could remove a future ban on its participation in voting by using the veto in the early stages of the question. Chairman Liang, speaking as the Chinese representative, reminded the committee that the Yalta formula was set up only with the Dumbarton Oaks documents as a basis. Thus, he cautioned, when the Yalta formula mentions "disputes" it also means "situations." He added that any widening of the veto power should be guarded against, since the sponsoring powers who made the San Francisco declaration pledged to the smaller nations only limited use of the veto. Adoption of the Soviet proposal's interpretation could hardly be considered consonant with such a pledge, he reasoned. Johnson subscribed to Liang's remarks and pointed out that two points were involved: 1) Decision as to whether a dispute or situation exists; and 2) Decision as to who, under Article 27(3) are parties to a dispute. 1) is clearly substantive, but he could not accept such a rule unless it also included a rule on 2).

105. Daily Secret Summary

Committee of Experts . . .

The Security Council's Committee of Experts met at Hunter College at 10:30 a. m. Wednesday, April 24, and proceeded to discussion of Item 3 of S/Procedure/17, the Soviet proposal for the redraft of Rule 31.³²

³² The Committee of Experts had put this question aside and considered other matters during the period April 17-23.

The Committee agreed at request of Soviet representative Stein to discuss the third point in the third paragraph of this item, which says that the "decision . . . whether the dispute is of the nature referred to in Article 33 of the Charter shall be regarded as accepted if it is voted for by seven members of the Security Council, including the concurring votes of all the permanent members of the Security Council."

Van Blokland (Netherlands) gave a prepared statement which dealt primarily with the second point in the third paragraph of Item 3. This concerns the vote on the decision as to whether the question under consideration is a dispute or a situation. Van Blokland felt that the rule should be concerned not only with the vote on this question but also with the problem of determining whether the question is a situation or dispute.

The burden of his argument was that procedures should be set up to narrow the doubtful area between the two questions and make it easier for the Council to decide whether the matter was a situation or a dispute. In effect, his criterion for determining whether a dispute exists in a doubtful case is if a situation violates justice and international law and somebody brings it to the Council's attention. As an example, he said if troops of one country lined the border of another country this could be considered only a situation, but if the first country conducted fifth column activities and charged that this was a fact, then the situation thus became a dispute. He left himself open on how the Council would decide on this point if the claim that a dispute exists was challenged by some other state. He understood both sides of the argument but leaned to the idea of considering it a procedural matter.

At this point, Stein called the Committee's attention to the fact that they had agreed to discuss the third point of the paragraph and therefore requested the views of the members on this.

Liang (China), Lawford (U.K.) and Johnson (U.S.) all stated that they thought the decision relating to this point should be by substantive vote, but each insisted that the rule should contain provisions setting forth the obligatory abstention from voting of Council members who were parties to the dispute in question.

Hasluck (Australia), and de la Colina (Mexico), although agreeing tentatively on this point, did not express firm opinions on Stein's specific proposal. Hasluck brought up the question of the binding effect of the four-power statement at San Francisco. Johnson and Chaumont

(France) stated categorically that it is binding on the five powers, Chaumont specifically including France on this point.³³

Hasluck denied that it bound any but the five powers, while de la Colina declared that this was at least a moot point. Johnson agreed with de la Colina and pointed out that at San Francisco, committee 3(1) had agreed not to vote on this point. Stein argued that the four-power statement was binding on all, basing his argument on the fact that he knew of no existing document which contradicts this interpretation.

Stein, at this point, indicated that he wished to summarize the debate, but Johnson, with Stein's permission, proceeded to summarize the arguments he had presented in the committee on the three parts of the third paragraph of the Soviet proposal for Rule 31.

1) With respect to determining whether a procedural or substantive decision is involved, Johnson stated that the final paragraph of the four-power statement at San Francisco made it clear that such a decision must be substantive. However, he could not accept a rule such as the Soviets proposed unless there had previously been spelled out the vote by which decisions under each rule, where a decision is required, were to be taken. Indeed, he was not sure that even then the Soviet rule would be desirable.

2) As to the decision whether a situation or dispute exists, that also is substantive. Here again, however, Johnson opposed any rule on this point unless coupled with a satisfactory rule taking care of the distinct and separate issue of determining who are to be considered parties to a dispute for the purposes of Article 27(3).

3) The decision whether the dispute is of the kind referred to in Article 33 is also substantive. Johnson opposed, however, a rule to cover only this question under Chapter VI and did not wish to accept it unless coupled with as many rules as the committee would draft relating to other decisions under Chapter VI. Moreover, the question of abstention of parties would also have to be considered in connection with this rule.

Stein declared, after Johnson's summary, that the USSR attached great importance to these amendments since they felt that the absence of rules of procedure on these points would hamper the work of the Council. The lack, or absence, of precise rules, he added, may have consequences not only of juridical but also political importance, and may block the work of the Council and affect its prestige.

He noted that even those who admitted they are bound by the four-power statement do not want these rules. He pointed out, "without criticizing", that such binding includes the obligation to carry out the four-power statement with implementing rules. He came to the conclusion after the statements made by Liang, Hasluck, Johnson and

Lawford on the Soviet proposals, that the committee should present an objective report to the Council, not at once, but in the near future, on the discussion on Rule 31 of the Soviet proposal.

As the meeting closed, Johnson requested permission to speak first at the next meeting in connection with certain remarks Stein had made in his summary and particularly on Stein's proposal that a report should be made to the Council on the various views on the Soviet amendment. Hasluck also reserved the right to speak on these points at the next meeting. The committee meets again at 10:30 a. m. Thursday, April 25.

After the meeting, in a brief discussion with Chaumont, Johnson said that he opposed such a report as unnecessary and undesirable. Chaumont said that if his delegation agreed on this, he would support Johnson's opposition to such a report.³⁴

As you will recall Johnson, acting under instructions, reserved the U.S. position on this rule and at his request Committee deferred further consideration of it. Subsequent to receipt of your Nos. 18 and 19 of April 13, Johnson handed copies of rule B set forth in former to representatives of U.K., France, China and U.S.S.R. explaining purpose of this rule and stating that he realized it, in effect, would constitute a reversal of decision reached by Big Five at San Francisco, June 11[?], 1945. He said that his Government had given further consideration to this question and believed that abstention of permanent members parties to a dispute was both desirable and consistent with provisions of Charter.

Johnson has now ascertained the views of his four colleagues as follows. The French are rather in favor of the proposed rule. The British see no objection to the proposed rule but believe it would be difficult to reach agreement on it. The Chinese apparently share the British view. Stein, on the other hand, states that he has consulted his Government and that it is opposed to such a rule. While a permanent member cannot be forced to vote he said, against its wishes, the Charter clearly imposes a special obligation on permanent members and they should not be encouraged by such a rule to abstain. Moreover, there might be serious practical difficulties if so many abstain as to make an affirmative vote impossible.

It appears certain that discussion on rule A of S/Procedure/51 will take place early next week. Johnson has indicated to all four of his above-mentioned colleagues that he may submit the proposed amendment to this rule at that time, but has made no final decision on this point.

In view of the facts that this rule would, in effect, reverse a five-power agreement and that Soviet Government opposes it, Johnson desires instructions regarding its submission to Committee as a whole. If he is not to introduce it, what attitude should be taken toward present rule A? If it is introduced and Stein announces his opposition, what course should be followed?

It is our tentative view that rule A, as it stands, can be accepted without prejudicing possible later amendment along the lines suggested in proposed redraft.

37. For Johnson from Hiss. This relates to Rule A of S/Procedure/51/Rev. 1 (reurtel No. 113 of April 26).

Inasmuch as Rule A does make it mandatory on the President after a vote is taken to state whether the question voted on has been carried, we believe that it would be a mistake for the Committee of Experts to adopt Rule A as it now stands without having considered the question of the voluntary abstention of a permanent member.

It seems to us that this is one of the cases where it is preferable for the Council to have no rule of procedure than to have one on which unanimous agreement has not been reached. Furthermore, in view of the fact that our proposed Rule B has been shown only to the representatives of the permanent members and not to the representatives of the other members of the Council, it would be helpful to have the views of those governments. We see no reason why the Committee of Experts should reach a decision on this question in great haste and would prefer to have it discussed at some length and over a period of time.

Stein's opposition to the rule appears to be not against its practical operation but against the existence of the rule itself. His admission that a permanent member cannot be forced to vote against its wishes appears to us to indicate that he would not necessarily attack the validity of a resolution of the Council on a substantive matter which was adopted by the necessary majority except for a permanent member who voluntarily abstained. This seems further to indicate that there is no necessity for having a rule on this subject at the present time.

As far as his arguments against the rule are concerned, we are willing to admit that the permanent members have a special obligation to vote on questions coming before the Council but this does not mean that the Charter itself demands that they must vote on every issue where they are willing to accept a decision of the Council without affirmatively voting for it.

We are not particularly impressed with his second argument that there might be practical difficulties in obtaining the necessary majority if permanent members are permitted to abstain. The same reasoning would apply to the abstention of non-permanent members which under the Charter and according to past practices of the Council is clearly permissible.

Accordingly, you should urge the Committee not to adopt Rule A in its present form. [Hiss.]

will a permanent member of the Council be entitled to participate in a vote on the question whether the permanent member is itself a party to the dispute or not?"

The answer to question 22 as contained in Annex D reads as follows:

³⁸ Robert W. Hartley, technical expert on the U.S. Delegation.

³⁹ No further progress was made in the Committee of Experts at this time on the question of voting, the Committee reporting to the Security Council on May 13 that "It was the view of certain members of the Committee that this chapter [that is, the chapter entitled "Voting"] should contain detailed provisions covering both the mechanics of the vote and the majorities by which the various decisions of the Council should be taken. There was a full and free exchange of views on this subject in the Committee. It was agreed to postpone the further study of this question and to recommend the retention for the time being of rule 27 of the provisional rules of procedure (document S/35), which now becomes rule 37." Rule 37 read: "Voting in the Security Council shall be in accordance with the relevant Articles of the Charter and of the Statute of the International Court of Justice." ⁴⁰ Paul H. Gore-Booth, British Foreign Office expert on United Nations affairs.

and myself, accompanied by Noyes, H. V. Johnson⁴¹ and J. E. Johnson.

“Following discussion of the Iranian question (which is recorded in a separate memorandum from Mr. Noyes), Sir Alexander raised the question of rules relating to voting in the Security Council. This had been one of his objectives in requesting a meeting. In the ensuing discussion the following points were brought out :

1. Determination of Procedural and Substantive Decisions.

With respect to the Soviet proposal for a rule providing that the decision as to whether a question is substantive or procedural should be taken by a qualified vote, J. E. Johnson restated, at Cadogan's request, the position which he had taken in the Committee of Experts. This was that the Soviet proposal only covered the last paragraph of the statement by the four sponsoring governments at San Francisco, and that it should be read only in context of the previous paragraphs of that statement. J. E. Johnson suggested that an attempt might be made to define those decisions which are clearly procedural and those which are clearly substantive either by means of separate lists or by an indication in each relevant rule as to the manner which the decision is to be taken. Only after this is done, would such a rule as the Soviets have proposed be at all acceptable. Mr. Noyes emphasized this last point by stating that we do not consider that, if a question is raised as to the kind of vote to be taken, the decision must always be a substantive one. There was complete agreement on this point, Sir Alexander remarking that from paragraph 2 of the four power statement itself it is clear that certain decisions will unquestionably be procedural.

There seemed to be, however, considerable doubts as to whether such a solution, as proposed by Mr. J. E. Johnson would be sufficient. Sir Alexander doubted whether it would be possible to induce the Soviets to accept the idea of stating in each rule the nature of the vote to be taken, and it was pointed out that, even if this were done or a list of decisions agreed upon, there still might be too broad an area in which doubt might arise. It was remarked, for example, that however complete the list might be, there would still be room to question whether that part of the Iranian resolution of April 4, which requested reports from the Soviet Union and Iran, was procedural or substantive.

There was general agreement that this question requires further study.

2. Disputes, Situations and Parties to a Dispute.

It was pointed out to Sir Alexander that the US feels that a distinction should be made between, on the one hand, the determination as to whether the Council is dealing with a situation or dispute within the meaning of Chapter VI and, on the other, the determination as to who should be considered parties to a dispute within the meaning of Article 27 (3). The proposal, which had been informally submitted earlier to the representatives on the Committee of Experts of the other permanent members,⁴² was again shown to Cadogan and the reason for proposing that the determination of parties to a dispute should be made by a ruling of the President was explained. Cadogan indicated that he felt the acceptance of such a rule would be a very happy solution, but he did not believe that the Soviets could be induced to accept it. He recognized that the history of the Yalta Formula gave grounds for endeavoring to interpret "parties to a dispute" as meaning "parties in interest". He, nevertheless, felt that it would be hard to speak of "a party to a situation" and expressed serious doubt as to whether the Soviets would accept such a modification of the letter of the charter.

Cadogan then raised the question of the Foreign Office's proposal for the definition of a dispute.⁴³ It was agreed that the text proposed by the Foreign Office is not satisfactory, and that some attempt should be made to revise it. There seemed to be general agreement, however, that, while it would probably be impossible to formulate a definition of a dispute which would take care of all possible contingencies, a carefully drafted definition might be useful in working toward the desired end of preventing a permanent member from blocking its own exclusion from voting. In the course of this discussion, Gore-Booth, who was familiar with the Foreign Office background of this paper, remarked that he understood one of the purposes of the proposed definition to have been to wipe away the distinction between "situations" and "disputes" and to include all matters in the latter category.

The British representatives having stressed the Foreign Office's interest in this approach, and requested US criticisms of the paper, they were informed that: (a) the draft did not adequately take care of frivolous claims; (b) it confused the definition of a dispute with that of a party to a dispute; and (c) paragraph (2) dealt only with disputes of the nature referred to in Article 33 of the charter.

It was agreed that Lawford and J. E. Johnson should get together with a view to drafting a new paper which the UK delegation might send to the Foreign Office for comment.

It was agreed that the two approaches mentioned above—that suggested by the US and that advanced by the Foreign Office—are not mutually exclusive and that both avenues should be pursued.

3. Future Discussions of Voting Rules.

In answer to an inquiry from Cadogan, the US representatives stated that their Government does not favor forcing the issue if agreement cannot be reached in the Committee of Experts. The US believes that this issue should be dealt with very cautiously and that the matter should be allowed to simmer. It was further stated by the US representatives that, in their personal opinions, no good would be served by pushing this issue very hard while the Iranian case is still before the Council. Cadogan and his advisers appeared to agree with both points, although they gave the impression that the Foreign Office may have been leaning toward forcing the issue in open meetings of the Security Council.

There was some discussion of the advisability of informal five-power conversations at the expert level. There was tentative agreement that such discussions should not in any case be held until after the matter had been given further study both by the two delegations in New York and by their respective governments.”

WASHINGTON, June 12, 1946—7 p. m.

92. For J. E. Johnson from Hiss. Reference telephone conversation June 10 between Bancroft and J. E. Johnson concerning Rule of Procedure proposed by U.K. defining dispute set forth in no. 12 of March 28, from New York.

The problem of defining a dispute in the rules raises the entire question of the voting procedure of the SC and our position set forth in Amdel 18 and 19 of April 13.

It is perhaps possible that a sufficiently comprehensive definition of a dispute incorporated into the Rules of Procedure might accomplish the desired result of preventing a permanent member from vetoing the Council's decision that it must abstain from voting. However, we doubt if such a comprehensive definition would be acceptable to all the members of the SC at the present time.

We therefore believe that any advantage to be gained through our favoring a rule such as that proposed by the British would be more than offset by the following considerations:

1. We agree with your position as set forth in your telegram 251 of May 29 distinguishing between a determination as to the existence of a dispute or situation and the separate and not necessarily related determination as to the parties to abstain from voting. The U.S. position on the type of vote that will be required on the latter determination is set forth in Amdel 18 and 19 of April 13. A rule of procedure such as that proposed by the U.K. which fails to differentiate between the meaning of dispute as used in Article 27 (3) and its meaning in other sections of the Charter would be inconsistent with this position and might complicate future discussion of the whole voting and abstention problem.

2. We believe that your suggestion to the British as set forth in telegram 251 of May 29 that parties involved in a situation as well as parties to a dispute must abstain from voting is sound both historically and analytically. The definition of a dispute in the rules would, we believe, make it difficult for us to assert this position.

3. We believe that the best way to distinguish between procedural and substantive questions is to indicate those decisions which are clearly procedural and those which are clearly substantive either by separate lists or by an indication in each relevant rule as to the manner in which the decision is to be taken. We believe the Soviets should be willing to accept this procedure in view of Professor Stein's statements to the Committee of Experts (S/Procedure/60, p. 6) and also since such a procedure is in accord with the Soviet proposal at San Francisco. (See Amdel 24, April 15). While the procedure of enumerating in the Rules the substantive and procedural decisions is not closely related to the idea of defining a dispute, we fear that the British approach might tend to shift the emphasis from our approach which we believe over a period of time has greater chances of success.

4. Finally, we see no real hope that it will be possible to work out a satisfactory definition of a dispute. Hartley informs us that numerous previous efforts have been made and were unsuccessful.

Although as you point out in your 251 of May 29 the UK and US approaches are not mutually exclusive, any attempt by the British to press for an agreed definition of dispute in the Committee of Experts will raise all the angles of the whole voting problem.

We therefore suggest that you try to persuade the British to postpone any discussion of this matter. It may be that developments during the summer may alter the British position. Likewise on the basis of further information which you may furnish us it might be desirable to reconsider our position upon Mr. Cohen's return from Europe.⁴⁵ [Hiss.]

SECRET URGENT
[via Courier]

NEW YORK, June 12, 1946—8:35 p. m.

Lawford (UK) indicated on June 11 to J. Johnson (US) that he would probably introduce the U.K. proposal relating to the definition of a dispute into the Committee of Experts in about a week. He hoped that it might be possible to obtain agreement in the Committee of Experts without getting into the whole question of voting in the Security Council.

Lawford hinted, however, that if further discussions make it appear that it would be impossible to obtain early agreement on the definition of disputes, he might tell his Government of the difficulties and ask permission to drop the matter for the time being.

Lawford read a Foreign Office report which made the following points:

1. That the U. S. would be well-advised to drop its proposal relating to abstention of parties to a dispute. For one thing this would create two new concepts unknown to the Charter, (a) a party to a situation, (b) an issue. Secondly, it was illogical to attempt to disqualify a State from voting on the ground that it is a party to a dispute before determination has been made that a dispute exists.

2. The Foreign Office would like to support the U.S. concept of extending the scope of procedural decisions by the adoption of a list of matters which would be deemed procedural, or by a similar device.

3. In answer to Lawford's earlier query as to whether the definition should not be extended to cover cases in which a state does not contest the facts or inferences but, nevertheless, is actually involved in a dispute with another State, the Foreign Office thought this would be a most unlikely situation. It was, however, willing to insert in Paragraph A (2), following the word "contest", the words "or do not admit".

4. In connection with point (3) the Foreign Office made it clear that its proposed definition was not meant to be all inclusive, but was merely designed to narrow the area of uncertainty as to what constitutes a dispute.

5. Commenting on Lawford's report that U.S. representatives had pointed out that Paragraph A (2) of the U.K. proposal appeared to limit the definition of disputes to those which endanger or are likely to endanger the international peace and security, London said that this was intentional. The Foreign Office added that in its view the Security Council could not, under the Charter, deal with disputes of any other character.

6. The Foreign Office failed to comment on the U.S. suggestion that Paragraph A (3) of the proposal related to a definition of a party to a dispute rather than to that of a dispute. It did say however, in response to a specific query, that all three of the states referred to in this paragraph would in its opinion be parties to a dispute.

[Received 9:10 p. m.]

316. For Hiss. Following receipt of urtel No. 92, June 12, and of telephoned report of discussion on June 13 in Mr. Cohen's office concerning that part of mytel 308, June 12, relating to definition of dispute, J. E. Johnson yesterday requested appointment with Lawford (U.K.). He read Lawford your 92 except for last two sentences and then added that, since receiving report of the conversation of June 11 (mytel 308), US Government had taken an even stronger position regarding the definition of a dispute. Johnson stated that, in view of the US Government there is nothing in the Charter which makes a rule defining a dispute necessary, or desirable. Moreover, his government had informed him that it is quite firmly opposed to the UK proposal for a definition of a dispute, because (1) it does not agree with the text, and (2) it wishes to avoid discussing this question unless there is complete discussion of entire voting question.

At Lawford's request the US views were later given to him in an informal memorandum.

Lawford, who fully understands our position and is obviously unhappy about both the text of the proposal and the Foreign Office's insistence of introducing it now, intends to tell F.O. at once of US views. He also read Johnson a draft of a letter to F.O. in which he raised some of the points mentioned in mytel 308 (for more complete report of June 11 talk, see memorandum of conversation given Bancroft⁴⁶). The letter also emphasized the inadvisability of introducing a proposal without advance US concurrence: Lawford wrote in this connection that, on the basis of previous experience, he felt that the proposal would have little chance of adoption by Committee of Experts in absence of UK-US agreement on it.

⁴⁶ Not found in Department files.

Following a brief discussion, Lawford, feeling F.O. would not alter its position on his recommendation alone, wondered whether matter might not be referred to Paris for discussion between Jebb⁴⁷ and Cohen. I believe this suggestion, which Lawford intends to pass on to Cadogan, merits serious consideration and would appreciate your views.⁴⁸

WASHINGTON, June 18, 1946—7 p. m.

2926. Secdel 289. For Benjamin Cohen. Joseph Johnson has had a series of conversations with Lawford of the UK delegation in New York and has pointed out in emphatic terms our reaction to the British proposal that the term "dispute" be defined in the Rules of Procedure of the SC.

Johnson has reported that (New York telegram 316, June 14) although Lawford is willing to recommend to the FonOff that the proposal be dropped, he does not feel that it will alter its position on his recommendation alone. Accordingly, Lawford has suggested that a conversation between you and Jebb might help to change the FonOff view. Cadogan has requested FonOff to ask Jebb to discuss question with you.

In the light of the foregoing, you may wish to bring the matter up with Jebb in the hope that the FonOff can be dissuaded from pursuing its present course.

⁴⁷ H. M. G. Jebb, Counsellor, British Foreign Office, principally engaged in United Nations affairs at this time.

⁴⁸ In telegram 324, June 17, 8:10 p. m., Minister Johnson stated: "Lawford informed member US delegation today . . . that Cadogan has requested Foreign Office to ask Jebb to take up question of definition of a dispute with Cohen in Paris." Mr. Johnson suggested also that Mr. Cohen be informed of the substance of the conversations in New York. (501.BC/6-1746)

Also explained our position that charter does not require a finding by the Council that there is a dispute or a determination of the parties to a dispute, but that these questions may be raised in connection with the right to vote and then decided as a procedural matter. I had not yet received your Secdel 296⁴⁹ and he did not appear to be briefed on their position.

He listened sympathetically and, while not committing himself definitely to our position, did not seem disposed to advance contrary position, merely indicating that some of their people thought that their definitions might be helpful rather than harmful. He also indicated that there was a division among their people regarding our position on the effect of abstention though he was inclined to agree with our position.

PRESENT STATUS OF DISCUSSIONS IN THE COMMITTEE OF EXPERTS ON VOTING IN THE SECURITY COUNCIL

The question of voting in the Security Council has been raised in the Committee of Experts on three occasions and has been discussed among members of the Committee of Experts but not formally raised before the Committee on two other occasions. It is convenient to consider this subject by summarizing briefly the discussions that took place on each of these occasions. It must be emphasized that a number of problems arose and a number of positions were taken on collateral issues in connection with the problem of voting which cannot be adequately summarized. For a more complete discussion of the most important problems raised in the Committee of Experts relating to voting, reference is made to a document entitled Compulsory Abstention from Voting under Article 27 (3) of the Charter (SD/S/247).⁵¹

Very little progress has been made in the Committee of Experts towards interpreting Article 27. However, considerable progress was made in the development of techniques for interpreting that Article. In general, it was agreed by all Representatives that procedural decisions of the Security Council should be enumerated in the Rules of Procedure. It was further agreed that after as full an enumeration as possible of procedural decisions, the question of whether other decisions of the Security Council were procedural would require the concurrence of the permanent members of the Council.

⁴⁹ Telegram 2934, June 19, 11 a. m., to Paris, not printed; it transmitted the text of the British proposal for defining disputes.

Undoubtedly, very little agreement was reached in the application of these techniques. For example, no agreement was reached as to the nature of the decision approving reports from the Security Council to the General Assembly. Also while it was recognized that a permanent member of the Council a party to a dispute must abstain from voting on decisions in connection with that dispute, no agreement was reached as to whether or not the alleged party to the dispute must abstain from voting on the preliminary questions as to whether the matter was a dispute or a situation, whether the dispute endangered the maintenance of international peace and security, and whether the State was in fact a party to the dispute. As will be pointed out considerable agreement on most of these problems was achieved among the Representatives on the Committee of Experts other than the Representatives of USSR.

The chief significance of the Committee of Experts discussions is that they indicate the approaches towards consideration of the problem of voting which are most likely to secure support for the United States position. A summary of the most important discussions in the Committee of Experts follows:

I. Security Council Rule of Procedure on Voting

The Committee of Experts recommended in February 1946 and the Security Council adopted the following Rule of Procedure on voting:

“Voting in the Security Council shall be in accordance with the relevant Articles of the Charter and of the Statute of the International Court of Justice.” (Rule 40)

This Rule of Procedure, which is a recognition of the fact that the problem of voting cannot be dealt with summarily, was adopted provisionally by both the Committee of Experts and the Security Council without any substantial discussion.

To quote the Report of the Security Council to the General Assembly (page 47):⁵²

⁵² This is an incorrect page citation which should read p. 87 (United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, Second Part, Supplement No. 1, “Report of the Security Council to the General Assembly. . .”). Further, the quotation which follows is out of context; actually, it appeared in the May 13 Committee of Experts Report to the Security Council; see footnote 39, p. 274.

“There was a full and free exchange of views on this subject in the Committee. It was the view of certain of its members that the Chapter on Voting should contain detailed provisions covering both the mechanics of the vote and the majorities by which the various decisions of the Council should be taken. But since the Committee was not able to draft additional rules of procedure on this subject, it was decided to defer further consideration of the problem to a later date.”

II. “Rule 31” Proposed by Representative of the U.S.S.R.

The greater part of the discussion of voting in the Security Council has centered around the consideration of the so-called “Rule 31” proposed by the Representative of the U.S.S.R. to the Committee of Experts. This proposal, which is contained in S/Procedure/17, is as follows:

Rule 31 proposed by Soviet Representative in S/Procedure/17

“Rule 31. Should the Security Council consider a dispute provided for by Article 33 of the Charter, a party to the dispute shall abstain from voting in accordance with paragraph 3 of Article 27 of the Charter.

Should the Security Council consider a situation provided for by Article 34 or any other dispute which does not fall under Article 33, all the members of the Security Council are entitled to participate in voting.

The decision of whether a question under the consideration of the Security Council is of procedural nature and also of whether the question under consideration is a dispute or situation and whether this dispute is of the nature referred to in Article 33 of the Charter shall be regarded as accepted if it is voted for by seven members of the Security Council including the concurring votes of all the permanent members of the Security Council.”

The discussion of the problems raised by this Rule of Procedure which took place between April 15–25, 1946, was extremely extensive and in some instances went far beyond the specific provisions of the Rule. The positions taken by the respective delegates on the four main issues raised either directly or indirectly by the proposed Rule were as follows:

A. Decision of Security Council as to whether a matter is of a procedural nature.

a. The rule proposed by the U.S.S.R. provides that the decision of whether the question under consideration by the Security Council is of procedural nature shall be by a substantive vote. In view of paragraph 2 of Part II of the Four Power Declaration it would be difficult for the United States to take a contrary position without violating the Four Power Declaration. This is recognized by the United States Representative, S/Procedure/70, page 7. Only Australia and Netherlands suggested that the determination of this question should be by procedural vote. Australia, S/Procedure/71, page 2 and 73, page 3; Netherlands, S/Procedure/75, page 4.

b. In the Four Power Declaration it was contemplated that the area covered by such a rule should be restricted as much as possible through specifying in the Rules of Procedure the types of decisions of the Security Council requiring a procedural vote. The following Representatives have approved of such a procedure:

The further enumeration of procedural decisions through Rules of Procedure was deferred in the Committee of Experts until completion of urgently required rules on subjects which were less controversial.

B. Decision of Security Council as to whether a dispute under Chapter VI is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security.

a. The U.S.S.R. proposal provides that such a decision should be by a substantive vote. This is undoubtedly in accordance with the discussions at San Francisco. This position was approved by the Representative of China, S/Procedure/61, Rev. 1, page 1 and 70, page 4; U.S., S/Procedure/70, page 4.

b. However, the U.S.S.R. proposed rule likewise provides that the parties to a dispute shall not abstain from voting unless the dispute falls under Article 33 (i.e., endangers the maintenance of international peace and security). All Representatives excepting the Representative of U.S.S.R. agreed that there is nothing in Article 27 (3) which justifies such distinction in connection with the duty to abstain from voting. The U.S.S.R. position on this question was opposed by the following Representatives:

C. Decision of the Security Council as to whether a matter before the Council is a dispute or situation.

a. In the discussions in the Committee of Experts it is frequently pointed out that the decision of the Council as to whether a dispute or situation exists has consequences in addition to those relating to the problem of abstention from voting. (S/Procedure/73, pages 4 and 5) for example, a State which is a Member of the United Nations may, under Article 32, participate in the discussion in the Security Council of a dispute but not of a situation. (Probably a State involved in a situation could be invited to participate in the discussion of the Security Council under the general powers of the Council or in certain circumstances under Article 35. See paper on Technical Aspects of Proposals for Liberalized Interpretation of Four Power Statement and Article 27, page 6). Likewise, under Article 33, the parties to a dispute are required to seek a solution by means of their own choice. This requirement does not extend to the parties involved in a situation. The U.S.S.R. position is that the determination of whether a dispute or situation exists should be by a substantive vote. The Representatives of France and the United States have tentatively acquiesced in the U.S.S.R. position except on the question of abstention from voting (France, S/Procedure/60, page 7, 61, Rev. 1, page 6; U.S., S/Procedure/70, page 7). The Representatives of Netherlands and Australia suggested that such a decision might be by a procedural vote (Netherlands, S/Procedure/75, page 4; Australia, S/Procedure/60, page 6 and 73, page 6).

b. The United States, however, has taken a position that in the interpretation of Article 27 (3) no distinction should be made between disputes and situations—in other words that the term “dispute” should cover “situations”. As is pointed out in the memorandum on the History of the Voting Problem (Chapter on Yalta Conference I, 4, d) and also in the memorandum on the Technical Aspects of Proposals for a Liberalized Interpretation of Article 27 (3) and the Four Power Statement (page 6) it appears that the omission of the word “situation” from Article 27 was inadvertent.⁵³ The United States Representative therefore contended that parties involved in situations as well as parties to a dispute should be required to abstain from voting under Chapter VI of the Charter. The following Representatives have supported this position:

D. Decision of the Security Council as to whether a State is a party to a dispute.

This problem is not raised directly by the proposed Rule 31. However, if Rule 31 were adopted, there would be practically no occasion for a vote on the question of the parties to a dispute since an alleged party to a dispute could exercise its veto power at an earlier stage of the proceedings. However, in the event of the adoption of any rule in accordance with the position taken by the United States Representative, this problem would arise.

In the discussions in the Committee of Experts the following Representatives have indicated that the decision of this question should be by procedural vote:

The Representative of China has indicated that the decision of this question should be by a substantive vote with alleged parties to the dispute abstaining from voting. S/Procedure/61, Rev. 1, page 4.

The United States has taken no definite position on this matter in the Committee of Experts except as hereinafter set forth in connection with the so-called "Rule C".

[Here follows discussion of another aspect of the voting problem, unrelated to Article 27.]

IV. Proposed Rules B and C.

In Amdel 18 of April 13, 1946 the Department communicated to the United States Delegation two proposals for Rules of Procedure on the subject of voting. These proposals were as follows:

Rule B. "In announcing the results of a procedural vote, the President shall indicate the number of members voting in favor of the proposed action and shall state whether the proposed action has been taken.

"In announcing the results of a substantive vote, the President shall indicate the number of members voting in favor of the proposed action, and the permanent members concurring; the number of members voting against and the permanent members voting against; and the number of members abstaining and the permanent members abstaining. Unless a permanent member abstaining, affirmatively indicates that it does not concur, it shall not be deemed to have exercised its veto right, but shall be deemed to be willing to concur without voting on whatever action the Council may take by an affirmative vote of seven members including the concurring votes of the other permanent members."

In Amdel 19 of April 13 the United States Representative was authorized to discuss Rule B under the following circumstances:

"We are not prepared to recommend Rule B set forth in the earlier telegram as the firm position of the U.S. Government. However, it can be used to promote discussion in the Committee of Experts or elsewhere and may be helpful in your efforts to persuade the other members to the view that a permanent member may abstain from voting in the Council without exercising a veto."

Rule C. "In accordance with Article 27 (3) a party to a dispute shall abstain from voting on non-procedural matters, and in announcing any vote on any such matter the President shall record any member which he deems to be a party to a dispute within the meaning of Article 27 (3) as not voting. If any member of the Council appeals a ruling of the President either that a member shall abstain or shall not abstain from voting, the President's ruling may be overruled by a procedural vote."

In Amdel 19 the United States Representative was given the following instructions concerning the proposed Rule C:

"We suggest that Rule C be used as a first step in discussion only if the Committee determines to proceed to the immediate consideration of Rule 31, proposed by the Soviet Representative or another specific rule dealing with other problems set forth in Rule C.”

The report of the United States Representative concerning these proposed rules is set forth as follows in Telegram 74 of April 15, 1946 from New York:

“In the course of Sunday, April 14, and Monday, April 15, U.S. Representative Johnson informally and confidentially presented copies of the suggested U.S. revision of Article (A)—(S/Procedure/51)—* relating to announcement of votes to his U.K., China, U.S.S.R. and French colleagues on the Committee of Experts, in the order given.

“In each case Johnson made it clear that this was a suggestion on which the U.S. would like comments. He referred specifically to the two discussions in San Francisco on this point among Representatives of the Big Five, and explained that this background was the reason for showing copies at this time only to Representatives of the permanent members. Lawford and Chaumont made no comment on the substance. Liang thought China would accept the concept of abstention. Stein, while he made clear the need to talk to Gromyko said that he personally was not in favor of forcing a State to vote if it wished to abstain. This is perhaps significant in light of the fact Johnson told Stein in detail of Lavrentiev’s position at San Francisco.

“Johnson also discussed with Lawford and Liang the proposed rule relating to parties to a dispute (Department’s Urtel 18).† Both Liang and Lawford had doubts as to whether there was sound legal basis for this procedure. Johnson has not yet had time to discuss this matter with Chaumont and Stein.”

(Lavrentiev’s view at San Francisco was substantially the same as that expressed informally by Stein).

There has been no further discussion of these proposed rules.

V. U.K. Proposal to Define a Dispute

The United Kingdom Representative on instruction showed United States Representative a draft which he proposed to bring before the Committee of Experts, of a suggested Rule of Procedure defining a dispute in such a manner that every matter brought before the Security Council and alleged to be a dispute would in fact be a dispute. The United States opposed the British proposal for a number of reasons, two of which are closely linked to the general problem of voting. First, the United States has taken the position that parties involved in a situation, as well as parties to a dispute, must abstain from voting. If the term “dispute” is defined in the Rules, it would be difficult to assert this position. Second, the United States has taken the position that differentiation should be made between the meaning of “dispute” as used in Article 27, paragraph 3 and as used in other sections of the Charter. Any Rule defining a dispute which failed to make such a differentiation would be inconsistent with the United States position, which recognizes that for the purpose of some articles the determination requires the concurrence of the permanent members of the existence of a dispute.

The Representative of the United Kingdom informed the United States Representative that while he had instructions to bring the matter before the Committee of Experts, he did not wish to do so unless the United States agreed. In view of the United States objections which were communicated informally to the United Kingdom Representative, the proposal was never carried beyond the stage of informal discussions between the two Representatives.

Memorandum Prepared in the Office of Special Political Affairs

PROPOSED PAPERS ON THE ISSUE OF THE "VETO" IN THE SECURITY COUNCIL, AND RELATED QUESTIONS⁵⁴

[WASHINGTON,] August 16, 1946.

The issue of the "veto" in the Security Council has been placed on the agenda of the General Assembly, scheduled to meet September 23, by the Australian Delegation which requests consideration of the application of Article 27 of the Charter dealing with the method of voting in the Security Council.⁵⁵ In addition, the Cuban Delegation has placed on the supplementary list (containing items which can be included in the agenda by vote of the Assembly) an item requesting that a general conference of United Nations members be called in accordance with Article 109 of the Charter (General Conference to consider amendments) "in order to modify Paragraph 3 of Article 27 of the Charter to eliminate the so-called veto privilege".⁵⁶

⁵⁴ A working paper drafted in the Office of Special Political Affairs for the Department's United Nations Liaison Committee.

The relevant section of Article 109 reads: "1. A General Conference of the Members of the United Nations for the purpose of reviewing the present Charter may be held at a date and place to be fixed by a two-thirds vote of the members of the General Assembly and by a vote of any seven members of the Security Council. Each Member of the United Nations shall have one vote in the conference."

There is every prospect of a full debate on the subject of the "veto" followed by possible action by the General Assembly. Public as well as official interest has of course been increased by the use of the veto in the Security Council and discussion in the Atomic Energy Commission.

The United States Representative to the Security Council and ranking officers of the Department of State have proposed a full study of the "veto", not only in its technical aspects, but more especially from the broader viewpoints of the philosophy of the "veto" and the theory and use of the principle in national governments and in international organizations other than the United Nations as well as in the United Nations itself.

Listed below are a series of papers suggested for preparation in various interested offices and divisions of the Department. Responsibility for the preparation of each paper is suggested after each title on the assumption that the named office or division will consult with other interested offices and divisions.⁵⁷

1. The United States position⁵⁸—SPA and its divisions in collaboration with Le and other interested offices and divisions.

⁵⁷ Technical information regarding drafting procedures, deadlines, etc., omitted: omissions not indicated. Detailed studies were made on each subject; most were completed by the first week in September. In turn these were incorporated into a collection entitled "Background Book on Unanimity Rule and Related Issues" (IO Files).

The work on preparing a position paper on the General Assembly items dealing with voting in the Security Council was initiated in the Division of International Security Affairs in the Office of Special Political Affairs. By August 31 a second draft was being circulated within the Office of Special Political Affairs and at this time Elwood N. Thompson, Special Assistant to the Director (Hiss) noted in a memorandum to Mr. Hiss and the Deputy Director (Ross) that: ". . . The basic question seems to me to be whether or not the attached paper is couched in a sufficiently broad framework to be satisfactory to Mr. Austin, Mr. Cohen and Mr. Fahy [Charles Fahy, Legal Adviser of the Department of State]. The material perhaps can be adapted to a broader framework which will make clear the reasons for the position taken. The paper as now organized seems to balance a large superstructure primarily on the consideration of an effective set of tactics to gain our objectives in the Committee of Experts. Perhaps the necessary broad framework can be established separately in the outline for possible use in preparing an address, which Mr. Ross planned to develop." (501.BC/8-3146)

In one of the earliest meetings in the Department on this question, shortly after the Australian item had been submitted, Mr. Ross had written: ". . . I find it difficult to escape the feeling that we perhaps have been indulging in a large amount of shadow-boxing with the technicalities of rules of procedure without having first formulated our broad policies with regard to the veto not only as this question arises in the Security Council but in many other ways." (Memorandum to Mr. Fahy and Mr. Cohen, July 22, 501.BC/7-2246).

2. Legislative and diplomatic history of provisions for voting in the Security Council up to the adoption of the Charter—IS.

3. Analysis of voting procedure in cases thus far considered by the Security Council—IS.

4. A compilation of official U.S. statements on the veto in relation to the control of atomic energy—IS, with Le.

5. Present status of discussions in the Committee of Experts on voting in the Security Council—IS.

6. The "veto" principle as expressed or implied in Article 79 of the Charter and in recent U.S. proposals for its relaxation in application—DA and EUR.

7. The "veto" principle in the Council of Foreign Ministers, and in the peacemaking machinery established after World Wars I and II—EUR.

8. The "veto" in Allied Control Commissions in Austria, Bulgaria, Finland, Hungary, Germany, Japan and Rumania—EUR and FE.

9. Public attitudes toward the "veto" in the United States—PL.

10. Voting procedure in the League of Nations and in major Pan American conferences—OA.

11. The "veto" or influence tantamount thereto in specialized international agencies—OA.

12. Aspects of U. S. foreign policy on which this Government insists on exercising its unilateral judgment (e.g. immigration, bases, Monroe Doctrine, Panama Canal, etc.)—OCL., with all geographic offices, Le, A-C, A-B.

Note: An appropriate query in connection with the following suggested papers would be: What recognition is given in national attitudes and practices or political theory in various parts of the world to the possibility of interposing decisive objections (legal or extra-legal) to proposed international action?

13. The "veto" or influence tantamount thereto in relation to international organization in the Western Hemisphere (this paper should also characterize, if possible, the general attitude of Latin Americans toward the existence of the "veto" in political processes)—OA (Regional Branch), with ARA.

14. Soviet attitudes and practices with respect to the "veto" in international affairs, particularly in international organization—EE.

15. Chinese attitudes and practices with respect to the "veto" in international affairs, particularly in international organization—FE.

16. French attitudes and practices with respect to the "veto" in international affairs, particularly in international organization—EUR.

17. The "veto" in the operation of the British Commonwealth of Nations (This paper should also treat of the general attitude toward the "veto" or its equivalent in the internal politics of the various British Commonwealths)—BC.

18. Voting arrangements in the Arab League—NEA.

19. The "veto" in American constitutional theory and practice (This would include an examination of the Federalist Papers, analysis of relations between branches of the Federal Government, and analysis of congressional parliamentary practice and theory)—Le, with OCL.

The Acting United States Representative at the United Nations (Johnson) to the Secretary of State

SECRET URGENT NEW YORK, August 31, 1946—12:15 p. m.
[Received August 31—11:30 a. m.]

533. Reference Department's 167, August 23, 2 p. m.⁵⁹ I have discussed frankly with Hasluck all queries raised in the Department's telegram. He said that as he understands, what Evatt proposes to do at the Assembly will depend very largely on what he finds the "climate" of the Assembly to be. Evatt does not plan an all-out attack on the veto as such but his purpose is to effect a restriction of the veto more in line with what he believes to have been the general intention at San Francisco. Evatt is worried about developments since San Francisco which indicate that the Russians consider the veto a convenient piece of machinery to impose their will in all sorts of questions and to block any type of action that does not please them. I gather from Hasluck's remarks, therefore, that Evatt does not favor total abolishment of the so-called veto but would like to see its use confined to matters of real substance which would be of vital interest to the great power employing it. Hasluck showed some caution in reporting his statement as the views of Evatt because he has not got specific instructions. His conclusions may, therefore, be erroneous, as Evatt, if he finds extensive support in the Assembly for abolition of the so-called veto, may go further than he now intends. Evatt, however, has considerable political realism and, if my judgment of him is correct, he would not wish to go too far out on an issue which would lead him to a complete impasse. According to Hasluck, the Australians regard the Cuban proposal as unrealistic and I do not think that the Australian item has any relation to the Cuban proposal.

JOHNSON

⁵⁹ Not printed; The Department requested Ambassador Johnson to "... obtain by informal casual inquiry of Hasluck" information regarding Foreign Minister Evatt's purpose in requesting that the Australian item relating to Article 27 be placed on the agenda of the General Assembly. "To what extent does he desire modification of voting formula? Does he favor abolishment of so-called veto on all or part of Chapter VII, or other parts of Charter in addition to those relating peaceful settlement? Does he intend open challenge of four-power declaration? "Any information you can obtain as to Australian views on Cuban proposal and its relation to Australia item would be appreciated." GENERAL ASSEMBLY AGENDA ITEMS DEALING WITH VOTING IN
SECURITY COUNCIL

Mr. Ross stated that the purpose of this meeting was primarily to consider the approach which would be used in consideration of the problem of veto rather than the conclusions. The discussion in the meeting should center around the draft of a proposed position paper and Senator Austin's memorandum of September 9.⁶⁰ Mr. Ross stated that two factors must constantly be borne in mind :

1. That the discussions must be centered around the two specific proposals before the General Assembly—the Australian proposal and the Cuban proposal.
2. That since the veto problem will not be settled in this session of the General Assembly, a broad approach must be made to the specific agenda items and their relation to the future development of the United Nations.

Senator Austin stressed that in public discussion of the veto question the emphasis had been wrong; that the affirmative problems of prevention of war and peaceful settlement of disputes should be stressed rather than the negative functions of the veto; that the veto merely was one aspect of the principles of voting which were in turn only phases of the broader subject of the prevention of war and peaceful settlement of disputes.

Mr. Ross indicated that the general line of Senator Austin's approach was the same as the approach that had been taken in the Department of State.

Legal Effect of Four Power Statement

Mr. Johnson suggested that consideration of Senator Austin's memorandum and the draft position paper raised the important problem of the legal status of the Four Power Statement. Senator Austin thought that the statement was morally but not legally binding on the Members of the United Nations that subscribed to it. Mr. Fahy suggested that the Four Power Statement, while not legally binding on the U.S., should be departed from reluctantly and should be given great weight as a statement of U. S. policy.

Senator Austin suggested that other statements of other Members of United Nations,—for example, a British statement which he quoted—should likewise be given weight as interpretations of the Charter and particularly as interpretations of problems where the Four Power Statement itself was ambiguous.

Mr. Ross summarized his impression of the views of Mr. Benjamin Cohen on the Four Power Statement and the general subject of the development of the Security Council. He stated that Mr. Cohen regarded the Four Power Statement in the nature of "dicta" concerning interpretation of the Charter which can be modified as the development of the world situation requires. Mr. Cohen did not consider the Charter as a static instrument the interpretation of which cannot be changed with development in world affairs. He believed that the Security Council would from time to time be given powers far beyond the specific limits of the Charter. An instance of such development would be the authority given to the Security Council with reference to the Government of Trieste.

Mr. Ross added his own view that future development is as important as past precedents in the interpretation of the Charter.

(It was agreed that a further paper be prepared on the specific question of the legal effect of the Four Power Statement).⁶¹

Reconciliation of Position on Veto Taken by Mr. Baruch⁶² With the Position To Be Taken Before the General Assembly

Mr. Fahy pointed out a possible conflict between the suggested position of the IS position paper and of Senator Austin's memorandum that the Charter should not be amended, and Mr. Baruch's position advocating abolition of the veto in connection with enforcement action in the event of violations of the proposed treaty concerning atomic energy. It was agreed that the U.S. position should be stated in such a manner that it would not be possible to claim that the U.S. opposition at this time to amendment of the Charter provisions on voting would prevent the carrying out of the recommendations of the Atomic Energy Commission.

Senator Austin stated that the position to be taken before the General Assembly should not interfere with the position taken by Mr. Baruch and should not limit future exceptions to the general voting position to the specific matter of atomic energy.

Possibility of General Assembly Statement Interpreting the Veto

Mr. Thompson suggested the possibility of a General Assembly statement similar to the Four Power Statement interpreting the veto. Senator Austin was impressed with the usefulness of such a statement in magnifying the roles of smaller States in United Nations. Mr. Johnson, although impressed by the importance and usefulness of such a statement, stressed the difficulties of securing agreement on it.

Senator Austin and others felt that the important thing was to get a broad and liberal expression of the Assembly's view, even though some Members might not agree to the statement. Senator Austin suggested and it was agreed that as a first priority the Department of State should draft a proposed text of such an interpretative resolution.⁶³

Importance of Voting Formula

Senator Austin stressed the importance of the voting formula as set forth in Article 27 of the Charter, and that without this formula, there probably would have been no Charter. He felt that the veto was the smallest element in the voting principles and that stress must be given in all publicity concerning the positive achievements with respect to voting.

Mr. Sanders cited as a parallel the situation in the Inter-American organizations where despite the non-existence of a veto, it has been found desirable to work toward unanimity in order to insure the better functioning of the system. Mr. Wadsworth contrasted the useful purposes of the veto to its abuse. Mr. Ross pointed out that the shifting of emphasis from the negative side of the veto to the possible usefulness of unanimity among United Nations Members should not be permitted to obscure the fact that the greatest accomplishments of United Nations have taken place in one of the organs where there is no veto, the Economic and Social Council.

Present Position on Elimination of the Veto

Senator Austin stated that in his opinion it would not be appropriate to eliminate the veto at this time in connection with problems arising under Chapter VII.⁶⁴ On the other hand, it would be appropriate to take some steps towards eliminating the veto in connection with recommendations under Chapter VI.⁶⁵ For the future after disarmament the number of situations where the right of veto is retained should become progressively less and less. It is to be anticipated that disputes among nations will in the future be dealt with more frequently through the methods of pacific settlement or through the use of the World Court. A tremendous step in this direction was the recent U.S. commitment to accept the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice.

Draft Position Paper

The most important comments concerning the proposed position paper submitted by Mr. Johnson are set forth below. Mr. Johnson requested Senator Austin's view on the problem of U.S. policy towards elimination of the veto in connection with recommendations of the Security Council pursuant to Article 37(2).⁶⁶ He explained that there was a great deal to be said both for and against elimination of the veto in this situation.

It was agreed that all positions set forth in the paper should be specifically limited to the present time thus leaving the door open for possible future modification of positions.

Senator Austin suggested that the position paper stressed insufficiently the accomplishments of the Security Council to date and presented too pessimistic a picture of the present procedures in the Security Council.

⁶⁴ Chapter VII deals with breaches of the peace, etc.

⁶⁵ Chapter VI is concerned with pacific settlement of disputes.

⁶⁶ Article 37 of the United Nations Charter reads: "1. Should the parties to a dispute of the nature referred to in Article 33 fail to settle it by the means indicated in that Article, they shall refer it to the Security Council. 2. If the Security Council deems that the continuance of the dispute is in fact likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security, it shall decide whether to take action under Article 36 or to recommend such terms of settlement as it may consider appropriate."

Article 36 reads: "1. The Security Council may, at any stage of a dispute of the nature referred to in Article 33 or of a situation of like nature, recommend appropriate procedures or methods of adjustment. 2. The Security Council should take into consideration any procedures for the settlement of the dispute which have already been adopted by the parties. 3. In making recommendations under this Article the Security Council should also take into consideration that legal disputes should as a general rule be referred by the parties to the International Court of Justice in accordance with the provisions of the Statute of the Court."

It was agreed after discussion that a brief paper should be prepared to indicate whether or not under Article 25⁶⁷ a Member of the United Nations was under legal obligation to carry out recommendations under the Security Council pursuant to Chapter VI. There was considerable difference of opinion among those at the meeting as to proper interpretation of that Article.

[WASHINGTON, October 16, 1946.]

Subject: Consultation with other Members of the Security Council on the Veto Question.

It is proposed that as soon as the U.S. position paper on the veto question is fully approved in the Department, a communication be submitted to each of the other four permanent members of the Security Council, briefly setting forth in substance:

(1) That the U.S. regards the principle of unanimity as reflected in the Yalta voting formula as sound and valid;

(2) That accordingly, the U.S. does not at the present time favor any amendment to Article 27 of the Charter nor a modification of the Four-Power Statement issued at San Francisco;

(3) That the U.S. does, however, favor a liberalized interpretation of Article 27 and the Four-Power Statement along the lines of the three points set forth in the U.S. position paper.

(4) That the U.S. favors full discussion of the veto question in the General Assembly, including the Cuban proposal, but will oppose the calling of a general conference to amend or eliminate the so-called veto privilege.

(5) That the U.S. position with respect to voting on the Security Council does not alter the position taken on the problem of the application of the veto in the control of atomic energy.

This procedure will enable the Governments of the other four permanent members of the Security Council to consider the U.S. position in advance of discussion in the General Assembly or in Committee. It will also make it possible if deemed advisable by the permanent members, to have discussion at the expert level as to the methods of carrying forward, by Rules of Procedure or otherwise, the U.S. pro-

[WASHINGTON, October 22, 1946.]

UNITED STATES POSITION ON GENERAL ASSEMBLY AGENDA ITEMS DEALING WITH VOTING IN SECURITY COUNCIL

I. *The Problem

The Problem is to determine the United States position with respect to

(1) the following item placed on the agenda of the General Assembly by the Australian Government: "the application of Article 27 of the Charter (dealing with the methods of voting in the Security Council) in the proceedings of the Security Council during 1946, and including exercise and the purported exercise of the right of veto upon Security Council decisions conferred by Article 27 and the circumstances connected therewith;" and

(2) an item for the consideration of the General Assembly proposed by the Cuban Government, which has been placed on the Supplementary List by the Secretary-General, as follows: "A convocatory for a general conference of the Members of the United Nations Organization in accordance with Article 109 of the Charter in order to modify Paragraph 3 of Article 27 of the Charter to eliminate the so-called veto privilege.†

II. Possible Objectives of Proponents of Veto Discussion

Discussions in the General Assembly may be expected to be directed toward any or all of the four following objectives:

⁶⁹ Marginal notation by Elwood N. Thompson, Special Assistant to the Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs (Hiss): "I have told Harding Bancroft [now Associate Chief of the Division of International Security Affairs] to go ahead & prepare the paper suggested. ENT." For subsequent developments concerning this proposed communication to the four other permanent members of the Security Council, see pp. 317 ff.

*This paper deals with the question of the veto as embodied in the Charter of the United Nations, particularly in respect of voting in the Security Council. It does not touch directly on the problem of the application of the veto in the control of atomic energy. [Footnote in the original.]

†The Cuban representative proposed an additional item to the General Assembly agenda calling for a general conference of the United Nations members to review the Charter. It is understood that this was in effect a reiteration of their original proposal and not designed to enlarge its scope. [Footnote in the original.]

A. An attack on the interpretation of Article 27 contained in the Statement on Voting Procedure issued at San Francisco by the United Kingdom, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, China, and United States, and agreed to by France, with a view to one or more of the following: (1) the adoption of a resolution denying its validity and binding character, (2) requesting the International Court of Justice to interpret Article 27 of the Charter, (3) inducing the permanent members of the Security Council to modify or abandon the Statement.

B. Charter amendment to eliminate or curtail the veto right in certain limited respects, most probably in relation to (1) pacific settlement under Chapter VI and Article 52(3), and (2) election of the Secretary-General and admission of new members.

C. Charter amendment to eliminate the veto right in its entirety.

D. Convocation of a General Conference to initiate amendments for either total or partial elimination of the veto.

III. Recommended United States Position‡

A. General Considerations.

The position of the United States Delegation in the Assembly debate on voting in the Security Council should be based on the determination of the United States to make the United Nations an effective international organization and to promote its growth toward greater effectiveness as an instrument of international cooperation. This is the position which President Truman and Secretary Byrnes have repeatedly proclaimed and which the latter again enunciated at Stuttgart ⁷⁰ in these words:

“We intend to support the United Nations organization with all the power and resources we possess.”

In carrying out this objective, the United States must continue to recognize that the principle of unanimity among the permanent members of the Security Council is inseverably linked with one of the basic forces which made possible the establishment of the United Nations,—the coordinated action of the great powers during the last war and in preparation of the organization of the United Nations.

It is believed that the requirement that important decisions of the Security Council shall have the concurrence of all of the permanent members tends to discourage the assumption by the major powers of intransigent positions and to encourage the achievement of unanimity through compromise, the alternative being no decision at all. While the requirement of unanimity tends to increase the difficulties of adopting a clearcut decision by forcing the great powers to endeavor to find a solution acceptable to all of them, it probably produces better results than would a voting formula that permitted an important decision unacceptable to any one of them. In any event, it prevents any tendency for the Security Council on issues of major importance to the Great Powers to become progressively committed to a course of action inconsistent with the continued collaboration of one or more of those Powers in the Security Council.

‡The United States should early in the debate make its whole position known. The various points set forth in this section being interrelated, the United States position would suffer serious distortion unless stated as an integral whole. [Footnote in the original.]

Therefore, the United States should seek to direct the Assembly debate on the veto toward carefully considered and feasible objectives which will strengthen the United Nations as much as present circumstances permit. Four general factors serve as guide posts in determining the objectives which are feasible :

1. The highest possible degree of unanimity among the permanent members is not only a desirable objective, but is considered essential to the effective operation of the Security Council. Therefore, even if all the other great powers were ready and willing to consent to a voting formula in the Security Council which would permit substantive decisions§ where the great powers were not unanimous, it is not at all certain that the United States should favor such a formula, since it would be likely to retard the achievement of unanimity. In situations where the principle of unanimity should be maintained, the voting formula itself should be changed to permit decisions which are not arrived at unanimously only if extended experience shows that such change is necessary for the successful operation of the Council.

It is pointed out in the Four Power Statement (Part I, Paragraphs 6 and 7)⁷¹ that the voting formula in the Security Council is in itself a relaxation of the stricter conception of unanimity contained in the Covenant of the League of Nations.

§Certain decisions of the Council under Chapter VI, now requiring the concurrence of all the Permanent Members might well be adopted by an unqualified majority of any seven members without affecting the objectives set forth herein. See C, 2 infra. [Footnote in the original.]

⁷¹ These paragraphs read : "6. In appraising the significance of the vote required to take such decisions or actions, it is useful to make comparison with the requirements of the League Covenant with reference to decisions of the League Council. Substantive decisions of the League of Nations Council could be taken only by the unanimous vote of all its members, whether permanent or not, with the exception of parties to a dispute under Article XV of the League Covenant. Under Article XI, under which most of the disputes brought before the League were dealt with and decisions to make investigations taken, the unanimity rule was invariably interpreted to include even the votes of the parties to a dispute.

"7. The Yalta voting formula substitutes for the rule of complete unanimity of the League Council a system of qualified majority voting in the Security Council. Under this system, non-permanent members of the Security Council individually would have no 'veto'. As regards the permanent members, there is no question under the Yalta formula of investing them with a new right, namely, the right to veto, a right which the permanent members of the League Council always had. The formula proposed for the taking of action in the Security Council by a majority of seven would make the operation of the Council less subject to obstruction than was the case under the League of Nations rule of complete unanimity."

It can be argued that much of the current criticisms of the veto stem not so much from the legitimate use of the privilege but primarily from its abuse. This abuse has fostered confusion about the primary interests involved.

2. The unanimity rule was meant to be confined in the United Nations to the most vital decisions affecting war and peace. It is important to keep in correct perspective the significance and influence of the requirement of unanimity among the great powers. It does not apply to voting in the General Assembly, the Economic and Social Council or the Trusteeship Council. It has not been incorporated into the rules or practices of the several Commissions which have been established, including the Atomic Energy Commission, nor into the constitution of any of the specialized agencies.

The approach, therefore, towards a solution of the problem raised by the requirement of unanimity is a gradual extension of the areas wherein the probability of obtaining unanimity, or effective action without it, is high enough to eliminate or diminish substantially the need for a unanimity rule. This extension will be based largely upon experience gained through the operations of the United Nations in fields where unanimity is required.

Article 27 of the Charter which establishes the voting procedure in the Security Council was the result of thorough and carefully planned study in the United States and of extended and difficult negotiation. This has also been the case only to a slightly lesser degree with regard to other Articles incorporating the unanimity rule, such as those relating to amendments, (Articles 108, 109 (2)).⁷² It would appear to be undesirable to alter the Charter in this respect before the advantages and disadvantages of the present provisions had been tested both from the point of view of the interest of the United States and from that of the effectiveness of the United Nations.

3. In accomplishing its objectives, the United States must constantly bear in mind the viewpoint of other nations and particularly of the Soviet Union towards the unanimity principle and avoid action which tends to drive them into grudging, half-hearted partnership or even out of the Organization. All the evidence at hand indicates that the Soviet Union is, if anything, even more devoted to the principle of unanimity of the permanent members of the Security Council than it was when the Charter was signed. It is clear that the Soviet Union feels that it cannot be assured that the fundamental principle of unanimity will be observed and that it will not be subject to the direction of an opposing majority, in the absence of a voting formula permitting a veto by a permanent member. This being so, the Soviet Government can be expected to resist to the utmost any proposal for even partial elimination of the veto from the United Nations Charter, at least at the present time. The United States position, therefore, should be along lines which will insure the maximum accomplishment with the greatest cooperation from the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

4. The successful functioning of the United Nations requires that all members uphold the Charter in good faith and a spirit of conciliation, and be ever alert to live up to and to defend the purposes and principles of the organization, both within the organization and in all their other international relations. The special responsibilities of the great powers as permanent members of the Security Council impose on them a particularly heavy obligation in this regard. In view of its great responsibilities, the United States, while seeking to understand the views of other states and to obtain maximum cooperation from them, must use its full influence to ensure adherence by all members of the United Nations, and particularly by the other permanent members of the Security Council, to the principles and purposes of the organization and to the spirit of the Charter. No member of the United Nations can be permitted to ignore the fact that, as Secretary Byrnes said on February 28, 1946, "the mere legal veto by one of the permanent members of the Council does not in fact relieve any state, large or small, of its moral obligations to act in accordance with those purposes and principles."⁷³ Nor does the failure of any organ of the United Nations to take a decision relieve any member of that obligation.

The United States position has been formulated with regard to these general considerations.

B. Preferred Position: Liberalized Interpretation of Article 27 and Four Power Statement.

In view of the general considerations outlined above, the United States Delegation to the General Assembly should take a position designed primarily to promote a liberal interpretation by the Security Council of Article 27 and the Four Power Statement. Concretely it should (1) demonstrate what can be accomplished in this direction and the technique by which this may be done, and (2) endeavor to persuade the Soviet Union and the other permanent members of the Security Council on the one hand, and the lesser powers on the other, to accept such a liberalized interpretation. It should of course be remembered that this objective cannot be achieved by a resolution of the Assembly alone but requires action by the Security Council as well.

This course of action has the great advantage from the point of view of negotiations with the Soviet Union of making previous agreements the point of departure and of expanding gradually therefrom the areas of agreement. It would be a mistake to assume that even with this approach it will be easy to secure the consent of the Soviet Union to a liberalized interpretation of the voting formula. Discussions which have already taken place, particularly in the Security Council Committee of Experts, have demonstrated that not only will the Soviet

Government resist liberalization along the lines proposed, but that it actually desires Rules of Procedure which will interpret Article 27 so as to expand the field of decision requiring the concurrence of the permanent members. Also it will remain possible, as long as the Four Power Statement remains in effect, for a permanent member to attempt to invoke Part II, Paragraph 2, of that Declaration in connection with any decision not previously determined to be procedural and thus to attempt to assert a veto in patently unjustifiable cases.¶

In this connection, it should be noted that in the Four Power Statement the four governments expressed their belief that the permanent members would not "use their 'veto' power willfully to obstruct the operation of the Council." If all permanent members had lived up to this principle, it seems likely that there would have been very little criticism of the voting formula. Criticism has been mainly directed at the abuse rather than the use by the permanent members of their privileged voting position.¶

In a general way it is possible through a liberalized interpretation of Article 27 and the Four Power Statement to eliminate most of the abuses of the voting formula that have handicapped the operations of the Security Council to date. While the United States is probably not legally bound by the Four Power Statement, almost as much can be accomplished in the direction of improving the operations of the Security Council through interpretation of both Article 27 and the Four Power Statement, as through interpretation of Article 27 without the Four Power Statement. In this connection it should be noted that the Four Power Statement was regarded at San Francisco as a liberalization of the original Yalta Formula even by Mr. Evatt who was its bitterest opponent.

It is believed that the advantages of this method of approach far outweigh any possible disadvantages. Further experience as a result of the operations of the Security Council, however, may open new avenues of approach. The proposed liberalized interpretation of Article 27(3) and the Four Power Statement should, if possible, include all the following points:

(1) Agreement that the abstention clause of Article 27(3) shall be interpreted to prevent a state from being a judge in its own cause in ¶Part II, Paragraph 2 reads as follows: "In this case, it will be unlikely that there will arise in the future any matters of great importance on which a decision will have to be made as to whether a procedural vote would apply. Should, however, such a matter arise, the decision regarding the preliminary question as to whether or not such a matter is procedural must be taken by a vote of seven members of the Security Council, including the concurring votes of the permanent members." [Footnote in the original.]

¶For discussion of abuses of the voting formula, see paper entitled Use of Veto in the Security Council of the United Nations (Background Book), and The Unanimity Principle in Theory and Practice, pp. 8 to 14, and Annex A (Position Book). any decisions under Chapter VI and under Paragraph 3 of Article 52.⁷⁴ This would require a party to a dispute or involved in a situation to abstain from voting on decisions in connection with the particular dispute or situation, not only in connection with recommendations and other substantive decisions, but also in voting on any preliminary questions which may be necessary to determine whether a dispute or situation exists and whether the particular state is a party in interest. This was the clear intent of the Charter. It is true that several Articles of Chapter VI distinguish between disputes and situations, while Article 27(3) refers only to a dispute. Nevertheless, there are sound historical and logical grounds for assimilating disputes to situations in so far as Article 27(3) is concerned. Moreover, the spirit of the Charter would be seriously violated if it remains possible for a permanent member to block its own exclusion from voting by insisting either that no dispute exists or that it is not a party, and by vetoing any attempt to decide the contrary.

(2) Agreement that the requirement of unanimity among the permanent members on a non-procedural decision will be satisfied if all of the permanent members actually voting on the decision, vote in the affirmative (i.e., that voluntary abstention from voting by a permanent member—as opposed to the abstention required of a party to a dispute under Article 27(3)—shall not be the equivalent of a negative vote). This will enable the Council to reach a decision in cases where one or more permanent members do not approve of a decision but nevertheless are not prepared to vote against it.^{}

(3) Agreement on a clear and exhaustive definition of procedural matters for the purpose of increasing to a maximum the occasions when the question of whether a matter is procedural may be decided without a vote. (Under Paragraph 2 of Part II of the Four Power Statement such decision requires the concurrence of the permanent members). Such an interpretation will not only eliminate most of the debate over procedural questions which now occupies a great part of the Security Council's time and energy but will reduce to a minimum the opportunities for a permanent member to veto a motion before the Council which it does not like merely by invoking Paragraph 2 of Part II of the Four Power Statement.

It will probably be desirable to secure most, if not all, of the above interpretations through Rules of Procedure. In some instances, however, it might be adequate and more feasible to accomplish the results through the establishment of precedents in the Security Council as a first step rather than through the immediate adoption of Rules of Procedure.

⁷⁴ Paragraph 3 of Article 52 reads: "The Security Council shall encourage the development of pacific settlement of local disputes through such regional arrangements or by such regional agencies either on the initiative of the states concerned or by reference from the Security Council."

^{}This may be an extremely difficult position to maintain technically. Although the English text of Article 27(3) provides for "the concurring votes of the permanent members", the text of the Charter in Chinese, French, Russian and Spanish translated literally requires "the concurring votes of all the permanent members". Furthermore, at San Francisco the United States Delegation expressly interpreted the English text in the same manner, i.e., as if the word "all" were included, and hence contrary to the present proposed position. See History of the Voting Problem p. 49. [Footnote in the original.]

A detailed exposition of the nature and limitations of this approach to the problem of voting in the Security Council, as well as a detailed statement of reasons for believing that the U.S.S.R. consent might be secured to the specific suggestions is contained in the paper on technical aspects of proposals for liberalized interpretation of the Four Power Statement and Article 27, (Doc. SD/S/668A).

C. Position on Possible Objectives of Proponents of Discussion.

1. Modification of Four Power Statement.

The United States, from the viewpoint of logic and without prejudicing its national interests, could not only agree to, but should welcome an interpretation of Article 27 which would restrict more than does the Four Power Statement both the areas to which the veto applies and the possibilities of its abuse. Such an interpretation might provide, for example, that decisions under Articles 33, 36 and 52 (3) of the Charter and decisions to investigate (but not subsequent determinations) under Article 34, should be taken by procedural vote, on the ground that such decisions deal only with procedures of pacific settlement and not with the substance of disputes and situations.

Under the present circumstances, however, the United States should not favor discarding the Four Power Statement. While the Statement does not bind this country legally, it does constitute a moral commitment towards other nations which should not be unilaterally renounced without the most careful consideration.†† Any statement in the General Assembly by the U.S. of a desire to secure modification would certainly arouse the resentment of the U.S.S.R. and doubtless lead the Soviet Government to question the sincerity of U.S. support of the principle of unanimity, thus increasing the difficulty of achieving that degree of liberalization possible within the framework of Article 27 and of the Statement. It would probably be unfavorably received by some other permanent members of the Security Council.

The United States should therefore publicly declare its intention to stand on the Four Power Statement and should discourage the introduction of any General Assembly resolution attacking it, as this would weaken our tactical position in securing any modification through direct negotiations with the other four powers. It should, if necessary, affirm that its actions in the Security Council will be based on the Statement as the United States interprets that document, regardless of any such resolution unless the statement is modified by agreement of the five powers.

†† See paper on Legal Status of the Declaration of the Delegations of the Four Sponsoring Governments, Doc. SD/A71A. [Footnote in the original.]

There are a number of indications that the Australian Delegation will probably train its heaviest guns on the Four Power Statement, endeavoring to obtain acceptance as a minimum, of the following positions:

(a) That decisions as to whether a matter is procedural or substantive shall be taken by procedural vote;

(b) That a procedural vote shall govern decisions of the Security Council generally under Chapter VI.

Unless the United States, by strong and effective leadership, keeps the debate properly focussed, there is considerable likelihood that a good many Delegations will rally to the support of any resolution designed to challenge the Four Power Statement on these, and perhaps other, points. Three further points should be borne in mind in this connection. In the first place, the Statement does not contain as restrictive an interpretation of Article 27 as could be devised, or even as the Soviet Delegation desired at San Francisco when they undertook to limit the procedural vote to matters coming within Articles 28 to 32 inclusive and even to contend that discussion of a question should be subject to the veto.

In the second place, the U.S. is not in a position to argue that the Four Power Statement is an unreasonable interpretation of Article 27. While it is true that nearly all members of the U.S. Delegation at San Francisco, including Senators Connally and Vandenberg, expressed themselves in Delegation meetings as opposed to the application of the unanimity rule to pacific settlement, the only point of interpretation of Article 27 insisted on by that Delegation in meetings of the Big Five related to Paragraph 1 of Article 35.⁷⁵ In accordance with the view expressed in the State Department release of March 24,⁷⁶ the American Delegation insisted, in the words eventually incorporated in the Four Power Statement, that "no individual member of the Council can alone prevent consideration and discussion by the Council of a dispute or situation brought to its attention. . . ."

Thirdly, it must not be forgotten that this Government proposed the formula adopted at Yalta and that the Four Power Statement con-

⁷⁵ Article 35 of the United Nations Charter states: "1. Any Member of the United Nations may bring any dispute, or any situation of the nature referred to in Article 34, to the attention of the Security Council or of the General Assembly. 2. A state which is not a Member of the United Nations may bring to the attention of the Security Council or of the General Assembly any dispute to which it is a party if it accepts in advance, for the purposes of the dispute, the obligations of pacific settlement provided in the present Charter. 3. The proceedings of the General Assembly in respect of matters brought to its attention under this Article will be subject to the provisions of Article 11 and 12."

forms to all prior public interpretations which the U.S. had made of Article 27.

2. Partial Elimination of Veto through Charter Amendment.

It is quite probable that suggestions will be made in the General Assembly for amendments to the Charter which would eliminate the requirement of the concurring votes of the permanent Members in connection with the following types of decisions by the Council:

- (a) Election of the Secretary General.
- (b) Admission of new members to the United Nations.
- (c) Decisions relating to pacific settlement of disputes. (Chapter VI and Article 52 (3)).

In connection with any of such proposals, it must be stressed that no amendment could be adopted without the concurrence of all the permanent members of the Security Council which has been shown to be unlikely. In the absence of previous agreement by all these states, support of proposals for amendment would serve no useful purpose and would probably hamper the attainment of the principal objectives of the U.S. with respect to the United Nations.

The following analysis of such proposals is concerned solely with their relation to U.S. policy objectives and does not deal with their political feasibility. It is quite possible that some of the proposed Charter amendments considered below would not be ratified by the U.S.

As regards the election of the Secretary General, unquestionably the prestige of the office is increased if the incumbent has the support of all permanent members. This is one instance where observance of the unanimity principle is clearly helpful. It does not follow, however that the voting formula should make unanimous action mandatory in this type of matter. The U.S. could readily forego its special voting privilege in this instance in the interest of building up the Security Council, if such a course should meet the tests set forth in the general considerations described in III A above.

The considerations with respect to admission of new members are somewhat similar. It is probably desirable that there should be unanimity among the permanent members on this matter. However, in this instance the requirement of unanimity in the voting formula has resulted in the exclusion from membership of certain applicants in total disregard of the standards for membership set forth in Article 4 of the Charter. Here too, there is no serious reason why the U. S. should not forego its special voting privilege especially since there was far less reason for the Charter to provide for the concurrence of the permanent members on this matter than in other cases.

The objectives of U. S. foreign policy would probably be served by removal of the requirement of unanimity among the permanent members of the Security Council in questions of pacific settlement, possibly including even decisions recommending terms of settlement under Article 37 (2).⁷⁷ One of the grounds on which the U. S. agreed to the requirement of unanimity of the permanent members in this instance was that it would have the effect of forcing the great powers to compromise and harmonize their views. The full measure of the anticipated results has not thus far been achieved.

Another reason was the belief that proposals relating to pacific settlement which did not have the support of all the permanent members would lack the weight necessary to be fully effective and might encourage failure to adhere to recommendations of the Security Council.

The U. S. also took the position which is embodied in the Four Power Statement that "decisions and actions by the Security Council" (under Chapter VI) may well have major political consequences and may even initiate a chain of events that might in the end require the Council under its responsibilities to invoke measures of "enforcement" under Chapter VII. The basis of this argument was that effective enforcement action would probably not be possible unless the permanent members of the Security Council had all been in agreement on the decisions taken by the Council prior to the time when enforcement action became necessary. The weakness of this argument is that it will probably be applicable to extremely few cases since the great majority of cases brought before the Council will be disposed of before any question of possible enforcement action arises. On the other hand, a voting formula that requires the concurrence of permanent members may prevent the Council from utilizing fully its machinery for effecting peaceful settlements in a large number of cases, and therefore it is important to strengthen the Council's powers in this field.

The elimination of the unanimity requirement from the operations of Articles 33, 34, 36, 38, and 52 (3) would not, it is believed, remove any protection from vital United States interests which the veto now affords. The only decisions which the Security Council can take under these articles relate to (1) calling upon states to settle their disputes by peaceful means of their own choice; (2) the finding of facts as the basis for possible Security Council recommendations; and (3) recommendations of procedures and methods of settling disputes. While technical and legalistic changes in the voting procedure of the Council cannot be a really satisfactory substitute for effective reconciliation of conflicting interests, particularly of the permanent members, it should be to the real advantage of this Government, which has taken a position of leadership in the United Nations, if the Security Council were able to arrive with greater ease and dignity at decisions relating to investigation and recommendations of procedure of settlement.

⁷⁷This reads: "If the Security Council deems that the continuance of the dispute is in fact likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security, it shall decide whether to take action under Article 36 or to recommend such terms of settlement as it may consider appropriate."

The U. S. can suffer no real injury through elimination of the unanimity requirement from decisions under the articles listed above. Enforcement action under Chapter VII will still require the concurrence of the permanent members.

Article 37 (2) which provides that the Security Council may in certain circumstances "recommend such terms of settlement as it may consider appropriate" raises serious questions and it is not clear whether the U. S. would wish to agree to the abandonment of the unanimity requirement with respect to such recommendations. It is conceivable that a majority of the Security Council might recommend terms of settlement in cases in which the U. S. is not a party, which the U. S. did not regard as consonant with its fundamental interests. While there may be no legal obligation under Article 25 to accept and carry out "recommendations" of the Security Council in contrast to "decisions," nevertheless the moral opprobrium in failing to carry out suggested terms of settlement is considerable.

On the other hand, as previously stated, the highest possible degree of unanimity among the permanent members is considered essential to the effective operation of the Security Council. This is extremely important in connection with the recommendations under Chapter VI, not only for the reasons previously set forth, but also because a recommendation in which only two or three of the Great Powers concurred, even though favored by the smaller states, would not have the force and effect of one supported by all five major powers.

In summary, then, it would appear that the advantages of changing the voting formula with respect to election of the Secretary General, election of members, and pacific settlement of disputes, probably somewhat outweigh the disadvantages. The decisive factors which make it undesirable for the U. S. to favor at this time an amendment of the Charter along these lines are: (1) that it would be impossible to accomplish the desired result in view of the fact that amendments to the Charter require the concurrence of all permanent members of the Security Council; (2) that it would minimize the chances for obtaining concurrence of the Soviet Union in liberalized interpretations of the Charter; and (3) that it might jeopardize the objectives which the principle of unanimity is designed to serve.

3. Elimination of Veto in its entirety through Charter Amendment.

In the event that such an amendment were to be proposed at the forthcoming General Assembly, the United States should oppose it, and should endeavor to concert its efforts to this end with those of the other four permanent members of the Security Council. There are several grounds on which the United States should oppose under present circumstances any proposal for the abandonment of the unanimity rule in its entirety :

(a) The most fundamental ground is the importance of great power unity, which is recognized to be vital to the maintenance of international peace and security. The U.S. had advocated the unanimity requirement and has defended it against attack on the ground that it is an essential basis for the attainment of unity among the Great Powers and thus has a practical value more than offsetting all difficulties attaching to it. Elimination of the unanimity rule might well increase rather than diminish basic disagreement among the Great Powers.

It is also clear that if a grave conflict between the Great Powers should occur, the United Nations itself could not by enforcement measures prevent major hostilities. Consequently, the membership and voting provisions of the Security Council do not directly bear on the issue of the effectiveness of enforcement measures against a great power.

The elimination of the unanimity rule with respect to enforcement action would not alter in any real sense the special status which the Great Powers now have with respect to military matters. As Mr. Stettinius stated before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee :

“The Charter does not confer any power upon the great nations which they do not already possess in fact. Without the Charter the power of these nations to make or break the peace would still exist.”

At present the United Nations has no military forces at its disposal. Even when provision of forces is made in accordance with Article 43, these forces will not be able to carry out against one of the three Great Powers a Council decision to take enforcement action. Probably not even a decision against France or China could be enforced. While it is conceivable that the Council could enforce decisions against certain smaller states despite the refusal of one of the permanent members to agree to the decision, it is unlikely that the rest of the Council would be prepared to take the risk of carrying out enforcement action against such a state over the determined opposition of a permanent member which regarded its vital interest as adversely affected.

Even if, under such circumstances, enforcement action were not actively resisted, it might well be ineffective. It is logical to assume that the Security Council, having decided to use force, would wish to make use of the forces of the Great Power nearest at hand. It is unlikely that a great power would place its forces at the disposal of the Council to carry out a decision it did not approve. Yet, it is quite possible, that under the assumption that the Security Council would wish to use the forces of the Great Power nearest at hand, the forces of this power would be the logical, if not the only ones, that the Security Council could effectively utilize.

Some day the armaments of the Great Powers may be reduced to a level which would make possible enforcement action against any one of them. Quite aside, however, from the factor of military potential, which is independent of the size of forces in being, is the fact that effective regulation of armaments cannot be attained except as a consequence of, or as an accompaniment to, mutual confidence among the Great Powers. This in turn depends upon their ability to attain agreement on major issues. Elimination of the veto on enforcement action would doubtless lessen the chances of Great Power agreement, rather than the contrary; hence, it would render effective regulation of armaments even more remote than at present.

The unanimity rule is designed to facilitate such agreements, and should also facilitate rather than impede the development of an effective system for the regulation of armaments.

(b) The U. S. Government is not in a position to consider at the present time a change in the Charter whereby the concurring vote of the U. S. would be unnecessary to a decision of the Security Council involving enforcement measures in which U. S. forces or economic instrumentalities would be required to participate. Apart from the arguments presented in (a) is the fact that the whole course of development of this Government's position on voting and the debates on the ratification of the Charter show that the Senate regarded the veto as essential in these respects. Moreover, it is open to question whether the American people would in the last analysis support such a step at this stage of international relations.

(c) The U. S. would not now be prepared to accept an amendment of the Charter which would modify the unanimity rule with respect to strategic areas placed under trusteeship.

(d) It is improbable that the U. S. would care to forego the requirement for concurrence among the permanent members of the Security Council in the ratification of amendments to the Charter which might increase the obligations of membership.

(e) The U.S. would have to give the most careful consideration to the effect of the elimination of the unanimity rule on the Monroe Doctrine and on the relations between the Security Council and the Inter-American system, particularly in the light of the Act of Chapultepec and its implementation in the forthcoming Rio Conference.⁷⁸

⁷⁸ For the Act of Chapultepec and the Rio Conference, see footnote 20, p. 130.

4. Cuban Proposal for General Conference To Amend or Eliminate the Veto

There is no reason why the U. S. Delegation should oppose placing the Cuban proposal on the agenda of the Assembly. The U.S. could appropriately suggest, however, that the item should be coupled with the Australian proposal so that the two may be considered at the same time. This is especially desirable since the Cuban proposal permits a consideration of only one phase of the problem, while the Australian proposal permits the discussion of all phases of the problem including the particular question raised by the Cuban proposal.

Technically also, it would be possible to amend the Charter either to limit or eliminate the veto under Article 108 without convoking a conference. There seems to be no reason to believe that more could be accomplished through a conference pursuant to Article 109 than through the procedure for amendment provided by Article 108. The U.S. should therefore oppose the holding of such a conference for this reason, as well as for the reasons set forth above applicable to all proposals to amend Article 27 of the Charter.

Memorandum by Bernhard G. Bechoefer of the Division of International Security Affairs to the Chief of the Division (Johnson)

[NEW YORK,] October 23, 1946.

Subject: First Meeting of Delegation on October 22, 1946 concerning the Veto Problem

I am submitting this memorandum at the suggestion of Mr. Paul Taylor⁷⁹ since neither the secret summary which I prepared immediately after the meeting and which was sent today nor the minutes⁸⁰ which Mr. Taylor has prepared and cleared with me deal with certain phases of the meeting which are of particular interest to you. I shall follow this practice only in unusually important matters where greater detail is required than is ordinarily furnished through the minutes. The meeting took place on the afternoon of October 22 and lasted approximately an hour. Senator Austin stated that the U.S. position has been briefed more thoroughly in connection with the veto problem than with any other problem confronting the General Assembly because it was necessary to convince not only the General Assembly but also to convince public opinion in order to rectify misunderstandings and to secure agreement on voting principles.

⁷⁹ Paul B. Taylor of the Division of International Organization Affairs and an Assistant Executive Officer on the expert and advisory staff attached to the United States Delegation to the General Assembly.

⁸⁰ Neither the telegraphic summary nor the minutes of the meeting are printed here. The minutes of the meetings of the United States Delegation are in the IO Files, the series carrying the symbol US/A/M(Chr); the identifying number for the meeting under reference here, the eighth held by the Delegation (October 22, 1946, 3 p. m.), is US/A/M(Chr)/8.

Senator Austin stated that there was nothing novel in the Security Council voting principles embodied in the Charter and that they were evolved after much study to meet actual conditions. He compared at some length the procedure leading to the adoption of the Charter of the United Nations with the procedure used to adopt the U.S. constitution.

Senator Austin stressed the necessity of (quoting the Vermont constitution) "recurrence to fundamental principles". He stated that the U.S. position aims to avoid the tangle of details. He then said that the U.S. position paper,⁸¹ which was distributed in the meeting, comes from the White House. It had been discussed and approved by the President, the Secretary of State, and the Under-Secretary and that the contents represented the recommendations of the Chief Executive.

Senator Austin stated that the discussion with the Secretary of State and the President concerned not only the substantive position but also procedures for presenting the substantive position. It was agreed that a general statement of the U.S. position should be presented to the delegates of the permanent members of the Security Council⁸² before any discussion took place either in the general committee or in the General Assembly. Senator Austin would personally see the delegates in the hope that the permanent members would take positions similar to that recommended by the U.S.

Senator Austin further stated that the U.S. would advocate a discussion in the General Assembly immediately after the general debates and prior to the reference of this particular matter to a committee. The Senator would attempt to induce the U.S.S.R. to suggest a general discussion prior to the reference of the matter to a committee. The purpose of such discussion would be to limit the extent of consideration in the committee and to sift out the most important problems.

Senator Austin then proceeded to state briefly the substance of the position paper. He made two fundamental points: First, the U.S. adheres firmly to the principle of unanimity which requires that the more important decisions of the Security Council be approved by all Powers with responsibilities to carry out the decisions. The loss of speed through the requirement of unanimity is more than counter-balanced by the gain in certainty of the abolition of war. Second, the U.S. must assure the world that it is not standing against world opinion through opposing change. The U.S. is eager to go ahead at the proper time when real progress can be achieved through change and when change will advance the possibilities of peace. Specifically, from a long-range standpoint, the U.S. looks forward to interpretation of the Charter in such a manner that the veto at some future time may not apply to matters arising under Chapter VI of the Charter. The U.S. cannot however hold out any hope for any change in the Charter which would eliminate the veto under Chapter VII.

Senator Austin suggested that the position paper be studied carefully and that more detailed discussions should take place at a later time.

Senator Austin stated that one aspect of the U.S. position is negative. The U.S. believes that no case has been made out for amendment of the Charter at this time and therefore will oppose the Cuban proposal for a convocation of a general conference. The indictment against the Security Council voting formula is directed not to the formula but to abuses, malpractice—and therefore is insufficient to justify amendment of the Charter.

Affirmatively, the U.S. suggests rules, regulations, definitions, not changes.

Senator Connally suggested that possible future modifications of the Charter should not be restricted to Chapter VI but might also apply to matters such as the election of the Secretary-General. Minister Wadsworth further suggested that future modifications might also apply to admission of States to membership.

Senator Austin agreed but stated that the first task was to stop the Cuban movement which could not help but result in futility because of the right of permanent members to veto any amendments.

Mr. Dulles suggested that the U.S. should not take the Cuban proposal too seriously since the Cubans knew that it was futile. It was put forward because of the feeling of many nations, not only the smaller nations but also some of the greater powers, that the veto has been used arbitrarily. However, to the best of his knowledge no State has contended that the veto has been used arbitrarily by the U.S. Mr. Dulles therefore suggested that it was not necessary for the U.S. to come to the defense of the veto. If the purpose of the discussion is to air the grievances of the smaller States concerning the veto, why should we come to its rescue?

Senator Austin stated that the U.S. must take the leadership to revive the spirit of our people with regard to the United Nations, indicating that the campaign against the veto had shifted the viewpoint of the U.S. from fundamental conceptions of the United Nations. Mr. Dulles said that he conceded Senator Austin's contention but stated that he objected to Senator Austin's statement that there was no grounds for the Cuban indictment. Congressman Eaton asked if the U.S. was defending the veto and merely objecting to the U.S.S.R. use of the veto. Senator Austin reiterated that the attacks on the veto undermined the confidence of the American public in the United Nations and the U.S. position must be directed to end the defeatist attitude in the U.S. Minister Wadsworth said that he was impressed by the necessity for defending the principles of unanimity but asked what safeguards could be given against continuing abuses. Senator Austin said that safeguards could be furnished through rules and regulations. Senator Austin informed Mr. Stevenson that there would be many chances for further discussion but that such discussions should not take place until all the delegation had had an opportunity to study the Charter.

[For the brief General Committee discussion as to whether the three items on the voting question should be recommended to the General Assembly for inclusion on its agenda, see United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, Second Part, General Committee, pages 74 and 75. In deference to the Soviet Representative's (Vyshinsky) withdrawal of an initial opposition to the inclusion of the items on the agenda, the United States Representative (Austin), "actuated by the same conciliatory spirit as Mr. Vyshinsky", did not press for a General Committee recommendation for discussion of the items by the General Assembly in plenary session before referral to the appropriate committee. The General Committee decided, then, that a "qualified committee" should be appointed to study the question and to report to the General Assembly. The final recommendation of the General Committee to the General Assembly was that the items should be adopted for inclusion in the final agenda and then be referred immediately to the First Committee (Report of the General Committee to the General Assembly, document A/163, United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, Second Part, Plenary Meetings, pages 1475 ff., annex 30; this record is cited hereafter as GA (I/2), Plenary).]

Position on the Veto

Senator Austin reported that he had decided to speak at the close of the general debate. He would take the position on the veto outlined in the position paper. The net of this was that the United States objected to amending the Charter. Our understanding of the veto principles was that they were pre-eminently constructed and not negative. We favored keeping the door open to amendments if the case were suitable but, in the meantime, there should be announced a progressive, constructive policy regarding the peaceful settlement of disputes. The voting principles had not been intended to interfere with peaceful settlement of disputes. Senator Austin did not propose to put forward any resolutions or recommendations to be acted on by the General Assembly.

⁸³ With respect to the minutes of the meetings of the United States Delegation to the General Assembly the list of persons present is not printed because of excessive length; those who are mentioned in the minutes themselves as participating in the discussion are readily identifiable; note may be made of the general lists of persons on the expert and advisory staff printed pp. 37-42.

Senator Connally inquired whether the United States could not sponsor or agree to a resolution expressing the hope that the Security Council would use the veto sparingly, thus indicating the United States was not pleased with its prodigal use. Senator Austin said that he thought the United States could agree to such a motion but he thought that it should not be put forward in his speech but in later debates or in the Committee. Senator Connally agreed. He recalled that in defending the veto at San Francisco, he had defended the principle of unanimity among the Great Powers. It had been agreed then if two Powers were to try to coerce a third major Power, war might be precipitated and therefore unanimity was essential. However, it had not been the intention that the veto should be used all over the lot on two-bit questions.

Senator Austin said that it might be that Senator Connally might see fit to make some such proposal in Committee 1.

In answer to Mr. Eaton's question, Senator Austin said he was not going to imply that the veto had been abused. Mr. Eaton asked if that were not the case. Senator Austin said that he had not completely clarified the position but that he expected to urge that the use of the veto be restrained by rules of procedure.

Senator Vandenberg said he did not know what the speech should contain for it was Senator Austin's and not his. He continued that the thing he missed was the lack of affirmative United States proposals on anything on the agenda. He said that he did not believe that there was any United States proposal in the thirty-two items on the agenda. He did not believe that moral leadership would be obtained in that way. He agreed that it was no time to amend the Charter but that the development of a definition of the veto should specifically assert that in our opinion the veto should be confined to Chapter VII. This would be a progressive step which could be taken without jeopardizing in any degree reasonable use of the veto.

Senator Connally observed that when abuse of the veto was charged, someone would ask in what cases it had been abused. Senator Vandenberg replied that one didn't have to charge abuse of the veto but he did not like, even by silence, to deny the great majority of small States who had charged an abuse of the veto. He did not like to be associated with the general denial. Senator Austin remarked that that was the reason for his speech. Senator Connally thought that was a very nebulous sort of approach. Senator Vanderberg replied that it ceased to be nebulous if it was established that the veto applied only to Chapter VII. Senator Connally recalled that the Delegation had started out and intended in San Francisco to have the veto apply only to Chapter VII. However, some provisions of the Charter had been drawn which did not sustain this position. Senator Austin said that he believed the use of the veto to obstruct peaceful settlement violated the Charter. Senator Connally stated that if Senator Austin emphasized that argument it would lay the groundwork for Committee 1 to come along with some recommendations.⁸⁴

The Counselor of the Department (Cohen) to Senator Austin

CONFIDENTIAL

WASHINGTON, November 2, 1946.

MY DEAR SENATOR AUSTIN: I enclose a revised copy of the memorandum entitled "U.S. Position on General Assembly Agenda Items Relating to Voting in the Security Council."⁸⁵ You will recall that an earlier draft was discussed in the meeting in Washington on the evening of October 18.⁸⁶ I also enclose a paper entitled "United States Proposals for Rules of Procedure of the Security Council",⁸⁷ which contains three proposed rules together with brief comments thereon. These are revisions of three of the rules contained in the document "Technical Aspects of Proposals for Liberalized Interpretation of Four Power Statement and Article 27 (SD/S/668B),"⁸⁸ a copy of ⁸⁴ For Senator Austin's statement of the United States position on the General Assembly item dealing with voting in the Security Council, delivered in the course of his speech to the General Assembly on October 30 at the time of the opening speeches by the delegates, see GA (I/2), Plenary, pp. 904-908. Omitted from Senator Austin's speech were details of the United States program for liberalization of the voting procedures and practices of the Security Council as set forth in the position paper of October 22 and included in earlier drafts of the speech.

The General Assembly on October 31 after a brief discussion adopted the General Committee's recommendation that the items regarding Article 27 be referred to the First Committee (GA, (I/2), Plenary, pp. 931-933).

⁸⁸ Not printed; this was a lengthy working paper of some 25 pages which went through several revisions.

which was included among the background material for the position paper on the "veto." You will note that the other rules and alternatives in that document have been omitted.

It is our judgment that the best way to achieve success in obtaining agreement on these draft rules, which we believe will accomplish the ends set forth in the position paper and in your speech, is to discuss them at an early date with the representatives of the other four permanent members of the Security Council, and as soon as practicable thereafter to have them considered by the Committee of Experts of the Council.

The Department believes that the best way to approach the other four permanent members would be for you personally to hand copies of the two documents directly to each of the Chiefs of the Assembly Delegations from those countries, stating that you wish to take advantage of their presence for an exchange of views on this most important question. You will wish, I believe, to explain the two memoranda briefly, emphasizing our view that the establishment of satisfactory procedures for the Security Council is the responsibility of the Council itself. You will probably wish also to indicate that you will be glad to hold further consultations with them after they have had an opportunity to study the two documents, and perhaps to suggest conversations on the technical level as well. The four Chiefs of Delegations should be also informed of our desire to have the Committee of Experts of the Security Council consider these proposals at an early date, preferably within the next week or so. In this connection it should be noted that drafts of rules designed to achieve the same ends as Rules B and C of the second paper were handed informally last spring to the representatives on that Committee of the other permanent members, but were never discussed in the Committee or shown to its other members.

It is not impossible that during the consultations others will make an attempt to explore more fully the question of eliminating the "veto" with respect to atomic energy. Should this occur, I believe the United States position should be that the question is irrelevant until such time as the Atomic Energy Commission makes specific proposals. We are presently concerned solely with the procedures of the Security Council within the framework of the Yalta formula.

I enclose a copy of a letter I am sending today to Mr. Herschel Johnson, suggesting that after consultation with you, he arrange with Sir Alexander Cadogan, the President of the Security Council, to have the Committee of Experts meet for the purpose of considering these proposals.

Sincerely yours,

BENJAMIN V. COHEN

The Counselor of the Department (Cohen) to the Acting United States Representative at the United Nations (Johnson)

CONFIDENTIAL

WASHINGTON, November 2, 1946.

DEAR HERSCHEL: I enclose a copy of a letter I am sending today to Senator Austin, together with copies of the enclosures referred to therein.

As you know, the proposed draft rules result from long and careful consideration of the problem of the "veto". You will note that there has been considerable redrafting and that certain of the rules and alternatives discussed in the paper on "Technical Aspects of Proposals for Liberalized Interpretation of Four Power Statement and Article 27", have been left out of this paper. This was done in the belief that the three rules which are submitted constitute the basis on which we should begin negotiations with the other permanent members of the Security Council and in the Committee of Experts. In this connection, I should say that while the Department feels very strongly that it is essential to obtain eventual agreement on the substance of these three rules, it does not regard the form and language as fixed and binding.

We regard the successful adoption by the Council of rules of this nature as the primary objective to be sought from the consideration of the "veto" question in the present session of the General Assembly. The Department is fully aware that the attainment of this objective will be difficult and may take considerable time. We regard certainty as much more important than speed. We do, however, want to have the Committee of Experts begin considerations of our proposals before the General Assembly has completed its discussion of the "veto".

I believe that it should be possible to begin discussions within the Committee of Experts a week or ten days after these proposals have first been submitted to the other permanent members of the Security Council. Will you, therefore, keep in touch with Senator Austin with a view to your asking Sir Alexander Cadogan to call a meeting of the Committee of Experts as soon as it appears appropriate, and to ask the Committee to examine these proposals thoroughly and with as much dispatch as is consistent with accuracy and thoroughness.

Sincerely yours,

BENJAMIN V. COHEN

U.S. POSITION ON GENERAL ASSEMBLY AGENDA ITEMS RELATING TO VOTING IN THE SECURITY COUNCIL⁸⁹

(Draft of Memorandum Which It Is Proposed To Hand to the Delegations to the General Assembly of the Other Four Permanent Members of the Security Council)

The U. S. Government attributes importance to the discussion in the General Assembly of the agenda items proposed by the Governments of Australia and Cuba dealing with the voting procedure in the Security Council.

For this reason and because these items necessarily have a special significance for the five permanent members of the Security Council the U.S. Government desires to outline its position on this subject to each of the other permanent members prior to the discussion in the General Assembly.⁹⁰

The U.S. position may be summarized as follows:

(1) The U. S. regards the principle of unanimity as of the highest importance for the success of the United Nations and the reflection of this principle in the Yalta voting formula (Article 27 of the Charter) as valid.

(2) Accordingly, the U.S. does not at the present time favor an amendment to Article 27 of the Charter.

(3) The United States is opposed to the calling of a general conference to amend the Charter in respect to the so-called "veto".

(4) The United States hopes that the five permanent members may find it desirable at some time in the future in full agreement among themselves and with other Members to support modifications of the unanimity requirement in its application to matters arising under Chapter VI.

(5) The United States recognizes that some of the difficulties encountered in the Security Council during the first year of its operations were due to lack of certainty regarding the meaning of the voting formula adopted at the San Francisco Conference. Consequently, the United States favors the clarification of ambiguities in that voting formula and suggests that a more detailed interpretation of Article 27 of the Charter and of the Four Power statement might be agreed upon along lines set forth below.

⁸⁹ In a revision of this paper (document US/A/C.1/20 (Rev.a), November 5, not printed) this title was changed to read: "United States Position on Voting in the Security Council with Special Reference to the General Assembly Items on This Subject"; the parenthetical statement which follows was eliminated.

⁹⁰ This paragraph was omitted in the November 5 revision.

(a) Agreement should be reached on a list of procedural matters, which should be as exhaustive as possible, for the purpose of increasing to a maximum the occasions when the question of whether a matter is procedural may be decided by a simple reference to such a list and without a vote. Such an interpretation will eliminate most of the debate over what is a procedural question which now occupies a great part of the Security Council's time and energy.

(b) In accordance with the clear intent of the Charter, the abstention clause of Article 27 (3) should be interpreted to ensure that a State be unable to serve as a judge in its own cause in any decisions under Chapter VI and under paragraph 3 of Article 52. This would require a State party to a dispute or involved in a situation to abstain from voting on non-procedural decisions in connection with the particular dispute or situation. It would eliminate the distinction between disputes and situations in connection with the Charter injunction of abstention from voting. It would also prevent a permanent member of the Council from rendering that injunction inoperative by casting its vote against a Council determination that a particular state was in fact a party to a dispute or involved in a situation.

(c) The permanent members of the Council should be permitted to abstain from voting on any decision without having such abstention regarded as a negative vote. Thus the requirement of unanimity among the permanent members on a non-procedural decision will be satisfied if all of the permanent members actually voting on the decision, vote in the affirmative. This will enable the Council to reach a decision in cases where one or more permanent members do not choose to exercise the right to vote.

(6) The United States is proposing the texts of three rules of procedure for the Security Council, copies of which, together with brief comments, are submitted herewith.⁹¹ Since the United States Government regards it as inappropriate for the General Assembly to consider or pass upon the texts of rules of procedure of the Security Council, it does not intend to introduce its proposed rules before the General Assembly. It does desire, however, to have them considered by the Committee of Experts of the Security Council at an early date.⁹²

⁹¹ See document US/A/C.1/18, November 4, p. 322.

⁹² In the November 5 revised paper this section was changed to read: "The United States is proposing to the Security Council the texts of three draft rules of procedure which embody these concepts and which it hopes can form the basis for constructive action by the Council. Since the United States Government does not believe that the General Assembly should consider or pass upon the texts of rules of procedure for the Security Council, it does not intend to submit its proposed rules to the General Assembly. It does hope, however, that the Security Council will request its Committee of Experts to consider them at an early date."

(7) The U.S. position with respect to voting in the Security Council does not affect the position taken by the U.S. Representative on Atomic Energy Commission on the problem of the application of the "veto" in the international control of atomic energy. It has already been made clear that the United States proposals do not attack the general requirement for unanimity of the permanent members of the Security Council.

The U.S. will welcome the opportunity for further consultation on this question with the Delegations to the General Assembly of the other states which are permanent members of the Security Council.⁹³

UNITED STATES PROPOSALS FOR RULES OF PROCEDURE OF THE SECURITY COUNCIL⁹⁵

A. Rule Listing Procedural Matters :

Decisions of the Security Council on the following matters, including all other matters falling within the general categories set forth below, shall be deemed procedural and the vote thereon shall be in accordance with Article 27 (2) of the Charter.

1. Decisions of the Security Council relating to its meetings and those of the General Assembly. This category shall include such decisions as those pertaining to (a) the time and place of regular and periodic meetings; (b) whether a meeting should be public or private; (c) what records of meetings should be kept, the classification thereof and the right of access thereto, etc; (d) convocation of a meeting of the General Assembly; (e) the time and place for a general conference for the purpose of revising the Charter pursuant to Article 109.

Comment :

Article 28 of the Charter providing that the Council "shall be so organized as to be able to function continuously" comes under the ⁹³ This paragraph was eliminated in the November 5 revision.

heading "Procedure" in the Charter. The Four Power Statement of June 7, 1945, Part I, paragraph 2, states that a procedural vote will be used by the Security Council to "select the times and places of its regular and special meetings."

It was agreed in the Committee of Five Deputies of the Heads of Delegations at San Francisco that the convocation of a special session of the General Assembly was a procedural matter. (Meetings on May 18 and May 29, 1945). See Article 20 of Charter.⁹⁶

The practice of the Council has been to decide on the time and place of meetings of the Security Council, and on the records of meetings without a formal vote or by a procedural vote.

2. Decisions of the Security Council relating to the agenda of its meetings and to the determination of items of which it is seized. This category shall include such decisions as those pertaining to (a) the adoption of the agenda or the addition of an item to or deletion of an item from the agenda; (b) the inclusion of a matter among, or the elimination of a matter from, those of which the Security Council is seized; (c) the Secretary-General's notification to the General Assembly pursuant to Article 12.

Comment:

Part I, paragraph 3 of the Four Power Statement provides that the veto power cannot be used to prevent bringing a matter to the attention of the Security Council. It has been the practice of the Council to adopt the agenda without taking a formal vote; in cases where a vote was taken the decision has been made by a procedural vote.

Similarly all the members of the Council have expressed the view that removing an item from the agenda is a procedural decision. Under Rule 10, an item which is being considered remains on the agenda unless the Council votes to remove it.

The decision to include a matter among or eliminate a matter from those of which the Security Council is seized is part of the decision to consider or to terminate the consideration of a matter and accordingly is likewise procedural.

3. Decisions relating to credentials. This category shall include decisions relating to the credentials of a representative on the Security Council or of a representative of any other State invited to participate in its meetings.

⁹⁶ In the November 5 revision of this paper this section was eliminated. A new section read: "Article 109 of the Charter provides that the decisions of the Security Council relating to the convocation of a General Conference to review the Charter shall be made by procedural vote. By the same token, the request of the Security Council to the Secretary-General for the calling of a special session of the General Assembly under Article 20, which comes under the heading 'Procedure', should also be by procedural vote."

Comment:

It has been the practice of the Council to approve the Secretary-General's report on credentials without a formal vote.

4. Decisions relating to the presidency of the Security Council. This category shall include such decisions as those pertaining to the manner of selecting the President, his term of office, the rights, duties, and responsibilities of his office.

Comment:

Article 30 of the Charter authorizing the Security Council to determine the method of selecting its President comes under the heading "Procedure" in the Charter. See also Four Power Statement, Part I, paragraph 2 which states that the Council will by a vote of any seven of its members "determine the method of selecting its President."

5. Decisions of the Security Council on questions of parliamentary procedure. This category shall include such decisions as those pertaining to (a) rulings by the President on points of order; (b) the precedence of principal motions and draft resolutions; (c) the order in which amendments to motions or draft resolutions are to be voted upon; (d) the motions listed in Rule 33 and similar parliamentary motions; (e) requests to members of the Secretariat or to other persons for information or for other assistance.

Comment:

All of these matters relate to parliamentary conduct of the discussions in the Security Council. Primary responsibility for decisions of this type rests on the President in his capacity as presiding officer of the Security Council. The authority which the Security Council reserves to itself in this area and does not delegate to the President is clearly procedural and has been so regarded in the past proceedings of the Security Council.

6. Decisions relating to invitations issued by the Security Council to States to participate in its discussions. This category shall include such decisions as those pertaining to (a) invitations to non-members of the Security Council to participate pursuant to Articles 31, 32, and 35 (2) of the Charter; (b) the conditions of such participations.

Comment:

This category is expressly covered by Part I, paragraph 2 of the Four Power Statement which states that the Security Council will by a vote of any seven of its members "invite a member of the Organization not represented on the Council to participate in its discussions when that member's interests are specially affected; and invite any state when it is a party to a dispute being considered by the Council to participate in the discussion relating to that dispute."

The practice of the Council has been to invite a non-member of the Security Council to participate without the taking of a formal vote; when a formal vote was taken the decision was made by procedural vote.

7. Decisions relating to the procedures for dealing with applications for membership in the United Nations.

Comment:

Rule 58 provides that except where the Security Council decides otherwise, an application shall be referred to a Committee and the Council has followed the method provided in this rule. It seems clear that a decision to use some other procedure than that which is specified in Rule 58 would be procedural.

8. Decisions concerning relationships with other organs of the United Nations. This category shall include such decisions as those relating to (a) the establishment of such relationships; (b) approval of annual and special reports to the General Assembly.

Comment:

It seems clear that questions relating to the methods of establishing and conducting relations among the various organs of the United Nations are procedural. This category would not include a decision to refer a matter from the Security Council to the General Assembly.

Inasmuch as reports of the Security Council should record past proceedings of the Council rather than contain recommendations this approval by the Council should be by procedural vote.

9. Decisions on all matters relating to the election of Judges of the International Court of Justice excepting where a different voting procedure is provided in Article 10 (2) of the Statute of the Court.

Comment:

Article 10 (2) of the Court provides that the Security Council shall elect judges and appoint members of a joint conference by an absolute majority of votes "without any distinction between permanent and non-permanent members of the Security Council."

It would follow that decisions on matters purely incidental to the election of Judges such as the dates of special elections or questions of procedure in connection with the balloting should not require more than a procedural majority of the Council. Matters on which the Security Council would be required to vote are listed in Article 12 and Article 4, paragraph 3 of the Statute of the Court.

Such incidental decisions as were taken in the Council during the election of judges in February 1946 were made without formal vote.

10. Decisions relating to the conditions under which a State not a member of the United Nations may become a party to the Statute of the International Court under Article 93 of the Charter, and the conditions under which the Court shall be opened to States not parties to the Statute under Article 35 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice.

11. Decisions concerning the creation of subsidiary organs, and their relation to the Security Council. This category shall include such decisions as those pertaining to (a) the appointment of any committee or commission, or of the Secretary-General as Rapporteur for a specified question; (b) the approval of procedures of committees and commissions established by the Security Council.

Comment:

Article 29 of the Charter authorizing the establishment of subsidiary organs is one of the Articles coming under the heading "Procedure." The Committee of Five Deputies of Heads of Delegations at San Francisco tentatively agreed on May 27, 1945 that this matter was procedural.⁹⁷

The resolution establishing the Atomic Energy Commission specified that its Rules of Procedure should be approved by the Security Council by a procedural vote and the Security Council has established this precedent.

12. Decisions of the Security Council relating to the adoption, alteration or suspension of its Rules of Procedure.

Comment:

This matter is specifically covered in paragraph 2 of Part I of the Four Power Declaration which states that the Security Council may by a vote of any seven of its members "adopt or alter its Rules of Procedure." The power to alter would include the power to suspend.⁹⁸

13. All other decisions of the Security Council not involving its taking direct measures in connection with settlement of disputes, adjustment of situations likely to lead to disputes, determination of threats to peace, removal of threats to the peace, and suppression of breaches of the peace.

Comment:

Part I, paragraph 1 of the Four Power Statement provides as follows: "The Yalta voting formula recognizes that the Security Council, in discharging its responsibilities for the maintenance of international peace and security, will have two broad groups of functions. Under Chapter VIII, the Council will have to make decisions which involve its taking direct measures in connection with settlement of disputes, adjustment of situations likely to lead to disputes, determination of threats to peace, removal of threats to the peace, and suppression of breaches of the peace. It will also have to make decisions which do not involve the taking of such measures. The Yalta formula provides that the second of these two groups of decisions will be governed by a procedural vote—that is, the vote of any seven members. The first group of decisions will be governed by a qualified vote—that is, the vote of seven members, subject to the proviso that in decisions under Section A and a part of Section C of Chapter VIII parties to a dispute shall abstain from voting.”

⁹⁷ The second sentence of this section was omitted in the November 5 revision.

⁹⁸ Paragraph 12 was omitted in its entirety in the November 5 revision, and paragraph 13 became paragraph 12.

B. Rule Relating to Abstention From Voting Under Article 27 (3)

In accordance with Article 27 (3) a party to a dispute or a party involved in a situation shall abstain from voting on non-procedural matters under Chapter VI or paragraph 3 of Article 52 relating to such dispute or situation. If prior to or immediately following the vote on such decision, question is raised as to whether a member of the Security Council is required under the Charter to abstain from voting as a party to the dispute or involved in the situation the President shall rule whether that member is required to abstain from voting.

If after the president's ruling a vote is requested, the question whether the member is required to abstain from voting shall be submitted to the Security Council under Article 27 (2). The ruling shall stand as the decision of the Security Council, unless by an affirmative vote of seven members the Council decides in a contrary sense.

In the event that question is raised as to whether more than one member is required under the Charter to abstain from voting the Security Council's decision as to each such member shall be made separately.

Comment:

The injunction contained in Article 27 (3) of the Charter that a party to a dispute shall abstain from voting was designed to give effect to the principle that a member of the Council should not be a judge in its own cause. That principle, which is a fundamental of the Yalta voting formula and which, as was pointed out in the Four Power Statement, was an important distinguishing feature between the Yalta formula and the practice of the Council of the League of Nations, should be applied whether a particular case before the Security Council is labelled a dispute or a situation.

The distinction that is made in other articles of the Charter between a situation and a dispute was not intended to prevail in derogation of the Charter provision which enjoins the parties to a case before the Council to abstain from voting on non-procedural decisions relating to that case.

The Charter specifically enjoins a party to a dispute to abstain from voting. This can only mean that the vote of the party must not be included in recording votes on non-procedural decisions. It means further that no individual member of the Council should be permitted to prevent the operation of the Charter injunction.

While this injunction is absolute, and while the Charter makes no provision for a determination by the Council as to whether a particular member is in fact a party, some method for determining whether a vote should be counted is essential.

In view of the fact that no individual member can be permitted to prevent the operation of the Charter injunction, this question should not be determined by a non-procedural vote. Moreover, the U.S. is convinced that this determination is in the truest sense procedural. It is a decision that clearly does not involve the taking of direct measures in connection with the settlement of the case but rather determines in what manner the vote of the Security Council shall be taken when the substantive decision comes to a vote.

C. Rule Providing that Voluntary Abstention From Voting Shall Not Be Considered the Equivalent of a Negative Vote

The failure of a permanent member of the Council to vote on any non-procedural decision of the Council shall not constitute a negative vote. Unless a permanent member affirmatively indicates that it does not concur it shall be deemed to be willing to concur in any such decision that the Security Council may make by the affirmative vote of seven members including the affirmative votes of the permanent members not abstaining.

Comment:

The question of whether the voluntary abstention of a permanent member of the Council should operate as a negative vote was discussed both at Dumbarton Oaks and at San Francisco. Although in those discussions the U.S. representative took a contrary view, it is now the position of the U.S. Government that a proper construction of the Charter does not prevent a permanent member of the Council from abstaining without having that abstention operate as a veto.⁹⁹

The practice of the Council has been to permit the elected members of the Council to abstain without depriving the necessary majority of seven of the right to decide. There appears to be no greater reason for giving a different effect to the abstention of a permanent member. If for political or other reasons a permanent member is not in a position to support affirmatively a proposition but is perfectly willing to defer to the wishes of the majority there is no reason why that member should be forced to exercise its veto.

⁹⁹ In the revised paper of November 5 this section was changed to read: "The United States Government believes that the Charter may properly be construed so as to permit a permanent member of the Council to abstain without having that abstention operate as a veto."

It is the view of the U.S. that this liberal construction of the voting formula is of primary importance to the successful functioning of the Charter. Certainly no permanent member should be able to prevent the functioning of the Council merely because it is unwilling to vote on a proposition either in the affirmative or in the negative.

In construing a basic document like the Charter the right given to the permanent members in the voting formula should be construed as a right subject to waiver by its non-exercise, particularly when such a waiver cannot be regarded as prejudicial to the interests of the Organization or to the interests of any of its members.

VOTING IN SECURITY COUNCIL

Present: Senator Warren R. Austin	Mr. Sandifer
Senator Connally	Mr. Joseph Johnson
Ambassador Herschel Johnson	Mr. Noyes
Mr. Dulles	Mr. Foote
Mr. Stevenson	Mr. Sanders
Mr. Cohen	Mr. Stokes
Mr. Fahy	Mr. Wilcox
Mr. Ross	Mr. Bechhoefer

Copies of documents US/A/C.1/20 and US/A/C.1/18 were distributed to those present. Mr. Joseph Johnson read the former document which was a draft of a memorandum which it was proposed to submit to the delegations to the General Assembly of the other four permanent members of the Security Council indicating the position of the United States on the problem of voting in the Security Council. Mr. Johnson summarized the latter document which also was to be submitted to the other four permanent members of the Security Council and which contained the proposals for rules of procedure of the Security Council which the United States intended to present to the Security Council.

After considerable discussion it was agreed that the position memorandum should be revised in certain details. Likewise the comments on the proposals for the rules of procedure should be revised to delete all reference to secret documents of the San Francisco Conference. It was further agreed that both documents as revised should be submitted to the delegations of the other members of the Big Five—if possible today or tomorrow morning and in any event, prior to any discussion of the problem in Committee I. It was further agreed that they should likewise be submitted to the delegations of other members of the Security Council shortly after submission of the documents to the other Four.

It was decided that the documents should also be filed with the President of the Security Council but no decision was reached as to the time when such filing should take place.

No decision was reached on the following questions :

1. Whether the proposals on rules of procedure to be filed with the Security Council should be a restricted document.
2. Whether in the presentation to Committee I of the General Assembly the United States should confine itself to the general points made in Senator Austin's speech or should list the matters where the United States believed additional interpretation of the voting formula was required.
3. The nature of the statement to be made by Senator Connally in the Committee.
4. Whether to submit the specific rules of procedure to the General Assembly.
5. The nature of any resolution which the United States should support in the General Assembly.

Mr. Stevenson and others emphasized that almost immediately after the presentation of the documents discussed in this meeting to the other members of the Security Council, their contents would become public. Therefore, it was suggested that it would be appropriate to submit the documents officially to the General Assembly for its information but not for action, even though the exact text of the proposed rules of procedure need not be deemed a firm position of the United States.

Mr. Cohen and Mr. Joseph Johnson emphasized that the objective of the discussions in the General Assembly was to obtain acceptance by the Security Council of satisfactory rules and practices, and not to secure a resolution that satisfied the General Assembly. Since it would be undesirable to press for the hasty adoption of rules by the Security Council which might be unsatisfactory, there was very little chance that the Security Council would act during the present session of the General Assembly. Accordingly they felt that the presentation in the General Assembly should be made in such a way as not to prejudice success in the Committee of Experts and in the Security Council.

Mr. Cohen stressed that the unofficial publication of United States proposals would not be the equivalent of their being submitted to the General Assembly by the United States as an official document.

It was agreed that there was considerable danger that a great multitude of very specific proposals would be made to the General Assembly with the effect of confusing the main issues. The fact that other states might submit specific proposals to the General Assembly should not influence the United States to change its emphasis on the necessity of Security Council Action.

Mr. Dulles suggested that the United States revise its suggestion concerning voluntary absence from voting to include the point made by Mr. Parodi in the General Assembly that the Security Council permanent members be permitted to vote negatively on non-procedural matters without their negative votes being considered as an exercise of the veto. Others present at the meeting suggested that such a proposal would contravene Article 27 of the Charter.

VOTING IN SECURITY COUNCIL

Present:	Senator Connally	Mr. Wilcox
	Mr. Herschel Johnson	Mr. Sanders
	Mr. Fahy	Mr. Stokes
	Mr. Joseph Johnson	Mr. Bechhoefer
	Mr. Noyes

Mr. Joseph Johnson submitted to Senator Connally a revision (US/A/C.1/20, Rev. a), of the summary of the United States position on voting in the Security Council which was to be given to the heads of Assembly delegations of the other four permanent members of the Security Council. Mr. Johnson also submitted a revision (US/A/C.1/18, Rev. a) of the specific proposal for additional rules of procedure on this subject which would be made to the Security Council,³ and a draft memorandum on the proposed course of action to be followed by the United States.

The discussion in the meeting dealt chiefly with the first paper. Senator Connally commented with approval on the proposal for listing types of procedural decisions of the Security Council. He doubted, however, that after decisions were listed, the U.S.S.R. would be willing to accept the ruling of the chair that a particular decision was procedural without calling for a vote.

³ Revisions indicated in footnotes appended to documents US/A/C.1/20 and US/A/C.1/18, November 4, pp. 320 and 322, respectively.

Mr. Joseph Johnson explained at some length the necessity for a rule of procedure which will make certain that no state should be a judge in its own cause on decisions under Chapter VI of the Charter. Senator Connally indicated his approval of this proposal.

Senator Connally stated that the third proposal which would permit a permanent member of the Council to abstain from voting on a decision without having such abstention regarded as a negative vote was in his opinion contrary to the express terms of the Charter.

In defense of this proposal Mr. Stokes suggested that the term "concurring" vote be given a different meaning from the term "affirmative" vote:—in other words that a permanent member be permitted to concur in the decision of the other permanent members without casting an affirmative vote. Senator Connally did not believe that such construction of the Charter was possible.

Mr. Fahy suggested that the permanent members by agreement among themselves could waive their right of veto since the right was primarily for their benefit. Senator Connally stated that the Charter was not the property of the five permanent members but belonged to all the members and therefore that its provisions could not be waived by an agreement of five members.

Mr. Joseph Johnson stated that a rule to permit voluntary abstention from voting without such abstention being regarded as a negative vote was submitted informally last Spring to the representatives of the permanent members on the Committee of Experts but was never discussed in the Committee. All of the permanent members excepting the U.S.S.R. reacted favorably to such a rule but foresaw difficulties in interpreting the Charter to permit such a rule. The U.S.S.R. representative believed that abstentions by the permanent members were bound to take place, stating that "you can lead a horse to water but you can't make him drink," but was unwilling to accept a rule.

Senator Connally asked whether the proposed rule would be applicable to decisions under Chapter VII as well as under Chapter VI to which Mr. Joseph Johnson replied that abstention under the rule would be permitted on any non-procedural decisions. Mr. Herschel Johnson and Mr. Wilcox suggested that as a practical matter it might be desirable to limit the application of any such rule to decisions under Chapter VI. Mr. Noyes and Mr. Joseph Johnson felt that the principle was the same regardless of the decision, the latter holding that there was no danger in covering Chapter VII as well as VI in a rule for voluntary abstention. Mr. Fahy suggested that it might be appropriate to provide that the rule apply to all decisions excepting those under Chapter VII. Mr. Herschel Johnson suggested that voluntary abstention should not be permitted in connection with the election of a Secretary General. After some discussion, it was suggested by Mr. Wilcox and Mr. Fahy, that a redraft of the rule for voluntary abstention of permanent members might be preferred which should apply to all decisions excepting those under Chapter VII. Senator Connally agreed that as a practical matter it would be desirable to loosen up the procedures in the Security Council except on decisions under Chapter VII. Senator Connally inquired as to the possibility of securing agreement in the Security Council on the proposals. Mr. Joseph Johnson felt that it might not be too difficult to secure a list of procedural decisions which would include substantial number of those suggested in the proposed rule and that likewise it might be possible to secure agreement on a rule for voluntary abstention by permanent members. He felt that the most justifiable of all of the rules, that to insure the carrying out of the Charter provision for abstention by parties to a dispute, would have the hardest sledding with the U.S.S.R.

DEVELOPMENTS IN CONNECTION WITH UNITED STATES POSITION ON GENERAL ASSEMBLY AGENDA ITEMS DEALING WITH THE VETO

Mr. Johnson ⁴ stated that the United States position was still not definitely determined in connection with this subject. Two papers had been circulated; ⁵ one stating in summary the United States position (US/A/C.1/20 Rev.a) and the other listing proposals for additional rules of procedure (US/A/C.1/18 Rev.a).⁶ Mr. Johnson stated that that part of the position contained in points 1-5 (excluding the sub-paragraphs of 5) and 7 of the former paper ⁷ was firm. However, it was uncertain whether the three proposals for interpretation of Article 27 ⁸ would be submitted to the Assembly. It was also uncertain what disposition would be made of the texts of the three specific rules.⁹

⁴ Presumably Joseph E. Johnson.

⁵ That is, internally, within the United States Delegation.

⁷ The same as in the original paper, document US/A/C.1/20, November 4, p. 320.

⁸ See the sub-paragraphs of point 5, document US/A/C.1/20, November 4, p. 321.

⁹ That is, Rules "A", "B" and "C" of document US/A/C.1/18, November 4, p. 322.

Furthermore, as regards paragraph 6 of the first paper,¹⁰ the weight of sentiment in the delegation favored the view that the detailed discussion of voting in the Security Council should take place in the Council. This view was based first upon the necessity that the Security Council write its own rules of procedure; and secondly, upon the realization that very little would be gained through rushing into matters quickly. The United States tactics should be directed toward securing agreement leading to effective Security Council action. An Assembly resolution of such a character that the U.S.S.R. was forced to vote against it would scarcely be helpful in accomplishing this objective.

Whether the text of the specific rules would be given publicity even when they were submitted to the Security Council, has, Mr. Johnson stated, not yet been determined. If their submission was delayed until the matter was referred to the Committee of Experts it might be possible to keep the texts restricted.

Mr. Johnson stressed that the two papers referred to above represent the Department's position. The general issues involved in all the specific proposals have at one time or another been discussed in the Committee of Experts, and drafts containing the substance of rules B and C were handed to the representatives of the other permanent members on the Committee of Experts last summer but were not placed before the Committee.¹¹ Mr. Johnson stated that all the representatives of permanent members excepting the U.S.S.R. had been sympathetic with the objective of the second proposal and that all of the permanent members were sympathetic with the objective of the third excepting that the U.S.S.R. did not wish a rule. Mr. Johnson pointed out that in one of the decisions under the Spanish case which the U.S.S.R. claimed to be non-procedural, the U.S.S.R. itself had abstained from voting. Also in the Syria-Lebanon case, both the United Kingdom and France had abstained from voting.

Mr. Johnson reviewed Rule A briefly and indicated that a large part of that Rule might be non-controversial. This of course would not be the case with paragraph 12 which, however, was taken literally from paragraph 1 of Part I of the Four Power Statement. Mr. Johnson stated that one of the dangers in connection with Rule A which must be guarded against would be that the U.S.S.R. might, in connection with such a rule, attempt to write paragraph 2 of Part II of the Four Power Statement into the rules of procedure and thus in effect nullify for the future the provision that rules of procedure should be adopted by procedural vote.

Rule B, it was pointed out by Mr. Johnson, was the most important and vital United States proposal and likewise the one that would be most difficult to put across.

Veto Problem

Senator Connally said that the Secretary favored the delegation statement on the veto position.¹² He pointed out that the United States was opposed to undermining the Charter and favored unanimity in relation to Chapter VII, but advocated that the Security Council should consider formulating more rules and procedures. The procedural matter should be designated but there should not be a list because that would cause endless debate over every item. He thought that this position was about as far as the United States could go now. It should be recommended that the Security Council get to work on its rules of procedure to say which should be procedural matters, and to prevent the veto from applying to Chapter VI.

Mr. Dulles noted that Senator Austin had said that we would present a program on the veto at a proper time. Senator Austin agreed and said that there would be a concrete formula drawn before the next meeting of the Delegation.

In answer to Mr. Fahy's question, Senator Connally said that the Secretary thought that the question of whether an abstention was a veto should be left to the Security Council, otherwise there would be a great debate raised. The question had been examined but it was not proposed to put forward anything on this now.

United States Delegation Position Paper

CONFIDENTIAL

[NEW YORK,] November 12, 1946.

UNITED STATES POSITION ON VOTING IN THE SECURITY COUNCIL WITH SPECIAL REFERENCE TO THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY ITEMS ON THIS SUBJECT

The United States position may be summarized as follows :

(1) The United States regards the principle of unanimity as of the highest importance for the success of the United Nations and the reflection of this principle in the Yalta voting formula (Article 27 of the Charter) as valid.

(2) The United States considers that hasty amendment of constitutional documents on the basis of inadequate experience is unwise and may be harmful.

(3) Accordingly, the United States is neither proposing nor supporting an amendment to Article 27 of the Charter.

(4) Likewise the United States is opposed to the calling of a general conference to amend the Charter in respect to the so-called "veto".

(5) The United States hopes that the five permanent members may find it desirable at some time in the future in full agreement among themselves and with other members to support modification of the unanimity requirement in its application to matters arising under Chapter VI of the Charter relating to Peaceful Settlement of Disputes.

(6) The United States believes that the failure of the permanent members of the Security Council to agree upon important issues before the Council frustrates the carrying out of the principle of unanimity and leaves unsettled questions, the settlement of which is required in the interest of peace and security ; and that the responsibilities imposed upon the permanent members of the Security Council under the Charter require them to make every effort to reach agreement on substantive questions before the Security Council.

(7) The United States considers that the failure of the permanent members of the Security Council to agree upon any substantive question before the Council must not and cannot be construed to relieve any state, large or small, of its obligations under the Charter and under the law of nations.

(8) The United States believes that many of the difficulties encountered in the Security Council during the first year of its operations have been due to lack of certainty and differences of opinion regarding the practical application of the voting formula adopted at the San Francisco Conference. Consequently, the United States hopes that the voting formula may be clarified in the light of experience and practical need. In this connection the United States suggests that it would be helpful to implement Article 27 of the Charter and the Four-Power statement through the adoption by the Security Council of appropriate rules of procedure.

(9) Specifically the United States believes that the Security Council should give most careful attention to the development of practices and procedures that will carry out the assurances contained in the statement made by the Four Powers at San Francisco that under the Yalta formula decisions of the Security Council not involving the taking of "direct measures in connection with settlement of disputes, adjustment of situations likely to lead to disputes, determination of threats to peace, removal of threats to the peace and suppression of breaches of the peace," will be governed by a procedural vote under Article 27(2). This should make it easier for the Council to arrive at satisfactory decisions relating to the Peaceful Settlement of Disputes.

(10) The United States believes that the consideration in the General Assembly of the question of voting in the Security Council should be directed toward focusing the issue on the general objectives set forth above, and that the discussion of specific proposals for clarification of the procedures and practices of the Security Council should as far as possible be avoided. It may be that at a later stage of the Assembly debates the United States may wish to support a Resolution containing the substance of paragraphs (6) through (9).

(11) The United States position with respect to voting in the Security Council does not affect the position taken by the U.S. Representative on the Atomic Energy Commission on the problem of the application of the "veto" in the international control of atomic energy. The United States has already made clear that its proposals do not affect the general requirement for unanimity of the permanent members of the Security Council.

Voting in the Security Council

Senator Connally pointed out that the debate on the veto was going to start on the following day, and he asked the Delegation's opinion on whether the U.S. should state its position early in the debate or let the situation develop. Also he wanted guidance on what line should be taken. He said that the position paper US/A/C.1/43¹³ was on the whole satisfactory to him although there were some points that were not as clearly set forth as they might be.

Senator Austin said that he thought there was no confusion in the Delegation on its position. Senator Connally replied that he thought there was some confusion within the Delegation although he agreed with the position put forth in general. The thing which he did not agree with was the recommendation in paragraph 10 of the position paper that there should be a postponement in making known the U.S. position and he saw no reason for this delay and thought that a position could be taken now as well as later, especially since there was no violent change advocated.

Senator Connally continued that he would like to be able to say in his statement that the Four-Power statement at San Francisco was wrong when it stated that there must be a unanimous vote of the permanent Members to decide whether a question was substantive or procedural. He recalled that the statement had gone too far in order to get votes at that time and had been put forward at a moment of considerable pressure.

Mr. Dulles agreed that the Four-Power statement had been put forward very hastily at a time when the Delegation was engrossed in what it thought were larger problems. The theory put forward had been that of Mr. Pasvolsky and he thought that the Delegation had never given the matter much thought. Senator Connally reiterated that he thought the statement was wrong and that the Security Council should be asked to reconsider it. Mr. Dulles agreed that it was most important that the Four-Power statement should be corrected.

Senator Connally said that the Four-Power Statement made the veto apply to all questions. Anything could be vetoed when a substantive vote was applied to the decision as to whether or not a matter was procedural. Senator Austin commented that he thought if the matter were reconsidered that the Delegation should shoot high.

Mr. J. Johnson agreed. He pointed out that the Department's position was that no state should be a judge in its own case except in enforcement matters. He thought that the Charter should be consistent with the abstention clause in the Yalta formula regarding Chapter VI.

He pointed out that the Charter in Article 27 says "shall" but this nicety of phraseology had been completely ignored by the Soviets who claimed that they could decide whether a matter was procedural or substantive. This, he said, was an intolerable situation.

Mr. Johnson thought that it was essentially a tactical matter how to handle the Soviets. The question was whether we were more or less likely to obtain agreement on procedural matters than last Spring when the attempt was made or at the time of the Four-Power statement.

Mr. Dulles said that as he recalled the Four-Power Statement it was an attempt to express the then present situation and it was not regarded as a perpetual definition. He had criticized the statement in that respect. The attitude of the Delegation at that time was that there should be as much dilution of the veto as possible in practice. Certainly, the statement had not been looked upon as being immutable. The U.S. Delegation had been forced into making it by the practical situation at the time.

Senator Connally pointed out that the Four-Power Statement had never been agreed to by the whole organization and was not binding upon it.

Senator Austin said that he thought that the United States position as outlined in the position paper US/A/C.1/43 was a fine position up to recommendation 10 which stated:

"The United States believes that the consideration of the General Assembly of the question of voting in the Security Council should be directed toward focusing the issue on the general objectives set forth above, and the discussion of the specific proposals for clarification of the procedures and practices of the Security Council should as far as possible be avoided. It may be that at a later stage of the Assembly debates, the United States may wish to support a resolution containing the substance of paragraphs (6) through (9)."

Senator Austin thought that the last sentence of paragraph 10 took away all the strength of the position to that point and he thought that this sentence should be deleted. Senator Connally agreed that the sentence should be taken out. Senator Austin described the sentence as a break and a clog upon the U.S. position. Senator Connally added that we should not make statements for the future but state the present position and then move on.

Mr. J. Johnson pointed out that the position paper was meant for the Delegation's deliberations and referred to this session of the Assembly. He also was agreeable to striking out the sentence.

Senator Austin polled the Delegation and it was agreed that the second sentence of paragraph 10 should be stricken out of the paragraph.

Senator Connally said he thoroughly agreed with the action taken and with the position paper. He pointed out that he and Senator Vandenberg had to confer with Secretary Byrnes. Therefore he would like an expression of opinion from the Delegation whether the U.S. views on the veto should be expressed early in the debate or wait until the complainants had developed their positions. Senator Austin said he would like to see the position put forward early. Mr. Bloom remarked that it would be useful for educational purposes to put forward the position at an early date.

Mr. Wadsworth said that as a political officer he would like to support the statement of Senator Connally. All delegations were looking forward to hearing Senator Connally speak early in the debate and were looking to the United States to support a correction of the abuses of the veto. They were most anxious to know how the United States would approach the problem. He thought that the U.S. position should be made clear as early in the debate as possible.

Senator Connally thanked Mr. Wadsworth and, as he was leaving, he said that he would like to know who was giving out everything that transpired in the Delegation meeting. Mr. Bloom said that he would like to know too and it had to stop. Senator Connally observed that the release of the information was not helping the Delegation. Senator Connally and Senator Vandenberg then left.¹⁴

[Here follows discussion of other subjects.]

¹⁴ Consideration of the voting question by the First Committee began on November 14 and by November 18 resolutions or amendatory resolutions had been submitted by Argentina, Australia, Cuba, Peru, and the Philippines Republic; for the Committee's deliberations at this time, see United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, First Part, First Committee, pp. 84-126, and pp. 323-328 (annexes 7, 7a, 7b, 7c, 7d, and 7f); the First Committee record is cited hereafter as GA (I/2), First Committee.

Senator Connally led off the meeting on the second day (November 15) with a statement of the United States position which was based on the memorandum of November 12 (document US/A/C.1/43) as modified by the Delegation's discussion on November 13. Senator Connally stressed to the Committee that "The General Assembly could best contribute by focusing any recommendations on general objectives rather than assuming to dictate technical details, which were the province of the Council's own rules of procedure." In concluding, Senator Connally lent the support of the United States Delegation in principle to the Australian resolution (ibid., p. 323, annex 7), while disapproving of certain of its specifics (ibid., pp. 92-94).

MR. BEVIN said he had asked for this meeting because his Government considers that the Security Council as set up at the San Francisco Conference was the central organization of the United Nations and that it was a body that to fulfill its functions must command the greatest respect among the nations of the world and be the body to which they would turn for protection and security on the most important questions. It must be capable of preserving peace in a serious crisis. The British Government had never felt that it should be used as a substitute for direct negotiations between states but only when states could not settle their differences.

As to the question of the veto, he had been a member of the Cabinet when the voting formula had been adopted after much discussion and had been regarded as a protection which would only be used when the vital interests of the Big Five were affected and only as a last resort. He said he wished to state first of all that the British Government had no intention of suggesting or supporting any amendment to the Charter on this subject but it was anxious that the permanent members of the Council should give a lead to the Assembly on this question and announce a code of conduct concerning the use of the veto, which would clear up the confusion regarding the use of the veto which has existed among other nations and public opinion during the past months.

¹⁵ United States minutes drafted by Charles E. Bohlen, Special Assistant to the Secretary of State.

He said vital questions of disarmament and similar matters which are now being considered by the British Government would eventually go to the United Nations. His Government felt strongly that they could do nothing in these vital fields unless there was confidence and clarity concerning the manner in which the veto would be used. He said the British Government was considering formulation of basic policies and it was their desire to base these policies squarely on the United Nations, but before abandoning old methods of defense the British Government wished to be sure that the United Nations would be able to function as it had been expected at the time it was set up. It was for this purpose that he had circulated to the other permanent members of the Security Council a 7-point document which, as would be seen, was designed to clarify the problem of the use of the veto.

He said that he felt that much of the difficulty in this field had come from the lack of common agreement on the application of this principle. He said he must state that the confidence of his government in the United Nations after the experience of the past year was not so great as to permit it to go as far as it would like in basing its policies on the world organization. He said he thought that this was the most critical period since the end of the war, since everyone had recognized for the 15 or 16 months after the end of hostilities there would be great difficulties growing directly out of the war. Now future policies of long duration would be decided.

He repeated that Great Britain wished to base its policy on the United Nations but wished to be sure that the Organization would operate as intended. He said that the veto power made the preservation of peace in the first instance dependent on the five countries represented here and that if they could give the proper lead then in the next 15 or 20 years there was hope that a rule of law, as against a rule of war, would develop in the world.

He then said he would like to hear the views of his colleagues and called on Mr. Molotov.

(Copy of Bevin's proposal attached. See Annex 1.)

MR. MOLOTOV replied that he had not asked for the floor but he was ready to state his views. He said they had studied Mr. Bevin's document and they fully shared his desire to strengthen the authority of the Security Council and the United Nations organization. This had always been the view of the Soviet Delegation. The Soviet Government felt that recent efforts to popularize the discussion of the veto or its use was somewhat artificial. In so far as the Soviet Government was concerned it had only used the veto in essential cases and could not agree that anyone had abused the veto. Talk of abuse of the veto was a wrong method of work and participation in the activities of the United Nations, which could only harm it. The purpose should be not to weaken the foundations of the United Nations but to strengthen them.

In regard to the veto, certain members of UN bear the responsibility for the adoption of an attitude contrary to what was correct. He said he did not believe that Australia and Cuba would have unleashed this campaign against the veto and its use without having been encouraged by certain other delegations. Account must be taken of the results of this campaign, which had been conducive to a bad atmosphere in the Security Council on the question of the veto. The proper course was to give a rebuff to those delegations who for some reason or other do not value the foundation of the Charter adopted by 51 nations over a year ago.

The Soviet Delegation does not understand such a course of action whereby simply because some members of the United Nations failed to conduct themselves properly others should follow their example. He said that the disposition to have no confidence in the Security Council was in the opinion of the Soviet Delegation a one-sided attitude and an unconvincing one. As to the Security Council, he said that its work depended not on others but in the first instance upon ourselves, and that it would be better not to base our attitude on the incorrect attitude of others but to show confidence and support to the Security Council and along with others to try to increase mutual collaboration and the settlement of questions that not only affect the members of the Security Council but all members of the organization. The best answer, therefore, to the question he felt was to agree to cooperate more fully and he felt that this duty applied more directly to the permanent members of the Security Council.

There had been various proposals for special agreements or new regulations concerning the use of the veto in the Security Council. The aim of these proposals was to create stricter rules, which he felt were calculated to have an adverse effect on the work of the Security Council and unnecessarily restrict its activities under formalities and rules. This course, he said, instead of doing good would do harm. He added that the Soviet Delegation was not against Mr. Bevin's proposal that the five permanent members should consult whenever possible. He felt that on certain questions it would be desirable to have a preliminary understanding if such understanding would facilitate the technical work of the Security Council and help the members to reach understanding and to further cooperation between permanent and non-permanent members. He said he felt everyone wished to act along lines which would be in harmony with the principles of the United Nations and consequently in the interests of the countries there represented.

THE SECRETARY stated that the United States had made its position clear at the General Assembly and in the Commission [Committee?] through the statements of Senator Connally. We consider hasty amendments based on inadequate experience to be unnecessary and harmful. That is not our conception of constitutional growth. For example, in a hundred years there had only been five amendments adopted to [after?] the U.S. Bill of Rights, which was an example of the slow development of a fundamental charter. Prior to the San Francisco Conference there had been a great deal of discussion concerning the wisdom of the veto. We recognized the necessity of this power but we had envisaged that it would be used primarily in cases involving enforcement of action and only in matters of the greatest importance. We recognized, for example, that if the United States were called upon to supply armed forces over its adverse vote, there would be great difficulties in putting any such course into effect because of the opposition from the United States Congress. Therefore, the United States had sympathized with those nations urging the inclusion of the veto in the Charter and had supported its inclusion.

On the other hand, we had always recognized the feelings of the smaller nations and their fear that the veto might be exercised in secondary questions. For this reason, they had joined in the San Francisco Declaration, which was in effect a pledge that the veto would not be abused.

The United States, he continued, is satisfied that many of the difficulties on this point had arisen from the practical application of the voting formula. He would not be frank if he did not say that the United States was disappointed at the too frequent use of the veto power. He said he had not been associated closely with the work of the General Assembly but from all his information the majority of small nations have serious objections against the use of the veto. He thought that they should devise some plan in order to reassure the small nations on this point. He said since we apparently had a common desire to avoid any question of amendment of the Charter at this time it would be well to find a solution which would prevent the question of amendment arising. He had therefore prepared in writing some suggestions to that end which he would now distribute.

DR. KOO said that the Chinese Delegation had little to add to the statements already made. He would not take the time of the Committee to elaborate further the attitude of the Chinese Government which was sufficiently well known.

They had always attached great importance to the question of veto in the United Nations and had accepted the Yalta formula with certain diffidence because they had recognized the need of unanimity among the great powers in order to promote success of the organization. Having subscribed to the Charter, including Article 27, the Chinese Delegation wished to show its respect for the Charter in every way and feel that it should be given a test for several years before any consideration of an amendment. Therefore, the Chinese Delegation tried to make it clear, both in General Assembly and in Commission I that they did not wish any change in the Charter at this time.

This does not mean that the Chinese are not aware of or indifferent to the volume of criticisms, both in the General Assembly and outside, concerning the use of the veto. The Chinese Delegation has been deeply influenced by this criticism of the veto power and they are anxious to work out by agreement with the other permanent members some improvement on the use of the veto without commenting in any way on the manner in which any representative has used the veto. In this opinion, there has been too much discussion on procedure and too many votes on procedure.

The Chinese Delegate feels that in the light of the experience of the past year it should now be possible to agree on improvements in the work of the Security Council, which would in large measure meet the existing criticism without in any way revising the Charter. He pointed out that at San Francisco the four sponsoring powers and France had issued a Declaration concerning the use of the veto. Paragraphs 2 and 3 of this Declaration gave an example of questions which would be regarded as procedural. If at that time, without any experience in practice, it had been possible to give a list of such questions, now after ten months of existence it should be possible to extend that list.

In actual fact, the Security Council had already dealt with a number of procedural questions and had adopted some new rules. It would be wise to explore what further questions could be by mutual agreement regarded as procedural, thus in effect amplifying the San Francisco Declaration. The five permanent members might help the Security Council to amplify its rules of procedure. For example, at present there were 60 rules, but only one on voting, which merely said that voting in the Security Council would be in conformity with the Charter and Statute of the International Court. He felt that if they could clarify and elaborate the practical application of the voting formula it would not only meet criticism but would also fulfill the promise contained in the San Francisco Declaration that the permanent members would not use the veto in any way to obstruct or block the work of the Security Council. He said the Chinese Delegation welcomed Mr. Bevin's initiative and in this spirit had some suggestions of their own to make.

(He circulated document containing these suggestions. See Annex 3.)^{15a}

In explanation he said that many of these suggestions were along the lines of Mr. Bevin's paper, but perhaps more concrete. He thought that if they could reach an agreement along these general lines it could either be embodied in a Declaration of the Five Powers or an addition to the San Francisco Declaration.

M. PARODI said he was the last to speak and would be brief. The French views on this subject were well known. They considered it would be neither wise, justifiable nor right to attempt to amend the Charter at the present time but they felt that certain improvements could be made in the function of the Security Council without touching the Charter. The French Delegation was in general agreement with the three texts which had been circulated. He would like to make a few observations.

He pointed out that points 3 and 4 of the Chinese draft were already in effect in the Security Council. As to Mr. Bevin's suggestion, the French Delegation were in favor of the idea of consultation but he felt that to make that consultation effective there would have to be some agreement along the lines of points 4 and 5 of Mr. Bevin's paper. As to the other points, he said he attached the greatest importance to point 7 and he had already made the views of the French Government known on this question of abstention. He recognized that there were legal difficulties and also that the adoption of this view on abstention would not be a final solution but would indicate a way to solution.

THE SECRETARY then suggested that they should adjourn in order to study the documents which had been circulated. He said he thought every effort should be made to reach an agreement because once the question had been raised before the permanent members, failure to agree would have a bad effect on the General Assembly and those who opposed the veto would take it as an indication that the permanent members had no intention of changing their views.

MR. MOLOTOV said the Soviet Delegation had already expressed its views on the general question. He would like to add a few words with reference to what had been said here.

He knew that there have been many critical observations concerning the work of the Security Council and the use of the veto. He wished, however, to say that the Soviet Delegation did not regard criticism of the Security Council or of any organ of the United Nations as anything to be afraid of. Criticism is necessary. Different views were held and if they were not stated there was no method of reaching agreed decisions. However, it is essential that criticism should be based only on the desire to strengthen the foundations of the United Nations and not to break them. If they could take that as a starting point and follow this aim, the criticism would be useful and even welcome. He said we should not fear criticism but he felt if they should proceed in their discussion to increase the regulation of the work of the Security Council they would be taking the wrong path and would create difficulties for the Security Council and the United Nations by heaping up formalities. There are enough rules already. In fact, no one here could even remember all existing rules. He said they should draw the necessary conclusions from the situation in order to help the practical work of the Security Council. To increase the regulations would bring about the opposite result.

^{15a} Not printed. The views set forth in the document are incorporated substantially in a draft resolution dated October 10, 1947 which was submitted to the First Committee of the General Assembly by the Chinese delegate in the committee and printed in United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, Second Session, First Committee, pp. 621 and 622.

The Soviet Delegation therefore takes as its aim, based on these considerations, the improvement of the work of the Security Council and not to add to its difficulties by more formalities and regulations.

He concluded that since he had no translation of the American or Chinese papers he would have no concrete observations to make on those. He said in general his attitude towards these suggestions would be as he had outlined here.

M. PARODI said that Committee I was meeting this afternoon in order to consider a resolution to suspend discussion on this question until the Secretary General has drawn up a list of the various proposals which have been submitted, and that this would require several days.

MR. BEVIN said that they should not interfere with the work of the political committee or vice-versa. He did not wish in any way that this meeting of the five permanent members would be regarded as a substitute for anything in the United Nations. He said the difficulty as far as Great Britain was concerned was that the criticism had not been confined to the General Assembly but had in England unquestionably influenced the feeling of confidence in the Security Council. Some declaration as to the future work of the Security Council would be of great importance. It was not a question of regulation but of intent. He said everyone in England—the Government and the people—wished to build on the United Nations, but they could not ride two horses, and before shifting from one to the other they wished to make sure that the UN horse would run.

He repeated that the British Government wished to base its policy with [without?] qualification or reservation on the United Nations, but that any uncertainty as to its future functioning must be removed.

It was agreed that they would meet again tomorrow, November 19.

at eleven o'clock, if such a meeting did not conflict with the meeting of the Political Committee which Mr. Molotov wished to attend.¹⁶

(British Paper)

NOTE

It must be recognised that the use of the "Veto" in the Security Council in recent months has called forth almost universal criticism from Members of the United Nations.

His Majesty's Government themselves are amongst the first to admit the necessity for the maintenance of unanimity amongst the Great Powers. But the manner in which the "Veto" has often been used takes no account of unanimity, and its constant use in this way makes achievement of unanimity all the more difficult.

There can probably be no question of amending the Charter at this stage, but are there not some things that could be done to avoid in practice the situations that have given rise to so much criticism?

For instance,

(1) The Powers possessing the right of "Veto" might agree amongst themselves to consult each other, where possible, before a vote is taken, if their unanimity is required to enable the Council to function effectively.

(2) If there is not unanimity, it might be agreed that the minority of the permanent members, mindful of the fact that they are acting on behalf of all the United Nations, would only exercise the "Veto" where they consider the question of vital importance to the United Nations as a whole, and they would explain on what grounds they consider this condition to be present.

(3) The permanent members might agree that they will not exercise their "Veto" against a proposal simply because it does not go far enough to satisfy them.

(4) The permanent members might agree to advocate rules of conduct for the Security Council providing that questions are only brought before the Security Council after other means of settlement have been tried and must then be presented in proper form to the Council.

¹⁶ Although there was no meeting of the First Committee at that time the Five Ministers do not seem to have met again on this problem until November 23.

(5) The permanent members might agree to support the establishment of further rules of procedure for the conduct of the Security Council's business, e.g., for the consideration of any question, the Council should appoint a rapporteur, or a Committee of some of its members, to make a further attempt at conciliation before resorting to the final discussion and voting.

(6) It might facilitate the work of the Security Council, and ensure that the Charter is properly applied, if a formula could be devised on which all could agree, for the definition of a "dispute".

(7) It would be of great advantage if it were possible to provide, by some means, that a Permanent Member could abstain from voting without automatically vetoing the proposal. Similarly, that mere absence of a Permanent Member should not have the effect of a veto.

PROPOSED STATEMENT TO BE MADE BY THE PERMANENT MEMBERS OF THE SECURITY COUNCIL ¹⁷

1. The permanent members of the Security Council recognize that the responsibilities imposed upon the permanent members of the Security Council under the Charter require them to make every effort to reach agreement on substantive questions before the Security Council.

2. The permanent members of the Security Council recognize that many of the difficulties encountered in the Security Council during the first year of its operation have been due to lack of certainty and differences of opinion regarding the practical application of the voting formula. They believe that these difficulties can in the main be worked out by the Security Council in the light of experience and practical need.

3. Specifically, that the permanent members of the Security Council undertake, with a view to removing or reducing these difficulties, to have the Security Council give attention to the development of practices which will ensure so far as is consistent with the Charter

a. that matters which are truly procedural and matters which are truly non-procedural will be determined in advance of controversy by agreed rules of procedure;

b. that no state shall act as judge in its own cause;

c. that a permanent member shall be enabled to abstain from voting without exercising its veto power.

MR. BEVIN: Will you take the chair, Mr. Molotov.

M. MOLOTOV: Thank you. Are there any remarks on the procedure for the meeting?

MR. BEVIN: I wonder if there are any other views to be expressed since the papers have been circulated and if there is any possibility for agreement? There were the proposals of the United States, China, and the United Kingdom and the different questions evolved at Committee No. 1 at the Assembly. It seemed to me that the papers and the questions gave so much light that we might clear up the matter.

M. MOLOTOV: I gave the general view of the Soviet Union the other day. Since reading the papers I should like to make additional remarks to clarify our view. The Soviet Delegation will submit certain proposals being typed now, and I will explain them. We hold that in the general discussion and in the proposals submitted to the General Assembly and to the Big Five that there were two outstanding questions: 1) revision of the Charter, 2) method of applying the procedure. As to a revision of the Charter, as far as I can judge from recent proposals submitted to the Five, no one insists on making such changes. It appears from these proposals that no one here thinks it would be timely or wise. There is no way we can avoid this matter as the question of revision of the Charter was raised in the Assembly, and as we think it should react in some manner. We think the Assembly should reject the proposal to revise the Charter as not timely.

¹⁸ United States minutes; no drafting information on document but probably drafted by Mr. Bohlen.

As to the second question, application of the Charter and the procedure agreed to by the Assembly, it is evident from reading the proposals of France, the United Kingdom, and China that the question centered around that. The Soviet Delegation believes that we should agree in regard to question two not to take the road of new agreements between ourselves intended to regulate our decisions. The matter has been the subject of many proposals which will not be helpful but harmful to the United Nations and the Security Council. We think that the relations between the United Nations and individual countries, particularly the Great Powers, should not be based upon technicalities and regulations. This is a serious question. As to the substance of the question, we can't agree that anyone applied the veto wrongly in the Security Council and think it undesirable to foment passion around this question. It would hurt not only the Soviet Union but all of us. This attitude is not calculated to induce us to seek agreement; therefore, it is essential that we adopt a decision saying that it is not correct to make more rigorous rules for the Security Council or the United Nations. We should make clear that any attempts to stiffen the rules are calculated to do harm and will not be useful. I can now read the draft proposals prepared by the Soviet Delegation:

"1. Bearing in mind that the Organization of the United Nations is still in the first period of its activity, the General Assembly considers it important that all States of the United Nations strive for the further strengthening of the Organization of the United Nations and the improvement in every respect of the work of its organizations in conformity with the lofty principles and aims of the Charter which has received commendation from all peace-loving peoples. The General Assembly considers incorrect attempts to revise the Charter in view of the short period which has elapsed since its unanimous adoption by the United Nations.

"2. Attaching special importance to the unification of the efforts of nations both large and small in the development of firm relations between them and in the establishment of durable peace and security, the General Assembly calls on the United Nations for the broadening of international cooperation on the above-mentioned basis, avoiding superfluous regimentation and formality in the work of its organizations and furthering the development of practical achievements in political, economic, and cultural cooperation between nations. In accordance therewith, the General Assembly rejects the proposals aimed at the regimentation of the application of the rule of unanimity set forth in Article 27 of the Charter."

MR. BEVIN: It seems to me that the text you read, Mr. Chairman, applies rather to the General Assembly. But it seems to us that this is a matter for each Delegation. We said that we had no desire to change the Charter. All we tried to get is a code of conduct between ourselves to see if we can avoid these difficulties. We have no desire to have a lot of rules and regulations, but we want to establish more confidence in the United Nations, as, quite frankly, we haven't much confidence now. We couldn't do anything like making a general resolution such as you have read. That is a matter for the General Assembly to express its views upon. It is a general matter. As for the British Government, we are working out our policy now, and we hoped that we could agree amongst ourselves so that I could say to the British people whether we could build security on the Security Council. After this first year that seems very doubtful. I thought we could settle it here as there are only five powers here who can use the veto. A general statement of the character of the one you read does not help understanding amongst the Big Five. We have tried, and we can't do more than explain our position as to what we have been doing.

M. MOLOROV: I would like to make plain that if the draft I just gave is unacceptable on the ground that it is drawn up in the form of a decision of the General Assembly, that this can be put right. We can regard the draft not as a decision of the General Assembly but as a draft that will enable us to reach agreement on the questions being discussed now. The form is secondary; the substance is what matters. If Mr. Bevin says that his Government is engaged in drawing up its long-term policy, we are prepared to discuss this in businesslike language.

MR. BEVIN: It was not so much the form as the substance which does not deal with what my Government has felt to be the points at difference in the operation of the Security Council. It desires to know if the operations can be on a more understanding basis than in the past year.

MR. BYRNES: I made at our last meeting a statement with regard to the position of the United States. The United States has announced that it does not approve efforts to amend the Charter but sympathizes with the point of view of small states that the Great Powers have exercised the veto in a manner never envisaged at San Francisco. It is evident that there was a serious misunderstanding among the Permanent Members. The United States believes that the veto should be sparingly exercised and only on the most important matters. The United States will join in a statement that the veto will be exercised only in times of great emergency to create assurance. This might lead to the cessation of attempts to amend the Charter. It would be a mistake to make a statement of the kind proposed which suggests that the General Assembly is trying to regiment the Permanent Members. It will be better to say nothing at all if we can't make a better statement.

M. PARODI: The resolution which has been submitted would be important for the collaboration of the nations belonging to the United Nations. I think it is somewhat general and vague in tone. We have made numerous efforts to achieve collaboration in the Security Council. I think also that a great atmosphere of unquietness has characterized the discussions in the General Assembly. We must do everything to quiet this spirit in the Assembly. If the Permanent Members of the Security Council submit such a statement as you propose, it would poison the spirit in the Assembly. The very important questions the Assembly has to decide would not be helped by such a resolution. It would be better to submit nothing than to say that. I understand the desire not to augment the rules, but the proposals presented to the Assembly are aimed not at augmenting the rules, not at making the procedures more rigid, but at making them more supple.

M. Koo: At the last meeting I gave the views of my Government on the veto. I won't repeat them today since we have also presented some concrete suggestions, but I would like to say a word or two on the Molotov statement and also the words of explanation he has given. None of us desires to revise the Charter. As to that part of the statement, it is in accord with the views of the Chinese Delegation. The problem has two aspects. I believe those two will have to be met. a) The effective working of the Security Council has been commented on in the General Assembly. The general view, which we share, is that the past workings of the Security Council have not been as effective or as smooth as we might have hoped. The Security Council should see itself how it can improve. Since the question was raised in the General Assembly, we should meet that criticism as far as we can. I agree with Mr. Molotov that we should not add to the rules in the Security Council. We have sixty articles already. Whereas the past has produced agreed procedures, I think they might be put in writing. If the procedures were enlarged, the criticism of the General Assembly might be met. What I have in mind is matters such as the inclusion of an item on the agenda, or the removing of an item from the agenda. If I am correct, that could be included in the list of procedures established by the Permanent Members at San Francisco. We should make use of our past experience to improve the workings of the Security Council for the future.

The second question is a situation in the General Assembly which we must meet in some way. This is really a matter between the five Permanent Members and the five members coming from the Assembly. So far as the emphasis in the Soviet proposal is on strengthening the United Nations and improving relations between great and small nations we all agree, but we wish the conclusion at the end were more concrete. I mean some definite procedures which we in the Security Council have reached in the past, or here. Only by this step can we meet the criticism from the General Assembly. If only a negative statement is made, we will only get a long debate, and I can't see what the outcome would be. Only if we make concrete suggestions, can we dispel the criticism, and we would thus contribute to the collaboration Mr. Molotov urges.

M. MOLOTOV: Various remarks have been made with regard to our draft resolution, and, owing to the fact that differences of opinion came to light, the opinion was expressed that we could dispense with the statement. The Soviet Union thinks that some statement is necessary. It is desirable that certain conclusions be placed for our work in the future. It would be a good thing if after our discussion of the veto, the Charter, and other things, we could arrive at a unanimous opinion, at least on the part we can express an opinion on now. It can be stated that the Five think revision of the Charter untimely, as it has been in force only one year. To revise it now would be to discredit the work of the United Nations last year. I wonder if we can't make a resolution saying that we deem it essential to maintain the prestige of the Charter agreed to by all peace-loving nations. It was said that our draft contained certain negative elements, and that such a resolution was undesirable. Although we are the authors, we won't insist upon it. Let us modify it, or eliminate the negative elements but find a solution which will strengthen the Charter and establish more harmonious work in the Security Council and in the United Nations as a whole. When the reference was made to the Security Council in the initial period, the approach was one-sided. The Soviet Union cannot ignore the discussion of the Iranian question in the Security Council. The method used was not conducive to harmonious work. It is easy to say that this or that government has no confidence in the Security Council, but we must remember that confidence in the Security Council depends upon each of us, and we should all try for harmonious work and not be one-sided or use the Security Council against one of the members. Take the question of the veto. It wasn't raised today, but discussion of this took a one-sided trend, and the atmosphere around it was one-sided, too. The impression was created in the outside world that certain of us are encouraging this view. In the long run the work of the Security Council depends not upon new decisions but upon each of us trying to improve the work. The method of majorization has acted several times to the disfavor of the minority, to the disfavor of the opinion of delegations which did not have a majority on any of the questions under discussion. I think the method of majorization in the Security Council and other conferences will not be useful. It would be better to establish business-like relations and understanding to allow us to improve the work. Upon each of us five much depends. We should say there was room for improvement in this respect. There is no need for new formal decisions upon the regimentation of the work, but we should secure the character of the work so as not to injure any one of the partners, but so that the interests of the minority are taken into account as well. The statement under discussion will be good if it contributes to the improvement of the work.

MR. BYRNES: At the last meeting proposals were presented by the United Kingdom, China, and the United States, and France expressed approval in principle of the three resolutions. The Soviet Delegation was unable to agree and added its own resolution. The United States cannot agree with the Soviet resolution. One hour and forty-five minutes have gone by, and, as the matter must be settled elsewhere,¹⁹ I suggest we adjourn for fifteen minutes and then go on with consideration of the treaties.²⁰ I would add that we will all have the opportunity to express our views in Committee No. 1. It is useless to go on here.

MR. BEVIN: I agree. We must reserve our position for the Assembly, and state our case there. There is nothing positive we can put forward elsewhere than in Committee No. 1. Certainly my Government understood the use of the veto was to be quite different after San Francisco. I hoped we could have agreed. If we had, I should have been very happy. If we can't—

M. MOLOTOV: Any objections?

M. KOO: I want to ask Mr. Molotov if he said he could not accept the other papers. I understood that his observations were of a general character.

M. MOLOTOV: I take it we have been engaged today in the examination of these drafts as well as of our own.

MR. BEVIN: We are as well divided as the Security Council.

M. MOLOTOV: We will adjourn until 6:00 p. m.

Editorial Note

Discussion of the voting question was resumed by the First Committee on December 1 at which time it was decided to appoint a subcommittee to reconcile the several resolutions which had been offered (the Soviet Union submitted one at this meeting, making a total of six). The Sub-Committee, composed of representatives of the delegations of Argentina, Australia, China, the Soviet Union, the United ¹⁹ That is, in the General Assembly.

Kingdom, the United States, and Venezuela, in an unsuccessful attempt to reach a consensus extending through five meetings, finally on December 6 drafted a report to the Plenary Committee which recommended that the Committee vote on the resolutions of Cuba, Peru, Australia (the second of two revisions), the Soviet Union, and China (the latter submitting a resolution to the Sub-Committee on December 6). For the deliberations of the First Committee on December 1, see GA (I/2), First Committee, pages 210 ff.; the Soviet and Chinese resolutions are found ibid., pages 328 and 330, annexes 7*g* and 7*i*, respectively; the two Australian revisions are found ibid., pages 327 and 331, annexes 7*e* and 7*j* (the text finally voted on by the First Committee was that found in annex 7*j*); see ibid., pages 329 and 330, annex 7*h* for the text of the Sub-Committee's report.

In the final phase of the First Committee's consideration of this issue, on December 8, the Committee, grappling with a tangled parliamentary situation, finally approved the second Australian revised text, while rejecting its second paragraph which was implicitly condemnatory of the past performance of the Security Council; the Australian Delegation had signified its willingness that the voting on the proposed resolution should be on a paragraph-by-paragraph basis. For the December 8 proceedings of the First Committee see ibid., pages 284 ff.

At both meetings of the Plenary Committee, on December 1 and December 8, the United States Representative on the First Committee, Senator Connally, declared that the United States Delegation supported the resolution offered by Australia except for the second paragraph "which appeared to imply a condemnation of past events and reflect on members of the Security Council. . . . His delegation believed the Council's difficulties were the growing pains of a new organization for which no one should be blamed" (ibid., pages 218 and 219; quotation from December 8 statement).

The report of the First Committee to the General Assembly on this matter is found in GA (I/2), Plenary, pages 1538 ff., annex 7*l*. General Assembly debate of the report during two meetings on December 13 is found ibid., pages 1231 ff. For Senator Austin's statement to the General Assembly in support of the First Committee's recommended draft resolution, see ibid., pages 1244 ff. The draft resolution was adopted by the General Assembly without change and as Resolution 40 (I) read:

"The General Assembly
Mindful of the Purposes and Principles of the United Nations, and having taken notice of the divergencies which have arisen in regard to the application and interpretation of Article 27 of the Charter:
Earnestly requests the permanent members of the Security Council to make every effort, in consultation with one another and with fellow members of the Security Council, to ensure that the use of the special voting privilege of its permanent members does not impede the Security Council in reaching decisions promptly;

Recommends to the Security Council the early adoption of practices and procedures, consistent with the Charter, to assist in reducing the difficulties in the application of Article 27 and to ensure the prompt and effective exercise by the Security Council of its functions; and

Further recommends that, in developing such practices and procedures, the Security Council take into consideration the views expressed by Members of the United Nations during the second part of the first session of the General Assembly.²¹

[WASHINGTON, December 1945.]

12. NEW MEMBERS²²

THE PROBLEM

The main practical question relative to the admission of new members concerns the time at which we shall support membership applications from States which in our opinion are peace-loving, and are able and willing to carry out the obligations of the United Nations Charter.²³ Enemy and ex-enemy States are not now concerned, since final treaties of peace have not yet been concluded with them. Obviously, the United States welcomes the full collaboration of all qualified States in the United Nations Organization as soon as the working schedule of the Organization permits this to be arranged.

²¹ Short title for the Reference and Documents Section of the Bureau of International Organization Affairs, Department of State.

²³ For the United Nations Charter, signed at San Francisco, June 26, 1945, see Department of State Treaty Series No. 993, 59 Stat. (pt. 2) 1031.

For practical reasons, however, the United States has taken the general attitude that the admission of new members should be postponed until after the Assembly session devoted to the task of organization.²⁴ The problem is whether this attitude should be relaxed so as to permit us to support the applications of any States and, if so, of which States.

PROPOSED U.S. POSITION

We should maintain our position that the consideration of applications for membership should be deferred until after the first part of the first session of the Assembly. Completion of this primary task in the January meeting would leave the way open for consideration, during the second part of the session or the first meeting thereafter, of applications forwarded by the Security Council with its recommendation.

DISCUSSION

The paramount factor in the decision—over and above any considerations pertaining to the admission of any particular State—is believed to be the estimated effect which consideration of membership questions at the January meetings would have upon the Assembly's ability to complete the structure of the United Nations during those meetings. It is not unlikely that consideration, during the first part of the first session, of an application of a single State might unavoidably raise complex questions concerning possible applications of other States as well. To deal with these involved matters might take up much time which is urgently needed for completion of the essential mission of this part of the session: to establish the Organization on a working basis. A still more serious danger is that the deliberations and decisions of the Assembly on the essential structure of the Organization might be affected or determined by political maneuvering on membership questions. When the establishment of the United Nations Organization is complete, we should, so far as possible, give separate consideration to the application of each State, entirely on its own merits. Care must be taken to avoid a log-rolling process which might make difficult the rejection of applications of, for example, entities which lacked the qualities of statehood necessary to effective membership in the Organization.

A few foreign Governments have approached United States representatives with questions concerning the proper procedure and time for making application, or intimating an interest in membership. In

September 1945 the Government of Iceland informed the American Minister of its desire to be admitted to the UNO at the earliest possible date, and requested that this be brought to the attention of the Secretary of State in case such questions should be discussed at the forthcoming London conference of foreign ministers.²⁵ In reply it was stated that while Iceland could count on our whole-hearted support for membership at the earliest possible moment, only the Council and Assembly could handle admissions and that a communication to the Secretary-General, when he was appointed, might elicit information as to the correct procedure for making application.

The Swedish Government has shown a very active desire for early admission to membership. It has been informed that, while consideration of applications would probably be deferred, for practical reasons, until the second part of the present session, the United States was most desirous of seeing Sweden become a member of the Organization at the first appropriate date and that it would support Sweden's application as soon as applications were in order.

Various reports indicate a definite, though still undeclared, interest in membership on the part of Portugal. A suggestion from Lisbon to the effect that Members of the League of Nations—referring to Portugal, Sweden and Switzerland—might be admitted as a group, was not favored by the Department of State and it was said that in any case new members could not be admitted until the second part of the present session, or later. The Brazilian Government has already indicated to the United States its support for Portugal's application.

Our position with reference to the question under discussion has thus been consistently developed both in the Preparatory Commission²⁶ and in our diplomatic relations with individual States, and at present at least, no difficulty in maintaining it is anticipated.

of the General Assembly requesting Albanian admission to UNO membership. This telegram was recently transmitted by the Yugoslav delegation to Mr. Jebb.²⁷ It was agreed at the Security Council meeting Friday²⁸ that the question of whether the Albanian application should be placed on the agenda would be discussed at the next meeting of the Security Council on January 28. As the British through Gore-Booth²⁹ have approached us not only on the question of the Albanian application but on the matter of admission of new members generally, we should appreciate receiving from the Department any advice that it may have.

“Message from the President of the People’s Republic of Albania to the President and Vice-Presidents of the General Assembly.

The following is the text of the telegram from Colonel General Enver Hoxa, President of the People’s Republic of Albania, to the President and Vice-Presidents of the General Assembly.

To His Excellency the President and to the Vice Presidents of the General Assembly of the United Nations, London.

On the occasion of the opening of the first session of the General Assembly of the United Nations which marks an important stage in the history of mankind, I should like to inform Your Excellency that the Government of the People’s Republic of Albania, being desirous of giving positive evidence of the importance they attach to the organisation for peace and cooperation among nations and of the joining the other democratic countries in the working out of the noble purposes and the exalted principles which constitute the bases of the organisation, had the honour to address a request to the President of the Preparatory Commission on the 20th December 1945 asking him to undertake the necessary steps with a view to the admission of Albania into the organisation of the United Nations in accordance with the provisions of the Charter and on the basis of the contribution of her people to the common cause of the United Nations. In renewing their application the Government of the People’s Republic of Albania are convinced that the General Assembly, appreciating at their true value the immense sacrifices made by the Albanian people during the long and arduous struggle against the Axis Powers, will accede to their request. At the same time, I wish to declare on behalf of the Government of the People's Republic of Albania that our country is prepared to assume all the obligations arising from the Charter of the United Nations.

²⁸ At this meeting on January 25 when the Albanian application first came to the notice of the Security Council Mr. Stettinius made a brief statement which in effect set the direction of United States policy on this issue for the remainder of the London meetings: “May I suggest that we deal with the question of new membership as a whole later on, at one meeting rather than piecemeal? I am sure there are a number of delegations which have statements to make relative to new membership, and I think it would be much better to deal with the subject in toto” (United Nations, Official Records of the Security Council, First Year, First Series, p. 21; hereafter cited as SC, 1st yr., 1st series).

I avail myself of this opportunity to express to Your Excellency, in the name of the Albanian people, the name of the People's Republic of Albania and my own, the warmest and most sincere good wishes that the work of the new organisation may be crowned with full success in achieving a more prosperous future for mankind.

It assumes that position taken by the U.S. Delegation at Security Council meeting of January 28 with regard to the Albanian application for membership was in line with this general policy but if there were specific factors relating to the Albanian request or if there are other developments relating to admission of new members to UNO, we should appreciate fuller information than given in Delun 171.³⁰

³⁰ Telegram 1061, January 29, from London. This was a daily summary telegram of the events of that date and read in pertinent part: "At Security Council meeting today first question raised was whether Albanian request for membership should be on agenda. U.S. motion that it should not be included being lost 4 to 4, with three abstentions and Chairman not voting. Extended discussion ensued as a result of which it was agreed without objection to including this item on agenda, on clear understanding that, as emphasized by Chair, decision as to when to consider Albanian request should be taken when item is reached on agenda." (501.BB/1-2946) The record of this meeting is found in SC, 1st yr., 1st series, pp. 24 ff. In his statement on the motion for adjournment Mr. Stettinius said: "You will recall that I referred briefly to this question the last time we met. In view of the position taken by the Executive Committee [of the Preparatory Commission], and also by the Preparatory Commission, that new applications for membership would not be acted upon at the first part of the General Assembly session, I feel it would be best not to include this item at this session of the Council. The admission of new Members is a serious and important matter, requiring the most careful consideration of the Members of the United Nations. In the circumstances, it is apparent that the only reasonable and fair method of giving proper and adequate consideration to applications for new membership would be to defer all applications until some time prior to the next meeting of the General Assembly, when the Security Council would have had an opportunity to deal with the number of applications that have accrued at that time" (ibid., p. 25).

We desire to repeat to Tirana not only text set forth in Delun 162 but also such additional information as you may be able to provide. It would be helpful if you could give us an estimate as to when consideration of the Albanian request will be given in the Security Council. 1514. Delun 247. [Here follows summary of the January 25 meeting of the Security Council, and part of the January 28 meeting, as these related to the membership question.]

After my motion was defeated (Delun 171)³² there followed extended discussion at end of which it was agreed to place item on agenda on clear understanding that question of time when subject should be considered will be determined by SC when this item is reached.

Albanian application has since remained last item on published agenda of each meeting of SC. Presumably question as to when to consider request will be decided after consideration of Greek problem and Indonesia question has been finished.

I believe it likely that Albanian application will not have to be considered again in London. If, however, it comes up either in normal course of events or in connection with consideration of question of moving to US, I propose to take same line as before and to attempt to postpone consideration until after Council is in session at temporary site.

It is significant that Poland and Soviet Union both supported early consideration of Albanian application and indicated that they would support application itself. While there has been no public Greek opposition to application, Glintaris of Greek delegation on January 29, in long conversation with Hare emphasized that incidents of this kind fitted perfectly into familiar pattern of Russian encroachment in Balkans which he doubted either British or US delegations fully appreciated. Moreover, Aghnides telephoned member of staff same day suggesting that when Albanian question is raised I might wish to suggest that in view of Greece's proximity to Albania, SC would desire to hear from Greek delegate. He expressed view that it would be inappropriate for a state which has not yet entered into peace arrangements to be singled out as first new member. Unless otherwise instructed I shall not make such a suggestion as it might indicate a tendency to support Greek position in Greek Albanian issues.

Freitas Valle of Brazil who supported me in Council January 28 remarked in [apparent omission] today expressing to me belief that SC could finish in three or four meetings that he hoped it would do so before Albanian item came up.

I would welcome any comments or suggestions Dept cares to make.³³

UNITED STATES ATTITUDE TOWARD MEMBERSHIP QUESTIONS DURING COMING SECURITY COUNCIL MEETINGS³⁵

THE PROBLEM

The Security Council placed Albania's membership application on its agenda on January 28. On February 13, the Council voted, on the motion of the United States, to defer disposition of the matter "pending further study until the Security Council convenes at the temporary ³³ In telegram 1403, Undel 198, February 11, 7 p. m., to London, the Delegation was informed that "Dept approves your course of action proposed in fifth paragraph of Delun 247 and desires that you continue effort to secure postponement of vote. Please inform us of probable time of vote. Department will cable further instructions prepared in the light of current developments in Albania." (501.BB/2-746).

The Department instructed further in telegram 1495, Undel 207, February 13, 8 p. m., to London, that "Dept assumes that question of Albanian application will probably be disposed of by vote to consider at later meeting of Security Council. If, however, your efforts toward this end should fail, Dept desires that you vote along general lines of your statement in paragraph 2 of Delun 247. . . ." (501.AA/2-1346).

The question was in fact voted upon the evening of February 13, when Mr. Stettinius offered a motion that ". . . this item be kept on our agenda, but that disposition be deferred, pending further study, until the Security Council convenes at the temporary headquarters." Mr. Stettinius added: "My Government desires to have more time to examine the problem." The motion was carried. (SC, 1st yr., 1st series, p. 268.)

³⁴ No date appears on this document; internal evidence indicates that it was drafted in the early part of March, probably no later than March 15.

³⁵ The Security Council was scheduled to reconvene in New York on March 25.

headquarters." The issue will, therefore, almost certainly be discussed at the coming meetings.

Its exact place on the agenda remains to be determined. In postponing consideration until its next meeting, the Security Council did not indicate what priority the matter should have on the agenda, several representatives indicating simply that the Council could call up this or any other item for discussion at such time as it wished.

As to action on the application itself, we have the choice of three main alternatives:

- (a) To vote for a favorable recommendation from the Security Council to the General Assembly;
- (b) To vote against such a recommendation;
- (c) To propose or support further postponement.

However, our action on this matter is only a single item in what must be a broad program for the admission of new members. The Potsdam agreements³⁶ reflect a purpose to admit the neutral States (except Spain) and, after the conclusion of peace treaties, Italy, Bulgaria, Finland, Hungary and Roumania and there is a general consensus that this program should be set in motion without unnecessary delay.

Thus a further branch of the problem is the decision whether choice of one of the alternatives set out above should be combined with some other action or statement designed to advance the program of bringing in all qualified States.

PROPOSED UNITED STATES POSITION

1) The following course should be carefully considered and, if the current political atmosphere is judged not unfavorable therefor, steps might be taken as follows:

(a) The neutral governments might be sounded out to ascertain their views and desires concerning the submission of membership applications;

(b) A few members of the Security Council might be sounded out to ascertain whether or not they plan any action in the present meeting on the subject of admission of new members, and to ascertain their views with regard to possible means of expediting admission of qualified neutral States as a group. Such action would be presented as a procedure for carrying out the provisions of Chapter X of the Potsdam Communiqué;

(c) If it were found that some of the neutral States were ready to submit applications at once, we might consult and if possible come to an agreement with other Security Council powers concerning means of encouraging and expediting this, and of securing prompt and favorable action by the Security Council;

(d) To provide for neutral States who were not admitted or who did not apply, a resolution might be proposed, providing in substance:

“That the consideration of any applications for membership received from any neutral State be made an item of the continuing agenda of the Security Council, to the end that any ex-neutral State that so desires may, if found qualified, be admitted to membership by the General Assembly at its September meeting.”

(e) We should, if this course were taken, presumably be prepared to vote for Albania's admission if this should make possible favorable action on a reasonable number of other applications.

2) If conditions appear unfavorable for the successful execution of such a program as is outlined in (1), we should proceed as follows:

(a) If, as is anticipated, General Hoxha makes no satisfactory acknowledgement of the present effect of the treaties in force between the United States and Albania on April 7, 1939:

i. We should, if possible, favor postponement until August or September, of action by the Security Council on this and any other applications that might be received in the meantime. Our position might be explained as follows:

When the subject was discussed before, consideration was deferred pending further study. The primary question requiring such consideration was, and still is, what general procedure the members of the United Nations shall follow in providing for the admission of a number of States, at least some of which have been generally assumed—in the Potsdam agreement, for example—to qualify for membership. This question is not one merely of Security Council procedure—although that has not been put in final form as yet—but one of the general relations of States and one which in particular involves many uncertainties connected with post-war reconstruction. These uncertainties, concerning the internal and external relations of many States, will, it is hoped, decrease during the coming months.

We accordingly suggest that, in the circumstances, the best general procedure for taking the initial steps to bring about the membership of qualified states would be as follows:

(a) Consideration of all membership applications should be postponed until a meeting of the Security Council in August or early September, the exact date to be agreed upon later.

(b) That meeting would be a propitious occasion for considering not only Albania's application but also any applications from the former neutral and enemy States whose admission was generally envisaged in the Potsdam Communiqué. In the case of ex-enemy States, admission would naturally depend on the prior conclusion of peace treaties.

(c) It should be strongly emphasized that such a program need not delay by a single day the final acquisition of membership by any State that was found qualified. The General Assembly which has the final decision on membership applications, does not meet again until September.

ii. In prior discussions with representatives of other Security Council Members, it should be indicated that our intentions are as stated above and that we should prefer to support a motion to postpone consideration to the alternative of simply voting against a motion to approve Albania's application. Actual voting tactics should be left to the decision of the American representative in the light of political conditions existing just prior to the vote. However, in view of the fact that the United States representative has proposed two previous resolutions to postpone, it would be preferable to arrange, if possible, that the motion be put by some other State.

iii. In case sufficient support for a postponing vote could not be secured, it would presumably be necessary to vote against the application on the merits or, perhaps, to abstain from the vote. A possible statement giving grounds for an adverse vote is given in Annex B.³⁷

3) In the unlikely case that a satisfactory response should be received from General Hoxha, we should favor the application.

4) Whatever the attitude taken by the United States toward the application we should, in one of our statements, refer to Chapter X of the Potsdam Communiqué, of August 2, 1945 and point out that since the Security Council will be considering Albania's application at its meeting in August or September, it would presumably be ready at that time to consider also any applications from States whose admission is envisaged in the Communiqué. In the case of ex-enemy States, this would naturally depend on conclusion of the peace treaties by that time. This government regards the admission of any state to membership in the United Nations as a matter that must be decided through careful consideration of the actual merits of each particular case.

DISCUSSION

Our attitude in connection with the Albanian application should be consistent both with our general attitude and program toward the admission of new members and with the individual merits of the Albanian case. As to the former, it is clear that Albania cannot be a major concern of our broad policy. Our action should, therefore, not be such as to delay necessary steps toward the admission of a number of States whose membership would strengthen the United Nations. Unless a rather bold course such as is outlined under (1) above is practicable, it seems that the needs of our broad policy toward admission to membership would be served by incorporating into our proposal for postponement some indication that the Security Council should be ready in August or September to consider applications from neutral States.

It is believed that a reference to Chapter X of the Potsdam Communiqué, which registers the views of the Big Three in favor of the admission of the neutrals other than Spain and, following the conclusion of peace treaties with the enemy states of Italy, Bulgaria, ³⁷ Not printed.

Roumania, Hungary and Finland, would serve our purpose of giving some public hint of our interest in securing the admission of at least some ex-neutral states. The reference to the Potsdam Communiqué would also indicate that we wish to limit the field at this time and that we would not be open to any possible suggestion that further Soviet Republics be admitted.

With regard to the three possible alternatives of action in Albania's application, set out in the statement of the "problem" above, it seems clear that unless the Hoxha regime modifies its present attitude in important respects, it will be impractical for the United States to cast a favorable vote on the application. The background of the case is briefly as follows:

This Government sent a political representative to Tirana in May 8, 1945, and negotiations looking toward recognition of the Hoxha government have supposedly gone on since then.³⁸ The United States made an acknowledgment by the Hoxha regime of the continued validity of the treaties in force between Albania and the United States on April 7, 1939, a condition precedent to recognition. General Hoxha has made no such acknowledgment and has stated that the validity of no treaty could be accepted "in advance". While negotiations were thus supposedly continuing without leading to tangible results, the American mission was subjected to increasingly inconsiderate and unfriendly treatment in a number of respects. The American representative accordingly delivered to General Hoxha, under instructions, a strongly-worded memorandum expressing the dissatisfaction of the United States Government and indicating that it would not grant recognition to Albania unless the attitude of the Hoxha regime became satisfactory in respect of the basic questions at issue. It was intimated that Albania's admission to the United Nations would be opposed unless proper respect for treaties was shown by the Hoxha regime.

It is not understood that a satisfactory response has thus far been received.

In case a satisfactory reply were received, so that recognition could be granted to the Hoxha regime it would seem logical and desirable to vote in favor of the application. This eventuality, however, appears unlikely at present.

In case no such satisfactory reply is received, it would presumably be impossible for us to support the application. However, unless general circumstances favor a flat negative vote on the merits of the case, it would seem preferable to find some formula for postponing any vote on the merits. A negative vote would, of course, create resentment, would probably provoke discussion in the Security Council on the special issues between ourselves and the Hoxha regime, and would in any case require explanations on our part that would receive much publicity. However, the general circumstances may possibly be such as to make it desirable for us to raise the issues publicly and to make a strong statement of our attitude on them.

The need for special care in choosing the ground on which we favor postponement is obvious. The application has already received some discussion in the Security Council on two different occasions and we and the British took the attitude then that more study of the subject was necessary before a decision could be given. We ourselves moved postponement of the vote until the present session; this attitude would naturally create the expectation that we would at this time be prepared to cast our vote on the merits of the case. Accordingly, it will be fairly obvious to all concerned—and particularly to the Russians, who are doubtless familiar with the issues between ourselves and Hoxha—that our attitude of favoring postponement contains the element of unwillingness to approve the application at the present time. We should attempt, by prior discussions with Security Council members, to get our attitude accepted without the necessity of airing our views on the precise issues between ourselves and Hoxha. However in case circumstances should make it necessary to do so, we should presumably be prepared to make a statement along the general lines of Annexes A and B.³⁹

U.S. POSITION TOWARD MEMBERSHIP APPLICATIONS DURING COMING SECURITY COUNCIL MEETINGS

1. We should favor a motion to postpone, until a meeting in August, consideration of the Albanian application and any other application received before that time, since ³⁹ These contingencies did not arise, and the annexes are not printed.

⁴⁰ Internal evidence indicates that this paper had been cleared through the Department by March 22. On that date it reached the office of the Secretary of State and by March 25 it had been passed on to the office of Mr. Stettinius (whether in Washington or in New York is not clear) "with a mere notation from the Secretary that it was for him [Stettinius]. . . . It was apparently transferred to Mr. Stettinius pursuant to the general intention that the Secretary should handle only the Iranian case." (Memorandum by Mr. Sandifer, Chief of the Division of International Organization Affairs, to Alger Hiss, Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs, April 3, File No. 501.AA/4-346; this memorandum is printed in part infra).

(a) the admission of Albania or any other applicant State could not possibly take place until final approval of the application by the General Assembly at its meeting in September, and

(b) the Security Council should make provision for considering not only the one application now before it, but all applications that may be presented within a reasonable time.

To provide now for action upon such application at a meeting during August, the exact date to be fixed later on, would establish a general and reasonable procedure by which the Security Council could give the membership problem as a whole the careful consideration which it warrants, and by which all States that desire membership can prepare and present applications without any State necessarily suffering any delay in securing admission.

2. In prior discussions with representatives of other Security Council members, it should be indicated that our intentions are as stated above and that we would not be able to vote in favor of approval of the application. We should arrange, if possible, that a motion along the lines of (1) above should be made by some other member with assurance of our support.

3. In case such a motion should fail, we should maintain our position that action on the Albanian application should be postponed until a meeting in August. If necessary, in order to maintain this position, we should vote against any motion for approval of the application.

4. In the unlikely case that General Hoxha's attitude should suddenly become such as to justify our support in principle and, further, that the motion to postpone should fail, we should favor the application.

501.AA/4-346

Memorandum by the Chief of the Division of International Organization Affairs (Sandifer) to the Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs (Hiss)

[WASHINGTON,] April 3, 1946.

I have received the following informal report from Mr. Taylor,⁴¹ dated April 2, concerning the Albanian membership question:

"1. As I told you on the phone, we have as yet had no indication of any impending move to place the Albanian problem on the agenda. However, such a move should probably from now on be expected at any time.

⁴¹ Paul B. Taylor of the Division of International Organization Affairs, on detail with the United States Delegation to the United Nations in New York.

"2. I have just prepared a handy collection of documents on the Council proceedings on this matter and including as well a proposal as to our tactics and a proposed statement for possible use.⁴² After talking a previous draft over with Alger,⁴³ Charles Noyes⁴⁴ and Harding Bancroft⁴⁵ I have drawn it up so as to suggest that we resist any move to place the item on the agenda of any meeting before July. A distinction has emerged from the Committee of Experts'⁴⁶ discussion, between the "Calendar of Business" (a sort of docket of future business without any indication as to the time it will be taken up) and the "Agenda", which is the order of business of any particular meeting. The Albanian matter would, under the new procedure, be said to be at present on the Calendar of Business, but not on the agenda. Under this suggested plan, we should oppose placing the matter on the agenda on the grounds specified in the position paper that was cleared through the Department. I think we will discuss the matter tomorrow—Noyes and Johnson⁴⁷ will, I hope, have time for it but the latter is extremely busy attending and preparing for the meetings of the Committee of Experts. I shall see that you are informed at the earliest possible moment.

"3. One suggestion has been that we make concrete proposals for so changing the rules of procedure as to make some special provision for the consideration of membership applications. There is, as you may know, a specific Russian proposal along these lines in the Committee of Experts.⁴⁸ It seems to be the consensus here, so far as I have been able to observe, that no such rules are needed unless possibly for negotiation purposes in connection with the handling of this application. We have made something, in the Council discussions before, of the need for the establishment of general procedures for the handling of the matter. It may possible be that a suggestion to submit all such matters to a committee of the Council would be helpful. I am going to ask the opinions of Mr. Johnson and Mr. Noyes on that matter tomorrow if possible. I do not know yet whether present plans call for any general use of committees by the Council. A referral to committee might possibly offer one means of ascertaining in advance what the Members' attitudes toward particular applica-

The first meeting of the Departmental Team on the admission of new members to the United Nations, organized pursuant to a decision of the United Nations Liaison Committee,⁵⁰ was held at 2:00 P. M., April 9, in the Office of Mr. D. V. Sandifer.

Mr. Sandifer opened the meeting with a statement on the status of the Albanian application and explained the proposal which had originated in New York, to postpone consideration of the application by referring the entire question of new membership to the Committee of Experts on the ground that it was necessary to determine methods of procedure before moving to consider specific applications. It was the sense of the meeting that, on the basis of the information hitherto at hand, the original policy paper on Albania⁵¹ provided a better method of procedure. It was pointed out that the proposal for a delay by reference to the procedural problem would put us in a vulnerable position, since we might be voted down on it and would then have to veto the Albanian application in the Council. The possibility was also raised that if, as the Russians desired, the consideration of Rules of Procedure was accelerated and completed within a few weeks, we should then be confronted with the necessity of a veto. Mr. Raynor remarked that we did not want to veto the Albanian application but rather to agree to the admission of Albania in return for Soviet concessions on applications favored by the United States. He stated that Mr. Bohlen⁵² had seemed confident that we could secure postponement of the Albanian case through the policy originally laid down, but that others, notably Mr. Noyes, had not been so optimistic. Mr. Raynor said that he would press for adherence to the original policy statement in New York and that he expected the British to follow the same line, perhaps even vetoing the admission of Albania on grounds of substance rather than procedure.

⁴⁹ Respectively, J. Wesley Adams of the Division of International Security Affairs (Office of Special Political Affairs); G. Hayden Raynor, Special Assistant to the Director of the Office of European Affairs; Kenneth P. Landon, Assistant Chief of the Division of Southeast Asian Affairs (Office of Far Eastern Affairs); Mr. Wilson is not precisely identifiable but probably is Leonard S. Wilson of the Division of American Republics Analysis Liaison (Office of American Republic Affairs); Joseph C. Satterthwaite, Assistant Chief of the Division of Near Eastern Affairs (Office of Near Eastern and African Affairs); Miss Dorothy Fosdick, Assistant Chief of the Division of International Organization Affairs (Office of Special Political Affairs); David H. Popper, also of the Division of International Organization Affairs.

⁵⁰ The United Nations Liaison Committee had itself just been organized in the Department of State (see pp. 15 and 21), and had a membership which was representative of each of the geographical offices and the Office of Special Political Affairs. As “working teams” were set up by the Committee on special problems each of the offices, as appropriate, was to name a member or members on the team.

Mr. Satterthwaite, who was at the UNRRA Council meeting at Atlantic City, remarked that the Russians had probably used the case of Albania there to pave the way for its consideration in New York. He was of the opinion that we could expect the Soviets to insist on action before the Council.

Mr. Adams stated that at a meeting of the Liaison Committee last Friday (April 5) the view was expressed that we should take the initiative in preparing a resolution on the question of admissions, for introduction in the Council. He pointed out that this would be a logical outgrowth of our position at London and that it might be used to invite qualified states not now members to prepare their applications for submission in July or August. There was some discussion of the relative advantages and disadvantages of our taking the lead on this subject, particularly since we had been continually in the forefront of the discussions in London. The question was raised as to what advantage would be gained if we brought the matter up in case the Russians and the Yugoslavs did not do so. Miss Fosdick suggested the desirability of an amendment to any resolution proposed by other states, which under the Rules would be voted on first. A decision was taken to prepare a preliminary draft resolution for possible introduction, and to consider it at a Team meeting on April 10.

From a brief review of the states qualified to apply for membership, it appeared that Iceland was the only state in the area covered by EUR now ready to apply, and Sweden could easily be made ready. Mr. Raynor stated that EUR would try to arrange for an application by Italy before the other ex-enemy states—preferably along with the application of Austria, since it was not desired that Austria join before Italy. Mr. Landon noted that the Department wished Siam to apply as soon as possible. Italy, Austria and Siam, it was felt, might all be regarded in one sense as victims of aggression for which some special treatment might be appropriate. Mr. Satterthwaite said that at Atlantic City the French had urged us not to sponsor Siam for admission at this time but had indicated that their difficulties with that country would soon be straightened out.⁵³ Any application from Korea would be considered premature at this stage.

The procedure for acting upon applications was then considered. It was noted that there was no necessity that any application be sponsored by any member state. Mr. Raynor asked for clarification of the position as regards the eligibility of Switzerland, and Mr. Sandifer undertook to have OA prepare a specific statement on the difficulties raised by Swiss neutrality.

The discussion then turned to the possibility of opposing the placing of the Albanian question on the daily agenda. The view was expressed that this would be contrary to our broad policy of permitting discussion on all appropriate questions, and it was stated that we could not put through a positive resolution by means of such tactics. Mr. Raynor stated that passage of a Council resolution framed in general terms might encourage states which have been holding back their applications to forward them to the Secretary-General.

Minutes of the Second Meeting of the Departmental Team on Admission of New Members to the United Nations, Department of State, Washington, April 10, 1946

[Here follows list of names of persons present (8), the same as at the April 9 meeting.]

The second meeting of the team on the admission of new members to the United Nations was held in Mr. Sandifer's office at noon on April 10.

Two documents were submitted at the meeting:

1. A memorandum on the qualifications for admission to membership in the United Nations and the procedure to be followed by an applicant state.⁵⁴ This document was prepared in OA in response to a request from Mr. Raynor, with the thought that it might be useful for guidance in the course of informal conversations with representatives of states desiring to apply for membership.

2. A draft resolution on the procedure to be adopted by the Security Council in connection with applications for membership.⁵⁵ The form of the resolution was discussed at some length and a number of changes were suggested. It was agreed that much of the material in the preamble would be more appropriate for inclusion in the statement by our delegate if and when the resolution was introduced in the Security Council.

It was decided that Mr. Sandifer would take with him to New York the text of a revised resolution. It was the consensus of the team that there might be great advantages for the United States in taking the initiative, barring the existence of unfavorable political factors, and it was suggested that we might either propose this resolution as a new item on the agenda or present it as a substitute proposal when the Albanian issue arose. Mr. Sandifer stated that he would consult with the members of the delegation concerned with the problem and would present this point of view.

Minutes of the Third Meeting of the Departmental Team on Admission of New Members to the United Nations, Department of State, Washington, April 12, 1946

[Here follows list of names of persons present (7), the same as at the April 9 meeting, page 371, with the exception of Mr. Sandifer.]

The third meeting of the Departmental Team on admission of new members was held in Mr. Raynor's office on April 12, at 2:00 P. M. The meeting was called to discuss a proposed course of action on the question of admission to membership, which was an outgrowth of the draft resolution previously worked out by the Team and conversations held by Mr. Sandifer and Mr. Taylor in New York.

Mr. Raynor remarked that the proposed course of action appeared to be consistent with the attitude he had noted during his talks in New York. He suggested that, of the two Plans noted,⁵⁶ our delegate should be instructed to propose Plan A first in his talks with the British, and to initiate discussion on Plan B only if Plan A does not meet with a favorable response. It was agreed that an instruction should be prepared on the proposed course of action for circulation and clearance in the Department, accompanied by a background memorandum on the subject.

A suggestion was made by Mr. Adams that provision be made for introducing Plan A as an amendment in case the Albanian application came up for approval over our opposition. It was agreed that this would be desirable.

⁵⁶ See the instruction of April 17, infra.

There was some discussion of the question of consulting the Russians at some stage in the procedure. It was noted that, once the British had been approached, the delegation would have authority to approach representatives of other countries as it saw fit.

The Secretary of State to the United States Representative at the United Nations (Stettinius)

WASHINGTON, April 17, 1946.

SIR: A. In pursuit of the objectives set forth in the policy memorandum on the United States Position Toward Membership Applications During Coming Security Council Meetings you should immediately initiate discussions, first with the United Kingdom Delegation and then with other delegations at your discretion, to determine the extent of support for the following course of action:

1. The United States Delegate should at an early date, if possible prior to inclusion of the Albanian application on the Provisional Agenda of any meeting, introduce the following resolution in the Security Council:

RESOLUTION OF PROCEDURE TO BE ADOPTED BY THE SECURITY COUNCIL IN CONNECTION WITH APPLICATIONS FOR MEMBERSHIP IN THE
UNITED NATIONS

THE SECURITY COUNCIL,

taking into account the fact that, under Article 4 of the Charter, membership in the United Nations is open to all peace-loving states which accept the obligations contained in the Charter, and, in the judgment of the Organization, are able and willing to carry out these obligations; and taking into account the fact that the General Assembly, which acts to admit applicant states to membership on the recommendation of the Security Council, will meet for the second part of its first session on September 3, 1946

RESOLVED that:

1. Applications for membership which have been or may be received by the Secretary-General shall be considered by the Security Council at a meeting or meetings to be held in August 1946 for this specific purpose.

2. Applications for membership which may be received by the Secretary-General not later than July 15, 1946 shall be referred to a committee composed of a representative of each of the members of the Security Council for examination and report to the Council not later than August 1, 1946.

2. If the Albanian application is included on the Provisional Agenda for a meeting before we introduce the foregoing resolution, the United States Delegate should move to amend that item on the agenda so that in effect it will apply to applications for membership generally, including the Albanian application, and indicate our intention to introduce the foregoing resolution. If, over our opposition, an Agenda is adopted which includes the Albanian application, the United States Delegate should then introduce the resolution as an amendment to a proposal that is made in connection with the application or as a substitute proposal.

3. The United States Delegate should accompany the introduction of the resolution by a statement that it is desirable to work out satisfactory rules of procedure before considering applications from states desiring membership in the Organization. For this purpose, he should introduce in the Committee of Experts at the proper time, two rules along the following lines to replace Rule 34 of the Provisional Rules of Procedure of the Security Council (S/35, April 10, 1946).⁵⁷

The Secretary-General shall immediately bring the application for membership to the attention of all representatives on the Security Council in accordance with Rule 6. The President of the Security Council shall thereupon, unless otherwise directed by the Council, refer the application for examination to a committee of the Council composed of a representative of each of the Members of the Council. The committee shall at least thirty days in advance of each session of the General Assembly report to the Security Council on all applications received more than forty-five days prior to that session. When there is less than thirty days notice for any session of the General Assembly or when an application has been filed less than forty-five days prior to a session, the Security Council shall determine the time at which the committee shall report on applications before it.

Rule 35

The Security Council shall decide whether in its judgment the applicant is a peace-loving state, and is able and willing to carry out the obligations contained in the Charter, and whether to recommend the applicant state for membership.

B. If the above course of action does not meet with a sufficiently favorable reaction, you should initiate discussions, with the United Kingdom Delegation and then with other delegations at your discretion, to determine the extent of support for the following alternative course of action:

1. The United States Delegate should oppose inclusion in the Agenda for any meeting of the Security Council of an item on the Albanian application, until such time as the rules of procedure governing the handling of membership applications shall have been approved by the Security Council.

2. The United States Delegate should introduce in the Committee of Experts at the proper time the two rules to replace Rule 34 of the Provisional Rules of Procedure of the Security Council as indicated in paragraph A3 above, so that the Albanian application would not be considered immediately by the Security Council.

3. If, over our opposition, an Agenda is adopted which includes the Albanian application, the United States Delegate should continue to oppose consideration of the merits of the application.

C. For your information, this instruction does not modify the position stated in the policy memorandum on the United States Position Toward Membership Applications During Coming Security Council Meetings⁵⁸ that you should vote against any motion for approval of the Albanian application if it is necessary to do so in order to postpone action on the Albanian application until a meeting of the Security Council in August.

Very truly yours,

JAMES F. BYRNES

MEMORANDUM TO ACCOMPANY INSTRUCTION ON UNITED STATES POSITION WITH REGARD TO CONSIDERATION BY THE SECURITY COUNCIL OF APPLICATIONS FOR MEMBERSHIP IN THE UNITED NATIONS

A. The Problem:

The Question of the admission of Albania to the United Nations was discussed in the Security Council in London in January, and on the proposal of the United States, further consideration was postponed until the Security Council should meet in New York. The subject may thus be placed on the Provisional Agenda of a meeting of the Security Council in the near future.

⁵⁸ Dated March 22, p. 368.

The Department has not opposed the admission of Albania to the United Nations on the merits of the case and wishes if possible to avoid doing so. There has been no disposition to deny that the United Nations can function with maximum strength and efficiency only if all properly qualified states are participants in the Organization. At the same time, it is believed that there would be a great tactical advantage in considering the Albanian application together with other applications toward which this country would be more favorably disposed.

On January 28, Mr. Stettinius made the following statement of the United States' position in the Security Council in London:

"The admission of new Members is a serious and important matter, requiring the most careful consideration of the Members of the United Nations. In the circumstances, it is apparent that the only reasonable and fair method of giving proper and adequate consideration to applications for new membership would be to defer all applications until some time prior to the next meeting of the General Assembly, when the Security Council would have had an opportunity to deal with the number of applications that have accrued at that time."

Substantially this same position was reaffirmed in the policy memorandum on the United States Position Toward Membership Applications During Coming Security Council Meetings which was approved by the Secretary of State in early March. That memorandum stated:

"1. We should favor a motion to postpone until a meeting in August, consideration of the Albanian application and any other application received before that time, since

(a) the admission of Albanian or any other applicant state could not possibly take place until final approval of the application by the General Assembly at its meeting in September, and

(b) the Security Council should make provision for considering not only the one application now before it, but all applications that may be presented within a reasonable time."

B. Purpose of Instruction:

The present instruction is intended to provide the basis for initiating discussions immediately with other delegations to the Security Council, beginning with the United Kingdom Delegation, to decide the course of action to be followed in dealing both with the Albanian application and with the related question of establishing a general procedure for handling applications for membership.

Two principal alternative courses of action are set forth, the second of which is recommended for exploration with other delegations only if adequate support is not forthcoming for the first.

C. Comment on Proposed Courses of Action:

The two courses of action set forth in the instruction are designed to secure the adoption of an agreed date this summer, such as August first, for consideration by the Security Council of all membership applications. Both courses of action are directed to having the Albanian application referred to a committee where it could be held until mid-summer. Both are premised on our opposing the Albanian application if it comes up for consideration by the Security Council before that time.

The first course of action is preferred, however, for the following reasons:

1. The United States would be pressing for adoption of a positive proposal which it had itself suggested, to achieve the purposes which it favors, instead of laying itself open to the charge of merely blocking substantive action on Albania by such procedural devices as opposition to the adoption of an Agenda.

2. The ground of discussion would be shifted in the Security Council from the case of Albania to the general question of membership, thus serving to prevent what might be an acrimonious discussion with the Soviet Union on Albania's qualifications.

3. The resolution proposed for introduction in the Security Council would serve as an indication to eligible applicants that they are invited to submit their applications in time for consideration before the specified date.

4. The resolution might be agreed upon as a special measure, even if the proposed rules of procedure providing for a regular procedure of submission of applications to a committee failed of acceptance in the Committee of Experts.

It is understood that if the Security Council adopts the proposed resolution that action would be in no way modified by approval of the suggested rules of procedure to replace Rule 34.

Minutes of the Fourth Meeting of the Departmental Team on Admission of New Members to the United Nations, Department of State, Washington, April 29, 1946

[Here follows list of names of persons present (8), the same as at the April 9 meeting, page 371.]

1. The Present Status:

Miss Fosdick opened the meeting with a description of the situation as it now exists in New York. She reported that there had been some feeling that the Secretary-General might put the Albanian question on the provisional agenda of the Security Council in the next few days. It was ascertained through Mr. Saba of Egypt,⁵⁹ however, that President Afifi⁶⁰ was disinclined to put the matter on the provisional agenda until the Committee of Experts had considered Rules of Procedure on the general subject of membership. Mr. Johnson, in New York, now believes that the Albanian question will not be placed on the agenda before the end of this week and possibly not until later.

⁵⁹ Mr. Saba was serving as Chairman of the Committee of Experts at this time.

⁶⁰ Haraz Afifi of Egypt, at this time President of the Security Council.

With regard to our conversations with the British, Cadogan has evidently approved the method of procedure suggested in the Department's Instruction of April 17 and is communicating with London in this connection. Mr. Johnson is to discuss the matter today with the other members of the Security Council who supported our position on Albania at the London meetings.

2. Question of Supplementary Instruction for Delegation:

The question was then raised whether we should move immediately to present our resolution or wait until the Albanian question should arise. The decision on this point was that, if there was no additional information from New York today, we should prepare a telegraphic draft instruction tomorrow for clearance in the Department. The instruction would authorize the U.S. Representative to communicate our resolution to the Secretary-General for inclusion on the provisional agenda, provided the Representative feels that there is sufficient support to assure a favorable reception for it. The instruction further expresses the hope that the resolution can be introduced in the Security Council before our proposed Rules of Procedure on membership go to the Committee of Experts, although the Delegation would be authorized to introduce these Rules of Procedure at its discretion.⁶¹

3. Draft Statement for Mr. Stettinius:

The Team then considered a draft statement which might be used by Mr. Stettinius in introducing our resolution on admission. The statement was approved in principle, after one change had been made, and members of the Team agreed to communicate to Mr. Popper any detailed changes they might later wish to suggest.⁶²

4. Survey of Situation by Countries:

A consideration of the timing factors involved in the problem of admission then ensued. Mr. Raynor expressed the opinion that the applications of Iceland and Sweden would be ready by August, but he was not so certain regarding those of Portugal, Switzerland, and Eire. Mr. Satterthwaite felt that the Afghans would probably be ready to apply whenever we informed them that the way was cleared to go ahead. There was, however, some slight possibility that Soviet pressure might restrain the Afghans. Mr. Landon stated that the French terms for a treaty of peace with Siam generally followed those of the British-Siamese Agreement, with the addition of the border settlement provisions. Mr. Raynor noted that talks with individual countries had been deferred pending the introduction of our resolution in the Council. He stated that we hoped to push the applications of Italy and Austria, perhaps even before the signing of an Italian peace treaty.

⁶¹ See telegram 38, April 30, 7 p. m., to New York, infra.

⁶² The draft statement was forwarded to New York in telegram 48, May 6, 8 p. m. (501.BC/5-646), but is not printed as the United States Representative (Stettinius) followed it quite closely when he made his opening statement on the proposed resolution to the Security Council on May 17; see United Nations, Official Records of the Security Council, First Year, First Series, No. 2, pp. 278-280; hereafter cited as SC, 1st yr., 1st series, No. 2.

In reviewing the status of other eligible countries, Mr. Satterthwaite pointed out that it was premature to present applications for Yemen, Burma, or Nepal, while the case of Transjordan is so complex that some time will be necessary before the application stage can be reached. It was decided to have a paper prepared on Outer Mongolia for the Book being prepared for the Delegation. Mr. Raynor stated that the Department's attitude on this point was that we would accept the Mongolian application if it were pressed by another state.

The Team felt that the Department's policy on the admission of additional Soviet Republics is and will remain one of unalterable opposition.

WASHINGTON, April 30, 1946—7 p. m.

38. USdel. Our instruction on admission to membership in UN of April 17, 1946 authorized you only to initiate discussions with other delegations to determine extent of support for resolution and rules of procedure set forth in instruction. In view of likelihood of early consideration of membership rules in Committee of Experts and possibility that move may suddenly be made to place Albanian application on Provisional Agenda of SC you are authorized to take action as follows:

If, in your view, there is sufficient support among members of SC to assure favorable reception of resolution set forth in instruction of April 17, 1946, you may immediately communicate resolution to Secretary-General for inclusion on Provisional Agenda of SC meeting. You may also at your discretion introduce in Committee of Experts rules of procedure on admission of members set forth in instruction of April 17, 1946. We still hope, however, that resolution can be introduced in SC before introduction of proposed rules of procedure in Committee of Experts.

WASHINGTON, May 3, 1946—7 p. m.

45. USdel. We are encouraged by your reports as to support which has been found in your informal discussions to date for our proposed resolution on membership (reurtel 136 from New York, May 2, 1946⁶³). We gather that if either Mexico or Egypt indicate support necessary votes to carry resolution will be assured.

We are strongly of view that resolution should be placed on agenda of SC at earliest possible moment and by all means should be considered before specific question of Albania is placed on agenda.

Our short-term objective is to have SC's attention turned to subject of membership in general, rather than to have it discuss specifically admission of Albania. We feel our resolution represents best chance of accomplishing this. We feel resolution should be considered rather than relying on action on rules in Committee of Experts.⁶⁴ At least three risks are involved in latter course; (a) our rule might not be adopted, (b) even if adopted it would permit committee to report out Albanian case at any time, (c) also it would be possible for Albanian case to be brought up in SC at any time, and considered by SC without reference to committee as such reference under proposed rule is at discretion of SC.

Another reason for prompt consideration and adoption of our resolution is that we, from long-term point of view, favor wide membership in the organization as early as possible and therefore the early admission of certain states that are now eligible. The resolution is so phrased that in effect it is an invitation to non-members to file application for membership. We wish to discuss matter of applying for membership with neutrals and perhaps other countries at an early date, and thereafter to discuss prospects for their admission with members of SC, and we feel that the adoption of the resolution by SC may have constructive influence on position of countries eligible for membership.

For your own confidential information, we feel it would be most unfortunate for specific Albanian question to be brought to vote now as we would have to oppose it and we understand British would do likewise. We wish to avoid setting of this precedent. If matter is deferred until summer and then considered on broad bases we may find it possible to vote in favor of Albanian application. This would be case if situation with respect to Albania should change, which we must admit seems unlikely. In addition, however, we might in summer be disposed reluctantly to vote for admission of Albania if at same time group of other countries which we consider better qualified for membership are also admitted.

⁶³ This daily summary telegram contains a detailed report of conversations held in New York on May 2 by Mr. Johnson (501.BC/5-246).

We realize that in suggesting this course of action a difficult situation would confront us if no application other than Albania's were forthcoming before August. We feel however that this risk is a slight one and must be taken.

As soon as necessary 7 votes seem assured, you should take steps immediately to have our resolution placed on agenda.

NEW YORK, May 7, 1946—7 p. m.

149. For Acheson. As indicated by daily secret summary, there appears to be a fair possibility that Committee of Experts will reach agreement by Monday⁶⁵ on draft rules relating to admission of new members which will incorporate substance of US proposals.⁶⁶

We believe strongly that this possibility might be jeopardized if we were to introduce our proposed resolution in SC now. (Reurtel 45, May 3, 7 p. m.) Moreover, we believe that if there is agreement on the rule it may be possible to reach agreement with Gromyko in advance on a resolution, if introduction of a resolution is still deemed desirable.

I accordingly request authorization to delay submission of proposed resolution until either an acceptable rule is agreed upon or agreement proves impossible. We should know the outcome by Monday at the latest.

the United Nations (Stettinius)*

WASHINGTON, May 8, 1946—8 p. m.

55. Amdel. Reurtel 149, May 7. We feel the following considerations must be borne in mind in any delay in submission of proposed resolution on membership.

1. Secret summary (Urtel 152, May 7)⁶⁷ indicates considerable opposition to our rules of procedure. If rules are greatly altered in negotiation we are likely to be in unsatisfactory situation to introduce proposed resolution. Our hope has been that resolution might be agreed upon as special measure, if necessary by majority vote, even if our rules of procedure providing for regular procedure of submission of applications to committee failed of acceptance.⁶⁸

2. Even if substance of our rules is adopted our central objective will not be met of announcing positively by SC resolution that applications from non-members are welcome and that any received will be considered in August.

3. Also even if substance of rules is adopted they would not assure postponement of consideration of Albanian application by SC until August as would be assured by first paragraph of resolution. Rules would permit consideration of Albanian case by SC at any time and allow committee to report out Albanian case at any time. We prefer resolution to some more rigid permanent rule, as it would be undesirable to bind Council always to consider all applications only in month before GA meeting or bind it to refer all applications to a committee. On occasion we may want applications considered at another time of year and immediately by SC.

4. If agreement is reached on rules of procedure before resolution is introduced there is danger that many delegations may feel resolution is unnecessary. We will therefore have no assurances that stage is set for initiating our discussions with neutral states or that consideration of Albanian application will be postponed. Moreover our strategy for both these objectives will be vitiated.

⁶⁷ Not printed ; see footnote 66, p. 383.

⁶⁸ Mr. Stettinius was in fact reporting at this very moment (telegram 157, from New York, May 8, 8 p. m.) that the sub-committee of the Committee of Experts had "decided to recommend to the Committee a draft rule on admission taking care, as far as possible, of the various views." The final results of a period of intensive committee and sub-committee work, May 8-13, were incorporated into Rule 56 (in its entirety) and Rule 57 (in part) of a set of provisional rules which the Committee of Experts recommended to the Security Council in document S/57, May 13. This is printed in SC, 1st yr., 1st series, Suppl. No. 2, pp. 20 ff., annex 1d.

5. If introduction of resolution is delayed SC may temporarily adjourn on disposition of Iranian question and resolution would thereby be further postponed. We would then have to delay our discussions with neutral states or initiate them without having support of SC resolution. We feel considerable time may be needed for these discussions and for talks with SC Members and time is beginning to run out.

6. We understand that Soviet Union has not been shown resolution. Since resolution supplements rules of procedure in important respects we feel Soviet Union might have grounds for considering that they were being misled as to our intentions if they agree to rules of procedure and are then faced with resolution. When given resolution they will in any case need some time for discussions with Moscow. We would prefer to have you show resolution immediately to Soviet Union so our full position is known to them.

In view of foregoing considerations we feel strongly that early action on resolution is important.⁶⁹ We will leave to your discretion timing of its discussion with Soviet Union and of its submission to SC.

Reurtel 152, May 7. We prefer reference of applications to committee of deputies of senior representatives rather than to committee of whole in private session, since committee of deputies can be more informal in consideration of questions, and private sessions of council are likely to excite adverse public comment.

⁶⁹ The Department had already sent a draft statement for use in introducing the resolution in the Security Council (telegram 48, May 6, 8 p. m., 501.BC/5-646). Mr. Stettinius reported favorably on the prospects for passage of the draft U.S. resolution in his daily secret summary on May 10, and stated that the document was about to be transmitted to the Secretary General (telegram 165, May 10, 9:25 p. m., from New York (501.BC/5-1046)).

Mr. Gromyko replied that he did not understand this resolution and said that, to be specific, it seemed to him to be inconsistent with the rules proposed by the Committee of Experts (Document S/57).⁷² Mr. Stettinius replied that the resolution was not inconsistent but was drafted within the terms of the rules which are rather broad. Ambassador Gromyko said that, in any case, he intended to ask Mr. Stettinius some questions to clarify the matter, and Mr. Stettinius replied that he thought the questions would be answered in his introductory statement.

Gromyko did not give the impression that he was determined, at all costs, to oppose the resolution.

Mr. Raynor explained that he had talked by telephone with Mr. Herschel Johnson about the proposed conversation with the British, that Mr. Johnson had agreed to our suggestions but wished to be fully sure of the Department's policy, and that the draft instruction would accordingly be presented to the Staff Committee the next morning, Tuesday, May 28.⁷⁷

*Memorandum Prepared in the Department of State*⁷⁹

[WASHINGTON,] May 28, 1946.

Subject : Further Steps in Relation to the Admission of New Members.

Now that our Resolution on Membership has been adopted by the Security Council we are in a position to initiate discussions with various states eligible for membership and, after we ascertain the desires of such states, to review the situation in New York with representatives of the other permanent members on the Security Council.

Through telegraphic instructions and other papers forwarded to New York, as well as through conversations of Mr. Herschel Johnson in Washington, the Delegation has doubtless gained a full understanding of the Department's objectives and a general understanding of the procedure envisaged. The membership book⁸⁰ also contains specific country study statements. For the sake of clarity, however, we will briefly review both aspects of the problems here.

Our long-term objective is membership for all qualified states. Our short-term aim is to obtain the admission this year of as many as possible of the states which are presently eligible. In our opinion, these states may be classified as follows :

(a) All the neutrals except Spain. As far as the neutrals are concerned, we think that the three powers which signed the Potsdam Declaration are fairly well committed, although we recognize that the question can still be raised as to whether certain of the neutrals are able and willing to carry out the obligations contained in the Charter. In certain cases, such as Switzerland, delays may ensue because of the difficulty to be expected in reconciling constitutional provisions or traditional policies with the obligations of the Charter.

(b) States which may be termed victims of aggression and states which were co-belligerents. We include Austria, Albania and Siam in the category of victims of aggression. We are prepared under any circumstances to vote for the admission of Siam but probably would not be able to support its candidacy actively until Siam retrocedes certain areas which are in dispute with the French. We would be willing to vote rather reluctantly for the admission of Albania if we could arrange at the same time for the admission of neutrals which may apply, of Siam if it applies, of Austria and of Italy.

⁷⁹ Drafted by Messrs. Raynor and Taylor and taken to New York by Mr. Raynor.

⁸⁰ This book was made up of two black binders entitled "Admission to Membership in the United Nations" and was divided into 3 parts: Policy, background information and pertinent documents, and information on specific countries.

As to Italy, although it will be difficult under the terms of the Potsdam Declaration, we desire also to arrange for her admission. If that is not possible we would wish to defer action on Austria, since we feel that Italy—whose services as a co-belligerent should not be disregarded—should not be admitted later than Austria. We are by no means certain that we can arrange for the admission of Austria and Italy this year, but we wish to make the effort in any event.

We feel three things should now be done :

(a) We should ascertain definitely the wishes of the eligible states as to membership and in talking to them tell them what our position would be on their applications. In general, our position will be one of active support at the proper time for all of these states with the exception of Eire, in whose case we feel our support can only extend to voting in favor of an application, and of the possible reservation pertaining to Siam mentioned above.

(b) After definitely ascertaining the desires of the presently eligible states, and if there is no objection by the particular state concerned, we would then wish that the U.S. Representative ascertain informally the reactions of the other permanent members of the Security Council.

(c) We would then plan to discuss the question further with the eligible states, informing them fully of the content and the results of our discussions with the other permanent members of the Security Council. The eligible states would thus have adequate information upon which to decide whether or not to submit their applications, and in cases where it was justified we would encourage the candidate state to apply for membership.

Before starting the steps enumerated above and in view of the expressed wish of the British to discuss this problem with us it would be desirable for Mr. Stettinius or Mr. Herschel Johnson to review the whole matter informally with Sir Alexander Cadogan. We do, however, desire ourselves in any event to talk to Iceland, Sweden, Switzerland, and Afghanistan. The discussion with Sir Alexander should, we believe, take place at the earliest possible moment, since we desire to initiate our discussions with the other countries in the very near future.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Chief of the Division of Southeast Asian Affairs (Landon)

[WASHINGTON,] May 28, 1946.

Participants: Mr. Luant Dithakar Bhakdi, Siamese Legation
Mr. Konthi Suphamonkhon⁸¹
Mr. Abbot Low Moffat, SEA⁸²
Mr. Kenneth P. Landon, SEA
Mr. Stanton,⁸³ American Minister to Siam

In the course of conversation Mr. Konthi said that one of the most important instructions that he had from his Government was to get Siam included among the United Nations. He reminded us that on a previous mission, shortly before the end of the war, he had had similar instructions but that he had been unsuccessful chiefly because Siam was occupied by the Japanese.

Mr. Konthi went on to say that he had a letter from the Minister of Foreign Affairs to the Secretary General of the United Nations inquiring as to the procedure of applying for membership in the United Nations. He asked us what the procedure was and if we would support Siam's application for membership.

Mr. Konthi was informed that the method of applying for membership was quite simple in that all that was required was a letter from the Minister of Foreign Affairs to the Secretary General applying for membership and agreeing to abide by all of the rules and the charter that were binding on members of the United Nations. He was also informed that the United States stood ready to vote affirmatively on the Siamese application for membership, that Siam might expect some difficulty from France in this connection inasmuch as France still considered itself in a state of war with Siam and that, therefore, it might be wise to give some thought as to the best time to apply.

Mr. Konthi said that Siam has never been informed by France that France would oppose Siamese membership in the United Nations unless Siam first retroceded the disputed areas and that he did not believe that France would oppose Siam's membership.⁸⁴

⁸¹ Mr. Konthi was a Siamese Foreign Office official.

⁸² Mr. Moffat was Chief of the Division of Southeast Asian Affairs.

⁸³ Edwin F. Stanton.

⁸⁴ In telegram 84, June 5, 7 p. m., to New York, the Department informed Mr. Johnson that "We assume Siamese letter on membership may raise questions re constituting membership committee and referring applications to it.

"Under membership resolution Committee would in our view not meet until July 15. We suggest that Committee not be constituted until around that time and that chairmanship might rotate with council presidency.

"Would welcome your views re Chairmanship and method of constituting committee." (501.AA/6-546).

to the Secretary of State*

SECRET PRIORITY

NEW YORK, May 29, 1946—7 p. m.

257. From Herschel Johnson. Reference Department's 81, May 28.⁸⁵ I called with Hayden Raynor this afternoon on Sir Alexander Cadogan and gave him a brief summary of the Department's views regarding admission of new members to the United Nations. I referred to the statement he had made yesterday to Mr. Stettinius that he felt it imperative for this situation to be canvassed between us at an early date and said that we had the same view.⁸⁶ I told him that our long-term objective is membership for all qualified states and our short-term aim to obtain admission this year of as many as possible of those states now eligible. These states we had classified as follows: (A) All the neutrals except Spain; (B) The states which might be termed the victims of aggression and states which were co-belligerents. I then went over in detail the views on individual states contained in a memorandum from the Department which was brought by Raynor.

Cadogan was obviously in general agreement on the procedures we suggested and also as to our views on the specific countries. He seemed surprised at first that our support on Eire would not be all out as in the case of other neutrals but after I had repeated that we had every intention of voting in favor of an application by Eire, he replied that their position might be very close to ours. He gave no indication that Eire would have active British support. In the informal talks which we might have in certain capitals along lines suggested in the Department's memorandum Cadogan thought it would be desirable for us to concert our action and he suggested that we might not be able to get through the entire catalog of states and that it would be useful to work out a schedule of priority. He said that the possibility of an application by Italy had not been mentioned to him by London but he reacted favorably to our suggestion and seemed to feel there might be a good chance of having an application from Italy accepted. On Portugal he expressed the opinion that the British would wish to take the lead in that country but stated very definitely that they would like our support. He will telegraph tonight a summary of our views as to procedure and our views insofar as they are now clarified on individual countries.

Before going to see Cadogan I had gone over the Department's memorandum carefully with Raynor and the Department's views as expressed in the memorandum were followed closely. Sir Alexander Cadogan understood that these views were, although representing official opinion, put forward on this occasion on an informal basis.

NEW YORK, June 11, 1946—3 p. m.

[Received June 11—2: 28 p. m.]

302. Reurtel No. 84, June 5.⁸⁸ Following suggestions are submitted concerning the establishment and organization of the Membership Committee of the Security Council:

1. We believe that July 17 would be the most suitable date for the Membership Committee to convene since the presidency of the Security Council will change on that date. If agreeable, I suggest that we informally indicate this view to the Secretariat. If it were decided that the chairmanship of the Committee should rotate with the Council presidency, the chairman would be a representative of the Netherlands.

2. While we agree in principle that the Committee chairmanship might rotate with the Council presidency, we believe that since the Committee would be in session for a maximum of 6 weeks (unless a question arises during the meeting of the General Assembly), it would be unnecessary to provide for a change in the chairman on August 17. If you concur with this view, may we be authorized to discuss it informally with the other delegations, particularly the Netherlands and Poland?

3. The composition of the Committee is, of course, a matter for the individual members of the Council to decide for themselves, since the US resolution on membership provides that the Committee is to be "composed of a representative of each of the members of the Security Council". In this connection a letter was received from the Secretary General on June 10 which stated in part as follows: "I have the honour to request that you communicate to me, before 1 July 1946, the name of your representative on the Committee to be constituted pursuant to the Security Council's resolution of 17 May 1946."

Because of the political importance which may attach to the deliberations of this Committee I feel that each delegation should appoint its deputy representative or a person occupying a relatively high position. Unless the Department objects, I shall indicate this view to the other delegations, and also inform the Secretary General that I shall be the United States representative. After the Committee commences its consideration of the applications, circumstances may require that I assign another member of the delegation to act in my stead. If this is necessary, I shall, nevertheless, continue to follow the work of the Committee very closely because of its importance.

4. With regard to the procedure to be followed by the Committee in examining applications for membership, it is believed that:

(a) Applications should be examined individually in the chronological order of their receipt. (This would mean that the application of Albania would be the first to be considered by the committee.)

(b) The Committee should examine each application in order to determine whether the applicant state has conformed with the provisions of Article 4, paragraph 1, of the Charter.

(c) The Committee should take into account any written or oral testimony relating to the qualifications of the state seeking membership which members of the United Nations desire to submit for consideration.

(d) The Committee should report its conclusions to the Council not later than August 1 in accordance with the US resolution. It would be preferable to have the report cover the Committee's findings on all of the applications; however, we see no reason for insisting that a single report, rather than individual reports on each of the applications, be submitted, provided the latter are submitted simultaneously.

The report should be as brief as possible but in such form as to prevent any superfluous discussion in the Council.

U.S. URGENT

NEW YORK, June 19, 1946—7:30 p.m.

[Received June 19—6:43 p. m.]

337. I gave the substance of the following telegram to Mr. Hayden [Raynor] over the telephone today.

I had a further discussion this morning with Sir Alexander Cadogan on the subject of new members. He had received instructions from the Foreign Office as well as comments on their attitude on each of the possible candidates.

The Foreign Office appears to be in general agreement with the procedures we had suggested to Cadogan previously (as reported in my No. 257 of May 29). The Foreign Office had the following comments in regard to possible candidates:

Finland, Rumania, Bulgaria and Hungary were covered by the Potsdam declaration and could hardly be considered in the near future.

Italy: They favor Italy's membership, but would stick to the Potsdam provisions, and did not believe the question would arise this summer.

Austria: They would support Austria and hoped the Foreign Ministers Conference could agree on some form of peace settlement soon, so that Austria's application could be entertained. Their position was slightly different from ours in that they did not feel the necessity of bringing Italy in before or at the same time as Austria.

Siam: Britain has already agreed with India to support Siam for membership by the peace treaty of Jan. last and they favor Siam becoming a member. They feel, however, that unless the present difficulties are cleared up, the French are sure to veto a Siamese application.

Afghanistan: They will support.

Albania: They have not yet received assurances which would justify appointment of a Minister and will resist until this is done. However, they want to keep in step with the United States.

Eire: They will not take any initiative but will recognize Eire as having the same rights as any other respectable state. They would adopt a favorable attitude in any review and would support if it came to a vote.

Iceland: They will support.

Muscat: They felt it had little chance at this time.

Nepal: Subject to agreement by India, they would support.

Portugal: They will take initiative; will support in any general review and on a vote. They wish to take the initiative with the Portuguese Govt, but would be glad of our support.

Sweden: They will support.

Switzerland: They will support if Switzerland accepts all the obligations under the Charter, which they understand will require a referendum.

Tibet: An application is unlikely. In any case, the Chinese would veto, as they consider it part of China.

Transjordan: They would support as soon as the treaty between Great Britain and Transjordan is ratified. Sir Alexander feels there is a question with regard to the elimination of the mandate.

Yemen: An application is unlikely at present. In any case they feel consideration should be deferred.

Soviet Republics: They will resist any Russian demand that additional Soviet Republics be made members.

I pointed out that they had not mentioned Outer Mongolia and advised them of the fact that the Russians had stated that they would not be prepared to consider Afghanistan for membership separately from Albania and Mongolia. Sir Alexander expressed no opinion.

After discussion we agreed that we should make a list of the eligible states with whom we might want to consult with regard to their applications. The procedure for proceeding through diplomatic channels with these discussions should be agreed to either in Washington or London. After such consultations, we would then wish to consult informally with the other permanent members of the Security Council here in New York. We agreed to the following list: Afghanistan, Iceland, Portugal, Sweden, Switzerland. We also considered the possibility of adding Transjordan to this list, but did not do so, pending further consideration of the problem of the treaty, of the mandate, and possible difficulties in regard to Palestine.⁸⁹

98. Amdel. Urtel 302, June 11, 3 p. m. 1. Re your paragraph one and your suggestion on chairmanship membership committee in your para two, we feel questions should be settled locally in accordance with views and convenience of all members and not as major issues. In addition to your suggestion and that of rotation with presidency, you may wish consider following:

- (a) Beginning rotation at head of alphabet, with Australia, as Atomic Energy Commission has done;
- (b) Electing one chairman for whole busy period of committee.

⁸⁹ For documentation on the status of Palestine in general and Trans-Jordan in particular, see vol. VII, pp. 576 ff., and pp. 794 ff., respectively.

The United States Delegation was informed by Mr. Lawford of the United Kingdom Delegation in June that the Foreign Office intended to suggest a different procedure from that outlined in this discussion. It was the belief of Cadogan and Lawford that the Foreign Office might propose that shortness of time necessitated a speedier procedure and that a first approach should be made to the other permanent members in New York. This information was reported to the Department in telegram 346, June 21, 3:30 p. m., from New York (501.BC/6-2146).

We particularly suggest alternative (a) as application of rotation principle that avoids further concentration of work on delegation of Council president. If Council continues to create standing committees it may become impracticable to rotate chairmanship of all simultaneously.

Shortness of committee's main period of work seems to make (b) worth consideration also.

2. Your course stated in para 3 is approved.

108. Amdel. We think there are many advantages to concentrating the talks on membership with the British between you and Cadogan in New York rather than talking to the Embassy here or talking in London. Will you be good enough to see Cadogan again and attempt to obtain his concurrence without consulting London again in view of shortness of time to our making informal approaches immediately to Sweden and Iceland. You should tell Cadogan that we, of course, have no objection to the British making their own approaches. Will you also tell Cadogan that as the British do not desire to take the initiative we are considering making an immediate informal approach in Dublin. Also tell him that we hope the British will make approaches to Portugal and Switzerland. You may tell Cadogan we do not plan to approach either of these countries at the preliminary stage. We think it would be better for them to do so in the case of Portugal and our information on Switzerland is that it is quite unlikely that the Swiss will apply this summer. We hope the British will talk to them however. We agree with the British position on Switzerland.

Also please tell Cadogan that we think the talks in New York with the other permanent members should not be deferred until the results of the informal approaches are known and we would be receptive to a Foreign Office suggestion if made for the New York talks to commence almost at once.

In that connection we are reviewing our position on Italy, Austria, and the satellites and may wish to discuss these further with Cadogan.

On other countries discussed in your last meeting with Cadogan we have the following comments for you to transmit to Cadogan:

Siam: Our position on Siam, which you are authorized to impart in your discretion in whole or in part to Cadogan, is fully covered in our 105 of June 22.⁹⁰

Afghanistan: Agree on support. From our point of view feel approach unnecessary as we understand application will be made. No objection to a British approach.

Albania: We are reviewing our position and will advise you further.

Eire: Will vote in favor and as indicated above will probably make an informal approach now.

Muscat, Nepal, Tibet: Please express to Cadogan the hope that applications will not be made at this time.

Transjordan: We think on balance an application now would be premature. There are many complicating factors from our point of view and we would prefer that the matter not come up.

Yemen: Would think better if doesn't come up. If did come up could probably support.

Soviet Republics: In agreement.

Outer Mongolia: Don't wish to encourage or discourage. If should be pressed might be able to support.

We hope Cadogan will agree that it is all right for us to initiate informal approaches immediately without awaiting further London clearance in the cases of Sweden, Iceland, and Eire. On our part we hope they will do the same without coming back to us on Portugal and Switzerland. We would appreciate a telephonic report following your discussion with Cadogan.

SECRET U.S. URGENT WASHINGTON, June 26, 1946—1 p. m.

109. Amdel. Department has reviewed its position on Italy and Austria and continues to feel an effort should be made to obtain their admission to the United Nations this summer. Admission would give peoples of both countries great psychological lift and we feel strongly this is important. We continue to feel also that Austria should not be admitted prior to Italy and that if we should be blocked on Italy that Austria should be dropped.

⁹⁰ See vol. VIII, p. 1026. The U.S. attitude was to favor Siam's application for membership in the United Nations in accordance with the general position of this government toward membership applications, contingent upon Siamese action with respect to settling the question of the disputed areas involving French Indo-China; for documentation on this subject, see ibid., pp. 978 ff.

We recognize that Potsdam gives the Soviets, should they desire to employ it, the strongest kind of an argument that an exception to Potsdam should not be made in the case of Italy. We believe if we propose Italy that we can almost certainly expect a Soviet counter demand for the satellites. We feel if such a counter demand is made and strongly pressed we must be prepared to accept it. This would mean a revision of Potsdam. Its justification is that at Potsdam no one expected it would take such a long time to develop and negotiate peace treaties.

Please review this urgently with Cadogan and request him to ask the Foreign Office to reconsider its position on Italy, Austria, and the satellites. For your own information, if the F.O. does not change its position we will be prepared to drop this matter this summer.

Also please tell Cadogan that while we are not happy over Albania and also lack certain reasonable assurances required to regularize our relations, we continue to feel that if necessary to accomplish our broad program we would reluctantly vote for Albania. We are also somewhat apprehensive over the possibility that it may be necessary to vote for Albania in order to get any state in. If necessary we would be prepared to do this after making a statement as to our unfortunate experience and indicating we are voting in favor in the interest of unanimity in the U.N. Please ask Cadogan to request F.O. to reconsider on Albania.

Pursuant your telephone conversation yesterday we are deferring approach in Dublin until you talk further with Cadogan.

Please impress on Cadogan urgency of these several questions as all should be resolved prior to your talks with other permanent members and these talks should take place almost at once.

WASHINGTON, June 28, 1946—7 p. m.

115. In view of the imminence of your talks with the representatives of the Soviet Union, China, and France on membership, we are outlining below certain suggestions for your guidance and on which we would welcome your comments or other suggestions.

1. The major objective is to find out if vetoes must be expected on specific applications. In this connection, the Soviet Union is probably the key. Hence, we suggest talking first with Gromyko.

2. The result of that talk will indicate the line to take with others and our comments are made with special reference to your talk with Gromyko.

3. We feel it is very important that the impression of a concerted U.S.-U.K. approach be avoided. It would follow that you and Cadogan should not call together for the talks. We believe preferable for you to persuade Cadogan that it would be wise for you to handle the first round of talks by yourself seeing each representative separately but as nearly simultaneously as possible.

4. You should lay on the table Sweden, Iceland, Afghanistan, Switzerland, Portugal, Eire, Italy, and Austria as states in our opinion eligible and well qualified for admission at this time. You would have to admit that we do not know whether or not all of these states will apply but indicate we are confident at least some of them will.

5. We think the conversation initially should be pitched on a discussion as to the qualifications of the states as to eligibility and should descend to a bargaining level only as last resort.

6. We think it would be wise as to above neutrals to refer to Potsdam and assume blandly that they are well qualified to assume obligations of Charter and become members.

7. Incidentally in mentioning name of Sweden you should, in view of assurance given Eriksson,⁹¹ make very clear we are not speaking in any way on behalf of Sweden.

8. On Italy you should stress cobelligerency and assistance rendered United Nations in war and you could refer to recent liberal revision of Armistice terms.⁹²

9. On Austria the strongest argument would be that she was a victim of aggression. Reference should of course be made to the Moscow Declaration on Austria.⁹³ You should attempt to avoid a detailed legalistic discussion as to whether Austria under military occupancy has sufficient control over its foreign relations to carry out obligations of membership. You should stress that if occupying powers agree on membership this could be worked out.

10. During discussion our position on Siam should be outlined. This obviously will present difficulties in French talk. A separate telegram contains our suggestions.⁹⁴

11. When Gromyko mentions Albania we feel you should reply at first that while we would like to vote for Albania it is difficult for us to reconcile her failure to give us requested assurances on treaties with willingness to carry out obligations of Charter. If we received the assurances we would have no difficulty. We feel that by taking this line there is a bare possibility it may result in Soviets persuading Albanians to give requested assurances. If possible, therefore, in first conversation you should avoid conceding on Albania. A separate telegram gives information on types of treaties involved which should be mentioned to Gromyko with the explanation that they are of a type beneficial rather than detrimental to Albania in its foreign relations.

12. Likewise, we think it desirable to defer conceding on Mongolia until after Gromyko is thoroughly "smoked out" and you can evaluate the situation. In Chinese talk you should make a special point of ascertaining their reaction on Mongolia and on Siam.

13. We leave entirely to your discretion when you should indicate we are willing to go along on satellites if raised by Gromyko.

14. If Gromyko or others inquire with whom we are talking, you should reply first with the permanent members and later with other members of Council in order to avoid possible suspicion of Big Five deal. If he asks why, it would probably be appropriate to explain that we have indications that some states which would like to apply are holding back because of fear of a veto but this should be left up to your discretion to be determined on spot in light of tone of conversation.

15. Material in your membership book will provide you with argumentation on the countries we consider presently qualified.

16. In answering questions on other countries, you should follow information in our 108 of June 24.

17. If you desire Raynor to assist in conversations Dept. will make him available.

18. You will note these comments assume agreement with British on Italy, Austria and satellites and if such agreement not reached would of course be changed accordingly.

Memorandum of Conversation, by G. Hayden Raynor, Special Assistant to the Director of the Office of European Affairs (Matthews)

CONFIDENTIAL

[WASHINGTON,] July 1, 1946.

Participants: The Swedish Minister
Mr. Hugh Cumming, NOE
Mr. Hayden Raynor, EUR

The Swedish Minister called this afternoon at his request to discuss the question of a possible Swedish application for membership in the United Nations.

The Minister handed to us the attached excerpts from instructions he had received by mail from Stockholm. He requested answers from us on the three questions listed in the first attachment hereto.

We informed the Minister that the answer to question No. 1 was Yes categorically.

We also informed him that our answer to question No. 2 was Yes. He then developed a thought behind question 2 further following the suggestion in the other excerpt of his instructions and inquired what our position would be if a situation developed in which a motion was made to postpone consideration of all membership applications. We informed the Minister that while we could not tell in advance what position we would take under such a contingency, we hoped that such a situation would not arise.

In answer to question No. 3 we told the Minister that in our view an application received after July 15 could be considered. We added that such an application would, of course, receive our support.

During the course of the conversation we indicated that our objective was to see as many eligible states as desired admitted to the United Nations this year. Also we told the Minister that we were strongly in favor of Sweden's candidacy and would support it actively. We urged the Minister to recommend to his Government that should they desire to apply the application be filed with the Secretary General of the United Nations prior to July 15.

The Minister read to us a telegram he had received from the Swedish Minister in Paris indicating that the Swedes had made similar inquiry of the French Government. The French had replied favorably on questions 1 and 2 and reserved their opinion on question 3. Although the Minister did not admit it, it seems clear that the Swedes have directed the same inquiry to all of the permanent members on the Council.

Before leaving the Swedish Minister smiling broadly and in a light vein, but with evident underlying sincerity, stated that he understood application No. 1 had been received from Albania, application No. 2 from Siam, application No. 3 from the Mongolian People's Republic and that it was suggested that application No. 4 should be from Sweden.

QUESTIONS, ORALLY AND INFORMALLY MADE BY THE SWEDISH MINISTER,
ON JULY 1

Question No. 1: Is the Government of the United States prepared, through its delegates in the Security Council and in the General Assembly of 1946, to vote for the approval of a Swedish application for membership in the United Nations?

Question No. 2: Is the Government of the United States, in case of an affirmative answer to question No. 1, willing to support a Swedish application for membership, without making its attitude dependent upon a positive decision with regard to applications for membership from other nations?

Question No. 3: Could a Swedish application for membership be taken up for consideration and be expected to receive the support of the Government of the United States, even if submitted after July 15?

[Annex 2]

When making a decision regarding application for membership in the United Nations, the Swedish Government, for its guidance, would like to know what attitude the permanent members of the Security Council could be expected to take if Sweden should make such an application. In this respect it must be taken into special consideration that one or more of the members having veto right, although being prepared to vote for Sweden's admission, might combine this question with the admission of one or more other nations. It might thus happen that a member combines the approval of a Swedish application with the admission of another country whose application has caused difference of opinion. Thereby, the result might be, for instance, that all applications are postponed for the time being, although none of the members, as to matter, is opposed to Sweden's membership.

We suggest that the discussion with Gromyko be confined to a sounding out process on the countries listed in paragraph four of our 115, June 28 and Siam. WASHINGTON, July 1, 1946—7 p. m.

5121. Herschel Johnson has been having conversations in New York with Cadogan on question of membership in United Nations. Urgency is great because of July 15 date in Resolution on Membership passed by Security Council. Cadogan referred certain questions raised by Johnson including position of Brit with respect to Italy, Austria, ex-satellites, and Albania, and question whether inquiry should be made as to intention of Irish, to London some days ago and has not had definitive instructions thereon. Please stress urgency of this matter at a high level in Fonoff and urge they send Cadogan instructions on these matters promptly.⁹⁵

*The British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Bevin) to the Secretary of State*⁹⁶

[PARIS,] July 1, 1946.

DEAR JAMES: I have recently been considering the question of the admission of new members to the United Nations Organisation which has been the subject of some discussion between the representatives of our two governments on the Security Council.

I feel very strongly that we should if possible adopt a common policy towards this question and I am in any case opposed to it forming the subject of discussion between the representatives of the five permanent members of the Security Council since I believe this would be likely to lead to some rather confused political bargaining.

I suggest that our governments should agree to tell the governments of Sweden, Portugal, Iceland and Eire that we should be prepared to support their candidature at the next Assembly if they put it forward. We have ourselves been approached by the government of Afghanistan and Trans-Jordan on this subject and are already committed to support them if they apply for membership. We should be very glad if you felt you could do the same.

⁹⁵ In telegram 6472, July 3, 7 p. m., the Ambassador informed the Department that he had seen Under Secretary Sargent in the British Foreign Office that day about the membership question and that Mr. Sargent had said that the matter had been urgently referred to Mr. Bevin in Paris (501.AA/7-346). Mr. Bevin, Secretary of State Byrnes, and the other Foreign Ministers of the Big Five were attending a meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers.

I do not think that Switzerland is worth approaching at present in view of her special position in regard to neutrality and I feel that Nepal, the Yemen, Tibet and Muscat need not be considered for the time being. I think we can also leave over Siam for the present as her candidature does not come up until the 15th July and there may by then have been some new developments in her frontier dispute with France. I suggest finally that our attitude towards Albania should be decided at the last moment before her candidature comes up.

As regards Italy, Austria and other ex-enemy states, I have myself very grave doubts about encouraging their candidatures this year since I feel that any attempt to go outside the Potsdam Agreement would only expose us to reproaches from the U.S.S.R., which would in any case veto such application.

I should very much like to speak to you about all this sometime tomorrow and will get into touch with you with a view to arranging a suitable time. As you know, time is short, as applications have to be in by July 15th.⁹⁷

I checked this morning again with Cadogan to inquire if he had received any new instructions regarding membership. He replied in the negative. I then asked him if he had serious objection to my having an informal discussion on the matter with Gromyko. I said I would not bring him or his govt into the discussion nor would I indicate to Gromyko that I had instructions. Cadogan said he had no objection whatever and would appreciate it if his name and the British position were not brought into the discussion.

I had a private talk with Gromyko this morning, no interpreters or assistants of his being present. He was friendly and apparently frank. I told him that the time when applications for membership in the United Nations would have to be considered by the Membership Committee was drawing very close and that I would be greatly interested to hear any personal views of his which he might be willing to express. I told him that I felt personally and I knew that my govt felt that Sweden, Iceland, Afghanistan, Switzerland, Portugal, Eire, Italy and Austria were in fact eligible and qualified for admission at this time; that we had no idea whether any or all of these states will apply in time but felt certain there would be a few applications at least and recalled to him that there has already been a press report of action taken by the Swedish Parliament to authorize the govt to apply for admission. He volunteered the comment that Portugal is not in the same position as Franco Spain. With regard to the former European neutrals and Iceland, Gromyko's attitude, if I correctly interpreted it, was open-minded and not unfriendly. He said that his govt would not be able to indicate its final opinion on any countries prior to the time when the applications are actually up for consideration; and that in his view, all applications should be considered on their individual merits. He said he felt it was important for some countries to be admitted at this session and referred to Albania. I told him what our position on Albania is and suggested that his own govt or its representatives might be able to give Albania some good advice as to giving necessary assurances on her treaty obligations. Gromyko smiled at this and made a remark about Albania being a sovereign nation. I told him I readily admitted that, but that some great powers frequently advised their smaller friends upon action that might be usefully followed.

In discussing Italy and Austria I agreed without reservation that if these countries are admitted at this time, it would not be in accordance with the Potsdam decisions and that to take such action we would all have to agree on a revision of Potsdam. Gromyko then asked our attitude toward the Balkan states which, he said, were likewise covered by Potsdam. I concurred and said that I had not yet had precise instructions regarding these countries. He then said that whether the parties to the Potsdam Agreement agree to a revision of that agreement or not that in the Russian view admission of Austria and Italy is on all fours with that of Rumania, Bulgaria and Hungary. I admitted to him that under the Potsdam Agreement they were under similar handicaps for action. I expressed the hope, which I said was purely a personal one, that Austria, Italy and the Balkan countries might all be admitted to the United Nations as soon as possible. Gromyko apparently had no information about Afghanistan. He showed some interest, however, and gave no indication that the Russian attitude would be unfavorable. Our attitude in regard to Siam seemed to interest him. He gave no indication of hostility to admission of Siam.

The only country he specifically inquired about was Outer Mongolia. I told him that I had received no information or instructions regarding Outer Mongolia, but said that I felt sure when the application is up we will give it objective consideration. I expressed the personal opinion to him, however, that the admission of Outer Mongolia was not a matter of urgent necessity or desirability and that as it was an entirely new country without established international relations, its application could hardly be considered in the same breath with the application, for instance, of an old established democracy like Sweden, which is ready to make immediate and positive contributions to the work of the United Nations. Gromyko did not dissent from this, and impressed me as being in agreement in his own mind.

When I left Gromyko said he would report the conversation to his government and thanked me for coming. He said he thought the informal discussion had been useful.

“Article 4 of UN Charter.

With respect thereto, Security Council recently adopted following resolution on applications for UN membership:

“1. Applications for membership which have been or may be received by the Secretary General shall be considered by the Security Council at a meeting or meetings to be held in Aug 1946 for this specific purpose.

2. Applications for membership which have been or may be received by the Secretary General before July 15, 1946, shall be referred to a committee composed of a representative of each of the members of the Security Council for examination and report to the Council not later than Aug 1, 1946.”

As long-range goal US Govt interested in universality of membership in UN. Its immediate interest is that as many eligible states as possible become members UN during present year. As FonMin will recall, US Govt has repeatedly indicated to Ice Govt its friendly interest in Ice membership UN and has given assurances that Ice could count on wholehearted support of US Govt in earliest Ice application for UN membership.

According to rules of Security Council an application for membership should be made directly to UN Secretary General and should be accompanied by a declaration of the readiness of state concerned to accept the obligations contained in Charter of UN. The recommendations of UN Security Council on applications for membership will then be submitted to UN General Assembly which, according provisions Chapter IV, Article 20 of UN Charter, meets in regular annual sessions. The session for current year will open on Sept 3, 1946; therefore, an application by Ice for membership in UN should, if possible, be submitted to UN Secretary General before July 15, 1946 and at latest by Aug 1, 1946, if consideration of such application to be given this year.

Accordingly, although US Govt realizes time remaining after elections is short and that Althing not in session, it hopes Ice application will be made by July 15, or at latest by Aug 1.

US Govt would be appreciative if it could be informed whether Ice intends apply for UN membership during current year.

In case FonMin inquires you may inform him that US Govt intends attempt informally to ascertain reaction other Council members to Ice application and will be glad to report results such inquiries to Ice Govt.

A. If Italy and Austria proposed and Soviets countered with satellites we would have to accept satellites.

B. Siam qualified to extent that she concurrently submit whole territorial dispute with France to UN agreeing in advance to accept obligations of pacific settlement including agreement in advance to carry out decision of UN but in any event would vote for if British do.

3373. Secdel 455. In view of application of Trans-Jordan for membership in UN received July 5, we have to establish our attitude without delay and I am sending memorandum to President requesting his views.³ I should appreciate knowing your thoughts in advance of beginning of SC Committee discussion on membership on July 15.

As you are aware, we have had correspondence with Senator Myers regarding Trans-Jordan and he has introduced resolution containing request that executive take no action in any way recognizing Trans-Jordan as separate or independent state and that US representative on UN be instructed to seek postponement of international determination of status of Trans-Jordan area until future status of Palestine as a whole will be determined.

We also have received a long detailed legal argument from Rabbis Wise and Silver⁴ objecting to independence of Trans-Jordan.

Dept was informed in Brit Embassy Aide-Mémoire of June 26 that Trans-Jordan Govt intended to apply for admission to UN in near future; that it had taken this decision on its own initiative; that its application would have support of Brit Govt; and that in view of FO for reasons given in considerable detail Trans-Jordan fully satisfied requirements for membership in UN.

Brit Embassy has also furnished Dept with paraphrase of instructions to Cadogan on subject. He was told to convey gist of foregoing to US colleague in order to persuade him to support Trans-Jordan in SC using following arguments:

“We note that US Govt apparently think they will have to vote for Outer Mongolia in last resort. Transjordan, whose territory and record is open to all world is surely a more respectable candidate than Outer Mongolia, which is a quite unknown factor, and with whom western states have not hitherto been allowed to have any dealings. We think it would be deplorable if Outer Mongolia were admitted and Transjordan were not, and that this would incidentally encourage Soviet Govt to put up a Constituent Republic next year as their price for agreeing to Transjordan.”

Our tentative view is that, although legal position is not clear-cut in view of lack of precedents and differences in interpretation of treaties and other international obligations and can be argued ad infinitum, following considerations are important:

1. Non-applicability to Trans-Jordan of portions of Palestine mandate relating to Jewish National Home since 1922, plus existence of independent Arab Govt in Trans-Jordan since 1923, have resulted in evolution of Trans-Jordan distinct and separate from that of Palestine proper.

2. Assembly of UN, including US, welcomed Brit intention to declare Trans-Jordan independent. Subsequently League of Nations at final session last spring in effect recognized Trans-Jordan independence as accomplished.

3. We could if we desired abstain from voting on question of Trans-Jordan admittance on ground that lapse of time is required to establish its qualifications for UN membership. Our abstention in this case would, if otherwise desirable, be consistent with our long-range objective looking toward clear right of permanent member of Council to abstain from voting on substantive decisions without this constituting veto.⁶ You and Mr. Cohen⁷ are of course familiar with this issue. Brit and Arab States however might well question our refusal to vote for Trans-Jordan in view of our previous agreement to admit two constituent Soviet republics, India and Philippines and our present plan to vote in certain circumstances for admission of Outer Mongolia. (See Deptel 3276 Secdel 412 July 5 pgh 2-c.)

4. Our failure to vote for Trans-Jordan admittance would almost certainly give rise to serious repercussions against us in Arab world and would tend to weaken position of Great Brit and ourselves in Middle East. We feel that in view of international situation we should vote in favor of admission even though such action will arouse storm

1. He has received a telegram from the Chinese Minister for Foreign Affairs regarding the application for membership in the United Nations of Outer Mongolia. The Chinese seem to be disturbed about this because of information they have obtained that a secret agreement exists between Outer Mongolia and Soviet Russia which the Chinese believe would authorize the maintenance of Russian troops in Outer Mongolia. Quo says that his Foreign Minister is of the opinion that China cannot support the application of Outer Mongolia until they know more about the terms of this secret agreement. This agreement they believe may be in violation of the Chinese-Russian treaty⁸ which recognized the status of Outer Mongolia as an independent nation and pledged both China and Russia to support its application for membership in the United Nations. The Chinese Foreign Minister has suggested to Dr. Quo that their information regarding this secret agreement between Outer Mongolia and Russia should be allowed to leak out to the press without its source becoming known. Dr. Quo has not yet, however, acted on this suggestion. Although he spoke with discretion he made it clear that he would welcome expression of opinion and even suggestions for [from?] our government. The Chinese Foreign Minister informed him that the US Government had expressed its willingness to support the application of Outer Mongolia and had even suggested to China that the latter should actively sponsor the application. WASHINGTON, July 15, 1946.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: You will recall that on July 11 we sent a telegram to the Secretary in Paris in which we informed him that in our opinion the United States should vote in favor of the admission of Trans-Jordan into the United Nations and asked for his concurrence. In that telegram we stated that it would be necessary for us to establish without delay our attitude in the matter and that we were sending a memorandum to you requesting your views.

I am attaching hereto a memorandum which discusses in some detail various factors involved in the problem and sets forth the considerations which cause the Department to feel that it would be in our national interests to support the application of Trans-Jordan for membership in the United Nations.

I would appreciate it if you would let me know whether you approve the course of action which the Department suggests. The matter may come up for discussion before the Security Council Committee on Membership within the next few days.

Memorandum for the President

Subject: Position of United States with Respect to Admission of Trans-Jordan to United Nations.

The Kingdom of Trans-Jordan which was recognized by the British Government as an independent country on March 22 of this year, has applied for membership in the United Nations and the question has arisen as to whether or not the delegate of the United States to the Security Council should be instructed to vote for its admission. The decision which the United States Government takes with regard to this matter is certain to have considerable repercussions, both of a domestic and an international character.

Most of the Zionists and the supporters in the United States of extreme Zionism are opposed to the recognition of Trans-Jordan as an independent country and, therefore, to the admission of Trans-Jordan into the United Nations. On the other hand, Great Britain and the Arab world are extremely anxious that the application of Trans-Jordan for admittance shall not be rejected.

[Here follows discussion in some detail of the mandate for Palestine awarded to Great Britain by the Council of the League of Nations on July 24, 1922.^{9a}]

It seems to the Department that in the absence of precedents, and in view of the possibility of various interpretations being placed upon the language used in the Mandate, in the American-British Convention,¹⁰ and in other pertinent documents, the Zionists can produce plausible arguments in favor of their position. The Department is of the opinion, however, that the position of the British from the legal point of view is the more sound. The Department also feels that in making its decision, the Government of the United States should consider the factual and international political aspects of the problem, not solely those of a legalistic nature.

Among these considerations are the following:

1) Trans-Jordan has been a separate and autonomous part of the Palestine Mandate since 1922, and those provisions of the Mandate which related to the Jewish national home have never been applied to territory East of the Jordan.¹¹ The development of Trans-Jordan as an Arab state under a separate Arab government has resulted in the evolution of that territory in a direction quite different from that taken by Palestine proper. Even the most extreme Zionists have in ^{9a} For the terms of the mandate see Foreign Relations, 1924, vol. II, pp. 213-220. For a discussion of the special character of the Palestine mandate, see Marjorie M. Whiteman, Digest of International Law, vol. I, pp. 630 and 631.

¹⁰ The mandate of Great Britain with respect to Palestine came into force on September 20, 1923. On December 3, 1924 the United States concluded with Great Britain a convention (signed at London) defining the rights of United States nationals in Palestine; see Foreign Relations, 1924, vol. II, pp. 212 ff., or 44 Stat. (pt. 3) 2184, or Department of State Treaty Series No. 728. For a discussion of the treaties or conventions concluded by the United States with the mandatory states defining rights of its nationals in the several mandated territories, see Whiteman, Digest of International Law, vol. I, pp. 618 ff.

the past apparently recognized the special and semi-independent position of Trans-Jordan within the Palestine Mandate, and they have not taken exception to Article 25 of the Mandate which sanctioned the exclusion of Trans-Jordan from the provisions relating to the Jewish national home. Furthermore, the population of Trans-Jordan is almost wholly Arab, and, so far as is known, contains no Jewish residents.

2) Great Britain has gone so far in setting up and recognizing an independent Kingdom of Trans-Jordan that it is not now possible for it to change its policy in this respect. Great Britain, therefore, apparently has no choice other than to support the application of Trans-Jordan for admission into the United Nations. If the United States should oppose the admission of Trans-Jordan, a rift would take place between Great Britain and the United States in the Middle East with a resultant weakening of the position of the Western Powers and a decline of Western influence in that area. Such a development would be extremely unfortunate in the present world situation.

3) The government of the United States may find it expedient to vote reluctantly for the admission into the United Nations of Albania and Outer Mongolia, countries which have no greater degree of independence than Trans-Jordan. The Philippines and India are already members of the United Nations. It would be difficult to explain to the Arab world why the United States in such circumstances should oppose the admission of Trans-Jordan, which is a member in good standing of the Arab League. In this connection, it might be pointed out that the British Embassy has furnished the Department with a paraphrase of instructions issued to Sir Alexander Cadogan on this subject. This paraphrase reads in part as follows:

Department is, of course, aware of USSR-MPR treaty of February 27, 1946, providing for mutual assistance (Department State Bulletin June 2, page 968). We do not know of any secret annexes or other treaties specifically providing for maintenance of Soviet troops in MPR.

We feel Chinese anxiety over alleged secret agreement is unrealistic. As Soviet satellite MPR is inescapably bound to and subject to USSR through operation of Soviet secret police and party apparatus. Soviet-MPR treaties, secret or open, are therefore matter of form. Soviet penetration and control of MPR is assumed to be so effective that MPR army may be regarded as under direction of Red Army General Staff and to all intents and purposes a part of Soviet military machine. Thus, unless MPR is confronted by major threat, there is no need for Red Army in MPR. If MPR is "threatened" USSR has right by known treaty of February 27 to send Red Army into MPR.

Soviet military relationship to MPR scarcely differs from that with Poland or Yugoslavia, both of whom are members of UNO. If we resist MPR entry into UNO simply because of its military relationship with USSR it would not be surprising if USSR raised question of British military relationship with Iraq and India or ours with Philippine Republic.

(a) Various neutral States have inquired re our attitude toward their admission, and we believe at least some have made similar inquiries of other Security Council Members including Soviet Union and United Kingdom.

(b) In Chapter X of Potsdam Agreement (see Membership Book, Part III, Item 5¹⁵) three Powers pledged themselves to support applications for membership from those states that remained neutral during war and fulfill qualifications of Article 4 of Charter. Express exception was made in case of Spain. Potsdam Agreement has direct application to present situation in which one neutral has already applied and others have made inquiries allowing reasonable assumption that their submission of applications depends on attitude of Potsdam signatories. We think Potsdam powers obligated in fairness neutrals to interpret Potsdam clearly and remove doubts in minds neutrals.

Memorandum of Telephone Conversation, by the Chief of the Division of Northern European Affairs (Cumming)

CONFIDENTIAL

[WASHINGTON,] July 20, 1946.

Mr. Aminoff, the Counselor of the Swedish Legation, telephoned me this morning. He said that day before yesterday the Soviet Minister in Stockholm had delivered to the Acting Swedish Foreign Minister a memorandum setting forth the Soviet reply to Sweden's inquiry as to the attitude of the Soviet Union towards a Swedish application for admission to the United Nations.

The Soviet memorandum in translation reads as follows:

"The Soviet Government takes a positive attitude towards Swedish admittance to UNO. At the same time the Soviet Government considers it necessary to point out that its representatives can not during consideration of the matter in the UNO refrain from taking into account the attitude of other countries concerning admittance to UNO, also of countries who have already expressed such desires."

Mr. Aminoff said that since the Soviet reply was obviously somewhat cryptic, the Acting Swedish Foreign Minister had asked the Soviet Minister for clarification. The Soviet Minister had replied that he could add nothing to the text of the memorandum which he had just delivered.

Mr. Aminoff said that he would appreciate our transmitting foregoing information in confidence to Mr. Herschel V. Johnson.

NEW YORK, July 29, 1946—7: 45 p. m.

[Received July 29—7: 27 p. m.]

458. I had this morning a talk with Gromyko as suggested in the Department's telegram No. 145, July 20, 11 a. m.

I told Gromyko that several neutral states had made inquiries of us regarding our attitude toward their admission to the United Nations and that we had reason to believe that some at least of them had made similar inquiries of other Security Council members. I referred to Chapter 10 of the Potsdam Agreement and the pledge of the Three Powers to support applications of the neutrals with the exception of Spain who could fulfill the qualifications of Article 4. I said that he must be aware that Sweden and Portugal and possibly other neutral states had hesitated to forward their applications for fear that one of the permanent members of the Council would vote against them. I referred to our talk of July 3 and remarked that I felt certain he understood exactly what my views were on each of the neutral states.

Gromyko said that he still had no instructions as to the attitude which would be taken on applications from these states. I asked him if he would not try to get an indication of Moscow's attitude and said that I thought the neutral countries who were considering applying ought to get some sort of clearance, particularly as there seemed to be no reason to believe that any of them could not qualify under the terms of the Charter. Gromyko registered no objection but said that several states had already made their applications and mentioned particularly Outer Mongolia and Albania. He asked me in what order I thought the applications would be considered in the Membership Committee. I replied that it seemed logical to me for the applications to be considered in chronological order and that the facts found by the Committee on all the applications should be embodied in a single report. I reminded him that at our previous talk, he said all applications should be considered on their individual merits and that I did not see why it was necessary to connect consideration on the application of one state with that of another. Gromyko replied that they were connected in fact. I asked him if he meant "political" and he said yes. I did not disagree with his statement as both of us understood each other perfectly and it seemed unnecessary to get into argumentative discussion. He attempted to argue the case of Albania as a matter of right. I told him I had given him our views on Albania at our earlier meeting, that I hoped Albania would take the necessary steps to qualify, that I personally hoped that all the recognized states of the world could qualify under the Charter and be admitted as soon as possible. I reminded him that the Greeks have indicated objections to Albania and their intention to bring those objections before the Council. He then commented that the Greeks not only disliked Albania but also Bulgaria and the Soviet Union and other countries.

In regard to Outer Mongolia, I said that we know very little about that country and nothing as to whether it is qualified to assume the obligations imposed by the Charter. I said that conditions in Outer Mongolia were unknown not only to us but to the world, to which he replied that the United States and Great Britain could get all the information they wanted about that country. He did not say how. He said that the Soviet Government had statistical evidence to prove that Outer Mongolia in fact had a very good moral claim to membership, that they had participated actively and in considerable numbers in actual combat against the Japanese.

The only country on which he tried to draw me out was Trans-Jordan. I told him our policy in regard to Trans-Jordan had not yet been formulated and that as he well knew it had important political implications in this country.

It is obvious that Gromyko understands our point of view and knows that we understand his. He did not commit himself specifically on any country but he made it sufficiently clear that Russian support of Albania and Outer Mongolia may go to the point of insisting on their admission as a condition for admitting western European states whose intrinsic claims to membership not even he would question. He was very good humored throughout the interview and promised to let me know of anything he got from Moscow. As a parting shot when I was leaving, he said that consideration of Outer Mongolia and Albania would in fact have a connection with consideration of applications of other states. I said: "You mean a political connection?" He laughed and said yes.

491. I had a conversation with Sir Alexander Cadogan in my office this morning, at which Lawford (UK) and Raynor and Popper (USdel) were present.

Sir Alexander said that he regarded Albania and the Mongolian People's Republic (MPR) as clearly unsuited for membership at this time. He told me that his instructions were to oppose the admission of these two states. He felt that if the Russians in retaliation vetoes other candidates, it should be left to them to explain the reason for their actions in the Security Council. Cadogan said that he was not prepared to approve any attempt to make a deal with the Russians. He thought that if any horse-trading was to be done, Gromyko should start it. He had no objection to our talking with the Russians, however, and asked to be informed of the results.

I told Sir Alexander that, in previous conversations with Gromyko, the latter had agreed that political considerations were in fact involved in this matter. I argued that we were desirous that the four European neutrals—Sweden, Iceland, Portugal, and Ireland—should be admitted to the United Nations at this time, and that we would be willing to agree to the admission of Albania and the MPR in order to facilitate the admission of the neutrals. I said that if the neutrals were not admitted now, it might be more difficult to bring them in later, especially since the Soviets might couple their admission with a demand for admission of the Baltic Soviet republics or other unacceptable conditions.

Cadogan reiterated that his present instructions did not permit him to agree to the admission of Albania and the MPR. He thought that the odds were 100 to 1 that the Soviets would not agree to our proposal. Replying to my argument that we might have to pay a higher price in the future, he said he felt he could not yield to that kind of blackmail.

It was his personal opinion that possibly the British might agree to postpone consideration of the Albanian application for one year, but that it would probably be many years before conditions in Outer Mongolia were sufficiently advanced and sufficiently clear to the outside world to permit the admission of the MPR. He said that it was obvious that the Soviets were prepared to link together the applications of Mongolia and Trans-Jordan, and appeared to feel certain that the Soviets had now closed the door to their approval of Trans-Jordan.

We then discussed the procedures to be followed by the Committee. The British feel that it will be impossible to reach decisions on the attitude of the Committee as a whole on the various applications. They would favor a report in which each applicant was considered separately, and in which the various opinions held with regard to each were set forth.

As Sir Alexander prepared to leave, I pressed him as to what his attitude would be if the Russians agreed to admit all the applicants on the basis I had suggested. He replied that in that case he would leave it to London to make the decision and that he could not honestly say that he liked the position we were taking. However, it is my impression that in the last analysis he would reluctantly agree to a settlement on the basis which I proposed to him.

JOHNSON

501.AA/8-1446

Memorandum of Telephone Conversations, by the Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs (Hiss)

[WASHINGTON,] August 14, 1946.

Mr. Raynor called late yesterday afternoon to say that the Membership Committee had yesterday completed its first preliminary survey of applicant states. This now brought up the question of whether we should, as we had been planning, proceed to explain to the Russians our position that we would not be able to vote favorably for Albania and Outer Mongolia unless we were satisfied that states such as Portugal, Ireland, Iceland and Sweden, which we consider more representative of states eligible for application than are Albania and Outer Mongolia, can also be assured of admittance. Mr. Raynor said that Mr. Herschel Johnson had made an appointment with Sir Alexander Cadogan at the latter's request for 10:30 this morning. Mr. Johnson was most anxious that he have the views of Mr. Hickerson, Mr. Henderson and myself by that time.

After talking to Mr. Hickerson²⁰ and Mr. Henderson²¹ this morning I called Mr. Raynor back and said that we still felt the conversations with the Russians would be desirable; Mr. Henderson, in fact, thought they had already taken place. Consequently we felt that Mr. Johnson and Mr. Raynor should try to persuade Sir Alexander of the wisdom of this course and unless Cadogan disagreed we should go ahead. I said that Mr. Hickerson seemed to feel that if Cadogan did disagree we might reconsider the matter in the light of Cadogan's views.

Mr. Raynor thanked me for this information and said that he would let me know in any event the outcome of the talk with Cadogan.

We then discussed briefly the situation as it may develop, whether we do or do not have private discussions on the matter with the Russians. The Russians have said that they will vote for Afghanistan, that they have an open mind as to Iceland and to Sweden, and that they cannot support but reserve the right to consider again Trans-Jordan, Portugal, Ireland and Siam. We agreed that if the Russians should veto Trans-Jordan and/or Siam but not oppose the others we would probably cast our vote in favor of all applicants. However, if we knew that the Russians were going to veto any one or more of the four European neutrals, we would probably take the position that we could not vote in favor of Albania or Outer Mongolia in as much as we considered that an equally representative state or equally representative states would not be able to obtain admission at this time. Mr. Raynor pointed out, as he had last night, that in order to be able to act intelligently we really needed to know what the Russians would do about these four European states in as much as we would have to vote on Albania and Outer Mongolia before the Russians would have to vote on the four European states. This is the chief reason why Mr. Raynor and Mr. Johnson feel that it is desirable that we promptly explain our position informally to the Russians.

Later Mr. Raynor called to say that he and Mr. Johnson had completed their talk with Sir Alexander.²² He said that Sir Alexander does not believe our proposal has much chance of success and expressed his opposition to it, saying that he did not believe in bargaining over principles. However, he also said that he thought the Russians should come to him if they wanted to bargain.

Mr. Raynor commented that he understood in conversation with Mr. Lawford that Sir Alexander's instructions would permit him to go along with us. However, Sir Alexander took the position in his talk with Mr. Johnson and Mr. Raynor that his instructions did not permit him to do so. Sir Alexander said that he had no objection to the United States going ahead with its talks with the Russians provided it was made clear that the British had not agreed to our proposal.

Mr. Raynor said he understood from the foregoing that Sir Alexander wished to vote against both Albania and Outer Mongolia and therefore would not be willing to agree at this stage to support the applications of these countries provided the Russians agreed to support the four European neutrals. However, Sir Alexander said that if the United States should succeed in reaching agreement with the Russians he would report the situation to his government, probably without recommendations.

Mr. Raynor believes that if we succeed in reaching an agreement with the Russians that the British will in fact come along and will not take action that would jeopardize the agreement. He said that Mr. Johnson had concluded his conversation by saying that he planned to go ahead and talk to the Russians anyway.

I spoke to Mr. Hickerson and told him of the foregoing and he agreed that Mr. Johnson should go forward with his proposed talks with the Russians. I notified Mr. Raynor to this effect.²³

²³ Detailed summaries of the completion of the Committee's consideration of the membership applications, and the debate attending the drafting and approval of the report to the Security Council by the Committee, are found in telegrams 495, August 14, 503, August 14 and 506, August 20, none printed (501.BC/8-1446, 501.AA/8-1446, and 501.AA/8-2046.)

said that there is no other reason than the fact that these countries do not have diplomatic relations with Russia, and that in the case of Ireland and Portugal it is clear from their attitudes in the past that they do not desire relations with Russia. The Russian stand on these countries, he said, is one of principle and that he knows of no reason to believe that this attitude may be changed. Sweden and Iceland he mentioned favorably as having diplomatic relations with Russia and as being otherwise eligible from the Russian point of view.

He then spoke warmly about the candidacy of Outer Mongolia, emphasizing particularly the fact that Outer Mongolia had contributed to the limit of her ability in the promotion of the war against Japan. His remarks conveyed the suggestion that the attitude of other countries toward Outer Mongolia might have a bearing on the Russian attitude toward Sweden, Iceland and Afghanistan whose applications on their own merits Russia would be disposed to favor. He did not mention Albania in this connection, although he referred warmly to that country's claim to membership.

I thanked him for his statement and said I regretted his expressed attitude that opinions of other countries about Outer Mongolia should in any way affect decisions on other applications. He countered that remark by saying that Russia felt the merits of Outer Mongolia, despite the primitive state of development of that country, were as fully entitled to consideration as those of countries who had not made any direct contribution to the defeat of Germany and Japan.

Gromyko's remarks gave no reason to doubt that the Russian decision against Ireland, Portugal, Transjordan and Siam is a fixed one. He may have wished, however, to give this impression at the present time in the hope that might influence our attitude. It is not possible from what he said to hazard a guess as to whether Russia will veto all or some of the other applicants if Outer Mongolia is not admitted.

I am communicating the substance of this talk orally to Cadogan and Velloso and I may have talks also with Hsia and Parodi if it seems later advisable.²⁴

We are informed that Siamese Chargé d'Affaires in Washington has visited Soviet Embassy and informed it of his govt's attempt to establish diplomatic relations with Soviet Union. Siamese Chargé d'Affaires states that Soviet Embassy was unaware of these developments and would inform Gromyko. It seems possible, therefore, that Russia may withdraw its opposition to Siam's application. In this event, France might feel its opposition can no longer be maintained.

tion of the interdependence of all peoples and all parts of the world. That great coordinated effort, in which the forces of the various United Nations met the enemy throughout the world, was a lesson to all that took part in it. Now, with the memories of the fighting and the sacrifices already growing dimmer, it is necessary not to forget the fundamental lesson that the interdependence of the world demands its unity in efforts to ensure peace, that the talents and energies of all peoples must be united in an organized effort to this end. If they are not, those left out inevitably become a source of danger or at best an unused resource. If the United Nations is to be successful, no major state can be left out of it any longer than is absolutely necessary.

The conference at San Francisco created the Charter. In the first part of the first session of the Assembly, and the meetings of the other United Nations organs held in London at the time, the structure of the organization was substantially completed. We believe that one of the important constructive acts of the coming assembly meetings should be the logical next step—the expansion of membership to include all presently eligible applicants. The organization cannot afford to function any longer than is absolutely necessary without the cooperation of every qualified state. It should in its very first year seek as great universality as is possible. The General Assembly will not meet again this year after the coming session. It may not meet again for a full 12 months after that session. Unless favorable action is now taken by the Council on applications before it the organization must carry on for some time with a less representative membership than is necessary.

My Government proposes that the Council take broad and far-sighted action to extend the membership of the United Nations now, so far as is consistent with the provisions of Article 4 of the Charter. It accordingly proposes that the Council now recommend to the General Assembly the admission of all the present applicants. We do not disguise the fact that we have misgivings about some of the applicants, especially Albania and Outer Mongolia. Our doubts and questions with regard to these applicants were fully and clearly stated during the proceedings of the Membership Committee.

If there were among the present applicants an entity that was not a State in the international sense, or one that lacked the governmental powers or material means of carrying out the obligations of the Charter, we would not make this proposal. In order to accelerate the achievement of universality of membership we are prepared, on the basis we have suggested, to resolve the questions we have had as to the complete readiness of some applicants to assume the obligations of the Charter. Accordingly, the essence of our proposal is that the Council now, in a spirit of fair-mindedness toward all present applicants and in the best interests of the organization recommend that the Assembly admit them all to membership.

2. In event foregoing proposal fails of acceptance you should find opportunity prior to actual voting on individual cases to make statement ²⁷ along following lines:

I must express the deep regret and grave concern of my Government over the rejection of what is, in our view, the fair and wise way to apply the Charter provisions as to membership. My Government is, however, determined to minimize the adverse results of such rejection to the fullest extent possible. It does not propose to agree to what is in its judgement an arbitrary use of power to bring about the rejection of clearly qualified applicants and the admission of doubtful applicants. That in our opinion would be contrary to the best interests of the United Nations.

The Membership Committee of the Security Council is established pursuant to the Rules of Procedure to provide a means for the examination of applications and report thereon to the Council. It was clearly contemplated that problems seen by the Members in connection with any application should be brought forward in the Committee, so that an opportunity would exist for clarifying the issues and, if possible, removing doubts in advance of the formal proceedings in the Council.

The record of the proceedings of the Membership Committee leaves no room for doubt that the problems connected with the applications of Albania and Outer Mongolia were raised by my Government and others at the proper place and time—that is, during consideration of the applications by the Committee. The difficulties raised pertained directly to the qualifications of the two applicants as measured by the Charter. Since then, little has been brought forward by either of the two applicants or by the Permanent Member that so strongly sponsored their applications, to remove the grounds for our misgivings.

When the applications of Eire and Portugal were considered, no substantial questions concerning their qualifications under the Charter were raised by any Member. The Delegate of the Soviet Union merely stated that the Soviet Union could not support their admission. This attitude has been maintained although it has not been attended by any explanation, in terms of the Charter, of why the two States concerned are thought not to be qualified.

The United States firmly believes that in the admission of new members there should be no compromise with principles. The decision upon any application should be made according to the objective standards of Article 4 of the Charter. These requirements are that the applicant be a State in the international sense, that it be peace-loving and that it be, in the judgement of the organization, able and willing to carry out the obligations contained in the Charter. Whether or not a State qualifies for admission to membership depends upon its possession of those qualifications. It does not depend upon other considerations. It does not depend for example upon the existence of diplomatic relations with any particular Member. It is true that one of the most reliable evidences of statehood is the acceptance of the entity as a State by other States generally, its reception into the international community of States. But this is far from saying that the Charter justifies a Member in making its vote on an application depend on its own direct relations with the applicant's Government.

It would be a manifest injustice and contrary to the best interests of the United Nations if Portugal and Eire, whose qualifications for membership have not been seriously challenged, should be rejected while two applicants concerning which such material doubts have been raised by a number of Members, should be recommended for admission. The result would be to make the membership of the United Nations unrepresentative of the qualified states of the world. The world will not understand why, in its first consideration of new members, the organization had chosen to admit the doubtful and reject the qualified. Such a precedent would be most unfortunate.

My Government must therefore propose that, in the circumstances, the Council not recommend at this time the admission of Albania and Outer Mongolia. We should dislike to cast an adverse vote. However, if other members insist upon bringing these two applications to a vote, we shall have to vote adversely on both applications.

I therefore move that the Council not take action at this time on the applications of Albania and Outer Mongolia.²⁸

NEW YORK, August 23, 1946—7 p. m.

[Received 7:20 p. m.]

515. Reference my telephone conversations this afternoon with Alger Hiss and Hayden Raynor.

At the meeting today on initiative of Secretary General Lie, Parodi, ²⁸ Repeated to the Secretary of State at Paris as telegram 4286, Secdel 726.

Hsia, Gromyko, Cadogan, Lange,²⁹ Sobolev³⁰ and I were present. Informal discussion of membership problem was initiated by Secretary General Lie, who made earnest plea for admission of all 9 candidates. He also implored the members having the right of veto not to exercise this right in the case of applications for membership in the UN. He told the group that he thought use of the veto for this purpose would be damaging to the prestige of the UN and would further lower the esteem of the Security Council in the eyes of the world. Public opinion, he thought, already inclined to the view that the veto had been too frequently employed. He said that he knew that the representatives of the US, Mexico and Brazil favored the admission of all the applicants, and that he believed certain other members of the Council would also. He was also aware of strong objections which had been raised by other states represented on the Council.

I then spoke myself, confirming Lie's statement that the US favored admission of all the applicants, and gave at length our reasons for this view. I told my colleagues that my Government desired me to make our position in this matter clear at the next meeting of the Council, when the report of the Committee on Membership would be considered and that a statement of our views had been prepared which I would then place on the record. I told them that I had copies of this statement with me and would distribute them to all the members present. I expressed the hope that all of them would be able to give the US their support in the Council on this important question. I concluded by saying that I must necessarily reserve the position that my Government would take on applications of individual states in the event that all members of the Council did not give their support to our proposal for admission of all 9 applicants.

Parodi then asked me if I would have to reserve my position in the event that France should be unable to cast an affirmative vote for Siam. He indicated that he wished to vote affirmatively for Siam, but that, pending the outcome of the talks now taking place in Washington between representatives of France and Siam, he would have to oppose the Siamese application under present instructions. I asked him if it would not be possible for him to abstain from voting if it became necessary to vote before the Washington talks had reached a favorable conclusion. He said that he was sorry, but that under his present instructions he would have to oppose the Siamese application.

The general opinion of the group was that the effect of abstention by a member of the Council is not determined. If one of the powers possessing the veto should abstain, the controversial question might therefore arise as to whether it was not a veto by implication.³¹

Cadogan said he was sorry he could not say now what his attitude toward our proposal would be, that he could not give it his support under present instructions, but that he would telegraph London immediately.

Gromyko said that he would state his views on our proposal at the next meeting of the Council.

Cadogan informed me privately afterwards that he regretted that he could not give my proposal his full support, but that his present instructions made it impossible. He also indicated that he did not personally agree. I know that Cadogan feels strongly on the subject of Albania and Outer Mongolia, and believes that those countries should not be admitted at the present time. His views probably reflect those of the British Foreign Office. He said that he would not make any recommendation on our proposals and that if Gromyko should speak at the Council first, indicating that he accepted our proposition, the British then might be able to support it, but that he would not speak before Gromyko. I gathered from this remark that Cadogan feels that if all other members of the Council, including the Russians, accept our proposal, the British Foreign Office may allow him to go along.

Lie informed me privately that Gromyko told him yesterday that he would vote against Portugal and Ireland. Since the meeting this afternoon, I have spoken individually with all the other members of the Council who were not present, and have sent them copies for their confidential information of the statement of our position that I shall make at the next meeting of the Council. The Brazilian, Mexican and Egyptian delegates have assured me of their full support. Van Kleffens³² has not yet committed himself, but talked favorably and said that the thing which troubled him most was the Albanian disregard for treaty obligations. I told him that that point troubled us also, but that for the sake of the broader interest involved in securing admission of all 9 applicants, we would be willing to pass over our very real objections to Albania. I made clear to each of those who were not present at the meeting in Lie's quarters that, if our proposals were not supported by all members of the Council, the US would be compelled to reserve its position on individual states.

517. Reference my 515, August 23, 6:50 p. m. Cadogan came to see me this morning to discuss the membership problem. Although he did not say so specifically, I gathered he has received instructions from the Foreign Office. He said he did not wish to use the veto on our over-all proposition for admission of the 9 applicants but that after I had spoken he would have to make a statement himself expressing the British doubts about Albania and Mongolia. I told him that in the event the French are unable to support Siam, we will consider the possibility of then proposing the admission of 8 members but that final decisions on this point had not been reached. He thought the idea a good one and said that he would have no difficulty in supporting it as a second proposition upon failure of the first. I told him that if we fail on both and voting goes by individual countries that we would have to vote against Albania and Mongolia. His instructions are the same.

Hasluck's³³ attitude is uncertain. I talked with him Saturday and he said that he had telegraphed the text of our proposed statement to Evatt³⁴ with a request for instructions. The Australian attitude is difficult to understand. His reservations on the report of the Membership Committee do not make sense and seem to me contrary to clear stipulations of the Charter. The general Australian attitude seems to be that the voting should be by separate states but I have pressed Hasluck our view that it is desirable to avoid discussion of the merits of each individual case in the Council if we can do so.

I would appreciate the Department's views as soon as possible regarding the proposal that we suggest voting on 8 states if the French have to oppose Siam. I will try to see Parodi before the meeting of the Council on Wednesday. If he still has rigid instructions to oppose Siam and would therefore have to vote against our proposal for admitting all 9 applicants, we might consider whether our initial proposal should not be for 8 applicants, provided Parodi will previously request a postponement of Siam.

Lie indicated his belief that Sobolev who is now in Paris will endeavor to persuade the Soviet Foreign Minister not to oppose our proposal for admission of all 9 members. Gromyko has told Lie that he has definite instructions to veto the applications of Portugal, Ireland and Trans-Jordan. Lie now believes that both Gromyko and Sobolev will use their influence for whatever it may be worth to secure modification of the instructions. In matter of SC consideration membership applications, however, US believes that in general this question is not one in which interests of any one or several members are specially affected; rather it is of interest to all members that applicants meet qualifications set forth Article 4 of Charter. It is for SC and GA to judge each applicant on basis information available.

In present case all Members UN not members of SC were given opportunity on basis Australian resolution adopted by Membership Committee Aug 1³⁵ to present to that Committee factual information on applicants. Furthermore, we assume any further written communications could be brought to attention SC.

Final decision as to membership rests with GA, thus providing forum for full oral presentation views by all members.

We believe Greek request to participate SC discussion more valid than Yugoslav because of Greek assertion it is still in state of war with Albania but do not wish to support participation of either. US, however, does not feel this question of sufficient importance to take a position in matter. Accordingly, you should go along with general sentiment of Council.³⁶

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Chief of the Division of Southeast Asian Affairs (Moffat)

[WASHINGTON,] August 27, 1946.

Mr. Bhakdi³⁹ called by appointment at his request and informed us that the Siamese delegation had decided to submit a letter to Mr. Lie on Wednesday morning requesting postponement of consideration of the Siamese membership application. I inquired the reason for their proposal and what they proposed to say, pointing out that it seemed difficult to avoid either placing themselves in an embarrassing and perhaps ridiculous position (as such action might be construed as an admission that they were not peace-loving) or else as an attack upon the French (which would make their negotiations with the French very difficult if not impossible). Mr. Bhakdi stated it was proposed to state merely that there were conversations in progress between the French and the Siamese in an effort to settle their differences and they were requesting postponement of consideration of their application pending such settlement. He stated further that he thought such move would be of assistance to us because they knew we were anxious to minimize vetoes and to them because this course of action had been decided prior to the delegation leaving Bangkok. He explained that Siam was determined to avoid a French veto because the reaction in Siam to a veto would be so serious that border incidents and anti-French feeling would inevitably increase. The French would use such incidents to attack the good faith of the Siamese Government and by pointing to such incidents injure the Siamese position.

I explained that Prince Svasti had mentioned at lunch time that Bhakdi would be in to inquire our views regarding such a Siamese move and two or three of us personally had been giving thought to various moves which might be made; that these were purely personal thoughts and not Department views. I explained confidentially the proposed American resolution in which our interest favoring universality was so great that I thought we would be willing to have Siam temporarily excluded from the resolution if by such action individual voting on other countries could be avoided. I explained that there seemed to us to be three procedures by which this could be accomplished: that it was possible the French might move to postpone consideration of Siam, we might make such a motion, or the Siamese might request such postponement. I reiterated that this proposal had nothing to do with Siam qua Siam. I then pointed out that if our resolution was in any event defeated and there were individual votes taken on each country, doubtless there would be numerous vetoes.

It seemed to us in that event that possibly our good offices, if both the Siamese and French approved, might be used to urge a postponement of consideration of the Siamese application in order not to jeopardize the negotiations. He stated that if that situation should arise the Siamese for their part would appreciate such exercise of good offices by the United States.

I inquired whether in any motions for postponement the Siamese would prefer a fixed date not later than the termination of the General Assembly meeting or an indefinite date which, if the conversations were not concluded before the end of the General Assembly meeting, would result in a postponement of action on their application for a year. Mr. Bhakdi stated that the Siamese would prefer an indefinite postponement and then explained that the French appeared to consider that their potential veto or support of the Siamese membership application was a trump card in their negotiations. This, he said, was not so. Siamese membership in UN is not so important to Siam as to warrant their giving way to the French as the price of such admission.

I inquired at least twice of Mr. Bhakdi whether the Siamese decision to withdraw its complaint had definitely been decided upon and he replied in the affirmative. I stated that we would consider further the various possibilities which we had discussed and that I would telephone him that evening any views which the Department might have on the various possibilities which I had outlined. I suggested that Mr. Konthi ⁴⁰ get in touch with Mr. Raynor in New York before he presented the Siamese letter to ascertain any very late developments.

After conferring with Mr. Hiss and Mr. Wallner,⁴¹ I telephoned Mr. Bhakdi in the evening that it was the view of the Department that the decision as to whether Siam would request a postponement of consideration of its membership application was one which the Siamese, after consideration of the advantages and disadvantages to themselves, must make solely from their own point of view. I said the Department would appreciate knowing definitely what action the Siamese decided upon so that it might decide what action if any it wished to take. I also said that the Department thought that if the Siamese decided to request postponement the French should be so informed and that if the Siamese did not wish to tell them directly we would be willing, if authorized by them, to have Mr. Raynor inform M. Parodi.

⁴⁰ Mr. Konthi Suphamongkhon was in charge of the special Siamese delegation that was negotiating with the French regarding the border disputes.

⁴¹ Woodruff Wallner, Acting Assistant Chief of the Division of Western European Affairs.

Later that evening in the course of conversation Mr. Bhakdi informed me that the Siamese delegation had decided to present the note to Mr. Lie requesting postponement of the membership application. The note would be along the lines he had indicated in the afternoon. Mr. Bhakdi also stated that the Siamese would be glad to have Mr. Raynor inform M. Parodi of their decision.

The US believes Siam is qualified for membership in the UN now. We recognize however the special character of Siam's case in that (a) question of its continued possession of territories gained through Japanese aggression is material to its qualifications for membership, and (b) this question is now subject of special negotiations at Washington between the two Governments concerned. We believe these negotiations should and can succeed in the immediate future. [WASHINGTON,] October 4, 1946.

POSITION OF THE UNITED STATES CONCERNING THE RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE SECURITY COUNCIL ON THE ADMISSION OF NEW MEMBERS TO THE UNITED NATIONS

THE PROBLEM

Of the nine applications for membership thus far presented to the Organization, three have been acted upon favorably by the Security Council and transmitted with its recommendation to the Assembly for final action. These three applicant States are Afghanistan, Iceland and Sweden. One applicant (Siam) requested postponement of consideration of its application, two applications (Albania and the People's Republic of Outer Mongolia) did not receive seven affirmative votes in the Council, and three applications (Eire, Portugal and Transjordan) were vetoed by the Soviet Union.

The General Assembly, which has the final decision on the admission of new members will in any case have its first occasion not only to act on applications but also to develop general policies and express its views on the subject of membership as a whole. General dissatisfaction over the results of the action of the Security Council on membership applications may be reflected in proposals in the Assembly.

Under present procedure, each membership application is referred by the Secretary-General to the Security Council for consideration. The Council, if it approves the application, makes a favorable recommendation to the General Assembly, which decides finally whether or not to admit the applicant to membership. The Australian Government may propose a change of procedure whereby membership applications will be submitted first to the Assembly, referred by it to the Council for a recommendation, and acted upon finally by the Assembly upon receipt of the Council's recommendation. It is not clear whether or not this proposal is designed to provide a means of eliminating the possibility of a veto of membership applications in the Security Council.

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. We should support and vote favorably on the applications of Afghanistan, Iceland and Sweden.

2. We favor thorough study and debate, looking toward the adoption of suitable resolutions by the General Assembly on the membership problem as a whole, including the criteria for admission, and the policies and procedures of the Organization with respect to membership.

3. We see no particular value in Assembly consideration at this time of the applications rejected by the Security Council—those of Albania, the Mongolian People's Republic, Transjordan, Eire and Portugal. We should express this point of view but should also state that we do not oppose such consideration.

4. In case the Assembly should vote to consider any of the above mentioned applications, any U.S. statements on those applications would be made in the light of the circumstances then existing and of our previous proposals in the Council.

5. Any proposals involving questions concerning constitutional aspects of the Soviet veto of certain applications on grounds not found in the Charter should be considered primarily in connection with the other proposals on the general problem of the veto.⁴⁵ However, our objections to the wisdom of these Soviet vetoes may be expressed wherever pertinent during consideration of membership questions.

6. We should favor full discussion of, but should not support, an Australian proposal, if presented, for adoption of a fixed procedure whereby all membership applications should be considered first by the Assembly, referred by it to the Security Council for a recommendation, and acted upon finally by the Assembly after receipt of the recommendation.⁴⁶

DISCUSSION

1. Position Taken by U.S. Toward Membership Problem Thus Far.

(a) General

Article 4 of the Charter provides:

“1. Membership in the United Nations is open to all other peace-loving states which accept the obligations contained in the present Charter and, in the judgment of the Organization, are able and willing to carry out these obligations.

“2. The admission of any such state to membership in the United Nations will be effected by a decision of the General Assembly upon the recommendation of the Security Council.”

This Government has strongly espoused the principle that the United Nations must, in order to be fully effective, attain as broad and representative a membership as possible in the shortest possible time. It has taken a series of steps to further this end.

It proposed a resolution, which was adopted by the Security Council on May 17, 1946 providing in substance that all applications received up to July 15 (a date subsequently postponed three weeks) be considered together by a Committee of the Security Council and that the Council itself act upon all these applications in time to make recommendations thereon to the General Assembly at this session. In appropriate cases, the Department informed non-member governments of its willingness to support applications for membership submitted by them.

In the proceedings of the Membership Committee of the Security Council it expressed its support for Afghanistan, Ireland, Portugal, Iceland, Siam and Sweden. It reserved its position with respect to Transjordan and, while declaring that it had an open mind toward the applications of Albania and the Mongolian People's Republic, expressed doubts concerning the qualifications of those two applicants for membership.

In the meeting of the Security Council on August 27[28], the U.S. Representative made a strong declaration in favor of universality of ⁴⁶The substance of this paper was adopted to constitute virtually the whole of a position paper drafted by the United States Delegation to the General Assembly and entitled “Admission of New Members to the United Nations”, October 28, not printed (IO Files, document US/A/C.1/8). For certain changes made, to bring the document up to date, and to reflect the thinking of the Delegation as expressed in a Delegation meeting on October 29, see minutes of the October 29 meeting, infra.

membership and proposed a resolution providing for a favorable recommendation upon all applicants but Siam, which had requested that consideration of its application be postponed. In proposing this resolution, the American representative stated that while this Government continued to have misgivings concerning the qualifications of Albania and Outer Mongolia it was prepared, in the interest of helping the Organization to make as rapid strides as possible toward universality of membership, and applying the terms of the Charter in a broad and fairminded way, to resolve its questions with regard to some applicants in case the other members of the Council would join in the proposed action. It was made clear that in case our proposals should not be accepted the position of the U.S. toward each application was reserved. The resolution was opposed by the Soviet Union and Australia, and in the voting upon individual applications which ensued, only the applications of Afghanistan, Iceland, and Sweden were unopposed. Albania received five votes and the Mongolian People's Republic six, these applications being thus rejected by lack of the necessary seven votes. The Soviet Union vetoed the applications of Transjordan, Eire, and Portugal on the expressed ground that it had no diplomatic relations with these applicants. This ground is, of course, not found in Article 4 of the Charter and is hence objectionable as a matter of policy if not contrary to the Charter.

Poland joined the Soviet Union in voting against Transjordan and Portugal. Australia abstained from all votes on individual applications.

As a result of these votes, the Security Council made the following recommendation to the General Assembly :

The Security Council, having received and considered the report submitted by the Committee on the Admission of New Members regarding applications for membership in the United Nations presented by Albania, Mongolian People's Republic, Afghanistan, Transjordan, Ireland, Portugal, Iceland, Siam and Sweden.

Having considered in the course of its debate each one of the above mentioned applications, and having taken due notice of the statements of opinion of the members of the Security Council in regard to those applications, recommends to the General Assembly that it admit to membership in the United Nations the following applicants:

Afghanistan
Iceland
Sweden

A special report on the admission of new members is being made to the Assembly by the Security Council. The first part of this report contains the recommendations; the second summarizes the Council's proceedings on the subject.

(b) U.S. Position Toward Individual Applications Recommended by the Security Council.

Afghanistan

In response to an inquiry by the Afghan Government the Department stated in May that in its opinion Afghanistan fulfilled the qualifications for membership and that this Government intended to lend its wholehearted support to Afghanistan's application. Similar inquiries of the British, French, Indian, Chinese and Soviet governments elicited favorable responses except that the Soviet Union stated that Afghanistan's application could be considered only in connection with those of Albania and Outer Mongolia. The Afghan Government applied by telegram dated July 2, 1946, declaring that it was prepared to accept the obligations contained in the Charter.

It is our view that Afghanistan is fully qualified for membership. Its status as a state is unchallenged, it conducts its own foreign affairs, maintains normal diplomatic relations with about a dozen states, and has succeeded in maintaining its independence. It observed a scrupulous neutrality during the war. It is believed that membership in the United Nations would serve to minimize the possibility of difficulty with Afghanistan's neighbors and of threats to Afghanistan's independence.

During the proceedings of the Security Council's Membership Committee and of the Security Council itself no objection to Afghanistan's admission was expressed by any Government. The U. S. stated its support for Afghanistan's application.

Iceland

Iceland's contribution to the success of the United Nations in the struggle for the North Atlantic sea lanes gave it from the start a close relationship to the United Nations. This relationship was recognized in the invitations extended to Iceland, as a nation associated with the United Nations, to participate in such conferences as those pertaining to the Food and Agricultural Organization, UNRRA, and Bretton Woods. Upon the inquiry of the Icelandic Government in September 1945 this Government stated that it would warmly support Iceland's admission. In July 1946 this Government informed the Icelandic Government that any application for membership should be submitted very shortly in order to secure membership this year, and inquired concerning Iceland's intentions in this respect. The Icelandic Government convoked the Parliament which on July 29 adopted a resolution authorizing an application for membership. This application was filed with the Secretary-General on August 2.

In the consideration of the resolution by the Parliament, the question of major interest concerned the scope and nature of the obligations, under Article 43 of the Charter, to grant bases or other assistance to the forces of the United Nations. Considerable opposition was expressed to the grant of bases. Although Iceland's application was made without reservations or conditions, intimations were given to several governments, including that of the United States, of opposition to the grant of the use of Icelandic territory for military purposes.

This Government has consistently taken the position that Iceland, as an independent and peace-loving state, is fully qualified for membership and that it is able to make a useful contribution to the United Nations.

The United States supported Iceland's application strongly in the Security Council.

Questions.

Little doubt could exist concerning Sweden's qualifications for admission to membership. In July, the United States and British Governments indicated their willingness to support Sweden's application. The Swedish Government then inquired concerning the attitudes of the other permanent members of the Council and received indications of support although the Soviet Union indicated that its attitude toward Sweden would depend upon the attitudes of other Governments toward Soviet candidates for admission. The Swedish Government made application on August 9. No question was raised in the Membership Committee or in the Council concerning its qualifications.

This Government is convinced that as a member of the United Nations Sweden will be able to make an outstanding contribution.

2. Support for Declaration of Policies by Assembly on Membership Questions.

This Government is of opinion that since the General Assembly has the final decision on the admission of new members, it should play as influential a role as possible in determining the criteria for admission and the general policies of the Organization toward the matter. Consideration of the subject at the first part of the first session, at London, was discouraged in order to concentrate on the task of setting up the Organization. The Assembly has, accordingly, not yet dealt with membership questions. It is believed that we should encourage and support any reasonable moves to have the General Assembly give study to the subject of membership and, to the fullest possible extent, elaborate its views and policies with respect to the criteria for admission, to the basic policies of the Organization toward new members, and to the procedures of the Organization for giving effect to those policies.

Such moves may be given impetus by general dissatisfaction with the action of the Security Council on the nine membership applications received thus far. In particular, the action of the Soviet delegate in vetoing the applications of Eire, Portugal and Transjordan in the Security Council on the non-Charter ground that it had no diplomatic relations with those countries was sharply criticized by the Representatives of Australia and other Governments and it is not unlikely that an issue will be made of this matter in the Assembly. The Australian delegate stated in the Council on August 29 that “our Delegation feels sure that if it should be necessary for this Council to report to the General Assembly that Membership in the United Nations has been denied to an applicant State for some reason which lies entirely outside the Charter of the United Nations, then that is a matter to which the General Assembly must give the very closest and the most careful consideration.”

No concrete proposals designed to remedy the effect of the proceedings in the Security Council have yet been made. However, it would not be surprising if the Assembly were asked to consider and declare its views on the rejected applications with a view toward adoption of a resolution requesting reconsideration of certain applications by the Council. Again, it might be proposed that the Assembly state its views as to the criteria which under the Charter should be applied in the consideration of membership applications. In general, it seems likely that the tendency of the Assembly will be to support the basic objectives for which this Government has contended in the Security Council, namely, the admission of all qualified States and the exclusion of entities that clearly are not qualified. However, since further progress toward our objective of securing the admission of all qualified States depends upon the attitude of the powers on the Council, we have no specific proposals to make in the Assembly. We wish to leave the initiative in the Assembly to other Governments, but to lend general support to a vigorous exercise by the Assembly of its functions in relating to the membership question. We should naturally favor such elaboration of the criteria for membership as may make more difficult the admission of applicants that lack the qualities of statehood.

3. Assembly Consideration of Applications Rejected by the Security Council.

It might be proposed that the Assembly consider the applications rejected by the Security Council—those of Albania, Mongolian People's Republic, Transjordan, Eire and Portugal—with a view toward an Assembly request that the Security Council reconsider its action in any of these cases. In principle, there would appear to be no objection to this, assuming that such consideration would be agreeable to the applicant States. The status of the applications and the desires of the applicants since the action of the Security Council are not clear. However, it would seem doubtful whether any such request from the Assembly would be heeded by the Council unless any current Soviet candidates were mentioned favorably in the request. Thus if, for example, the Assembly should after considering the applications adopt a resolution stating that Eire, Portugal, and Transjordan appeared to have the qualifications for membership but that Albania and the Mongolian People's Republic were doubtful and requesting Council action in accordance with these views, the Soviet Union could hardly be expected to agree. It would be preferable for the Assembly not to embark on any such action unless there were reasonable prospect of securing a vote in the Security Council in accordance with its objective.

4. U. S. Position on Rejected Applications.

The decision as to the position which this Government might make with regard to individual applications in the event that the Assembly should vote to consider them, would need to be postponed until all the circumstances became clearer.

In the Security Council, the U.S. proposed the admission of all applicants in order to secure approval of the maximum number of qualified members. In so doing, it stated clearly that it had certain doubts about the qualifications of Albania and the Mongolian People's Republic and that, in case the broad proposal were rejected, it reserved its position with regard to individual applications. When the proposal was rejected by the Soviet Union, the U.S. representative voted in favor of Eire, Portugal and Transjordan and voted against Albania and the Mongolian People's Republic.

Proposals looking toward universality of membership may be presented and strongly supported in the Assembly. If they are, this Government can refer to its Council proposal and state its support for the general principle. However, there would appear to be no reason why any doubts expressed by the United States in the Council concerning the qualifications of any applicant should not be repeated if still deemed valid at the time.

The Membership Book contains detailed background and policy data on each of the States that applied.⁴⁷

5. Soviet Veto of Membership Applications.

Remarks of the Australian and Netherlands representatives in the Council concerning the Soviet veto of membership applications suggest that proposals relating specifically to this use of the veto might be made. Thus, the Netherlands representative mentioned the possibility of a request for an advisory opinion from the International Court of Justice on the subject. However, two proposed resolutions concerning the veto are already on the provisional agenda and their consideration should involve study of the veto problem as a whole by Committee I. It is believed that any proposals raising constitutional questions concerning the veto could be considered most usefully as part of this broader study. This does not mean that we should not express, in connection with discussions of the membership question, our general opposition to the Soviet veto. However, it would not be desirable, in present membership discussions, to take a definite position on the legal aspects of these vetoes.

6. Australian Views Concerning Membership Procedure.

The Australian Government has on various occasions expressed its adherence to a novel interpretation of Article 4 of the Charter. According to this interpretation, membership applications should appropriately be submitted first to the General Assembly for a decision as to whether or not they should be "entertained", thereupon referred to the Security Council for its recommendation and then returned to the Assembly for final action. The Australian Government made a reservation in the Membership Committee of the Security Council and in the Security Council itself that the fact that an application for membership had or had not been considered by the Committee (and presumably by the Council) should not exclude such application from consideration by the General Assembly. It abstained from all votes on the individual applications in the Council. It has given other indications that it will present these views, possibly in the form of a concrete proposal, to the coming Assembly. It is not yet clear where, if at all, the Australian proposal will be presented. It has not been placed on the agenda. Since it relates to procedure, it may possibly be offered to the subcommittee of Committee VI appointed to consider revisions of the Assembly's provisional rules of procedure. In any case it seems likely to be discussed generally in connection with membership questions.

Since the proposal has not been submitted in concrete form, the following discussion is necessarily general and tentative in character. It has not been made clear how this procedure is thought to strengthen the role of the Assembly in the membership question. The procedure might, however, conceivably be proposed as a method of circumventing the veto on membership applications. Such use would depend on the theory that the Council's "recommendation" might be either favorable or adverse and that the Assembly could accept or reject either type of "recommendation". Thus, the Assembly might consider applications in the first instance, expressly request recommendations (either favorable or adverse) from the Security Council on each application, and finally accept or reject such recommendations if and when received, voting to admit such applicants as it might consider qualified.

However, the records of the preparatory work which led to the adoption of Article 4 of the Charter indicate clearly that it was the design of the framers of the provision that the Assembly should not be able to admit an applicant State to membership without favorable action by the Security Council. Moreover, when the Australian representative in the Security Council presented the Australian plan as an argument for postponement of adoption of the Council's provisional rules of procedure on membership, the Chinese, Mexican, United Kingdom and Soviet representatives clearly stated their understanding that the Assembly can admit an applicant to membership only if favorable action on the application by the Council also takes place. In addition it should be noted that the Security Council could, simply by refusing to make a negative recommendation on an application of which it did not approve, remove every possibility of final Assembly action on the application. It does not appear, therefore, that the adoption of the procedure outlined by Australia would provide a means of eliminating the veto of membership applications.

The proposal may, however, be designed not to remove the veto from the membership question but simply to vest more control over the matter in the Assembly by providing that the Assembly take both the initial and the final steps in handling an application. This might be thought to afford some insurance against "horse trades" in the Security Council the results of which the Assembly could only accept or reject. It may be thought, further, that such a procedure would facilitate consideration of applications on their merits. While, however, there is nothing to restrain the Assembly from considering membership applications at any stage, a fixed procedure requiring double consideration of each application by the Assembly would be cumbersome and time-consuming, and there would be no assurance that it would bring substantial improvement.

The Provisional Rules of Procedure of the Assembly and of the Council, adopted by the respective bodies, both clearly reflect the intention that the Assembly will ordinarily act to admit an applicant only after a recommendation has been received from the Security Council. When the Council's draft rules of procedure drawn up by the Committee of Experts were considered by the Council, the Australian representative proposed postponement of their adoption on the ground that applications should be considered first by the Assembly.

His proposal was rejected 10-1, after various representatives had stated their preference for the draft rules.⁴⁸

It would appear that adequate grounds for U.S. support for the Australian proposal have not been shown.

Admission of New Members to the United Nations

Mr. Sanders⁴⁹ reminded the Delegation that the first two recommendations in the position paper on the Admission of New Members to the United Nations (US/A/C.1/8)⁵⁰ had been approved on October 22. It was desirable to have the Delegation's approval of the remaining recommendations in order that position could be clear when the matter came up for discussion early in the meeting. Mr. Sanders then read the remaining recommendations on recommendations as follows: (US/A/C.1/8, pp. 1-2).

"3. We see no particular value in Assembly consideration at this time of the applications rejected by the Security Council—those of Albania, the Mongolian People's Republic, Transjordan, Eire and Portugal. We should express this point of view but should also state that we do not oppose such consideration. (None of these countries could in any case be admitted without prior approval by the Security Council).

"4. In case the Assembly should vote to consider any of the applications mentioned in (3) above, any U.S. statements on those applications would be made in the light of the circumstances then existing and of our previous proposals in the Council.

"5. Any proposals involving questions concerning constitutional aspects of the Soviet veto of certain applications on grounds not found in the Charter should be considered primarily in connection with the other proposals on the general problem of the veto. However, our objections to the wisdom of these Soviet vetoes may be expressed wherever pertinent during consideration of membership questions.

"6. We should favor full discussion of, but should not support, an Australian proposal, if presented, for adoption of a fixed procedure whereby all membership applications should be considered first by the Assembly, referred by it to the Security Council for a recommendation, and acted upon finally by the Assembly after receipt of the recommendations.”

Senator Connally said that offhand he could not approve the last sentence of paragraph 5. He did not think it wise that if the Security Council voted properly that the General Assembly should raise objection unless something more vital were involved than appeared to be the case.

Mr. Sanders pointed out that the Soviet objection to the candidates whom they had vetoed had been that the U.S.S.R. had no diplomatic relations with those states. The United Kingdom had taken the position that this was an improper use of the veto under the Charter. It was possible that the United Kingdom would raise the question.

Senator Vandenberg wished that the sentence might be revised to point out that there was no objection to the Security Council's action as such, but to the Soviet use of the veto. Mr. Dulles pointed out that the fact was that Article 4 of the Charter stated that membership in the United Nations was “open to all other peace-loving states which accept the obligations of the Charter, and in the judgment of the Organization, were able and willing to carry out these obligations”. It was mandatory to admit to the United Nations those states that met these tests. Extraneous grounds should not be introduced as a test for membership. Thus the question was whether the veto had been correctly used in the face of Article 4.

Mr. Sandifer said that it would be possible to word the sentence in question more explicitly. Senator Austin suggested that this be done.

Mr. Dulles inquired why the United States had voted against Outer Mongolia. Mr. Taylor replied that adverse vote had been cast since one government which we thought was more qualified than Outer Mongolia had been opposed by the Soviet Union, and because so little is known about that country. Chiefly, he said it was because so little was known about Outer Mongolia which only had diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union. Since there was no case made for it, it could not be certain Outer Mongolia could carry out its obligations.

Mr. Foote⁵¹ pointed out that the United States said it would be willing to waive its doubts in the interests of the principle of universality provided objection was not raised to other candidates. However, once the Soviet veto had been exercised, the United States had not felt it could vote for Outer Mongolia.

⁵¹ Wilder Foote, Director of Information, United States Delegation to the United Nations.

Senator Connally inquired whether he was correct in believing that the Russians gave as their only reason the lack of diplomatic relations. He was assured that this was the case.

Senator Austin polled the Delegation on accepting the proposition that whenever pertinent our objection to the wisdom of the Soviet vetoes on the basis the applicant states had no diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union should be expressed. The Delegation unanimously approved this amendment to recommendation 5, (US/A/C.1/8, p. 2).

In discussing paragraph 6 (US/A/C.1/8, p. 2) of the recommendations on the Australian proposal on membership, Senator Connally observed that Australia could not maintain this position because it was clearly against the Charter. Mr. Sandifer remarked that the Australians had a novel interpretation of the Charter, that both the initiative and the final action in regard to membership was in the hands of the General Assembly. Senator Vandenberg remarked that the Australians wanted to amend the Charter. Senator Connally agreed that it was clear that the Charter required the Security Council to act first. Mr. Raynor remarked that Australia had no support for this view, but had a blind spot on the Assembly's authority.

Senator Austin stated that certainly the United States Delegation would adhere to the letter and spirit of Article 4 of the Charter. Senator Connally said that he would prefer that recommendation 6 should state that "We do not object to" rather than "We should favor" full discussions. There was no objection to this change, and with it the recommendation was approved.

[Here follows discussion of another subject.]

Editorial Note

The General Assembly on October 31 referred the question of new members to the First Committee. That committee's recommendations were transmitted to the General Assembly in three reports, one on November 9 (United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, Second Part, First Committee, page 318, annex 6; hereafter cited as GA(I/2), First Committee) and the other two on November 19 (United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, Second Part, Plenary Meetings, pages 1493 and 1494, annex 39 and pages 1494 and 1495, annex 40, respectively; hereafter cited as GA(I/2), Plenary).

The first report, on the admission of Afghanistan, Iceland, and Sweden, recommended favorable action and the draft resolution accompanying the report was adopted by the General Assembly with one change on November 9; the representatives of the three countries were seated on November 19. The second report recommended to the General Assembly a draft resolution which asked the Security Council to reconsider those applications that the Council had examined but on which it had made no recommendations; the General Assembly adopted this resolution unanimously on November 19. In its third report the First Committee recommended a draft resolution in which the General Assembly would request the Security Council "to appoint a Committee to confer with a Committee on procedure of the General Assembly, with a view to preparing rules governing the admission of new Members which will be acceptable both to the General Assembly and to the Security Council"; this was adopted by the General Assembly on November 19 by 32 votes to 9 with one abstention, the United States voting negatively.

Throughout the deliberations of both the First Committee and the General Assembly the United States Delegation followed closely the policies established in the position papers of October 4 and October 28, supplemented by a Departmental telegraphic instruction of November 7 (telegram 275, November 7, 6 p. m., to New York, (501.BB/11-446)) which set forth this Government's judgment that a proposal by Australia was incorrect in claiming for the General Assembly primary and final responsibility in the admissions process. In the same telegraphic instruction the Department also restated its objection to vetoes of membership applications "on grounds not found in [the] Charter", a principle invoked by Senator Connally subsequently in the First Committee on November 11 when certain states attempted to fix the attitude and conduct of an applicant state during the Second World War as a criterion of acceptability for membership (GA (I/2), First Committee, pages 321-323).

Memorandum by the Former United States Representative to Albania (Jacobs) to the Deputy Director of the Office of European Affairs (Hickerson)

[WASHINGTON,] November 14, 1946.

For the following reasons it is believed that the United States should oppose the admission of Albania to UN when consideration of that question comes up again before the Security Council upon recommendation made by the General Assembly on November 11, 1946:

1. The U.S. opposed the admission of Albania during the Security Council's consideration of Albania's application in August, for the reason that the present regime in control of the country has failed to meet its international obligations by steadfastly refusing to recognize the treaties in existence between the U.S. and Albania when Italy invaded Albania on April 8, 1939. The U.S. was prepared, however, as proposed at the meeting of the Security Council on August 28, 1946 to agree to Albania's admission under the "rule of universality".

2. Since the occasions referred to above, Albania has renewed its refusal to recognize the aforementioned treaties in Prime Minister Hoxha's note of August 13, 1946 to the U.S. Mission at Tirana (although it did accept multilateral treaties) and, as a result of this renewed refusal and for other reasons, the Department has now withdrawn its Mission from Albania.⁵²

3. The withdrawal of the Mission referred to above constitutes a "rupture" of relations of sufficient gravity to warrant not only adherence to the Department's previous policy of opposing Albania's admission but also the withdrawal of our offer to agree to admission under the rule of universality.

4. The Secretary has indicated his unwillingness to recognize the regime in Albania at the present time even if it should agree to the continued validity of the treaties (Delsec's telegram to Department no. 968, September 20, 1946).⁵³ If we should now agree to Albania's admission to UN and the regime suddenly agrees to the treaties, it would be most difficult for the U.S. to refuse to recognize the regime and exchange diplomatic representatives.

5. In addition to the foregoing reasons the conduct of the present regime in inaugurating a campaign of calumny against the Mission and false charges against Mr. Harry T. Fultz of the Mission, which involves the barbarous treatment of several Albanians, is ample evidence of the ruthless and unscrupulous character of the regime to indicate its unworthiness of membership in UN.

6. Finally, now that our Mission has been withdrawn, we can use as additional arguments against Albania's admission the facts that the regime (a) is carrying on a regime of terror against all opposition and is thus wholly unworthy of designation as "democratic", (b) has mobilized its manpower on a war footing at a time when UN is striving for peace and security, and (c) has compromised the independent status of Albania by permitting the country to become honeycombed with Yugoslav and Soviet advisers.

We think it would be particularly unfortunate in connection with reconsideration of rejected applications, however, for SC to make an adverse decision on Siam's application at this time. The position you take in the Council with respect to the timing of a decision by the Council on Siam's application should be guided accordingly.

Should Soviet representative indicate either that he will support or not oppose Siamese application, you should endeavor to bring application to a vote following discussion in SC and without reference to Membership Committee. On other hand, in event it is learned that Soviet representative will oppose Siamese application or in event that Soviet position is undecided or unknown to you, application should probably be referred to Membership Committee in order to postpone immediate SC action.

Prince Wan assured me that he would call upon Mr. Johnson on Monday after a further conversation with Mr. Gromyko and would discuss the best method of procedure.⁵⁸

CONFIDENTIAL

[WASHINGTON,] December 11, 1946.

In the course of a conversation with His Excellency Pridi Banomyong, in reply to a question, I outlined briefly the situation in regard to Siam's application for membership in the United Nations. I made it clear to His Excellency that as matters stood the American delegate would press for immediate consideration only if so urged by Prince Wan in New York; that the question of Siam's application was coming up on Thursday⁵⁹ at 3:00 p. m.; and that as far as I knew Prince Wan had not made his position clear to Mr. Herschel Johnson. His Excellency expressed great concern that Siam become a member of the United Nations; he asked whether there was still time to urge Mr. Johnson to support Siam's application strongly and expressed the hope that as he himself was not in an official position to express such an opinion to Mr. Johnson that the Department would urge Mr. Johnson to give such strong support. I said that I appreciated his expression of opinion.

[December 11, 1946, 4:00 p. m.: In telephone conversation with Mr. Charles Yost⁶⁰ in New York, I learned that Mr. Yost and Prince Wan had been in consultation on the subject of Siam's application; that Prince Wan hoped that Mr. Johnson would make a strong speech in support of Siam's membership and would press for immediate consideration of the question; that this would then require an expression

Memorandum of Telephone Conversation, by the Assistant Chief of the Division of Southeast Asian Affairs (Landon)

[WASHINGTON,] December 12, 1946.

Prince Wan telephoned from New York and informed me that he had just had a conversation with Mr. Gromyko who had in simple language stated his position to the effect that until Siam issued a communiqué along the lines of an exchange of letters which have already taken place at Stockholm indicating that Siam repudiates the anti-communist attitude of previous governments that he is instructed to move for a deferment of consideration of Siam's application and failing that, as a last resort, to veto.

Prince Wan stated that his Government had no objection to the issuance of such a communiqué but that the Minister of Foreign Affairs felt reluctant to use such a strong phrase in regard to the attitude of previous Siamese governments toward communism, and that a compromise formula was being sought.

I asked whether Prince Wan felt that the matter could be resolved in time for Siam's admission to the United Nations this year. He replied that he had pointed out to Mr. Gromyko that there would not be time for an exchange of telegrams with Bangkok and that he would give him a letter of assurance that such a communiqué would be issued. He explained that he felt justified and empowered to make such a written statement in view of the fact that he had discussed the matter for several hours last night with His Excellency, the Elder Statesman, Pridi Banomyong and that His Excellency had thoroughly concurred in such a letter. Prince Wan added that, as I knew, the present Government was composed of followers of the Elder Statesman and there was no question of their supporting his judgment.

I urged Prince Wan immediately to see Mr. Johnson and tell him what he had told me. Prince Wan said that he would do so as soon as he hung up his receiver.

[In a telephone conversation with Charles Noyes⁶² in New York he stated that Prince Wan had had an extensive conversation with Herschel Johnson and himself and had asked Mr. Johnson to agree to postpone consideration of Siam's application for membership until the next meeting if Mr. Gromyko so desired on the grounds that he needed two more days to complete the arrangements that he had in mind. He then repeated the substance of the foregoing conversation and said again that he believed that he would be able to get the communiqué issued within two days. He added, however, that he was going to see Mr. Gromyko immediately and try to persuade him to be satisfied temporarily with a letter assuring him that such a communiqué would be issued and to withdraw his objections to Siam's application for membership.

Mr. Noyes said that their procedure would be for Mr. Johnson to make a statement favoring Siam's application and that if Mr. Gromyko asked for a postponement then Mr. Johnson would reluctantly agree to postponement stating that he would be willing to do so only until the next meeting or until an earlier moment than the next regular meeting if Mr. Gromyko were willing at an earlier time to discuss the matter.⁶³ Mr. Noyes added that in view of the fact that Prince Wan had asked that the U.S. delegate agree to postponement, if Mr. Gromyko desired it, that there seemed to be no other course to pursue.]⁶⁴

IV. POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES REGARDING THE APPORTIONMENT OF EXPENSES OF THE REGULAR (ADMINISTRATIVE) BUDGET OF THE UNITED NATIONS AMONG MEMBERS OF THE ORGANIZATION

501.AB/8-2946

Memorandum by the Deputy Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs (Ross) to the Director of the Office (Hiss)

[WASHINGTON,] August 29, 1946.

Jack Thompson⁶⁶ talked to you this morning about the proportion of the United States contribution to the United Nations and I understand you plan to take this up with Mr. Acheson⁶⁷ at 10:30 this morning. The papers on this subject are attached but the principal points may be summarized as follows:⁶⁸

⁶⁶ Elwood N. Thompson, Special Assistant to the Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs.

⁶⁷ Dean Acheson, Under Secretary of State (Acting Secretary at this time).

⁶⁸ Papers not attached. At the London session the General Assembly had appointed a standing expert Committee on Contributions of ten members and directed it to establish for the consideration of the General Assembly at the second part of the first session a contributions scale for apportionment of the expenses of the Organization amongst the Member States. This was on the recommendation of the Preparatory Commission which had met at London during November and December 1945 (see Foreign Relations, 1945, vol. I, pp. 1433 ff.).

The General Assembly in setting up the Committee on Contributions instructed it to base the recommended quotas on the formula set forth by the Preparatory Commission in its Report (United Nations, Report of the Preparatory Commission, December 23, 1945, p. 108):

"The expenses of the United Nations should be apportioned broadly according to capacity to pay. It is, however, difficult to measure such capacity merely by statistical means, and impossible to arrive at any definite formula. Comparative estimates of national income would appear prima facie to be the fairest guide. Other factors which should be taken into account in order to prevent anomalous assessments include the following:

(a) comparative income per head of population, e.g. in the case of populous states with low average income per head;

(b) temporary dislocation of national economies arising out of the second world war;

(c) the ability of Members to secure foreign currency.

Two opposite tendencies should also be guarded against: some Members may desire unduly to minimize their contributions, whereas others may desire to increase them unduly for reasons of prestige. If a ceiling is imposed on contributions the ceiling should not be such as seriously to obscure the relation between a nation's contributions and its capacity to pay. The Committee should be given discretion to consider all data relevant to capacity to pay and all other pertinent factors in arriving at its recommendations."

The Committee membership was made up of ten experts from as many states; they were not, however, representatives of the governments of those states. Mr. Paul H. Appleby was the member from the United States. For General Assembly action concerning the Committee see United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, First Part, Plenary Meetings [hereafter cited as GA(I/1), Plenary], pp. 621 ff., annex 19, especially pp. 627, 640, 641, and 448.

1. The Committee on Contributions was opposed to establishment of any ceiling.⁶⁹

2. The Committee recommendation based on capacity to pay would call for a contribution of 49% for the United States, 11% for the United Kingdom, 9% for the U.S.S.R., 4% for France, and 2% for China.

3. However, the Committee gave three other scales calling for contributions of 25, 30 and 35% by the United States.

4. I understand Mr. Appleby's position is that the United States should be prepared to pay 30 or 35% plus 5% for war damages.

5. The OA recommendation calls for a payment of 30 or 35% including war damages.

I personally feel very strongly that our initial position should be that we would be willing to make a contribution of 25% and that we might recede to 25% plus 5% for war damages but no further, and I

⁶⁹ United States policy had favored the establishment not only of a "ceiling" (maximum contribution) but also a "floor" (minimum contribution). This policy was formulated in the Department during September and October 1945 for the guidance of the United States Representative on the Executive Committee of the Preparatory Commission (Stettinius), and was communicated to Mr. Stettinius in telegram 8786, Preco 149, October 4, 1945, to London, which telegram read in pertinent part:

"We agree that countries should contribute on the basis of a rough approximation of their capacity to pay as indicated by their net national income, per capita income figures for the latest available pre-war year, and other pertinent factors such as the effect of the devastation of war on capacity to pay during the next few years. The capacity to pay principle should be modified by imposing both a ceiling and a floor to contributions. The minimum contribution might be fixed at $5,000 since without such a provision the smallest countries would contribute only very trivial amounts. It is thought that the membership of UNO should be worth at least $5,000 for any country. As to the ceiling, we are not prepared to make any definite suggestions before consultation with Congressional leaders. It should be noted, however, that if no ceiling provision were adopted, the United States' share might be approximately 45 percent of the total. Although such an assessment would be equitable according to capacity to pay, it would be undesirable for any one country to have such a dominant position in the financing of UNO. . . ." (500.CC(PC)/10-445)

When the Executive Committee failed to make "a positive recommendation in favor of imposing either a ceiling or a floor on contributions", the Department cabled its disapproval to the Acting United States Representative on the Preparatory Commission (Stevenson) in telegram 10176, Preco 305, November 21, 1945, to London. Mr. Stevenson was informed that "We continue to consider it essential that the formula of capacity to pay be modified by applying both a ceiling and a floor, and we favor the recognition of this principle by Preco [the Preparatory Commission]." (500.CC(PC)/11-2145 and FW 500.CC(PC)/11-2145)

The Committee on Contributions began its meetings in June. In May a paper had been prepared in the Department entitled "Scale of Contributions for Apportionment of United Nations Expenses", to be transmitted informally to Mr. Appleby. This memorandum is missing in the Department's files, but it may be presumed that it embodied the principle of a floor and a ceiling for contributions in light of previous and subsequent developments. (Memoranda, the Deputy Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs (Ross) to the Associate Chief of the Division of International Organization Affairs (Stokes), May 17, and Mr. Marion W. Boggs of the Division of International Organization Affairs to the Chief of the Division (Sandifer), June 3, both File No. 501.AB/6-346). The Committee's work on this question was substantially done by this date (August 29), although its Report was not formally completed until September.

think this is the position Mr. Acheson should take in his discussion with Mr. Appleby today.⁷⁰

On the matter of clearances I think we should discuss this matter with Don Russell and with or through him the Appropriation Committee Chairmen if they are in town. Subsequently the matter should, of course, be discussed with the Congressional members of the Delegation which should be given discretion to recede beyond what I suggest above as may be determined by the circumstances.

I think you understand the theory of "war damages". This means that for a period of a few years the United States would pay a slightly higher proportion while some of the other countries recovering from the war would pay a somewhat lower percentage.

UN Contributions

I am attaching the final report of the Committee on Contributions.⁷² As you know, I served on the Committee in my personal capacity and not as an official of the United States Government. Since I am an official of the United States Government,⁷³ however, I feel at liberty to offer you some comments on the Report and the Committee's proceedings which may be helpful to the United States at the meeting of the General Assembly.

⁷⁰ This view had been expressed with equal emphasis by Mr. Ross in an internal SPA memorandum dated April 24 concerning informal talks being held at that time on this problem between budget officers of the Department and officers of the Bureau of the Budget at the White House. ". . . the contribution of the United States should be limited to a maximum of 25%. Although our share might be very considerably larger based on 'capacity to pay', there are two main objections to increasing our contribution above the 25% which was set for the working capital fund. First, from the international point of view it does not seem to me appropriate for the United States to carry any larger proportion. A contribution larger than 25% would give the United Nations too much of the flavor of being an American organization. Second, our Congress is already conditioned to the idea of a 25% contribution and I doubt very much whether they would take kindly to an increase." (SPA office lot files, Lot 54-D510, Box 20013, "R" folder) Mr. Ross' statements regarding a United States quota of 25% refers to the United States share in the provisional scale of contributions established by the General Assembly at London on the basis of the Food and Agriculture Organization quota formula (see GA (I/1), Plenary, pp. 623, 448).

The first point I want to make perfectly clear is that the scale prepared is not the scale of contributions recommended for adoption by the Assembly. It is an index of relative capacities to pay and is submitted merely as a basis for negotiation in the Assembly.

I consider that the Committee fell short of completing its assignment when it decided not to prepare a scale that it would recommend for adoption. I personally felt very strongly that contributions should be determined by experts and taken out of politics as far as possible. As it is, the scale must now finally be determined by political argument in the Assembly.

The great obstacle in the way of a definite recommendation was the question of the United States contribution. While I agree that the statistical and economic data lead to the conclusion that the capacity to pay of the United States is over 49 per cent for the next three years, I decidedly do not agree, for reasons I shall elaborate upon later, that the United States contribution should be that high. I urged this position strongly in the Committee and was supported by Mr. Jacklin⁷⁴ from South Africa, but we had no success whatever in persuading the Committee to deviate from the principle of capacity to pay. Consequently, the compromise solution arrived at was the only way to achieve agreement in the Committee.

The Report of the Committee is unambiguous on the point that the scale is not a recommendation for adoption. I quote the concluding paragraphs in full:

"21. Conclusion

The Committee has confined its work to making estimates of relative capacity to pay, recognizing that factors other than capacity to pay including ceiling provisions, which raise political issues, may be discussed by the General Assembly if it so desires.

"By taking into account the combined effects of its estimates on account of war dislocation, war improvement, availability of foreign exchange and per capita incomes, the Committee made adjustments to the scale derived from the original national income figures, and thereby arrived at the scale of relative capacities to pay that it now submits to the General Assembly. While differences in capacity to pay are very large in some instances, the Committee has exercised restraint in respect both of war allowances and degree of progressiveness. It feels confidence in its results and considers that the scale provides an appropriate estimate of capacity to pay for the years 1946, 1947 and 1948. Before the end of that period it can be hoped that the distortions in national economies produced by the war will have greatly diminished and that revised estimates can then be worked out on a firmer statistical basis. Meanwhile the Committee hopes that the exploratory work it has done in working out the present scale will prepare the way for improvement in the future.

V. Scale

"22. The Committee on Contributions submits that the following scale be accepted by the General Assembly as reflecting relative capacities to contribute to the administrative expenses of the United Nations:" (italics supplied)

I believe a large part of the trouble lies in the instructions of the Committee. Possibly the most literal interpretation of those instruction restricts the Committee to the question of capacity to pay. The only peg on which you can hang other considerations is the sentence "The Committee should be given discretion to consider all data relative to capacity to pay and all other pertinent factors in arriving at its recommendations." We argued that all other pertinent factors included factors other than capacity to pay. The majority of the Committee believed that the factors referred to were economic and nonpolitical factors of the same nature as capacity to pay.

There is, therefore, a possibility that the Assembly may have to revise its principles of assessment and make it clear that other factors are to be considered if it is to arrive at a scale of contributions that is acceptable to the United States.

When we started the negotiations, we thought that the idea of a ceiling would be acceptable to the Committee. We felt they would want no one nation to be predominant in the organization. We found that not to be the case. With the exception of Mr. Jacklin and Mr. Brigden,⁷⁵ everyone seemed to think that the more the United States paid the better. I was particularly surprised to find this point of view held by the United Kingdom member. I should have thought that questions of prestige might enter in. I do not know whether the Committee is an adequate index of the temper of the Assembly, but I suspect that we shall find more resistance to the idea of a ceiling than we have been assuming.

The Preparatory Commission report states that "If a ceiling is imposed on contributions, the ceiling should not be such as seriously to obscure the relation between a nation's contributions and its capacity to pay." I believe that a figure that would be acceptable to the United States and desirable for the United Nations would deviate seriously from its capacity to pay, especially for the administrative budget of the United Nations. I believe that other factors should have an important weight in determining contributions. Some of these considerations are:

1. A contributions scale should take into account the principle of sovereign equality as well as capacity to pay. Since every nation has one vote, the capacity to pay figure should be adjusted in the direction of equal contributions. Although the Committee refused to accept this idea I am sure it was unconsciously applied to the the assessments for Latin America. Had South America consisted of one country instead of 20, I am sure its total contribution would have been lower. If the budget was small enough I would favor a system of equal contributions for each country. As it is, I believe there should be a compromise between the principle of capacity of pay and the principle of sovereign equality. Needless to say, the Committee would not accept this position.

2. It is undesirable for any one country to bear too large a share of the budget. This is true from the point of view both of the country in question and of all other countries. If the United States pays a large proportion of the budget, other countries would be likely to tolerate administrative extravagances on the grounds that the United States is paying most of the bill. I think we have seen evidences of this already.

3. The contributions of the veto powers should not differ too widely. There is no need for me to labor this point as I know you are fully aware of it. Mr. Jacklin and I tried out on the Committee the idea that the Big Five contributions should be settled by special consideration, but we met with a most hostile reception.

After giving a great deal of thought to this matter, I am convinced that from the point of view of the United Nations, the contributions of the United States should not in any event exceed 35 percent and should probably be less. If the Assembly is persuaded to accept this position, it will have to reverse its previous decision about the relation of a ceiling to capacity to pay.

The Committee was as reluctant to accept the idea of a floor to contributions as it was a ceiling. At one stage, we had thought of a floor of .05 percent. This would result in inequities as between the countries to which the floor applied, and the countries just above the floor. As it is, no country in the scale has an allocation of less than .02 percent. This means $5,000 on a $25 million budget. If the United States contribution were lower than 50 percent the minimum would probably be raised. It would be at least sufficient to pay the fares of five delegates to the Assembly meetings.

[Here follow comments in some detail by Mr. Appleby on the scale decided on by the Committee with a table showing indexes of relative capacity to pay for each Member of the United Nations based on national income reported for 1938-1940 and estimated national income for 1946.]

United States Delegation Position Paper

[NEW YORK,] October 21, 1946.

PRINCIPAL ISSUES BEFORE COMMITTEE 5

Following is a summary of the principal issues anticipated for Committee 5 arranged in order of relative importance. References to tab numbers correspond to the position papers in the Committee 5 Handbook.⁷⁶

1. (Tab 4) Report of the Committee on Contributions on a Scale for the Apportionment of Expenses. The Committee on Contributions, appointed by the Assembly, will submit an index of relative capacity to contribute to the support of the Organization for the first three years. This index lists the U. S. capacity at 49.94 per cent, the UK at 10.5 per cent, the USSR (together with Byelorussian SSR and the Ukrainian SSR) at 7 per cent, France at 5.5 per cent, and China at 2.75 per cent. On the basis of a $25,000,000 budget, the annual U. S. contribution would amount to $12,485,000. The report refers to the Assembly the question of a ceiling on contributions and does not propose a floor.

U. S. POSITION

It is suggested that the U. S. Delegation should:

(1) Propose that the Assembly accept the Committee Report as a general technical basis to aid in determining contributions for the first three years (the U. S. would thus not have to attack the technical quality of the report);

(2) Propose adoption by the Assembly of the principle of a ceiling, in order to prevent undue dominance of the Organization by one Member, and in recognition of the principle of sovereign equality as set forth in the Charter;

(3) Propose that the basic ceiling be fixed at 25 per cent, but indicate a willingness to discuss a higher U. S. contribution for the first three years as a means of compensating for the "exemption" to be allowed certain countries on account of war damages;

(4) Seek to secure adoption of a temporary three-year U.S. quota of not more than 30 per cent (i.e., a 25 per cent ceiling, plus 5 per cent, to compensate for war damages exemptions), but be prepared, if

⁷⁶ This has reference to volume 1 of two "books" of position papers and background memoranda relating to the Fifth Committee which had been prepared in the Department, and which are found in the IO Files. This Delegation position paper (in pertinent part) was an abbreviated version of a position paper prepared in the Department on the subject of the Report of the Committee on Contributions (IO Files, document SD/A/C.5/1). necessary to facilitate agreement, to accept a temporary three-year quota as high as 33- $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent (i.e., a 25 per cent ceiling plus 8- $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent compensation for war damages) ;

(5) Refrain from pressing its previously held position for a floor and vote against a floor if one is proposed. ⁷⁷

United States Attitude Toward Contribution Ceiling

Senator Vandenberg stated that he wished to put before the Delegation the issue of the United States attitude on a contribution ceiling since Committee V met that morning. It had been proposed that Committee V immediately divide into two sub-committees, and he wished to be able to make the United States position clear to the whole

⁷⁷ The United States Delegation to the General Assembly (see pp. 37-42 for information about the composition of the Delegation) discussed the contributions question at meetings on October 21 and October 28; this paper was used by the Delegation in its October 21 discussion. At this meeting a lengthy review of the problem was presented by Mr. William Hall, Adviser on the staff of the Delegation and expert on Fifth Committee (administrative and budgetary) matters. In a statement that followed Senator Vandenberg expressed apprehension that the United States "would pay so much that sovereign equality would become meaningless. . . ." Later in the discussion Mr. Ross said he wished to clarify the thinking of the Department, where the emphasis was not so much on the principle of sovereign equality, "a frank and sincere [approach]", as on other factors. "More stress was put on (a) what Congressional reaction would be toward the proposed rate of the contribution in general, and (b) a concern lest Congress and the Executive Department be misled into thinking that, since the U.S. contributed almost half the expenses, it could exercise more influence in the UN than was actually the case. . . ." In the end the Delegation decided to defer its decision on the United States position until there had been more opportunity to study the Report of the Committee on Contributions. (IO Files, Minutes of the 5th Meeting of the U.S. Delegation, October 21, document US/A/M(Chr.)/5)

At the October 28 meeting the paper under discussion apparently was the Department's own position paper on the Committee's Report (SD/A/C.5/1) referred to in footnote 76, p. 467, and the Delegation quickly approved it (IO Files, Minutes of the 11th Meeting of the U.S. Delegation, October 28, document US/A/M(Chr.)/11).

On October 31 the Delegation received a telegram from the Department (telegram 259, October 31, 8 p. m., File No. 501.AB/10-2646) which directed that the first recommendation of the Department's position paper (and so of this Delegation working paper) be revised to read that "U.S. Delegation point out the admitted statistical inadequacies of the Report and the failure of the Committee to consider fully differences in cost of living and price indexes, but agree to use the Report as a general guide to differences in capacity to pay among Members in the sense that the United States has greatest capacity to pay even though it is not as great as indicated in the Report."

Committee before that time. He recalled that the Department's position was that there should be a ceiling of 25 per cent of the contribution of any member. However, the United States, because of the post war emergency, would be willing to increase its contribution for 1947. Senator Vandenberg said that he thought that it would be almost impossible to get any ceiling imposed, knowing that even the Canadians opposed a ceiling. Therefore, he thought that the only possible position was a bold and immediate statement of the United States position to the entire Committee. He stated that he had prepared a statement on that subject and had submitted it to Mr. Bloom and Mrs. Roosevelt, whose opinion he particularly valued. He thought the question was whether the United States should meet the question head-on. He pointed out that the report of the Committee on Contributions recommended a 50 per cent United States contribution.

Senator Connally inquired regarding the prospects for getting by with the United States position. Senator Vandenberg replied that he did not know what the prospects were, but he felt sure that a proposition for the United States to pay 50 per cent of the budget could not get by Congress. Mr. Eaton stated that he was sure that such a proposition could not be passed, especially if there were a Republican House.

Mr. Sandifer pointed out that the matter had been carefully considered by the Department and that the view of Mr. Eaton had been taken into account. He thought that the other Delegations should be informed as to how far the United States was willing to go, and he thought it desirable that a public statement should be made. Mr. Ross also agreed to the desirability of making a bold and immediate statement. However, he proposed that the door should be left open in view of the economic dislocation of the world. While the 25 per cent ceiling should be a standard rule, it should be clear that the United States would be willing to go as far as a one-third contribution to the budget.

Mrs. Roosevelt said that she hoped Senator Vandenberg would stress that any group making such a large contribution to the budget as 50 per cent would be open to pressure by its constituency to exercise pressure on the Organization. It should be made clear that the United States interest was not only a monetary one but a concern that the Organization must be free.

Senator Vandenberg agreed that this was his primary point. He also said he would take occasion to point out that it was an old dictum that taxation without representation was unjust. He said he would note that for his British colleague.

Senator Connally said that he thought Mrs. Roosevelt's point was a very good one, for if the United States contributed 50 per cent, there would be stimulated a spirit of suspicion. Mr. Dulles added that it would also stimulate a tendency toward extravagance.

Mr. Eaton said that the question had to be faced in view of the attitude of the House of Representatives. He said that the House of Representatives would never pass a bill providing that the United States pay 50 per cent of the expenses of the United Nations. He pointed out that it was difficult to get more money for UNRRA and emphasized that money bills had to originate in and be approved by the House.

Senator Vandenberg reminded the Delegation that every other representative at the Committee table would also be under an obligation to defend his position before his parliament.

Mr. Sandifer cautioned that it was important that the statement be firm and clear, but it would be dangerous to make it appear to be an ultimatum.

Senator Vandenberg said that he would agree to put in for an emergency ceiling of one-third of the budget to be paid by the United States and would emphasize that this should apply to the purely administrative budget. Insofar as the affiliated agencies were concerned, the United States would accept what was demanded by their needs. He would also say that in regard to the specialized agencies, wherever the United States had a special responsibility it would pay what was necessary.

Senator Austin polled the Delegation on whether Senator Vandenberg was authorized to state a firm position based on the Delegation's previous decision accepting a ceiling of 25 per cent on contributions, with an emergency ceiling of 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ per cent in respect to the administrative budget for United Nations.⁷⁸ This was approved unanimously.⁷⁹

[Here follows discussion of other items.]

⁷⁸ See footnote 79, below.

⁷⁹ At the first meeting of the Fifth Committee at 11 o'clock the same morning Senator Vandenberg made a statement setting forth the principal points of the United States position. He stressed the danger to the principle of "universal and equal authority" inherent in the allocation of "almost fifty percent" of the total assessments to one member; and criticized the Report of the Contributions Committee as "technically inadequate". "Mr. Vandenberg emphasized that he was not speaking of the operational budget [a reference to the budgets of specialized programs such as that of the International Refugee Organization], in which the United States clearly accepted larger responsibility, but of the administrative budget [the "house-keeping" budget of the Organization itself], regarding which his Government proposed that a ceiling of twenty-five per cent should be set on the assessments to any one Member. Although extraordinary conditions, such as the temporary incapacity of many nations to pay, resulting from war damages, might call for a temporary divergence from the twenty-five per cent standard, such a divergence should be an emergency measure only. Under present conditions, the United States Government was prepared to urge its Congress to meet a temporary assessment of thirty-three and one-third per cent." (United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, Second Part, Fifth Committee, p. 72; hereafter cited as GA (I/2), Fifth Committee)

At a meeting of the executive and political officers of the Delegation on November 7 "It was urged that everything possible be done to persuade other States to accept the U.S. position that there should be a ceiling on contributions. The anticipated serious difficulty with Congress on this question should be pointed out." (IO Files, document US/A/M/8)

782. Daily Plain Summary. Committee V (22nd Meeting)

[In a statement to the Committee on the contributions question⁸⁰ Senator Vandenberg “re-emphasized the U.S. position on the necessity for a ceiling on contributions to UN administrative budgets. . . .”]

Asserting that the U.S. did not seek to avoid any appropriate responsibility he assured the Committee that no matter what party was in the majority in Washington, full U.S. support was behind the UN. The issue, he added, was not what the U.S. could afford to pay, but “what is right and wise and just as between partners in this common enterprise.”

The U.S. continued to be unable to agree that “relative capacity to pay” could justify a basic American assessment of 50%. The experts, he declared, had estimated 1946 national incomes in lieu of complete statistics, and “since it admittedly is a temporary figure representing temporary exigencies, it should not be consulted for more than one year.”

The temporary U.S. acceptance of an unequal share of the administrative budgets, and application of a completely different standard to operational budgets “quite clearly demonstrates our complete desire and willingness to take our full share of the load,” the U.S. delegate declared: The U.S. protest involves relatively small sums, but “a relatively large principle,” he added.⁸¹

Vandenberg urged that the UN avoid the “mundane” relationship between contributions and control already recognized in some other international institutions, referring to the International Bank. He held further that decisions on the 1947 allocations should be con-

⁸⁰ For the Vandenberg statement to the Fifth Committee on November 8, see GA (I/2), Fifth Committee, p. 92 and U.S. Delegation Press Release No. 66, November 8 (IO Files, U.S. Delegation Press Releases, 1946).

⁸¹ In the Delegation press release the sentence following at this point reads: “It [the U.S. protest] involves only what may become the permanent basic criterion for supporting the general administrative budget.”

Senator Vandenberg went on to say (press release text): “We have suggested, therefore, the desirability of a ceiling at this one point. We do not believe it is desirable for this basic budget to indicate anything like a 50% reliance upon any ONE member of the United Nations. Although this view has been quite uniformly dismissed in the general debate, it persists in our thinking. . . .”

“In the course of the recent general debate, one of our able colleagues reserved a doubt as to just how serious I may have been in my recent argument that the indispensable ‘sovereign equality’ among us may soon be jeopardized if any one member Nation is permitted to dominate the contributions [presumably a reference to his statement to the Committee on November 1; see footnote 79, p. 470]. I can assure him we are very serious—because, as a practical matter, any such preponderant contributor must take a somewhat relevantly preponderant interest in the creation of obligations and in the expenditure of funds. It will be his only protection. I am afraid that this sequence is inevitable. . . . Certainly the government of the United States has no remote wish to see any such situation created. . . .”

fined to one, single year and that the standing Contributions Committee and Advisory Committee on Budgetary Problems be instructed to reexamine the whole question of assessments without restriction and to report its recommendations to the 1947 GA.

Since the U.S. has offered to accept special obligations in respect to operational budgets, and also to accept extra, temporary obligations in respect of the basic administrative budget, Vandenberg contended it was only fair that all these obligations be considered together in fixing the 1947 allocations. Proposed budgets should be submitted at the earliest possible date to permit deliberative consideration, and decisions respecting allocations should be made at the same time, he said.⁸²

The Uruguayan delegate remarked that there had been no concerted drive for unanimity since the Uruguayan and Belgian Delegations had "categorically" supported the U.S. principle that no nation should be responsible for a 50% contribution.

⁸² The Vandenberg proposals appear in the Committee records as follows:

"Mr. Vandenberg made the following suggestions:

"First, when the Committee decided upon the 1947 allocation, the decision should be confined to a single year.

"Secondly, the Committee should instruct the standing Committee on Contributions or the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions to re-examine the whole study of assessments without restriction and report its recommendations to the second session of the 1947 General Assembly.

"Thirdly, since the United States had offered to accept special obligations in respect to operational budgets, and also to accept extra temporary obligations in respect of the basic administrative budget, it was only fair that all those obligations should be reviewed together at one time in fixing all the allocations for 1947. The Committee could [should?] not weigh those obligations separately. The answer to one problem would necessarily affect its attitude toward other problems.

"Fourthly, all proposed budgets should be submitted as early as possible to permit ample time for deliberative consideration. If certain of the budgets could not be presented, the most definite estimates available should be placed before the Committee. Any decisions respecting allocation should be postponed until all decisions could be made at the same time." (GA, (I/2), Fifth Committee, pp. 93 and 94) These suggestions were submitted as a formal proposal by the United States (United Nations document A/C.5/61, GA (I/2), Fifth Committee, pp. 322 and 323, annex 6a)

vember 8⁸⁴ that he had decided to intervene in the debate on the contributions scale in support of the U. S. The Secretariat would be in an intolerable situation if any one country contributed half of the budget, Lie said.

U. K. Views on Contributions

Pitblado⁸⁵ (U. K.) told USdel that he found the contributions scale generally satisfactory except that the Russians and Latin-American States were under-assessed and the British Commonwealth countries and the U. S. slightly over-assessed. Considering that new members would contribute slightly more than two per cent and that other States might be expected to bear a one-tenth increase in their contributions, he thought it would be possible to bring the U. S. figure down to forty-two per cent, subject to possible Soviet objection. He believed that any scale adopted might apply only for one year.

While Pitblado was not prepared to fix a figure for the U. S., he hoped that the time would not be very far off when one-fourth to one-third would represent a reasonable percentage based on the U. S. share of the world income. He said the U. K. would oppose a vote on the contributions question, believing the U. S. would be voted down. The U. K. view was that it would be an unfortunate precedent to establish a scale over the negative vote of any major country.

The U. K. representative stated that the British reaction to proposed UN scales, particularly if applied for only one year, would be conditioned by agreements reached with the U. S. on other items involving dollar exchange, such as the IRO and the U. K. share of the cost of German occupation. He added that it would be helpful to the U. K. if the IRO and UN contribution scales could be considered at the same time and inquired whether the U. S. would consider an increase in its proposed forty-three per cent contribution to the IRO.

Soviet Views on Contributions

After Vandenberg's speech in Committee V on November 8, Geraschenko⁸⁶ (U.S.S.R.) stated to USdel that "speaking as an individual" he was impressed by the U. S. position and would be prepared to support in his Delegation a reduction of the U. S. contribution to forty per cent or slightly less, assuming some method of spreading the reduction could be devised to keep the Soviet contribution below 7.5 per cent. NEW YORK, November 14, 1946—12:30 a. m.

802. The following is the continuation of daily plain summary—November 13.

*Committee V (23rd meeting).*⁸⁸

The United Kingdom came out in Committee V on November 13 with strong support for the United Nations contribution scale recommended by the Contributions Committee as Younger⁸⁹ (UK) pointed out that a downward revision of the United States quota meant an upward revision of quotas of other countries much less capable of meeting heavy financial demands.

In a careful analysis of the present contribution scale, Younger admitted that the present United States quota of 49.89 percent was too high, but added that it was only a temporary quota due to exceptional post-war circumstances. The recovery of national economies, he asserted, would bring about a natural revision of present inequalities.

Younger declared that no one could be surprised at the high United States quota because the factors used by the Contributions Committee in determining "capacity to pay" were (1) national income which was highest in the United States, (2) per capita income which was highest in the United States, (3) dislocation of national economy from the war which had been least serious in the United States, and (4) the status of foreign exchange which affected the United States not at all. In fact, Younger added, the further one investigated the excellent work of the Contributions Committee in an attempt to justify the United States contention that its quota was too high, "the stickier the going becomes". Younger further backed his case by asserting that ⁸⁸ Within the general area of its discussion of the Report of the Committee on Contributions the Fifth Committee on this date had under specific consideration the proposals formally advanced by Senator Vandenberg at the end of his statement to the Committee on November 8 (see footnote 82, p. 472). much of the estimated 23 millions for United Nations expenses in 1947, of which 19 millions were for personal and common services, constituted "an invisible import" for the United States.

With respect to the political implications of the high United States quota and its effect on sovereign equality, Younger declared that the United Kingdom could [not?] agree with Vandenberg, since in a contributions scale having numerous inequalities, there was no point at which national sovereignties were clearly infringed. He added that in his opinion the doctrine that the amount of representation was related to total contribution was novel in international practice.

Chinese Attitude on Contributions Scale

The opinion that Committee V might accept a 39 per cent contribution from the U. S. was expressed to USdel on November 14 by Hsia (China). This would have to be done in subcommittee by specific increases in contributions of several of the larger and middle powers. China would be prepared to increase its contribution at least 2 per cent in order to partially meet the U. S. position, he said.

USdel gained the impression that China might propose in the Subcommittee an increase in its own quota and suggest that other Members make similar concessions to bring the U. S. figure down. Hsia felt it

⁹⁰ Formal constitution of the sub-committee was deferred, however, until the Fifth Committee's meeting on November 15, at which time it was agreed that the sub-committee would be made up of the representatives of Canada, China, Egypt, France, Mexico, the Netherlands, Poland, the Soviet Union, the United States, and Uruguay (GA(I/2), Fifth Committee, pp. 110 and 111). *Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs (Hiss)*⁹¹

[WASHINGTON,] November 15, 1946.

The Department this morning received from the Assembly Delegation a brief cable which reads:

“Present strong indication that committee will vote US contribution 49.89 percent. Please advise delegation course of action this event.”⁹²

The total budget for this year is about $20,000,000 and the proposed budget for 1947 is $23,700,000. Information from New York indicates that the 1947 budget may be increased considerably. The contribution scale decided by this Assembly will apply to these two budgets and to the $25,000,000 working capital fund.

You will recall from your discussions with Mr. Appleby, who is Chairman of the UN Committee on Contributions, that his committee, whose members were appointed as experts rather than as representatives of governments, developed an index of relative capacity to contribute. This index listed the US capacity at 49.89 percent, the UK at 10.5, the USSR (together with Byelo-Russia and the Ukraine) at 7., France at 5.5, and China at 2.75.

You will also recall that Assistant Secretary Russell felt that it would be a mistake to accept these figures literally, since income figures, on which to base capacity to pay, were not necessarily comparable nor accurate for all countries reported upon. Moreover, the Department took the position that the US should propose adoption by the Assembly of the principle of a ceiling, in order to prevent ⁹¹ Addressed to the Under Secretary of State (Acheson) and the Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs (Clayton).

⁹² Telegram 804, November 14, 1:28 p. m., from New York (501.BB/11-1446). The Delegation at a morning meeting on November 14 had devoted virtually the entire session to the contributions problem, Senator Vandenberg leading off by stating “that he wished to have the problem of the UN budget considered because of developments on the previous day which he felt were most serious for the whole United Nations. He reported that the UK and Canadians had taken the leadership in the move to assess the United States for fifty per cent of the UN budget, regardless of any other consideration. They have declined to accept the ceiling idea.” (See telegram 802, November 14, from New York, p. 474.) After lengthy discussion it was decided to ask the Department for guidance. (IO Files, Minutes of the 20th Meeting of the U.S. Delegation, November 14, 9 a. m., document US/A/M(Chr.)/20) undue dominance of the organization by one member and in recognition of the principle of sovereign equality as set forth in the Charter. Our position was that a ceiling should be fixed at 25 percent but that we would be willing to discuss a higher percentage—not to exceed 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ percent—for the first three years as a means of compensating certain countries because of “war damage”.

The Delegation has found little or no support in the Assembly for the principle of a ceiling. And, as the cable from the Delegation indicates, it is now apparent that there is no possibility of obtaining an agreement on a ceiling at or close to our previously adopted top limit of 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ percent. However, there is some reason to believe we may be able to work out an arrangement with the British, whose position is likely to be of crucial importance, and ultimately with other delegations for a one-year contribution scale in which our share would be approximately 40 percent.

Recommendations

1. That you talk over this problem with Senator Vandenberg while he is in Washington this weekend.

2. That you recommend to Senator Vandenberg that he, with Senator Austin if that seems appropriate, discuss the problem with the Secretary and suggest that the Secretary may wish to speak directly to Mr. Bevin in view of our indications that the British attitude has substantially stiffened in the last few days. For your information we understand that Senator Vandenberg is having dinner with Mr. Bevin Sunday night.⁹³

3. That in talking with Senator Vandenberg you suggest the following position, which he may also wish to discuss with Senator Austin and the Secretary:

a. Any scale adopted this year should be considered temporary only, with a definite understanding that the question be reconsidered at the next Assembly. This is not without precedent since the present scale applicable to provisional advances was adopted temporarily. (The FAO formula was adopted in London as a stop-gap. Under it our share has been approximately 25 percent.)

b. A Sub-Committee of Committee 5 should be appointed to work out this temporary scale since the views of most delegations have been publicly expressed on the floor of Committee 5, and negotiation in such a large body is difficult.

c. That our Delegation try to work out a scale under which the US would contribute just under 40 percent. The opinion that Committee 5 might accept a 39 percent contribution from the US has been expressed to the US Delegation by Mr. C. L. Hsia of China, and the Delegation has reported in this connection that China would be prepared to increase its contribution at least 2 percent in order to partially meet the US position, Mr. Hsia has stated.

d. If a proposed assessment of just under 40 percent should come to a vote in the Sub-Committee, in Committee 5, or in the Assembly, the US Delegation should say that it cannot vote in favor of this percentage but must abstain because it feels the rate of assessment is too high, and unwise even on a one-year basis.

e. If a scale requiring the US to contribute more than 40 percent should come to a vote in the Sub-Committee, in Committee 5, or in the Assembly, the Delegation should vote "No", since the scale is so far from a plan which this government considers wise from the standpoint of the interests of the United Nations. The Delegation should not in this event indicate that the United States will not accept the verdict of the Assembly. A negative vote is simply the only effective way of registering our objection to what we consider a very unwise step.

f. In all the above steps the Delegation should feel free to use its own judgment within the broad lines indicated and to use any lines of procedure which it believes wise and calculated to obtain the desired objectives.

Note: Assistant Secretary Russell is out of the city and we were not able to reach him by telephone. In a conversation with Mr. Panuch,⁹⁴ who was in Washington today, the latter agreed generally with the steps outlined immediately above and was particularly favorable to the idea of a Sub-Committee in which an attempt could be made in a more intimate atmosphere than prevails in a full committee to obtain a satisfactory solution. He did not feel that the amount of money involved was such that we should raise a major issue on that ground alone. He said he would be in New York tomorrow and would be glad to do anything we wished.

I then spoke of the concern felt by our Delegation, especially the Congressional members, with respect to this whole question. I stated that we viewed the matter as a very serious one and that we felt that a contribution of this size would have a most unfortunate effect in our Congress and in the country.

Mr. Gore-Booth stated that the British were under instructions to make a statement they had made on the economic aspect of the question and he felt they were right on that aspect. He added, however, that he knew there was considerable personal feeling in their Delegation that a single country should not be called upon for such a heavy contribution. He added that although they had been instructed to make the statement they made that this was not necessarily their last word on the subject. Entirely of his own volition he made the suggestion that it might be a good thing for Messrs. Noel-Baker⁹⁸ and Younger to discuss this matter with Senators Austin and Vandenberg.⁹⁹

Memorandum by John C. Ross, Senior Adviser to the United States Delegation, to the Political Advisers¹ on the Delegation Staff

CONFIDENTIAL

[NEW YORK,] November 16, 1946.

I have a report this morning from Washington on conversations in which Mr. Hiss participated with Senator Vandenberg, Mr. Acheson, Mr. Clayton, and members of the Congress.

As the result of these conversations the United States position is absolutely clear that there must be a ceiling on contributions.

An energetic campaign on the part of all of our political officers and others concerned in support of this position is essential.

Stated in briefest terms the United States position is that our contribution for this year should be clearly on a provisional basis; the primary objective is to secure acceptance of the ceiling principle. The United States contribution should in no case be larger than 40% and the political officers in their conversations with members of the foreign delegations on this subject should seek actively to persuade other delegations to agree to some percentage under 40%, possibly between 33 and 39%.

⁹⁸ Philip Noel-Baker, Representative on the United Kingdom Delegation.

⁹⁹ No record has been found of such discussions.

¹ For the names of the 13 men who comprised the team of Political Advisers on the United States Delegation advisory staff, and to whom this memorandum was addressed, see footnote 65, p. 41.

(GA(I/2), Fifth Committee, p. 117). The Secretary-General's statement was printed as annex 4 of the proceedings of the Committee (ibid., pp. 291 ff.). His remarks about the contributions question came near the end of his statement: "Finally, I want to say something about contributions. This is, of course, a matter which the Member nations must decide. But there are two questions of principle which involve the Organization as a whole, and which I feel it is the duty of the Secretary General to discuss.

"It is my opinion that there should be both an upward limit and a downward limit to the amount which any State should pay.

"I feel that every Member State can properly be expected to make substantial contribution to the expenses.

"The present figure for some countries should be increased. . . .

"In regard to the second question, namely, the proportion of our expenses to be paid by any Member State, I agree in principle with what has been said by the United States representative in this Committee.

"Current conditions may make it necessary for one State to bear a very high percentage of the budget. But I feel that it would be undesirable from every point of view to allow this condition to continue over a period of many years.

"The international character of the United Nations would be threatened if one State were made to feel that it was primarily responsible for maintaining the Organization in a financial way.

"Even at the cost of sacrifice we must guard against anything which will threaten the independence and freedom of action and the true international nature of our Organization. I am glad that the United States has discussed the question on this plane." (Ibid., pp. 297, 298) portance to the wellbeing of the United Nations. We hope that the Delegation will mobilize all its resources in endeavoring privately to convince other delegations of soundness of our position in this respect. In this connection we suggest special efforts be made to persuade the British Delegation which we believe will play a crucial role in this matter.

2. We still feel that any proportion above twenty-five percent should be recognized as only temporary and should include recognition of principle of a ceiling. We believe that any proportion higher than 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ percent should be for only one year with specific provision being made for reconsideration of the whole problem at the next regular session of the Assembly.

3. We consider it is of utmost importance that Delegation make every effort to keep our temporary share below 40 percent and we note developments since date of your telegram indicate this may be possible.

4. Should Committee 5 vote a U.S. contribution of more than 40 percent we believe the Delegation should definitely vote in the negative as the only way in which this government can register its objection to what it considers a very unwise step from the standpoint of the United Nations themselves.

827. [Here follows brief discussion of several items relating to the current General Assembly.]

*Subcommittee on Contributions (1st Meeting)*⁴

Senator Vandenberg declared that the U.S. position on contributions was designed to save the UN, not to save money, as he warned the Subcommittee on Contributions on November 19 of the adverse effect on U.S. public opinion of the 49.89 per cent quota. He called for consideration of more than the major "capacity to pay" factor in order to reach an equitable solution which would take into account the principle of sovereign equality.

The U.S. was prepared to accept a 37 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent quota for the purposes of the Subcommittee discussions, although it was not rigidly committed to this figure, Vandenberg said.

⁴The records of the subcommittee are not printed except for the subcommittee's report to the Fifth Committee (GA (I/2), Fifth Committee, pp. 318 ff., annex 6).

Vandenberg urged the Subcommittee to accept the statistics of the Contributions Committee Report and to proceed immediately to a decision on the major policy questions. The problem before the Subcommittee, he pointed out, was political rather than one of relative statistics. The U.S., Vandenberg asserted, had no intention of raising the question of the validity of the statistics involved, and considered the Committee's report as good a job as could be accomplished under difficult circumstances.

Expressing the hope that the U.S. would continue to have a good opinion of the UN, Vandenberg asserted that it was not only morally dangerous to the UN but damaging in terms of U.S. public opinion for any one nation to pay almost fifty per cent of the costs.

Urging the Subcommittee to transfer its discussions from percentages to dollars, Vandenberg pointed out that there was a difference of only two million dollars in actual cash between the proposed 49.89 per cent and the tentative U.S. figure of 37½ per cent. He called upon the small nations to absorb this difference in order to defend the principle of sovereign equality and to prevent prejudicing public reaction in the U.S. The 37½ per cent figure was acceptable to the U.S., he added, even though it was the present view that the normal contribution of any one nation should not exceed 33⅓ per cent.

The U.S., Vandenberg said, would not involve itself in the ensuing discussions, but would leave the decisions in the hands of the other members on the Subcommittee. He wished to make it clear that there was no threat, no pressure by the U.S., and therefore he would withdraw from Subcommittee deliberations. A U.S. representative would remain to provide information and answer questions. Vandenberg assured the Subcommittee that he was prepared to return at any time and discuss the problem with the Subcommittee if it so requested.

Vandenberg said that he was exploring with the U.S. Secretary of the Treasury the possibility of making special arrangements under which dollar exchange could be made available to those countries whose contributions to the UN were made difficult by lack of U.S. currency.

Martinez-Cabanas (Mexico) who had been elected Chairman, supported Vandenberg's statement and said the Subcommittee would avoid the study of statistics and would restrict itself to actions necessary to achieve agreement on questions of policy. The main decision facing the Subcommittee, he pointed out, related to the political question of a possible floor and ceiling on contributions. The Advisory Committee of Experts, he asserted, would have to settle the questions raised by the entry of new members and the claims of several countries that the "capacity to pay" index unfairly represented their present capabilities.

Younger (U. K.) replied to Vandenberg in a conciliatory statement in which he noted U. K. agreement on the question of statistics and expressed appreciation for Vandenberg's clear statement on the difficulties presented by adverse U. S. public opinion. He was particularly interested, he asserted, in Vandenberg's remarks on the "special arrangements for dollar exchange." Such arrangements would solve most of the serious problems which confronted several contributors to the UN, Younger declared. He expressed some doubt, however, of the possibility of achieving any satisfactory solution.

Dzung⁵ (China) supported the U. S. views and asserted that the task facing the Subcommittee related to questions of policy and practical politics rather than to mere statistics. He urged consideration of other factors than "capacity to pay" and exploration of all other available criteria in order to reach an equitable solution.

836. GA Secret Summary.

[Here follows discussion of several matters taking up the attention of the General Assembly and the United States Delegation.]

Committee V, Subcommittee on Contributions (2nd Meeting)

At a continuation of the general debate on November 21, Turkey⁷ requested the Subcommittee to review the Turkish quota in view of the recent devaluation of Turkish currency and its consequent adverse effect on Turkish ability to secure foreign exchange.

St. Laurent⁸ (Canada) opened the discussion, stating that Canada had no quarrel with the criteria which the Committee on Contributions had used in defining "capacity to pay." With respect to Vandenberg's statement at the opening meeting, St. Laurent reasserted the Canadian view that relative per capita contribution was fundamental. If other criteria than "capacity to pay" were considered, Canada would have to put its case as strongly as possible to prevent less fortunate nations from having to pay a higher per capita rate than the U.S.

Geraschenko urged the Subcommittee to consider the substance of Vandenberg's arguments, and on the basis of its discussions to see whether or not something had to be done to meet U. S. demands.

The Soviet delegate recommended that the quotas of new members and the requests of member nations, except the U. S., for the lowering of quotas be referred to the Contributions Committee. Geraschenko (U.S.S.R.) declared that the Subcommittee could come to no solution of its problems if it confined itself to discussing the establishment of a ceiling. Vandenberg, he said, had suggested a 25 per cent ceiling for the U.S., but it might as well have been 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ per cent, or 40 per cent, and any discussion of an arbitrary ceiling would be academic. Geraschenko rejected the Canadian per capita principle, the consideration of contributions as a form of international taxation, and asserted that national revenue as well as the national budgets should be used in establishing capacity to pay.

The Polish delegate⁹ asserted that he appreciated that the U.S. position had been engendered by high principles and not through a desire to save money, but that Poland would have to oppose any attempt to establish ceilings at this time. He felt it was premature even to try to settle when ceilings might go into effect. When peacetime economics had been restored, he continued, quotas would have to be revised and due consideration given to "capacity to pay" and per capita contributions. The Polish delegate then urged lowering Poland's quota.

Pitblado (U. K.) asserted that to establish ceilings at this time would be an arbitrary action taken in a period of changing conditions. He agreed that the decision on the quotas of new members and appeals for lowering of quotas, except that of the U. S., should be referred to the Contributions Committee.

The U. S. request, he asserted, differed from other questions facing the Subcommittee in that it was essentially political. Although under ideal conditions no one would like to see so large a proportion of the UN costs assigned to one nation, the U. K. position remained substantially as it had been stated in Committee V.

Pitblado said he had no very constructive proposals to suggest, but he reminded the Subcommittee that in February the GA had stated that if a ceiling were imposed it should not be one that seriously obscured the relationship between contributions and capacity to pay.

With respect to the U. S. assertion that all nations in the UN had certain influence and responsibilities and that these should not necessarily be related to "capacity to pay," Pitblado reminded the Subcommittee that no nation could escape consideration of the public opinion factor. Referring to the matter of foreign exchange, Pitblado reminded the Subcommittee that the U. K. was well aware of the difficulties of procuring it in terms of added effort at production and reduction of goods for home consumption.

China¹⁰ opposed consideration of support of the UN as a form of international taxation rather than as national contributions. China recognized the justice of the U. S. request for a reduction in its quota because the request stemmed from an unselfish desire to give strong support to the UN. The Chinese delegate then suggested that the principle of sovereign equality might be applied to the smaller administrative budget and "capacity to pay" to the larger operational budgets.

The French delegate¹¹ asserted that he did not believe that the Subcommittee had the technical ability or the time to fix a new scale of contributions. Although no one could disagree with the justness and fairness of Vandenberg's statement of principles, the French delegate questioned whether the U. S. meant those principles to be practically applied in relation to the 1947 budget. He pointed out that in his belief, Vandenberg, even in his statements in Committee V, had not pressed for immediate adjustment, and that it was his understanding that what the U. S. wanted at this time was a recognition that the present U. S. contribution should not be a precedent.

¹⁰ Dr. C. L. Hsia was the Chinese Member on the Fifth Committee; Mr. J. C. Pao was the Alternate Member.

¹¹ The French Member was M. Jacques Rueff; the Alternate Member was M. Andre Ganem.

Two suggestions were put forward by the French delegate (1) that the Subcommittee defer any discussion of the foreign exchange element until it received advice on the results of Vandenberg's discussions with the U.S. Secretary of the Treasury, and (2) that the Subcommittee seriously consider Rueff's (France) proposal in Committee V that the Secretariat Fiscal Committee be requested for a redefinition of "capacity to pay."

Speaking as Chairman and the representative of Mexico, Martinez-Cabanas¹² recalled that only the matter of administrative budgets was before the Subcommittee. He also pointed out that the SYG's remarks on establishing a floor on contributions, as well as a ceiling, would have to be discussed. He expressed some doubt that contributions could be too closely related to per capita income in view of the fact that quotas were essentially based on national income.

SECRET US URGENT NEW YORK, November 22, 1946—4:30 p. m.
[Received 5:49 p. m.]

840. For Hiss from Sandifer. Senator Vandenberg has addressed to me the following memorandum concerning the reply to his telegram to Clayton concerning possible assistance to countries in need of dollar exchange for payment of UN contributions (No. 825). Dept's telegram to Vandenberg was sent to CFM (Secdel 1175, Nov. 20, 4 p. m.).¹³

"You have seen the Acheson message in response to my inquiry to Mr. Clayton regarding the use of the International Monetary Fund in connection with the settlement of UN assessments by countries which are short of dollar exchange. The message says: 'International Monetary Fund when in operation will undoubtedly be of great assistance to countries short of dollars, but Fund will not be in active operation until some time next year.'

This matter is of such vital importance to most of the member nations—and has such intimate bearing upon the allocation of assessments—that I wish it could be possible for us to get more definitely and specifically encouraging message from Washington on the subject. I can not overemphasize the effect this will have on the whole subject of both administrative and operations allocations. The Acheson message intimates generically that the international monetary fund 'when in operation' will be of assistance when it gets into 'operation sometime next year'. Most of these assessments will be payable 'sometime next year'. Therefore, the time element would not be a barrier to the usefulness of assurances for the future if the assurances could take a somewhat more definite form. Even if we were able to expand the settlement of these UN accounts into sterling as well as dollars, it would be a great and welcome relief. I should think there ought to be some way that the international monetary fund could promise top priority to the problem of facilitating the settlement of UN internal accounts and to seek to create some specific machinery for this purpose because the successful financing of UN is at the base of all international cooperation.

The question I submit to you is this. Is it impossible for the State Department at Washington to give us a more concrete or at least a more encouraging reply to my original question? The report which I have to make on this subject on the UN Contributions Committee will have a far-reaching impact upon the whole UN fiscal problem which involves such vital considerations for the US."

Would appreciate your taking any feasible steps to have this question re-examined in the light of the additional considerations set forth by Senator Vandenberg. It is important, if at all possible, to enable him to give to the Contributions Committee the more concrete and encouraging statement which he stresses. [Sandifer.]

WASHINGTON, November 26, 1946—1 p. m.

Secdel 1194. As you know, International Monetary Fund operates on basis of fixed quotas to each country for the purchase of dollars with their local currency. Under Articles of Agreement, Fund cannot start operating, however, until exchange rates have been fixed for countries having about two-thirds of such quotas. When this has been done, the countries for which exchange rates have been fixed can then purchase dollars up to the limit of their quota paying for same in their local currency. Such purchases are approved only for current transactions which however would include payments of UN assessments.

Since there is now a disparity of from one hundred to eight hundred percent between official and actual market rates of exchange in many countries, particularly in Europe, you will appreciate, I am sure, the great difficulty which the Fund faces in fixing a proper rate. Up to now no rates have been fixed. The Fund expects to begin operations sometime this winter. At such time, the amount of dollar exchange that the members of the Fund exclusive of the United States and the United Kingdom could purchase from the Fund in the first year of operation is over three-quarters of a billion dollars provided the necessary conditions of purchase are met.

If there is any further information desired please let me know.

SECRET

Payment of United Nations Assessments in Local Currencies

Senator Vandenberg said that one of the fundamental questions in connection with United Nations assessments was whether they might be paid in local currencies. He read to the Delegation a statement which he intended to make before Committee V as follows:

Pursuant to my promise to your Committee, I have made a thorough examination of the possibilities that United Nations assessments may hereafter be paid in local currencies. I regret that my report cannot be more immediately encouraging. But there is substantial hope of some relief along these lines next year through the International Monetary Fund.

This Fund operates on the basis of fixed quotas to each country for the purchase of dollars with their local currency. The Fund cannot operate, however, until exchange rates have been fixed for countries having about two-thirds of such quotas. Up to now no such rates have been fixed, the difficulty being that there is a disparity of from one hundred per cent to eight hundred per cent between official and actual market rates of exchange in many countries.

But it is expected that the Fund will begin operations sometime this Winter. At such time, the amount of dollar exchange that Members of the Fund, exclusive of the United States and the United Kingdom, could purchase from the Fund in the first year of operation is over three-quarters of a billion dollars provided the necessary conditions of purchase are met.

This is the most important part of my report. Approved transactions through the Fund will include payments of United Nations assessments.

I have found no way, except through the Fund, that assistance can be made available in connection with the problem submitted to my study.¹⁶

The meeting adjourned at 9:45 a. m.

*Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. William Hall of the United States Delegation Staff of Advisers*¹⁷

CONFIDENTIAL

[NEW YORK,] November 27, 1946.

Mr. Martinez¹⁸ of Mexico asked Mr. David Pitblado of the U.K., Mr. Orlov¹⁹ of the U.S.S.R., and myself to meet with him this afternoon.

At this session he proposed that the United States contribution be set at 40 percent; that the United Kingdom, Soviet Union, France, and China be asked to pay a contribution equivalent to the Committee of Contributions' recommendations plus 20 percent; and that countries other than the Big Five be asked to pay the Committee on Contributions' recommendation plus 5 percent with the exception of Canada, India, Czechoslovakia, and Poland which would be exempt from the 5 percent additional amount.

I said that we would prefer to consider the contributions question from the standpoint of the present provisional scale and, departing from that, show increases and decreases; that further our present instructions were that the United States contribution should not be more than 37½ percent, and I felt sure personally that there would be no possibility of obtaining approval of a contribution of 40 percent. Pitblado and Orlov objected strenuously to the use of the provisional scale as a basis for contributions and also objected very strongly to Martinez's proposal that a heavier assessment should apply to the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union than to the smaller countries. They cited the argument which we have been using, namely, that all countries had equal rights in the organization. The small countries had the same voting rights with the exception of the veto and that, in addition, countries other than the Big Five received many specific benefits from the United Nations organization.

Martinez then said he would prepare a scale which was based on a 10 percent reduction in the United States contribution which would be based on a 39.89 percent contribution by the United States and which would provide for contributions by other countries in accordance with the index proposed by the Contributions Committee plus approximately 7½ percent with the exception of China which had agreed to pay an additional amount because of its under-assessment, and Argentina and Brazil who had also agreed to pay additional amounts because of their under-assessments. He also agreed to put into his calculations Sweden at 2 percent and Afghanistan and Iceland at .04 and to provide for a floor on contributions at .04.

Pitblado then raised the question as to how the 2.08 percent of the new members might be provided in the scale which would apply to the 1946 budget. He said that, in line with the United States argument that the allowance of war dislocation should be revised downward each year, it seemed reasonable to him to ask the United States to carry this additional amount for the financial year 1946 in which the war dislocation was the greatest. He said he thought the United Kingdom Government would be willing to include in the Sub-committee report a statement to the effect that the scale should be revised each year for the next few years to take into account economic recoveries of the war-damaged countries; that the Sub-committee had noted the view of the United States representative that 33-⅓ percent constituted a reasonable ceiling for any one country; further that, while the Committee was not prepared as yet to set a definitive figure for such a ceiling, it recognized that under normal conditions some such figure as that proposed by the United States would not be unreasonable as the highest normal rate of contribution of any one nation. The Committee might also note that it would be anticipated that each year for the next several years the contributions of those countries which are today paying a proportionately large scale of contributions, namely, the United States, Canada, Argentina, Brazil, and Sweden, and others would expect some reduction in their contributions to take account of economic recoveries.

I said that I did not know what the attitude of the United States Delegation would be on this proposal; that I appreciated the difficulties which the Committee would face in apportioning the Swedish contribution over the 1946 contributions; and that, while I could appreciate the mechanical advantages of the United States acceptance of the additional contribution, I would want to consult my Delegation as [to] the political difficulties which might be encountered within the United States.

I said further that, insofar as the proposed 39 percent contribution for the United States to the 1947 budget and the Working Capital Fund was concerned, I could make no commitment and would put them on notice that our present instructions would not permit us to agree to any such figures, and that I would make an effort to obtain further particular instructions on this point.²⁰

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. William Hall of the United States Delegation Staff of Advisers

CONFIDENTIAL

[NEW YORK,] November 30, 1946.

Subject: Contributions Scale

Participants: Mr. Martinez-Cabanias (Mexico)
Mr. D. Pitblado (United Kingdom)
Mr. André Ganem (France)
Mr. Nicolai V. Orlov (USSR)
Mr. William Hall, Executive Officer, Committee 5

Mr. Martinez asked us to meet at the Mexican Delegation office for the purpose of developing an alternative scale to that discussed at an earlier meeting.

Mr. Martinez inquired at the opening of the meeting whether I had had an opportunity to discuss informally with my Delegation the United States contribution of 39.89 per cent with the United States assumption of new countries' contributions during 1946. I replied that I had discussed it some with my Delegation and I found there was little enthusiasm for any scale which called for a United States contribution in excess of 37-½ per cent; that I found particularly strong opposition to a proposal which would bring the United States contribution for either 1946 or 1947 up to 40 per cent.

Mr. Pitblado then said he had discussed the question in his Delegation and found that most of their people felt that the United States should contribute 42 per cent at least for the year 1946. I said I thought that I would personally be prepared to discuss further a scale which fixed the United States contribution at 39 per cent for 1947 and for the Working Capital Fund, with the understanding that the increase required because of the absence of new members during 1946 might be spread mathematically across the entire scale.

I said that it might be very useful to consider again the possibility of comparing the suggested index of the Contributions Committee with the scale which was now in force for contributions to the General Assembly, and that the Subcommittee might like to consider the possibility of making the new scale apply only to the 1947 budget,

²⁰ In telegram 873, November 28, 8:40 p. m., from New York, Senator Austin informed the Department that "The French Delegation would make every effort to work with the Subcommittee on Contributions in arriving at a solution which would be fair to the U.S." This information was conveyed by M. Georges Peissel, French Adviser-Member on the Fifth Committee. M. Peissel said that "His Delegation was much impressed by Vandenberg's statesmanlike handling of the difficult problem." (501.BB Summaries/11-2846) leaving the provisional scale in effect for 1946 and the Working Capital Fund.

As usual, this was violently opposed by everyone present at the meeting. It was agreed that Mr. Martinez would prepare for presentation a scale based on a United States contribution of 37.5 per cent, a United States contribution of 42 per cent, and a United States contribution of 39 per cent. We then proceeded to develop the attached scale which is based on the Committee scale reduced mathematically to a United States contribution of 39 per cent, which spreads certain other downward adjustments and the difference between 39 and 39.89 per cent for the United States.

It was agreed that the members of the Committee, other than the United States, would discuss the scale with the several representatives on Committee 5 to obtain their reactions.

During the discussion of the scale it became apparent that the Soviets were unwilling to accept their fair share of the increase. I pressed Mr. Orlov until the increase for the Soviet Union and the two Republics equaled .5, which was Mr. Geraschenko's earlier commitment to me on the total Soviet increase. At that point Mr. Orlov refused to discuss the matter further and we left the Soviet figure at 6.43 per cent.

I am sure that the United Kingdom and other Delegations will insist on a reappraisal of the Soviet contribution in the Subcommittee. This is particularly true because of the sizeable increases assumed by several of the countries and the very small difference (.33) between the French and the Soviet Union contributions.

Mr. Ganem of the French Delegation was very helpful in agreeing to assume additional burdens. It seems to me that the French (at 6.12) have assumed more than a fair share of their cost of the Organization.

The United Kingdom contribution might, it seems to me, be increased to 12 per cent, but I doubt if they would be willing to agree to any such increase unless the Soviet contribution is also raised.

Senator Vandenberg of the United States Delegation to the Secretary of State

PERSONAL

NEW YORK, November 30, 1946.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Our various United Nation budget problems will shortly come to a climax. I want you to know the situation at first hand because I think the fiscal situation can be a far greater threat to the United Nations (and particularly to the attitudes of the American people) than even the *veto*²¹ issue.

As you know, an Advisory Committee²² (including our Mr. Appleby) reported that the United States has 50% of the United Nations "capacity to pay" annual assessments. I have been fighting this percentage in my Committee for five weeks. I fear that any such assessment against us would shock the American people into a literal revolt. We now have some hope of driving this percentage down to 39% or 40% for administrative expenditures, (on a temporary basis for one year). Even this will be difficult to "sell" to Congress and the American people. But this is only half the story.

Unfortunately, each UN "specialized agency" is virtually autonomous in making its budgets and its allocations. Undoubtedly, they will be largely influenced by the basic percentage of assessment which we accept for the central budget. This in turn produces hazardous consequences. The trouble is that all members of the United Nations are not members of the specialized agencies. For instance, only one-half of them belong to UNESCO. Therefore, a 40% base will become substantially higher when applied to the UNESCO budget. This is relatively true in connection with the budgets of all "specialized agencies" (which are being created entirely too rapidly and too ambitiously).

²¹ For documentation on this subject, see pp. 251 ff.

²² Senator Vandenberg's intended reference here was to the Committee on Contributions, not to be confused with the General Assembly's other standing committee on administrative and fiscal matters, the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions.

Consider the refugee prospectus. The State Department is talking about an American assessment for IRO between 43% and 50%. But! It is also proposed to launch IRO when seventy-five percent of its budget has been subscribed. Meanwhile, our dollar contribution would remain the same. This means it could actually represent an assessment against us of 66 $\frac{2}{3}$ percent. I think this would excite the same sort of Congressional resistance as nearly defeated our 72% assessment in UNRRA.

I have been struggling to get one unified budget not only for the Central Office but also for all "Specialized Agencies."²³ I seriously fear the Congressional reaction when eight or ten separate and different budgets are submitted to Congress one by one. It will be impossible to accomplish anything along this line at this General Assembly except to order a study for future consideration.²⁴

This leaves us confronting uncoordinated budgets for 1947 and dangerously high percentages of American contribution. I, therefore, think it is highly important that all of our American representatives in "Specialized Agencies" should be emphatically instructed by the State Department to hold all 1947 budgets to an absolute minimum and likewise to hold our net contribution in the neighborhood of 40%.²⁵

With warm personal regards and best wishes,

Cordially and faithfully,

A. H. VANDENBERG

²⁴ See Fifth Committee discussions on November 18 in GA (I/2), Fifth Committee, pp. 125-128. These discussions in turn led on November 21 to the adoption of a draft resolution by the Committee which requested the Secretary General to explore ways for developing "a system of close budgetary and financial relationships between the United Nations and the specialized agencies. . . ." (ibid., pp. 140-143). A resolution to this effect was adopted by the General Assembly on December 14 (United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, Second Part, Plenary Meetings, p. 1376; hereafter cited as GA (I/2), Plenary).

938. GA Secret Summary.

[Here follow the first two items of the summary.]

Subcommittee on Contributions of Committee V (3rd Meeting)

Developments at the Subcommittee meeting on December 6 indicated to the USdel representative that the U.S. could probably obtain approval of a 39.89 per cent contribution for 1946 but would have difficulty ensuring that this figure would apply for only one year.

Chairman Martinez (Mexico) stated that there were three issues before the Subcommittee requiring an answer from USdel. He listed them as, a 39 per cent contribution for the U.S. for 1947; assumption of the contributions of the three new members which would bring the 1946 contribution to 41.59 per cent; and acceptance of the 1947 scale for 1948.

The Contributions Committee's recommendations for the new members were presented as, Sweden 2.20 per cent; Afghanistan—.03 per cent; Iceland—.02 per cent. It was agreed that separate scales were required for 1946 and 1947. It was also agreed that the GA's basic resolution requiring adjustment of the Working Capital Fund to fit the 1946 contribution scale would have to be altered to provide for the adjustments to be made to the 1947 scale.

Ganem (France) supported in principle a limitation on contributions and inquired whether the U.S. might be willing to accept for 1946 the 2.69 per cent contributed by new members in 1947. Orlov (USSR) supported the French proposal and stated that the adopted scale should apply for 1946, 1947, and 1948 since no substantial change in world economic conditions could be expected in the next few years. He urged the Subcommittee to consider whether a 39 per cent U.S. contribution represented too great a deviation from the principle of capacity to pay.

Pitblado (U.K.) supported the French request that the U.S. absorb the differential between the 1946 and 1947 scales. He recommended that the 1947 scale should also apply to the Working Capital Fund. He recognized the validity of the U.S. arguments for a ceiling, but thought the difficulty came in fixing the limitation on the normal amount, referring to the mystic 40 per cent.

Geraschenko (U.S.S.R.) urged the U.S. to absorb the 2.59 per cent contributions of new members as a gesture of good will. He argued for a three-year scale and agreed to a 39 per cent contribution for the U.S. for 1947.

Chairman Martinez's suggested scales for 1946 and 1947 were supported in general by France and the U.K. These scales called for a 39.89 per cent contribution from the U.S. for 1946 and a 39 per cent 1947 contribution for the budget and Working Capital Fund. The U.K. was set at 11.98 for 1946 and 11.65 per cent for 1947. The U.S.S.R. would pay 6.62 for 1946 and 6.43 per cent for 1947.

United States Delegation Position Paper

SECRET

[NEW YORK,] December 8, 1946.

UNITED STATES CONTRIBUTION TO THE ADMINISTRATIVE BUDGET OF THE UNITED NATIONS

Recommendations:

1. The Delegation of the United States is prepared to recommend to Congress that we accept as our contribution to the 1946 and 47 Budget and the Working Capital Fund a figure not to exceed 39.89 percent of the total, with the following distinct reservation:

a. That under no circumstances do we consent that under normal conditions any one nation should pay more than a maximum of 33-1/3 percent in an organization of "sovereign equals."

b. That the difference between 33-1/3 percent and 39 percent is voluntarily assumed by us for 1947 and for the Working Capital Fund because we recognize that normal post-war economic relationships have not yet been restored and we are willing to accept this added, temporary assessment to assist the United Nations in meeting the emergency.

2. The Delegation of the United States is unwilling to have any contributions figure set for 1948 or thereafter. It believes that since the scale reflects abnormal economic conditions, the scale should be annually reviewed to reflect whatever economic changes occur from year to year. It would also anticipate that other factors than so-called "relative capacity to pay" will be given hereafter the consideration they deserve as a matter of sound public policy in an international organization of "sovereign equals."

3. The Delegation of the United States will request that this statement be made a part of the record of the General Assembly.²⁶

Committee V, Subcommittee on Contributions (4th Meeting).

Senator Vandenberg on December 9 stated the "final" U.S. position on scales of contribution pointing out that an amount not exceeding 38.89 [39.89?] per cent of the UN budget and Working Capital Fund was the limit that could be recommended for Congressional approval.

There were two reservations which he wished to make clear, Vandenberg said, (1) under no circumstances could the U.S. consent to any one nation paying more than a maximum of 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ per cent under normal conditions, and (2) the U.S. was voluntarily assuming the larger percentage for the 1947 budget and Working Capital Fund as a temporary assessment to assist the UN in an emergency post-war period of economic allocations.

The U.S. was unwilling, he added, to have any scale of contributions established for 1948 or thereafter because any scale should reflect economic changes which occur from year to year and should annually be reviewed. Vandenberg asserted that the U.S. anticipated that factors other than "capacity to pay" would hereafter be given serious consideration as a matter of sound public policy in an international organization of "sovereign equals."

Discussion closed without agreement being reached on the U.S. position or on a counter proposal that the U.S. assume 40.27 per cent

²⁶ This 3-paragraph statement was introduced into the Sub-Committee record by Senator Vandenberg on December 9 (see telegram 948, December 9, from New York, infra). It was incorporated in its entirety into the Sub-Committee's report to the Fifth Committee (GA (I/2), Fifth Committee, pp. 318 ff., note p. 320) and into the Fifth Committee's Report to the General Assembly (see footnote 27, p. 499 for this citation). The United States statement was preceded in the Fifth Committee's Report by the following: "After discussion in the Sub-Committee the delegation of the United States agreed, notwithstanding their previous statements, to accept as an emergency contribution of 39.89 per cent, with the reservation that the following statement would be included in the records of the General Assembly:"

for 1946 and 39 per cent for 1947. Further alternative proposals, it appeared were being worked out by the Chairman.²⁷

²⁷ At the 5th meeting of the Sub-Committee on December 11 the Sub-Committee reached agreement on an unanimous basis on a scale of contributions for 1946 and 1947 in which the United States was allotted 39.89 percent for each year; this meeting is reported in a detailed secret summary sent to the Department in telegram 955, December 11, 11:15 p. m., from New York (501.BB Summaries/12-1146).

The Sub-Committee's report (GA(I/2), Fifth Committee, pp. 318 ff.) was discussed in the Fifth Committee on December 12 (ibid., pp. 254 and 255), at which time Senator Vandenberg paid special tribute to Dr. Martinez-Cabanas for securing unanimous agreement in the Sub-Committee, and on December 13 (ibid., pp. 272 ff.), when the Committee adopted the Sub-Committee's report by 33 votes, with no opposition, the remaining members abstaining.

issue had been whether the WFTU should be invited to speak before the General Assembly. Kuznetsov (U.S.S.R.)³¹ spoke on behalf of the WFTU as well as in the role of a Soviet Delegate taking the position that the desires of WFTU were clearly set forth in their letters to Mr. Jebb.³² The Secretariat had been of the opinion that no action should be taken until the WFTU clarified its demands.³³ A long discussion took place on inviting the WFTU to appear before the General Committee. The debate was primarily a struggle between the U.K. and the U.S.S.R. . . . Mr. Spaak³⁴ was indecisive. Mr. McNeil³⁵ of the United Kingdom carried the discussion with vigor and aggressiveness, and more than covered the points which the United States Delegation felt should have been made. The General Committee finally took the position, with the Russians agreeing, that a General Committee subcommittee should meet with a WFTU delegation and make a recommendation concerning the relationship of that body to the General Assembly but not the relationship of the WFTU to ECOSOC. The General Committee would then examine the report of the subcommittee and the Committee itself could invite the WFTU to appear before it but such action could not be taken by an individual Delegate.

The Principal Adviser on the United States Delegation (Hiss) to the Secretary of State

[LONDON,] January 18, 1946.

THE PROBLEM

The question of the relations of the World Federation of Trade Unions to UNO was discussed at a meeting of the Subcommittee of the General Committee on January 16 from 9 p.m. to 12:30 a.m.⁵⁶ The WFTU representatives were Messrs. Citrine, Saillant, Jouhaux and Kuznetsov.

³¹ Vassilii V. Kuznetsov, Soviet delegate on the General Committee.

³² Mr. H. M. Gladwyn Jebb who was serving in a temporary capacity as Executive Secretary of the United Nations pending the election of the Secretary-General; the "letters" referred to here consisted of a communication dated December 13, 1945, with enclosure, from the Secretary-General of the WFTU, Mr. Louis Sallant, to the President of the Preparatory Commission which sat in London in late 1945, preceding the General Assembly; see GA (I/1), General Committee, pp. 33 ff., annex 2. As the letter arrived too late for consideration by the Preparatory Commission, and the objectives of the Federation stated therein were not deemed by Mr. Jebb to be sufficiently clear for consideration by the General Assembly, a certain confusion existed at this time as to the nature of the WFTU request.

³³ For a second letter written sent by the WFTU see footnote 37, p. 503.

Three principal problems were discussed:

1. Collaboration with the Assembly
2. Collaboration with the ECOSOC
3. The right to vote in the ECOSOC

1. Collaboration with the Assembly

The representatives of the WFTU were asked two questions:

- (i) Would they desire a permanent seat in the Assembly?
- (ii) Would they claim the right to speak whenever they wanted in the Assembly?

The answer to the first question was a definite "yes". The representatives said that they had not discussed the second question but that they recognized that there would have to be some restriction upon their action in this connection.

2. Collaboration with the ECOSOC

There was no disagreement that relations with the ECOSOC were provided for under Article 71 of the Charter. The WFTU however wanted the General Committee to recommend to the General Assembly that it recommend to the ECOSOC that arrangements be made to provide for regular and permanent consultation with the WFTU. The Labor representatives apparently had in mind having a seat in every meeting of the ECOSOC. Most of the time of the meeting was devoted to the issue of whether the General Assembly should make recommendations to the ECOSOC on this matter. No decision was reached.

3. The Right To Vote in the ECOSOC

The Labor representatives indicated that they would take up at some future time the question of a right to vote in the ECOSOC. They recognized that this would require an amendment to the Charter.

⁵⁶ In a covering memorandum dated January 18 (apparently drafted on January 17) Mr. Hiss told the Secretary of State that it was expected that on January 18 the General Committee would hear the report of the "Subcommittee of 4 which was appointed to ascertain the request of the WFTU. There is attached a memorandum stating what occurred when the Subcommittee met with the WFTU representatives last night and setting forth recommendations as to the position which we feel the United States should take on this question." The Secretary was urged to attend this meeting in person ". . . in view of the importance of the WFTU issues. . . ." (501.BB/1-1846)

No meeting of the General Committee was held on January 18, however, and the Sub-committee's views were not received by the Committee until January 21. Presumably the Sub-committee was awaiting the clarification of the WFTU's objectives desired by the Secretariat, which was conveyed by the WFTU in its letter of January 17; see footnote 37, p. 503.

The question was also raised whether the Subcommittee was going to recommend that the WFTU representatives be given a hearing by the General Committee. They were told that this was a question for the General Committee to decide and not for the Subcommittee to decide.

RECOMMENDED U. S. POSITION

It is recommended that the U. S. should take the general position that the WFTU is not a unique case to be considered only on its own merits but that any privileges extended to it would also have to be accorded to other large international non-governmental organizations.

In the specific issues raised it is recommended that:

1. Collaboration with the Assembly

The United States should take a definite position that the WFTU is not entitled to a seat in the Assembly nor to the privilege of speaking in the Assembly.

This point was raised by some of the British representatives with Mr. Bevin this morning and he stated emphatically that no such right or privilege should be given the WFTU.

2. Collaboration with ECOSOC

The United States should take the position that this is a matter to be taken up by ECOSOC in connection with Article 71 of the Charter and that no action by either the General Assembly or the General Committee would be appropriate until a recommendation on the matter has been made by ECOSOC.

3. The Right To Vote in the ECOSOC

If our recommended position under point 2 is sustained this question will not arise. If it does arise, the United States should definitely oppose any action which would lead to the granting of the right to vote.

4. Further Hearing of the WFTU by the General Committee

The United States should take the position that the Subcommittee has now heard the wishes of the WFTU and that there is no need for the General Committee to hear any further statement from them. If any question arises requiring clarification, the Subcommittee might meet again with the representatives of the WFTU in order to save the time of the full Committee.

United States Delegation Position Paper

SECRET

[LONDON,] January 21, 1946.

WORLD FEDERATION OF TRADE UNIONS ISSUE

In the General Committee, when the subcommittee which has conferred with representatives of the WFTU reports, there will apparently be three issues:³⁷

1. Whether the WFTU will have the right to sit regularly in the Assembly, and to speak at its request under special arrangements;
2. Whether the WFTU will have the special right to participate in the meetings of ECOSOC, its commissions and committees, and eventually the right to vote; and
3. The action to be taken by the General Committee on these points.

The General Committee should dispose of these questions in the following manner and for the following reasons:

1. Collaboration with and the right to vote in ECOSOC.

Provision is made in Article 71 of the Charter for consultation of non-governmental agencies with ECOSOC. Neither the General Assembly nor the General Committee should take any action on the question of relations of non-governmental organizations with ECOSOC. This is a matter for ECOSOC itself.

Recommendation: The President should be advised by the General Committee to reply in writing to the WFTU in this sense and he should inform the General Assembly of this advice.

³⁷ The second WFTU letter, dated January 17, and signed by Sir Walter Citrine, President of the Federation, as well as the Secretary-General, Mr. Saillant, had been received by the Sub-Committee during its deliberations, and stated in pertinent part: "We feel it should be possible for representatives of the World Federation of Trade Unions to be invited to sit in the Assembly in an advisory and consultative capacity, and also to be brought into regular consultation, under the provisions of Article 71 of the Charter, with the Economic and Social Council. We would also hope that, at a later date, the World Federation of Trade Unions would be accorded full participation in the work of the Economic and Social Council, with the right to vote." (For complete text, see GA (I/1), General Committee, pp. 38-40, annex 2a)

By January 21 the General Committee also had received requests from three more non-governmental organizations for association with the organs of the United Nations along the general lines of the request from the WFTU: the International Cooperative Alliance, the International Federation of Women, and the American Federation of Labor (see ibid., pp. 40 ff., annexes 2b, 2c, and 2d). From the outset of the meeting of the General Committee on January 21, when he "submitted that the World Federation of Trade Unions was an organization of a totally different character from the other three. . . .", the chairman of the Ukrainian Delegation to the General Assembly (Manuilsky), was associated with the initiative in all attempts undertaken to establish a special status for the WFTU on this basis, first in the General Committee, then in the First Committee, and finally on the floor of the General Assembly.

2. Collaboration with the Assembly.

The United States should take a definite position against the proposals of the WFTU on this issue and should vote against it in the General Committee for the following reasons:

a. UNO is an association of governments. The Charter of the United Nations does not make any provision for relations between the Assembly and private organizations or individuals. Furthermore, there is no such provision in the rules of procedure.

b. The Charter provides under Article 71 for a special type of relations between the ECOSOC and private non-governmental organizations. By implication the Charter does not contemplate any similar relations directly with the General Assembly.

c. If any particular private international organization is given a special relationship with the General Assembly, the General Assembly would undoubtedly find it necessary to deal similarly with a large number of applications from other similar organizations.

Recommendation: The General Committee should advise the President to reply in writing to the WFTU in this sense and he should inform the General Assembly of this advice.

3. General Approach.

a. The U.S. representative should make it completely clear in his statements that they are not based on any antagonism toward the WFTU but are based on general constitutional considerations and that the position of the United States would be the same regardless of what private non-governmental organization made a similar request.

4. Procedural question of a recommendation to the General Assembly.

a. There is an additional argument why the General Committee should not recommend to the Assembly that the WFTU request should be granted, i.e., the procedural ground that the General Committee has no authority to make recommendations on substantive issues. The most that the General Committee is empowered to do is to refer such matters to the Assembly with a factual report and without recommendations.

5. Possible request for right to speak before General Assembly.

a. Some member of the General Committee may make an alternative suggestion that the Committee recommend to the Assembly that the WFTU be invited to speak before the Assembly at this meeting. We should oppose such a proposal on the following grounds:

1. The General Committee does not have the right to recommend action on the request of a private individual or organization.

2. It is not authorized by the Rules of the Assembly.

3. It would set a bad precedent.

It is recommended that the U.S. maintain this opposition so as to preserve its right to oppose the proposal in the Assembly.

6. Further Hearing of the WFTU by the General Committee.

The United States should take the position that the subcommittee has now heard the wishes of the WFTU and that there is no need for the General Committee to hear any further statement from them. If any question arises requiring clarification, the subcommittee might meet again with the representatives of the WFTU in order to save the time of the full Committee.³⁸

³⁸ For the statements by Senator Connally, United States delegate on the General Committee, to the Committee on January 21 and January 24, in support of the United States position outlined in this memorandum, see GA(I/1), General Committee, pp. 9 and 12. The essence of his argument was that "the admission of any organization to permanent participation of the kind suggested infringed the provisions of the Charter, which were based on the principle of national representation by Governments". (ibid., p. 12).

The question of the representation of non-governmental bodies on the organs of the United Nations continued under the jurisdiction of the General Committee until February 2, at which time the General Assembly received it in the form of a report from the General Committee (see GA(I/1), General Committee, pp. 2-15, passim; pp. 33 ff., annex 2 and appendages; and United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, First Part, Plenary Meetings, pp. 578 ff., annex 5 [the latter hereafter cited as GA(I/1), Plenary]). The General Assembly on February 2 voted immediately to put the WFTU request on its agenda, and passed the problem on to its First Committee (ibid., pp. 326 ff.). On February 14 the General Assembly received a report from the First Committee on the subject with a proposed resolution (United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, First Part, First Committee, pp. 667 ff. [hereafter cited as GA(I/1), First Committee]); and adopted the proposed resolution on February 14 (United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, First Part, Resolutions Adopted by the General Assembly during the First Part of the First Session, p. 10; in the subsequent serialization of the resolutions of the General Assembly this was named Resolution 4 (I)). The complicated maneuvering that occurred both in the General Committee and the First Committee during this period may be traced in the official records of those Committees; General Committee references have been noted above; for the First Committee see GA(I/1), First Committee, pp. 15-35, passim; for consideration of the subject by the General Assembly on February 14, see GA(I/1), Plenary, pp. 501 ff. This problem was canvassed exhaustively by the United States Delegation in meetings from January 25 to February 8; minutes are found in the IO Files, series USGA/Ia/Del. Min. (Chr.).

Throughout this period the United States, represented by Senator Connally in both the Committees and in the General Assembly, adopted a position based on the principles enunciated in numbered paragraph (2.) ("Collaboration with the Assembly") of this memorandum, and as a result the final resolution contained no provision for consultative relationships between non-governmental organizations and the General Assembly. Also by the end of the General Committee phase there was a complete acceptance of the United States view that there could be no question of granting an organization representation with the right to vote in any of the organs of the United Nations as this would constitute an amendment of the Charter. This principle was explicitly stated in the Report of the General Committee to the General Assembly and in the Report of the First Committee to the General Assembly.

Regarding the points set forth in numbered paragraph (1.) ("Collaboration with the right to vote in ECOSOC") of this memorandum, the United States subsequently modified its position, accepting a proposal that the WFTU request should be transmitted by the General Assembly to ECOSOC with a recommendation that suitable arrangements be established as soon as possible; at the same time the United States insisted that the same status be accorded to certain other non-governmental organizations. The resolution adopted by the General Assembly, incorporating these provisions relating to ECOSOC, was based on a draft originally put forward in the First Committee by the United States.

Editorial Note

On June 21, 1946 at the end of its Second Session the Economic and Social Council, in pursuance of the General Assembly's resolution of February 14, agreed upon principles and procedures for the admission of non-governmental organizations to a relationship with ECOSOC, established three categories of eligible organizations, defined their privileges, and set up a standing committee to constitute a channel for establishing effective consultation between the organizations and the Council. The World Federation of Trade Unions, the International Co-operative Alliance and the American Federation of Labor were placed in the first category, designated as "category (a)": this was defined as including "organizations which have a basic interest in most of the activities of the Council and are closely linked with the economic or social life of the areas which they represent". The June 21 decisions of ECOSOC were based on the report of a special committee that had been appointed by ECOSOC on February 18 to implement the General Assembly's resolution of February 14. In turn the report leaned heavily on a memorandum of May 17, 1946 submitted by the United States Representative on the Economic and Social Council (Winant) and a working paper forwarded to the Council by the United Nations Secretariat. Before the Council took final action on the report the Soviet Union offered amendments that would have given the WFTU the right to participate without vote in the meetings of the Council and those of its commissions and committees. In the discussion that followed, concluding with the defeat of the Soviet proposals, the United States Representative (Winant) stated the position of the United States Government that no non-governmental organization should be given rights not accorded to a Member State of the United Nations not on the Council. For the June 21 proceedings of the Council see United Nations, Official Records of the Economic and Social Council, First Year, Second Session, pages 108 ff. (hereafter cited as ESC (II) [ECOSOC records are denoted by session rather than by year]). REPORT ON GENERAL COMMITTEE MEETING

Invitation to Specialized Agencies

Senator Austin reported that at the meeting of the General Committee on October 27 [28], the Secretary-General had asked that there be extended an invitation such as he had given on the opening day to the heads of the specialized agencies including the ILO, FAO, PICOA [PICAO], International Monetary Fund, Bank, WHO, UNRRA and The League.⁴⁰ The Committee approved extending the

⁴⁰ In February 1946 at London the Economic and Social Council at its first session had passed a resolution providing for a Committee on Negotiations with Specialized Agencies and directing the committee to draw up draft agreement for the establishment of relationships between the United Nations and the specialized agencies. These agencies at that time were the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO), the International Labor Organization (ILO), the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), the Provisional International Civil Aviation Organization (PICAO), the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. By June the Committee had negotiated agreements with the ILO, UNESCO and the FAO which were approved by the Economic and Social Council at the end of its second session on June 21, 1946. The third session of the Council, which began on October 3, 1946, saw the approval of the draft of a subsequently negotiated agreement with PICAO. In turn these approved drafts were referred by the Council to the impending session of the General Assembly for the Assembly's approval. A brief survey of these developments and of the provisions of the draft agreements may be found in United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, Second Part, Supplement No. 2, Report by the Economic and Social Council to the General Assembly, 23 January to 3 October 1946, pp. 42-48.

From the outset the United States was very actively interested in the negotiation of these agreements and at an appropriate time the Department of State had forwarded to Mr. John G. Winant, United States Representative to the Economic and Social Council, drafts of the proposed agreements (IO Files, documents SD/SA/4, May 20, 1946 and SD/NSA/1, May 22, 1946, not printed). In a position paper of October 10, 1946, entitled "Consideration and Approval of Agreements Concluded with the Specialized Agencies" (IO Files, document SD/A/C.2/10, not printed), the Department had informed the United States Delegation to the impending session of the General Assembly that "The agreements already negotiated are, in general, satisfactory. They contain certain provisions which have been questioned from certain points of view . . . but they fulfill the requirements of the Charter and leave scope for future implementation and improvement. Meanwhile, pressing substantive problems confront the United Nations and the agencies and it is of great importance that these organizations begin at once the day-to-day collaboration which is contemplated for these bodies. Hence, it is deemed advisable to get the agreements into operation speedily . . ." (Relevant documentation for United States participation in this invitations to these men as guests for the whole session. They were also given the right to address the General Assembly and the committees. Senator Connally remarked that those persons would then have more privileges than members of the General Assembly. Senator Austin replied that the agencies had no rights. He pointed out that the draft agreements between the United Nations and the four specialized agencies were not yet accepted and that the Secretary-General's procedure was simply anticipating the approval of these agreements. If the Delegation disapproved of such an arrangement, the proper step, of course, would be to vote against it. Both Senators Connally and Vandenberg expressed the opinion that the agreements should not accord the representatives of specialized agencies the right to address the General Assembly.

Senator Austin continued that at the General Committee meeting he had favored the Secretariat proposal, admitting the representatives of the above-named organizations as guests. Mr. Sandifer, who had accompanied him, had approved this course. Senator Austin said that when he voted he thought he knew what the invitation meant. However, Mr. Parodi (France) moved that if one particular individual were absent when a matter concerning his agency arose, he should have the right to appoint a deputy to speak in the General Assembly. Then, Senator Austin said, he stated that he had understood that the individuals had been invited as guests only. Chairman Spaak replied that this was not the case, but that the invitation meant they could speak and attend all meetings for purposes of consultation.

Mrs. Roosevelt said that her understanding of the word "consultation" was that the heads of agencies should be consulted if the Assembly or a delegation wished to consult them, but it was up to the Assembly to take the initiative. Mr. Dulles recalled the London debates on the meaning of the word "consultation" and the Soviet view that determination of the need for consultation could be made by either party.

Senator Austin described the manoeuvre of the General Committee as a forward pass. The agencies were now out ahead of the agreements which were not yet approved. He pointed out if the Delegation did

For the text of the memorandum submitted by the Secretary-General to the General Committee on October 28, see United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, Second Part, General Committee, p. 105, annex 19; hereafter cited as GA(I/2), General Committee. not approve this arrangement, it could be changed in the contracts still to be signed.

Mr. Sandifer wished that Senator Austin's report should be clearly understood. When the United States agreed to the plan it had no information that the term "guest" was to be construed to mean that the representatives should have the right to speak. However, when the interpretation of the term "guests" was made, it had not been desirable to raise an objection.

Mr. Sandifer continued that the most important point of the agreements was an agreement for reciprocal representation. The specialized agencies were to be represented in United Nations meetings and vice versa. Even in the face of yesterday's move, he considered that the representatives could make statements only by invitation of the General Assembly. He said he was concerned that there should be a sound mutual basis of cooperation in view of the importance of some of the specialized agencies. Collaboration between those agencies and the United Nations was most important. However, the former had a tendency to hold back, which was explicable in part because of differences within the governments of the respective members. He cited as an example the fact that the Bank was slow about making an agreement with the United Nations. This was in part attributable to the fact that matters in connection with the Bank were handled by the Treasury rather than the State Department. A similar split in other governments explained a good deal of the reluctance of specialized agencies to conclude agreements with the United Nations.

Mr. Sandifer continued that a more important aspect of the question arose in respect to the possible parallel demands by non-governmental organizations. Manuilsky and Vishinsky⁴¹ had both served notice that they intended to press for a status for the WFTU similar to that granted the specialized agencies. Mr. Sandifer further remarked that it would have been much more preferable from the United States' view for the guest status to have been extended only to those four agencies which had concluded draft agreements with the Economic and Social Council, in order that there should be some advantage accruing to those who made agreements.

[Here follow brief remarks by Senator Austin, Senator Connally, and Mrs. Douglas.]

Mrs. Roosevelt believed that the emphasis should always be placed on the fact that it was an invitation extended which enabled the agencies to appear before the General Assembly. The Assembly, of course, had the right to ask an explanation on any point. She pointed out that these agreements had been made in the Economic and Social Council and were now being submitted to the General Assembly for its approval. She could not imagine that the Economic and Social Council could have said that the agencies should appear and have a right to speak, because that could only be decided by the General Assembly, which wished to extend an invitation rather than grant a right.

Senator Austin agreed with Mrs. Roosevelt and pointed out that that concept had been stretched when the motion had been approved that there could be substitute speakers.

Senator Austin then read into the record the following paragraph from the draft agreement with the ILO: "Representatives of the International Labour Organization shall be invited to attend in a consultative capacity meetings of the General Assembly and shall be afforded full opportunity for presenting to the Assembly the views of the International Labour Organization on questions within the scope of its activities."

He noted that the agreement with the FAO and PICAQ was of a somewhat different nature and read the following paragraph from the FAO agreement: "Representatives of the Food and Agricultural Organization of the United Nations shall be invited to attend meetings of the General Assembly for purposes of consultation on matters within the scope of its activities."

Mr. Bloom inquired what and when consultation would take place in the General Assembly. He stated that he thought it should be in committee and not in plenary sessions. Senator Austin said that it was his understanding that any delegate could call on the ILO representative and ask him questions. Mr. Stevenson said that he thought it had been construed that the representatives of the agencies could ask to be heard. Senator Austin replied that the record was not clear, that it was his understanding that the representatives should come as guests.

Mr. Dulles pointed out that when the Delegation talked about "consultation," it did not mean the same thing as other delegations. He cited Article 71 of the Charter and recalled the long struggle which had ensued over it. The U.S.S.R. interpreted this article to mean that the international organizations had the right rather than the privilege to be heard and even to vote, which was a very different meaning from the meaning ascribed to that article by the United States.

Senator Vandenberg said that it should be remembered that the fundamental and original concept of the United Nations was that it was a world organization. It was commencing to mushroom entirely too fast, in Senator Vandenberg's opinion, and he thought the mushrooming was not healthy. He urged that the basic concept should be maintained, that governments and no one else sit and speak in the Assembly, except at the invitation and on the sufferance of the Assembly. If this road, which had been followed from the beginning, were left, the Assembly would wander into the wilderness.

United States Delegation Working Paper

CONFIDENTIAL

[NEW YORK,] November 8, 1946.

MEMORANDUM

REPRESENTATION OF SPECIALIZED AGENCIES AT MEETINGS OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AND OF ITS MAIN COMMITTEES

In view of the fact that this subject has been raised in the General Committee (October 28, 1946), and may come up in the Assembly or in one or more of the committees, the following background information may be found useful. Each of the draft agreements on the agenda for General Assembly approval contains an article on reciprocal representation. The status of representatives of the specialized agencies in respect of plenary meetings of the General Assembly is dealt with in one paragraph, and their status at meetings of the Main Committees of the General Assembly is dealt with in another paragraph.

Plenary Meetings of the General Assembly

Three of the agreements (FAO, UNESCO, and PICAQ) contain essentially similar provisions to the effect that representatives of the agencies shall be invited to attend meetings of the General Assembly "for purposes of consultation" on matters within the scope of their activities (see attachment giving the texts of paragraph 3, Article II or III, in each of the four draft agreements). The corresponding provision in the draft agreement with the ILO provides that representatives of that organization shall be invited to attend meetings of the General Assembly "in a consultative capacity" and, unlike the other three agreements, goes on to state that they "shall be afforded full opportunity for presenting to the General Assembly the views of the ILO on questions within the scope of its activities".

These provisions in the agreements with FAO, UNESCO, and PICAQ do not appear to confer upon these agencies a right to take the initiative in presenting general statements about the work of their organizations at plenary meetings of the General Assembly. The corresponding provision in the agreement with the ILO, however, might be interpreted as granting such a right. On the other hand, a case can be made that the wording of paragraph 3, Article II, of the ILO draft agreement should be taken to mean that the ILO shall be afforded full opportunity for presenting its views to the General Assembly only when questions within the scope of ILO's activities are under discussion in the General Assembly.

Meetings of Main General Assembly Committees

The paragraphs in the four agreements dealing with the question of representation of the specialized agencies at meetings of the Main Committees are essentially similar. (See attachment giving the texts of paragraph 4, Article II or III, in each of the four draft agreements.) They provide that representatives of the agencies shall be invited to attend meetings when matters within the scope of their activities are under discussion and "to participate, without vote, in such discussions". The wording of the paragraph in the agreement with the ILO is slightly more favorable to that Organization than the corresponding wording in the other three agreements; that is, it provides the ILO with a somewhat better basis for claiming that it "has an interest" in matters under discussion.

Comments

It will be seen from the foregoing and from the texts reproduced in the attachment to this memorandum, that neither the word "guests" nor the word "observers" adequately describes the status of representatives of the specialized agencies, under their draft agreements with the UN, in respect of plenary meetings of the General Assembly or meetings of the Main Committees of the Assembly.

Pending the coming into force of the agreements between the specialized agencies and the UN, the General Assembly and its Main Committees need not accord to representatives of the four specialized agencies the treatment provided for in the draft agreements but may make ad hoc arrangements to hear them on matters within the competence of the agencies.

Although it might be argued that some differentiation should be made between the privileges accorded to representatives of specialized agencies with which agreements have been concluded and those representing agencies with which negotiations are still in progress or contemplated, it is believed that any such differentiation in treatment at meetings of the General Assembly or of its Main Committees probably would serve no useful purpose.⁴²

[NEW YORK,] November 21, 1946.

REQUEST OF THE WORLD FEDERATION OF TRADE UNIONS FOR CHANGE IN ARRANGEMENTS FOR CONSULTATION WITH THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL

PROBLEM

Mr. Leon Jouhaux, Vice President of the WFTU in a letter of November 12, 1946 to Mr. Spaak⁴⁴ asks that the General Assembly recommend revision of the arrangements for consultation with non-governmental organizations (agreed upon in the Economic and Social Council on June 21, 1946) so as to give the WFTU

1. The right to submit to the Council questions for insertion in the provisional agenda in accordance with the procedure now applicable to specialized agencies. (This procedure is that the Council, subject to such preliminary consultation as may be necessary, includes on its agenda and the agenda of its commissions items proposed by the General Conference or Executive Board of the specialized agencies.)

2. The right to present written and verbal statements to the Council on all matters of concern to the Federation.

Mr. Jouhaux, acting as delegate for France in a Joint Meeting of Committee 2 and 3 on November 20, asked that the above recommendation be adopted, and was strongly supported by the Soviet Delegate.⁴⁵ The U.S. Delegate, Mr. Stevenson, favored a New Zealand proposal that the Assembly simply draw the attention of the Economic and Social Council to the remarks made in the meeting: "and to the letter of 12 November signed by the vice president of the WFTU."⁴⁶ This suggestion did not satisfy the Soviet Union. Further discussion was postponed.

The problem is whether we wish to support a recommendation to the Economic and Social Council that the WFTU be granted the additional rights proposed by Mr. Jouhaux.

RECOMMENDATION

We should strongly oppose any recommendation by the General Assembly to the Economic and Social Council which suggests changes in the arrangements agreed upon for consultation with the WFTU. We should base this opposition on the following grounds:

a. The present arrangements, embodied in the Council's Resolution of June 21, 1946 confirmed by its Resolution of October 1, 1946,⁴⁷ give the WFTU ample opportunities for consultation with the Economic and Social Council. (See Annex I.) In particular with reference to the new demands of the WFTU, the WFTU now has three possibilities of recommending items for inclusion in the provisional agenda of ECOSOC:

(1) By having one or more members of the United Nations submit the item.

(2) By transmitting a recommendation to the President of the Council or to the Secretary-General (which they may place on the agenda at their discretion.)

(3) By addressing a request to the Committee on Non-governmental Organizations of the Council.

Under existing arrangements the WFTU also has the right to transmit to the Council any memoranda, recommendations or draft resolutions bearing on matters before the Council within the special competence of WFTU and such recommendations will be distributed to the members of the Council in full.

b. The present arrangements have been in force for such a brief

⁴⁵ The French request was made on November 18 at the beginning of the Joint Committee's consideration of the draft report of the Economic and Social Council to the General Assembly; for the discussion on November 18 and subsequent discussions on November 22, 23, 26, and 27, see GA (I/2), Joint Second and Third Committee, pp. 1 ff.

⁴⁶ See ibid., p. 96, annex 3a.

⁴⁷ This refers to Council action extending category (a) status to the International Chamber of Commerce, thus adding a fourth non-governmental organization to the three already established in that category by the Council on June 21, see E/SC (III), pp. 112 ff. This move was sponsored by the United States.

period that there is now no basis in experience for questioning their adequacy.

c. The Economic and Social Council is empowered by Article 71 to make the arrangements for consultation with non-governmental organizations, and it is inappropriate for the General Assembly to give the Economic and Social Council instructions on the nature of these arrangements. The Economic and Social Council should be left free to operate under the arrangements which have been agreed upon and which the President of the WFTU, in a meeting on October 2, 1946 with the Council's NGO Committee,⁴⁸ indicated were satisfactory. (See Annex II.)

[Annex I]

ARRANGEMENTS FOR CONSULTATION OF NON-GOVERNMENTAL ORGANIZATIONS WITH THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL ⁴⁹

(Report of the Committee on Arrangements for Consultation with Non-Governmental Organizations of June 21, 1946)

1. It is recognized that the nature of the consultations will vary with the character of the organization. Accordingly, it is recommended that in drawing up its recognized list of organizations the Council should so far as possible define the field of interest of each and should distinguish between:

(a) Organizations which have a basic interest in most of the activities of the Council, and are closely linked with the economic or social life of the areas which they represent;

(b) Organizations which have a special competence but are concerned specifically with only a few of the fields of activity covered by the Council;

(c) Organizations which are primarily concerned with the development of public opinion and with the dissemination of information.

2. Organizations in category (a) may designate authorized representatives to sit as observers at all of the public meetings of the Council. Representatives of these organizations which will include ⁴⁸ On June 21 ECOSOC established a standing committee known as the Committee on Arrangements for Consultations with Non-Governmental Organizations and it was given the official short title of "Council NGO Committee"; see ESC (II), p. 320. The composition of this committee was made up of the President of the Economic and Social Council and four members; these were to be assisted by the United Nations Assistant Secretaries-General for Economic and Social Affairs. The Committee was to perform functions related to listing non-governmental organizations eligible for relationship with the Council and generally to perform in a liaison capacity.

organizations of labour, of management and business, of farmers and consumers, will be entitled to circulate to the various members of the Council written statements and suggestions within their competence. Such communications will be addressed to the Secretariat, which will transmit them to the members of the Council.

3. To insure effective consultation on matters in which organizations have special competence or knowledge, it is recommended that those included in category (a) may be invited by the Council to consult with a standing committee appointed for that purpose, if the Council so desires or the organization requests such consultation. The Chairman of the Standing Committee should be the President of the Council. The representatives of the organizations should be able to participate fully in any consultations of this kind so that the Committee may report to the Council on the basis of a full exchange of views. Upon recommendation of the Standing Committee, the Council as a whole may receive representatives of organizations in category (a) for the purpose of hearing their views.

4. Organizations in categories (b) and (c) may designate authorized representatives to sit as observers at public meetings of the Council. They may submit written statements and suggestions on matters within their competence, and the Secretariat will prepare and distribute a list of all such communications briefly indicating the substance of each. On the request of any member of the Council, a communication will be reproduced in full and distributed. Any lengthy communications will be distributed only if sufficient copies are furnished by the organization concerned.

5. To insure effective consultation on matters in which organizations have special competence or knowledge, it is recommended that those included in categories (b) and (c) may be invited by the Council to consult with a committee appointed for that purpose, if the Council so desires or the organization specifically requests such consultation. Their representatives should be able to participate fully in any consultations of this kind so that the Committee may report to the Council on the basis of a full exchange of views.

[Annex II]

PROCEDURES ESTABLISHED BY THE NON-GOVERNMENTAL ORGANIZATIONS COMMITTEE TO IMPLEMENT THE RESOLUTION OF THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL OF JUNE 21, 1946

The Council NGO Committee pointed out:

1. that the WFTU should receive in advance of every Session of the Council copies of its Provisional Agenda and of documents bearing upon the various points of the Agenda.

2. that under the existing Rules of Procedure of the Council, the WFTU had three possibilities of recommending items for inclusion in the Provisional Agenda as follows:

- (a) by approaching a Member of the United Nations
- (b) by transmitting a recommendation to the President of the Council or to the Secretary-General
- (c) by addressing a request to the Council NGO Committee

3. that in line with Part IV, Paragraph 2⁵⁰ of the above-cited Resolution the WFTU as one of the organizations in category (a) would have the right to transmit to the Council any memoranda, recommendations, or draft resolutions bearing on matters before the Council within the special competence of the WFTU and that such communications would be distributed to the Members of the Council in full.

4. that the WFTU could, according to Part IV, Paragraph 3, request the Council NGO Committee to meet with representatives of the WFTU for the purpose of discussing views put forward by the WFTU.

5. that the Council NGO Committee would give most serious consideration to requests by the WFTU to be heard by the Council as a whole, if it is so desired on specific matters of importance within its special competence or knowledge.

6. that the WFTU under the provisions of Part IV, Paragraph 2, would automatically have the right to submit written communications to the Council protesting any decision by the Council NGO Committee, including a decision not to recommend to the Council that it should hear the WFTU on a particular matter.

7. that the Council NGO Committee would make a practice of keeping the Council fully informed about its consultations with the WFTU.

8. that according to Part V, Paragraph 1, the WFTU would normally have an opportunity to consult directly with the various Commissions of the Council.

[NEW YORK,] November 24, 1946.

At Saturday's⁵¹ meeting of Joint Committee 2 and 3, the first part of a USSR resolution concerning the relationship of the WFTU to the Economic and Social Council (see (A/C.2 and 3/10, of Nov. 21)⁵² was adopted by a vote of 22 to 15.

The second part of the USSR resolution, in which the GA would have recommended that the ECOSOC give to the WFTU the right to make oral as well as written statements "on all matters of interest to the Federation", was rejected by a vote of about 24 to 14. Included among those voting with the USSR in favor of this part of the resolution were Argentina, Chile and Colombia. Venezuela, among others, abstained.⁵³

In the resolution adopted by the Joint Committee the GA recommends that ECOSOC give to the WFTU the unrestricted right, now enjoyed by specialized agencies and Member states not members of ECOSOC, to place items on the Council's agenda.⁵⁴

The UK, Canada, New Zealand and the US vigorously opposed this resolution on some or all of the following grounds: (1) that it would go beyond the provisions of the Charter (Art. 71); (2) that the arrangements worked out by the Council should be entirely satisfactory to the WFTU and the other three non-governmental organizations presently included in Category A (American Federation of Labor, International Chamber of Commerce, and International Co-operative Alliance); (3) that these arrangements should be given a reasonable trial before the GA raises any question as to their adequacy; and (4) that it was questionable whether it was appropriate under the terms of the Charter (Art. 71) for the GA to attempt to deal with the details of the arrangements to be worked out by the Council for its consultative arrangements with non-governmental organizations. (For additional background information on this subject see Secret document US/A/C.2 and 3/2 of Nov. 21).⁵⁵

Although a roll-call vote was not taken, the many speeches made

⁵² The operative section of the proposed Soviet resolution read:

"The General Assembly recommends that the Economic and Social Council grant to the World Federation of Trade Unions:

1. The right to submit for consideration by the Economic and Social Council, questions intended for inclusion in the provisional agenda in accordance with procedure applied at the present time to specialized agencies;

2. The right to submit to the Council written and oral communications on all matters of interest to the Federation." See GA (I/2), Joint Second and Third Committee, pp. 96 and 97, annex 3b, which is United Nations document A/C.2 and 3/10, November 21.

⁵³ The United States vote was recorded against both parts of the proposed Soviet resolution. For the proceedings of the Joint Committee on November 23, see GA (I/2), Joint Second and Third Committee, pp. 15 ff.

⁵⁴ The resolution as enacted (that is, the first section of the original Soviet proposal) was incorporated by the Joint Committee into a draft report which was being submitted by the Joint Committee to the General Assembly, relating to the Report of the Economic and Social Council to the General Assembly submitted earlier by the Council to the General Assembly; see ibid., pp. 97 ff., annex 3e, with particular reference to the second section on p. 99.

⁵⁵ The United States Delegation working paper, printed supra.

prior to the vote, as they will be summarized in the Journal, will afford useful guides to attitudes and votes. In general, it was apparent that quite a few Delegations were reluctant to vote against both parts of the USSR resolution. Belgium (Lebeau) had taken the lead in suggesting the desirability of a "compromise" in which the first part would be accepted and the second part rejected.

USDel should make every effort, with the aid of like-minded Delegations, to defeat the USSR resolution, adopted by Joint Committee 2 and 3, when it comes before a Plenary meeting of the GA at some future date. It is vitally important that we rally the necessary support to do this. If we fail in the GA, we might not be able to stave off adoption of the USSR resolution by ECOSOC. Adoption of such a resolution by ECOSOC would seriously weaken the effectiveness of the Council; its agenda might be bogged down with all sorts of items from the WFTU and from other Category A organizations if, in accordance with the general principle of equality of treatment we favor, the same right were extended to other non-governmental organizations in the same category.

Immediately after the Joint Committee had adopted the first part of the USSR resolution, Mr. Stevenson called to the Committee's attention the fact that there were other non-governmental organizations in Category A and asked whether it would be in order to propose an addition to the resolution just adopted, to the effect that if ECOSOC should grant the unrestricted right to WFTU to place items on the Council's agenda, the same right should be given to all other Category A organizations.

The Chairman ruled that this would not be in order, but that the US Delegation would be free to submit a separate resolution for consideration at a later meeting.

After the meeting, a separate resolution (see attached) was drafted and submitted to the Secretariat to be circulated. It will come up for discussion at the next meeting of Joint Committee 2 and 3, probably on Tuesday.⁵⁶

⁵⁶ See GA(I/2), Joint Second and Third Committee, p. 97, annex 3 c. The draft resolution read: "The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Economic and Social Council (document A/125) concerning arrangements for consultation with non-governmental organizations:

1. Takes note of the action of the Council to place certain non-governmental organizations in category A; and

2. Expresses agreement with the general principle that all non-governmental organizations in category A should receive equal treatment in respect of consultative arrangements with the Council."

This draft was approved by the U.S. Delegation at a meeting on November 25, and at the same time it was agreed that the United States should make every effort to defeat the Soviet resolution (included in the Joint Committee's report) when it came before the General Assembly (IO Files, document US/A/M/20).

This resolution would simply place the GA's stamp of approval on the ECOSOC principle of treating equally all non-governmental organizations within Category A. This resolution, and the attendant circumstances, will be discussed by Mr. Stevenson at the Delegation meeting Monday morning.

The present intention is to press for favorable action on this resolution in Joint Committee 2 and 3 on Tuesday. In presenting it, Mr. Stevenson would make it very clear that we remain unalterably opposed to the USSR resolution adopted at Saturday's meeting and that we intend to work toward its defeat in the Plenary meeting of the GA, for reasons already stated. He would argue in favor of adoption of our resolution endorsing ECOSOC's "equality of treatment" principle, mainly on the ground that we cannot let pass unchallenged the attack made on that principle by the USSR and a few other Delegations. (Although not adaptable for use in an open meeting, there is the further consideration that adoption of our "equality of treatment" resolution would provide a hedge against the possibility that we may not be able to defeat the USSR resolution in the Plenary meeting of the GA).

All political officers can begin immediately to attempt to build up support for defeating the USSR resolution in the Plenary meeting of the GA. After the Delegation meeting Monday morning they will have a clear idea of how best to deal with the proposed US "equality of treatment" resolution.⁵⁷

Memorandum by Adlai E. Stevenson, Alternate Representative on the United States Delegation, to All Political Officers on the Delegation Staff

[NEW YORK,] December 7, 1946.

At the San Francisco Conference, the World Federation of Trade Unions made an aggressive effort to be admitted to the Assembly and Commissions. But the Steering Committee concluded that no private organization should have any special position in the Conference.

At the General Assembly in London last winter, the Soviet Delegation introduced a resolution supporting a letter from Louis Saillant, Secretary-General of the Federation, requesting special recognition of the Federation in the Assembly and also rights of participation in the work of the Economic and Social Council.

⁵⁷ For the U.S. statement made by Mr. Adlai Stevenson in offering the U.S. resolution at the meeting of the Joint Committee on November 26, see GA (1/2), Joint Second and Third Committee, p. 23; debate on the resolution is found ibid., pp. 23-30. The resolution was adopted by the Joint Committee on the same date by 19 votes to 13, and 11 abstentions and 11 members absent, and incorporated into the draft report of the Joint Committee on the ECOSOC Report.

The matter was debated there interminably in the General Committee, Committee I and the General Assembly. You are familiar with the results: resolutions recommending that the Economic and Social Council establish consultative arrangements with WFTU and with the AFofL and the International Cooperative Alliance.

In short, the best we could do at London was to insure equal treatment for the AFofL and the International Cooperative Alliance. Our policy there was first to resist the WFTU proposal and, failing that, to get equal treatment for two other large international non-governmental organizations.

Last June, after careful consideration, ECOSOC worked out a system of categories and placed these three organizations in Category A for consultative relationship with the Council because of their general interest in all of the work of the Council. Later, in October, the International Chamber of Commerce was added to Category A.

Despite the opportunity to do so, the WFTU has thus far made no proposals or suggestions relating to the work of the Council, and the WFTU negotiators expressed satisfaction with the consultative relationship established by the Council at its last session.

However, Leon Jouhaux, one of the French Delegates and a Vice-President of WFTU, wrote a letter to President Spaak on November 12 complaining that these arrangements were insufficient and requesting

1. The right to submit to the Council questions for insertion in the provisional agenda, in accordance with the procedure now applicable to specialized agencies;
2. The right to present written and verbal statements to the Council on all matters of concern to the Federation.

The USSR presented these two requests to Committee I⁵⁸ in the form of a resolution and after prolonged debate the Committee approved the first of these requests 22 to 15 and rejected the second 24 to 14. The U.S., the U.K., Canada and a few others vigorously opposed the adoption of this resolution.

After further debate, we succeeded in getting a resolution adopted which reaffirms the general principle that all non-governmental organizations in Category A should receive equal treatment in respect of consultative arrangements with the Council. This "equality of treatment" resolution was introduced (1) to meet the challenge to the principle of equal treatment and (2) as a hedge against the possibility that our efforts to defeat the USSR resolution in the plenary meeting of the GA may be unsuccessful.

⁵⁸ Mr. Stevenson's intended reference here is to the Joint Committee of the Second and Third Committees.

Our Delegation should vigorously oppose, in plenary session, the Soviet resolution granting the WFTU the same rights as a specialized agency with regard to inscribing items on the provisional agenda of the Council on the following grounds:

1. The arrangements worked out by the Council should be entirely satisfactory and afford WFTU and the other three non-governmental organizations included in Category A ample access to the agenda.
2. These arrangements have not even been tested by usage and it is altogether premature, therefore, to assume their inadequacy.
3. These arrangements should be given a reasonable trial before the GA considers any recommendations for change.
4. The GA should not interfere in the details of the Council's work with regard to consultative arrangements with non-governmental organizations.
5. Such a right, which would have to be extended to other organizations in Category A, would seriously jeopardize the Council's control over its own agenda; in this connection, it should be borne in mind that the placing of items on the provisional agenda is tantamount to placing them on the approved agenda.

It is apparent that the Soviets and possibly others are determined, if possible, to exalt the prestige of the WFTU at the expense of the ILO, to serve political purposes. That this incessant pressure for special recognition for WFTU is not motivated by a desire to improve the efficiency of the conduct of its business with the Council is best evidenced by the fact that it has made no use of the consultative arrangements already established.

As we attach first importance to defeat of this resolution in the General Assembly and because many Delegates do not take it seriously, or are influenced by their domestic labor movements, it would be very helpful to contact as many as possible before this matter arises in the Assembly to make clear the degree of our interest and the reasons for our opposition to the USSR resolution.⁵⁹

⁵⁹ General Assembly debate on the draft United States and Soviet resolutions incorporated in the Joint Committee's report took place on December 15, the Soviet resolution being adopted by 25 votes to 22 votes with 6 abstentions and the United States resolution by 34 votes to 11 with 8 abstentions; for General Assembly proceedings on this see United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, Second Part, Plenary Meetings, pp. 1393 ff. (hereafter cited as GA(I/2), Plenary). Texts are found in United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, Second Part, Resolutions Adopted by the General Assembly during the Second Part of Its First Session, pp. 77 and 78; the two were designated two parts of the same resolution, Resolution 49 (I), entitled "Activities of the Economic and Social Council".

The Soviet Union at this time re-introduced on the floor of the General Assembly the section of its original resolution that had been rejected by the Joint Committee (paragraph 2); see GA(I/2), Joint Second and Third Committee, pp. 96 and 97, annex 3b and GA(I/2), Plenary, p. 1591, annex 92a). This Soviet amendment was rejected by the General Assembly.

For a statement made to the General Assembly by the Alternate Representative on the United States Delegation (Douglas) against both the draft Soviet resolution and the Soviet amendment, see GA(I/2), Plenary, pp. 1399 ff.

CONFIDENTIAL IN PART

AGENDA ITEM ON CODIFICATION OF INTERNATIONAL LAW: BACKGROUND

Under Article 13 of the Charter, the General Assembly has a positive obligation to initiate studies and make recommendations to encourage the progressive development of international law and its codification. This provision was included in the Charter largely because of insistence at the United Nations Conference at San Francisco that more emphasis should be placed on law as the basis of the Organization than had been evident in the Dumbarton Oaks Proposals. The inclusion of the proposed item on the agenda would therefore make clear that the United Nations desires to promote international justice through the encouragement of the rule of law.

The length of time which the League of Nations' efforts at codification consumed shows that the process of codifying international law is slow and difficult. An early and carefully thought-out approach to the problem by the United Nations, therefore, seems desirable.

Confidential. From the point of view of the United States, the inclusion of the item would have certain political advantages since the other American republics are keenly interested in the codification of international law. The United States has gone along in the past with the other American republics in supporting the movement for codification by inter-American agencies, as manifested by pertinent resolu-

¹ Transmitted to the Acting United States Representative (Johnson) under instruction no. 23, July 30, in which Ambassador Johnson was requested to transmit to the Acting Secretary General of the United Nations (Sobolev) a communication along the following lines: "Since Article 13 of the Charter provides that 'the General Assembly shall initiate and make recommendations for the purpose of . . . encouraging the progressive development of international law and its codification,' the Government of the United States suggests that the Secretary-General include in the provisional Agenda for the Second Part of the First Session of the General Assembly an item looking toward the carrying out of this provision of the Charter." tions of the Seventh and Eighth International Conferences of American States,² the Third Meeting of Foreign Ministers of 1942,³ and the Inter-American Conference on Problems of War and Peace.⁴ There is, however, considerable feeling in the Department that regional codification of international law is undesirable since public international law is a legal system for the entire community of states and since such regional codification might conflict with codification on a universal basis under the auspices of the United Nations. Inter-American codification might also operate against the interests of the United States since it might raise the question of commitment to some Latin American legal concepts, such as the Calvo clause, which are unacceptable to this government.⁵ It so happens that the inter-American machinery for codification is at present practically at a standstill, pending possible revision of the procedures at the Ninth International Conference of American States, which is scheduled to meet at Bogotá some time next year. It is, therefore, highly desirable from the point of view of this government that the United Nations plan should be evolved, at least in its broad outlines, before inter-American procedures are revised or new machinery developed independently of the United Nations. End Confidential.

We should like to see emphasized that the Charter provides for the progressive development of international law as well as its codification. We, therefore, do not propose that the United Nations should merely continue the efforts of the League of Nations to bring about the progressive codification of international law. We believe that the General Assembly should not simply encourage the systematization of existing law but should, by every possible means, foster its progressive development.

The Charter itself creates new legal relationships and poses new problems. In the ordinary course of events, the United Nations will contribute greatly to the development of international law as the various organs interpret the Charter and carry on their functions under it. The Economic and Social Council, in particular, may make important contributions since much development of international law will undoubtedly take place in economic, social, cultural, health and related fields and in the promotion of human rights. Article 62 of the Charter authorizes the Economic and Social Council to make studies, reports, and recommendations on the subjects falling within its competence, to prepare draft conventions for submission to the General Assembly, and to call international conferences.

The League of Nations encouraged the codification of international law through the work of special preparatory committees working from 1924 to 1930 and by convening a codification conference in 1930. The League's efforts were crowned with little success, mainly, it seems, because national views as to what the law on the subjects chosen actually was and what it should be were more divergent than had been supposed.

The League also fostered the development of international law through the holding of such conferences as the Financial Conference at Brussels in 1920, which recommended the Economic and Financial Organization of the League, and the Barcelona Conference of 1921 on communications and transit which took important steps in this field.

The variety of League activities in the development of international law, the varying success which attended them, the wealth of knowledge which has grown out of the consideration of many subjects for codification suggest that the first step which might be taken toward the discharge of the General Assembly's responsibility under Article 13 might be the consideration by the General Assembly's Legal Committee of the appointment of a special committee concerned primarily with the procedures to be adopted. Since the main task of the special committee would be to make recommendations for a general plan which the United Nations might adopt, it should probably be composed of government representatives, mainly officers trained in international law and having wide experience in that field.

Such a committee might consider and report to the next General Assembly on :

(1) the most practical methods by which the General Assembly may undertake to encourage the progressive development of international law and its codification ;

- (2) the proper division of labor between the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council in working toward this objective;
- (3) the best method of enlisting the most effective assistance of national or international groups;
- (4) the establishment of machinery of the General Assembly to continue work in the field;
- (5) the consideration of proposals for special United Nations bodies, such as an international drafting body, which might assist in the attainment of the objective;
- (6) the best procedure for deciding what specific subjects should be tackled first taking into account the work done or inspired by the League.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mrs. Alice M. McDiarmid of the Division of International Organization Affairs

[WASHINGTON,] August 30, 1946.

Mr. Rogers of the Canadian Embassy was referred to SPA by Mr. Parsons, BC, to make inquiries concerning the agenda item on the progressive development and codification of international law, proposed by the United States.

Mr. Rogers wished to make informal inquiries as to what the United States had in mind for the progressive development and codification of international law. I explained that we considered it important to work out carefully the procedures through which the General Assembly might carry out its obligation to "initiate studies and make recommendations for the purpose of encouraging the progressive development of international law and its codification." I stressed our interest in development as well as codification and mentioned the desirability of considering the role which the Economic and Social Council acting under Article 62 might play in the development of international law, the functions of the Secretariat Division for the Development of International Law, and the relations with public and private, national and international groups interested in codification.

Mr. Rogers explained that the Canadian Government was much interested in the codification of international law and wished to go ahead somewhat faster than we proposed. He showed me a copy of a memorandum which had not received ministerial approval but which served as an informal expression of their views.⁶ They wished to have set up at this meeting of the General Assembly a Commission on International Law closely connected to the General Assembly. This commission might, like the International Court of Justice, be composed of fifteen persons, experts on international law, elected for overlapping terms of nine years. I mentioned that we felt the persons working on codification should be experts but should also have had experience in government because one of the major problems was what governments would be willing to accept in the way of codification. The commission, in the Canadian view, should attempt a re-statement of what international law actually was. As portions of the re-statement were prepared, they might be submitted to the General Assembly as declarations. If the commission found international law inadequate or outdated on a particular subject, it might prepare a draft convention for adoption by General Assembly and submission to states.

I told Mr. Rogers that I saw nothing essentially incompatible in the two proposals but that theirs represented a step further than we had been preparing to go at this time. He said the Canadians felt that a specific proposal would give direction to the discussion and reduce the time spent on general debate.

He left with me for further study a copy of the Canadian memorandum, emphasizing that it did not amount to a formal proposal since it had not received ministerial approval. He asked me to return it to him with any general comments which I cared to make.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Mrs. Alice M. McDiarmid of the Division of International Organization Affairs

[WASHINGTON,] September 11, 1946.

Mr. Bathurst of the British Embassy stated that the Foreign Office has asked him to make informal inquiries with regard to the agenda item proposed by the United States on the progressive development and codification of international law.

I explained that we took the view that the General Assembly had a positive obligation to promote the development and codification of international law and that stress should be laid on development as well as codification. We believe careful consideration should be given to the procedures by which it might discharge its responsibility. We were, therefore, planning to propose a small sub-committee to consider procedures and make a report to the next General Assembly. The sub-committee might consider the kind of codification agency the United Nations might establish, its relations with public and private groups, the role of the Economic and Social Council particularly with reference to Article 62, the consideration of special proposals, such as a legislative drafting bureau, and the topics which might be selected for codification.

Mr. Bathurst said he thought our proposals were along the lines Mr. Beckett, Legal Adviser of the Foreign Office, had been thinking. He said he would relay the information to London and believed the United Kingdom would wish to support our proposals.

He expressed particular interest in the consideration of the kind of agency which might be established. He said he had talked with Mr. Feller of the United Nations Secretariat, who had indicated that plans for the work of the Secretariat's Division for the Development of International Law had not yet been clearly formulated. He expressed the view that without some specific direction the Secretariat might simply draft papers which would gather dust. I agreed with him that the Secretariat's Division could do highly useful preparatory work but that it needed some authoritative direction in order to be most useful. I mentioned that in our view members of the sub-committee should be experts in international law but should also be acquainted with the policies of governments because one of the major problems was what governments were willing to do or to accept. Mr. Bathurst agreed.

He inquired whether we had any specific topics in mind for codification, and I said we did not at this time. I also said that, if possible, it might be desirable to take a general view of the field rather than to tackle a problem simply because it looked easy.

He asked whether there was any precedent for the appointment of a sub-committee of this kind. When I replied that the Committee on U.N.R.R.A. or the Negotiating Committee on League of Nations Assets might be precedents, he added the Negotiating Committee on the Headquarters. We agreed that the appointment of a sub-committee seemed well within the Charter.

In response to his question, I said that we would have a proposal in the form of a resolution. I emphasized that we would not go to the General Assembly committed irrevocably to a specific proposal but that we thought a careful and thoughtful approach should be made to the problem.

In leaving, Mr. Bathurst again expressed sympathy with the proposal and said he might get in touch with me again when he heard from London.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Associate Chief of the Division of International Organization Affairs (Maktos)

[WASHINGTON,] October 3, 1946.

Participants: Dr. Yuen-li Liang, Director of the Division of Development and Codification of International Law, United Nations, Legal Department
Mr. Charles Fahy⁷
Mr. John Maktos

Dr. Liang called at the Department at his request to discuss a document entitled, "Proposed Resolution on the Development and Codification of International Law", and dated August 15, 1946.⁸

The document contains a draft resolution which the Secretariat proposes should be submitted to the General Assembly for adoption. The resolution requests the Secretary General:

"1. To prepare a survey of the general multipartite international conventions now in force, and of such conventions drafted by official international conferences during the past fifty years which have ceased to be in force or have not been brought into force;

"2. To establish contacts with official and unofficial bodies engaged in efforts to promote the scientific formulation and development of public and private international law, and to prepare a survey of their current projects and activities; and

"3. To prepare, with such advice and assistance as may be needed, a report on the methods and procedures which may usefully be followed by the General Assembly in discharge of its functions under paragraph 1a of Article 13 of the Charter to 'initiate studies and make recommendations for the purpose of encouraging the progressive development of international law and its codification.'"

Mr. Fahy stated that under Article 13 of the Charter, the General Assembly was under obligation to take steps to initiate studies and make recommendations with respect to the development and codification of international law. He added that the Department would give careful consideration to the document, copies of which were handed to Mr. Fahy and Mr. Maktos. Thereupon, Dr. Liang offered to remain in Washington for further discussions. It was pointed out, however, that the subject had been discussed by the Department with Senator Austin and that in view of his absence from Washington, no useful purpose would be served by Dr. Liang's stay.

⁷ Legal Adviser.

⁸ Not found in Department files.

Mr. Fahy informed Dr. Liang that the problem and the appropriate procedure could be considered by a General Assembly committee. Mr. Maktos suggested that such a committee could, of course, study reports and suggestions of official as well as unofficial bodies and that the proposed report of the Secretariat could be submitted to the committee. Dr. Liang suggested that Mr. Maktos discuss this problem with Ambassador Wellington Koo but it was pointed out that such discussion should be postponed until after additional consultation with Senator Austin.

The hope was expressed by Dr. Liang that the Delegations of the United States and China would submit a joint resolution in this manner, particularly in view of China's initiative in this field at the San Francisco Conference. Mr. Fahy assured him that we would be glad to cooperate in this respect and that in the meantime the document will be given careful consideration.

At the end of the meeting, Mr. Maktos gave Miss Whiteman⁹ a copy of the document for her comment, since she had been responsible for the preparation of the position paper on codification.

Memorandum by Miss Marjorie M. Whiteman of the Office of the Legal Adviser to the Associate Chief of the Division of International Organization Affairs (Maktos)

[WASHINGTON,] October 4, 1946.

I have examined the document entitled "Proposed Resolution on the Development and Codification of International Law", Confidential—August 15, 1946, which Dr. Liang of the Legal Division of the Secretariat of the United Nations left with you this morning.¹⁰

The document contains a draft Resolution on the subject of the Development and Codification of International Law, which officers of the Secretariat propose should be submitted for adoption by the General Assembly. The document stresses (a) the progressive development of international law, (b) international legislation, and (c) cooperation with official and unofficial bodies.

Briefly, by the Resolution the Secretary General would be requested (1) to prepare a survey of general multipartite international conventions during the past fifty years; (2) to prepare a survey of current projects of official and unofficial bodies engaged in codification; and (3) to prepare, "with such advice and assistance as may be needed", a report on the methods and procedures which may be usefully followed by the General Assembly in discharging its functions under Article 13 of the Charter (relating to the Assembly's part in codification).

In other words, the Secretariat suggests that it be constituted the Committee on Procedure which the United States feels should be established to determine the scope of the problem and appropriate procedures which should be adopted looking to the accomplishment of the work to be done. It is contemplated that the Committee on Procedure suggested by the United States would consider all plans for codification submitted, whether official or unofficial, and make its recommendations in the light of such consideration.

It is my view (1) that the Secretariat should not constitute the Committee on Procedure and (2) that the document left at the Department by Dr. Liang, containing as it does suggestions on procedures with respect to codification, is such a document as might appropriately be considered by the Committee on Procedure.

501.BB International Law/10-446

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs (Hiss)

[WASHINGTON,] October 4, 1946.

Dr. Liang told me that he had suggested yesterday to Mr. Fahy the introduction of a resolution in the General Assembly which would direct the Secretariat to prepare a survey of the problems involved in attempting the codification of international law, this survey to be made available to the General Assembly at the Assembly's 1947 session. Dr. Liang said that Mr. Fahy had replied that we had been giving consideration to the codification question, that he had been in consultation with Senator Austin about the matter, and that he was inclined to feel that there would be considerable sentiment for a committee of the General Assembly composed of representatives of member governments to consider the matter.

Dr. Liang said that on further consideration he would now like to suggest a combination of his proposal and of the formation of a General Assembly committee. He would suggest that at the forthcoming session of the General Assembly a committee along the lines Mr. Fahy had described be appointed with the understanding that it would not meet for six months. The resolution would direct the Secretary General immediately to appoint an advisory committee of experts in international law who together with appropriate members of the Secretariat would prepare a survey report of the kind Dr. Liang had in mind. This report would be submitted within six months to the Assembly committee which would be directed to make its own report to the Assembly at the 1947 session. Dr. Liang thought his latest proposal would combine the merits of both plans and would speed up the whole question of Assembly action in this field.

Dr. Liang said that he will see Ambassador Wellington Koo¹¹ and that he hopes that the United States and Chinese Delegations will jointly sponsor a resolution on the subject of codification. I told Dr. Liang that the British Embassy had talked to us briefly about this subject and that it seemed to me that they and perhaps other delegations might be interested in the subject and I wondered whether there might not be merit in having as wide support for whatever resolution might be introduced as possible. Dr. Liang said that at Mr. Gromyko's¹² request he had already talked about this subject to a member of the Soviet Delegation. I remarked that the Latin American states are particularly interested in questions of international law. Dr. Liang indicated that he might consult Mr. Padilla Nervo¹³ of the Mexican Delegation.

I told Dr. Liang that we would be glad to consider his suggestions and that I would see that Mr. Fahy and others interested in this matter were informed of his views.

*Memorandum by the Associate Chief of the Division of International Organization Affairs (Maktos)*¹⁴

[WASHINGTON,] October 8, 1946.

There is attached hereto Miss Whiteman's memorandum¹⁵ commenting on the document entitled "Proposed Resolution on the Development and Codification of International Law" which Dr. Liang, of the United Nations Legal Department left with Mr. Fahy and Mr. Maktos last week.

I was waiting for the said memorandum before sending you my memorandum of conversation which Dr. Liang had with Mr. Fahy and me regarding this subject. I agree with Miss Whiteman's conclusion that the Secretariat should not constitute "The Committee on

¹² A. A. Gromyko, Representative of the Soviet Delegation to the General Assembly.

Procedure." I also agree that the suggestions of procedure contained in the aforesaid document as well as those of Dr. Liang mentioned in Mr. Hiss' memorandum of October 4, 1946 might appropriately be considered by the proposed assembly committee. I am a little skeptical concerning a resolution authorizing a committee of experts prior to consideration of the scope of the problem by the governments concerned. As you remember at the meeting on General Assembly Preparation with Senator Austin, it was thought that in the beginning codification should be undertaken by experts connected with the governments, particularly since any plans suggested by them would have to be approved by the governments. The Secretariat, of course, would be free at any time to ask the advice of any person or group of persons and submit to the General Assembly Committee such report as it may prepare.

Memorandum by Elwood N. Thompson, Special Assistant to the Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs (Hiss), to the Director

[WASHINGTON,] October 11, 1946.

Attached are memoranda and documents by Mr. Liang, Mr. Maktos, and Miss Whiteman,¹⁶ on the subject of the General Assembly agenda item on codification of international law. Mr. Liang's proposed resolution suggests that the Assembly request the Secretary General to prepare a survey of multipartite international conventions, establish contacts with official and non-official bodies engaged in the development of international law and prepare a report on methods and procedures for the General Assembly.

I should think the best features of Mr. Liang's resolution could be retained, and the doubts of Miss Whiteman and Mr. Maktos resolved, by suggesting that the resolution for the General Assembly create a committee on the codification of international law, and in the same resolution request the Secretary General to do the things indicated in Mr. Liang's draft, with a further provision that the Secretariat submit its results to the Assembly's committee. The committee would not thereby be bound by the Secretariat's work but should find it useful, nor would the committee be precluded from suggesting to the Secretariat other lines of inquiry and also from following other lines of inquiry through other facilities that the committee may want to use.¹⁷

Memorandum of Telephone Conversation by the Associate Chief of the Division of International Organization Affairs (Maktos)

[NEW YORK,] October 14, 1946.

At the request of Mr. Noyes,¹⁸ Mr. Maktos called Mr. Bathurst to discuss the agenda item relating to codification of international law.

Mr. Bathurst stated that he had gathered the impression from a conversation with Dr. Liang, Director of the Codification Division of the Legal Office of the United Nations Secretariat, that the position of the United States concerning codification of international law had been changed.

Mr. Maktos informed him that he had been present at a meeting in Mr. Fahy's office at which Mr. Liang had submitted a Secretariat document, dated August 15, 1946, containing certain suggestions with respect to codification of international law. Mr. Bathurst had also been handed a copy of the document and was familiar with the suggestions. Mr. Maktos pointed out that Mr. Fahy had explained the position of the United States and had pointed out that it had been discussed with Senator Austin. Dr. Liang was also informed that the Senator was away from Washington and that the subject would be further discussed at the New York meetings of the Delegation.

Mr. Maktos made it clear that there had been no change of policy indicated by Mr. Fahy at that meeting and that none had taken place since then.

Mr. Bathurst stated that he was glad to hear that our thinking was still along the line of a committee consisting of government experts rather than experts in connection with the government.

He said, however, that the [United Nations] Secretariat might want a committee of experts to study the matter. Mr. Maktos said he agreed that the committee should be made up of experts, but that the experts should be international lawyers with official positions in their governments so that their governmental viewpoints could be presented." After the first meeting of Committee VI, November 2, 1946, Mr. Fahy convened an informal meeting in the delegates' lounge to discuss the United States' proposal on codification of international law.²² He outlined the United States' position briefly and stated that the United States would be pleased to have China sponsor the proposal jointly with the United States. He added that he had discussed the proposal informally with Sir Hartley Shawcross of the United Kingdom who had indicated his general agreement but that the United States was not asking United Kingdom to co-sponsor its proposal.

He felt that the United States' proposal was a sound one. Mr. Liang stated that he had not had enough time to study the written proposal thoroughly, he questioned the number of members (seven) on the special committee. Mr. Fahy told him that this part of our proposal could easily be modified. THE PROBLEM

The recent exchange of letters between the President and Judge Francis Biddle regarding the reaffirmation of the principles of the Nuremberg charter in the context of a general codification of offenses against the peace and security of mankind,²⁵ leads to a proposal that the United States Delegation submit to the General Assembly, under the subject of the Codification of International Law, a draft resolution reaffirming those principles of international law and encouraging their codification.

RECOMMENDATION

It is recommended that the United States propose the following resolution for adoption by the General Assembly:

The General Assembly,

recognizing the obligation laid upon it by Article 13, paragraph 1, sub-paragraph (a) of the Charter to initiate studies and make recommendations for the purpose of encouraging the progressive development of international law and its codification; and taking note of the London agreement of August 8, 1945 for the establishment of an international military tribunal for the prosecution and punishment of the major war criminals;²⁶

2. directs the Assembly Committee on the Codification of International Law created by the Assembly's resolution of _____ to treat as a matter of primary importance the formulation of the principles of the London agreement and of the judgment of the Nuremberg Tribunal in the context of a general codification of offenses against the peace and security of mankind or in an International Criminal Code.

DISCUSSION

Judge Biddle, in a letter to the President dated November 9, 1946 reporting on the Nuremberg trials, recommended that "immediate consideration be given to drafting such a code (code of international criminal law), to be adopted, after the most careful study and consideration by the governments of the United Nations." The President in his letter of reply to Judge Biddle said, "The setting up of such a code as that which you recommend is indeed an enormous undertaking, but it deserves to be studied and weighed by the best legal minds the world over. It is a fitting task to be undertaken by the governments of the United Nations. I hope that the United Nations, in line with your proposal, will reaffirm the principles of the Nuremberg charter in the context of a general codification of offenses against the peace and security of mankind."

It seems appropriate for the United States to take the lead in recommending to the United Nations that the General Assembly not only instruct a committee to study the procedures to be followed in codify-

DRAFT RESOLUTION ON CODIFICATION OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

[Here follows statement by Mr. Charles Fahy, Legal Adviser, to the Delegation about the United States-Chinese resolution on the codification of international law.]

Mr. Fahy pointed out that since the initial work on the codification of international law resolution had been completed by the Department, the Nuremberg trials had been completed. These represented a vital development for international law, and the problem had been made more immediate when Mr. Francis Biddle in his letter of resignation as a Judge of the Nuremberg Court had recommended a plan for an international criminal code to include the decisions of the Nuremberg Court. The President in his reply to Judge Biddle said that he hoped that the United Nations would reaffirm the principles of the Nuremberg Charter in the context of a general codification of offenses against the peace and security of mankind. In the light of this exchange of correspondence, it was proposed that there be introduced into the Assembly a resolution as set forth in US/A/C.6/25. Mr. Fahy then read the resolution as follows:

[Here follows text as recommended in the United States Delegation Working Paper of November 14 (US/A/C.6/25), supra.]

Mr. Fahy said that he desired to change the word in paragraph 1 from "approves" to "reaffirms" since nineteen states had adhered to the statement by the United States, the United Kingdom, France, and the U.S.S.R. and thus the matter was already law.

Mr. Fahy continued that the Presidential letter had spoken of "a general codification of offenses against the peace and security of mankind", whereas Judge Biddle had spoken of "a code of international criminal law". Therefore, both terms had been used in the resolution in order that the Assembly Committee could consider either alternative.

Mr. Bloom inquired how far back in time it was necessary to go to start a codification of international law. Mr. Fahy replied that some of the law went back for several centuries.

Mr. Dulles said that in general he approved of the resolution and that he thought that Mr. Fahy's use of the word "reaffirm" was desirable.

Senator Austin suggested that instead of speaking of the "London agreement" that the resolution might better use the phraseology which he had used in his address to the General Assembly, namely; "the law of the charter of the Nuremberg Tribunal", thus there would be a continuity in terminology throughout the United States declarations on this point.²⁸ This suggestion was unanimously approved by the Delegation.

Mr. Dulles pointed out that the United States was advocating an international criminal code. He pointed out further that in the United States a legislative act which is more recent than an international act supersedes the international act. In that case, if there were a war and the legislature were to pass war legislation, it would prevail over the international criminal code. He inquired if Mr. Fahy knew of any way to make the international code effective in this event. Mr. Fahy replied that he did not know how this could be done except by constitutional revision. Mr. Sandifer remarked that it could be provided in a statute. Mr. Dulles pointed out that there was no way of making such a statute prevail against a subsequent statute. He pointed out that a citizen would not be able to make a defense in a court that he was obeying the international criminal code if there were a subsequent national law. While Mr. Dulles pointed out that the question was not directly relevant to consideration of the Assembly resolution, nevertheless, he thought that the United States might be criticized by certain other States that did not like the form of our law.

Mr. Stevenson agreed with Mr. Dulles but pointed out that even though the International Criminal Code might not be superior to the national law, it was still useful to codify international law. Mr. Dulles agreed. Mr. Sandifer pointed out that the same problem arose with any obligation which it was possible to override. He pointed out that the peculiar problem in this case was that the criminal code was proposed to be applied to the individual rather than to the State.

Mr. Dulles agreed that the individual was in a dilemma whether he owed allegiance to the international criminal code or to the national law. He recalled that he had advocated an international law that operated on individuals as well as on States. However, there was still a need to find out how to make the international law superior to national law especially since the Constitution provided that the laws of Congress were the supreme law of the land. Mr. Fahy said that he did not see how it could be done without a constitutional amendment.

Mr. Fahy said that the problem was also involved in the atomic energy proposals. Mr. Dulles agreed and said that he had spoken with Mr. Baruch about including this problem in his statement and Mr. Baruch had done so.²⁹ Mr. Stevenson remarked that he believed the United Kingdom had the same problem.

Senator Austin polled the Delegation on accepting the recommendation as revised and it was unanimously approved:

8 (a) MEMORANDUM ON UNITED STATES PARTICIPATION IN ADMINISTRATION OF TRUST TERRITORIES

THE PROBLEM

Should the United States participate in the trusteeship administering authority of any trust territories other than in the Pacific, Korea and the Italian colonies?

DISCUSSION

American interest in dependent areas has traditionally been based on a broad humanitarian concern for the welfare of the inhabitants of ¹The master files of the Reference and Documents Section of the Bureau of International Organization Affairs, Department of State.

²This was one of eight papers prepared in the Division of Dependent Areas Affairs, Office of Special Political Affairs, Department of State, on trusteeship matters for the use of the U.S. Delegation to the first session of the General Assembly of the United Nations scheduled to meet in London on January 10; for other papers in this series, see infra. These papers are found in Briefing Book II of three briefing books carried to London by the U.S. Delegation; these briefing books are found in the IO Files. these areas and a desire not to see these areas exploited for the benefit of a single power through restrictive trade practices. Public opinion in the United States, on the other hand, has consistently opposed taking on specific responsibilities in dependent areas where the interests of the United States are general and not specific.

In the case of the Japanese islands, considerations of security are so overwhelming that the United States will find it necessary to become the sole administering authority, at least for the majority of the islands.

In the case of Korea, an agreement for a four power trusteeship was reached with the Soviet Union before the trusteeship system of the United Nations had been established and, therefore, the possibility of the Organization itself being the administering authority could not be considered at that time.³

In the case of the Italian colonies, the United States has already proposed in the Council of Foreign Ministers that they be placed under the trusteeship system, with the Organization itself as the administering authority.⁴ The United States would participate through its membership in the General Assembly and the Trusteeship Council, and through a representative on the Advisory Committee which, it is proposed, shall advise the Chief Administrator of each of these territories.

In the case of the mandated territories,⁵ the prior historical claims of the mandatory powers will lead, it is assumed, to their being designated as administering authorities in the same territories over which they formerly had control.

If any other territories, however, should be considered for trusteeship or if some other disposition is desired for the territories mentioned above, the traditional interests of the United States would best be expressed by having the Organization itself as the administering authority. Administration by a single power or by two or more powers would not be so satisfactory because of the conflict between different national objectives inherent in such situations.

It should be noted that the United States will continue to have a special position with respect to all trust territories which were detached ⁵ Article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations, approved by the Paris Peace Conference on April 28, 1919 and incorporated into the Treaty of Versailles which was signed June 28, 1919, provided for the mandates system under the general supervision of the League. from enemy states in this war or were formerly under mandate status. As one of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers in the first World War⁶ and as a signatory of the peace treaties which will follow the second World War, the United States will be one of the states directly concerned in the negotiation of the trusteeship agreements for these territories and as such will have the right to agree to the alteration or amendment of the agreements, in accordance with Article 79 of the Charter.

PROPOSED UNITED STATES POSITION

If the probability should arise of the United States participating in the administration of any territories other than those in the Pacific, Korea and the Italian colonies, the United States should take the position that it would be preferable to have the Organization as administering authority rather than one or more powers.

It should be emphasized in the General Assembly if necessary that a trusteeship agreement including the designation of the administering authority will have to be made by the states directly concerned before any agreement can be submitted to the General Assembly for approval.

8(e) QUESTIONS BEARING ON PACIFIC ISLANDS

THE PROBLEM

In view both of the interest of this Government in certain territories conquered from the Japanese, and of the difficulties which have delayed any actual implementation of the trusteeship system, certain questions arise. Should the U.S. make a specific clarification of its intentions to place Japanese mandated territories under trusteeship, and initiate negotiations among the states directly concerned? Which states should be so defined? Should this Government extend trusteeship to the other Japanese Islands desired for security purposes: The Bonin-Volcano Islands including Marcus Island, the Izu Islands, and the Ryukyu

⁶ The United States concluded treaties or conventions with the appropriate Mandatory Power over a period of years defining the rights of U.S. nationals in Iraq, Syria and Lebanon, Palestine, East Africa (Tanganyika), the Cameroons, Togoland, Ruanda-Urundi, and the former German islands north of the Equator; see Foreign Relations, The Paris Peace Conference, 1919, vol. XIII, pp. 101 ff. U.S. rights defined in these instruments were equivalent to those possessed by members of the League of Nations.

Islands? Should the U.S. insist that it be the sole administering authority over any of the captured Japanese mandates or islands concerned?

DISCUSSION

The State Department is preparing policy papers on the above problems. In some cases, clearance with other departments of the government will be required before these papers can be considered as representing official United States policy.

PROPOSED UNITED STATES POSITION

In the event that the above questions are raised in the General Assembly, the United States should take the position that it is not prepared to discuss such questions, and they should be referred immediately to the Department.

8(g) THE FORM OF TRUSTEESHIP AGREEMENTS

THE PROBLEM

Should every trusteeship agreement to which the United States is a party be in the form of a treaty?

DISCUSSION

In American constitutional law language, the term "treaty" is applied to any international agreement which becomes binding upon the United States through ratification by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate "provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur". The constitutional position of treaties as part of the law of the land, added to the traditional formalities of treaty-making, indicate that they are intended to be among the most solemn acts of the government. It would be initially assumed, therefore, that any international agreement to which the United States is a party and which attempts to determine the disposition of territories and to delimit the political rights of nations would be made in the form of a treaty. Trusteeship agreements, which are basically political arrangements between states, fall into this category.

From the point of view of either the acquisition or the relinquishment of rights or duties, a treaty is far the best sort of instrument, both legally and politically. It might be particularly important to make trusteeship agreements by treaty in cases where the agreement will involve some modification of rights previously confirmed to the United States by treaty, for example rights in many of the mandated territories, or where the United States is to assume obligations, such as those of the administering authority in a trust territory.

Because of the requirement that a treaty shall be approved by a two-thirds vote in the Senate, there is always the possibility that a treaty will fail there, even though it has the backing of the administration and of a majority of both Houses of Congress.

The executive agreement, authorized by act or joint resolution of Congress, is a type of instrument which might also be used for making trusteeship agreements. Though not so universal in its applicability as the treaty, the executive agreement with Congressional authorization has been widely used to make international commitments and to give them domestic implementation.

It would seem possible also for a trusteeship agreement to take the form of an executive agreement when it is negotiated in pursuance of decisions made in a treaty to which the United States is a party.

The question of which form of instrument should be used can most properly be determined on the basis of prior consultation with the representatives of appropriate branches of the government.

RECOMMENDATION

Trusteeship agreements should ordinarily be in the form of treaties or of executive agreements authorized by Congress, as may be determined on the basis of prior consultation with the representatives of appropriate branches of the government.

If a trusteeship agreement should be made for Korea before the treaty of peace with Japan is signed, such an agreement might be made by executive action authorized by Congressional resolution. It would seem possible for other trusteeship agreements to be made by executive agreement in pursuance of a previously ratified treaty, or when authorized by Congress.

8(b) MEMORANDUM ON DISPOSITION OF MANDATED TERRITORIES

THE PROBLEM

Should the United States take the position of urging the mandatory powers who are Members of the United Nations to transfer their mandated territories to the trusteeship system, considering the inaction which thus far has marked the attitude of those powers?

DISCUSSION

The present mandated territories were detached from enemy states after the last world war and were placed under the mandates system of the League of Nations because the responsibility for their administration was felt to be a matter of international concern. The League of Nations is about to be dissolved, but the international responsibility for these areas will continue and would properly be expressed through the trusteeship system of the United Nations. In Article 77 of the Charter of the United Nations, it is specifically provided that territories now held under mandate may be placed under the trusteeship system, and Article 80, paragraph 2 of the Charter was designed to encourage the mandatory powers and other states directly concerned to take such action without delay. It has been assumed by the United States Government that mandatory and other interested powers would expedite action toward this end.

The Preparatory Commission has recommended unanimously that the General Assembly invite the mandatory powers to act in concert with states directly concerned to take steps toward placing the mandated territories under the trusteeship system of the United Nations.⁷

It should be noted in this connection that it is the view of the United States that the question of which states shall participate in the negotiation of trusteeship agreements as states directly concerned can be settled only by preliminary negotiation at the time when steps get under way to place the territories under trusteeship.

⁷ For documentation on the Preparatory Commission of the United Nations which met in London November 24–December 22, 1945, see Foreign Relations, 1945, vol. 1, pp. 1479 ff. For the recommendations of the Preparatory Commission to the General Assembly concerning trusteeship, see Preparatory Commission of the United Nations, Reports of the Preparatory Commission of the United Nations (December 23, 1945), pp. 49 ff.; deliberations in the trusteeship committee of the Preparatory Commission may be found in Preparatory Commission of the United Nations, Committee 4: Trusteeship.

The Preparatory Commission proposed to the General Assembly a draft resolution as follows: "The General Assembly of the United Nations calls on the states administering territories under League of Nations mandate to undertake practical steps, in concert with the other states directly concerned, for the implementation of Article 79 of the Charter (which provides for the conclusion of agreements on the terms of trusteeship for each territory to be placed under the trusteeship system), in order to submit these agreements for approval preferably not later than during the Second Part of the First Session of the General Assembly.

"Those trusteeship matters which will be taken up by the General Assembly at the First Part of its First Session for the purpose of expediting the establishment of the trusteeship system, will be considered by the Trusteeship Committee of the General Assembly, using the methods which the General Assembly considers most appropriate for the further consideration of these matters."

PROPOSED UNITED STATES POSITION

The United States should support any proposal by which the General Assembly would take steps to encourage the transfer of territories mandated to Members of the United Nations to the trusteeship system, except that the General Assembly should not undertake any judgment as to the states directly concerned prior to the submission of trusteeship agreements to that organ for approval.

Editorial Note

The United States Delegation to the First Part of the First Session of the General Assembly arrived in London during the first week of January 1946; for information regarding the composition and organization of the Delegation, see ante, pp. 5-7. Mr. John Foster Dulles was given responsibility for representing the Delegation on Fourth Committee matters (trusteeship and non-self-governing territories), and on January 8 he presided at a meeting of trusteeship advisers and experts from the Advisory Staff of the Delegation. The subject under discussion was the resolution on trusteeship that had been drafted by the Preparatory Commission of the United Nations; and Mr. Dulles made a particular point of urging that this resolution be broadened by a United States Delegation proposal that would include an appeal to the colonial powers in general rather than limiting the resolution to the matter of the conversion of the old League of Nations mandates into trusteeships under the United Nations.

The relevant portion of the minutes of the meeting (Second Meeting of the United States Group on Trusteeship, January 8, 1946) read:

"Mr. Dulles said that he wondered whether the General Assembly in its resolution should not call on other states, not just the mandatory powers, since there were other types of territories eligible for trusteeship in addition to the mandated territories. He was particularly concerned, Mr. Dulles went on, with the necessity of appealing to dependent peoples throughout the world and of reassuring them at this meeting of the General Assembly that the United Nations was taking steps to promote their welfare. The Trusteeship Council was the only organ of the United Nations which could not be created at this time. He had reluctantly come to this conclusion on the basis of the technical difficulty of creating the Trusteeship Council and he, therefore, thought it all the more important to make plain to public opinion throughout the world that the question of trusteeship and the broad question of dependent territories was not being completely neglected at the first meeting of the General Assembly." Later in the discussion Mr. Dulles "commented that he wanted to put the whole emphasis on people, not on land", adding that "The real problem in this whole field of dependent areas was that people of one color were ruling those of another." PRESIDENT'S PRESS CONFERENCE

Correspondent said there had been reports that delegation at London seems to be divided on the question of Japanese mandated islands, and asked what the Administration's policy was regarding these islands. President declared that those we do not need will be placed under UNO trusteeship, and those we need we will keep. Asked how long we intended to keep these islands, Mr. Truman said as long as we needed them. Asked if they would be under individual trusteeship of this country, President replied in affirmative in regard to those islands we need. Asked if the others would be under the Security Council, Mr. Truman replied in affirmative, adding just like all of the rest of them. Correspondent asked if some islands would be under our trusteeship and some under individual trusteeship of other nations. President said some would be under individual trusteeships as well as collective trusteeship, but that policy would have to be worked out by United Nations Organization as it went along. Asked if we would have to ask UNO's authority for our individual trusteeships, President replied affirmatively. Correspondent said that there were several Pacific islands below the Equator that were not Japanese mandated and asked if we were interested in those. President replied only in conjunction with our Allies. Asked if we had demanded any of these islands which we need, President declared we have not.

¹⁶ The distinction noted here between “ordinary trusteeship agreements” and “strategic [trusteeship] areas” has its origin in Article 82 of the United Nations Charter, which reads in part: “There may be designated, in any trusteeship agreement, a strategic area or areas which may include part or all of the trust territory to which the agreement applies. . . .” Goodrich and Hambro note that “This Article, taken together with Article 83, provides a special regime for those areas in which a Member or Members of the United Nations, or the United Nations, may have special interests of a strategic character. Presumably the interest in question may result either from the defense requirements of a particular state or states or from the needs of the Organization for maintaining peace and security.” (Leland M. Memorandum of Conversation, by the Associate Chief of the Division of Dependent Area Affairs (Bunche)

[LONDON,] January 17, 1946.

Participants: Mr. Creech-Jones, Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for the Colonies.

Mr. Poynton, Assistant Secretary, Colonial Office.

Mr. Ralph J. Bunche

Following Mr. Bevin's speech before the General Assembly¹⁸ this morning Mr. Creech-Jones and Mr. Poynton undertook to explain to me the meaning of the statement in Mr. Bevin's speech that "preliminary negotiations have already started" in connection with placing the British African Mandates under the trusteeship system. They stated that the United Kingdom Government had formulated draft trusteeship agreements for these territories and that these agreements were in process of transmittal to the several states which they thought might be interested.

¹⁷ The Acting Secretary cabled to the Secretary of State in telegram 628, Undel 94, January 19, 8 p. m.: "Studies referred to . . . are being initiated on Monday by a committee of the three Departments." (890.0146/1-1646)

On January 21 the Department of State cabled Secretary Byrnes in telegram 661, amplifying on the circumstances surrounding the initiation of the studies referred to in telegram 628 (501.BE/1-2146). The January 21 telegram also conveyed the following in a final paragraph drafted in longhand by Mr. Acheson and initialed by President Truman:

"The President believes that if it is possible without embarrassment to avoid a public statement and commitment at this time that would be desirable. He wishes to work out through appropriate sole trusteeship the control of necessary bases which the military services require. It may take a little time to get the appropriate forms agreed upon and pending this a public debate upon the question in this country will hamper rather than advance this solution. If this in any way embarrasses you please inform the President who wishes to support you in every way." (501.BE/1-2146)

In the immediately preceding telegram (No. 660, January 21, 7 p. m., File No. 890.0146/1-1546) the Acting Secretary had cabled the Secretary asking that any action on telegram 519, January 15 be deferred "pending receipt of immediately following telegram. . . ." As it happened, telegram 661 arrived in London in garbled form and the corrected copy was not received until some days later and after the Secretary's departure from London (501.BE/1-2646).

¹⁸ For the statement by the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Bevin) to the General Assembly on January 17 as regards the intention of the British Government to enter into negotiations for placing the British mandated territories of Tanganyika, the Cameroons, and Togoland under the United Nations trusteeship system, see United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, First Part, Plenary Meetings, p. 166; hereafter cited as GA(I/1), Plenary.

Copies of the agreements have been sent to Washington for transmittal to the Department and to the American Embassy here.¹⁹

Mr. Creech-Jones and Mr. Poynton further stated that they had not known how to define with any accuracy the "states directly concerned" in these territories but that they had sent the agreements for review to the states which appeared most likely to be interested, namely, the other four great powers and also to Belgium and the Union of South Africa because of their proximity to and direct interest in the African mandated territories. Mr. Creech-Jones admitted that this was in effect an indication of his Government's conception of the states which might be concerned in the agreements for these territories.

Mr. Creech-Jones also stated that the agreements would be discussed with the Dominions, but that with respect to all of them except South Africa this would be considered as purely a matter of domestic relations. There would be no suggestion, therefore, that the Dominions other than South Africa would be parties directly concerned in the African mandates.

and Mr. Creech-Jones that afternoon. "Everybody had agreed, including Mr. Gromyko and Mr. Creech-Jones, that the General Assembly should have nothing to do with the rules of procedure of the Trusteeship Council since, under the Charter, the Council was authorized to adopt its own rules." Mr. Pasvolsky then proposed "throwing out" the rules of procedure, and group discussion developed on this point.]

Mr. Dulles said that he would like to turn to the question of the "states directly concerned". He understood that the Trusteeship Council could not be set up until there was a balance between the trustee powers and the non-trustee powers. At least three trustee powers were required before the Council could be created. You could not get any trusteeship agreements, however, until you had decided which were the "states directly concerned".

He had discussed this question at considerable length with Mr. Gromyko, Mr. Dulles continued, and had explained the problem of getting an adequate number of trusteeship agreements to establish the Council. Mr. Gromyko had then asked Mr. Dulles about his views as to which were the "states directly concerned". Mr. Dulles replied that the State Department view was that the United States, United Kingdom, and France were the states directly concerned in the mandated territories, since they were the residual Allied and Associated Powers under the Treaty of Versailles. The State Department did not consider that nations became automatically "states directly concerned" because of geographic propinquity to the trust territory. Mr. Gromyko had replied that he noticed that the Soviet Union was not mentioned in this group. It was the view of his Government that the Soviet Union was a state directly concerned in any trust territory. When Mr. Dulles had asked what was the basis of this view, Mr. Gromyko had replied that the Soviet Union considered itself as concerned in any major economic, political, or geographic question anywhere in the world. Mr. Dulles had then asked whether Mr. Gromyko would include China on the same basis. Mr. Gromyko had replied that he had no opinion on this matter but that he would imagine that China would put forth a similar claim.

Mr. Dulles then had said that he had no competence to discuss this matter officially but that he was merely anxious to explore the problem. He had then asked whether Mr. Gromyko thought that the problem should be discussed during the General Assembly. Mr. Gromyko had replied in the negative, saying that the problem should be handled through diplomatic channels. Mr. Gromyko had then said that if he could consider Mr. Dulles as making an official call he would ask his Government for authority to discuss the question formally with the American Government. Mr. Dulles had replied that he was not speaking officially but was merely discussing the question as a member of the American Delegation.

Mr. Dulles continued that he had discussed the same question with Mr. Creech-Jones. In reply to a question the latter had commented that the Colonial Office had submitted copies of its draft agreements for their African mandates to the five permanent members of the Security Council and to the neighboring states, that is, Belgium and South Africa.

Mr. Cohen asked what was the nature of this submission. Mr. Dulles replied that he had understood that the British were not submitting the agreements in any formal way or with any indication that these were the indispensable powers concerned in the agreements. He understood that they were merely transmitting the agreements informally in order to invite suggestions about them. Mr. Creech-Jones had indicated that the British had no clear view about the "states directly concerned" but had implied that he would accept Mr. Dulles' view that geographic propinquity was not a necessary criterion, since it would automatically involve the Arab states in Palestine.

In the course of his talk with Mr. Creech-Jones, Mr. Dulles went on, he had got a general idea that it would be better not to try to get any abstract definition of the "states directly concerned". It would be better to start discussions with those states obviously concerned in the hope that an agreement could be concluded for submission to the General Assembly. If the General Assembly found that some indispensable powers had been omitted it could reject the agreement. This action of the British would soon force a decision on this question, since the General Assembly could not very long avoid taking a position. He would need guidance on this question, Mr. Dulles went on, in case it came up in the near future. He had thrown out to Mr. Gromyko Mr. Cohen's idea that the mandatory power might be considered the only state directly concerned. This suggestion seemed totally unacceptable to Mr. Gromyko, who had spoken about it in an extremely positive way.

Mr. Gerig said that he might continue this story by summarizing a memorandum of his conversation with Mr. Orts of the Belgian Delegation. It was clear that the British and the Belgians had been in consultation about this discussion. Mr. Orts had a draft agreement which he said was to be sent to the five great powers. Mr. Orts had said that while it might be better to send the agreement to the three great powers from which they had got their mandate, they intended to submit it also to the Soviet Union and China. The Belgians were somewhat hesitant to bring the Soviet Union and China into Central Africa but intended to go ahead nevertheless. Mr. Gerig had suggested to Mr. Orts that since the United Kingdom was on their list as a great power they would not need to receive a copy as a neighboring state. This would avoid setting any unfortunate precedent. Mr. Orts had said that he had not thought of this aspect of the question but that he would give it consideration.²¹

Mr. Bunche commented that he understood that the British were proposing to send their agreements to all of the Dominions as a purely domestic matter. They were sending them to the Union of South Africa, however, because of its special position in Africa.

Mr. Bloom asked why the Belgians and the British were sending their agreements to the Soviet Union. Mr. Gerig replied that they apparently regarded the Big Five as "states directly concerned", although others might be added.

[At this point Mr. Cohen stated that "in his opinion the procedure followed by Britain and Belgium was the most appropriate way of starting the negotiations." There followed a long discussion which revolved rather tenuously around the general problem of whether there should be immediate conversations to determine who were states directly concerned or whether to follow along with the British procedure of starting off on an informal and pragmatic basis; more concretely the discussion centered on the two questions of rights of the United States in the mandatory system and definition of the term "states directly concerned". Insofar as there was registered any sense of the committee during and at the end of these deliberations it appeared to be that the group agreed with the Cohen view, repeatedly stated, that ". . . it was up to the state with administrative responsibilities to take the initiative, after which the General Assembly could review the situation."

Mr. Cohen argued at one time that "This battle was lost at San Francisco. At that time there was a conflict of interests. We had a special interest in the Pacific which we wanted to protect and, therefore, we had to agree with the British interpretation about other mandated territories. We could not, therefore, force our views upon the mandatory powers in favor of a United Nations trusteeship. Mr. Pasvolsky pointed out that this decision had been taken at Yalta because it was the only possible solution of the problem. It has been the American position and it was the only one acceptable to the British."

At the end of the discussion, the group seemed to go along with a statement by Mr. Hiss that ". . . it would not prejudice the position of the United States to say that the definition of the 'states directly concerned' would have to be handled through diplomatic channels."^{21a}]

U.S. POSITION AS TO FUTURE STATUS OF THE PACIFIC ISLANDS

Articles from London which appeared in the morning papers on January 15, 1946, and subsequently indicate uncertainty among the United States representatives at the United Nations meetings as to what the United States position should be as to the future status of the Pacific islands. The President, at his press conference on January 15, made certain extemporaneous remarks as to the United States position. His statements were in general terms.

In view of these circumstances, I feel there is an urgent need for the State, War and Navy Departments to consider the question with a view to reaching agreement as to United States policy with respect to the future status of the Pacific islands. I feel this essential in order to provide uniform guidance to the civilian and military representatives of this Government at this and future United Nations meetings.

It is, therefore, my suggestion that the State-War-Navy Coordinating Committee hold a special meeting on this problem as soon as possible. At this meeting the Committee should be advised as to the present state of development of a governmental position and as to what instructions or guidance, if any, was given on this question to our representatives at the present United Nations meeting. We should then decide upon steps to be taken to develop and clarify the governmental position at the earliest practicable date.

United States Delegation Working Paper

CONFIDENTIAL

[LONDON,] January 22, 1946.

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO SECTION 1 OF CHAPTER IV : DRAFT RESOLUTION FOR THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY ²³

(Submitted by U.S. Delegation)

1. Add the following as a new first paragraph in the Preamble to the Draft Resolution :

"Chapters XI, XII, and XIII of the Charter recognize the problem of the non-self-governing peoples as of vital concern to the peace and general welfare of the world community."

2. Substitute the following revised wording for paragraphs 1 and 2 of the proposed Resolution, following the introductory sentence :

"The United Nations, meeting in their First General Assembly, are keenly aware of the problems and aspirations of the peoples who are not directly represented here because they have not yet attained self-government. The General Assembly recalls with satisfaction the profound concern of the Charter for them, and, in particular, Chapter XI whereby Members which administer non-self-governing territories accept, as a sacred trust, various obligations, including the obligation to develop self-government and to assist the inhabitants in the progressive development of their free political institutions; and Chapters XII and XIII with reference to the establishment of an international trusteeship system for the purpose, among others, of promoting the progressive development towards self-government or independence of the peoples of trust territories.

²³ This refers to the draft resolution proposed by the Preparatory Commission; see footnote 7, p. 549. The U.S. amendment was submitted to the Fourth Committee by Mr. Dulles on January 24. In an introductory statement Mr. Dulles explained that this proposed change in the draft resolution of the Preparatory Commission was being made solely because ". . . the recent declarations of the intentions of the mandatory Powers promptly to negotiate trusteeship agreements had put the matter in a different light.

"These declarations were a very significant development, a development which justified the hopes of the public in the General Assembly. The United Nations should publicly express satisfaction at the progress already made.

"Another consideration underlying the United States amendment was the unrest which prevailed among dependent peoples generally. Beyond the probable zone of trusteeship, there were hundreds of millions of people who constituted a problem with which this Assembly should concern itself, as did the Charter. It was an urgent necessity that, on the one hand, dependent peoples should realize that the Charter, particularly Chapter XI, provided orderly processes for the attainment of their legitimate aspirations, while, on the other hand, the administering nations should quickly give concrete evidence of their intention to vitalize those processes." (United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, First Part, Fourth Committee, p. 15; hereafter cited as GA (I/1), Fourth Committee)

"The General Assembly regrets that it cannot, at this First Part of its First Session, establish the Trusteeship Council. This is not because of any lack of desire to do so, but because, before a Trusteeship Council can be established, trusteeship agreements must be concluded.

"Therefore the General Assembly particularly welcomes the expressed intention of certain Members to proceed forthwith to negotiate agreements for placing under the trusteeship system territories which are administered under League of Nations mandate. The General Assembly urges that this program be expedited by all states directly concerned so as to permit the establishment of the Trusteeship Council if possible not later than the Second Part of this First Session.

"The General Assembly expresses the hope that the progressive realization of the objectives of Chapters XI, XII, and XIII will make possible the attainment of the legitimate aspirations of non-self-governing peoples."³¹

³¹ Subsequently amendments were submitted also by Canada, China, Iraq, Australia, India, Belgium, and the Netherlands (GA(I/1), Fourth Committee, pp. 43 ff.); and the matter was referred by the Committee to a sub-committee which was charged with preparing an agreed draft. For the deliberations of the Fourth Committee on the United States and other proposed amendments, see ibid., pp. 15 ff.

In the course of the Fourth Committee's discussions the question arose of fixing the criteria for determining who were the states directly concerned and whether the Committee's competence extended to this area. Mr. Dulles defined the position of the United States on this matter in a statement to the Committee on January 25. "There was no doubt," he said, "that, at some point, the General Assembly would have an opportunity to go into this matter. The normal procedure would be for the initiative to be taken by the mandatory Powers in drawing up agreements and in securing adhesion to such agreements by those States which, through diplomatic negotiations, might be considered as States directly concerned. When the agreements were finally submitted to the General Assembly for approval, the Assembly could then decide for itself whether the parties to the agreements were in fact the States directly concerned.

"For this reason and because of the difficulty of solving the problem in general terms, it would be inappropriate for the Assembly now to engage in a long and academic discussion as to which were the 'States directly concerned.'" (GA(I/1), Fourth Committee, pp. 19-20)

For the report of the Fourth Committee to the General Assembly and its draft resolution see GA(I/1), Plenary, p. 588, annex 13. General Assembly debate and approval of the resolution took place on February 9 (ibid., pp. 366 ff.). For text of the resolution, see United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, First Part, Resolutions Adopted by the General Assembly during the First Part of the First Session, p. 13.

In the General Assembly debate Mr. Dulles underscored the importance that the United States attached to a revision of the Preparatory Commission's proposed resolution, along the lines adopted: "There was one matter which the Preparatory Commission proposed which could significantly test the spirit of the United Nations. That was a suggested resolution which touched the fringes of the problem of dependent peoples. Your Fourth Committee took hold of that resolution and transformed it into a bold and significant advance. By the resolution now before you, the United Nations speaks out in relation to the whole colonial problem, involving hundreds of millions of dependent peoples, and not merely the fifteen millions who might come under trusteeship.

"We make it clear once and for all that the declaration regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories contained in Chapter XI of the Charter is not merely the

YOUR EXCELLENCY: I have the honour to invite your attention to Chapters XII and XIII of the United Nations Charter which provide for the establishment of a system of International Trusteeship. As Your Excellency is aware, Article 77 of the Charter provides that the International Trusteeship system may be applied to territories at present held under Mandate, and that it is a matter for subsequent agreement which territories shall be placed under the Trusteeship system, and upon what terms.

2. As Mr. Bevin informed the General Assembly of the United Nations on 17th January, it is the intention of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom to enter into negotiations for placing Tanganyika, the Cameroons and Togoland under British mandate under the Trusteeship system.

3. I have the honour to transmit for Your Excellency's information drafts of the terms of Trusteeship³² which His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom propose for Tanganyika, the Cameroons and Togoland under British mandate. At the same time I am to place on record the understanding of His Majesty's Government that these drafts are communicated to Your Excellency without prejudice to the interpretation, to be eventually adopted, of the phrase "States directly concerned" in Article 79 of the Charter.³³

*The Deputy Director of the Office of European Affairs (Hickerson)

[WASHINGTON,] February 23, 1946.

The attached draft note³⁴ to the British Government makes a claim that the United States is one of the "States directly concerned" to participate in the approval of the proposed trusteeship arrangement for Tanganyika. The arguments used in the note are good ones and I feel that the United States can, if it wishes to do so, establish its right to participate in this agreement as a State directly concerned.³⁵

Whether, taking everything into account, this is advantageous from the standpoint of our over-all national interests, requires careful consideration. If we take this position in regard to Tanganyika, we could scarcely deny a similar position on behalf of the United Kingdom and France in respect of the Japanese Mandated Islands. This might strengthen the case of the Soviet Union as a State directly concerned in regard to Pacific islands.

It might be to the advantage of the United States as regards Pacific islands to take the position that the States directly concerned are the United States, Australia and New Zealand, the Pacific States which bore the brunt of the war against Japan. I have no final views in regard to this matter. I do feel strongly, however, that the attached note should be brought to the Secretary's attention and should be considered by him from the standpoint of the over-all national interests

"4. The Government of the United States therefore assumes that there will be no question as to its being a party to any trusteeship agreements affecting the African territories mandated to Great Britain which may be submitted to the United Nations for approval in accordance with articles 83 or 85 of the Charter and that it will participate in the decision as to which are the States directly concerned in the territories referred to. . . .

"6. This Government would further suggest that it might be found desirable, if the observations of directly interested governments should be numerous, to hold a short conference of these States for the purpose of completing negotiations upon the trusteeship agreements to be submitted by them to the United Nations Organization for approval. . . ." Memorandum by the Secretary of State to the Chief of the Division of African Affairs (Villard)

[WASHINGTON,] February 25, 1946.

MR. VILLARD: Referring to the attached letter³⁶ to the British Ambassador, unless there is some very strong reason for the assertion of the right set forth in this letter, I believe it unwise to assert such a right.

I think that it would establish a precedent for assertion of similar rights by the Soviet Government and the British Government as to Pacific Islands where we do not intend to agree that they are states directly concerned.

[WASHINGTON,] March 4, 1946.

Subject: Draft Reply to British Ambassador Regarding Mandated Territories

In view of the Secretary's note to Mr. Villard of February 25, in which he questions the desirability of the United States asserting its right to be a state directly concerned because of the precedent it might set for the assertion of similar rights by the Soviet and British Governments as to the Pacific islands, I have drafted the attached alternative³⁸ form of reply.

³⁶ See Mr. Hickerson's memorandum of February 23, supra.

³⁷ Addressed to the Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs (Hiss) and Leo Pasvolksy, Special Assistant to the Secretary of State.

³⁸ Marginal notation: "alternative to Villard's new draft attached". "Villard's new draft" has reference to a second draft reply to the British Ambassador's note of February 4, prepared in the Division of African Affairs on February 28; this replaced the first draft of February 21 described in Mr. Hickerson's memorandum of February 23, p. 562. In the second draft there was no mention of a general U.S. position "in all of the mandated territories". The emphasis was rather on the U.S. position in the British mandated territories in Africa resulting from the London conventions of February 10, 1925 between the United States and Great Britain. "The existence of these conventions," read the second draft, "under the terms of which the United States has always considered that it had the right to be consulted in regard to the disposition of the territories in question, is regarded by the Government of the United States as affording ample ground for the contention that this Government is directly concerned in the terms of the proposed trusteeship agreements." (862S.00/2-446)

Mr. Gerig's draft, prepared as an "alternative" to Mr. Villard's second draft and described in this memorandum, is not printed (862S.00/3-446).

This reply has the effect of maintaining our position under the Treaty of Versailles and the various conventions to be regarded as a state directly concerned, but does not ask the British Government at this time to acknowledge this claim. Instead, it proceeds immediately to a consideration of the terms of the agreements transmitted by the British Government and offers certain suggestions or amendments for their consideration. These amendments should be in an attachment to the reply, and the reply with these attachments might go out within four or five days if a brief acknowledgement of the British communication goes out today or tomorrow.

I am inclined to think that we will lose nothing by following the procedure suggested by the Secretary, provided we deal with the problem on purely practical grounds as a matter of urgency and without giving up our claims of twenty-five years standing. The British Government never has fully recognized our legal position and therefore it would probably be a protracted business to get them to accept our legal and treaty arguments in time to conclude the agreements by the next Assembly. Further, by pressing our legal position, we immediately raise a difficult question with the Soviet and Chinese Governments whose rights would be less strong by comparison, thus possibly opening a long controversy with them also.

I think it is possible without giving up any of our claims to influence the content of the draft trusteeship charters. In any case, the British Government as one of the states directly concerned would presumably have a veto power at any stage of the negotiations.

Finally, as to the changes or additions which we might propose on the British drafts, I would strongly recommend that we be very selective and reduce our observations to matters which are strictly essential. I doubt if we can get the British to accept a complete rewrite of their drafts which are largely based on the former mandate charters, though somewhat weaker in a few places. The appropriate divisions of the Department should at once formulate the suggestions which we have to make on the British drafts and DA is already prepared to make proposals.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Director of the Office of European Affairs (Hickerson)

[WASHINGTON,] March 8, 1946.

In the absence from Washington of Mr. Balfour, Mr. George Middleton, First Secretary of the British Embassy came in to see me today.

I handed to Mr. Middleton the Department's note dated March 7³⁹ acknowledging the British Embassy's note of February 4 last, transmitting copies of the draft trusteeship agreements for Tanganyika, the Cameroons, and Togoland.

I told Mr. Middleton that it appeared to us desirable that I supplement our note of acknowledgment with the following information. We are now considering in the Department the whole question of states directly concerned in connection with trusteeship agreements. It is clear to us that the United States could assert an unassailable legal claim to be a state directly concerned in respect of these three mandates. This position could be established on either of two grounds: Our position as one of the Allied and associated Powers in World War I, and our Mandates Treaty with the United Kingdom. I went on to say that in my opinion either of these grounds was sufficient to establish our position as a state directly concerned and a combination of the two makes an unassailable position.

I continued, however, that we are now considering the question of states directly concerned from the overall standpoint. In other words, whereas we can certainly claim to be a state directly concerned, we are now considering whether from the standpoint of our overall national interest we wish to assert such a claim. I added that it seemed wise to us to tell the British Government the foregoing for their information and to suggest that no definitive action be taken by the British Government without further consultation with us.

Mr. Middleton expressed his appreciation and said that he would communicate this information to his government. He asked if I cared to hazard a prediction as to what decision we would reach and I replied that I would not. He inquired whether I could tell him what my personal view was and I replied that my personal view was that an ad hoc decision should be reached as regards each mandate, depending on circumstances. I said, however, that there is a sharp division of opinion in the Department on the subject and that many of my colleagues disagree with me.

The Secretary of the Navy (Forrestal) to the Secretary of State

CONFIDENTIAL

WASHINGTON, 4 April 1946.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I acknowledge receipt of copies of four draft trusteeship agreements for the African territories of Togoland,

³⁹ The note acknowledged receipt of the British note and the accompanying draft trusteeship agreements for Tanganyika, the Cameroons, and Togoland and stated that "Both the note and the draft agreements are being studied in the Department of State and it is hoped that a reply can be made in the near future." (862S.01/2-446)

British Cameroons, Tanganyika and Ruanda-Urundi⁴⁰ which were forwarded with Mr. Acheson's letter of March 29, 1946.⁴¹

I have no comment to make as to the substance of these agreements. However, a question will arise at the time they are presented for consideration in the General Assembly of the United Nations whether the United States should assert that it is a state directly concerned with respect to these territories. I believe that the United States has no real interest in these territories other than a general concern for the welfare of their inhabitants.

I further believe that any assertions by the United States of direct concern in these territories might well serve as a precedent for other nations voicing their direct concern with respect to trusteeship for Pacific islands in which we have a definite strategic interest. Inasmuch as it is the view of the Navy Department that the number of states directly concerned in Pacific islands trusteeships should be kept to a minimum, I am strongly of the opinion that it would be most unwise for the United States to assert that it is directly concerned in connection with these four African territories.⁴²

Sincerely yours,

JAMES FORRESTAL

⁴⁰The Belgian Foreign Ministry had on January 30 transmitted to the U.S. Embassy in Brussels draft terms of agreement for the Belgian mandated territory of Ruanda-Urundi; it was requested in a covering note that this text be conveyed to the U.S. Government for its information. The draft of the proposed agreement was transmitted to the Department in Brussels despatch 1151, February 6, received February 13, neither printed. (501.BE/2-646)

⁴¹Not printed. Copies of the draft trusteeship agreements were forwarded also to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior. The Acting Secretary informed the three Secretaries that "I should be pleased to receive at this time any comments which you may care to make concerning them." (862P.01/3-2946)

⁴²In a letter of April 10 the Secretary of War (Patterson) responded that "There appears to be no matter in these proposed agreements requiring comment from the military point of view." He then went on to say: "However, I feel that the U.S. position concerning the submission to the U.S. Government of these draft agreements should be worked out with concern to the possible establishment of a precedent which we may later regard as unfortunate. If the U.S. Government were to acquiesce in regarding this country as a 'state directly concerned' under the United Nations Charter, in preliminary trusteeship moves with respect to such areas as Togoland, British Cameroons, Tanganyika and Ruanda-Urundi, a precedent might well be established which would make difficult our own application of a more restrictive definition for 'directly concerned' should it later prove desirable to do so in connection with trusteeship agreements applying to Pacific islands, or other areas in which our interests are particularly great." POLICY AND PROCEDURES CONCERNING THE NEGOTIATION OF TRUSTEESHIP AGREEMENTS

COVERING NOTE

The attached document ^{44a} is designed to assist in formulating basic American policy on trusteeship matters which require immediate decision.

The need for such a decision is urgent because the British Government transmitted on February 4, 1946 copies of draft trusteeship agreements for Tanganyika, Togoland, and the Cameroons. In a covering note it stated that these draft agreements were transmitted to this Government for its "information" and "without prejudice to the interpretation, to be eventually adopted, of the phrase 'states directly concerned' ". Also, the Belgian Government transmitted on January 30, 1946, under a similar covering note, a copy of a draft agreement for Ruanda-Urundi.

A reply to the British was drafted by interested Divisions of the Department, stating that the United States considered itself a state directly concerned in the African mandated territories because, among other reasons, of its position as one of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers. This draft reply did not receive the unanimous approval of the interested Offices; and the Secretary, in a memorandum to Mr. Villard dated February 25, 1946, expressed the view that it might be unwise for the United States to assert a claim to be a state directly concerned in the African mandated territories "unless there is some very strong reason", because such an action might establish a precedent for assertion of similar rights by the Soviet and British Governments in the Pacific Islands.

In a letter dated April 4, 1946, received after the preparation of these papers, the Secretary of the Navy takes the position that "the number of states directly concerned in Pacific islands trusteeships should be kept to a minimum" and states that "any assertion by the United States of direct concern in these [African] ⁴⁵ territories might well serve as a precedent for other nations voicing their direct concern with respect to trusteeship for Pacific islands in which we have a definite strategic interest”.

⁴³ The Secretary's Staff Committee was responsible for "advising and otherwise assisting the Secretary of State in determining current and long-range foreign policy". For the composition of this committee, see footnote 46, p. 569.

⁴⁴ Staff Committee document SC-192 was drafted in the Division of Dependent Area Affairs. It consisted of several parts, one of which, this covering memorandum, is printed here. Discussion of Memorandum SC-192 by the Secretary's Staff Committee, initially scheduled for April 18, was taken up by the Committee at a meeting especially convoked for that purpose on April 20; for minutes of this meeting, see infra.

In as much as any definition of the “states directly concerned” in one region sets a precedent for some other region, as the Secretary indicated, a group of officers representing interested Offices and Divisions met several times to consider this problem again in its broadest aspects. They reached the conclusion that it was probably best to consider the states directly concerned in the mandated territories to be the five Great Powers, as successors to the rights of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers under the Treaty of Versailles, and the mandatory state if it is not such a power. A more restrictive definition would be difficult to secure and a broader definition would be obviously undesirable.

The Soviet Union, the United Kingdom, and France, as signatories of the Italian Armistice, will probably in any event claim to inherit the rights and titles which Italy holds in all the mandated territories as a Principal Allied and Associated Power; and the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom, and China, being among the acceptors of the Japanese surrender, will claim to share in the rights and titles that Japan similarly holds. It is doubtful whether the United States could succeed in denying these claims. It was felt, moreover, that the United States can most effectively protect its many interests in Africa and advance its general objectives regarding dependent peoples by asserting its treaty rights.

With regard to the special question of the Japanese Mandated Islands, it was considered that inclusion of the other four Great Powers as states directly concerned in these islands could not jeopardize American control there. Even if one of the other Great Powers were not included as a state directly concerned, it could veto a strategic-area agreement in the Security Council. . . . It is clear that if these five states cannot agree on the terms of trusteeship or if the Security Council does not approve the agreement, the United States will remain in de facto control of the islands. The group agreed that when the United States proposals for placing the islands under trusteeship are submitted to the other states directly concerned, these proposals should be published in order that our position would be promptly made known.

The group concluded that as soon as American policy is settled the United States should consult with the United Kingdom and France, as the remaining Principal Allied and Associated Powers, regarding the states directly concerned. It should be prepared to agree that these three Powers, together with the Soviet Union and China as inheritors of the rights which Italy and Japan hold as Principal Allied and Associated Powers, should be the only states directly concerned in mandated territories and that these five Powers should consult as to whether any other states might participate in the negotiations and to what degree. The United States would, however, be prepared to give careful consideration to any different views proposed by the British or the French.

It is suggested that after the Department reaches a decision on these trusteeship matters it should forward its recommendations to the President for his consideration, with the suggestion that if the President provisionally approves these recommendations the Secretary should seek to obtain, through the State-War-Navy Coordinating Committee, the agreement of the Secretaries of War and Navy and of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

⁴⁶The Secretary's Staff Committee at this time, in addition to the Secretary himself, was made up of the two Under Secretaries (Acheson and Clayton), the Counselor of the Department (Cohen), the Assistant Secretaries (Benton, Braden, Hilldring and Russell), the Legal Adviser (not present at this meeting), the Special Assistant to the Secretary for Intelligence and Research (McCormack), the Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs (Hiss) in lieu of the Special Assistant to the Secretary for International Organization and Security Affairs (there was no incumbent at this time), and the Directors or Deputy Directors of certain geographic offices (Hickerson, Vincent and Henderson), in lieu of the Assistant Secretary for European, Far Eastern, and Near Eastern and African Affairs. Mr. O. Benjamin Gerig was present at this meeting in his capacity as Chief of the Division of Dependent Area Affairs. The others named were present presumably in the capacity of secretariat officials; Mr. Lewis recorded the minutes of the meeting.

The Committee met at 9:30 A. M.

Policy and Procedures Concerning the Negotiation of Trusteeship Agreements (Document SC-192)

MR. HISS presented document SC-192⁴⁷ making recommendations regarding policy and procedures concerning the negotiation of trusteeship agreements. The immediate problem, MR. HISS said, was to formulate our position as to which are the "states directly concerned" in such agreements, under the provisions of Article 79 of the Charter. MR. HISS said that the British Government had transmitted to this Government on February 4 copies of draft trusteeship agreements for Tanganyika, Togoland and the Cameroons, and on January 30 the Belgian Government had similarly transmitted a draft agreement for Ruanda-Urundi. The agreements were transmitted to this Government for its "information", and the question now arose as to how this Government should reply—as a "state directly concerned", or otherwise. A reply would have to be made soon, or this Government would be accused of delaying the whole trusteeship program, or the British and Belgians would go ahead on the assumption that we are not interested.

It was also expected that the French Government would shortly transmit to us copies of draft agreements for the French mandates in Africa.

MR. HISS said an important factor in the problem was the effect which an assertion of U.S. claims as a "state directly concerned" in all the mandated territories would have on the policy which this Government may wish to apply to the Japanese mandated islands in the Pacific. He recalled that the Secretary, in a memorandum of February 23, 1946 had expressed the view that it would be unwise for the U.S. to assert a claim as a "state directly concerned" in the African mandated territories unless there was some very strong reason, because such an action might establish a precedent for assertion of similar rights by the Soviet and British Governments in the Pacific islands.

Referring to Article 79 of the Charter, MR. HISS said that it had been the understanding at San Francisco that the mandatory power was obviously a "state directly concerned", while others directly concerned were to be determined by diplomatic negotiations. The importance of the question lay in the fact that no change could be made in a trusteeship agreement except with the consent of the "states directly concerned". Since 1921, MR. HISS said, this Government has taken the position that title to mandates resides in the Principal Allied and Associated Powers in whose favor Germany renounced its titles. He also recalled that Secretary Hughes had asserted a U.S.

interest in Turkish territories placed under mandate, merely on the ground of our war effort in the First World War. The U.S. has entered into treaties with the mandatory powers, based on this legal theory, which makes it impossible to modify the present mandates without United States assent. At San Francisco the U.S. took the position (informally) that we would certainly be a "state directly concerned" in all mandates. However the War and Navy Departments have recently taken the position that the United States should not assert claims as a "state directly concerned" in the African mandates since this would make it difficult for us to take a more restrictive position with respect to Pacific strategic territories. The answer to this, Mr. HISS said, was that self-restraint by the U.S. would not cause China or the Soviet Union to exercise corresponding self-restraint. Furthermore the British have in a sense already foreclosed this question by sending copies of the draft African agreements to us and to China and the Soviet Union and thus almost inviting claims on the part of those powers to be considered "states directly concerned". If we renounced our claims with respect to the African mandates, we might be accused of foregoing our own interests, particularly since we had taken the leading part in formulating the whole trusteeship system. Congress might feel that our treaty rights were not being safeguarded, MR. HISS added. Moreover in certain areas (e.g. Palestine, Western Samoa, New Guinea and Nauru) if we do not assert a claim as a "state directly concerned" we have no treaty rights.

MR. HISS also pointed out that the Army and Navy are concerned about limiting the number of states directly concerned in Pacific territories which will be strategic trusteeships. Trusteeship agreements for these areas will have to be approved by all members of the Security Council (including China and the Soviet Union), so excluding them at the formulation stage will not exclude them later.

MR. HISS said it was accordingly recommended that we consult with the British and French regarding the definition of "states directly concerned". In these consultations we would take the following general position but keep an open mind to their suggestions:

(1) With respect to the mandated territories, the U.S., U.K. and France as the remaining members of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, and China and the Soviet Union, as the inheritors of the rights of Italy and Japan as Principal Allied and Associated Powers, should be "states directly concerned".

(2) The "states directly concerned" in the Italian colonies are the U.S., U.K., France and the Soviet Union (in accordance with the Italian armistice).

(3) As far as the non-mandated Pacific territories are concerned, the "states directly concerned" are the acceptors of the Japanese surrender (U.S., U.K., Soviet Union and China).

(4) The five powers would consult on an ad hoc basis to determine any other "states directly concerned", or any others to be consulted.

Referring to the argument that the Big Five would have veto power in the Security Council over strategic trusteeship agreements, and that therefore it did not make any difference whether the Soviet Union and China were designated as "states directly concerned", THE UNDER SECRETARY asked if our position would not be prejudiced if we admitted these states were directly concerned. We were recognizing a legal right on their part which might prejudice our position in other places, he said. MR. HISS said that if we did not recognize this legal right we would be basing our position solely on the right of conquest.

THE SECRETARY raised the question of the status of the non-mandated Japanese islands (e.g. Okinawa) in the event the Security Council did not approve a trusteeship agreement proposed by us. THE COUNSELOR said there would presumably be a preceding step—the disposition of the islands in the peace treaty. If we do not agree to a peace treaty we will be in possession of the islands for the time being.

THE COUNSELOR emphasized that the important thing to consider was the status of "states directly concerned". If this meant only that such states should be consulted in advance we should construe the term broadly, but in fact the so-called "states directly concerned" must agree before a trusteeship agreement can even be submitted to the Security Council or the Trusteeship Council. Hence the more narrowly we construe the term the better. In so doing, however, let us consult other states broadly before we submit the drafts to the approving authorities. He agreed with the paper that if we broaden the definition to include ourselves with respect to all mandates, it will be impracticable to exclude the Soviet Union from any mandate. It seemed to him that it would be a legitimate construction to take "states directly concerned" to mean only the state immediately administering or in control of the territory. As many states as were interested should be consulted, however. He was not sure that the fact that a broader conception was carried away from San Francisco was important. However, he said, it must be recognized that the Charter refers to states directly concerned, in the plural, and it also refers to "agreement" to be reached among them. MR. HISS added that the Charter provided that terms should "be agreed upon by the states directly concerned including the mandatory power".

THE SECRETARY, after reading from Article 79, asked how the agreement of the "states directly concerned" was to be obtained and how the "states directly concerned" would be determined. MR. HICKERSON (who had been an adviser to the American Delegation in drafting this portion of the Charter) said the Charter was ambiguous on this point, and he said that frankly he thought a mistake had been made. He agreed that the Army and Navy wanted all the Japanese islands to be strategic areas and hence all the "Big Five" states would have a veto. He said he thought the most that should be done now was to consult realistically with the British and French, without taking a formal position, to see what they have in mind. He pointed out that the British had transmitted the draft agreements regarding the African mandates to us for "information" and "without prejudice to the interpretation . . . of 'states directly concerned' ". He noted that the trusteeships proposed by the British were for non-strategic areas, and said that if we take the position with respect to them that all the "Big Five" are "states directly concerned", we will in effect be extending the "Big Five" veto power to the General Assembly (which has authority over non-strategic trusteeships). MR. HICKERSON said he thought the position suggested by the Counselor (see above) was preferable.

MR. HISS pointed out that the veto would not be that of the "Big Five", but of the "states directly concerned". Moreover, the veto is negative. It is to no one's interest except that of the mandatory power to exercise the veto. In fact the veto is being extended beyond the "Big Five" in this respect to other countries, e.g. South Africa.

THE COUNSELOR said he was not at all sure it would work out this way. The position outlined by Mr. Hiss generally assumes our right to a veto even before an agreement goes to the Trusteeship Council or the Security Council, and this would give us great influence. If it were necessary for a compromise to be reached before the agreement went to the appropriate United Nations organ, our position would be on record and hence compromised before the matter comes up in that organ. MR. HISS suggested we could waive our rights at the earlier stage in the interest of reaching an agreement for the higher body to consider rather than to waive them in a broad way prior to the consideration of an agreement. THE COUNSELOR emphasized his feeling that it would be much easier to reach mutual agreement if "states directly concerned" were kept to the minimum and others interested were merely consulted. The mandatory state could introduce the draft agreement. He referred to Palestine as an example—if the U.S. and the Soviet Union were accepted as "states directly concerned", there would be others who would claim equal concern. He said he opposed drawing such a sharp line between (a) legal right to participate in the drafting and concurring on a trusteeship agreement and (b) consultation on such agreements prior to their submission to the Security Council or General Assembly.

MR. HISS said his proposal was designed to restrict the number of "states directly concerned" as much as feasible, but it was felt that there would have to be four or five such states in each case. He also re-emphasized his belief that it did not follow that other states would give up their claims merely because we did so. MR. HICKERSON suggested we could find this out by consultation with U.K. and France, at least as far as the mandated areas were concerned. If a draft agreement goes into the General Assembly with only the mandatory pushing it the result will be negotiating with 50 states in order to get approval. MR. HISS said his recommendation provided for this consultation, but that in order to carry out such consultation we must have prior clarification of the concept of "states directly concerned".

MR. HISS suggested that timing was a further consideration. If a trusteeship agreement were turned into the General Assembly by the mandatory with the approval of only that mandatory (as proposed by the Counselor) the task of getting the agreement approved promptly by the 51 members would be much more difficult than if it had been previously approved by all those directly concerned. THE UNDER SECRETARY said he did not think speed was particularly important.

MR. HENDERSON asked whether Counselor's proposal was feasible in view of the specific reference in the Charter to the plural, "states directly concerned". THE COUNSELOR said that while the language seemed to indicate several states, the same language applied to the voluntary placing of colonies under trusteeship by a colonial power, and it would be strange to require the agreement of others for such trusteeships. MR. HENDERSON said he thought the Counselor's proposal was a very good one.

THE COUNSELOR said he would also think that we should get agreement that trusteeship agreements would be submitted to certain groups of interested states for their views.

MR. HICKERSON said he had discussed the whole problem, and particularly Western Samoa (for U.S. base rights), with the New Zealand Prime Minister, Mr. Fraser. He (Fraser) does not hold a legalistic interpretation of Article 79 but feels determination should be on an ad hoc basis and the number of "states directly concerned" kept to the minimum. With regard to Western Samoa he would prefer to consult only the United States but recognizes that Australia will also have to be consulted. Because Fraser is concerned about a tendency of Great Britain to retire from the Pacific, he would also like to see Britain assert a claim as a "state directly concerned" in Samoa.

THE UNDER SECRETARY asked whether there was any difference between the Japanese mandated territories and other separated Japanese territories, in so far as this problem was concerned. MR. HICKERSON thought there might be. THE COUNSELOR pointed out that claims in the mandates go back to Versailles, whereas a new treaty will be necessary to dispose of the other Japanese territories. He said there were no specific pertinent references in the Japanese surrender terms. THE UNDER SECRETARY said he assumed the Russians would not advance claims regarding the non-mandated territories because of the Kuriles (which they now hold). THE COUNSELOR asked whether there was any reference in the Yalta minutes which would bear out his assumption that the disposition of the Kuriles in favor of the Soviet Union was all they were to get from Japan. THE SECRETARY said the Yalta agreement merely provided that the Kuriles "shall be handed over" to the Soviet Union, and the only argument which can be derived from this is that no claim to anything additional was advanced by the Soviet Union at that time.

MR. HICKERSON, referring to the strategic trusteeships we propose to establish over the Japanese mandated islands, said a question of tactics was involved—whether we want the main discussion at the negotiating stage, or in the Security Council. He said the Department's experts on Russia felt that tactically our position would be a little better if we should be blocked, to have it come in the Security Council acting before the world rather than at the negotiation stage. THE SECRETARY said he agreed with this line of reasoning—the quicker the matter went to the Security Council, the better it would be.

MR. HICKERSON said he had a formula which he had proposed in previous inter-office discussions of the problem. He favored consulting the British and French, and our course might be altered by their views, but assuming they still want to "dodge" the issue of "states directly concerned", he would propose going directly to the Security Council with trusteeship agreements for the Japanese islands. We would say that these are being presented for approval without prejudice to the interpretation of "states directly concerned", and that we know that all possible states directly concerned are in the Security Council, except New Zealand which has been consulted and approves. Then the whole discussion will be in the Security Council, and open.

THE SECRETARY said that if we followed the course recommended by Mr. Hiss, and encountered the usual delays in the preliminary stage, we could then follow the procedure suggested by Mr. Hickerson, with perhaps a prior thirty-day notice of our intention to submit the draft to the Security Council. We should try to get agreement before going to the Security Council but not let the matter be indefinitely delayed.

THE UNDER SECRETARY again raised the question whether our future position was not prejudiced if we recognize as legal rights the interests of certain other states in the mandated areas as "states directly concerned". If an agreement should be defeated by a veto in the Security Council then in subsequent action we would have to take account of the fact that we had recognized their interest in the territory. MR. HISS said that if we base our claim solely on conquest, and a trusteeship agreement is not approved, we will have no legal claim. MR.

HICKERSON questioned this. Referring to the Marianas, he said Germany had the last clear-cut title. She surrendered it to the Principal Allied and Associated Powers. They gave a mandate to Japan, but Japan did not acquire sovereignty. We have driven out the Japanese and are in possession of the islands, but who has title? MR. HICKERSON said it was obviously cloudy. He would hope we could reach agreement in the peace treaty with Japan, but if not, we are in de facto control. THE COUNSELOR said he thought we should avoid asserting the right of conquest over a mandated territory. MR. HISS said we would have to admit Japan had had some sort of title if we base our claim only on conquest.

MR. HISS said the immediate question was the reply to be made to the British and Belgians, and to the French when they ask. He said he assumed from the discussion that the Department was not prepared to assert the position that the U.S. is a "state directly concerned" in all the mandated territories on a legal basis. He asked whether we could say that this has been the U.S. position but we are not now asserting it, and give them our comments on the proposed agreements on their merits without asserting it.

THE UNDER SECRETARY asked why we should say this has been our position. To do so assumes it is the legal position but we are not asserting it, he pointed out, and we might wish to say it was not the legal position. MR. HISS said it has in fact been our position for more than 20 years, and he thought we should not waive it out of hand in the hopes that other states would renounce similar interests.

MR. HENDERSON said we could assert a right under existing treaties as a "state directly concerned" in Tanganyika but he did not think the Soviet Union or China could assert a legal claim either there or in the Japanese mandated islands. Their claims would have to be based on agreements yet to be made. MR. HICKERSON said we could waive our rights with respect to Tanganyika and rely on expressing our views in the General Assembly. THE UNDER SECRETARY said he would prefer neither to waive or claim rights—but merely to reply because we have been consulted.

THE COUNSELOR then proposed that in its reply to the British and Belgian communications on certain proposed trusteeship agreements this Government should reserve its legal right under existing treaties and that its observations on these proposed agreements should be without prejudice to its claims as a "state directly concerned". He further proposed that this Government should discuss the problem of defining "states directly concerned" with the British and French and should take the position that the conclusion of trusteeship agreements would be facilitated by defining this term as narrowly as possible, and that if this is agreed to this Government would propose consultation with as many states as have a legitimate interest in any particular trusteeship agreement.

THE SECRETARY said he thought this might take care of the immediate situation.

MR. HISS suggested the War and Navy Departments should also be consulted regarding their views and to try to show them how those views may not be as valid as they think. THE UNDER SECRETARY said he thought their views were pretty valid.

The agreement of the Committee was recorded as follows:

AGREED that in its reply to the British and Belgian communications on certain proposed trusteeship agreements this Government should reserve its legal rights under existing treaties and that its observations on these proposed agreements should be without prejudice to its claims as a "state directly concerned".

AGREED FURTHER that this Government should discuss the problem of defining "states directly concerned" with the British and French and should take the position that the conclusion of trusteeship agreements would be facilitated by defining this term as narrowly as possible, and that if this is agreed to this Government would propose consultation with as many states as have a legitimate interest in any particular trusteeship agreement.

AGREED that there should be consultation with the War and Navy Departments to ascertain their views regarding the position the Department proposes to take in defining "states directly concerned" and regarding the areas which this Government will propose should be placed under the trusteeship system, it being understood that in the event of failure to reach agreement on these matters, the Staff Committee should consider the matter again.

The meeting adjourned at 10:40 A. M.

The Acting Secretary of State to the British Ambassador (Halifax)

SECRET

WASHINGTON, May 7, 1946.

EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to refer further to your communication of February 4, 1946 (No. 71; Ref. 419/19/46) in which His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom transmitted to this Government drafts of the terms under which the United Kingdom proposes to place the mandated territories of Tanganyika, Cameroons and Togoland under the trusteeship system of the United Nations in accordance with Article 77 of the Charter.

The Government of the United States appreciates the initiative which has been taken by the Government of the United Kingdom with a view to the early establishment of the trusteeship system as contemplated in the Charter. This Government notes that the draft terms of trusteeship have been transmitted to the United States Government "for their information" and "without prejudice to the interpretation to be eventually adopted of the phrase 'states directly concerned' in Article 79 of the Charter".

This Government has carefully examined the draft terms of trusteeship proposed by His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom and takes this opportunity to transmit certain comments on these draft agreements which are outlined in the attachment appended hereto.⁴⁸ These comments pertain largely to changes which it is believed experience has shown to be desirable since the original mandate charters were adopted a quarter of a century ago. We hope that these suggested changes and additions may find ready acceptance by the Government of the United Kingdom since in many cases the proposed changes or additions are in effect a codification of practices already adopted by His Majesty's Government. Moreover, it is believed that these terms as broadened might serve as a useful guide when the terms of trusteeship for other territories are being drawn up.

In transmitting these comments, the United States Government does so without reference to the determination of the phrase "states directly concerned". The position of the United States in this respect remains what it has been for the past twenty-five years, namely, that it has special and specific rights under the Treaty of Versailles and as a party to certain bilateral treaties, including treaties with the United Kingdom concerning the mandated territories. The United States believes that by virtue of this position it is entitled to be one of the "states directly concerned" in all mandated territories.

However, it is the view of this Government that in the interest of speeding up conclusion of trusteeship agreements it would be desirable to limit the number of negotiating states to a minimum, and in line with this principle it is felt that the most desirable procedure would be that the present mandatory powers should propose draft terms of trusteeship and that other particularly interested powers should be consulted in regard to these terms before they are actually submitted to the General Assembly for approval.

This procedure is proposed on the condition that the other interested powers agree to the principle of consultation as described above without pressing claims to be signatories to the terms of trusteeship for the African territories in question.

This Government further believes that a useful purpose might be served if informal discussions could take place very soon with His Majesty's Government in order to explore these and other aspects of this subject. This would also afford an opportunity to consult together in regard to the draft terms of trusteeship. Such discussions might take place either in London or, if desired, in Washington, and would, we believe, expedite matters so that a number of draft trusteeship agreements could be submitted to the General Assembly in September, thus enabling the Trusteeship Council to be constituted at that time. It is our intention also to ascertain the views of the French Government on the question of the most effective procedure for concluding the agreements.⁴⁹

Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

COMMENTS ON THE DRAFT TERMS OF TRUSTEESHIP FOR TANGANYIKA, AND THE CAMEROONS AND TOGOLAND UNDER BRITISH MANDATE⁵¹

(Note: The comments which follow apply equally to the draft terms of trusteeship for Tanganyika, the Cameroons, and Togoland, since it is noted that these terms are identical with the exception of Articles 5 and 6 and the definition of boundaries contained in Article 1 of each draft agreement.)

Article 1a (new)

Comment.—In view of the uncertainty under the mandates system with respect to the location of rights and titles to mandated territories, the following wording is suggested as clarification of this matter:

“Upon the approval of these terms of trusteeship by the General Assembly in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, all rights and titles in the trust territory shall thereupon be vested in the United Nations. The United Nations shall exercise these rights as trustee for the inhabitants of the trust territory."

⁴⁹ The same note, mutatis mutandis, was transmitted to the Belgian Ambassador (Silvercruyts) on May 14 (880.014/2-346). A note to the French Ambassador (Bonnet) on May 13 described the approach made by the British and Belgian Governments, set forth the position of this Government in general terms, and without referring directly to the fact that no draft terms had been submitted to this Government by the French Government proposed “informal discussions . . . very soon” either in Paris or Washington (862P.01/5-1346). The essential information regarding these notes was forwarded to the Ambassador in France (Caffery) in telegram 2360, May 15, 8 p. m., the Department indicating that it “would welcome any information you can obtain informally re French plans for negotiating trusteeship agreements for Togoland and Cameroons (urtel 605 Feb 7) [not printed] and French views on states directly concerned.” (862P.01/2-746) In telegram 3829, May 8, 5 p. m., to London, Ambassador Harriman was informed of the May 7 note to Lord Halifax and was requested to “inquire whether other Governments to which British sent draft agreements either as states directly concerned or for information have yet replied and, if so, what position they have taken re states directly concerned and draft terms of trusteeship.” (862P.01/4-2946) The same telegram, mutatis mutandis, was sent to Brussels on May 15 (telegram 515, File No. 862.01/5-946).

Article 5

Comment.—With respect to paragraph (b), it is suggested that the qualifying words "with the approval of the General Assembly or of the Trusteeship Council" should be inserted after the words "shall be entitled". At the end of this clause, consideration should also be given to the insertion of the words "and with the terms of this agreement". It is suggested that the words "under his sovereignty or control" be eliminated in order not to bar future arrangements of this character which might include areas not under British sovereignty or control. Consideration might be given to establishing this clause as a separate Article to follow Article 5. An additional clause should be inserted sustaining the validity of arrangements of this character already established.

It is suggested that paragraph (c) be replaced by the following three paragraphs:

"(1) may establish and use military, naval and air bases, erect fortifications, and station and employ its own forces in the trust territory in carrying out its obligations toward the Security Council as well as for local defence and the maintenance of law and order within the trust territory.

(2) may enlist volunteer forces for the purpose of carrying out its obligations toward the Security Council and for local defence and the maintenance of law and order within the trust territory; and

(3) shall use such forces only within the trust territory except upon the call of the Security Council in accordance with any special agreement made by the Administering Authority under Article 43 of the Charter of the United Nations and, in recruiting such forces, shall take care that, except in case of a threat to international peace and security, as determined by the Security Council, enlistments shall not be permitted in such numbers as to disrupt the economic life of the territory."

Article 6

Comment.—It is suggested that it would be of considerable value to specify in greater detail the steps by which the inhabitants of the territory will accomplish their progressive development towards self-government or independence. Such provisions would take account of the great interest of peoples throughout the world in the procedures and techniques for the development of political expression and political institutions in non-self-governing areas. To this end, the following revision of Article 6 is suggested:

"1. The Administering Authority shall foster the development of political institutions suited to the trust territory and shall promote the progressive development of the inhabitants of the trust territory towards self-government or independence in accordance with Article 76(b) of the Charter by:

(a) providing for increasing participation of citizens of the trust territory in administrative and other governmental positions;

(b) establishing advisory and legislative bodies on a local and a territory-wide basis in the trust territory, as may be appropriate to the particular circumstances of the territory and its peoples;

(c) developing the use of popular election in the trust territory, with progressive widening of the franchise;

(d) extending to all citizens of the trust territory eligibility to hold appointive and elective office; and

(e) developing legislative, administrative, and budgetary autonomy for the trust territory.

2. At intervals not exceeding five years, beginning in 194—, the Trusteeship Council in consultation with the Administering Authority shall survey the development of the political institutions of the trust territory and the capacity for self-government achieved by its inhabitants, and shall report thereon to the General Assembly.

3. At such time as the General Assembly shall find that the inhabitants of the trust territory are ready for self-government it may make recommendations to the signatories as to the form which self-government shall take.”

Article 7

Comment.—With respect to the application of international conventions to the territories, it is believed that the approach followed in Article 9 of the Mandate for Tanganyika is to be preferred to the abbreviated form of Article 7 of the draft terms, with the addition of references to conventions dealing with labor and health.

Article 8

Comment.—It is suggested that consideration be given to the use of the expression “land and resources” rather than merely “land” throughout this Article in order to safeguard the transfer of not only land but also of the sub-surface resources.

It is further suggested that the expression used in the terms of mandate, “previous consent”, be retained in the second sentence of this Article.

It is also proposed tentatively that the guarantees of the terms of mandate relating to usury be maintained.

Article 8a (new)

Comment.—In the implementation of the objective of the trusteeship system “to promote the . . . economic . . . advancement of the inhabitants of the trust territories”, it seems desirable, as in the case of the objective to promote the political advancement of the inhabitants, to specify in some detail the steps which the Administering Authority should take in the achievement of this objective. It is recognized that the items which are included below in the suggested Article represent for the most part statements of programs or plans which are already in existence with respect to these territories. However, it is strongly urged that a valuable service may be performed through these first trusteeship agreements by the formalizing of high standards of administrative practice. With this object in view, the following detailed Article is proposed for inclusion in the terms of trusteeship:

“To promote the economic advancement of the inhabitants of the trust territory, the Administering Authority shall:

(a) regulate the development of natural resources, including the use of land and mineral resources, in accordance with sound conservation principles and for the benefit of all the inhabitants of the trust territory;

(b) encourage the development of efficient agriculture and industry, including diversification wherever desirable in the interests of the inhabitants;

(c) facilitate the access of the inhabitants to capital and technical assistance needed for economic development;

(d) assist the inhabitants, so far as feasible, to become qualified for and to obtain employment in all occupations, employments, and professions without discrimination;

(e) assist the inhabitants to participate in the world economy by permitting them to supply their needs from and to sell their produce in the most favorable markets;

(f) prevent the economic development of the trust territory from being distorted or retarded for the benefit of other peoples or territories;

(g) protect the inhabitants against the loss of their lands and occupations;

(h) assist the inhabitants to become progressively free to manage their own economic affairs subject only to the requirements of a sound international economy; and

(i) institute such other regulations as may be necessary for the economic advancement of the inhabitants of the trust territory.”

Article 9

Comment.—It is believed that the insertion of the word “industrial” after the word “economic” in the introductory clause of the Article would serve a useful purpose in broadening the scope of these provisions on equal treatment. This terminology would follow the Mandates Agreements. The introductory clause should end with the word “nationals”. Paragraphs (a), (b), and (c) should be independent subsections.

In order to make it wholly clear that aviation rights are included within these commercial equality clauses, paragraph (a) of Article 9 should be amended by the insertion of the phrase "including freedom of transit and navigation by air" after the phrase "freedom of transit and navigation".

Article 11

Comment.—The necessity of making a provision for protecting the interests of the inhabitants of the trust territory with respect to economic and commercial matters is fully appreciated and concurred in by the Government of the United States. It is believed, however, that the phrase "the application of a more advantageous regime" is not susceptible of precise definition. Moreover, under the commercial policy followed by the United States Government, while it is quite feasible to agree to most-favored-nation treatment for a trust territory, it would be most difficult for this Government to accept an undertaking by which its rights would depend upon a determination of whether a "more advantageous regime" existed in a trust territory for the United States and its nationals than was in existence in the United States for the trust territory and its nationals. The following provision is therefore suggested as a substitute for the present wording of this Article:

"Nothing in this agreement shall entitle any member of the United Nations to claim for itself or for its nationals, companies and associations the benefits of Article 9 of this agreement in any respect in which it does not give to the nationals, companies and associations of _____ equality of treatment with the nationals, companies, and associations of any other state."

Article 11a (new)

Comment.—As an amplification of the objective stated in Article 76(b) "to promote the . . . social . . . advancement of the inhabitants of the trust territories," it is suggested that the following detailed provisions might be inserted as a new Article in the terms of agreement. Again, in many cases these items represent policies already in effect with respect to Tanganyika, Togoland, and Cameroons:

"To promote the social advancement of the inhabitants of the trust territory, the Administering Authority shall:

- (a) protect the rights and fundamental freedoms of all elements in the population without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion;
- (b) prohibit all forms of slavery and slave-trading;
- (c) prohibit all forms of forced or compulsory labor except when necessary for essential public works and services as specifically authorized by the local administration, with adequate remuneration, with adequate protection of the welfare of the workers, and in accordance with the provisions of the Forced Labor Convention, 1930;

(d) promote the progressive elimination of recruiting of workers and the development of the spontaneous offer of labor in giving effect to the principles of the Elimination of Recruiting Recommendation, 1936;

(e) prohibit penal sanctions for breach of contract of employment;

(f) promote employment at adequate wages, improve working conditions, assure freedom of association and, where feasible, encourage collective bargaining and provide needed social insurance and social services;

(g) protect the health of the people through improvement of housing and sanitation, adequate provision for medical care, including insofar as feasible the development of an adequate health service and the provision of necessary hospitals, dispensaries and mobile medical units, the strict application of necessary quarantine regulations, and public education concerning hygiene and nutrition;

(h) control the traffic in arms and ammunition;

(i) regulate the traffic in opium and other dangerous drugs;

(j) regulate in the interest of the inhabitants the manufacture, importation, and distribution of alcohol and other spirituous beverages; and

(k) institute such other regulations as may be necessary to protect the inhabitants against social abuses."

Article 11*b* (new)

Comment.—The following provisions are suggested as implementation of the basic objective of the trusteeship system to promote the educational advancement of inhabitants of trust territories:

"The Administering Authority shall continue and extend the general system of elementary education throughout the trust territory, designed to abolish illiteracy and to facilitate the vocational and cultural advancement of the population, child and adult. It shall provide such facilities as may prove necessary in the interests of the inhabitants for qualified students to receive higher education, including training on the professional level."

Article 12

Comment.—Great significance is attached to the establishment of broad rights with respect to the exercise of religion, religious teaching, and the legitimate activities of missionaries. In this regard, the wording of Article 8 of the Mandate for Tanganyika seems preferable to the shorter form adopted in the draft terms. It is suggested, therefore, that the phraseology of this Article follow Article 8 of the Mandate for Tanganyika with the addition of references to freedom of religious teaching and the right of missionaries to open hospitals in the trust territory as well as schools. Appropriately revised, this Article would read as follows:

“The Administering Authority shall ensure in the trust territory complete freedom of conscience, freedom of religious teaching, and the free exercise of all forms of worship which are consonant with public order and morality. Missionaries who are nationals of States Members of the United Nations shall be free to enter the trust territory and to travel and reside therein, to acquire and possess property, to erect religious buildings and to open schools and hospitals throughout the territory; it being understood, however, that the Administering Authority shall have the right to exercise such control as may be necessary for the maintenance of public order and good government, and to take all measures required for such control.”

Article 12*a* (new)

Comment.—It is strongly urged that the following Article be inserted in the terms of agreement, since no where else in the trusteeship terms is there a direct statement of these fundamental democratic guarantees:

“Subject only to the requirements of public order, the Administering Authority shall guarantee to the inhabitants of the trust territory freedom of speech, of the press, of assembly, and of petition, freedom of migration and movement.”

Article 17 (new)

Comment.—In order to make clear the right of the Administering Authority to accept membership for the trust territory in appropriate regional and international associations of states, the following additional Article is believed to be desirable:

“The Administering Authority may, on behalf of the trust territory, accept membership in any regional advisory commission, regional authority, or technical organization, or other voluntary association of states, may cooperate with specialized international bodies, public or private, and may engage in other forms of international cooperation, not inconsistent with the Charter.”

Article 18 (new)

Comment.—The achievement of free interchange of information on an international basis is a purpose to which both the United Kingdom Government and the Government of the United States subscribe and toward the attainment of which both Governments continue to extend their efforts. It therefore seems appropriate to include in trusteeship agreements provisions which will facilitate such free interchange of information. The following additional Article is therefore proposed:

“1. The Administering Authority shall adhere to the principle of free interchange of information. To this end, nationals, corporations, and associations of Members of the United Nations shall have the right throughout the trust territory to engage in such activities as writing, reporting, and gathering of information for public dissemination abroad, and shall enjoy freedom of transmission of material to be used abroad for publication and for the radio. Furthermore, the nationals, corporations, and associations of other Members of the United Nations shall enjoy freedom of publication in the trust territory, in accordance with the applicable laws and regulations, upon the same terms as nationals, corporations, or associations of the Administering Authority.

2. The term 'information', as used in this Article, shall include all forms of oral and written communications, printed matter, motion pictures, and photographs."

SUPPLEMENTARY COMMENTS ON THE DRAFT TERMS OF TRUSTEESHIP FOR TANGANYIKA, AND THE CAMEROONS AND TOGOLAND UNDER BRITISH MANDATE ⁵²

Suggestions Relating to Procedural Matters and Drafting Changes

Article 2

Comment.—In view of the requirement of Article 81 of the Charter that the Administering Authority shall be "one or more states or the Organization itself", it seems desirable to designate "the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland" rather than "His Majesty" as the Administering Authority. It likewise seems desirable to set forth in clear terms the basic role of the Administering Authority in the trusteeship system of the United Nations. The following revised wording is therefore suggested:

"The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland is hereby designated as Administering Authority for _____ and, in the exercise of rights and duties conferred upon it in this agreement, shall serve as agent of the United Nations as trustee."

Article 3

Comment.—Since both the General Assembly and the Trusteeship Council are given important functions in the Charter of the United Nations with respect to the trusteeship system, the Administering ⁵² This document was not transmitted to the British Government at this time, but was handed informally to representatives of the Foreign Office in London in June by Mr. Benjamin Gerig, Chief of the Division of Dependent Area Affairs. For the London conversations, see Mr. Gerig's "Report" to the Acting Secretary, dated July 1, p. 601.

Authority should undertake to give effect to the actions of both of these organs in discharging with respect to the trust territory the functions set forth in the Charter and in the terms of trusteeship. The following revised wording is suggested for the latter portion of this Article:

“. . . and to give effect to the actions of the General Assembly and the Trusteeship Council in discharging their functions with respect to _____ as defined in the United Nations Charter and in this agreement.”

Article 4

Comment.—In view of the fact that this Article bears upon the responsibilities of the Administering Authority with respect to internal and international security, it is suggested that the words “good government” might properly be eliminated in this Article. The designators (a) and (b) might also be eliminated.

Article 5

Comment.—It is suggested that paragraph (a) of the draft terms for Tanganyika should contain, as do the draft terms for Togoland and the Cameroons, the words “subject to the provisions of this agreement”.

Article 10

Comment.—It is suggested that the introductory clause to Article 10 be revised to include the conception that the obligations specified in this Article are obligations of the United Nations as well as of the Administering Authority. The introductory clause so revised would read as follows:

“Measures taken to give effect to Article 9 of this agreement shall be subject always to the overriding obligation of the United Nations and of the Administering Authority to promote the political, economic, social and educational advancement of the inhabitants of _____, and to carry out the other basic objectives of the International Trusteeship System as stated in Article 76 of the Charter. The Administering Authority shall in particular be free:”

It is suggested that the words “as appear to him to be” in paragraph (c) be replaced by the words “as may be”. The exercise of the right set forth in paragraph (c) should be made subject to the approval of the Trusteeship Council.

Article 13

Comment.—It is believed that this important aspect of the trusteeship system would be made still more effective in its practical application by the inclusion of two additional clauses, the first of which would make possible requests for special reports should this seem desirable, and the second of which would put into writing a useful practice which was quite generally followed under the Mandates System.

“1. The General Assembly or the Trusteeship Council may call upon the Administering Authority to submit special reports upon particular matters.

2. The Administering Authority shall include in its reports to the General Assembly information concerning the measures taken to give effect to suggestions and recommendations of the General Assembly and the Trusteeship Council.”

Article 13a (new)

Comment.—The following suggested Article is also based upon a practice of the Mandates System which it might be useful to formalize in the trusteeship terms.

“The Administering Authority shall designate a special representative to be present at the sessions of the Trusteeship Council at which the reports of the Administering Authority with respect to _____ are considered.”

Article 14

Comment.—It is suggested that the phrase “in accordance with Articles 82 and 83 of the United Nations Charter” be omitted, since the procedure of amending trusteeship agreements is fully specified in the Charter.

Article 15

Comment.—In view of the fact that these draft terms of agreement are non-strategic in character, the alteration or amendment of them should take place in accordance with Article 79 and 85 of the Charter.

Article 16

Comment.—Consideration might be given to the addition of a clause on advisory opinion.

Article 16a (new)

Comment.—Article 87(c) of the Charter states that visits to trust territories may be provided for at times “agreed upon with the Administering Authority”. It therefore seems appropriate to include within each trust agreement a provision of the character of the clause which follows:

“The Administering Authority shall facilitate any periodic or special visits to _____ which the Trusteeship Council or the General Assembly may deem necessary, in accordance with Article 87(c) of the Charter.”

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Director of the Office of European Affairs (Hickerson)

[WASHINGTON,] May 24, 1946.

Mr. Middleton came in to see me at his request at 4 p. m. this afternoon and handed me the attached aide-mémoire, dated May 24,⁵³ in answer to our note of May 7 in regard to the proposed trusteeship agreements for Tanganyika, the Cameroons and Togoland. Mr. Middleton suggested that I read the note and give him any immediate comments I wished to make.

I read the aide-mémoire and told Mr. Middleton that after a careful consideration of the note we would have a number of comments to make. I told him that my immediate reaction was that the British Government must have misunderstood in at least one important particular our note of May 7. The British aide-mémoire refers to the United States Government's "not pressing to be recognized as a 'state directly concerned' ". I told Mr. Middleton that the purpose of our note was to state that we felt that on either of two grounds we could establish a claim as a state directly concerned as regards to these three trusteeship agreements. Our note, however, indicated a willingness that in certain circumstances we would not press such a claim, but we reserved our right to press our claim if these conditions were not met. I said that the whole purpose of our proposal was to reduce to the absolute minimum the number of states actually signing the agreement (and thus possessing a veto power before the agreements reached the United Nations). I said that we hoped that the British and French Governments would agree that it would be desirable to consult governments and obtain their views without recognizing their status as states directly concerned.

I went on to explain to Mr. Middleton that to be more explicit, if we did not assert or claim to be a state directly concerned in the three British Mandates, we would expect the British Government not to assert a claim to be a state directly concerned in agreements in respect of the Japanese Mandated Islands; that we would furthermore expect them to hold to an agreed minimum the number of states signing their three trusteeship agreements as states directly concerned; and that if they recognized as states directly concerned countries in respect of these three agreements which we did not believe to be states directly concerned, we would reserve the right to assert our claim to sign the agreements as a state directly concerned.

Mr. Middleton said that he had understood our note in this sense and he believed the British Government did. He said that he felt the whole difficulty was that the British Government had not decided whether or not to waive its claims to be a state directly concerned "in the Pacific Mandated Islands".

I said that I had commented only on one aspect of the note after a hasty reading, and that we might have a number of other comments to make after we had studied the note.

AIDE-MÉMOIRE

His Majesty's Government have carefully considered the comments of the United States Government on the draft terms of Trusteeship for Tanganyika, and the Cameroons and Togoland under British Mandate, which were conveyed in the Acting Secretary of State's note and attached memorandum of May 7th.

2. The present position regarding trusteeship agreements for the United Kingdom mandated territories in Africa is as follows:

(a) In January drafts were sent for concurrence to States which His Majesty's Government have recognized as in any event "directly concerned" (i.e. Belgium in the case of Tanganyika, France in the case of British Togoland and the British Cameroons, and the Union of South Africa in respect of all three). Simultaneously drafts were also sent to all other members of the "Big Five" and to other British Commonwealth Governments members of the United Nations for information.

(b) The Belgian Government have already concurred in the Tanganyika draft and the South African Government in all three.

(c) No reply has yet been received from the French Government and no comments from the Soviet and Chinese Governments.

(d) For local reasons in East Africa it is desirable to publish at least the Tanganyika agreement as soon as possible, preferably before the end of May, 1946.

(e) As regards the form of publication, the Prime Minister originally announced to Parliament that the drafts would be published as soon as His Majesty's Government had received the concurrence of the States directly concerned.

3. It is against this background and in relation to the future timetable that His Majesty's Government have to consider the United States suggestions contained in Mr. Acheson's letter of May 7th. His Majesty's Government much appreciate the fact that the United States Government, although not pressing to be recognized as a "state directly concerned", have put their points to His Majesty's Government in this way instead of bringing them up at the General Assembly without the opportunity of previous discussion. His Majesty's Government wish to assure the United States Government that they are giving their detailed comments the most careful consideration. The United States Government will, however, appreciate that if His Majesty's Government decided to modify their draft in the light of the United States Government's suggestions this would now necessitate a second reference to the States hitherto recognized as directly concerned in order to obtain their concurrence in the alterations, which might not be altogether easy especially as the United States are not themselves claiming to be recognized as a State directly concerned. His Majesty's Government would also wish to consult other British Commonwealth members of the United Nations as well as the Union of South Africa, particularly Australia and New Zealand, on account of possible repercussions on future terms of trusteeship for their mandated territories.

4. Between now and September it will be necessary to work to a close timetable if the terms of trusteeship are to be ready in time for submission to the General Assembly. Parliament was told on January 23rd that as soon as the drafts had been agreed upon by the States regarded as being in any event directly concerned their terms would be communicated to Parliament and to the local Legislative Councils (Hansard House of Commons January 23rd Column 151). There are already indications that Parliament and at any rate the Tanganyika Legislative Council may wish for a debate. Debates in the Legislative Councils must obviously come first so that in any Parliamentary debate the reaction of the inhabitants of the territories may be known. This means in practice that any local debates must take place during June so that the matter may be raised in Parliament, if desired, before the summer recess. Otherwise it will be too late for the General Assembly. Consequently His Majesty's Government must arrange simultaneous publication in the United Kingdom and in territories concerned without delay. The only reason why publication has been deferred so long already is that His Majesty's Government had hoped first to secure the agreement of all States whom they had recognized as being in any event States directly concerned. The proposed terms have been drawn up in confidential consultation with the governments of the territories concerned but the delay in making them available to the public is already causing inconvenience, especially as it is known that they were communicated in January to the South African and various other governments, and further delay would cause acute embarrassment. In reply to a question in Parliament on May 15th enquiring what consultations are being held to ascertain the wishes of the local populations the Colonial Secretary stated inter alia that he hoped that publication of the proposed terms of trusteeship would be possible shortly.

5. From the foregoing it will be seen that adoption of the State Department's proposal would involve a radical alteration of the timetable. The consequent delay (pending Anglo-American discussions) would not only cause His Majesty's Government domestic embarrassment but might indeed prejudice the possibility of bringing the trusteeship agreements before the next General Assembly for approval which, according to Mr. Acheson's note is the object of the proposed discussions. In all the circumstances His Majesty's Government consider that it would not be practicable to defer publication in order to make textual amendments. The Foreign Office feel that the State Department will appreciate the importance His Majesty's Government attach to complying with the proper processes of democratic consultation both in the United Kingdom and in the territories concerned.

6. Nevertheless, His Majesty's Government are anxious to collaborate with the United States Government in this matter as fully as circumstances permit. They consider that early discussions with United States officials will be desirable and would be glad that they should take place in London. For the reasons given above, however, the timetable unfortunately precludes deferring publication until these discussions have taken place. Naturally, the drafts as published will not necessarily be final since the General Assembly might make its approval conditional upon amendments proposed by any member State. Although the terms of trusteeship must be agreed to by the existing mandatory power (Article 79 of the Charter) there is nothing to preclude His Majesty's Government accepting amendments after publication of the original draft either at the General Assembly stage or earlier if His Majesty's Government (and the other States directly concerned) consider them satisfactory. His Majesty's Government could profitably consider with the United States Government and possibly other Governments between now and September which, if any, of the United States amendments they would be prepared to accept and, if the other States directly concerned also agree, these amendments could perhaps be incorporated before formal submission of the texts of the United Nations.

AIDE-MÉMOIRE

The United States Government has carefully considered the views of the United Kingdom Government expressed in an aide-mémoire of May 24, 1946 replying to the Acting Secretary of State's Note of May 7, 1946 concerning the negotiation of trusteeship agreements with respect to Tanganyika and the Cameroons and Togoland under British mandate.

The United States Government is gratified with the sympathetic consideration which the United Kingdom Government is disposed to give to its comments on the draft terms of trusteeship and welcomes the opportunity to discuss these comments further with representatives of the United Kingdom Government in London.

As to the question of the states which should be signatories to the draft agreements and thus recognized as states directly concerned under Article 79 of the Charter of the United Nations, the United States Government regrets that the United Kingdom Government feel that they have already been committed to a specific definition in this respect according to which France, Belgium, and the Union of South Africa should in any event be included as states directly concerned.

The United States Government notes that this commitment was made without consultation with it and hopes that the United Kingdom Government and the Governments of the three States referred to will yet be able to agree not only that the procedure would be simplified but also that no real advantage to them would be lost if these three Governments would be satisfied with a procedure of consultation on these terms of agreement as proposed by the United States Government. Indeed, it appears to the United States Government that to be a signatory of an initial draft agreement as a state directly concerned gives no greater advantage than would obtain under the exercise of consultation, unless it be the doubtful negative advantage of being able to veto proposals made by the other signatories.

The United States Government, therefore, hopes that the Government of the United Kingdom will agree to make either by itself or jointly with the United States an approach to these three Governments asking them in the circumstances to consider the procedure of consultation as a substitute for negotiation and signature in formulating the initial terms of the draft agreements in question.

Should such an agreement not be reached, the United States Government would feel obliged to reconsider its position and to examine again whether and under what conditions it should press its claim also to be a signatory of the initial draft agreement as a state directly concerned, a claim which, under the condition specified in its Note of May 7, it was prepared to waive in the interest of speeding up the conclusion of trusteeship agreements. It should be noted that the United States Government has not, as suggested in the British aide-mémoire, waived the claim of the United States to be recognized as a state directly concerned. This Government merely expressed its willingness to waive its right, subject to certain conditions stated in its Note of May 7, to sign the draft agreement.⁵⁴

With reference to publishing the draft terms of trusteeship when the United Kingdom Government has "received the concurrence of the states directly concerned", the United States Government had hoped that this might follow rather than precede the consultations with the other particularly interested states, including the United States, especially as several other states had previously been consulted in the drafting of the terms.

The United States Government does not wish unduly to delay the publication of the drafts since promises of publication have been made to local territorial authorities and to Parliament, whose delayed fulfillment might cause embarrassment. It sees no great inconvenience in this procedure since, as stated in the aide-mémoire, "there is nothing to preclude His Majesty's Government accepting amendments after publication of the original draft either at the General Assembly or earlier" if they are considered satisfactory, and that such amendments could perhaps be incorporated before formal submission of the texts to the United Nations. It does, however, hope that publication will be in the form of a draft proposal by the United Kingdom rather than as an agreement between certain "states directly concerned".

The United States Government agrees with the suggestion contained in the aide-mémoire to the effect that it will be desirable to have conversations between the two Governments take place in London at an early date. The Secretary of State has designated for this purpose

⁵⁴ In the drafting history of this aide-mémoire a paragraph reading substantially as this one had first appeared and then disappeared. When the draft aide-mémoire was circulated by the Division of Dependent Area Affairs to the interested offices for initialling on May 29 it was accompanied by a memorandum from the Chief of the Division (Gerig) recommending that consideration be given to restoring the paragraph. This proposal was concurred in and the paragraph was re-inserted in the final draft with two changes which made the statement both clearer and more firm. (Memorandum by Mr. Gerig to the Office of European Affairs, the Counselor of the Department, the Under Secretary of State, the Office of Special Political Affairs, the Division of African Affairs, the Office of Near Eastern and African Affairs and the Division of British Commonwealth Affairs, May 29, File No. 862P.01/5-2446.)

Mr. Benjamin Gerig, Chief of the Division of Dependent Area Affairs, and Mr. Edwin L. Smith, of the Division of African Affairs, who, if agreeable to the United Kingdom Government, will be prepared to go to London next week to carry on conversations on these questions.⁵⁵

The Acting Secretary of State to the Chief of the Division of Dependent Area Affairs (Gerig)

WASHINGTON, June 7, 1946.

MY DEAR MR. GERIG: In undertaking conversations with representatives of the British Government, and possibly of the French and Belgian Governments with regard to the negotiation of trusteeship agreements for mandated territories in Africa, you should be guided by the instructions which follow.

General Objectives

1. It is desirable that the Trusteeship Council be constituted at the September meeting of the General Assembly. This can be done if the mandatory powers, in response to the Resolution on Non-Self-Governing Peoples adopted by the General Assembly in February 1946, take the proper steps for submitting draft trusteeship agreements for their respective mandated territories and if, through the approval of these draft agreements by the General Assembly, a sufficient number of states are designated as administering authorities. (The Trusteeship Council, for example, might be constituted under Article 86 of the Charter with the United Kingdom, France, and Belgium as "Members which administer trust territories", and with the United States, the Soviet Union, and China as "those which do not", provided that trusteeship agreements can be brought into force for at least one mandated territory now administered by each of the former three states.) It is important, therefore, that you should assist in every possible way in facilitating the conclusion of these draft agreements, while safeguarding the American position on the "states directly concerned" and on the draft terms of trusteeship.

2. The American position on the "states directly concerned", as defined immediately below, is primarily designed to limit the exercise

⁵⁵ In telegram 4407, May 31, to London, the Ambassador in the United Kingdom (Harriman) was brought up-to-date on developments since telegram 3829, May 8, had been cabled to him. Specifically he was apprised of the May 24-May 31 exchange between the Department and the British Embassy and the impending trip to London by Messrs. Gerig and Smith. (862P.01/5-2346) of the "veto" in this particular field of United Nations activity. Restriction of the "states directly concerned" to an absolute minimum, if possible to a single state, would thus eliminate one opportunity provided by the Charter for use of the "veto" by a Member which may wish unilaterally to block the proper development of the United Nations.

"States Directly Concerned"

1. You should attempt to obtain acceptance for the position on the "states directly concerned" which was stated as follows in the Department's note to the British Government (and, mutatis mutandis, to the French and Belgian Governments) :

In transmitting these comments, the United States Government does so without reference to the determination of the phrase "states directly concerned". The position of the United States in this respect remains what it has been for the past twenty-five years, namely, that it has special and specific rights under the Treaty of Versailles and as a party to certain bilateral treaties, including treaties with the United Kingdom concerning the mandated territories. The United States believes that by virtue of this position it is entitled to be one of the "states directly concerned" in all mandated territories.

However, it is the view of this Government that in the interest of speeding up conclusion of trusteeship agreements it would be desirable to limit the number of negotiating states to a minimum, and in line with this principle it is felt that the most desirable procedure would be that the present mandatory powers should propose draft terms of trusteeship and that other particularly interested powers should be consulted in regard to these terms before they are actually submitted to the General Assembly for approval.

This procedure is proposed on the condition that the other interested powers agree to the principle of consultation as described above without pressing claims to be signatories to the terms of trusteeship for the African territories in question.

2. You should explain that this formula is designed to facilitate the conclusion of trusteeship agreements by keeping the number of "states directly concerned" to a minimum. The Member which forwards a draft trusteeship agreement to the General Assembly for approval would inform the latter that it had consulted all the particularly interested powers on the terms of trusteeship and had taken their views into account. Such consultation would obviate the need for prolonged discussion and perhaps extensive revision of the terms of trusteeship by the General Assembly. If a definition of "particularly interested powers" which should be consulted is called for, it may be suggested that it might include (a) the states having special treaty rights, (b) all the remaining permanent members of the Security Council and (eventually) of the Trusteeship Council, and (c) any states in the region having special interests in the territory.

3. You should make clear that in waiving its right to be a signatory to the initial draft terms, the United States is not necessarily waiving its rights with respect to any alterations and amendments which may subsequently be proposed under Article 79.

4. In advocating this formula for consultation, you should point out that the "states directly concerned" in any mandated or other territories should, in any case, include those which have legal rights in the territory. You should maintain the principle that the United States, because of its treaty rights, is entitled to be a "state directly concerned" in all mandated territories, even though it is willing not to press its claim to be a signatory to the draft agreements for the mandated territories in Africa, provided that other states (except the mandatory power) do not do so. You need not attempt to obtain British and French concurrence in the claim of the United States to be a "state directly concerned" if you can persuade them to accept the procedure of consultation outlined in paragraphs 1 and 2 above.

5. If geographic propinquity is advanced as a criterion, you should not accept any interpretation that this factor is necessarily a basis for determining the "states directly concerned". It may be advisable, however, to consult with such states in regard to the terms of trusteeship, as stated in paragraph 2 above.

6. If the British, French, or Belgians insist, with respect to the draft trusteeship agreements in which they are respectively interested, that states other than the mandatory power must be considered as "states directly concerned" and as signatories to the agreements, you should reserve your position and should immediately ask the Department for instructions. Should the British representative refer to Mr. Attlee's statement in the House of Commons that the Union of South Africa is directly concerned in all the British mandates in Africa, it might be replied that all of the Union's interests could be satisfied by being "consulted" as the United States now proposes.

7. Should the question of the Japanese Mandated Islands arise you should refer to the statements made by the President on January 15, 1946 and by the Acting Secretary of State on January 22. You may state that it is your personal assumption that this Government intends to place these islands under trusteeship. You should further inform the British and French representatives that, with respect to the Japanese Mandated Islands and any other Japanese territories which the United States may administer under trusteeship, this Government prefers that the "states directly concerned" be kept to an absolute minimum. In fact, it would prefer to submit the draft agreements to the General Assembly or the Security Council as the sole "state directly concerned" after consultation with all interested states. In dealing with the draft agreements for mandated territories in Africa, moreover, you should bear in mind that every decision taken with regard to both the "states directly concerned" and the terms of trusteeship may set a precedent which may affect the trusteeship agreements for territories in the Pacific.

Comments on the Draft Agreements

In general, you should press for revision and expansion of the British and Belgian draft agreements in order to make adequate provision for the political, economic, social, and educational development of the people of the territories and for equal treatment in the territory for the Members of the United Nations and their nationals. The comments which were sent to the British and Belgians, together with the supplementary comments⁵⁶ which are to be handed them informally, represent the maximum terms of trusteeship for these areas which this Government believes it possible to obtain under existing circumstances. In view of the voluntary character of the Charter, the terms of trusteeship must be satisfactory to the mandatory power which, under Article 79 of the Charter, is automatically a "state directly concerned". While the revisions suggested to the British and Belgian Governments do not contain all the most desirable features that might be included in an ideal trusteeship agreement, they are probably the most that could be accepted by the mandatory powers.

Basic Objectives

It is the view of this Government that trusteeship agreements for the mandated territories should be as comprehensive as possible in order that they may serve as a general guide for the constitution or organic law of the territory. These trusteeship agreements should, so far as possible, supplement the bare outlines of the trusteeship system provided in the Charter and should contain specific provisions for fulfilling the objectives of the trusteeship system laid down in Article 76. The agreements, furthermore, should make clear the relationship of the administering authority to the United Nations and its principal organs.

Authority of the United Nations

It is highly important that, as proposed in a new Article 1(a) and in the revised Article 2,⁵⁷ the authority of the United Nations with regard to each trust territory should be made perfectly clear in the trusteeship agreement. The agreement should be based upon the principle that all rights and titles are vested in the United Nations and that the United Nations itself acts as trustee for the inhabitants of the trust territory and that the administering authority serves as agent of the United Nations, exercising the rights and duties conferred upon it by the trusteeship agreements. Such provisions would remove many of the ambiguities which characterized the mandates system of the League of Nations, and would reflect a genuine spirit of "trusteeship".

⁵⁶ For the "Supplementary Comments", see Memorandum Prepared in the Division of Dependent Area Affairs, May 7, p. 586.

⁵⁷ See Memorandum accompanying note from the Acting Secretary of State to the British Ambassador, entitled "Comments on the Draft Terms. . . .", p. 579; see also "Supplementary Comments", p. 586.

Fulfillment of Objectives of Trusteeship System

Each trusteeship agreement should, so far as possible, be organized to prescribe, seriatim and in detail, the general objectives of the trusteeship system laid down in Article 76 of the Charter:

a. to further international peace and security;

b. to promote the political, economic, social, and educational advancement of the inhabitants of the trust territory, and their progressive development towards self-government or independence;

c. to encourage respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all; and

d. to ensure equal treatment in social, economic, and commercial matters for all Members of the United Nations and their nationals.

Detailed provisions to supplement these general principles would have the following advantages: they would place the administering authority under definite obligation to fulfill these objectives; encourage the inhabitants of the territory to work for their own advancement in accordance with these principles; and provide criteria by which the General Assembly and the Trusteeship Council could supervise and review the work of the administering authority.

Fundamental Freedoms

It is of particular interest to this Government that trusteeship agreements for African territories should make special provision for carrying out Article 76(c) with regard to encouraging respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, including such matters as freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, and the right of petition. The agreements should also provide for complete freedom of conscience, worship, and religious teaching.

Equality of Treatment

This Government has a special interest in the proper fulfillment of Article 76(d) relating to equal treatment in social, economic, and commercial matters for Members of the United Nations and their nationals. Similar provisions were included in the "A" and "B" mandates⁵⁸ of the League of Nations at the insistence of the United States, but this Government was unable to incorporate the principle of equal treatment in the "C" mandates.

The trusteeship agreements should contain at least the provisions of the "B" mandates for equal treatment in social, economic, industrial, and commercial matters for all Members of the United Nations and their nationals. The trusteeship agreements should provide for equal treatment with respect to: freedom of transit and navigation, including freedom of transit and navigation by air; acquisition of property both movable and immovable; the protection of person and property; the exercise of professions and trades; the granting of concessions; and the administration of justice.

It is of special concern to this Government that these trusteeship agreements should provide for equal treatment of the missionary activities of nationals of all Members of United Nations. The principle of equal treatment is equally important in the field of freedom of information.

Procedural Matters

As the Charter affords only the barest outline of procedures for the supervision of trust territories by the United Nations, it is important that each trusteeship agreement make detailed provision for such supervision. Some of these procedural arrangements may ultimately be established by the Trusteeship Council in its Rules of Procedure. Until the Council adopts its Rules of Procedure, however, special provisions on these matters will be required in the trusteeship agreements along the lines suggested in the supplementary comments to be handed to the British and Belgian negotiators.

Sincerely yours,

DEAN ACHESON

⁵⁸ The degree of control exercised by the mandatory power over the political and economic life of the mandated territory varied according to the degree of civilization attained by the dependent peoples involved. This distinction gave rise to the three types of mandates ("A" mandates: Areas provisionally recognized as independent, but temporarily being given advice and assistance until reaching full nationhood—Syria and Lebanon, Palestine and Transjordan, and Iraq; "B" mandates: Areas where it was not considered feasible to grant autonomy and where the Mandatory Power was responsible for the administration under certain specified conditions—the Middle African territories of the Cameroons, Togoland, Tanganyika, and Ruanda-Urundi; "C" mandates: Areas inhabited by peoples in only a primitive stage of civilized development and which were administered under the laws of the Mandatory Power as integral portions of its territory—South West Africa and certain islands in the Pacific Ocean area). *Memorandum by the Chief of the Division of Dependent Area Affairs
(Gerig)*⁵⁹

[WASHINGTON,] July 1, 1946.

REPORT FOR THE ACTING SECRETARY

From June 12 to June 20, 1946, Mr. Smith and Mr. Gerig met in London with representatives of the British and French Governments to discuss, on the expert level, steps which will need to be taken to establish the trusteeship system of the United Nations.⁶⁰

In particular, the discussions dealt with two questions: (1) the procedure by which trust agreements for mandated territories will be brought before the General Assembly, and (2) the precise terms of such draft agreements. Five meetings were held with the British and two with the French representatives. The following summary of conclusions will be of special interest:

Conclusions

1. It is now clear that the Trusteeship Council can be established by the General Assembly in September. This is made possible because France, as well as the United Kingdom and Belgium, will have draft ⁵⁹ Submitted to the Acting Secretary of State (Acheson) by the Deputy Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs (Ross) under a covering memorandum of July 2.

⁶⁰ A series of conversations planned to take place in London, Paris, and Brussels in that order began in London on June 12 and concluded there on June 19.

The meetings with the United Kingdom officials took place at the Colonial Office on June 12-June 14 and June 19. Attending on the British side were Mr. Creech Jones, Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for the Colonies; Mr. A. H. Poynton, Head of the International Relations Department, Colonial Office; Mr. Melville, Economic Adviser, Colonial Office; Mr. J. G. Ward, Head of the United Nations Department, Foreign Office; Mr. Paul Mason of the North American Department, Foreign Office; and Mr. G. E. G. Shannon of the Dominions Office. On the American side, besides Messrs. Gerig and Smith, there were Mr. Harry Hawkins, Counselor of Embassy for Economic Affairs, and Mr. Raymond A. Hare, First Secretary of Embassy. Minutes of these meetings are found in the London Embassy Files (1946): 800-Trusteeship.

The talks with the French also took place in London as a result of last-minute changes. The conversations were held at the French Embassy on June 18 and 19, with the French represented on June 18 by Mr. Le Roy, Second Secretary of the French Embassy in London (who had recently been in Paris for consultation on the trusteeship problem), and on June 19 by Mr. Le Roy and Mr. Lucas, French Foreign Ministry mandates expert who came from Paris especially for the talks. Minutes of these conversations are found in the office lot files of the Office of Special Political Affairs, Lot 61-D 146, Box 4581.

Regarding the proposed talks with the Belgians, see footnote 62, p. 603.

agreements ready to submit in regard respectively to the Cameroons, Tanganyika, and Ruanda-Urundi.

2. Both the United Kingdom and France are prepared to present these draft agreements to the Assembly according to our preferred procedure, viz., that they will present them alone after consulting with a number of states, including the United States, which may be regarded as directly concerned or particularly interested. Neither of these states think it necessary that these draft agreements need be formally signed by the directly concerned states prior to submission, although the British Government is not certain whether an informal right of veto might not exist for those states referred to by the Prime Minister as in any event directly concerned in certain African mandates, namely, South Africa, Belgium, and France. No difficulty, however, is anticipated.

3. Both the British and French representatives received very cordially our suggestions for certain modifications and additions in the draft terms. A majority of our proposals were accepted in some form, several subject to further consideration at the ministerial level.

4. While tentatively accepting the draft terms so modified, we made it clear that our Government and the United States Delegation to the Assembly remained completely free to propose any modifications and changes. In this connection, we especially reserved our position regarding a provision giving the trust power authority to establish certain general monopolies in the trust territories when these are regarded by it to be in the interest of the inhabitants. We proposed, in line with our draft, that such monopolies be subject to approval by the Trusteeship Council, but the British and French thought this gave too much executive authority to the Trusteeship Council. They agreed with us to try to find a better formula.

5. The French representatives frankly stated their hope that the inhabitants of the Cameroons and Togoland, under their trust, would eventually choose to be assimilated to the French Union. An article in the draft dealing with political development was drawn up by them in a way to favor such development. We induced them to accept in the article a reference to Article 76(b) of the Charter envisaging "self-government or independence", which they agreed to refer once more to the Cabinet.

6. The Soviet Union and China have received the British drafts but have made no proposals regarding them.

7. The French drafts will be submitted officially to the United States, Great Britain, the Soviet Union, and China near the end of July. They thought it would include most or all of our suggestions agreed to.⁶¹

8. The British representatives feel certain that Australia and New Zealand will be prepared in September to present draft terms for their Pacific mandates. In this event, the occasion will arise to elect two states to the Trusteeship Council to retain the balance required under Article 86.

9. The British representative said their legal advisers were considering the question of what special procedure, if any, might be required to terminate the special treaties between the United States and Great Britain regarding the mandated territories when the new agreements are consummated. We said we would make similar inquiries.

10. No conversations were held with the Belgian representatives, who informed us through our Embassy in Brussels that they were not quite ready to discuss our proposals, but that they would soon be ready to discuss them through their Embassy in Washington.⁶²

11. The French sent an official from Paris to London in order to avoid any possible suspicions on the part of the Soviet representatives now in Paris who, they thought, might have wished to participate in the conversations.⁶³

12. Full texts of the draft terms as modified are annexed to this report.⁶⁴

BENJAMIN GERIG

⁶¹ In the conversations of June 18 there was discussion of terms of agreement for Togoland and the Cameroons on the basis of drafts prepared in Paris. On June 20, however, a note was received by the U.S. Embassy in Paris from the French Foreign Ministry which stated that no final terms of trusteeship had yet been established and that the talks in London must be regarded as "strictly informal and unofficial" (telegram 448, Paris to London, June 20, repeated to the Department as No. 2986, File No. 880.014/6-2046). No official French drafts were in fact presented to the U.S. Government by the French Government until October 9.

2. The Administering Authority shall collaborate fully with the Trusteeship Council in the conduct of any surveys of the development of the political institutions and the capacity for self-government of the inhabitants of Tanganyika which the Administering Authority and Trusteeship Council agree it would be useful to hold. (b) The Administering Authority shall not discriminate on grounds of nationality against nationals of any member of the United Nations in matters relating to the grant of concessions for the development of the natural resources of Tanganyika, and shall not grant concessions having the character of a general monopoly;

⁶⁶ The British Embassy text transmitted to the Department on July 31 included the words "or resources" at this point (FW 862S.01/7-3146).

⁶⁷ The British text read: "or resources".

(c) The Administering Authority shall ensure equal treatment in the administration of justice to the nationals of all members of the United Nations.

The rights conferred by this Article on nationals of members of the United Nations apply equally to companies and associations controlled by such nationals and organised in accordance with the law of any member of the United Nations.

Article 11.

Nothing in this agreement shall of itself entitle any member of the United Nations to claim for itself or for its nationals, companies ~~or~~ and associations ~~in Tanganyika~~ the application of a more advantageous regime than that member itself grants in its own territory to Tanganyika and its inhabitants the benefits of Article 9 of this agreement in any respect in which it does not give to the nationals, companies and associations of Tanganyika equality of treatment with the nationals, companies and associations of any other state.

Article 11a.

⁶⁸ The British text at this point included the words "as may be appropriate to the circumstances of the territory", set off by commas.

⁶⁹ In the British text the words "desirable and practicable" were used in place of "necessary".

⁷⁰ The British text inserted "secondary and" ahead of "higher".

Article 17.

The Acting Director of the Office of European Affairs (Hickerson) to the Division of Dependent Area Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL

[WASHINGTON,] July 26, 1946.

The New Zealand Minister came in to see me in the late afternoon day before yesterday by an appointment made at his request. Sir Carl Berendsen handed me the attached note dated July 23, 1946, enclosing a draft of the trusteeship agreement proposed by New Zealand in respect of Western Samoa.⁸⁵

You will observe that the second paragraph of the note states that the New Zealand Government is prepared to regard the United States as a "state directly concerned" within the meaning of that Article, and that the New Zealand Government accordingly invites the comments of the United States on this draft. You will also observe that the note states that a similar approach is being made to the Governments of the United Kingdom and France, and that the comments of Australia have already been received.

Sir Carl Berendsen also handed me the attached aide-mémoire dated July 23, 1946, which should be read in connection with his note.

Last February at the Secretary's request I discussed with the New Zealand Prime Minister, the Right Honorable Peter Fraser; Sir Carl Berendsen, and Mr. A. D. McIntosh, Secretary of the Department of External Affairs, a proposal of the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff, approved by the President, that the United States Government be granted by New Zealand joint rights of military use of certain facilities constructed by the United States during the war on Upolo Island in Western Samoa.⁸⁶ I am taking up the New Zealand note and aide-mémoire with the War and Navy Departments and the Joint Chiefs of Staff insofar as it relates to base rights.⁸⁷ I shall be glad to ⁸⁵ Neither printed, but see footnote 87 below regarding the text of Article IX of the proposed agreement.

⁸⁶ For documentation on discussions between the United States and New Zealand regarding the desire of the United States to acquire base rights in Western Samoa, see vol v, pp. 1 ff. At the time that these negotiations were initiated by the United States in talks at Washington in February 1946 the New Zealand representatives were handed a draft agreement which described United States views as to the nature of a trusteeship that New Zealand might set up over an area in which the United States might acquire base rights (ibid., p. 3; the draft was handed to the New Zealanders on February 21). The New Zealand representatives at the same time had presented to the Department of State on a most informal basis proposals described as a sketch of the form a trusteeship agreement for Western Samoa might take, having regard to Western Samoa's status as a "C" mandate; this text apparently had been drafted before the Washington talks on bases, and it was noted by the New Zealand Legation that "some use has been made of the United Kingdom draft for Tanganyika". (S11.24590/3-146)

⁸⁷ This was done in an "official letter" from the Acting Secretary of State to the Secretaries of War and Navy respectively on July 30 in which especial attention was directed to Article IX, section 3, of the proposed trusteeship agreement. Article IX provided that:

"The administering authority shall ensure that the trust territory of Western Samoa shall play its part, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, in the maintenance of international peace and security. To this end the administering authority shall be entitled:—

(1) to establish naval, military and air bases and to erect fortifications in the trust territory;

(2) to station and employ armed forces in the territory;

(3) to enter into such agreements in accordance with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations as it may deem necessary or desirable with other members of the United Nations with respect to sharing rights of occupation and operation, and responsibility for the establishment, maintenance collaborate with you in bringing together in a single document all of our comments on this draft agreement.

When I read this note in Sir Carl's presence I inquired whether he had heard of the development of our thoughts in regard to the interpretation of the phrase "states directly concerned". He replied that he had not. I then explained to him briefly our views and told him of Mr. Gerig's conversations in London with the British and the French. Sir Carl said that he was completely in accord with these views "on common sense grounds", but that he did not know whether the language of the Charter could be "so stretched". He said that he was confident that the New Zealand Government would be glad, however, to go along with this interpretation. He added that if there were general agreement with that interpretation, their note could be regarded as part of the consultation process.

AIDE-MÉMOIRE

1. In the preparation of the draft Trusteeship Agreement for Western Samoa, the New Zealand Government have endeavoured to meet the point of view of the United States (as expressed in discussions on bases, and in comments on draft agreements prepared by the Government of the United Kingdom) as far as possible, without sacrifice of the following main principles, from which they are unable to depart:

(a) That the agreement should adhere as closely as possible to the form of the Mandate;

(b) That it is unnecessary and most undesirable that Western Samoa or any part of it should be declared a strategic area;

(c) That the grant of base rights to the United States or to any other state under bilateral arrangements should be subsequent to the conclusion of the Trusteeship Agreement, and should be made on lines consistent with New Zealand's obligations to the United Nations.

and control of existing or additional military bases and facilities in the trust territory; and

(4) to make use of volunteer forces, facilities and assistance from the trust territory in carrying out the obligations towards the Security Council undertaken in this regard by the administering authority, as well as for the local defence and the maintenance of law and order within the trust territory." (text from draft agreement, dated July 23, 1946, File No. 890.0146/7-2346)

In the same letters it was stated by the Acting Secretary that "After handing [the] note and aide-mémoire to Mr. Hickerson, Sir Carl Berendsen stated orally that he was authorized to inform the United States Government that New Zealand was prepared to work out a bilateral agreement with the United States giving the United States joint military rights in Western Samoa which he believed would be satisfactory to both governments." (811.24590/7-3046)

2. Subject to these considerations, the New Zealand Government will be happy to consider and to discuss any views which the United States Government may feel it desirable to express.

3. It is the general desire of the New Zealand Government that the agreement should be a simple document, susceptible of easy translation into the Samoan language, and reasonably comprehensible to the Samoans.

4. The New Zealand Government hold no strong views as to the method by which the agreement of the United States might finally be expressed. They do, however, contemplate an informal exchange of notes, but if this procedure should raise any difficulties for the United States Government, then the New Zealand Government would be satisfied with an unqualified assurance that the draft, as finally agreed upon, is acceptable to the United States and will have the active support of the United States before the General Assembly.

The First Secretary of the British Embassy (Middleton) to the Chief of the Division of Dependent Area Affairs (Gerig)

CONFIDENTIAL

WASHINGTON, July 31, 1946.

DEAR MR. GERIG: With reference to your recent discussions with the the Colonial Office in London regarding the draft terms of trusteeship for Tanganyika and Togoland and the Cameroons under British Mandate, I am enclosing three copies of a provisional revise of the draft terms of trusteeship for Tanganyika.⁸⁸

2. I have been asked to point out that the revised draft is to be regarded only as the United Kingdom record, on the official level, of the understandings reached during your recent discussions. I am sure that you will understand that the revisions which have tentatively been agreed are entirely without commitment on the part of His Majesty's Government and are subject to reference to Ministers, and to consultation with the Governors of the territories concerned. We for our part recognize that your acceptance of modifications in the original State Department proposals are subject to reference to higher authority in Washington.

3. I have also been asked to pass along the following two small explanatory comments on the revised text:—

“(a) Article 12A. The United States text added the words ‘freedom of migration and movement’. Mr. Gerig agreed to drop ‘migration'. The United Kingdom representatives said that they would think whether there was some more effective way of describing 'freedom of movement', but they have not yet been able to devise a suitable synonym.

"(b) Article 13. The United States text included a reference to special reports. Provisionally, no reference to this has been made in the revised text, but the point is still being considered."

Yours sincerely,

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Acting Director of the Office of European Affairs (Hickerson)

[WASHINGTON,] August 19, 1946.

Mr. Harry⁸⁹ came in to see me at 5 p. m., Friday afternoon, August 16th at his request and handed me the attached undated memorandum and its enclosure.⁹⁰ It will be noted that the enclosure is a draft trusteeship agreement for New Guinea. Mr. Harry said that the Australian Government would be grateful to receive the comments of the U.S. Government on this draft as a matter of urgency. He said that it would be of assistance if they could receive the views of the U.S. Government through our representative in Canberra.

I told Mr. Harry that we would be glad to consider this draft and to give the Australian Government our comments on it as soon as we can. I said that since our experts are here and not in Canberra it might be desirable for our experts in the Division of Dependent Areas to discuss this matter with officers of the Australian Embassy, but that I assumed that we would have no objection to transmitting our views when they are finalized through our Embassy in Canberra if that is the wish of the Australian Government.

I read the aide-mémoire of the draft hurriedly. I commented to Mr. Harry that I saw no mention in the draft or the aide-mémoire of the proposals which we gave to the Australian Embassy in Washington on March 14, 1946 proposing an agreement under which the United States would have joint military rights with Australia in certain facilities in the Admiralty Islands.⁹¹ I said that since no specific reference was made I assumed that it is the view of the Australian Government that Article VII of the draft would provide adequately for such an agreement with the United States; it reads as follows: "The Administering Authority may take all measures in the Territory which it considers desirable to provide for the defence of the Territory and for the maintenance of international peace and security." Mr. Harry said that he was not informed on this aspect of the matter.⁹²

[WASHINGTON,] August 20, 1946.

Participants: Mr. G. H. Middleton, First Secretary, British Embassy
Alger Hiss—SPA
Benjamin Gerig—DA

At our invitation, Mr. Middleton came to the Department to consider whether it would be wise for the British Government to notify the Soviet Government prior to the meeting of the General Assembly with respect to the procedure by which the British Government is proposing to submit its draft trusteeship agreements to the Assembly for approval.

Mr. Hiss pointed out that the Soviet Government may not be aware that the British and American Governments had agreed upon a simplified procedure for submitting the trust agreements to the Assembly, a procedure which would not require the agreement to be formally signed by states directly concerned but, instead, would be submitted by Great Britain after informal consultations with a number of states particularly interested. Mr. Hiss added that the Soviet Government had several times heard United States Delegates explain a more formal procedure under Article 79, in which signature by the states directly concerned would be required. In a conversation which Mr. Dulles had with Mr. Gromyko in London, the former got the impression that the Soviet Government expected that signatures would be called for under Article 79 and that the U.S.S.R., as a state directly concerned, would wish to sign an agreement. He, therefore, thought it was possible that the Soviet Government, unless informed otherwise in advance, might come to the Assembly under a misapprehension and cause unnecessary delay by claiming "surprise". He wondered whether the British draft agreements might not be submitted to the United Nations about two weeks before the Assembly is to meet. This draft could indicate without special emphasis the plan with respect to submission to the UN.

⁹² In a memorandum of even date to the Chief of the Division of Dependent Area Affairs (Gerig) Mr. Hickerson said: "I am taking up with the War and Navy Departments and the Joint Chiefs of Staff the security aspects of this draft and its effect upon our proposed agreement with Australia giving us joint military rights in certain installations in the Admiralty Islands. Mr. Richards of BC [Arthur Richards, Assistant Chief of the Division of British Commonwealth Affairs] and I will be glad to collaborate with you in the preparation of a reply to the Australian aide-memoire." (890.0146/8-1946)

Mr. Middleton said that he agreed that the problem should be considered. He thought his government would feel committed to transmit to the Soviet Government informally a copy of the revised draft of the agreement before submitting it formally to the UN. He pointed out that the prior draft had been similarly given to the Russians at the same time it had been given to us. No comment had been received from the Russians. Mr. Middleton said that he thought his government might transmit the revised draft about two weeks before the Assembly meets and in that draft indicate without calling attention to the point their plans as to the method of submission. He said he would take the matter up with the Foreign Office and the Colonial Office and would let us know their reaction. In the course of the discussion Mr. Middleton confirmed Mr. Gerig's understanding that the British had never accepted the view that the agreement of states directly concerned should be evidenced by their signing an agreement prior to its submission to the UN. Consequently our proposal that there be no such signing was entirely in line with their own views and plans. Any "surprise" to the Russians would, therefore, be something the British would not feel responsible for.

The discussion then turned on whether the problem of defining the states directly concerned under Article 79 might arise in the Assembly. It was suggested that states claiming to be states directly concerned might assert that their affirmative vote would be required in the two-thirds necessary for approval of the agreements. It was also suggested that to avoid the necessity of settling the issue such states might say merely that they were prepared to accept the agreement thus making the issue moot but that they wished to be recorded as claiming the status of states directly concerned whose agreement would be necessary for any amendment of the agreement. It was agreed that such statements, however, might elicit quite a number of similar pronouncements which might become embarrassing. Palestine was mentioned as an example in which such pronouncement would be embarrassing.

Mr. Middleton pointed out that in the absence in the Charter of any fixing of responsibility for determining which are the states directly concerned, the United Kingdom Government, on practical grounds, took the initiative with respect to their mandated territories and named a limited list of countries which, in any event, might be so regarded. He agreed that the list was not exclusive but that in the absence of any Charter definition they thought this procedure a feasible one. Mr. Hiss explained that the U.S. position had, all along, been that we considered ourselves a state directly concerned, but did not think it necessary that effect be given to this status through signature of a formal instrument.

Mr. Middleton repeated that there was a danger of a misunderstanding here and said again that he would immediately take it up with London and let us know the result in due course.

SIR: [Here follow introductory amenities, and statement that the United States Government had carefully examined the draft terms of trusteeship prepared by New Zealand and was transmitting in an enclosure "certain comments" for revisions and additions. It was noted that many of these "have already been accepted by the Government of the United Kingdom for inclusion in the terms of trusteeship for Tanganyika".]

On August 12, 1946, Mr. John Reid of your Legation was informed by Mr. Hickerson of this Department that Article IX of the draft trusteeship agreement relative to the maintenance of international peace and security is agreeable to the United States Government. This statement is hereby confirmed. Furthermore, this Government agrees to the provisions of paragraph 1(c) of the aide-mémoire which you left at the Department of State on July 23, 1946, stating that the question of base rights should be taken up subsequent to the conclusion of the trusteeship agreement.

[Here follows exposition of this Government's position on the question of "states directly concerned", at the outset of which appreciation was expressed that New Zealand was prepared to regard the United States as a "state directly concerned" in Western Samoa.]

*Extract From Telegram From the Foreign Office to Lord Inverchapel
Dated August 31st, 1946*⁹⁵

His Majesty's Government have never considered that agreement to terms of trusteeship by the "States directly concerned" should take the shape of a formal treaty. Therefore we do not contemplate that the draft terms of trusteeship as agreed upon under Article 79 will carry any signatures. It will be seen from the draft terms for our African territories (published as Command Papers 6840 and 6863) that these terms have been drawn up in the form of an Assembly resolution the preamble to which contains the words "having satisfied itself that the agreement of the States directly concerned including the mandatory power has been obtained in accordance with Article 79 of the said Charter". In submitting the draft terms of trusteeship to the Secretary-General we intend to inform him that the agreement of Belgium and South Africa, in the case of Tanganyika and France and South Africa in the case of the West African mandated territories has been obtained and to enclose copies of the relevant notes from them provided these governments have no objection. As regards Soviet thesis attributed to Gromyko by Dulles and Gerig, we cannot trace any record that Soviet Delegation expressed view that trusteeship agreements required signature by "States directly concerned", nor do we recollect this point being made. His Majesty's Government's attitude as explained above is different. Charter is admittedly obscure but nowhere states explicitly that process described in Article 79 (regarding terms of trusteeship being agreed upon by "States directly concerned") itself constitutes (or is identical with) the "trusteeship agreement" mentioned in e.g. Articles 75, 77, 80 and 81. It will be noted that term "trusteeship agreement" is not used in Article 79 and in our opinion this variation of wording was deliberate and is significant. The trusteeship agreement in our view is the instrument which governs relationship between administering authority and United Nations (to whom administering authority is accountable). The trusteeship agreement is the document which designates the administering authority (Article 81) and by which the territory is placed under the trusteeship system established by the United Nations (Articles 75 and 80). It must be something different from the proposal referred to in Article 79 because the States directly concerned do not themselves place the territory under trusteeship. Their function under

Article 79 is simply to agree upon the terms of trusteeship which they must do before the United Nations can take action on any draft terms. In other words although the word "agreement" in the term "trusteeship agreement" clearly means an instrument of some kind the phrase "agreed upon" in Article 79 has no such formal significance but means simply "concurred in". Such concurrence (or agreement without a capital A) can as stated above be obtained by diplomatic consultation and no question of signature arises. Our interpretation is implicit in the form of draft terms of trusteeship communicated to Soviet Government among others in January. Soviet Government have so far made no comment either on form or on content of these drafts and despite attitude adopted by Yugoslav and Soviet Delegations during preparatory commission on interpretation of "States directly concerned" have not approached us since receipt of these drafts with request to be recognised as "State directly concerned". That being so we believe it would be tactical mistake to approach Soviet Government at this late stage on the procedural question without any obvious reason for doing so. In our view such an approach would be likely to create impression that we felt doubtful about our interpretation. It would weaken our position by provoking suspicion and at same time giving Soviet Union plenty of time to think up objections. We believe it is much wiser to proceed according to plan as though no uncertainty existed. If Soviet Delegations at New York argue in favour of "agreements" signed by States directly concerned we should rely on arguments outlined above to counter such interpretation and trust United States Government (whose objective on this point seems identical with ours) would support us.

We naturally desire to avoid a clash with the Russians when the draft terms of trusteeship come up for discussion. While there may be arguments which Russians could use against procedure we propose we should have thought that following action would be open to us. We were urged by the Assembly resolution of February 9th to take all "practical steps" for the implementation of Article 79 of the Charter. As no authoritative interpretation has been given to this Article, His Majesty's Government have been obliged to work on basis of their own interpretation which was explained to the Assembly at the time. In presenting the draft terms to the Assembly in the form of a draft Assembly resolution His Majesty's Government do not intend to preclude the discussion at the Assembly of the interpretation of Article 79 or of any comments on the draft terms made by other States either during debates at the Assembly or through diplomatic channels. But His Majesty's Government will insist on adherence to the wording of Articles 79 and 85 which limit the functions of the Assembly to approval or disapproval of the draft terms. Thus if a Delegation wishes to secure a change in the draft terms of trusteeship submitted by the mandatory power it could only move that the Assembly should not approve them unless amended in some particular respect. Even if such a motion were carried by necessary majority this would not of itself be effective in amending draft terms since under Article 79 "States directly concerned" (including mandatory power) must agree upon any alteration or amendment of terms of trusteeship before such amendment can be approved by United Nations. Russia would have NO veto on the terms of trusteeship unless she establishes a claim to be a State directly concerned. There is nothing in the Charter to indicate how it should be decided who are the "States directly concerned", but as it is essentially a political issue presumably it will be decided in the last resort by the Assembly. Russia would therefore require a two-thirds majority (see Article 18) to carry a motion that she should be recognised as a State directly concerned.

WASHINGTON, September 3, 1946.

4567. Secdel 812. For Cohen from Hiss.

1. Middleton of British Embassy told us today that he had been asked to take up "with highest possible authorities" the difficulty in which the British find themselves vis-à-vis Parliament with respect to Tanganyika trusteeship agreement. Creech Jones insists that as the initial British draft was submitted to Parliament the revised draft agreed at the technical level when Gerig was in London cannot be submitted to the United Nations without having first been tabled in Parliament. As Parliament is not now in session any submission of the revised draft would entail delay in establishment of trusteeship system in which British say they have been leading exponent of speed. British Embassy was directed to ask us what amendments we considered absolutely essential and to ask us whether we considered in the present state of international relations amendments so essential as to warrant delaying establishment of trusteeship system. Embassy was also informed that amendments proposed by Assembly could only be accepted ad referendum.

2. We suggested Parliamentary situation would be met by French revised draft for Cameroons and Togoland being submitted first. French revised draft almost identical to British revised draft. British Assembly Delegation could agree to this as they have suggested no difficulty in substance with our proposals. British revised draft could be submitted to Parliament when it reconvenes. Middleton believes reconvening date is end of September.

3. We pointed out British original draft would invite numerous amendments which would cause confusion and make ultimate form of agreement uncertain. We indicated our own view that we would have to favor substantial amendments. British would be in embarrassing position if they oppose amendments they really agree to in substance but would be equally embarrassed in Parliament if they accepted amendments ad referendum and submitted greatly modified agreement for Parliamentary approval. We also said information conveyed by Middleton came as great surprise. Middleton gratefully accepted suggested procedure which he will refer to Foreign Office and said that until Foreign Office reaction received Embassy would not need to take matter up with higher authorities.

4. In view of fact that our suggestion involves British ceding of leadership to French and of possibility French may be unwilling to propose revised draft it is doubtful our suggestion will be acceptable to the Foreign Office. If not, we feel important we retain free hand to propose in Assembly bulk of amendments agreed to in Gerig's London's talks. We feel original British draft would be unfortunate precedent as first trusteeship agreement. Will of course submit matter to Secretary for decision if British do not accept our suggestion.

Memorandum for the File, by Mr. Edward T. Wailes of the Division of British Commonwealth Affairs

[WASHINGTON,] September 9, 1946.

On the basis of the attached memoranda from the War and Navy Departments⁹⁶ and subsequent telephone conversations with Captain ⁹⁶ Neither printed. A War Department memorandum of August 23, signed by Colonel J. E. Bastion, Jr., of the General Staff Corps, noted that "the trusteeship agreement for New Guinea as proposed by Australia does not make any provision for the future use by U.S. Forces of the base we developed on Manus Island. Nor does the Aide-Mémoire mention any plans for providing an agreement on the use of Manus. . . The New Zealand form of trusteeship agreement is considered much more favorably by the War Department." After suggesting that an attempt be made to persuade the Australians to revise their agreement to the form of the New Zealand agreement (that is, Article IX (3) of the New Zealand agreement) the War Department memorandum concluded: "In event the Australians decline to change the form of the agreement it is recommended that an expression of intent be obtained from the Australians with regard to their intentions on future military base agreements with the U.S." (890.0146/8-2346) A similar point of view, stated in more general terms, was expressed by Captain R. L. Dennison, Office of the Chief of Naval Operations, Navy Department, in a letter of August 27 (890.0146/8-2746).

Dennison of the Navy and Mr. Gerig of DA, I asked Mr. L. R. McIntire, First Secretary of the Australian Embassy, to call on me this afternoon to discuss Article VII of the Australian draft trusteeship agreement for New Guinea. Miss Beard of BC was present.

I told Mr. McIntire quite frankly that we felt Article VII of the Australian draft was not sufficiently explicit and that we greatly preferred Article IX of the New Zealand draft. He said he was not surprised to hear this comment. At the suggestion of Captain Dennison I then added that if the Australian Government adopted phraseology similar to Article IX of the New Zealand draft we, of course, would want them to consider such phraseology sufficiently broad and inclusive to provide the necessary means for their entering into a base agreement with respect to rights at Manus such as we had discussed with them on previous occasions.⁹⁷ I added that we felt that the phraseology of New Zealand's Article IX sufficiently inclusive to permit such an agreement and that we only wished to make sure that the Australian Government felt so likewise.⁹⁸

SWNCC Meeting*⁹⁹

[WASHINGTON,] 10 September 1946.

As directed by SWNCC at its 42nd meeting, there is submitted herewith a draft text of a trusteeship agreement (Appendix)¹ for the Japanese Mandated Islands. This text has been developed by the ad hoc Committee solely for exploratory purposes. The ad hoc Committee considers that with one exception as described below, the draft is fully consistent with the applicable provisions of the United Nations Charter.

⁹⁷ Documentation on the discussions relating to military bases is found in vol. v, pp. 1 ff.

⁹⁹ This paper with its appendix was circulated by the Secretariat of the State-War-Navy Coordinating Committee on September 10 to the Committee as SWNCC document 59/4.

A month earlier the ad hoc committee had had under study five different types of trusteeship agreements "to cover all possible contingencies for territories formerly mandated to Japan or formerly under Japanese control" (a report of the ad hoc committee to this effect was circulated to the Committee on August 8, not printed; unnumbered document dated August 8 filed with the papers of Series 59 in the SWNCC Files).

¹ Appendix not printed. Except for Article 8 the text of the draft agreement included in 59/4 is the same with minor technical revisions as that printed in the White House press release of November 6 on the proposed trusteeship arrangement (see Department of State Bulletin, November 17, 1946, pp. 889 ff.)

The draft trusteeship agreement is based on the hypothesis of a strategic agreement for the entire area.

The ad hoc Committee believes that substantially the same text could be used for other islands which were pre-war Japanese territory.

The members of the ad hoc Committee agree on all Articles of the attached draft except Article 8 concerning the application of Article 76(d) of the Charter, which requires equal treatment in social, economic and commercial matters for all Members of the United Nations and their nationals.

On this Article, the State Department representatives consider that Article 76(d) requires "national" treatment and believe that if made subject to security requirements could be safely applied. They further believe that if "most-favored nation" treatment, as suggested by the Navy representatives, were adopted it would react unfavorably on our economic interests in other mandated territories.

The Navy Department representatives agree that Article 76(d) of the Charter may be technically applicable under the terms of the Charter to a strategic trusteeship. However, the provisions of this subparagraph do not seem appropriate for the area in question. The sparseness of population and the lack of indigenous resources are factors which should make unnecessary provisions in the agreement for free-for-all social, economic and commercial exploitation.

The principal objections to Article 76(d) of the Charter as applied to the ex-Japanese Mandates are :

a. The area would be open to exploitation by nationals of all Members of the United Nations while the United States, under the terms of the agreement, holds responsibility for the protection of the social and economic welfare of the inhabitants.

b. Subversive activities could be undertaken under the guise of commercial development, inter-island traffic and welfare activities.

The above objections are not removed by the State Department representatives' proposal that the application of the terms of Article 8 in the draft agreement should be stipulated as subject to the requirements of security. This test could not be practically or equitably applied for adequate protection of security interests. The Navy Department representatives have proposed a "most-favored-nation" clause in Article 8. This was done because the terms of the Charter seem to require provisions for equal treatment of all Members of the United Nations. It is believed that "most-favored-nation" interpretation can be applied to the terms of Article 76(d) of the Charter. Even this provision, however, does not appear adequately to protect security interests.

The difference of opinion between the members of the ad hoc Committee as demonstrated by Article 8 is not based on the relative philosophical merits of "national" treatment versus "most-favored-nation" treatment but principally on security considerations alone.

Memorandum by the Chief of the Division of Dependent Area Affairs (Geric) to the Department of State Member on the State-War-Navy Coordinating Committee (Hilldring)

[WASHINGTON,] September 11, 1946.

Subject: Comment on SWNCC 59/4

(1) Agreement on all Articles except Article 8 was reached by State, War, and Navy members of the ad hoc Committee.

(2) The present draft containing 16 Articles represents a combination of the State draft of August 8 containing 27 Articles, and of the Navy (JCS) counter draft of August 24 containing 9 Articles.

(3) Nothing essential from the original State draft is omitted in the present draft. It was possible by condensation, combination, and abridgement to arrive at the present text. All the essential features of the Navy Department draft are also retained.

(4) Disagreement by the ad hoc Committee remains on only Article 8 where the text is presented in parallel columns. State's representatives consider that "national" treatment is required under Article 83(2) and Article 76 of the Charter, while Navy's representatives consider that "most-favored-nation" treatment would be safer and also legitimate in these circumstances. The War Department representative on the ad hoc Committee did not express himself finally either way.

(5) The distinguishing features of this draft are:

(a) It designates the whole area as strategic (Art. 1);

(b) It specifies that the goal shall be self-government instead of independence, thus announcing in advance that independence is no objective (Art. 6);

(c) It provides, however, for full use of the Trusteeship Council as regards economic and social matters outside of any closed areas (Art. 13);

(d) It restricts any possible fiscal, administrative or customs union to a union "with other territories under United States jurisdiction" instead of with "adjacent" territories, as was proposed in the original State draft (Art. 9); and

(e) It provides that the agreement cannot be "terminated" without the consent of the United States (Art. 15).

(6) Captain Dennison and Colonel Giffen showed a very great desire to meet State's representatives on every possible point and the compromise was arrived at in the ad hoc Committee very congenially.

We believe requirements of Article 79 will be fulfilled if Belgium informs GA it has consulted with all Members particularly interested in Ruanda-Urundi and given full consideration to their views. If Belgium insists on naming UK and France as "states directly concerned" this may precipitate a succession of claims by other Members to be so considered and thus delay approval of trusteeship agreement.⁵

This telegram was in response to Brussels telegram 1157, September 8, summarizing the discussion (501.BB/9-846). Minutes of the meeting were transmitted to the Department under Brussels despatch No. 458, September 8, not printed (862S.01/9-846).

⁵ Villard had reported in telegram 1157 that "Belgians agreed submit alone to Assembly unsigned document containing trusteeship terms for Ruanda Urundi stating document has been agreed to by French British [sic] as state directly concerned in any event and that US (and possibly France) have been consulted as particularly interested powers. They feel bound to reach prior accord with Great Britain by exchange of communications as in technical conformity with Article 79 of Charter but are prepared to state this arrangement is without prejudice to final determination of States directly concerned." It is clear from the minutes of the meeting that the French should not have been named in this telegram along with the British as a state directly concerned. Mr. Hiss however did not have the minutes of the meeting available when this telegram was drafted, hence the confusion apparent in the text.

⁶ Villard had reported in the telegram under reference that the chief Belgian spokesman, Mr. Walter Loidan, Chef de Cabinet of the Belgian Ministry of Foreign Affairs, "appeared well versed and several times questioned my statement as to British and French approval of certain articles indicating he has had more recent contact than we with interested French and British officials. He suggested informal meeting New York or Washington with British, French and ourselves prior to submission agreement to General Assembly to establish uniformity which he deems indispensable."

[Received September 13—2:07 p.m.]

8165. From Villard. Sir George Gater, Permanent Under-Secretary of State for Colonies, who also was in Brussels last week, told me at luncheon yesterday that British Govt had not yet had time to consider on higher level revised trusteeship drafts discussed with Gerig last June.

This morning Secretary of State for Colonies called meeting his staff to go over matter. In subsequent conversation at Colonial Office Poynton informed me that approval had been given to most of our suggestion modifications, principal exception being revision for political surveys which British cannot accept. Early FonOff approval is expected after which final revised draft will be forwarded Washington and elsewhere.

Poynton also stated that while agreement of states defined by British as directly concerned would be sought, it would be unnecessary to submit changes for parliamentary approval. Colonial Office is in touch with Belgians and feels informal and separate discussions in NY prior to Assembly would be useful in interest of uniformity. Position of French regarded as uncertain.

In the event that this form of a trusteeship agreement is unacceptable from a military point of view, it is requested that the State-War-Navy Coordinating Committee be advised of the specific respects in which it is unacceptable.

It is not intended that the submission by the State-War-Navy Coordinating Committee or consideration by the Joint Chiefs of Staff of this draft agreement shall prejudice the ultimate decision as to whether the strategic control desired by the United States over former Japanese-held islands is to be accomplished through sovereignty or through United Nations trusteeship.

AIDE-MÉMOIRE

The United States Government was glad to learn from the extract of a Foreign Office telegram dated August 31, 1946, which was attached to Mr. Middleton's letter of September 5, 1946 addressed to Mr. Hiss, that the respective views of the two Governments as regards the procedure for submitting trusteeship agreements to the General Assembly are now almost identical.

It is noted that the United Kingdom Government considers that the phrase "agreed upon" in Article 79 of the Charter means simply "concurrent in" and that such concurrence can be obtained by diplomatic consultation without any recourse to formal signature. It is further noted that the United Kingdom Government believes that it would be a tactical mistake to approach the Soviet Government as to any other possible interpretation of this Article.

The United States Government is very anxious to avoid a protracted debate in the General Assembly, both as regards the nature of the "agreement" and the states which might have to concur in an agreement of this informal character. Therefore, the Department undertakes once more to urge the United Kingdom Government to consider whether it would not be possible and highly desirable for the United ⁹ Handed to the First Secretary of the British Embassy (Middleton) on September 20 by the Chief of the Division of Dependent Area Affairs (Gerig).

Kingdom Government to present the draft terms of trusteeship to the General Assembly without specifying any particular states by name as having concurred in the agreement. Should the United Kingdom Government specify as "states directly concerned" those named in Prime Minister Attlee's statement of January 23, 1946 and also in the British Embassy's aide-mémoire of May 24, 1946, this Government might deem it necessary to inform the General Assembly that it considers that the United States is entitled to be a "state directly concerned" in all mandated territories. Such a decision might easily result in a large number of other claimants, and thereby start the General Assembly on a protracted debate and possibly a series of votes as to which states should qualify under Article 79 of the Charter.

It seems to this Government that the General Assembly should be able to "satisfy itself that the agreement of the states directly concerned including the mandatory power has been obtained . . .", as stated in the preamble of the draft agreements, without undertaking to specify these states in each case. This Government is expressing the same view to the Belgian and French Governments.¹⁰

The United States Government is also somewhat disturbed by the possibility that some mandatory powers may only be able to accept ad referendum certain changes which might be proposed by the General Assembly. This Government agrees with the Foreign Office view as to the procedure in case changes should be proposed by the General Assembly, namely, that the mandatory power would need to agree to such changes before the terms of trusteeship could be approved by the United Nations.

It is to be hoped that the pre-Assembly consultations will have resulted in such a wide area of agreement that any changes in the draft agreements which may be necessitated in order to obtain the approval of the General Assembly could readily be agreed to by the mandatory powers through their representatives to the General Assembly. This would obviate the delays incident to reference back to Parliaments and would permit the Trusteeship Council to be established by the General Assembly this year. In furtherance of this ¹⁰ Actually aide-mémoire were handed first to the Australian Embassy and the New Zealand Legation on September 30, neither printed (800.014/9-3046). Aide-mémoire were transmitted to the Belgian and French Embassies on October 7 and 8, respectively, neither printed (800.0146/10-746 and 501.BB/10-846 respectively). A memorandum was handed to Mr. A. A. Gromyko of the Soviet Delegation to the General Assembly on October 15, at the United Nations, not printed (501.BB/10-1146). All were substantially of the same content as this aide-mémoire of September 20 to the British Embassy.

On October 18 a memorandum was handed to the Chinese Ambassador (Koo) by the Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs (Hiss), explaining this Government's position regarding states directly concerned. This was an abbreviated composite of the Secretary of State's note of May 7 to the British Ambassador, p. 579, and this aide-mémoire. (501.BB/10-1846) objective the United States Government has warmly accepted the Belgian proposal for further separate and informal discussions by the Belgian, United Kingdom, French, and United States Governments just prior to the opening of the General Assembly.

For the foregoing reasons the United States Government believes that it will be both possible and desirable to leave the question of "states directly concerned" undetermined and the enumeration of such states unspecified. If the question should arise in the General Assembly, the United States Delegation is likely to urge the wisdom of leaving the phrase undefined. And if the General Assembly does not concur in this view, it may urge that all states, except of course the mandatory power, should agree to waive the exercise of any special rights which their designation as states directly concerned might appear to give them and, instead, to accept as binding the two-thirds vote of the General Assembly. If all the other states are willing to agree to this formula the United States Government, as mentioned before, will be willing to waive the exercise of its rights in this respect. The United States will, however, reserve its rights with respect to future alterations and amendments of the terms of trusteeship.

EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to refer further to your communication of February 4, 1946 (No. 71; Ref. 419/19/46) in which the United Kingdom Government transmitted to this Government drafts of the terms under which the United Kingdom proposes to place the mandated territories of Tanganyika, the Cameroons, and Togoland under the trusteeship system of the United Nations in accordance with Article 77 of the Charter. In addition to its original comments, transmitted to the British Embassy in a note of May 7, 1946, the United States Government, which is still considering the revised draft for Tanganyika sent to Mr. Gerig by Mr. Middleton in a letter dated July 31, 1946 desires to suggest at this time the following clause for inclusion as the final paragraph of Article 9 of the drafts:

"Nothing in this article shall be so construed as to accord traffic rights to aircraft flying into and out of the trust territory. Such rights shall be subject to agreement between the administering authority and the state whose nationality such aircraft possess."

The inclusion of this paragraph seems desirable since, in the view of the Government of the United States, aviation traffic rights (taking on and discharge of passengers, cargo, and mail) require special treatment in accordance with the Chicago Convention on International Civil Aviation and with relevant bilateral treaties.¹¹

SIR: The United States Government are aware of and indeed are known to share the wish of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom to see the Trusteeship system set up without delay. In this spirit His Majesty's Government expressed their readiness to co-operate as fully as circumstances permitted in considering the amendments to the draft terms of trusteeship for the territories in Africa under United Kingdom mandate proposed by the State Department in their secret note to my predecessor of the 7th May, 1946.¹⁴ Representatives of the State Department were accordingly invited to London early in June to discuss these amendments. The discussions on the official level resulted in a joint text which was communicated to the State Department informally shortly afterwards.¹⁵ As was explained at the time, this text was subject on the part of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom to ministerial approval.

ANNEX A

AIDE-MÉMOIRE

REVISED DRAFT TERMS OF TRUSTEESHIP
FOR TERRITORIES IN AFRICA UNDER UNITED KINGDOM MANDATE

SECRET

The revised draft terms of trusteeship for territories in Africa under United Kingdom mandate are identical with the texts resulting from the discussions in June between United States and United Kingdom experts,²⁰ except in the following respects.

Article 2.

After very careful consideration His Majesty's Government have found themselves unable to accept the inclusion in this Article of the words "on behalf of the United Nations". They cannot find any words in the Charter to warrant definition of the position in these terms. They feel that the position of the Administering Authority under the trusteeship system in relation to the United Nations is clearly set out in the Charter, and that it would be undesirable to attempt to define it further in the terms of trusteeship themselves. It is felt that the inclusion of these words might give the erroneous impression that the ¹⁹ Copy of revised draft terms accompanying this note not printed. The revised draft terms are printed in British Cmd. 6935, October 1946. The explanatory memorandum follows as "Annex A".

²⁰ See draft terms of agreement for Tanganyika, p. 604.

United Nations itself had administrative functions in respect of trust territories where a single state is designated as administering authority. It will be recalled that in his statement to the General Assembly in January, 1946, when announcing the intention of His Majesty's Government to place the territories in question under the trusteeship system, the Foreign Secretary said: "It is most important that the people of the territories themselves and the world at large should be left in no doubt that the continuity of administration will be maintained until the ultimate objective of the trusteeship system, self-government or independence, as the case may be, is attained".

Article 5(b).

It has been decided to retain the words "under his sovereignty or control". His Majesty's Government are not in a position to constitute a trust territory under their control into a customs, fiscal or administrative union with any territory not under their control. Further His Majesty's Government are anxious to avoid anything which might create an impression either locally or internationally that they wish in any way to attach other territories to territories under their administration.

Article 6(1).

The words "in accordance with Article 76(b) of the United Nations Charter" have been substituted for the words "towards the objectives of self-government or independence as prescribed in Article 76(b) of the Charter". It is felt that the Article as now amended is already sufficiently explicit and that all that is required is a simple reference to the relevant Article of the Charter where the objectives in question are set out.

Article 6(2).

His Majesty's Government are unable to accept the addition of a paragraph to Article 6 about surveys of development of political institutions. They appreciate that there was considerable discussion at the Preparatory Commission on this question and that it is felt in some quarters that it is desirable that such surveys should become a feature of the International Trusteeship System. Should the United Nations eventually decide that such surveys were desirable and should provision be made for them in the rules of procedure of the Trusteeship Council or anywhere else, the position would have to be re-examined. In the meantime however His Majesty's Government feel that they would not be justified in prejudging the issue by including a provision for such surveys in the terms of trusteeship.

Article 8.

The word "natural" has been inserted before "resources" in this Article. This has been done as a result of a suggestion by local authorities who considered that it is desirable to define more clearly what was meant by "resources".

Article 10(c).

There has been a slight rewording in this Article in order to make the sense clearer.

Article 11.

The word "nationals" has been substituted by "inhabitants" as this is a more appropriate description of the status of the people of Tanganyika. There has further been a slight rewording at the end of this article, which does not involve any change in the sense of the article.

*The British Embassy to the Department of State*²¹

AIDE-MÉMOIRE

During the discussions which were held in London on the official level in June, 1946, with State Department officials to consider trusteeship matters, the thesis was put forward on the United States side that the mandatory power is the only "state directly concerned" in the terms of trusteeship for its mandated territories, and that the obligation of Article 79 of the Charter can be discharged simply by a process of diplomatic consultation with other states. Subsequently the views of the United States Government were further elaborated in the State Department's Aide-Mémoire of the 20th September, 1946.

2. His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom appreciate the motives of the United States Government in putting forward its suggestions for simplifying the procedure of consultation with other governments and expediting the conclusion of trusteeship agreements. They share the desire of the United States Government to avoid lengthy debate in the General Assembly on the issue of "states directly concerned" and have no desire to provoke such a debate. Indeed the respective views of the two governments on the interpretation to be placed on Article 79 of the Charter would now appear to be almost identical.

3. It will be recalled that at the time that His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom announced their intention of bringing the African territories under United Kingdom mandate under trusteeship, there was not (and there still is not) any agreed or authoritative interpretation of the phrase "states directly concerned". His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom therefore had no alternative but to give a practical interpretation themselves in what appeared to be a generally accepted sense. As is known, His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom informed the General Assembly that they were communicating the draft terms of the trusteeship to certain states who seemed on any interpretation to be directly concerned with the terms of trusteeship for the territories in question. The United Kingdom drafts were also communicated for information to the other states mentioned by name in Article 23 of the Charter. It was made clear at the time that this action was without prejudice to the ultimate interpretation of the phrase "states directly concerned" and the action of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom was not challenged by any delegation at the General Assembly. Since that time the states which, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, were in any event directly concerned, have concurred in the original United Kingdom draft terms of trusteeship, the drafts themselves have been published as command papers and the command papers which refer to the concurrence of these states have been communicated for information to the Secretary-General. His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom cannot go back on these published statements.

4. In the light of the foregoing and particularly in view of the history of Article 79 of the Charter at San Francisco, His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom do not feel that they could avoid all reference at the next meeting of the General Assembly to agreement to the terms of trusteeship by "states directly concerned". His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, however, have never contemplated the conclusion of a formal treaty among "states directly concerned" and do not interpret Article 79 of the Charter as meaning that any "state directly concerned" can indefinitely hold up the submission of draft terms of trusteeship to the General Assembly should it unfortunately prove impossible to reach agreement in any particular case. Moreover, for their part, as the United States Government is now aware, His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom will be presenting the draft trusteeship agreements on their own behalf alone and not on behalf of a group of "states directly concerned", and will be taking the line that Article 79 of the Charter could adequately be fulfilled by obtaining the concurrence of certain states in these drafts through diplomatic channels.

5. Whether or not it will be possible to avoid a discussion on the meaning of the expression "states directly concerned", His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom consider that it is in any event almost certain that the General Assembly will not approve the drafts until it is told what states have in fact been consulted. His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom therefore expect that it will be necessary at some stage for them to declare which states they have formally consulted and possibly to produce written evidence in the shape of formal correspondence that such states have agreed to the draft terms presented. They do not, however, propose to take this action unless requested by the Assembly, which might conceivably be equally satisfied by oral statements from the delegations concerned.

6. With reference to the last paragraph of the State Department's note of the 20th September, His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom would be very content if it should prove possible to leave the general question of the interpretation of "states directly concerned" still undetermined. But the General Assembly itself may be unwilling to approve the draft terms of trusteeship on this basis. In the view of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom one of two things may then happen. Either the General Assembly itself may wish to settle the general question of the interpretation of Article 79 of the Charter before proceeding to the examination of individual drafts; or some particular state or states may put forward claims to be "states directly concerned", in respect of particular mandated territories (not necessarily only those under United Kingdom mandate), and press for consideration of their claims by the General Assembly. Either of these courses would probably lead to a prolonged discussion which His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, like the United States Government, would much prefer to avoid. His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom note that, in that event, the United States delegation is likely to urge the wisdom of leaving the phrase undefined. The United States Government will appreciate that any one new claim to be directly concerned put forward at the General Assembly would be likely to provoke others. For this reason His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom express the hope that the United States Government, since it shares their general approach and interest in this question, will feel able to agree with the procedure outlined in paragraphs 4 and 5 above and to refrain from making any formal reservation at the General Assembly of its own claim to be a "state directly concerned" in respect of mandated territories.

*Memorandum by Mr. John Foster Dulles of the United States Delegation to the Secretary of State*²²

CONFIDENTIAL

[WASHINGTON,] October 9, 1946.

I spent the morning with Mr. Hiss and Mr. Gerig discussing trusteeship in anticipation of the next meeting of the General Assembly. I had previously told the President and Secretary Forrestal that I would be in Washington and the President had asked me to call on him at 12:45 and Forrestal had asked me to lunch with him following that. I took advantage of these two meetings to try to advance somewhat what Messrs. Hiss and Gerig had told me was the Department's policy with respect to Trusteeship.

In the course of the conversation with the President, I said to him that I felt it of the utmost importance that he or you should at the next Assembly meeting make an authoritative and definite statement of U.S. intentions with regard to the Japanese Mandated Islands which are now under our administration. The President said that he expected to discuss this with you as soon as you returned.

I then lunched with Secretary Forrestal and told him that in my opinion it was very important that the United States clearly state its intentions at the next Assembly. I recalled that there had been indecision for about eighteen months. I stated that in my opinion from an over-all standpoint the United States needed to demonstrate to the rest of the world its capacity to act decisively in relation to international affairs. There were, I said, a number of countries who were doubtful as to whether we had that capacity and whether it was safe for them to associate themselves with us. I said that the indecision shown with reference to the Japanese Mandated Islands would, if prolonged, weaken our position in the world; that the differences of opinion between the State Department, War Department and Navy Department were well known and could not be continued without giving the world the impression that in such matters our Government was unable to make up its mind and come to a decision.

I said that while some decision was of first importance, irrespective of what that decision was, I thought it was important that the decision should be in favor of strategic trusteeship rather than annexation. There was a long history beginning with the Atlantic Charter which had given other nations reason to believe that we would not annex outright and if we did so it might set an example for others to do likewise with a result that the entire trusteeship system might collapse.

²² The Secretary could not have seen this immediately, as he was still at the Paris Peace Conference.

Secretary Forrestal seemed impressed by what I had said and he asked me to talk to Admiral Nimitz and Admiral Sherman. I repeated to them the substance of the above emphasizing that I thought it entirely possible and proper to get, in these largely uninhabited islands, the military rights which the Navy felt indispensable. I referred to the fact that we had not annexed the Panama Canal Zone but had a lease in perpetuity. Admiral Nimitz and Admiral Sherman put various questions to me which I was able to answer so that they felt fairly satisfied, and I gained the impression that the Navy people were by no means unalterably opposed to strategic trusteeship for the Japanese Mandated Islands. Admiral Nimitz asked me to look over an agreement which had been drafted to cover this contingency and to let him know what I thought of it, and I am planning to do so.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Chief of the Division of Dependent Area Affairs (Gerig)

[WASHINGTON,] October 10, 1946.

Participants: Mr. George Middleton, First Secretary, British Embassy
SPA—Mr. Hiss; DA—Mr. Gerig

Mr. Middleton said he had two points to take up with us. First, the United Kingdom Government agreed with our recent proposal²³ that it was desirable not to specify by name states as "directly concerned" under Article 79 whose concurrence would be necessary in voting the trusteeship agreements at the Assembly, and that the British would transmit the draft trusteeship terms for Tanganyika, the Cameroons, and Togoland to the Assembly without referring to any other states as being directly concerned. The British Government, he said, felt able to do this in the hope that the United States Government would refrain from making any formal reservation at the General Assembly of its own claim to be a "state directly concerned" in respect of mandated territories. Mr. Middleton added, however, that the British Government was not convinced that other states might not press the Assembly to define and specify certain states as "directly concerned".²⁴

On this point, Mr. Hiss said that it was our hope that a protracted debate could be avoided and that the United States Delegation, he thought, would merely state that while it considered itself entitled to be a state directly concerned if such states were to be designated, it was prepared, if others also agreed, not to press such a claim. He explained that our waiver, of course, was for this Assembly, and did not necessarily extend to future amendments and alterations of such agreements.

²³ See Department of State aide-mémoire of September 20, p. 628.

²⁴ It seems probable that sometime during the preceding statement by Mr. Middleton he handed Mr. Hiss the British Embassy aide-mémoire of October 9, p. 634.

Mr. Middleton then raised his second point, which he said was more difficult and to which the United Kingdom Government attached great importance. At that point he handed us a copy of the official revised text of the trusteeship terms which the British Government was now prepared to submit to the Assembly.²⁵ It contained, he said, substantially all the revisions which the United States experts had pressed in London last June, except on point 10(c) relating to the establishment of general monopolies, on which the experts did not agree. He said that the British Cabinet would have preferred to put forward their original terms, and that it was with some difficulty that the Cabinet was able to agree to a number of our revisions. They decided, however, to put the revised draft forward, provided we could give them some assurance that, apart from Article 10(c), the United States Delegation would support the amended text, and would not press for further revisions.

On this second point, Mr. Hiss said that if the United Kingdom Government wanted a formal commitment of this kind, the Department could not give it because it was not possible to tie the hands of our Delegation completely even before they had seen the text which would be the subject of negotiation at the Assembly. He hoped that the British Government would not press us on this point. He added, however, that it was unlikely that our Delegation would depart from the revisions tentatively agreed upon. Mr. Middleton then said that if we could not give adequate assurance on this point, the British Government might feel that it should fall back on its original text. Mr. Hiss said he felt that would be unfortunate, since it would mean that we, as well as others, would have to introduce a much larger number of amendments which would probably result in failure to reach agreement at this Assembly at all. He hoped that the suggestions previously made to the effect that we did not anticipate any difficulties on points apart from Article 10(c) would be sufficient to give the British Government the assurances it desired.

Mr. Middleton then said he hoped this would be sufficient and that he fully understood the constitutional difficulties of attempting to bind our Delegation. He urged, however, that every effort be made to support the revisions agreed on at the technical level and, further, that the United States Delegation would not support amendments of substance without first consulting with the United Kingdom Delegation.

²⁵ Not printed; see footnote 19, p. 632

Mr. Hiss said that he thought, in keeping with our previous practice of consultation, our Delegation would consult with the British Delegation on any amendments of substance which might arise at the Assembly.

At the end of the discussion, Mr. Hiss summarized our position by saying that he thought it would be possible informally to tell London that officials in the Department felt that, except for Article 10(c), the United States Government, through its Delegation, would generally agree with the revised draft in so far as it followed the original revisions agreed on in London, but that it should be explained, nevertheless, that we could not bind the hands of our Delegation to the Assembly.

Mr. Hiss agreed to discuss the matter with the Acting Secretary, and Mr. Gerig agreed to compare the two texts immediately to see if there were substantive differences between the two revisions which might occasion any difficulty.

Memorandum of Telephone Conversation, by the Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs (Hiss)

[WASHINGTON,] October 11, 1946.

Mr. Middleton called me on the telephone this afternoon and referring to the conversation which he, Mr. Gerig and I had yesterday (which is the subject of a separate memorandum of conversation) said that the Ambassador had asked him to clarify with me the matter of the degree of support which our Delegation would be prepared to give the Tanganyika draft. He said that he understood from his conversation with Mr. Gerig late yesterday afternoon, after Mr. Gerig had had an opportunity to examine the text of the British revised draft, that there were three points on which we still felt dissatisfied, namely, the draft of Article 10 (c) on monopolies, the absence of provision for periodic surveys, and the absence of a recital that the agreement is entered into by the United Kingdom on behalf of the United Nations. Mr. Middleton said that he understood that as to the provision with respect to periodic surveys we would probably be satisfied with a British statement of record that they would agree to such surveys if conducted in the form of questionnaires. He said that in any event he understood our position to be that if we can reach a meeting of the minds on these three points we would be willing to recommend to the Delegation that the United States not initiate any substantive amendments to the revised agreement and that it not support any substantive agreements which would be inconsistent with the spirit of the revised agreement.

I told Mr. Middleton his understanding of the views which Mr. Gerig and I had expressed yesterday was accurate but that I wanted to make sure that he understood fully the detailed application of this statement. There were a number of provisions which we had proposed in the course of Mr. Gerig's conversations in London which the British have been reluctant to include in the agreement but which they had been prepared to have included in questionnaires to be formulated by the Trusteeship Council. In the event that some other Delegation were to propose similar provisions for incorporation in the agreement we would certainly not wish to oppose them although we would be willing to say what we had already said to the British, namely, that we would be satisfied if they were incorporated in questionnaires. I thought that in some such cases we might abstain from voting and in others we might actually support the proposed amendment.

I then said that I wanted particularly to emphasize the fact that I was speaking in terms of my estimate of what the Delegation would do. I said that Mr. Middleton should understand that I was not in a position to bind the Delegation in any sense. We had every reason to believe, however, that the Delegation would see the issues as we see them. We have been careful to go over many of the points with the Delegates who will be most interested in trusteeship matters and we did feel that our estimates were accurate but they were estimates and not commitments. Mr. Middleton said that he thoroughly understood this.

Mr. Middleton indicated plainly that he thought the British Government would be mistaken were it to ask for written commitments and I made it plain that I was confident we could give them no written commitments. I pointed out that it seemed to me that it would certainly not be in the interests of the British Government in any event to submit the original draft agreement instead of the revised agreement, and I pointed out in this connection that the French agreement which has been filed with the United Nations is almost identical to the British revised agreement; furthermore the French have stated the British have agreed to the French draft agreement. In view of this and of our conversations with the British I did not see how they could possibly oppose amendments to the original draft which merely incorporated those of our proposals which the British had agreed to at the technical level and had incorporated in their revised draft. Mr. Middleton seemed to be in agreement with me but said that this was, of course, a matter for London to determine. He said that the Ambassador is extremely anxious to reach a maximum of agreement and I feel sure the Embassy will recommend that the British not pursue further the suggestion that we either give a written commitment to support the revised draft or they would have to revert to the original draft.

The First Secretary of the British Embassy (Middleton) to the Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs (Hiss)

SECRET

CONFIDENTIAL

WASHINGTON, 14 October, 1946.

MY DEAR HISS: May I refer to Mr. Clayton's secret note of the 20th September to Lord Inverchapel suggesting the following clause for inclusion as the final paragraph of Article 9 of the draft trusteeship agreements: "Nothing in this article shall be so construed as to accord traffic rights to aircraft flying into and out of the trust territory. Such rights shall be subject to agreement between the administering authority and the state whose nationality such aircraft possess".

The Foreign Office assume that your proposal is designed to limit the granting of all five freedoms, implicit in the preamble to Article 9, to granting of non-traffic rights, (i.e. first and second freedoms) only, and that the granting of the third, fourth and fifth freedoms could therefore be made only by bilateral agreements between the States concerned.²⁷

If this interpretation is correct, the Foreign Office consider that there would seem some doubt whether the suggested amendment is in accordance with the provisions of Article 76(d) of the Charter, from which Article 9 of the draft terms of trusteeship derives. They are not convinced that the amendment would be justifiable under the proviso to Article 76(d) contained in the words "without prejudice to the attainment of the foregoing objectives and subject to the provisions of Article 80". In consequence though it is appreciated that the United Kingdom might obtain considerable material advantages from accepting the proposed amendment, His Majesty's Government do not feel able at this stage to incorporate it in their draft terms of trusteeship or to take the lead in proposing in the Assembly such an amendment, which might expose them to criticism of attempting to strain the provisions of the Charter.

In explaining the difficulties of His Majesty's Government as outlined above, we have however been instructed to let you know informally that should the United States Government still desire to propose the inclusion of this or a similar amendment, in the Assembly, His Majesty's Government would have no objection to their doing so; and if the general view of the Assembly was that the provision is reconcilable with the Charter, they would be willing to accept a recommendation to incorporate it in the draft terms of trusteeship, subject to the concurrence of the States recognised by His Majesty's Government as directly concerned.

Yours sincerely,

G. H. MIDDLETON

We explained that while this was one method which might be pursued, our more simplified procedure would also be consistent with Article 79 and that short time remaining indicated simplified procedure preferable. 862S.01/10-1646

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs (Hiss)

[WASHINGTON,] October 16, 1946.

Mr. Middleton came to see me yesterday at his request.

He said that he had good news on the subject of the British attitude toward states directly concerned and, he believed, also on the question of the status of the revised draft agreement for Tanganyika.

As to the first point he said that the Foreign Office is now quite happy about the arrangements made with respect to proposed procedure for dealing with "states directly concerned." They agree with us in hoping that the matter can be left undefined. They have gone so far as to say now that if, in urging that it be left undefined, we wished to mention the possibility that the Charter could be interpreted as meaning only the proposed administering state is to be considered as a state directly concerned the British Delegation would be willing to go along with stating that that is a possible interpretation provided that the French, the Belgians and the South Africans, to whom they feel committed as being states directly concerned in the British African Mandates, are also agreeable to such a position. Mr. Middleton made it clear on this point that the Foreign Office is not prepared to support such an interpretation as a definitive interpretation but merely to agree that it is a possible interpretation and as such is indicative of the uncertainty of the issue and the desirability of leaving it undefined at this time. They think it might also be helpful as an argument in support of why those claiming to be states directly concerned should be willing to waive their claims for the purposes of the present Assembly.

With respect to the status of the present revised draft agreement for Tanganyika Mr. Middleton said that the Foreign Office have said that they were sorry that if in an excess of enthusiasm they had asked for a written commitment from the Department that we would not initiate amendments and would consult any amendments proposed by others. They understand fully that we are not in a position to give such a commitment and are perfectly satisfied with the oral assurances which Mr. Gerig and I had previously given that this was in fact the attitude of the Department, that we would urge it upon the Delegation and that we had every reason to believe that the Delegation would accept it.

Mr. Middleton went on to say that the Foreign Office further were agreeable to the issue of paragraph 10(c) (on monopolies) being left outside these oral assurances. He said we could "agree to disagree" about paragraph 10(c) and it was understood that we were perfectly free to initiate a substantive amendment to that paragraph.

As to the phrase "on behalf of the United Nations" which we wished to be inserted as governing the assumption of trusteeship, Mr. Middleton said that the Foreign Office regarded the exclusion of this as being as important to them as we regarded a revision of paragraph 10(c). He asked whether we could agree that if in the course of the informal conversations with the mandatory powers, planned to be held prior to the Assembly discussion, it developed that all the mandatories were equally opposed to the inclusion of this phrase we would agree not to initiate an amendment proposing its inclusion in the agreement. I told Mr. Middleton that frankly we regarded this as a matter of less moment to us than paragraph 10(c) but nonetheless considered it an important matter of principle which should be clarified so as to leave no doubt of the status of the trustee. It seemed to me the kind of issue that we would not wish to try to prevent the Delegation from raising although I felt sure the Delegation itself would not consider it the kind of issue which would prevent our approval of the agreement if not settled satisfactorily to us, assuming other provisions of the agreement were satisfactory.

Mr. Middleton said that he was now in a position to assure us that the Foreign Office has no objection to an obligation with respect to political surveys being incorporated in questionnaires or regulations of the Trusteeship Council. The Foreign Office is also prepared to make this commitment as a matter of record in the Assembly.

Mr. Middleton said that the Embassy had been asked by the Foreign Office to be sure that the oral assurances which Mr. Gerig and I had given as outlined above had been brought to the attention of the Acting Secretary. I said that I would undertake to do this and would communicate again with Mr. Middleton promptly after I had talked to Mr. Acheson.

Referring again to paragraph 10(c) Mr. Middleton said that he had been asked to repeat orally to the Department the British arguments as to why they did not feel that they could agree to determination as to the propriety of a given monopoly by an organ of the United Nations. They felt that freedom of action on the part of the trustee was necessary in order that the trustee could carry out its obligations for the welfare of the inhabitants. They felt that the open-door provisions of the mandates had resulted definitely in certain disadvantages to the inhabitants of the mandated area. They believe that Article 76(d) of the Charter, which relates to equal treatment, makes it clear that such treatment is to be given without prejudice to the attainment of the basic objectives re the welfare of the inhabitants. They think we should be prepared to accept lesser rights than we had under the mandates in view of the provisions of Article 76(d) and the whole change in the conception of the administering states' responsibilities under the Trusteeship System as opposed to the mandate system. They feel that any approval by a United Nations organ would result in endless appeals by vested interests which would obstruct necessary action for the welfare of the inhabitants. Finally, they feel that any abuse can be corrected in view of the fact that the right of petition will be available. Mr. Middleton said that the British Government wished to point out that their position on this matter does not mean that they will fail to give full consideration to our views in the course of any informal meetings we may have on the subject of paragraph 10(c).

Reverting again to the question of the phrase "on behalf of the United Nations" Mr. Middleton said that the British position is that there is an important distinction between trusteeships administered by a single power and trusteeships, such as we have proposed for the African colonies, which the United Nations is to administer directly. In the former cases the trustee is not merely an agent of the organization. He pointed out that the trustee has no recourse to the United Nations if there is a budget deficit. He said that if the Assembly were to insist on the inclusion of this clause he felt sure that the United Kingdom would have to reconsider its entire attitude toward the agreement and would consider that many of the obligations contained in it were inconsistent with such a thesis. He informed me that it was his understanding that the Australians are equally vigorously opposed to the inclusion of this clause.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs (Hiss)

[WASHINGTON,] October 16, 1946.

After clearing the matter with Mr. Acheson at the 9:30 meeting this morning I told Mr. Middleton that Mr. Acheson approved the oral assurances which had previously been given Mr. Middleton and that with the exception of points listed hereafter we would recommend to our Delegation to the General Assembly that they initiate no substantive amendments to the British draft trusteeship agreement for Tanganyika (or the draft agreement for Togo and the Cameroons) and that we would not support any substantive amendments without prior consultation with the British Delegation. (See memoranda of conversations of October 11 and October 16).

The exceptions as to which Mr. Middleton and I were already agreed related to paragraph 10(c) on the subject of monopolies and the phrase "on behalf of the United Nations" as the basis on which trusteeship would be assumed by the United Kingdom. As to the former point Mr. Middleton had already this morning received informally from the Department suggested new language and the whole subject will be considered in the informal conversations in New York between representatives of the two delegations. If agreement is not reached we remain free to initiate an amendment on that subject. With respect to the phrase "on behalf of the United Nations" we do not attach the same importance to this as to the monopolies provision but we nonetheless consider it an important matter of principle and would not wish to give any assurances that we would not take the initiative in proposing its insertion in the agreement. This subject, too, however, could be discussed further in the informal conversations in New York.

I went on to refer to the provision relating to aviation landing rights and pointed out to Mr. Middleton that in view of the note on this subject which he had sent to me after the earlier talks with Mr. Gerig and me this point would also be regarded as not covered by the oral assurances. (In his note Mr. Middleton had said that British Government is not prepared to adopt our proposal on this subject because they feel that a provision to the effect that landing rights should be granted only on a reciprocal basis would be inconsistent with the Charter. He had, however, said that his Government would have no objection to our Government raising the point.) Mr. Middleton concurred that this was the agreed status of this point.

I then referred to three other topics which we had found, after careful examination of the draft revised agreement, had not been incorporated but had not been mentioned in the Embassy's aide-mémoire with which the draft revised agreement had been submitted. In Article 3 the revised draft left out a provision for special visits which we had suggested; in Article 5 our proposal that fiscal, customs and administrative unions with neighboring territories be permitted with the approval of the Trusteeship Council had been omitted; in Article 12(a) our proposals that "freedom of movement" be guaranteed had been left out. I said that as to special visits and freedom of movement we felt that important matters of principle were involved and that while we did not attach the same importance to them that we did to the monopolies provision we nonetheless did not feel prepared to give assurances not to initiate provisions on these points. The two points could, of course, be discussed further in the forthcoming talks in New York. This arrangement was satisfactory to Mr. Middleton. As to the fiscal, customs and administrative unions point I said that I would wish to check further with my associates in the Department before giving Mr. Middleton a final answer but that I thought our position would be that although we considered the provision desirable it was merely designed to increase the authority of the trustee and if the administering power did not desire it I did not see how we could urge it further. (Subsequently, after Mr. Green of DA had checked with the other interested Divisions, I told Mr. Middleton by telephone that we would be willing to drop this point and to include it within the general oral assurances.)

I then said there remained one further point, namely, the question of the political surveys. Mr. Middleton had told me on October 15 that his Government is prepared to make a statement of record to the Assembly that political surveys might be included in questionnaires. Subsequently, on examining the record of the Preparatory Commission, we had discovered that both we and the British had opposed a provision for political surveys being put in the draft regulations of the Trusteeship Council on the ground that there was no authority for such surveys unless they were authorized by the agreements themselves. Mr. Middleton readily agreed that unless the Assembly were prepared to take a different view as to the legal status he could not expect the political surveys point to be within the scope of our oral assurances. It was agreed that this matter would be explored further in the New York conversations. (Subsequently I called Mr. Middleton to say that if the legal question on this point was satisfactorily settled we would want the British statement of record on this subject to be a statement of willingness that political surveys would be covered by questionnaires and by periodic visits.)

I reiterated that it was understood that with respect to amendments offered by others which merely proposed the addition of topics we ourselves had proposed but had agreed either to drop altogether or to drop from the agreement provided they were to be covered by questionnaires, periodic visits or regulations of the Trusteeship Council, although we would be prepared to consult the British Delegation before taking a position it should be anticipated that we would not oppose such amendments. In some cases we might vote for them after stating our willingness to have them taken care of by the questionnaires, periodic visits and regulation method, or after stating that we did not feel too strongly the topics should be included, as the case might be. In other cases we might be prepared to abstain after making our position clear in the same manner.

I then informed Mr. Middleton of the results of the conversations which Mr. Gerig and Mr. Herschel Johnson had had with Mr. Gromyko in New York on October 15 on the subject of "states directly concerned" (see telegram 671, October 15, from New York).

800.014/10-1646

Memorandum of Telephone Conversation, by the Associate Chief of the Division of Dependent Area Affairs (Green)

[WASHINGTON,] October 16, 1946.

Mr. Middleton telephoned at noon to say that there were two points in connection with our position on the British draft terms of trusteeship which he wished to clarify before telegraphing London. He said that Mr. Hiss had informed him earlier in the morning that the Department was still studying its position on Article 5(b) and that he understood Mr. Hiss to say that we were concerned about the omission of any provision concerning the establishment of customs, fiscal or administrative union, or federations. I said that he may have misunderstood Mr. Hiss, for we were concerned not with the omission of the provision as a whole, but rather with the omission of the clause "subject to the approval of the General Assembly or the Trusteeship Council" which we had proposed at London. I said that I understood that the British representatives in London had told Mr. Gerig and Mr. Smith that it would be difficult to incorporate such a provision in the Tanganyika agreement since arrangements for associating Tanganyika with Kenya and Uganda were already far advanced, but that the British spokesmen apparently did not feel quite so strongly on this point with respect to Togoland and the Cameroons.

Mr. Middleton said that the British had been willing to state that any such arrangements must be consistent not only with the basic objectives of the trusteeship system but also "with the terms of this agreement". He asked whether inclusion of this phrase would not give adequate protection. I replied that while I thought that the phrase would probably be sufficient to make sure that any such unions or federations would not violate the commercial equality article, I would like to consult other officers of the Department on this point. The Department had previously felt, I continued, that approval of the General Assembly or the Trusteeship Council would be necessary to make sure that any union or federation was in accordance with the trusteeship agreement. Mr. Middleton said that he personally could not see why such a provision was necessary and asked whether I thought he ought to emphasize the point in his telegram to London. I replied that I personally did not think this matter was of equal importance to the monopolies provision and certain other points on which we had reserved judgment, and that I would let him know our views as soon as possible.

Mr. Middleton then said that he had one suggestion to make concerning the suggested revision of Article 10(c) on monopolies which he had discussed earlier this morning with a group of officers of the Department. He suggested that the last clause of our suggested revision be altered as follows: "provided that the conditions laid down by the appropriate United Nations agencies and approved for the purposes of this Article by the Trusteeship Council relating to the circumstances in which and the manner by which such monopoly undertakings may be established or maintained are satisfactory". Mr. Middleton said that he thought the phrase "for the purposes of this Article" should be inserted in order to make clear that the Trusteeship Council was not reviewing the general work of other organs of the United Nations or of the specialized agencies, since the latter might well resent such an implication. I replied that I thought this amendment was a useful one and that I would inform the other officers who had talked to Mr. Middleton this morning.

The Ambassador has the honor to transmit herewith copies of drafts of trusteeship agreements for French Cameroons and French Togoland, which the French Government will submit to the General Assembly of the United Nations.³¹ A representative of the Foreign Office stated that these documents, which have not yet been released to the public, contain two noteworthy provisions, namely, (1) that the administering authority may establish military, naval and air bases

He feels, consequently, that in view of this reaction by the Senators we are entitled to assume that they see no objection from the point of view of the Senators' prerogatives to our agreeing that the Assembly may approve a trusteeship agreement to which we were not a party but which replaced a mandate as to which the United States has a convention with the mandatory.

Mr. Middleton telephoned this morning to say that he had been unable to reach Mr. Hiss. He said that he wished to inform the Department that the British Government was publishing as a white paper the "Revise A" of the Draft Terms of Trusteeship for Tanganyika, Togoland and the Cameroons. The Government was doing this in order to get through the parliamentary processes, but its action did not in any way constitute a commitment as to the final text of the three agreements. This action merely carried one step further the earlier parliamentary procedure by which the British Government had published the original draft terms of trusteeship as white papers. Publication at this time, he repeated, would not preclude any change which might be agreed to during the informal conversations in New York or in the General Assembly itself.

Mr. Middleton said that the British Government was following the same procedure it had used with respect to the original white papers. It was sending copies to the permanent members of the Security Council, to the British Dominions for purposes of consultation, and to France, Belgium and South Africa as states which the British felt were "states directly concerned" in any event in the three territories.

Mr. Middleton said, finally, that he had not received any information concerning the arrival of the Delegation in New York, but he was sure Mr. Poynton would get in touch with Mr. Gerig immediately upon arrival.

He added, however, that his Government felt that they had such friendly relations with the US that we should have no conflict over the revised wording.

*Minutes of the Fourth Meeting of the United States Delegation, New York, Hotel Pennsylvania, October 21, 1946, 10 a. m.*³⁶

[Here follows list of names of persons (23) present.]

In opening the meeting Senator Austin expressed the gratitude of the Delegation to Senators Vandenberg and Connally for the work done in Paris. He then called upon Mr. Gerig to discuss the problems which it was expected would arise in the Trusteeship Committee.

*Trusteeship Questions*³⁷

Mr. Gerig explained that the most important questions would be the following:

1. Procedure in Negotiating and Adopting Trusteeship Agreements;
2. The Question of the Future Status of South West Africa; and
3. The Functions of the General Assembly on Information to be Transmitted by Members Concerning Non-Self-Governing Territories.

Procedure in Negotiating and Adopting Trusteeship Agreements

Mr. Gerig discussed the proposals made by the Department aimed at simplifying the procedure for negotiating and approving trusteeship agreements, particularly as regards the definition and rights of the "states directly concerned". He explained that we had proposed to the mandatory powers and the Soviet Union and China that if all other claimant states were prepared to do the same, the United States would be willing not to press its claims to be a signatory to the draft trusteeship agreements and to leave the determination of the "states directly concerned" undefined when the draft agreements are submitted to the Assembly for approval and to abide by an unqualified two-thirds vote of the Assembly. He added that our proposals had been accepted by the United Kingdom, France, and New Zealand. The Soviet Government had been informed but had not yet accepted them. He pointed out that the Soviet Union had previously indicated that it was a "state directly concerned" in its capacity as a member of the ³⁶ For documentation regarding organization and arrangements for U.S. representation at the second part of the first session of the General Assembly, opening at New York on October 23, see pp. 1 ff.

³⁷ The Delegation had before it at this meeting a position paper dated October 19, document US/A/C.4/2 (IO Files), not printed, which was organized on the same basis as the sub-divisions of these minutes. Positions described in the paper were those which in pertinent part have been developed in the previous documentation, with specific reference to the procedure for submitting the trusteeship agreements to the General Assembly and the question of the terms of the agreements themselves. This paper was the last of several written in the Division of Dependent Area Affairs in a conventional drafting process which began in September (documents found in the IO Files in series SD/A/C.4/1 ff.).

Security Council and the Trusteeship Council and on account of its worldwide interests. The Arab states, as well as others, might also put in claims and, unless our proposed procedure were followed, the General Assembly would be forced to designate specifically "states directly concerned". Unless the Assembly were to decide this question by a two-thirds vote, one of the states directly concerned might veto any agreement.

Mr. Gerig explained that the viewpoint of the Soviet Union appeared to be that the proper procedure would be for four or five states directly concerned to confer together and draw up a more or less formal agreement. Senator Vandenberg expressed the opinion very strongly that our proposed procedure was already "out" and that the Russian position would have to be met.

Mr. Gerig said that if pressed to define the "states directly concerned", it was thought in the Department that we would probably have to vote for the inclusion of the Soviet Union in this category. He pointed out that the Soviet Union was particularly anxious to see the Trusteeship Council established and that we were not asking them to renounce their rights but merely not to exercise them to the full.

Mr. Sandifer expressed the opinion that if the Soviet Union were brought fully into the preliminary negotiations, it might waive the exercise of these further rights. Mr. Dulles pointed out that by our proposed procedure we were following a policy already laid down at London. We felt that it was undesirable to secure a formal definition of "states directly concerned" as it would involve endless decisions concerning the definition as well as claims from the Arab states, for instance, regarding Palestine. He agreed with Senator Vandenberg that much depended on preliminary agreements on the question with the Soviet Union.

Senator Vandenberg reiterated that the whole matter lay at the mercy of an advance agreement with the Soviet Union and Mr. Dulles pointed out that the Soviet Union could make an alliance with other states as well as with its own bloc and thus exert a practical veto power over the whole trusteeship system.

After Senator Vandenberg had stated that the procedure must be cleared and Senator Austin had suggested that the matter should be placed before the Secretary of State, the following decision was taken:

Decision: It was unanimously decided that no attempt should be made to define "states directly concerned" at the present time if it could be avoided.

It was unanimously decided that the Secretary of State should confer with Foreign Minister Molotov regarding the procedure in negotiating and adopting trusteeship agreements as soon as possible, especially as regards leaving the "states directly concerned" unspecified.

Terms of Trusteeship Agreements and Monopolies

Mr. Gerig, in discussing the terms of the draft trusteeship agreements on which differences remain, first took up the question of monopolies in trust territories. He explained that the British, French, and Belgian draft agreements proposed that the administering authority should be entitled to establish general monopolies in the trust territories, if such monopolies were considered to be in the interest of the inhabitants, as provided in Article 76(b) of the Charter. The United States had suggested that if such monopolies were established, they should not only be in the interest of the economic advancement of the inhabitants, but that determination of such interest should be subject to the approval of the Trusteeship Council. The British, French, and Belgian Governments have not agreed to our proposal.

Mr. Villard pointed out that the mandatory powers were opposed to securing the approval of the Trusteeship Council as they felt this would lead to endless delays and, in general, discourage investors.

Mr. Sandifer said that the British argument was that the administering authority should have the right to agree to the establishment of monopolies, loans, etc.

Mr. Bloom stated strongly that complaints against monopolies should go to the Trusteeship Council, while Mrs. Roosevelt expressed concern for the welfare of the inhabitants in the matter. Mr. Stevenson felt that the Department formula was perfectly acceptable. Mr. Dulles, with whom Mrs. Roosevelt expressed her agreement, stated that we should stick to our principles and vote for the prevention of monopolies. Mr. Dulles then proposed the following motion as a substitute for the formula suggested by the Department :

"That the position of the United States Delegation should be that the trusteeship agreements should make no provision for monopolies other than natural or fiscal monopolies or such monopolies as might be approved by the Trusteeship Council as being an application of Article 76 of the Charter."

Decision: The motion was unanimously adopted.

Aviation Rights

Mr. Gerig explained the United States proposal regarding aviation rights which stated that :

"Nothing in this article shall be so construed as to accord traffic rights to aircraft flying into and out of the trust territory, such rights being subject to special agreement between the administering authority and the state whose nationality such aircraft possess."

Senator Connally opposed raising the claims on aviation rights and Mr. Fahy agreed.

Decision: It was voted that the provision which the Department had suggested be added to each trusteeship agreement on aviation rights should be omitted.

Economic and Social Advancement of the Inhabitants of Trust Territories

Mr. Gerig explained that the United States had proposed to the mandatory powers that there be added to their draft trusteeship agreements detailed provisions concerning the economic and social advancement of the inhabitants of the trust territory.

Senator Connally moved that the recommendation of the Department on this subject be approved.

Decision: It was recommended that the United States Delegation should not initiate discussion on the subject of economic and social advancement as stated on pages 14 and 23 of the British draft agreement for Tanganyika (SD/A/C.4/6a) and that if other Members proposed that specific provisions on social matters be included in the trusteeship agreements, the Delegation should act in a negotiating capacity to reach a compromise acceptable to the mandatory power.

Freedom of Information

Mr. Gerig stated that the United States had suggested to the United Kingdom that it would be appropriate to include in trusteeship agreements provisions to facilitate the free interchange of information, but that the British preferred not to include such provisions in the trusteeship agreements in as much as the question was being considered by the Commission on Human Rights with a view to a possible convention on the subject.

Mrs. Roosevelt pointed out that any conference on freedom of information should include such important subjects as movies and radio adding that the United Nations Secretariat had expressed a desire to postpone consideration of this question for one year.

Decision: It was decided to defer consideration of this item for the present.

Responsibility of Administering Authority to the United Nations

Mr. Gerig pointed out that while the British and Australian drafts for Article 2 of the trusteeship agreements have eliminated the phrase that the trusteeship was being administered "on behalf of the United Nations", the Government of the United States wished to indicate that cognizance should be taken of the responsibility of the administering authority to the United Nations. He pointed out that the British feel that such a phrase should be eliminated as unnecessary and as embar-raising to the exercise of the full authority of the administering power in the territory.

Mr. Sandifer expressed the opinion that the British tended, by this reservation, to obscure the nature of the trusteeship system. Mr. Fahy stated that the phrase, although correct, was not essential.

Decision: It was recommended that while not pressing unduly for consideration of this phrase, the Delegation might find it desirable to state our views for the record.

New Zealand and British Requests Not To Amend

He added that the New Zealand and British Governments had requested an undertaking that we would not initiate further amendments at the General Assembly, that we would agree not to support any amendment in substitution which may be proposed by other states.³⁸ Mr. Gerig said it had been made clear that our Delegation could in no way have their hands tied. Mr. Dulles said that although this was true, he hoped the Delegation would confine itself to a minimum of changes.

The Future Status of South West Africa

Mr. Gerig summarized the present position as to the future status of South West Africa by explaining that the United States Government had proposed to the Government of South Africa that a United Nations Commission should be established to investigate the problem of South West Africa and to report to the next session of the General Assembly. He added that the South African Government had replied that it proposed to submit to the General Assembly a statement on the outcome of its consultation with the peoples of South West Africa regarding the future status of the mandated territory, and on the implementation to be given to the wishes thus expressed.

Senator Austin expressed the opinion that it might be unwise to take a position as to the annexation of South West Africa by the Union in view of the fact that we might be forced into the position of having to annex some of the Japanese Mandated Islands in the Pacific.

Mrs. Roosevelt asked for information as to what policy toward annexation we were contemplating in the Pacific and wondered what we were afraid of. She said that although the War and Navy Departments could offer advice, she felt that it was still up to the Department of State and to the President to make a final decision in the matter of annexation taking into account our general interests.

Mr. Dulles stated the opinion that the United States Delegation would be in an embarrassing position unless some declaration of intention regarding the Japanese Mandated Islands were made. He traced the history of internal dissension between the various Departments of this Government which went back as far as the period before Dumbarton Oaks. He requested the Chairman of the Delegation to confer with the President and the Secretary of State on the urgent necessity of making a declaration of intention regarding the Japanese Mandated Islands. The Chairman stated that he would do so.³⁹

Decision: It was decided to defer consideration of this question until conversations on the technical level with the South African Delegation had taken place.⁴⁰

Memorandum of Record, by the Assistant Chief of the Division of British Commonwealth Affairs (Richards)

[WASHINGTON,] October 22, 1946.

At Mr. Hickerson's suggestion I talked to Mr. Reid, First Secretary of the New Zealand Legation, regarding the revised wording of Article X(4) of the new draft trusteeship agreement for Western Samoa.

I informed Mr. Reid that we would go along with the revised wording, and that we would recommend that the Army and the Navy agree, on the understanding that no change in the New Zealand point of view existed and that the New Zealand Government continued to be prepared to enter into discussions with the US, as soon as the trusteeship agreement was approved by the General Assembly, looking toward a bilateral agreement for the joint use of bases in Western Samoa.

Mr. Reid stated that he was sure that there had been no change in this regard, but he would telegraph to Wellington at once for confirmation and would inform me immediately upon the receipt of a reply.

691. GA Secret Summary.

Conversations with U. K. on Trusteeship

In technical level conversations on October 22 on the remaining differences between the U. S. and the U. K. with regard to draft terms of trusteeship for the British African Mandates, it was agreed that, except for the wording of Article 2, which designates the administering authority, and the key question of monopolies, the U. S. would not take the initiative in the GA in raising and pressing substantive amendments on the several points of disagreement still remaining. The U. S. would be free, however, to support proposals by other Delegations in line with the original U. S. position on these several points.⁴¹ This followed the lines of earlier discussions in Washington between the British Embassy and the Department.

With regard to Article 2, both groups agreed to consider a possible wording to the effect that the administering authority is designated "under the international trusteeship system". The U. K. representatives held strong objections to the proposed U. S. wording "on behalf of the United Nations."

The basic remaining difference on the monopolies was whether the prior approval of the Trusteeship Council should be required for the establishment of monopolies in trust territories. The U. K. representatives strongly opposed such a provision largely on the grounds that it would act as an effective bar to the economic development of trust territories and to the general advancement of the inhabitants. No agreement was reached on this point; the discussions will continue tomorrow.

Trusteeship Discussions

Mr. Bloom reported that the Trusteeship Committee of the Delegation had discussed the trusteeship problem for a long time on October 24 but could not come to any conclusion. They felt that until a statement regarding the U.S. position on the Pacific Islands was available, the Delegation could not come to any final decision. He therefore wished to request that the Delegation should send another message to Washington requesting additional instructions on the Pacific problem.

Mr. Dulles concurred with Mr. Bloom and cited the South African question. He pointed out that the Delegation could not have a decision on whether the situation should be investigated because if it were to be proposed that the U.S. annex the mandated islands, then the South African precedent might be used to provide for an inspection.⁴³ On this inspection group might be all the permanent members of the Trusteeship Council. He asked, therefore, how the Navy would like to have Soviet representatives inspecting Pacific Island bases. In other words, he said, the Delegation does not want to be embarrassed. He continued that the question of monopolies was similarly complicated for the reason that the Navy wanted to establish trade monopolies for Americans on Pacific Islands because they thought that if foreigners were allowed in, they would photograph the islands and therefore endanger security.

Mr. Dulles inquired how, if these views of the Navy were correct and were the U.S. Government's position, how the British proposals for a monopoly in Tanganyika could be opposed. The United States was incapable of establishing a position on these questions until the American Pacific Islands position was defined. He said that he and Mr. Bloom were in agreement that the United States practically had to abstain until a directive came from Washington.

Mr. Ross reported that the message which had been sent by the Delegation was being considered in the Department through conversations between Mr. Byrnes, Mr. Forrestal and the President. Apparently no conclusion had been reached yet. Now Mr. Byrnes had gone to South Carolina for two or three days. Mr. Ross said if it was agreeable he would send a further message pointing out that it was the decision of the U.S. Delegation that until the American position on the Pacific Islands was defined that the Delegation could not go to work on the trusteeship question.

Senator Austin inquired whether the Navy had receded from its original position and Mr. Ross said he did not know.

Mr. Bloom inquired whether any consideration had been given to consulting the Chairmen of the Committees of the Senate and House. From what he had heard on the Hill about this question, committees of both Houses were very much interested in the Pacific Islands question.⁴⁴ He thought that if a decision were made without these committees being at least informed, and preferably consulted, that there would be considerable difficulty. He would like to have the Secretary of State informed that the various chairmen of the military committees should be consulted on this question. Senator Austin said he knew that the military committee of the Senate would dig into this subject thoroughly. Mr. Bloom commented that if Mr. Vinson was not given a chance to say something on this question he would be very much displeased.

Senator Austin suggested that there would probably be some more informal work done before Monday and it might be well to reach the respective chairmen by telephone and arrange an appointment on Monday. Mr. Bloom pointed out that the chairmen of the various committees had gone over these questions year after year whereas the Secretaries of State only picked them up at the time they entered office. He said there were many questions to which a great deal of consideration had been given over the years.

Mr. Fahy said he supposed there was a difference between annexation of territories for military bases as provided in a peace treaty and annexation of a mandated territory as was involved in the case of South West Africa. Mr. Dulles pointed out that in this connection consideration was being given only to the mandated islands and it was this on which clearance was needed.

Senator Connally remarked that this was simply because other nations had interests in these islands. Mr. Dulles replied this was the case and that also involved was a substitution of the United Nations for the League of Nations. Mr. Dulles said that if there was an agreement, as he hoped there would be, on a strategic trusteeship for the mandated islands, the Navy was going to be very stringent in what it would accept in the agreement. Mr. Dulles did not want the Delegation tion to be in the position of opposing in someone else's trust agreement what was going to be included in a United States agreement. He emphasized that he and Mr. Bloom were in full agreement on the need for instructions and clarifications of the United States position.

Mr. Reid called at his request to explain the New Zealand position regarding Article X (4) of the revised draft trusteeship agreement for Western Samoa.

Mr. Reid stated that the revised wording represented no change in New Zealand policy as regards future negotiations with the United States and with other members of the British Commonwealth, especially the United Kingdom and Australia, looking toward defense arrangements in the South Pacific. He stated that New Zealand is willing to undertake discussions along such lines at an appropriate time.

Mr. Reid was informed that the revised draft appeared to be acceptable to the Department and that the Army and the Navy would be advised of the changed wording.⁴⁵

255. For Gadel. Urtel 702, Oct. 23. 1. British suggestions to amend Article 10c or to substitute short general statement of principle for ⁴⁵ Approval of the new wording was given by the War Department on October 28 and by the Navy Department on October 29 (two memoranda for the files by Mr. Richards dated October 28 and 29, respectively, File Nos. 811.24590/10-2546).

Final talks between the New Zealand Legation and the Department on the draft trusteeship agreement for Western Samoa took place on October 25 and 28 (memoranda of conversation not printed, File Nos. 890.0146/10-1846 and 890.0146/10-2846, respectively). In the end the main question related to the degree of support on the draft agreement New Zealand could expect from the U.S. Delegation at the General Assembly. Mr. Hiss described the position of the United States as outlined in conversations with representatives of the British Embassy on the same general question, October 11-16 (see memoranda of conversation of even dates, pp. 641-642 and 644-650).

Articles 9 and 10 (telephoned Gerig to Green Oct 28) not satisfactory to Dept.

2. If Gadel considers modification necessary of Dept's original position favoring prior approval of other monopolies by Trusteeship Council, Gadel might suggest version requiring that any proposed monopoly be submitted to Trusteeship Council or its designee and should be considered approved if not disapproved within a specified period such as, for example, 60 days. The latter version would meet British objection that Trusteeship Council approval would unduly delay action and discourage capital from entering area.

3. If not possible to obtain British agreement to version suggested in para. 2, Dept suggests accepting modification of Article 10c proposed by British (urtel 702) if rephrased as follows:

"Where the interests of the economic advancement of the inhabitants of Tanganyika may require it, to establish, or permit to be established, for specific purposes, other monopolies or undertakings having in them an element of monopoly, under conditions of proper public control: provided that, in the selection of any non-governmental agencies to carry out the purposes of this clause, the administering authority shall not discriminate on grounds of nationality against other members of the United Nations; and that in every case in which use is proposed to be made of the powers conferred by this paragraph the administering authority shall report to the Trusteeship Council or its designee for consideration a full explanation of the circumstances and the reasons why the measures proposed to be taken are considered necessary. Such report shall be submitted at least blank days prior to any final decision by the administering authority."

Sixty days might be considered reasonable.

4. Dept aware British objections to prior approval by Trusteeship Council of other monopolies are based on both legal and practical grounds. Dept feels, however, British objection on legal grounds to granting Trusteeship Council right of "approval" could be met under broad scope of Article 87 (d) of Charter of UN by insertion of appropriate provision in trusteeship agreement. Administering authority could legally agree therein to accept "decision" or "recommendation" of Trusteeship Council. Dept willing not to force issue on legal authority being granted Council in trusteeship agreement and believes wording in para. 2 should satisfy British practical objections.

5. British experts' suggested alternate proposal to consolidate detailed provisions of Articles 9 and 10 into single statement of general principle appears even more undesirable than the mandate provisions and is subject to uncertain interpretation.⁴⁶

Memorandum of Conversation, Between Members of the United States and Soviet Delegations to the United Nations

SECRET

[NEW YORK,] October 31, 1946.

Participants: Mr. Gromyko, Mr. Novikov, Mr. Stein, of the Soviet Delegation
Mr. Bloom, Mr. Dulles, Mr. Yost, Mr. Gerig

At our invitation, the Soviet Delegates took lunch with us today at the University Club to consider various questions which we thought might arise in the trusteeship discussions at the Assembly. As we had not had any reply from Mr. Gromyko to the memorandum which was handed to him by Mr. Johnson and Mr. Gerig on October 15,⁴⁷ we thought it advisable to follow up on this matter and to discuss any other matters which might be of interest to the two Delegations.

Mr. Bloom asked Mr. Dulles to state some of the questions which particularly interested us. Mr. Dulles said that we might start by considering the views which we respectively held on the best way to consider the draft trusteeship agreements in the Fourth Committee. He thought it would be necessary, in any case, to have a Subcommittee and the question arose as to the size and composition of this Subcommittee.

Mr. Gromyko said that it would be desirable to have a rather small Subcommittee and Mr. Novikov added that it would be good to have a few days of general discussion by the whole Committee based on the Secretary-General's report as to these trusteeship agreements.

Mr. Dulles then suggested that the Subcommittee might well be composed of about ten states, somewhat on the pattern of the projected Trusteeship Council. Mr. Gerig suggested that perhaps the Rapporteur of the Committee might be added and that the question might also arise as to whether the Subcommittee should be composed exactly as the Trusteeship Council, since that might prejudice the election of two or three of the states that might later be considered for election to the Trusteeship Council. It was generally agreed that such a Subcommittee composed generally along these lines would be desirable.

Mr. Dulles then suggested that the Committee might be composed posals and counter-proposals passed back and forth between the U.S. and U.K. experts on this question in the latter part of October. There is further a memorandum of conversation of October 30 recording an exchange of some length that took place on that date between Messrs. Gerig and Poynton in which the situation as of that time was carefully explored, not printed. It is clear from the latter document that despite very active efforts by the technical experts on both sides that at least a temporary impasse had been reached. (IO Files, documents US/A/C.4/8 and US/A/C.4/9) of the five permanent members of the Trusteeship Council, the other states submitting trust agreements if they are not among the five, and that would leave two or so to be added.

Mr. Gromyko thought that if the Rapporteur was Czechoslovakia, that would account for one, and that one of the Arab states might be another. Mr. Novikov suggested India, but Mr. Gromyko did not feel that that would necessarily be a wise selection.

Mr. Gromyko then raised the question of what our view was concerning "states directly concerned".

Mr. Dulles said that they were familiar with our view, as stated in the memorandum, namely, that we hope it will be possible for all to agree on a simple procedure by which a formally signed agreement by certain states will not be necessary. He thought this was entirely feasible if we could get a Subcommittee composed as suggested before since this would give each of the five powers ample opportunity to make further suggestions or amendments. He added that the United States, as they well knew, had already made a number of suggestions to the mandatory powers and that some of these suggestions were included in the revised drafts.

Mr. Gromyko said that it was difficult to see how Article 79 could be interpreted as not requiring a formal agreement by certain states directly concerned. Then after the formal agreement was concluded, it would be necessary under Article 81 for the Assembly to approve such an agreement.

Mr. Dulles said that that was undoubtedly one possible procedure and that we had, ourselves, at one time felt along the same line. More recently, however, we felt that another procedure would be equally valid and we felt strongly that it would be necessary to adopt a simpler procedure if we were to get a Trusteeship Council at all this year. We certainly did not wish to do anything which was contrary to the Charter, but felt our proposal was entirely consistent with the Charter.

Mr. Bloom said that if we have a formally signed agreement, the question might arise as to completing such a formal agreement by some form of ratification and that this would certainly take some time. When Mr. Novikov said that an executive agreement might be sufficient, Mr. Bloom said that even an executive agreement in our system requires a joint resolution of Congress, that Congress is not now in session, and that such a procedure would certainly delay the establishment of the Trusteeship Council. Mr. Bloom added that a Subcommittee composed as previously suggested would, in Parliamentary practice, be entirely feasible since all the members could indicate their position in the Subcommittee and the report could be made on behalf of all of them.

Mr. Gromyko then asked Mr. Dulles to reply to a specific question, namely, whether the United States would consider that the Five Powers were "states directly concerned" in all mandated territories.

Mr. Dulles asked Mr. Gerig if we have a position on this general question as to who might be regarded as "states directly concerned" in case it came to a vote.

Mr. Gerig said that he thought our position was that if it became necessary to specify "states directly concerned" it would have to be done by a vote of the General Assembly, probably by a two-thirds vote. He said he did not know if we had a definite position because we had hoped the question would not arise. But he thought that we felt that the Five Powers, because of their special position on the Trusteeship Council as well as the Security Council might be in a position to put forward special claims to be states concerned in the draft trusteeship agreements which would be brought before this session of the Assembly. Mr. Yost said that that was also his impression.

Mr. Dulles said that that was also his impression and that we would try to give them a more definite reply if they desired it, which they did.

Mr. Dulles said that they knew, of course, that the United States has a special treaty position which was different from that of the Soviet Union and China, namely, that the United States was one of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers in whose favor the mandated territories had been renounced by Germany at the end of the First World War. He said that this was not necessarily a special position that we would emphasize, but he thought it should be mentioned.

Mr. Stein said he thought the Treaty of Versailles mentioned "Allied and Associated Powers" and not "Principal Allied and Associated Powers". Mr. Gerig said that he was quite certain that the word "Principal" stood in the text and Mr. Stein acknowledged that Mr. Gerig was probably right.

Mr. Stein then said that, in their view, the terms proposed by the mandatory powers were very inadequate and unsatisfactory. Mr. Dulles said that we also regarded them in their original form as quite inadequate but that he thought the revised drafts which were not yet in circulation would be found to be much better. As he had said before, the United States had made a number of suggestions, many of which were accepted, and it was on that account that we felt they were substantially pretty good, although they were capable of some improvement.

The discussion was friendly and cordial throughout. The Soviet Delegation did not, however, give a clear indication that they were yet ready to accept the simplified procedure which we suggested. It did, however, appear that their first objective was to be classified in relation to all trust territories as a "state directly concerned" and that to get this they might make some concessions.⁴⁸

[WASHINGTON,] November 1, 1946.

Participants: Mr. John Foster Dulles—Gadel
 Mr. John C. Ross—Gadel
 Mr. Alger Hiss

After the morning meeting in Mr. Acheson's office I called Mr. Dulles and Mr. Gerig and told them of the decisions which had been reached as a result of consideration of New York's telegram 741 of October 31, 9 p. m.⁴⁹ I explained that it was the Department's position that in the event our proposal is not accepted that claims to be states directly concerned in trusteeship agreements be waived by all other interested member states for the purposes of the present Assembly, we should take the position that the Assembly should refuse to designate any except the respective mandatories as being states directly concerned. I added that this meant we would vote against any proposal for a general formula which included additional states directly concerned and against any motions recognizing individual states as directly concerned. I explained that the Department felt that this was a justifiable interpretation of the ambiguous language of the Charter and I pointed out that neither at San Francisco nor at London had it been possible to arrive at an agreement of what states should be regarded as directly concerned or upon any principles for determining this question. I pointed out that it can be argued that under Article 77 (1) (c) a sovereign voluntarily agreeing to place some of its territory under trusteeship would presumably be the only state directly concerned. If the general language of the Charter can mean this in such a case it can mean it also in the case of mandates. I said that the Department felt that if a number of states, including the Soviet Union, were to be recognized as states directly concerned there was every likelihood that no agreements would be approved certainly at this Assembly and that the trusteeship system would be further indefinitely delayed. I added that the Department felt that there would probably be widespread support among the smaller powers in as much as our proposal meant resistance against extension of the veto power in the trusteeship field and in the General Assembly. We thought that the mandatory states should be able to accept our point of view for the reason that by the power they unquestionably have to refuse to adopt unacceptable suggestions of the Assembly they can by their own commitments to states they consider directly concerned give these other states all the protection they would have if they were so designated by the Assembly itself. I added that no decision had been reached by the Department as to the position we would take if despite our opposition one or more states were to be designated as directly concerned in any particular agreement. We might at that time decide to assert our own claims in view of the decision of the Assembly, a decision which we would regard as unwise but as necessarily changing the situation confronting us. Of course, if despite our opposition a general formula was passed which included us, and we doubt the likelihood of any formula which would exclude us being adopted, then we would accept the decision of the Assembly and regard ourselves as being a state directly concerned.

Mr. Dulles told me that he found himself substantially in agreement with the Department's point of view. He feels that the Russians are planning a campaign of obstruction to the proposed agreements. They have indicated they will emphasize the need for provisions looking toward early independence which would be unacceptable to the mandatory powers. If the Russians have a veto right they would then be able to prevent the establishment of the trusteeship system. Mr. Dulles said that he was inclined to feel that although the establishment of the trusteeship system is important, that establishment is really of less substantive importance than is the propaganda issue which the Russians are raising about what states are really the defenders of the dependent peoples. He said that once the trusteeship agreements were approved there will be relatively little of substance which the Trusteeship Council will itself accomplish and, as in the case of the mandate system, the administering powers will be responsible in fact for what goes on in their territories. He regards Chapter 11, which relates to dependent territories generally and of course covers a far greater area of the world's surface and a far greater population group than does the trusteeship system, as more important than the trusteeship system itself. He indicated that he was anxious that we not get in a position of appearing to rush through the Assembly against Russian opposition agreements which are satisfactory to colonial powers. He said he thought the Russians would try to class us with the colonial powers.

Mr. Dulles said that as a lawyer he cannot conscientiously argue strongly for the Department's interpretation of the Charter. In his opinion the language, by using the phrase "the states directly concerned, including the mandatory powers in the case of territories held under mandate", means at least a group larger than the respective mandatory states. However, he agrees with the practicable reasons for urging the Assembly to avoid determining that any state other than the respective mandatories are directly concerned. He said that he would wish promptly to talk to the Russians and the mandatory states on the basis of the Department's views and that perhaps after that had been completed he might wish to come down to confer on the whole matter with the Department. I pointed out that Mr. Cohen would be in New York by Sunday or Monday and suggested that Mr. Dulles and Mr. Gerig keep in touch with him.

Mr. Gerig told me that in recent talks with the British the British have indicated more sympathy than heretofore with our suggestion that the Charter be interpreted as including only the mandatory with respect to each trust territory. He thought that in view of these recent indications it might be possible to get the British to go along with us. Mr. Dulles doubted this and was not at all sure that we could avoid having a number of states designated. He said that the possibilities for logrolling in this connection are evident and said that he was sure that the Russian group of states and the Arab states would oppose our position. He thought it possible also that Chile and perhaps some other Latin American states would do the same. If the mandatories also opposed us, the possibilities for action contrary to our views would be considerable. Moreover it takes only one-third plus one to block the approval of a trusteeship agreement itself.

principle of interpretation inconsistent with this view and would also vote against the designation of any individual member state, other than the mandatory in each case, as a state directly concerned. Department considers the Charter can appropriately so be construed and feels strongly that this is the only practicable interpretation if the issue is forced on the Assembly. Any other interpretation would be an unnecessary extension of the veto principle which has no place in the deliberations of the General Assembly.

It seems to us that the mandatory powers should be willing not to oppose us on this issue for the reason that it leaves open to each mandatory the privilege of consulting such other states as it desires and refusing to give its consent to any amendment proposed by the General Assembly which it is unable to agree to or which is unacceptable to any of the states the mandatory may itself consider bound to regard as states directly concerned.

In the event, which the Department considers unlikely, that the Assembly should nonetheless designate one or more particular states as directly concerned in any given trusteeship agreement, Department will consider position the United States should take with respect to possible assertion by it of a right to be similarly designated as a state directly concerned. Our present position is that we are prepared to waive for the purposes of the present Assembly our claims to be a state directly concerned and we urge all other member states to do likewise. If this appeal is rejected by any member we urge the Assembly to refuse to designate any state other than the respective mandatories. If, nonetheless, the Assembly does proceed to designate one or more additional states as directly concerned we will have to consider our own position as a possible claimant in the light of such action, which we will consider unwise, by the Assembly.

EFFECTS OF THE CONCLUSION OF TRUSTEESHIP AGREEMENTS ON UNITED STATES CONVENTIONS WITH THE MANDATORY POWERS

ship system of the United Nations suggests the need for a careful consideration of the future status of the conventions between the United States and the respective Mandatory Powers. In view of the fact that the United States Delegation to the forthcoming meeting of the General Assembly will probably be called upon to indicate approval or disapproval of draft terms of trusteeship for each of the "B" Mandates, decisions on the following questions should be reached by this Government prior to the opening of the General Assembly:

1. If terms of trusteeship for the "B" Mandates should be presented, as is now contemplated, to the General Assembly by the Mandatory Powers after consultation with the particularly interested states rather than as formal agreements to which the United States and other states directly concerned would be parties, and if the General Assembly should approve these terms, what would be the status of the conventions between the United States and the Mandatory Powers?

2. If the Delegation should vote for the approval of terms of trusteeship for a territory now covered by one of the United States conventions with the Mandatory Powers, would such an affirmative vote constitute the "assent" of the United States to modification of the terms of mandate within the meaning of the provision which is included in each of these conventions in the following sense:

"Nothing contained in the present convention shall be affected by any modification which may be made in the terms of the mandate, as recited above, unless such modification shall have been assented to by the United States".

3. If the answer to Question 2 is in the affirmative, would this imply that the conventions with the Mandatory Powers would, in effect, be supplanted by the terms of trusteeship for the various trust territories?

4. Does it appear advisable to take specific steps to either continue in force the conventions with the Mandatory Powers or to terminate these conventions? If so, what procedures might be followed?

DISCUSSION

[Here follows detailed discussion of the problem with particular attention to the nature of American rights in the mandates and the effect of the replacement of the terms of the mandates by the terms of the proposed trusteeship agreements.]

The Assent Clause

As indicated above, if the United States Delegation to the General Assembly should vote for the approval of terms of trusteeship for a territory now covered by a convention with the Mandatory Power, such an affirmative vote would constitute the assent of the United States to modification of the terms of mandate within the meaning of the provision included in each one of these conventions. It is difficult to see how the United States could approve terms of trusteeship, and at the same time maintain that it was not assenting to a modification of the terms of mandate. It is believed that such an exercise of the assent clause is also valid in terms of our domestic constitutional law. The conventions do not specify how the assent is to be given. It may also be pointed out, that during the period of active operation of the mandates system, the United States acting through the Department of State on several occasions gave its assent to modifications of the terms of mandate. In international discussions involving the assent clause, the United States has never taken the position that the assent of the United States involved anything else than an expression of the Executive Branch. Moreover, by its consent to ratification of the Charter the Senate plainly endorsed the trusteeship system under which, by Article 77, it is expressly envisaged that the mandates may be placed. The Senate insisted on no reservations as to the mandates conventions and asserted no special prerogatives with respect to trusteeship agreements for the territories under mandate.⁵²

1. If United States Delegation votes in favor of the terms of trusteeship for the "B" Mandates, the rights of the United States and its nationals will depend upon the terms of trusteeship rather than upon the terms of mandate as specified by the conventions with the Mandatory Powers.

2. If United States Delegation votes in favor of the terms of trusteeship, this will constitute the assent of the United States to modification of the terms of mandate.

3. If United States Delegation votes in favor of the terms of trusteeship, the conventions with the Mandatory Powers will, in effect, be supplemented [supplanted?] by the terms of trusteeship for the various trust territories.

4. If the United States Delegation votes against the terms of trusteeship and if the terms of trusteeship do not enter into force, the rights of the United States and its nationals under the conventions with the Mandatory Powers are continued.

5. If the United States Delegation votes against the terms of ⁵² It may be noted that this discussion is without reference to the Japanese Mandated Islands. In December the Legal Adviser's office began a detailed study as to what form of Congressional approval was required for the U.S. draft trusteeship agreement for the Japanese Mandated Islands or any Japanese islands that might be included in the strategic trust territory.

trusteeship and if the terms of trusteeship nevertheless enter into force, it would probably be legally impossible for the United States successfully to maintain that such of its previous rights under the conventions which are inconsistent with the terms of trusteeship are still in force. The United States would, of course, have all the rights under the trusteeship agreements of a Member of the United Nations.

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. If the United States Delegation votes in favor of the terms of trusteeship for the "B" Mandates, no specific action to terminate the conventions with the Mandatory Powers seems necessary. It is unnecessary because, if the terms of trusteeship come into force, they will supplant the terms of mandate and the United States' rights will be adjusted accordingly.

2. If the United States Delegation does not approve the terms of trusteeship for the "B" Mandates and if these terms do not go into force, no action with regard to the conventions is required. In such a circumstance, the rights of the United States and its nationals under the conventions would be retained.

3. If the United States Delegation votes against the terms of trusteeship and if these terms nevertheless enter into force, it would seem politically undesirable and probably legally impossible for the United States to seek to maintain such of its rights under the convention as may be inconsistent with the terms of trusteeship. The United States should accept a two-thirds vote of the General Assembly approving terms of trusteeship as binding and should regard its previous rights as having been adjusted accordingly. For the reason given under paragraph 1 above, it should not, however, take steps to terminate the conventions.

"The United States is prepared to place under trusteeship with the United States as the administering authority, the Japanese Mandated Islands and any Japanese Islands for which it assumes responsibilities as a result of the second World War. In so far as the Japanese Mandated Islands are concerned this Government is transmitting for information to the other members of the Security Council and to New Zealand and the Philippines a draft of a strategic area trusteeship agreement which sets forth the terms upon which this Government is prepared to place those islands under trusteeship.⁵³ At an early date we plan to submit this draft agreement formally to the Security Council for its approval".⁵⁴

In accordance with this announcement I have sent this morning to the missions of the other members of the Security Council and of New Zealand and the Philippines, for the information of their Governments, copies of the draft trusteeship agreement under which our Government is prepared to place the Japanese Mandated Islands under trusteeship. Copies of the draft agreement will be forwarded to the Delegation which may be made available to other Delegations, the press, and the public.

I suggest that at an appropriate time you read the President's announcement into the records of the General Assembly or of its Fourth Committee.

Editorial Note

On November 7 the United States representative on the Fourth Committee, Mr. Dulles, reading President Truman's statement of November 6, announced to the Committee that the United States was prepared to place under trusteeship with the United States as the administering authority the Japanese mandated islands and any Japanese islands for which it might assume responsibilities as a result of World War II. This declaration was accompanied by a general statement to the Committee (approved by the Department in telegram 269, November 5, not printed, File No. 800.014/11-446) outlining the position of the United States regarding the establishment of a trusteeship system with particular reference to the implementation of Article 79 of the Charter.

After describing the problems involved in attempting a definition of the term "States directly concerned", Mr. Dulles continued:

"In the light of these considerations the United States Delegation urges that the Assembly, and this committee on its behalf, should not become involved in all these questions. We prefer a practical procedure which, in harmony with the letter and spirit of the Charter, will, as quickly as possible, permit the establishment of the trusteeship system and the giving to the inhabitants of the trust territories the benefit of that system. Concretely, we propose:

"1. That a small sub-committee of this committee should be established to consider the draft trusteeship agreements before us and to negotiate on our behalf in relation to them;

⁵³ Notes not printed. For text of the draft trusteeship agreement, see Department of State Bulletin, November 17, 1946, pp. 889 ff.

⁵⁴ The text of this announcement is printed, ibid., p. 889.

"2. That all states which are interested be given the opportunity promptly to submit to this sub-committee and to the mandatory power involved their suggestions regarding these proposed trusteeship agreements;

"3. That after hearing such suggestions and after consultation with the sub-committee, the mandatory power concerned shall promptly advise the sub-committee as to the acceptability of those suggestions;

"4. That the agreements reflecting any such modifications shall then be considered by this committee and referred by it to the General Assembly with the recommendation of this committee, in each case, as to approval or disapproval.

"Under this procedure", Mr. Dulles went on, "every state which is interested, whether or not technically a state 'directly concerned', whether it be large or small, whether it be near or far, will have an equal opportunity to present its views. All would, however, without prejudice to any rights they may possess, now forego formal classification as being, or not being, states 'directly concerned' and would forego formal signature of the preliminary agreement, accepting the verdict of a two-thirds vote of the Assembly." (United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, Second Part, Fourth Committee, Part I, p. 76. Hereafter cited as GA (I/2), Fourth Committee, Pt. I. Text of the complete Dulles statement on this occasion is found in Department of State Bulletin, December 1, 1946, pages 991 ff.)

Because of the wide range of subjects under consideration by the Fourth Committee at this time (there were three other items on the Committee's agenda in addition to eight proposed trusteeship agreements), the Fourth Committee on November 14 appointed two sub-committees, Sub-Committee 1 taking over the trusteeship agreements as its sole concern. Sub-Committee 1 organized itself on November 15, and immediately began examination of the agreement proposed by New Zealand for Western Samoa. The summary record of this sub-committee is found in United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, Second Part, Fourth Committee, Part II. Memorandum of Conversation, by Mr. Charles W. Yost of the United States Delegation

[NEW YORK,] November 7, 1946.

In the course of a conversation yesterday afternoon I asked Mr. Gromyko whether his Delegation had given further consideration to the suggested procedure for dealing with the question of "states directly concerned" which had been transmitted to them in an aide-mémoire a few days ago and which Mr. Dulles had explained more fully at our recent luncheon. Mr. Gromyko said that his Delegation is still studying this question. He felt, however, that it would be extremely difficult for them to accept the US proposal in view of the Soviet belief that the terms of Article 79 of the Charter require formally signed agreements among the "states directly concerned".

Mr. Gromyko asked whether we had given further consideration to the question he had raised at our luncheon as to whether the United States believes that the five principal powers are "states directly concerned" in all of the trusteeship agreements which have been presented. I replied that it is precisely because we feel that an attempt to define this term will lead to endless controversy and debate, and I cited the Indian claim to be a "state directly concerned" in the Tanganyika agreement, that we were proposing a procedure which would avoid this difficulty and enable the Assembly to set up the Trusteeship Council at this session. I pointed out that our procedure would accord to the Soviet Union, as well as to ourselves and to any other state which might consider itself directly concerned, ample opportunity to present its views to the proposed subcommittee, to the full committee and to the Assembly. Mr. Gromyko continued, however, to contest the constitutionality of our procedure and concluded our conversation by stating that, while it was, of course, most desirable to set up the Trusteeship Council as soon as possible, it would nevertheless be better not to do so at all, than to do so on an unsound constitutional basis and by virtue of trusteeship agreements which may not be satisfactory to all the "states directly concerned".

⁵⁷ The reference is to Clair Wilcox, Director of the Office of International Trade Policy in the Department and at this time Chairman of the United States Delegation to the Preparatory Committee for the International Trade and Employment Conference then meeting in London (for documentation regarding this subject, see pp. 1263 ff.). As a result of the Department's action there ensued an exchange of telegrams between the Department and Mr. Wilcox which extended over a period from November 8 to November 21 (telegram 7623, November 8, to London, File No. 560.AL/11-1346; telegram 9843, November 13, from London, File No. 560.AL/11-3446; telegram 7768, November 18, to London, File No. 560.AL/11-1346; and telegram 9653, November 21, from London, File No. 560.AL/11-2146).

The premise stated by the Department in initiating the exchange in telegram 7623, November 8, was that "British intransigence may be due to policy being shaped by Colonial Office. Latter appears unaffected by recent willingness other branches British Government including FonOff to subscribe to anti-monopoly principles." Mr. Wilcox was requested to discuss the matter "with such other officials", and in the same telegram was given a rather detailed background survey of the principal developments to date. (560.AL/11-1346)

The talks conducted by Mr. Wilcox in London in effect elicited no more than what was already known, namely that informally "no strong objections" to the United States position were entertained by the Foreign Office, but that formally the Foreign Office preferred to leave the question of the economic clauses of the trusteeship agreements "entirely" with the British Delegation to the General As-

(1). Manus Island. Evatt insisted that he discussed this question with Secretary Byrnes in presence of Messrs. Hickerson and Searls, though he does not say just when this occurred last July nor exactly what was agreed upon, if anything. He expressed desire for arrangements for mutual use of facilities there and for discussion as to financing same, saying that, to satisfy his Parliament, Australia must have arrangements for at least token right for mutual use of facilities in at least one American base.

(2). New Guinea trusteeship agreement. Evatt expressed feeling that suggested American revisions were altogether too elaborate, and, as such, would lead to future complications; that Australia could not agree to most of them. He desired agreement along broad lines. He felt that suggested revisions simply reiterate obligations in UN Charter which had already been accepted in letter and spirit by Australia and were therefore redundant and in one or two cases, notably anti-slavery clause, even insulting to Australia. He said that Australia would prefer to go on under the old pre-charter arrangement rather than accept most of the suggested revisions to the New Guinea trusteeship agreement. He pointed out that the Australian attitude in the New Guinea trusteeship agreement was in line with recent US attitude re the Marshalls, Carolines and Marianas which Australia was prepared to support. As regards "states directly concerned" he said Australia did not oppose regarding USA as one such, mentioning inferentially that USA based its claim to be such on rights acquired in the Versailles and other treaties. He expressed formally his belief that all trusteeship agreements should be submitted to all states directly concerned, though in each case their special interests must be as certain dand [garble] weighed, and he said that as regards the New Guinea agreement Russia had not been consulted as not being considered a state directly concerned. "USA is striving to retain former Jap islands in Pacific to set up powerful bases to maintain very strong Pacific fleet. What has brought this about? American military circles explain it by necessity for national defense; only simpletons can believe that construction of bases thousands of kilometers from US frontiers can be dictated by interests of national defense.

Admiral Sherman revealed true idea of American measures. He recently stated 'if we control oceans our frontier will run along coasts of other countries . . . we can attack any target within radius of action of our air forces and other arms located on board our ships'. Thus Admiral Sherman openly admits US imperialist aspirations, and they are far from constituting interests of defense.

Above cited facts illuminate present US Pacific policy and reflect views of influential business and military circles, proponents of militarism and imperialism who prefer power politics to policy of international collaboration. Draft agreement now advanced by US for trusteeship over former Jap mandated islands is only part of general US policy in Pacific bases. Trusteeship Agreements

Mr. Dulles continued that in Subcommittee I of Committee IV they were going through the draft trusteeship agreements in detail. The United States had a lot of fine suggestions but he had found that they were not included in the Pacific islands draft. He assumed that he should not press for inclusion in other trust agreements provisions that the United States would not accept in our agreements. Senator

Connally objected that this was exactly what he had had in mind when he had spoken earlier.⁶² Mr. Dulles gave as an example that the United States wished to introduce a statement that the administering authority was administering "on behalf of the United Nations". Also it was proposed to amend the statement that the trust territory could be administered "as an integral part of" the administering state to read "as if it were an integral part." However, this was not desired by other governments and the United States did not have this in its agreements because the Navy would not agree to it.

Mrs. Roosevelt said that if we thought certain things would improve matters for other nations and we thought that those things should be included in our agreements, then the Delegation had a responsibility to press its views. She said that she thought a significant remark had been made at a recent Delegation meeting when it was observed that we could disarm ourselves through our own people more quickly than any other way. She thought the way to do that was to give the impression that the military group in our own government was affecting policy decisions. She thought this impression would be given by United States action in this trusteeship matter. She thought that if the Delegation believed that it was right and good to have certain matters in other agreements, then it had an obligation to try to have those provisions agreed upon for ourselves. Mrs. Douglas said she wanted to support Mrs. Roosevelt because she was afraid that to hold back in this matter might wreck the United Nations.

Mr. Gerig thought that the difference between the strategic and non-strategic drafts was so great that a case could be made for presenting certain revisions in the non-strategic drafts. For example, we could press the case of a provision against monopolies, arguing against differential treatment and still not embarrass ourselves in regard to our strategic area draft. He thought that the provision for administration on behalf of the United Nations was of secondary importance and might be dropped.

⁶² The Delegation had just finished a discussion of the Fourth Committee's work regarding the proposal of the Government of South Africa to incorporate the mandated territory of South West Africa into the Union of South Africa. Describing opposition in the Committee to the South African proposal, Mr. Dulles indicated his desire to develop a moderate resolution under the sponsorship of the United States in order to head off the introduction of a resolution by India or Egypt "violently condemnatory" of South Africa, for in such a contingency "the United States would be in the position of having to vote for or against an extreme resolution". Mr. Dulles pointed out to the Delegation that "The United States' position was particularly delicate because the South Africans were taking the same position that the United States was taking in regard to the mandated Pacific islands, namely, that if the trusteeship proposal were turned down, the United States would hold on to them as a de facto matter. This was essentially what the Union of South Africa proposed." Shortly thereafter Senator Connally emphasized that "we must be very careful what was said in this connection because the United States potentially faced the same position." (US/A/M (Chr)/24) (For deliberations in the Fourth Committee on the question of South West Africa, see GA (I/2), Fourth Committee, Pt. I., pp. 62-180, passim; the work of Sub-Committee 2 which handled the question may be found ibid., Pt. III, pp. 41-82, passim.)

Mr. Dulles said that he thought it was fundamental whether we administered the islands in our own right or on behalf of the United Nations, and also whether the territories should be administered as an integral part of the United States. On both points he understood that the Delegation's hands were tied because the Navy refused to make any agreements that contained such language.

Mrs. Roosevelt observed that the Navy was thinking only of the interests of the Navy in this matter. She thought the Delegation had to think of how the people of the country would feel.

Senator Austin asked Mr. Dulles whether he thought it would be helpful to bring out the fact that United States' policy was to keep the territories under strategic area agreements only until the security system of the United Nations was established.

Mr. Dulles said he would be delighted to be able to put forward such a statement for it would clear the air greatly. He said that he had planned to put forward a statement in connection with the Indian proposal⁶⁸ containing a delicate hint to the same effect and that he might now consider changing it. However, he was not sure, nor was Mr. Cohen, that such a statement would be cleared in Washington. He said he thought it would have a great beneficial effect if Senator Austin's suggestion could be put forward.

Senator Austin said he had had a talk with General Romulo about this question on the previous evening. He had found the Philippines violently opposed to the United States position on the Japanese islands. When he had told General Romulo, however, that the strategic aspects would last only until the security system of the United Nations was established, Romulo said that would make all the difference in the world. Senator Austin thought that this fresh and unselfish reaction was typical and important.

Mr. Dulles queried whether such a statement could be made. He said it was his understanding that the Navy had yielded on the trusteeship question with the understanding that there would be no further dilution of the United States' position. Senator Austin said he would make a special effort to get this position cleared.

Mr. Dulles pointed out that at present the situation was reversed from that in London where the United States was lined up against imperialism. Now the United States was lined up with the colonial powers, the United Kingdom, France, Belgium and South Africa. He thought that on this side of the fence the United States would not carry abroad. Mrs. Douglas added that it would not carry at home either.

Memorandum by Mr. Charles P. Noyes, Adviser on Security Council Matters to the United States Delegation to the United Nations

SECRET

[NEW YORK,] November 25, 1946.

MEETING ON TRUSTEESHIP
HELD IN MR. HERSCHEL JOHNSON'S OFFICE AT 10 A. M.

Present: Mr. Herschel V. Johnson, Charles P. Noyes, Gordon Knox, Joseph E. Johnson, Harding Bancroft, Hugh Borton and James Green ⁶⁴

The meeting examined the proposed trusteeship agreement for the Japanese Mandated Islands, article by article, in connection with the draft commentary ⁶⁵ supplied by the State Department.

Preamble. It was agreed that the questions raised by the preamble were very delicate and were likely to be questioned most seriously by the Security Council. Several problems arose:

(1) Under what authority is the United States proposing this trust agreement?

(2) Is it possible to contend that the United States is the only "state directly concerned"?

(3) What is the United States position to be if Russia, for example, insists that it is a state directly concerned and that its signature is necessary before any trust agreement may be submitted to the Security Council?

In regard to question (1) it was agreed that the United States position is that as military occupant it is entitled to propose to the Security ⁶⁴ Messrs. Knox, J. E. Johnson, Bancroft, Borton, and Green were, respectively, Assistant to the Acting United States Representative at the United Nations (Johnson), Chief of the Division of International Security Affairs, Associate Chief of the Division of International Security Affairs, Chief of the Division of Japanese Affairs, and Associate Chief of the Division of Dependent Area Affairs.

⁶⁵ Not found attached to file copy. The document before the group for discussion was one of several drafts prepared in the Department of State between November 20, 1946 and February 18, 1947 as a commentary on the United States draft trusteeship agreement for the Japanese mandated islands. This was for the use of the Acting United States Representative when the Security Council undertook consideration of the draft terms and provided an interpretation of each article of the draft agreement. For nonconfidential excerpts from the final version, see Department of State Bulletin, March 9, 1947, pp. 420 ff.

Council a trust agreement in regard to these Islands. It is recognized that the United States must in some way overcome the contention that until the Peace Conference recognizes United States legal rights to these territories, it is inappropriate for the United States to submit a trust agreement to the Security Council.

As to question (2), Mr. Green indicated that the Department's present position in the Assembly is that only "the mandatory power" should be considered a state directly concerned within the meaning of the Charter. This gives rise to real difficulties because the United States certainly cannot contend that it is in the same position as a mandatory power exercising its mandate under the authority of the League of Nations. It was agreed that this difficulty would be studied in the Department. Whatever the technical difficulties involved, it is clear that the best argument we have for obtaining the agreement of other states that the procedure we have followed is appropriate is that the Big Five already have a veto power in the Security Council and that they therefore should not insist on a separate and additional veto power in connection with being a state directly concerned. It was also indicated, however, that if the U.S.S.R. was anxious, as it probably would be, to use this trusteeship question as a bargaining weapon, they were quite likely to insist on their position as a state directly concerned. It was also agreed that while the question was still open in the Assembly, the U.S.S.R. would certainly insist on its technical position because of the precedent involved. It was hoped that the Assembly decision on this question would be reached before it was necessary to have consultations in regard to the Japanese Mandated Islands so that we would be in a position to be guided by the Assembly's decision.

As to question (3), it was felt that if the Russians took a firm position that they were a state directly concerned, we would have to go back to the Department for further instructions. In any case, we were in no hurry to have the Security Council accept our proposed agreement. Our main purpose was to make our intentions known that we would place these Islands under trusteeship rather than annex them. Now that that has been accomplished by the President's statement, our main purpose was to obtain the Security Council's agreement to a trusteeship agreement satisfactory to the United States. Our approach should not be "take it or leave it now"; our approach should be that if the Security Council is unwilling to agree to our proposal at this time we are entirely willing to postpone its consideration, if necessary until the Peace Treaty with Japan has settled the strategic problems of the Pacific.

Article 1. It was agreed that the territory under trust is limited to the Islands with their territorial waters, presumably the three-mile limit, together with the column of air above this area.

Article 2. No problems.

Article 3. It was reported by the newspapers that Mr. Dulles had supported a proposal to take out of the trusteeship agreement for Western Samoa now before the Assembly the words in Article 3 "as an integral part of" New Zealand. Mr. Green indicated that Gerig had told him that Mr. Dulles had not supported this but had abstained from voting. In any case, the United States has taken the position in the case of other trusteeship agreements that the words should be "as if it were an integral part of". Therefore, we shall doubtless be confronted with this inconsistency. Mr. Borton indicated that the Navy had been requested to consider a possible revision to the "as if" language but up to date had insisted on the present language. He also indicated that the Navy would resist the deletion of the words "as an integral part". It was made clear, however, that it was not intended by these words to imply that sovereignty over the territory is vested in the United States.

Article 4. Mr. Green explained that it was the contention of the State Department that in the case of a strategic trust the objectives of the international trusteeship system were limited to "the people of the trust territory" in accordance with Article 83 (2) as contrasted with the territory itself in the case of nonstrategic trusts. The Department felt that this had been done intentionally with the purpose of limiting the obligations to paragraphs (76) a. b. and c. of the Charter and excluding d. He did not know whether there was any history at San Francisco to support this position. It was agreed that this matter would be looked into in the Department as it might be a difficult contention to make without some such support. This contention is important in connection with Article 8 of the agreement.

Article 5. It was pointed out that the last sentence of the Department's comment under this point had been carefully worded and took into consideration the Navy's views. Mr. Joseph Johnson did not like the second "if" clause in this sentence. It was pointed out that it might also be a good plan to state categorically that the United States does not propose to exclude consideration of the armed forces, assistance and facilities set forth in this article when the time comes for considering special agreements under Article 43 of the Charter. Mr. Borton indicated that he thought the Navy considered the proposed bases in the Japanese Mandated Islands as similar in all ways to its other bases insofar as Article 43 was concerned. It was generally felt that the more specific the United States could be on this point, giving general assurances, the better our position would be.

Article 6. It was pointed out that in the fourth line of paragraph (1) the word "self-government" was used without using in addition the word "independence". This might raise a question. Navy representatives agreed that independence was included within the meaning of the word "self-government". . . .

Article 7. No problems.

Article 8. This article was certain to raise serious questions. It was agreed that the basic reason for providing for most favored nation treatment instead of national treatment was the requirements of security and we should be quite frank in so stating. We should also argue that Article 76 (d) of the Charter is not applicable in the case of strategic trusts because of the exact wording of Article 83 (2).

Article 9. No problems.

Article 10. No problems.

Article 11. It was pointed out that the provision of the status of citizens in the trust territory does not exclude giving the inhabitants the status of American citizens or American nationals if that is desired. However, we should not emphasize this as it looks too much like annexation.

Article 12. No comment.

Article 13. It was pointed out that there is at least some doubt whether the provisions in Article 83 (1) of the Charter make it a requirement of a strategic trust that the administering authority undertake the responsibility to submit reports, allow petitions, and provide for periodic visits to the territory, as well as to agree to answer questionnaires. It would be advisable, therefore, for the United States to point out that it was voluntarily accepting the obligations contemplated in Articles 87 and 88 in connection with the Japanese Islands in any part of the Islands which were not closed for security reasons, even though it was not required by the Charter to do so. It was also suggested that Mr. Johnson, in his initial statement to the Council, should go as far as possible in explaining why the United States felt it necessary to have entire discretion in closing in part of the trust territory for security reasons and should give some general assurances that the United States would act in a reasonable manner in this regard. It should also be made clear if possible that even in the case of closed areas, the United States would restrict applications of Articles 87 and 88 only insofar as reasonably necessary to insure security. Such statements would be very helpful in allaying criticism and suspicion in connection with this Article.

Article 14. The question was raised whether the United States could bar the application of any particular international conventions to closed areas. It was felt that it probably could do so by reason of the clause "which may be appropriate to the particular circumstances of the trust territory". It was apparently the view of the State Department representatives that this clause did not guarantee that the provisions of the inspection agreement in relation to disarmament or the atom bomb would be applied to the trust territory. It was, however, their intention to include in the initial statement of Mr. Johnson's the statement that this would be done.

Article 15. No comment.

Article 16. No comment.

General Questions. It was stated that Mr. Dulles' statement to the General Assembly over the weekend, which the papers had written up as a commitment by the United States to consider in the future turning the Japanese Mandates over to the United Nations as the administering authority, was entirely a New York affair and was not in any way authorized by Washington; in fact, the Department knew nothing about it.⁶⁶

It was reported that the Secretary had requested postponement of submission of this whole matter to the Security Council until at least December 1st. The Department was apparently in no hurry to submit the matter to the Council, but in any case the matter should go back to the Secretary before any action is taken.

In regard to the general strategy, Mr. Borton stated that the President had decided that there would be no annexation of any Japanese Islands or Mandates; that at a later date the United States would submit a trusteeship agreement along the lines of the present one covering the Bonins and Volcano Islands; that there would be no attempt at the present moment to make a decision with regard to the Ryukyu Islands. It was the position, however, of the Army and Navy that no commitment could be made that the United States should have to wait for the Japanese Peace Treaty before it could submit a proposed trusteeship agreement for either of the latter two categories of Japanese Islands.

Mr. Bancroft stated that a document was being prepared on the question whether special provisions should be included giving the International Court jurisdiction. He indicated that the United States would probably claim that many questions involved in this trust agreement would be questions of domestic jurisdiction and could then be kept from the Court under provisions of the United States agreement on compulsory jurisdiction.⁶⁷

*Memorandum by Mr. John Foster Dulles of the United States Delegation*⁶⁸

[NEW YORK,] November 30, 1946.

Mr. Gerig and I dined with Messrs. Gromyko and Novikov on November 28th. They said they wished to consider whether some formula could be found to permit the Trusteeship Council to be established. They said that the two big difficulties, and the only serious difficulties, were:

- (1) Which were the "states directly concerned"; and
- (2) Could trust areas be fortified without the approval of the Security Council.

They stated as to (1) that it was the Soviet view that the five Permanent Members need not necessarily be considered "states directly concerned" in relation to all trust territory; that there could be a prior agreement between them that some would be deemed to be "states directly concerned" with reference to certain trust territories and others be deemed to be "states directly concerned" with reference to other trust territories. They intimated that the Soviet Union was not particularly interested in being considered a "state directly concerned" so far as the African mandated territory was concerned, but that they stood absolutely on the proposition that they were a "state directly concerned" in so far as related to enemy territory, specifically the Italian colonies, any Japanese islands and the Japanese mandated islands. There was a slight suggestion that if that position was conceded, they might not even claim to be a "state directly concerned" in Western Samoa and New Guinea.

We said that if the Soviet Union would not claim to be a "state directly concerned" as regards the African mandated territory, its position would be the same as that of the United States as regards these territories. We suggested that the Trusteeship Council might be set up on the basis of trust agreements with Great Britain, France and Belgium for African mandated territory. They said that they would not be willing to agree not to be a "state directly concerned" as regards the African territories, except as part and parcel of an agreement that they were a "state directly concerned" as regards other areas, notably the Pacific islands.

We said that instead of discussing which were and which were not "states directly concerned" it might be useful to consider what practical consequences the Soviet might want to draw from being a "state directly concerned" in Pacific islands. They said that their particular interest was in military fortifications. It was their view that under the Charter there was no right to fortify for national purposes. There was a right to local defense and the maintenance of order. Otherwise, the only right was for international peace and security and that the only body which could administer international peace and security was the Security Council. Therefore, there could be no fortification beyond the need of local defense except in accordance with special agreements negotiated by the Security Council under Article 43. They indicated that in this respect they saw no difference between strategic and non-strategic areas.

They also referred to a continuing right in the Security Council to inspect fortifications which might be authorized by the Security Council in trust territory.

We said that we could not agree at all with their legal construction of the Charter, but that it might be more profitable to consider the practical aspects of the matter. The concrete result of their theory was that the United States would not have the right to maintain bases in trustee Pacific islands except as might be specifically authorized in each case by the Security Council, i.e., by Russia, and subject to its supervision and inspection. I said that that result was not one which was acceptable to the United States and that they could take it as absolutely positive that the United States would not agree to any construction which would involve those consequences. We said that the United States preferred trusteeship to annexation or de facto possession because that would give the native inhabitants the benefit of the Charter provisions with respect to the inhabitants of trust territories. Also, trusteeship would make it easier to move toward internationalization of military establishments if and when the Security Council actually demonstrated that it could be relied upon to maintain the peace. However, that had not yet been demonstrated and until it was demonstrated, we would want in the Pacific Islands the same rights that the Soviet Union would presumably exercise in such islands as the Kuriles Islands. We said that the Soviet Union had shown no disposition to accept for the Kuriles Islands the regime which it was seeking to impose on us as regards Pacific islands which might come under our administration.

They said that this was different because it had been agreed between the United States and the Soviet Union that the latter could annex the Kuriles Islands. We said that that was an informal agreement which had not yet been ratified by peace treaty and that other nations than the United States were concerned in this matter, notably China.

I said that it was personally my strong hope that neither the United States nor the Soviet Union would have advanced military bases or military zones which would menace each other or other friendly nations. But that the United States would not agree to a double standard under which the Soviet Union did not subject to Security Council control areas in its possession which it deemed vital; whereas the United States, as to comparable areas in its possession, would be subject to control and inspection by the Soviet Union.

Messrs. Gromyko and Novikov affirmed strongly that, if necessary, the Soviet would fight the issue through to the floor of the Assembly, and they expressed confidence that they could defeat approval of trusteeship agreements with provision for bases, etc.

While the discussion was extremely frank, the atmosphere throughout was friendly and cordial and it was agreed that we would each think the matter over to see whether there was any possible basis for agreement which would permit of going ahead harmoniously on the trusteeship matter.

Memorandum of Telephone Conversation, by the Assistant Chief of the Division of Dependent Area Affairs (Bartlett)

[WASHINGTON,] December 1, 1946.

Mr. Gerig, who had just been talking with Mr. Cohen, stated that Mr. Cohen had had three suggestions to make regarding the method of presentation to the Security Council of the draft trusteeship agreement for the Japanese Mandated Islands. Mr. Gerig requested that Mr. Cohen's suggestions be brought to the attention of Mr. Green.

1. It was Mr. Cohen's recommendation that the formal presentation of the draft trusteeship agreement to the Security Council be postponed until after the General Assembly had acted upon the draft trusteeship agreements for non-strategic areas which are now being discussed in the Fourth Committee. He felt that to formally present the draft trusteeship agreement during the present discussion in Committee 4 would merely complicate its handling in the Security Council.

2. It was felt that Mr. Herschel Johnson's primary responsibility should be to explain and defend the detailed provisions of the draft trusteeship agreement and that the general introductory statement introducing it to the Security Council should preferably be made by the Secretary himself or, if that were not possible, should be prepared in a way which would indicate that it was being submitted on behalf of the Secretary.

3. Mr. Cohen indicated that perhaps consideration should be given to the desirability of this Government's acceptance in a certain degree of the USSR interpretation of Articles 82, 84, and 43 of the Charter of the United Nations. This Government might be prepared both in non-strategic and in strategic trusteeship agreements to provide for referral to the Security Council of proposals for military facilities within the area. If the Security Council should then refuse to approve such proposals there would be in effect no agreement regarding them. The administering authority would, in such a case, be left however with the overriding power of taking measures for self-defense of the territory and, in lieu of international measures to maintain international peace and security, would be free, and indeed obligated to maintain the security of the trust territory as it saw fit.

Memorandum of Telephone Conversation, by the Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs (Hiss)

[WASHINGTON,] December 3, 1946.

Mr. Gerig called me this morning and said that the question of monopolies was coming up today before the subcommittee of Committee IV.⁶⁹ He said he thought it was clear that our present proposal (see telegram 255, October 29, 1946 to New York) cannot get sufficient votes in the subcommittee or in the full Committee to be adopted. Even if it were the British, of course, might very likely refuse to accept it in their trusteeship agreements and we would almost certainly not wish to have the entire trusteeship system held up for that reason alone.

Mr. Gerig went on to say that Mr. Thomas, the chief British representative on trusteeship matters, has expressed personal willingness to accept a revision of our proposal which Mr. Gerig feels is sufficiently close to our proposal to be acceptable under the circumstances. Mr. Gerig said he wanted to emphasize that Mr. Thomas has not been able to obtain governmental authority to accept the revision and Mr. Thomas' advisers are opposed to it.

Mr. Gerig then read to me the proposed revision. Under this revision

⁶⁹ Except for the November 21 meeting, the Sub-Committee had been preoccupied with an exhaustive article-by-article examination of the draft trusteeship agreement for Western Samoa from its first meeting on November 15 up to and including November 30. On November 30 Mr. Dulles withdrew a United States proposal for a new article in the agreement dealing with the monopolies question "in order to expedite the work of the Sub-Committee. . . ." (Ga(I/2), Fourth Committee, Pt. II, p. 102). The issue of the monopolies thus was not resolved in the Sub-Committee's work on the New Zealand agreement. On December 1 the Sub-Committee commenced a general and definitive consideration of the seven draft agreements for the six African territories and New Zealand together on the basis of the experience gained in the detailed examination of the terms for Western Samoa, and the problem of the monopolies came up for final settlement in this phase.

the last clause of the first sentence and the entire second sentence of our draft would be replaced by the following:

“and that the proposed grant of such monopoly rights shall be promptly reported to the Trusteeship Council and shall as a rule be made in such a manner as to enable the Trusteeship Council to give an effective opinion as to its compatibility with Article 76 of the Charter.”

Mr. Gerig said that Mr. Fowler has been over the proposed revision and thinks that it is the best we can hope to get. Mr. Fowler agrees with Mr. Gerig's estimate that the present draft will be defeated if forced to a vote. Moreover Mr. Gerig pointed out that since government monopolies will not in any case be permissible even if our draft were to be adopted, it would simply encourage the administering authorities to establish government monopolies even though they otherwise would not be so inclined.

I called Mr. Stinebower, who was just about to leave for New York, and he said he also felt that this was the best we could get under the circumstances and represented a pretty good formula in view particularly of the strength of the belief on the part of our own representatives in New York that the monopolies issue is not of anywhere near the same importance as the issue of getting the Trusteeship Council established.

I then called Mr. Nitze⁷⁰ who called me back after consulting members of his office. Mr. Nitze said that it was the feeling of ITP that the proposed revision was, under the circumstances, acceptable. Mr. Nitze said that it was the understanding of ITP that the language meant that despite the phrase “as a rule” a prompt report about each proposed grant of monopoly rights would have to be made in any event. ITP understood that the exceptions permitted under the words “as a rule” related simply to the timing and manner of reporting rather than to the fact of reporting itself. Mr. Nitze also thought that the redraft had improved the language covering the type of consideration the Trusteeship Council should give to proposals relating to monopolies in that it spoke of “an effective opinion” as to the “compatibility with Article 76” of proposed grants of monopoly rights.

I then sent word to Mr. Gerig in New York that the revised draft of Article 10(c) would be acceptable to the Department. I pointed out ITP's understanding of the meaning of the clause and said that I had the same understanding and had so informed ITP. I asked that Mr. Gerig let me know if there was any doubt as to this construction of the revised draft.⁷¹

⁷¹ The new U.S. text, as proposed by Mr. Gerig and cleared in the Department by Mr. Hiss, came to a vote on December 4, the vote standing at 3 for, 7 against, and 7 abstaining. For statements made preceding the vote by the U.S. represent-

The Acting Secretary of State to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget (Webb)

WASHINGTON, December 3, 1946.

MY DEAR MR. WEBB: In your letter of October 24, 1946, you requested an expression of my views on H.R. 6605, a bill "to provide for the government and administration of certain islands in the Pacific Ocean by the Department of the Interior", in the light of observations made thereon by the War, Navy and Interior Departments in the enclosures which accompanied your letter.⁷²

As stated in Secretary Byrnes' letter of July 26 to Congressman Bell,⁷³ this Department is thoroughly in sympathy with the objective of placing United States administered islands with native populations under civilian administration.

In so far as H.R. 6605 relates to former Japanese controlled islands the Department of State is in agreement with the Secretary of War and the Secretary of Navy that it would be premature for action to be taken by this Government with respect to the determination of the form of administration which should be applied to such of these islands as we assume responsibility for as a result of the Second World War. However, the Department of State perceives no objection from the point of view of our foreign relations to consideration of the type of administration which should apply to Guam and American Samoa.

ative on the Sub-Committee, Mr. Gerig, and the U.K. representative, Mr. Thomas, see GA (I/2), Fourth Committee, Pt. II, pp. 165-167.

Certain declarations made by the Mandatory Powers during the work of the Sub-Committee regarding points at issue in the draft terms were included in the report of the Sub-Committee for the attention of the Fourth Committee, and in turn included in the Report of the Committee to the General Assembly (ibid., pp. 298-300 and GA (I/2), Plenary, pp. 1543-1545). In connection with the monopolies question there is included in the two reports the following declaration of the intentions of the Governments of the United Kingdom and of Belgium:

"(a) The Governments of Belgium and the United Kingdom have no intention of using the grant of private monopolies in Trust Territories as a normal instrument of policy;

(b) Such private monopolies would be granted only when this was essential in order to enable a particular type of desirable economic development to be undertaken in the interest of the inhabitants;

(c) In those special cases where such private monopolies were granted they would be granted for limited periods, and would be promptly reported to the Trusteeship Council." (Ibid., p. 1544)

⁷²None printed. For more than a year there had been a continuing discussion within the Executive Branch, which in due course had repercussions in the Legislative Branch, as to the type of government and administration of certain islands in the Pacific Ocean area in the possession of or controlled by the United States. Opposing views were held by the Department of the Interior on the one hand and the Departments of War and the Navy on the other. Documentation on this subject in the central indexed files of the Department of State may be found in File No. 890.0146.

⁷³Not printed. Representative C. Jasper Bell was Chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs, House of Representatives.

Legislation providing for civilian administration of Guam and American Samoa would be in keeping with American traditions and with the declaration regarding non-self-governing territories set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter of the United Nations. Furthermore, it is recalled that the United States has yet to fulfill, with respect to Guam, the obligation set forth in Article IX of the Treaty of Paris of 1898, as follows: "The civil rights and political status of the native inhabitants of the territories hereby ceded to the United States shall be determined by the Congress". Legislation providing for the form of government on Guam would contribute to the fulfillment of this treaty obligation.

In expressing this view the Department of State is not attempting to pass upon the effect of such a decision upon the security interests of the United States or upon the administrative and budgetary questions raised by the Secretary of Navy in his proposed report to Congressman Bell.

Sincerely yours,

DEAN ACHESON

304. USdel. For Gadel. Urtel 912 Dec 4.⁷⁴ Dept gratified at Australian comprehensive additional article as indicating desirable spirit of compromise. Australian additional article is welcomed for its inclusion of certain explicit undertakings as to human rights, cooperation with Trusteeship Council, protection of indigenous land ownership, education, and participation of inhabitants in administrative services. Such partial inclusion of undertakings might, however, be interpreted later, when Australian agreement is compared with New Zealand agreement, to exclude such other "undertakings as to methods" contained in Western Samoa draft as social advancement, economic rights, and more complete expression of political development. Dept therefore recommends that Gadel should strongly urge Australian Delegation to accept such additional amendments as would bring New Guinea draft trusteeship agreement into substantial accord with Western Samoa agreement in so far as latter will receive approval Gadel.

Memorandum of Telephone Conversation, by the Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs (Hiss)

[WASHINGTON,] December 5, 1946.

Participants: John Foster Dulles—U.S. Delegation to the General Assembly
Elizabeth Armstrong—U.S. Delegation to the General Assembly
Alger Hiss—SPA

Miss Armstrong called me yesterday afternoon and read over the telephone the attached draft proposals which she said Mr. Dulles wished to introduce in the subcommittee of Committee IV considering trusteeship agreements.⁷⁵

After consulting Mr. Hickerson, Mr. Green and Captain Dennison, I called Miss Armstrong back and told her the following:

*With Respect to the Proposal Dealing with "States Directly Concerned"*⁷⁶

I assumed that in the third sentence of the second paragraph the word "permanently" had inadvertently been omitted from the phrase "no state has waived or prejudiced its right to claim", in as much as we have proposed waiver of claims for the purposes of approval of the agreements now before the Assembly. I said that as to the last two sentences we had serious doubts as to their wisdom. It seemed to us that they would simply keep alive the issue of "states directly concerned" whereas we hoped that the issue would die out at least for some time to come upon the completion of the current session of the General Assembly. These two sentences would require the Trusteeship Council to consider this problem and hence it would keep it alive. In addition, if the Trusteeship Council should not take our view and should list as "states directly concerned" some states which voted against the adoption of particular agreements, this might tend to cloud the title of the administering authorities named under such agreements. The last sentence in particular was disturbing as it would specifically require the Trusteeship Council to consider the explosive question of "states directly concerned" if and when an agreement for Palestine or for the Italian colonies is submitted.

Miss Armstrong told me that the draft was also being taken up with Mr. Cohen. I said that I was glad to hear that and that the views which I had expressed should be regarded as tentative. I said that in the event Mr. Cohen and Mr. Dulles felt that the two sentences to which I had called particular attention were necessary in order to get by the problem of "states directly concerned" I thought the Department would be prepared to rely upon their judgment.

*With Respect to the Proposal on Military Establishments*⁷⁷

I said that our feelings were much stronger about this point. In particular, the proposed second paragraph seemed to us very inadvisable. I pointed out that we already had a tentative arrangement with New Zealand for the use of bases in Western Samoa and that also the paragraph would be inconsistent with our plans with respect to the mandated islands.

As to the first paragraph, we were worried about the phraseology as it might seem to give support to the Soviet interpretation of Article 43, namely, that military establishments in trust territories are only permissible if the Security Council specifically authorizes them. I said that I was working on a redraft of that paragraph along the lines of making it clear that, of course, any later agreement under Article 43 on the regulation of armaments would apply no less to trust territories than to the administering authority's own territory.

I said that I felt confident that the views I had expressed with respect to the military establishments proposal represented strongly held views of the State, War and Navy Departments.

This morning Mr. Dulles called me on the above subjects and said that Mr. Cohen was with him. He said that he had agreed to strike out the last two sentences of the proposal relating to "states directly concerned" and instead simply to add a general statement to the effect that the procedure now being followed by the Assembly on this point would not necessarily have to be followed in the future.

With respect to the proposal on military establishments, Mr. Dulles said that he had agreed to eliminate the second paragraph; however, he felt very strongly that it was necessary to have something along the lines of the first paragraph and that he thought the suggestion I had made to Miss Armstrong as to alternative language would not help meet the problem he was facing. He said that the other delegations and the public simply do not understand that closure of a military area from Trusteeship Council inspection does not mean closure of that area for purposes of armament inspection. He said that Senator Vandenberg himself in the last day or so had said that he thought our position of urging the Soviets to agree to international inspection for disarmament was inconsistent with our position of insisting upon the right to established closed areas in trusteeship territories. Mr. Dulles said he had readily explained the matter to Senator Vandenberg, whereupon the Senator said "why in the world isn't that made clear publicly?"

I told Mr. Dulles that I would attempt to clear a revision of the first paragraph of the proposed statement on military establishments within the Department and with the War and Navy Departments and that I thought it should be possible to maintain the essence of his draft.

I then cleared with Mr. Hickerson, Mr. Vincent, Mr. Green, Captain Dennison and Colonel Parker (in Colonel Giffen's office) the following draft which I telephoned to New York for Mr. Dulles:

"The General Assembly in approving those terms of trusteeship which authorize military establishments calls attention to the fact that whenever any administering authority, as such, becomes a party to the special agreement or agreements to be negotiated on the initiative of the Security Council pursuant to Article 43 or a party to any agreement or agreements with reference to control or limitation of armaments providing for inspection or supervision of military establishments, such agreement or agreements will, of course, be controlling as to the matters covered by them and will govern the availability of such military establishments to the Security Council and their subjection to inspection or supervision for the purposes specified in such agreement or agreements."⁷⁸

⁷⁸ This statement was submitted by Mr. Dulles to the Fourth Committee on December 9 with the proposal that it be included in the Report of the Rapporteur to the General Assembly (GA (I/2), Fourth Committee, Pt. I, pp. 143 and 144). Mr. Dulles initiated this action in connection with the Committee's discussion of a series of amendments to the eight draft agreements proposed by the Soviet Union which restricted the administering authority's right to establish military bases, erect fortifications, and station and employ armed forces in the trust territory except on the basis of obligations to the Security Council assumed by the administering authority (ibid., pp. 139-147, passim, and GA (I/2), Fourth Committee, Pt. II, pp. 236, 243 and 244, 252, 258, 259, 267 and 268, 269 and 270, and 271 and 272, annexes 4a, 5d, 6a, 7, 8, 10a, 11, and 12a, respectively). The Committee never gave formal consideration to the Dulles proposal; neither was the statement incorporated in the Rapporteur's Report. The Soviet amendments were not accepted by the Fourth Committee.

Actually the Committee's debate was a telescoped version of an earlier extensive consideration by Sub-Committee 1 of the question of whether the consent of the Security Council was required before naval, air, and military bases could be established in the trust territories (non-strategic). This had been in connection with the Sub-Committee's deliberations on the draft trusteeship agreement for Western Samoa, specifically Article X. For an analytical summary of the Sub-Committee's work on this question with copious references to the official record, see Repertory of UN Practice, vol. iv, pp. 253-262.

[Annex I]

The Subcommittee proposes that Committee IV, in recommending any terms of trusteeship to this session of the General Assembly for approval, should propose that approval thereof be on the following understanding with respect to "states directly concerned".

All members of the United Nations have had an opportunity to present their views with reference to the terms of trusteeship. There has, however, been no formal determination as to which of these nations are "states directly concerned" within the meaning of Article 79. Accordingly, the General Assembly in approving particular terms of trusteeship does not prejudge the question of what states are or are not "directly concerned" within the meaning of Article 79 and recognizes that no state has waived or prejudiced its right to claim to be or to be held to be such a "state directly concerned". The General Assembly instructs the Trusteeship Council promptly upon its constitution to consider what states are "directly concerned" in the terms of trusteeship now approved and to submit its opinion on the matter to the next session of the General Assembly. It further instructs the Trusteeship Council to submit its opinion as to "states directly concerned" in connection with any future submission to the General Assembly of terms of trusteeship.

DECEMBER 4, 1946.

[Annex II]

The General Assembly approves those terms of trusteeship which authorize military establishments on the understanding that as soon as any administering authority, as such, becomes a party to the special agreement or agreements to be negotiated on the initiative of the Security Council pursuant to Article 43 or a party to any other agreement or agreements with reference to control or limitations of armaments or inspection or supervision of military establishments, such agreement or agreements will be overriding and the administering authority cannot claim, under the present terms of trusteeship, any rights or privileges inconsistent therewith.

The General Assembly expresses the hope that administering authorities will not exercise their right to develop military establishments until the United Nations, through its Security Council, shall have had a further reasonable period of time in which to develop international agreements of the character referred to in furtherance of international peace and security.

*Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Special Political Affairs
(Hiss) to the Under Secretary of State (Acheson)*

[WASHINGTON,] December 6, 1946.

Mr. Dulles called me this morning and told me that he and Novikov had been named as a committee of two by Committee IV⁷⁹ to attempt to resolve the remaining outstanding differences on the subject of "states directly concerned". Mr. Dulles said that he had met with Novikov and that he believes it may be possible to settle the issue on the basis of having the General Assembly direct those states submitting trusteeship agreements in the future to consult with the permanent members of the Trusteeship Council who will express an interest in the particular territory concerned and with other members of the United Nations especially interested in such territory. Mr. Dulles said that the Soviets do not wish a repetition of the procedure we followed with respect to our proposed agreement for the Japanese Mandates in which we published the agreement without prior consultation and announced our intention of presenting it promptly to the Council without inviting consultation in the interim. In particular they do not wish to have the United States propose a trusteeship for other Pacific Islands, such as Okinawa, without prior consultation. Mr. Dulles said that he has received express assurances the Soviets mean consultation when they say consultation and not a right of veto, i.e., they do not insist that we must reach agreement with them before submitting a trusteeship agreement in the future.

Mr. Dulles said that he had discussed this matter with the Secretary who had some anxieties as to whether the Navy might not feel that such a practice would commit us to discussions in which our ability to resist suggestions for revisions would be less than in a procedure where we first published our proposed text.

I told Mr. Dulles that his proposal seemed to me entirely consistent with the theory and practice which the Department itself had advo-

⁷⁹ Reference should be made here to the two meetings of Sub-Committee 1 on December 5 (GA(I/2), Fourth Committee, Pt. II, pp. 170-185) at which the issue was joined on the opposing viewpoints regarding interpretation of the phrase "states directly concerned". The Soviet Union was the principal spokesman for a group holding that the Charter required a determination of the states directly concerned in the negotiation of the trusteeship agreements and the concurrence of these states in the terms of the agreements. In the course of the discussion Mr. Dulles introduced a statement outlining the U.S. Delegation's position along the lines of the memorandum of December 5, supra, and proposed that a small drafting sub-committee be constituted "to find a formula acceptable to all" (ibid., p. 176). As no consensus was forthcoming on either the terms of reference or the composition of such a drafting sub-committee, the Chairman requested the representatives of the United States and the Soviet Union "to consult informally on the question and to report back to the next meeting of the Sub-Committee. . . ." (ibid., p. 185).

cated to the mandatory powers last Spring and Summer. We had urged the mandatories to refuse to enter into formal agreements with countries claiming to be "states directly concerned". Instead we urged them to consult any interested states. Mr. Dulles said that Mr. Cohen had expressed agreement with the proposal.

I talked with Captain Dennison who is the Navy's chief representative on trusteeship matters. Captain Dennison's offhand reaction was quite favorable. He said he thought that if we could get our basic principle agreed to that agreement of "states directly concerned" is not a condition precedent to submission of a trusteeship agreement we would be willing to commit ourselves to consultations prior to publication. He thought there were indeed some advantages to such consultation in as much as we would not "have to air our dirty linen in public", i.e., some controversial points might be settled in the course of consultations. He said he assumed that the consultations would not involve organized meetings in which there would be voting. I told him that the consultation would be by diplomatic means but that it was quite possible that group discussions with representatives of interested states might be held. In any event there would be no voting as the consultations would not constitute any organized meeting. He seemed satisfied on this point.

Later in the afternoon Mr. Dulles sent word that with the Secretary's approval he was taking up with Mr. Novikov a draft along the foregoing lines. Attached hereto is a copy of Mr. Dulles' draft proposal. The first paragraph represents a slight revision of a statement which he made to the Committee yesterday after clearing with Mr. Cohen and with the Department (I took it up with the War and Navy Departments and with Mr. Hickerson and Mr. Dulles accepted our suggestions). The second paragraph represents the new proposal which Mr. Dulles is discussing with Mr. Novikov.

DRAFT MEMORANDUM WHICH MR. DULLES IS DISCUSSING WITH MR. NOVIKOV

"All Members of the United Nations have had an opportunity in committee to present their views with reference to the terms of trusteeship now proposed to the General Assembly for approval. All member states which might be 'states directly concerned' within the meaning of Article 79 have either agreed in committee to the terms of trusteeship or have agreed to accept the terms approved by the General Assembly. There has, however, been no specification of 'states directly concerned' in relation to the proposed trust territories. Accordingly, the General Assembly in approving the terms of trusteeship does not prejudice the question of which states are or are not 'directly concerned' within the meaning of Article 79. It recognizes that no state has waived or prejudiced its right hereafter to claim to be a 'state directly concerned' in relation to any alteration or amendment of the trusteeship agreements now approved or in relation to any trusteeship agreements which may be subsequently proposed.

"As regards the procedure to be followed hereafter the General Assembly calls on member states which may initiate trust agreements in relation to territories (a) now held under mandate or (b) which may be detached from enemy states as a result of the Second World War in advance of submission to the General Assembly to consult with such permanent members of the Trusteeship Council as assert an interest in relation to the proposed trust territory and also to consult with any other member state which has a substantial distinctive relationship to the proposed trust territory. But nothing herein contained shall be deemed to imply that prior agreement on the part of such other states is a condition precedent to the submission to or approval by the General Assembly of terms of trusteeship."

Dependent Area Affairs (Gerig)*

SECRET

[NEW YORK,] December 7, 1946.

Subject: Conversations regarding "states directly concerned".

Participants: Mr. Ivor Thomas (UK);
Mr. Dulles and Mr. Gerig (US).

Mr. Thomas, by request, came to see Mr. Dulles concerning the proposed draft statement prepared by Mr. Dulles and which had been given to Mr. Novikov yesterday with a view to serving as a basis for agreement on the question of "states directly concerned". (Draft attached hereto, the contents of which had been given to Mr. Thomas by Mr. Dulles yesterday.)

Mr. Thomas said that he had disclosed the essential features of the tentative draft to Mr. Bevin, whose first reaction was the following: Mr. Bevin felt strongly

(1) that the United Kingdom did not feel that it was wise to give any private assurances by letter or otherwise to the Soviet Delegation although they felt less concerned with the Japanese islands north of the Equator than with the Italian colonies in this respect;

(2) that the United Kingdom did not feel that it could agree to the important second paragraph of the tentative draft without permitting the Cabinet to examine it carefully which could probably not take place before Tuesday; and

(3) that Australia and the Union of South Africa were in particular very much concerned about a procedure which would require consultation in advance with the Soviet Union and China in regard to territories which are of special concern to them.

Mr. Thomas said that the Union of South Africa, he felt, might initiate a trusteeship agreement for South West Africa if it were not necessary to recognize a special position in relation thereto by the Soviet Union.

Mr. Dulles said that the second paragraph, as Mr. Thomas knew, was designed not to outline a procedure for determining "states directly concerned", but rather to avoid a precise attempt to define Article 79 by outlining a procedure for consultation only.

Mr. Thomas said his Delegation fully appreciated this point and felt that if the Soviet Union would find the proposal acceptable, it might go a long way toward breaking the deadlock on this question. He was mainly concerned about private assurances which might be given apart from this general statement.

Mr. Dulles then dictated the following memorandum addressed to Senator Austin giving a copy to Mr. Thomas which, in effect, states that we do not intend to give any private assurances to the relation of the Soviet Union to the Italian colonies:

"Mr. Ivor Thomas talked with me today regarding the conversations which I am having with Ambassador Novikov with respect to 'states directly concerned' and the establishment of a Trusteeship Council. I told him that he could feel assured that we would not, in the course of these conversations, give any private commitments or assurances to the Soviet Delegation that we would support a claim by the Soviet Union to be a 'state directly concerned' within the meaning of Article 79 in relation to Italian colonies."

Mr. Dulles said that in regard to the Japanese islands north of the Equator, which he felt was the main concern of the Soviet, in particular the question of the future of the Ryukyu Islands, he did not know what the attitude of the United States would be if a specific request were made by the Soviet Union in regard to the future of those islands. This was, of course, a most difficult question and would probably arise before or at the time of the Peace Conference on Japan. In any case it seemed clear that what the Soviet Union is trying to get is some understanding with the Great Powers and, in particular, with the United States as to the future of those islands.

Mr. Dulles said that the Soviet had indicated that China was very much concerned with possible claims on the Ryukyu Islands which might be made by the Soviet Union. Mr. Thomas said he had the same information.

It was agreed that if the Soviet Union rejects the second paragraph of the tentative proposal, it might be best to return to the original paragraph which slightly revised the statement made by Mr. Dulles in Committee IV on December 5. It seemed now that at least the requisite votes could be secured for that statement even though the Soviet group will vote against it. However, Mr. Dulles thought it might be desirable to indicate in an oral statement the main lines of the proposal contained in the second paragraph in order to let other Members of the Assembly know about the efforts which had been made to reach agreement.⁸⁰

⁸⁰ Also on December 7 a conversation along similar lines took place with Professor Kenneth H. Bailey, Solicitor-General of the Commonwealth of Australia and member of the Australian delegation. The gist of Professor Bailey's remarks was that he felt "the formula amounted, in fact, to recognizing the five great powers as automatically directly concerned almost everywhere"; particular concern was expressed at claims China and the Soviet Union might assert in this connection in respect of New Guinea and Nauru. At the end of the conversation "Mr. Dulles said that Mr. Novikov had not yet given any reaction to the proposal and if he did not do so in a day or two, we would, in any case, have to fall back on the original proposal contained in the first paragraph of the tentative draft. Mr. Bailey concluded by saying that that would certainly be their preference." (memorandum of conversation by Mr. Gerig, December 7, SPA Files, Lot 54-D510, Box 20012).

The two memoranda of conversation were forwarded by Mr. Gerig to the Department on the same date with the comment "You will see that a good deal of apprehension seems to be developing as to what might result from our talks with the Soviet." TRUSTEESHIP

MR. MOLOTOV, reverting to the question of Trusteeship, said he had wished to have a preliminary discussion with the Secretary in order to ascertain whether or not they could reach an agreement on the question of Trusteeship.

THE SECRETARY replied that up to their conversation on Saturday he had thought that as a result of the talks between Mr. Dulles and Ambassador Novikov, a satisfactory agreement was being reached; but he gathered from Mr. Molotov that these talks had not been satisfactory to him.

MR. MOLOTOV said that if only consultation was being offered this would not constitute a satisfactory solution to the Soviet Government since it would not be in conformity with the Charter which set up a special position for the five permanent members of the Trusteeship Council. The Soviet position was that these five because of their special position should be regarded as countries directly concerned even though in all cases this right was not exercised. He felt this was an indisputable principle. In individual cases he felt it would be possible to reach agreement as to what countries should be regarded as directly concerned, but he repeated that each one of the five countries should have the right to declare its direct interest.

He did not mean that only the five would be directly interested but that certain small countries under specific circumstances should also be so regarded in connection with one or another trusteeship area. The actual determining in specific cases could be done in the interim period between this General Assembly and the next session. He suggested that if three or four specific trusteeship agreements could be made before the close of the present General Assembly, the Trusteeship Council could be set up right away. He repeated, however, that in the meantime the five countries should confirm through an exchange of letters their understanding that the five permanent members of the Trusteeship Council are regarded as having the right to be regarded as countries directly concerned in all cases.

THE SECRETARY said he thought that it was reasonable to set up the Trusteeship Council during the present session and then use the interim to consider among themselves the question of the determination of countries directly concerned. He said he would talk over the subject with our representative on the Trusteeship Commission.

MR. MOLOTOV said that there was one difficulty which would have to be settled and that was the question of military bases on trusteeship territories. The Soviet Delegation felt that in all cases involving military bases the Security Council would have to pass on the matter. He said if they could agree that any bases in trusteeship areas required Security Council approval and conclude three or four specific trusteeship agreements, the Trusteeship Council could be set up at this session. He said if there were other nonagreed questions in such trusteeship agreements, any country or countries could make a reservation on specific points without blocking the acceptance of the agreement.

THE SECRETARY repeated that he would communicate with Mr. Dulles, our representative, on this matter and communicate with Molotov later.

MR. MOLOTOV then said that he understood that there was no objection to an exchange of letters confirming the understanding that in principle all five permanent members had the right to be regarded as directly interested countries.

THE SECRETARY said that he had understood that this question was to be left open for further discussion and asked Mr. Molotov if he would outline his position once again so that he might communicate it to Mr. Dulles.

MR. MOLOTOV said he had in mind the conclusion of at least three trusteeship agreements during the present session of the General Assembly in order to permit the establishment of the Trusteeship Council; that they should agree on the principle of the right of the five permanent members of the Trusteeship Council to be regarded as directly interested countries; and an agreement on the question of Security Council approval on the question of military bases in trusteeship territories. He added that an exchange of letters would merely deal with the right of any one of the five to declare its interest in any trust area but that the actual determination of how this right would be applied in specific cases and what other countries could be regarded as directly interested, could be left for future consideration.

THE SECRETARY said again that he would talk to Mr. Dulles on the subject.⁸²

⁸² This ended the informal United States-Soviet talks and on December 10 Mr. Dulles wrote the following to Mr. Novikov :

"My dear Mr. Ambassador,

"On December 6 I handed you a tentative suggestion with reference to 'states directly concerned' in the hope that this would meet the point of view which you had put forward in Subcommittee I of Committee IV and permit us to make an agreed report to the Subcommittee.

"I understand that Mr. Molotov yesterday told Mr. Byrnes that this suggestion was not acceptable to your government and since in any event it was only a tentative proposal, it should of course be considered to be withdrawn." (IO Files, document US/A/C.4/33)

[Here follows discussion of other subjects, as noted on the agenda list.]

Editorial Note

Mr. Dulles opened the meeting of Sub-Committee 1 on December 9 by reporting "that he had held consultations with Mr. Novikov, in an attempt to reach a formula with respect to the question of the 'States directly concerned', as had been requested by the Chairman. Since the time limit had passed, he had to report that it had not been possible in the time available to achieve a solution, and that there was no alternative except to continue with the situation as it had been before the consultations took place." Therefore, Mr. Dulles asked "to re-submit the proposal of his delegation, which provided for approval of the draft agreements at the current session of the General Assembly, without prejudice to future determination of the 'States directly concerned.'" (GA(I/2), Fourth Committee, Pt. II, page 201)

After some discussion the Sub-Committee adopted the United States proposal, by thirteen votes for, three against, and one abstention, to the effect that the following recommendation be incorporated into the Report of the Rapporteur to the General Assembly:

"Approval of any terms of trusteeship by this session of the General Assembly should be on the following understanding with respect to 'States directly concerned':

"All Members of the United Nations have had an opportunity to present their views with reference to the terms of trusteeship now proposed to the General Assembly for approval. There has, however, been no specification by the General Assembly of 'States directly concerned' in relation to the proposed Trust Territories. Accordingly, the General Assembly, in approving the terms of trusteeship does not pre-judge the question of what States are or are not 'directly concerned' within the meaning of Article 79. It recognizes that no State has waived or prejudiced its right hereafter to claim to be such a 'State directly concerned' in relation to approval of subsequently proposed trusteeship agreements and any alteration or amendment of those now approved and that the procedure to be followed in the future with reference to such matters may be subject to later determination." (GA(I/2), Plenary, page 1546)

The United States statement was incorporated into the supplementary report of the Sub-Committee which dealt solely with the question of "States directly concerned" as raised in the preambles of the draft agreements (GA(I/2), Fourth Committee, Pt. I, pages 301-304, annex 22a). The plenary committee on December 11 approved the supplementary report in toto for inclusion in its own Report to the General Assembly (ibid., pages 158 ff., and GA(I/2), Plenary, pages 1540-1557, annex 72).

The General Assembly debated the Report on December 13 (ibid., pages 1264 ff.) and the proposed trusteeship agreements were approved (ibid., pages 1287-1288). Texts of the eight trusteeship agreements (Western Samoa, Tanganyika, Ruanda-Urundi, The Cameroons under British Administration, The Cameroons under French Administration, Togoland under British Administration, Togoland under French Administration, and New Guinea) may be found in United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, Second Part, Supplement No. 5, Text of Agreements for Trust Territories. Text of the resolution on trusteeship agreements, adopted on December 13, is found in United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, Second Part, Resolutions Adopted by the General Assembly during the Second Part of the First Session, 23 October-16 December, pages 122 and 123; text of the resolution adopted by the General Assembly on December 14 regarding the organization of the Trusteeship Council may be found ibid., page 123.

890.0146/12-746

Memorandum by the Under Secretary of State (Acheson) to President Truman

[WASHINGTON,] December 11, 1946.

I am forwarding herewith, for your information, the translation of a note from the Soviet Embassy dated December 7, 1946. The Soviet Government expresses the view in this note that the question of trusteeship over the islands formerly under Japanese mandate, as well as over any Japanese islands, must be considered by the Allied Powers in the peace settlement in regard to Japan.

[Annex—Translation]

The Chargé of the Soviet Union (Orekhov) to the Acting Secretary of State

WASHINGTON, December 7, 1946.

SIR: With reference to your note of November 6 last, in which it was communicated that the United States of America is ready to place under trusteeship the islands which are under Japanese mandate and for which the United States will be the administering authority, I have the honor to inform you of the following:

The Soviet Government considers it necessary to study the given question and the "Draft Trusteeship Agreement for the Japanese Mandated Islands" which was presented by the Government of the United States of America.

The Soviet Government is prepared to take into account the interests of the United States of America in connection with this question, but at the same time it considers it necessary to express its view that the question of trusteeship over the islands formerly under Japanese mandate, as well as over any Japanese islands, must be considered by the Allied Powers in the peace settlement in regard to Japan.

Accept, Sir, the assurance of my very high esteem for you.

Subject: British Comments on Our Proposed Trusteeship Agreement for the Japanese Mandated Islands

Mr. Balfour called me and said that he had looked into the above subject since I called him yesterday. He found that the Embassy had been informed that as of December 12 the Foreign Office was urgently engaged in obtaining the informal views of the Australian and New Zealand Chiefs of Staff. He said that in view of the importance of the issues involved he thought it unlikely that British views could be formulated by the first of the year and that he hoped we could defer presenting the draft agreement to the Security Council until we had received a further communication from the Embassy.

I asked Mr. Balfour if he would be good enough to obtain from the Foreign Office an estimate of just when we could anticipate receiving their views, pointing out that we might find it undesirable to delay very long although I felt sure we would be glad to accommodate the Embassy by delaying for a few days after the first of the year if the British views were to be obtainable by that time. He agreed to find out immediately the date when the Embassy would be in a position to supply us with the British comments.

FOREIGN POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES

ATOMIC ENERGY

We recognize that the application of recent scientific discoveries to the methods and practice of war has placed at the disposal of mankind means of destruction hitherto unknown, against which there can be no adequate military defense, and in the employment of which no single nation can in fact have a monopoly.

We are aware that the only complete protection for the civilized world from the destructive use of scientific knowledge lies in the prevention of war. No system of safeguards that can be devised will of itself provide an effective guarantee against production of atomic weapons by a nation bent on aggression. Nor can we ignore the possibility of the development of other weapons, or of new methods of warfare, which may constitute as great a threat to civilization as the military use of atomic energy.

We believe that the fruits of scientific research should be made available to all nations, and that freedom of investigation and free interchange of ideas are essential to the progress of knowledge. In pursuance of this policy, the basic scientific information essential to the development of atomic energy for peaceful purposes has already been made available to the world. It is our intention that all further information of this character that may become available from time to time shall be similarly treated. We trust that other nations will adopt the same policy, thereby creating an atmosphere of reciprocal confidence in which political agreement and cooperation will flourish.

The military exploitation of atomic energy depends, in large part, upon the same methods and processes as would be required for industrial uses. We are not convinced that the spreading of the specialized information regarding the practical application of atomic energy, before it is possible to devise effective, reciprocal, and enforceable safeguards acceptable to all nations, would contribute to a constructive solution of the problems of the atomic bomb. On the contrary we think it might have the opposite effect. We are, however, prepared to share, on a reciprocal basis with others of the United Nations, detailed information concerning the practical industrial application of atomic energy just as soon as effective enforceable safeguards against its use for destructive purposes can be devised.

In order to attain the most effective means of entirely eliminating the use of atomic energy for destructive purposes and promoting its widest use for industrial and humanitarian purposes, we are of the opinion that at the earliest practicable date a Commission should be set up under the United Nations Organization to prepare recommendations for submission to the Organization. The Commission should be instructed to proceed with the utmost dispatch and should be authorized to submit recommendations from time to time dealing with separate phases of its work. In particular the Commission should make specific proposals: (a) For extending between all nations the exchange of basic scientific information for peaceful ends; (b) for control of atomic energy to the extent necessary to ensure its use only for peaceful purposes; (c) for the elimination from national armaments of atomic weapons and of all other major weapons adaptable to mass destruction; and (d) for effective safeguards by way of inspection and other means to protect complying states against the hazards of violations and evasions.

Our declaration of willingness to exchange immediately the basic scientific information and our plans for the setting up of a Commission under United Nations sponsorship have been sent by the Secretary of State to members of the United Nations Organization.

INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION AND SECURITY

The United Nations. Faced with the terrible realities of the application of science to destruction, we realize more urgently than before the overwhelming need to maintain the rule of law among nations and to banish the scourge of war from the earth. This can only be brought about by giving wholehearted support to the United Nations Organization, and by consolidating and extending its authority, thus creating conditions of mutual trust in which all peoples will be free to devote themselves to the arts of peace. It is our firm resolve to work without reservation to achieve those ends.

Using the Dumbarton Oaks Proposals as a basis, the San Francisco Conference agreed upon the Charter of the United Nations and upon the Statute of the International Court of Justice which is annexed to the Charter.⁴ The Charter was presented to the Senate of the United States on July 2, 1945; the Senate, by an overwhelming vote, gave advice and consent to ratification on July 28. The President on August 8 signed the formal document by which he ratified the Charter. On that date the instrument of ratification was deposited in the archives of the Department of State and thereby the United States Government became the first to complete action necessary to bring the Charter into force. The Charter was proclaimed in force by the Secretary of State on October 24, 1945, after ratifications had been deposited by the required number of states. It thus became a part of the law of nations.

The objectives of the Charter are to maintain international peace—by force, if necessary; to settle international disputes by peaceful means and in conformity with the principles of justice and international law; to remove the economic and social causes of international conflict and unrest; to promote world-wide progress and better standards of living; and to achieve universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms for all men and women—without distinction as to race, language, or religion.

At the San Francisco Conference the United Nations agreed to establish a Preparatory Commission, consisting of one representative from each signatory to the Charter, for the purpose of making provisional arrangements for the first sessions of the General Assembly, the Security Council, the Economic and Social Council, and the Trusteeship Council; for the establishment of the Secretariat; and for the convening of the International Court of Justice. The functions and powers of the Preparatory Commission, when it is not in session, are exercised by an Executive Committee of fourteen members. The United States is represented on the Executive Committee.

The Executive Committee met in London from August 16 to October 27, 1945 and drew up a report covering the above-mentioned points. The report is now being considered by the United Nations Preparatory Commission, on which fifty-one nations are represented, which convened in London on November 24, 1945.⁵

The Preparatory Commission will not deal with the political and economic problems awaiting action by the United Nations. It will complete the preparatory planning that is required to enable the United Nations to organize itself in order to deal promptly with these problems. The Commission will review the recommendations of the Executive Committee, adopt its own report and then call into session the first Assembly of the United Nations. It is scheduled to complete its work in from three to four weeks. The Executive Committee has recommended that the Commission convene the first Assembly in London between January 2 and January 7, 1946, in order that the United Nations Organization may begin functioning with the least possible delay.

We believe that the Charter constitutes a solid structure upon which the United Nations can build a better world. With all our might we intend to back our obligations and commitments under the Charter. Our action thus far is indicative of our policy of wholehearted cooperation and leadership to make effective the new International Organization. By proposing that the United Nations Organization appoint a commission to consider the subject of atomic energy, we demonstrate our confidence in that Organization as an effective instrumentality for world cooperation and world peace.

Transitional Security Arrangements. The United Nations Organization will be unable to bring force to bear to maintain peace until the conclusion and ratification of special agreements between the Security Council and members of the Organization for the provision of armed forces, assistance, and facilities. The Security Council will determine when sufficient of these agreements have come into effect to enable it to act in enforcement matters. The Charter provides that, pending the coming into force of these agreements, the parties to the Moscow Four-Nation Declaration of October 30, 1943,⁶ and France shall, in accordance with the provisions of that Declaration, consult with one another and as occasion requires with other members of the United Nations with a view to such joint action on behalf of the Organization as may be necessary for the purpose of maintaining international peace and security.

It is the policy of this Government in accordance with the Charter, that action in relation to enemy states shall be taken or authorized by the governments having responsibility for such action, until those governments give the United Nations Organization responsibility in this respect and the Organization accepts that responsibility.

1. TRAFFIC IN ARMS

THE PROBLEM

In view of the reported intention on the part of the British Delegation to urge consideration of controls for the international traffic in arms at the first part of the First Session of the General Assembly, what position should the United States be prepared to take?

DISCUSSION

Article 11 of the Charter permits the General Assembly to "consider . . . the principles governing disarmament and the regulation of armaments." This authority is believed to be broad enough to include such subjects as limitation, reduction of armaments, and establishment of a level for armaments, as well as controls for governing the international traffic in arms. The provisional agenda for the first part of the First Session is composed of organizational matters with provision made for introduction of substantive matters of urgent importance. Although the urgency of the arms traffic question is debatable in the light of the array of organizational details that must be disposed of at the first part, it is unquestionably a problem of immediate importance to the maintenance of international peace and security. The existence of huge stockpiles of arms in various parts of the world combined with the lack of an international agreement concerning their diversion or even a declaration of principles relating to their use may well increase in number and complexity the political and military problems confronting the United Nations Organization when it completes its organizational work and can undertake the study of such problems. As the traffic in arms is a phase of the regulation of armaments of immediate interest to all members of the United Nations Organization, as exporters or importers of arms, it would be especially appropriate for the General Assembly to deal with this matter. The proposed committee structure of the General Assembly provides that the Political and Security Committee shall include within its province the regulation of armaments, and this Committee, when organized, could undoubtedly proceed to consider proposals for the regulation of the arms traffic. However, a directive from the General Assembly to this Committee, as possibly contemplated by the British, might serve the purpose of accelerating international action in this field.

THE UNITED STATES POSITION

The United States Delegation should lend sympathetic support to a proposal at an appropriate time during the first part for the study of the problems of peace and security arising out of the international traffic in arms so that general proposals might be submitted to the General Assembly for the regulation of this traffic.

In the event that it may be necessary to state the current views of the United States with respect to the supervision of arms manufacture and traffic, the Delegation should adopt, pending the formulation of definitive proposals by this Government, a tentative position along the lines of the attached draft.

[Annex]

[WASHINGTON, December 22, 1945.]

I. With respect to the supervision of arms manufacture and traffic.

A. The registering of manufacturers, importers, and exporters; the licensing of each shipment of arms and munitions in or out of a country; and the publishing of statistics comprise the minimum of what is involved in international agreement in this field. These matters are relatively non-controversial and, in view of existing American legislation, the position of this Government is already determined.

B. Recommendation V adopted at Mexico City states that "It is highly desirable that governments exercise a complete control over the production and distribution of armaments, thus eliminating the profit motive in the traffic in arms."⁹ This expresses a rather widely held view. However it carried implications for relations between government and business which would be difficult for this Government to enact into legislation. Thought should be given, therefore, to the character of internal controls which might be both practicable and effective in the American case.

C. The circumstances in which exports of arms and munitions should be prohibited involve both national and international policy. We shall insist on remaining free in the future as in the past to impose prohibitions by virtue of our own unilateral action (e.g., the Joint Resolutions of January 31, 1922, November 4, 1939, and July 2, 1940) ; and, also we shall be under treaty obligations in old and new forms, to impose prohibitions in certain circumstances (e.g., the Cuban treaty, the peace treaties, the charter of the international organization). However, this issue arises most immediately in connection with the negotiation of international agreements other than one concerning supervision of arms manufacture and traffic. The only concern is that the machinery of control be sufficiently adaptable to be of use in the various circumstances in which it may be necessary to employ it and is more directly dependent on domestic legislation than it is on an international agreement for supervising arms manufacture and traffic.

4. SPECIAL AGREEMENTS TO PROVIDE FORCES

STATEMENT OF THE PROBLEM

Is the United States willing to give real power of enforcement to the Security Council? If so, what is its attitude concerning the special agreements to provide forces?

DISCUSSION

The policy of the United States is to support full-heartedly the United Nations. To doubt that is to doubt the good faith of the United States. Therefore, as Mr. Truman further spelled out the policy, "We must fulfill the military obligations which we are undertaking as a member of the United Nations Organization." (Navy Day Speech, October 27, 1945).¹⁰

The priority which should be assigned to the agreements has always been recognized since, even prior to Dumbarton Oaks, the United States position has been that the Security Council, "as soon as it comes into existence, should initiate the formulation of plans for, and the negotiation of, such an agreement . . ." (ISO 55 of August 17, 1944).¹¹ SWNCC agreed that "An important problem immediately facing the Security Council and the Military Staff Committee will be the preparation and negotiation of agreements" (SWNCC 219 of November 8, 1945).¹² However, because of the far-reaching importance of the special agreements set forth in Article 43, the present feeling is that actual "negotiations regarding special agreements cannot be initiated until substantial preparations have been carried out." (Preco 115 of September 27, 1945).¹¹

An examination of the documents relating to the negotiation of the special agreements, under consideration in the Department since 1942, discloses that the Army and Navy have generally worked on the technical aspects of the agreements. For instance, the United States' present position against an international force results, in part, from the Joint Chiefs of Staff statement that "To maintain such a denationalized, integrated force as a military entity on an effective footing, would involve serious technical difficulty [difficulties]." (Admiral Leahy¹³ to the Secretary, ISO [to the Secretary of State] 18 of March 28, 1944).¹¹ It is understood, however, that the problem is now under further consideration in the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

PROPOSED U.S. POSITION

(Answering ad seriatim the questions raised in Mr. Notter's¹⁴ memorandum of November 29, 1945).¹¹

1. When and how should the Security Council initiate the negotiation on the special agreements?

There must be an early consideration of the negotiation of the special agreements since their conclusion is prerequisite to the effective functioning of the Security Council. A satisfactory procedure would be for the Security Council, upon the advice of the Military Staff Committee,

1. to decide what should be the total pool of forces,

¹³ Fleet Adm. William D. Leahy, Chief of Staff to the Commander in Chief of the United States Army and Navy; the President's Representative on the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

¹⁴ Harley A. Notter, Adviser, Office of Special Political Affairs.

2. to initiate the negotiations between itself and the Permanent Members,

3. to draw up the remaining special agreements including therein, in so far as possible, only those forces which the Member states had already indicated a willingness to contribute. Some small states may contribute no forces, but only facilities, a port or an airfield.

A satisfactory form for the agreements would be for each Member or group of Members to sign an identical general agreement with the Security Council, followed by an individual, separate Annex providing for the specific forces or facilities or both. The terms of each Annex would be dependent upon the overall strategic situation and upon the military capacity of the signatory Member or groups of Members.

2. Should the United States specify that the initiation of agreements should be among the Permanent Members of the Security Council first and then among all other states, or groups of other states?

Yes, the United States should support this procedure. While no special proviso to this effect need be included in the special agreements, there should be an informal understanding among the Permanent Members of the Security Council.

3. Should the agreements be negotiated directly between the Security Council and Members or groups of Members, or first among groups of Members and then between the Council and the groups of Members?

The United States takes no strong position in this connection. However, it does feel that the agreement should be signed with groups of Members only when those Members themselves suggest such a procedure. Furthermore, it should be remembered that, when a group of Members sign an agreement, an Amendment to the terms of that agreement with one Member may, constitutionally, require the assent of the other signatory Members.

4. Should the United States approve or disapprove inauguration of negotiation by a specified date, say July, 1946?

The United States should not support any specific target date, but should stress speed.

5. Should we insist upon negotiating full agreements covering all categories of forces and implements of war or should we favor making a series of agreements, the first, for example, to concern Air Forces?

The United States should support the initial negotiation of the full agreements, but with provisions therein for amendment.

6. Should we approve or disapprove preparations for the regulation of armaments concurrent with the foregoing negotiations?

Preparations for the regulation of armaments may be made concurrently with, but not dependent upon, the foregoing negotiations.

Although we strongly believe that armaments should be regulated, we do not believe that armaments can be effectively regulated until the special agreements, at least those between the Security Council and the Permanent Members, have been concluded and the security system is under way that is envisaged in the United Nations Charter.

THE VOTING PROCEDURE OF THE ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION

The Moscow Resolution¹⁸ is silent on the ways in which the proposed atomic energy commission shall reach its decisions or take any action. Its powers are of course only advisory but there must be some established method of arriving at the reports and recommendations which it is required to make.

The "Suggested Manner of Reaching Decisions in the Commission" (Document No. 13 in the book for the Moscow discussions)¹⁹ provided that on procedural matters decision should be reached by a majority, but that on substantive recommendations no formal vote should be taken; if unanimous approval could not be obtained for them, full reports of the various views should be forwarded to the General Assembly. It is not revealed in the Moscow Resolution whether this was acceptable to the U.S.S.R.

The question is now raised whether the placing of the commission under the Security Council instead of the General Assembly calls for any reconsideration of the suggested method of handling this problem, or whether it is acceptable as it stands.

Having the commission report directly to the Security Council rather than to the General Assembly means that the permanent members of the Council are assured of a veto over any final action taken on the reports and recommendations of the commission. Hence, so far as these powers are concerned, it would not seem to matter very much how the commission arrived at its decisions. In fact it would seem advisable to keep the manner of action as informal as possible in order to allow wide freedom to the commission in exploring all aspects of the problem of atomic warfare.

¹⁸ The resolution under reference is that on atomic energy contained in the Communiqué of the Moscow Tripartite Conference of Foreign Ministers, December, 1945; for text, see Foreign Relations, 1945, vol. II, p. 822. For additional documentation on that conference, see ibid., pp. 560 ff. On January 6, 1946, Ernest Bevin, British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, transmitted the resolution to the Executive Secretary of the Preparatory Commission of the United Nations on behalf of the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom, the Soviet Union, France, China, and Canada. The sponsoring nations requested that it be placed upon the agenda of the General Assembly. (United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, First Part, Plenary Meetings, p. 257. Hereafter cited as GA (I/1), Plenary.)

The only new question that arises is concerned with the provision for making public the reports and recommendations of the commission. Paragraph II (A) of the Resolution provides that the commission "shall submit its reports and recommendations to the Security Council, and such reports and recommendations shall be made public unless the Security Council in the interests of peace and security, otherwise directs." This is a more generous provision than it appears at first sight since it means that the Security Council cannot prevent the reports and recommendations of the commission from being made public unless at least seven members including all five of the permanent members concur in such action. If any one of the five permanent members should not concur, then the Security Council cannot direct the commission to refrain from making its reports and recommendations public. In other words, so long as any single one of the five permanent members is willing to have the findings of the commission made public, the others cannot prevent it.

This is a very favorable provision from the standpoint of the work of the commission. It makes it possible for the commission to arrive at conclusions and make them public even though several great powers are in opposition. It removes the possibility that consideration of any one question can be blocked by a single great power. The Commission would be free to explore the pros and cons of all proposals and to make its findings public so long as it had the support of at least one permanent member of the Council. If the U.S.S.R. is prepared to accept this arrangement, the U.S. should also be willing to do so.

This means, of course, that the United States must be prepared to have the commission make public findings which are not in accord with the position of the United States on particular questions. For example, the commission might disagree with the position that the United States was entitled to an especially favorable position by reason of its present monopoly of the bomb. But the commission could do no more than make its findings public and it would not be likely to do so if the United States were antagonized thereby.

Some question might be raised as to whether the procedure for making public the reports and recommendations of the commission might lead to the unwanted disclosure of secret information entrusted to the commission. Under the arrangement suggested in Document no. 13, all different viewpoints on each question dealt with by the commission would be reported on, and if a single one of the five permanent members of the Security Council should be interested in having such reports made public, there would be no way of stopping it, even though it involved the disclosure of information bearing on the security of a member state. If this danger were a real one, it might deter nations from making information available to the commission and thus obstruct its work.

As a matter of fact, if a state is willing to disclose information to the commission, it would probably not object to having it made public to non-member states. Generally speaking, all the states which could make use of such information in any important way would be represented on the commission and would thus come into possession of it through their representatives. So far as the United States is concerned, any information which it would be willing to make available to the U.S.S.R. and other members of the commission would hardly be of a kind that it would want to keep from non-member states. Hence the danger of unwanted disclosure is really very slight.

On the whole, the procedure for making public the reports and recommendations of the commission as contained in the Moscow Resolution seems both liberal and forward-looking and should receive the whole-hearted support of the United States.

TERMS OF REFERENCE OF THE COMMISSION ²⁰

The general purpose is to give the Commission the greatest possible freedom in investigating all aspects of the problem and in making such recommendations as it deems advisable. There are no limits on the subject matter of its inquiries, save as the Security Council may direct in matters affecting security. Aside from this the Commission itself determines its own program and decides what is relevant to the questions arising from the discovery of atomic energy.

There is an implied obligation on the part of all the United Nations to provide such information and give such other assistance as may be necessary to enable the Commission to carry on its work. The success of its efforts will depend in large measure on the degree of cooperation of the various member states in supplying such assistance.

The listing of the four subjects on which the Commission is to make specific proposals does not exclude others, nor does it require the Commission to take these subjects up first or in the order mentioned. It is for the Commission to decide the best method of handling each problem.

The first specific objective—that of “extending between all nations the exchange of basic scientific information for peaceful ends”—is broad enough to include the normal interchange of scientists and scientific knowledge in all fields. The term “basic” is not intended to cover the mechanical or technical knowledge concerning the manufacture of the bomb. While this subject is not directly excluded from the scope of the Commission’s work, it must be assumed that the United States is not prepared to reveal such knowledge until adequate safeguards have been erected against its misuse. The general purpose underlying this first provision is to bring about a resumption of normal intercourse among scholars to the fullest extent possible without endangering the security of any state.

The second specific objective—the “control of atomic energy to the extent necessary to ensure its use only for peaceful purposes”—is concerned with the ways whereby the fullest possible advantage can be taken of the peacetime uses of atomic energy without at the same time increasing the likelihood of its use for destructive purposes. The problem here arises out of the relative ease with which plants and materials for peacetime use of atomic energy can be converted into war uses. The Commission is asked to make proposals as to how such conversion can be subjected to effective control. The general purpose is to retain the widest potential employment of atomic energy in peace while removing the threat of atomic warfare.

The third objective—the “elimination from national armaments of atomic weapons and of all other major weapons adaptable to mass destruction”—approaches the problem of international control through the method of limiting or eliminating the weapons themselves. The major questions here raised are whether elimination or limitation of existing weapons and plants would remove the threat of atomic warfare, and whether some stockpiles and plants must be kept in existence in order to provide adequate means of sanction against a state violating the terms of international control.

The fourth objective is to find “effective safeguards by way of inspection and other means to protect complying states against the hazards of violations and evasions”. Such safeguards are made necessary by the exceptional risks which any nation would take in refraining from building up to its full capacity to conduct atomic warfare. Because of this risk, any international limitation agreement would have to include adequate means of reassuring the states complying with the agreement that they would not be at the mercy of any violator of it. Such safeguards might take the form of an inspection system designed to give adequate warning in advance of any steps toward violation, as well as of sanctions of sufficient force to deter any potential violator. Because of the possibilities of surreptitious evasions, the success of any system of safeguards would seem to depend to a large extent on the creation of conditions under which all states would have a strong interest in making the system work.

The paragraph proposing that the Commission should proceed by "separate stages" does not mean that the four objectives previously specified are to be treated as separate stages and each one taken up and completed before the next one is considered. This provision takes account of the fact that the setting up of the essential conditions for a workable system of control cannot be accomplished in one stroke, but must be undertaken gradually, as confidence develops. It recognizes that successful international action with respect to any phase of the problem is not necessarily a prerequisite for undertaking affirmative action with respect to other phases.

The final provision takes note of the fact that the subject of atomic energy necessarily extends into fields already assigned to other organs of the United Nations. Where this is so, the Commission is directed not to infringe upon the responsibilities of such organs but to make recommendations which can be considered by them in the performance of their tasks. In line with paragraph II(a) dealing with the relations of the Commission with the organs of the United Nations, such recommendations would be transmitted through the Security Council.

THE QUESTION OF "SEPARATE STAGES"

There has been considerable confusion about the meaning of the provision in the Moscow Resolution stipulating that the work of the commission shall proceed by "separate stages." This provision comes immediately after the list of four subjects on which the commission was directed to make specific proposals, and it has been assumed by many people, including Senator Vandenberg,²¹ that the four subjects were the separate stages, "the successful completion of each of which will develop the necessary confidence of the world before the next stage is undertaken". The result of this would be that the important subject of safeguards would not be reached until the other three, dealing with exchange of information, control of atomic energy, and elimination of atomic weapons and other means of mass destruction, has been acted upon. It was thus foreseen with some uneasiness by Senator Vandenberg that an exchange of information might be proposed before full security had been achieved for the United States through the establishment of an effective inspection system.

As a matter of fact, the term "separate stages" was not intended to correspond to the four subjects on which the commission was specifically directed to make proposals. This is clear from the text of the Agreed Declaration,²² from which the provisions of the Moscow Resolution were taken verbatim. In the Agreed Declaration the provision about separate stages is followed by another sentence to the effect that "specifically it is considered that the commission might well devote its attention first to the wide exchange of scientists and of scientific information, and as a second stage to the development of full knowledge concerning natural resources of raw materials." This second stage obviously does not correspond with the second of the four subjects mentioned above. Hence it can be assumed that there was no intention to direct the commission to deal with these four subjects separately, completing one before the next was undertaken. The commission is left quite free to consider each subject in relation to the others, and in whatever order it sees fit. Senator Vandenberg was so assured by the Department of State.

There is another more serious issue bearing on the order of the work of the commission. Many people take the position that no step toward international control of atomic weapons should be taken until a system of safeguards satisfactory to the United States has been accepted by the rest of the world. This view holds that not even the normal exchange of general scientific information should be considered until an effective inspection system has been assured in all countries having any capacity to produce bombs. It suggests that the only kind of an international control system which the commission can consider is one which springs full-blown into existence all at once and does not grow by gradual stages.

This position is not supported by any statement of the United States, and would in fact interfere seriously with the commission's work. It is based on the erroneous assumption that our present advantage in possessing bombs will continue indefinitely and that the problem of international control is merely that of inducing other states to accept our terms. As a matter of fact, our advantage is only a temporary one. Other states might well prefer to wait until they had developed their own capacity to make bombs in order to be assured of entering into any scheme of international control on a basis of equality with the United States.

The problem of finding effective safeguards is essentially one of creating conditions under which all states will have a strong interest in making a system of international control work. It has been pointed out in the Agreed Declaration and elsewhere that no system of safeguards can be certain to work against a nation bent on defeating it. The process of setting up the necessary conditions will very likely have to be done in stages, and it was this fact which was foreseen in the "separate stages" provision of the Agreed Declaration and the Moscow Resolution. It would be most unfortunate if the impression were given that this position had now been abandoned, and that the commission could not consider any system of international control that called for gradual steps of development. If that body should be restricted to the consideration of schemes which would provide all nations with full safeguards right from the start, it might well have been given an impossible task.

WASHINGTON, January 11, 1946.²³

The Acting Secretary of State notes that the United Nations Preparatory Commission in London has endorsed the recommendation of the Executive Committee whereby Item 8 on the provisional agenda of the first meetings of the Security Council will be "the adoption of a directive to the Military Staff Committee to meet at a given place and date", and that the Preparatory Commission has also approved the language of the directive itself. Based upon the present plan to hold the inaugural meeting of the General Assembly on January 10, 1946, it may be assumed that the Security Council will be constituted about January 15, and shortly thereafter the Military Staff Committee item on the agenda should be reached. It may therefore be expected that the Military Staff Committee will be duly established and should be holding its first meeting sometime between January 15 and January 20.

²³ Drafted in the Division of International Security Affairs on January 3, 1946.

Anticipating that one of the first tasks of the Military Staff Committee will be the determination of its functions and initial organization, this Government has prepared a paper entitled The Functions and Organization of the Military Staff Committee of the United Nations,²⁴ which sets forth the United States views on this subject, and which is presented by this Government in the expectation that it should prove a useful basis for discussion in the early, organizational days of the Committee. This paper, a copy of which is enclosed, is now being circulated through military channels to the Chiefs of Staff of the permanent members of the Security Council.

This Government has expressed its complete agreement with the proposal of the British Government to hold informal conversations in London, some days prior to the establishment of the Military Staff Committee, among the five initial representations to the Committee.²⁵ With this in mind, it is planned to have the United States military and naval representatives arrive in London in ample time to participate in the suggested talks.

In regard to the form which the permanent representation of the five member nations on the Military Staff Committee should take, it is the view of this Government that this matter can be decided subsequently. In so far as the United States representation is concerned, the Chiefs of Staff propose to appoint representatives from each of the services who will hold rank equivalent to the grade of General or Lieutenant General. The United States Chiefs of Staff feel that they are unable to attend in person the first meeting or meetings of the Military Staff Committee, principally due to the recent changes among the Chiefs of Staff in this country.

A similar memorandum has been addressed to the French and Chinese Governments.

"Molotov has just written to inform us that under United Nations Charter, Article 47, the MSC is a body whose activity is controlled by the Security Council. The Government of the USSR accordingly is of the opinion that it would be premature to take up now practical questions concerning the Committee's activity, prior to the establishment of the Security Council within whose province matters of this type fall. It is the Soviet Government's view that discussion of subjects referred to in Sir Archibald Clark Kerr's letter²⁶ should be inaugurated after the Security Council has been set up at prospective General Assembly session and after the Council has arrived at a decision on item 8 of its agenda regarding the date and place of the first meeting of the Committee, not to mention additional subjects, which may come up in the SC when this question is before it.

It is the view of the Soviet Government, therefore, that both for reasons of procedure and substance the correct method would be to await the consideration of the question of the MSC's establishment in the Security Council before drawing up regulations of the Committee."

In addition, British Embassy has addressed to us an aide-mémoire dated January 9²⁷ in which hope is expressed that we will request from the Soviet Government through our Ambassador, Moscow, the identity of the Soviet representatives to the MSC, and that we will inquire whether the Soviet Government will agree to have these representatives arrive in the UK by January 20. Subject: U.S. Position on Traffic in Arms Phase of the Regulation of Armaments.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff have considered the paper on U.S. position on the traffic in arms phase of the regulation of armaments (Appendix),³³ approved by the Department of State for the guidance of the United States Delegation at the forthcoming meeting of the United Nations Organization, and submit the following comments and recommendations:

It is believed that the discussion in the Appendix does not emphasize that Article 11 of the Charter provides that the General Assembly may only “consider . . . the principles governing disarmament and the regulation of armaments, and may make recommendations with regard to such principles to the Members or to the Security Council or to both” whereas Article 26 charges the Security Council with the responsibility of “formulating, with the assistance of the Military Staff Committee . . . , plans to be submitted to the Members of the United Nations for the establishment of a system for the regulation of armaments.” From the military point of view, it is highly desirable that the United States should clearly maintain the position that while principles may be discussed and recommended by the General Assembly, the actual formulation of specific plans and proposals is the function of the Security Council acting with the assistance of the Military Staff Committee.

In paragraph C of the Annex to Appendix it is proposed that the United States "shall insist on remaining free in the future as in the past to impose prohibitions . . ." on the export of arms and munitions. In addition, it is highly desirable from a military point of view that the United States maintain freedom as to our rights to export arms and munitions to those nations with which we may reach agreement in this respect. It is recommended that such a statement be included, as this point is of particular importance to the United States in view of our current plans to provide arms and munitions to other nations of the Western Hemisphere, the Philippine Commonwealth and to China. It should, however, be provided to the Delegation as supplementary guidance with the understanding that it is not to be advanced in connection with a discussion on private traffic in arms unless the developments of such discussion clearly require.

It is desirable further, that the basic paper be amended to indicate clearly that the position defined therein is applicable to the limited question of private traffic in arms.

U.S. POSITION ON TRAFFIC IN ARMS PHASE OF THE REGULATION OF ARMAMENTS

A memorandum of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, dated January 14, 1946 (SM 4717), which was circulated with a note by the Secretaries of the State-War-Navy Coordinating Committee (SWNCC 219/4),³⁵ relates to a position paper, Traffic in Arms (USGA/Gen/1),³⁶ prepared in this office for the United States Delegation to the United Nations meeting at London. Below are the comments of this Office together with the reasons which make it unable to approve in full the recommendations of the Joint Chiefs of Staff :

1. This Office concurs in the desirability of emphasizing in this paper the responsibility of the Security Council under Article 26 of the Charter in contradistinction to the General Assembly's functions under Article 11 relating to the regulation of armaments. Accordingly, it is proposed to amend the position paper by adding to the second paragraph of the section, "The United States Position", a sentence as follows:

³⁶ Ante, p. 716.

"However, in consideration of these subjects by the General Assembly, it should be borne in mind that the Assembly's jurisdiction is limited to 'principles' whereas it is the responsibility of the Security Council, with the advice and assistance of the Military Staff Committee, to formulate plans in this field (See Article 26)."

2. This Office cannot concur in the recommendation that a statement be included to the effect that this country "maintain freedom as to our rights to export arms and munitions to those nations with which we may reach agreement in this respect," as it is felt that the addition of such a statement would not be necessary to protect such rights in the General Assembly, but might serve as an impediment to the drafting of the desired proposals.

3. Considering that the manufacture of arms and munitions in some states, notably the Soviet Union and Mexico, is a government monopoly, this Office cannot concur in the suggestion that the arms traffic discussions be limited to the private traffic in arms. The tentative position proposed in this paper indicates the advantage of establishing in the various governments a definite responsibility for supervising arms manufacturing activities, and controlling arms exports and imports, and that an approach to the various problems of international regulation could be achieved through uniform domestic legislation enacted by the various states.³⁷

Minutes of the Meeting of the United States Delegation Members Assigned to the Political and Security Committee of the General Assembly, London, January 18, 1946

A draft statement of the United States position with regard to the resolution proposing the establishment of an Atomic Energy Commission was circulated to the meeting.³⁸

³⁷ The international traffic in arms was not considered by the General Assembly at its first session. Efforts to formulate a unified United States policy on the subject fell into abeyance thereafter. Regarding the status of policy at mid-year, see document PCA D-5, June 7, p. 840.

³⁸ The draft has not been found in Department of State files. For the text of the statement delivered by Senator Connally at the 2nd Meeting of the First Committee of the General Assembly, January 21, see United Nations, Official

After some discussion it was decided that a drafting committee consisting of Messrs. Cohen,³⁹ Pasvolsky⁴⁰ and McRae⁴¹ should revise the statement to a form suitable for introduction to Committee I and submit it to Senator Connally⁴² for his approval. The purpose of the revision would be (1) to eliminate those parts of the draft statement which seemed directed to the American public rather than to an international body; and (2) to give emphasis to the U.S. conception as to how the proposed Commission would operate. Senator Connally also stated that in his opinion the statement should be compressed.

Mr. Pasvolsky pointed out that one of the principal questions that would be raised in the deliberations of Committee I would be as to how the Commission could establish effective safeguards against atomic disclosures without knowing more about the details of the matters involved. It was agreed that this question could not be answered in an entirely satisfactory manner. Mr. McRae pointed out that certain safeguards could be agreed upon based on hypothetical cases and Mr. Cohen added that on the basis of the testimony of scientists the Commission could make recommendations as to the adequacy of proposed safeguards. He pointed out further that under the Charter the Commission has no coercive power to compel disclosures from any nations or from any witnesses.

Admiral Turner raised the question of the meaning of the phrase "other major weapons adapted to mass destruction" and pointed out that this made the work of the Commission assume the proportions of a disarmament conference. Mr. Cohen stated that the reason this phrase was inserted in the proposed resolution was to enable the Commission to produce well balanced recommendations as atomic weapons were only one part of a larger problem. If the Commission made recommendations concerning the control of the atomic bomb alone, such recommendations would be lop-sided if in fact there were other important weapons on which similar controls should be placed.

Records of the General Assembly, First Session, First Part, First Committee, p. 7. Hereafter cited as GA (I/1), First Committee.

The First Committee recommended, without opposition, that the proposed resolution be adopted. At its 17th Meeting, January 24, the General Assembly unanimously approved the resolution. For text, see United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, First Session, First Part, Resolutions Adopted by the General Assembly during the First Part of the First Session, p. 9. Hereafter cited as GA (I/1), Resolutions.

⁴¹ William A. McRae, Adviser, United States Delegation to the General Assembly.

⁴² Tom Connally, United States Senator from Texas; Chairman, Senate Foreign Relations Committee; Representative to the General Assembly.

Mr. Pasvolsky suggested that it would be advisable to have a preliminary meeting of the nations sponsoring the atomic resolution prior to its discussion in Committee 1. Senator Connally stated that he would take this matter up with Mr. Byrnes.

[Here follows a brief discussion of another subject.]

Mr. Johnson⁴³ pointed out that the Secretariat in drawing up the business for Committee 1 had put consideration of the atomic resolution as the first order of business. Senator Connally stated that Mr. Byrnes was anxious to have the work on the atomic resolution given priority.

With UK having failed in efforts for discussions pre-MSA meeting; with Soviet linking the despatch of their representatives to adoption of a decision re MSA by SC (Moscow's 31, January 18);⁴⁵ with France and China unlikely to take initiative, there remains only US to make a proposal. Would it be unrealistic to propose sometime within next 10 days, say, January 25 or 28? Unless we are willing to propose a specific date we lose the value thereof in spurring action on other matters as well as render open to doubt our earlier assertions of desire to see MSA meet and organize without delay.⁴⁶

⁴⁶ At its 2nd Meeting in London, January 25, the Security Council adopted without objection the draft directive which the Preparatory Commission had recommended that the Council issue to the Military Staff Committee; for text, see United Nations, Official Records of the Security Council, First Year, First Series, Supplement No. 1, Annex 1, Section 3, p. 2. The date for the convening of the MSA was not specified in the directive. At the suggestion of the United States, the date was set at February 1. The MSA actually first met on February 4 at which time the United States representatives presented a proposal "Views on the Functions and Organization of the Military Staff Committee of the United Nations." That document had been approved by the State-War-Navy Coordinating Committee as Appendix A of document SWNCC 219/3 on December 12, 1945. The United States draft served as the basis for discussion in the drafting of MSA rules of procedure; the rules adopted by the MSA on February 14 and under which the MSA was directed to operate provisionally by the Security Council on February 16 drew heavily upon the United States proposal.

ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION

MR. ROYALL⁵² asked what was the exact function of the recently appointed Atomic Energy Commission.⁵³ MR. ACHESON⁵⁴ said that before Secretary Byrnes left he had been talking to him about what the American member on the United Nations Atomic Commission would say when and if that Commission is set up, and he is asked by his colleagues what he can tell them. Mr. Byrnes talked to the President about this problem and then appointed the Commission composed of Mr. Acheson, Mr. McCloy,⁵⁵ Dr. Bush,⁵⁶ Dr. Conant⁵⁷ and General Groves. The Commission has had two meetings and its function as stated in the announcement is to study the question of safeguards and control of atomic energy so that the American member on the Commission may be told what to say. The Commission was appointed to advise the Secretary of State and not Congress. The Commission decided to get some of the men who have been working with General Groves to assemble the facts. The men selected are Dr. Oppenheimer,⁵⁸ ⁵⁰ In a letter to Mr. Byrnes on January 23, Mr. Bevin stated that Mr. Attlee had agreed to defer his statement (Department of State Atomic Energy Files).

⁵¹ The Secretaries of the State, War, and Navy Departments or their representatives met on an almost weekly basis in 1946. Mr. Acheson usually represented the Department of State due to the frequent absence from Washington of Secretary Byrnes. Records of these meetings exist in the Central Files of the Department of State under enclosure number 811.002/1-2446.

There are many questions the answers to which the Commission should know, such as: (1) Raw materials. Are they scattered and in large quantities over the face of the earth, or are they concentrated in a few areas and in small quantities? (2) Technical trends. Will the bomb be produced in small and decentralized plants or must there be a large plant? (3) Cost factors. Is it the poor man's weapon or the rich man's weapon? MR. ROYALL said that he had been urging the War Department to take steps in the direction of compiling this information which he felt should have been done long ago. He spoke of the existing confusion in Congress and at the White House, etc., and said he was glad such a Commission has been set up. MR. FORRESTAL⁶³ agreed. MR. ACHESON said that after yesterday's meeting of the Commission he had talked with Senator McMahon⁶⁴ and told him that he will go over with him whatever conclusions are reached. He said that Senator McMahon had agreed not to call the people working with this Commission to testify.

MR. PETERSEN asked how the Commission could be coordinated with the Joint Chiefs of Staff who are responsible for instructions to our military staff people on the United Nations. MR. ACHESON said that for the time being the Commission will rely on General Groves to tell it if it is going in the wrong direction. When Mr. McCloy returns they will talk to General Eisenhower,⁶⁵ Admiral Nimitz,⁶⁶ and General Groves. He reiterated that the purpose of the Commission is to keep our delegates advised of possible pitfalls to be avoided. MR. ROYALL inquired whether the State Department had been asked for its views

GUIDANCE AS TO THE MILITARY IMPLICATIONS OF A UNITED NATIONS
COMMISSION ON ATOMIC ENERGY

REPORT BY THE JOINT STRATEGIC SURVEY COMMITTEE IN COLLABORATION WITH THE JOINT STAFF PLANNERS AFTER CONSULTATION WITH THE COMMANDING GENERAL, MANHATTAN DISTRICT⁶⁸

THE PROBLEM

1. To develop conclusions as to the military implications of the creation of a United Nations Commission on Atomic Energy.
2. To provide guidance to the representatives of the United States Chiefs of Staff on the Military Staff Committee of the United Nations as to the military advice to be given the United States representative on the Commission on Atomic Energy.
3. J.C.S. 1567/25⁶⁹ was considered by the Joint Strategic Survey Committee and the Joint Staff Planners in connection with this study.

FACTS BEARING ON THE PROBLEM AND DISCUSSION

4. See Appendix "A" (page 131).

⁶⁷ In regard to Congressional legislation on atomic energy in 1946, see Hewlett and Anderson, Chapter 14.

^{67a} Reproduced in SWNCC 253, January 24, 1946.

⁶⁸ The Joint Strategic Survey Committee, a wartime inter-service body established on November 7, 1942, made recommendations to the Joint Chiefs of Staff on global and theatre policy. The JSSC continued to concern itself with national policy and world strategy in 1946. It frequently drafted JCS positions on matters pending before the State-War-Navy Coordinating Committee; its members sat on SWNCC's Ad Hoc Committee on United Nations Security Functions. With respect to SWNCC and its Ad Hoc Committee, see footnote 73, p. 754. The Joint Staff Planners was similarly an inter-service group created in 1942 which continued to advise the JCS on strategic matters. Manhattan District was the wartime code name for the atomic bomb development program commanded by Maj. Gen. Leslie R. Groves; the designation continued to be employed after the nature of the project became public knowledge.

RECOMMENDATIONS

5. It is recommended that the Joint Chiefs of Staff agree that:

a. Rapid resolution by the Congress of the United States as to the governmental machinery for handling matters connected with atomic energy and the security thereof is desirable in the interest of sound action in the international field.

b. The production of atomic energy for industrial and scientific use by any nation will place that nation within a short step of the immediate capability of production of the atom bomb. Information essential to such use of atomic energy must be therefore regarded as in the same category as the "know how" of the atomic bomb itself.

c. No realistic system of inspection and control is as yet apparent which will ensure against the production of atomic bombs for military use in a nation which possesses such capability. However, in view of the certain alternative that failure of international regulation and control will result in an atomic armament race, every effort must continue to be made to develop and establish such a system.

d. Atomic weapons can be most effectively used against highly developed nations having centralized industries. The United States is such a nation. Consequently it is to the interest of the United States to assume active leadership in establishing international means to control atomic weapons. So long as the United States is the sole nation actually having atomic bombs and is furthest advanced in the field of atomic energy, it holds a preeminent position for the exercise of such leadership. This preeminence will wane with the passage of time. Therefore, all possible action should be taken under United States leadership before other nations develop their own atomic weapons.

e. The United States is committed to the establishment of a Commission on Atomic Energy under the United Nations in accordance with and for the purposes defined in the declaration on atomic energy of 15 November 1945, issued by President Truman and Prime Ministers Attlee and King and in the communique of 27 December 1945 from Moscow following the meeting of the Foreign Ministers of the United States, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the United Kingdom.

f. The work of the Commission is of vital interest to the United States from the standpoint of its national security.

6. It is not possible to state categorically in specific and comprehensive terms the military implications of the creation of a United Nations Commission on Atomic Energy, and the consequent opening of this matter to consideration and action by that Commission. While it is not possible to furnish a firm and complete list of objectives to be sought by the U.S. representative, it is apparent that any revelation of atomic information now held alone by the United States accelerates the rate at which other nations reach equality in respect to atomic weapons. The degree of agreed safeguards must thus be the criterion of the amount of information disclosed.

7. Much reliance will have to be placed on step by step analysis of problems as they arise in committee. The representatives of the United States Chiefs of Staff on the Military Staff Committee of the United Nations should be given a position advisory to the United States Representative on the Commission. Furthermore, there should be available, both as an assistant to the United States Member on the Commission and as one of the United States Military Staff Committee organization, an individual cognizant of matters of atomic energy and with a broad military background.

8. As a statement of implicit limitations on the functions of the Committee, the Representatives of the Joint Chiefs of Staff on the Military Staff Committee should be guided by the following principles:

a. It is essential that any action contemplated in the Commission be not prejudicial to the security of the United States.

b. Progress should not be hurried. Painstaking examination and thorough coordination of each step within the United States Government are required.

c. A satisfactory solution from the United States' point of view of the problem of effective controls and safeguards must be arrived at before any disclosure or exchange of specialized technological information is agreed.

d. Normal reciprocal peacetime interchange of basic scientific information and the restricted interchange of scientists and students is acceptable only under the limitations imposed in paragraph 17 of Appendix "A" and in subparagraphs a and b above.

e. Exchange of information on raw materials should not be undertaken at the present.

9. A copy of this paper be transmitted to the State-War-Navy Coordinating Committee for consideration in formulating the State Department's instructions to the United States Delegation to the United Nations Organization.

10. This paper be transmitted by the Joint Chiefs of Staff to their representatives on the Military Staff Committee of the United Nations for their interim information with the caution that it is a highly classified document and should be discussed only with United States personnel authorized to deal with matters concerning atomic energy.

Appendix "A"

FACTS BEARING ON THE PROBLEM AND DISCUSSION

1. On 15 August 1945, the President issued the following memorandum . . . to the Secretaries of State, War and the Navy, the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Director of the Office of Scientific Research and Development:

“Appropriate departments of the Government and the Joint Chiefs of Staff are hereby directed to take such steps as are necessary to prevent the release of any information in regard to the development, design or production of the atomic bomb; or in regard to its employment in military or naval warfare, except with the specific approval of the President in each instance.”

2. On 30 August 1945, the President modified his memorandum of 15 August 1945, . . . to permit:

“a. Identification of individuals and organizations now or formerly associated with the project together with disclosure of the general nature of their project activities, subject to rules already laid down by the War Department. These rules prohibit the release of any information of value to any foreign government which that government could not easily obtain without recourse to espionage.

“b. Release by the War Department of information of general interest which in the opinion of the Department will not jeopardize national security.”

3. The question as to how matters related to atomic energy will be controlled within the United States has not yet been settled. There are several bills before Congress now under consideration by the Special Committee on Atomic Energy of the U.S. Senate. It appears probable that a commission on the Cabinet level will be established to oversee all matters related to atomic energy and that the legislation establishing this commission will impose definite security regulations and some measure of Congressional control upon the commission.

4. On 15 November 1945, the President of the United States and the Prime Ministers of the United Kingdom and Canada jointly issued a declaration on atomic energy which suggested the establishment of a Commission on Atomic Energy under the United Nations. The full text of this declaration is attached as Appendix “B” (page 144).⁷⁰

5. On 27 December 1945, the Foreign Ministers of the United States, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and the United Kingdom jointly issued a communiqué outlining the agreements reached by them at their meeting in Moscow. In Section VII of this communiqué, the Foreign Ministers agreed to recommend to the General Assembly of the United Nations at its first session, that a commission be established to consider problems arising from the discovery of atomic energy and related matters. The full text of Section VII of the communiqué is attached as Appendix “C” (page 148).⁷¹

6. The above mentioned declaration and communiqué established as major missions of the proposed commission the preparation of recommendations for control of atomic energy to ensure its use only for peaceful purposes; for the elimination of atomic weapons and all other major weapons of mass destruction; and the provision of adequate safeguards against use of atomic weapons. Atomic weapons as presently known consist primarily of the atomic bomb. Radio-active by-products of the manufacture of atomic bombs also have a potential military use. "Other weapons of mass destruction" such as gas and biological warfare are not discussed herein since it is considered that their elimination is a somewhat separate problem.

7. The precise military characteristics and effects of atomic weapons have not as yet been fully developed, but the following general points may be assumed as factual :

a. The explosive effect of the present atomic bomb is roughly equal to that of 20,000 tons of TNT. As the development of the new weapon progresses, it is reasonable to expect that its effectiveness will increase.

b. The explosion of the bomb is accompanied by heat of solar proportions and the creation of radio-active material which, if the bomb explodes on or very near the surface of the ground or water, impregnates a limited area of that surface to such an extent that lethal effects may for sometime result to humans moving through the area affected.

c. The bomb is presently best transported by aircraft but could in anticipation of its future use be transported piecemeal to the target in secret, assembled on the spot, and exploded by remote control. In the future, it might be delivered by rockets and guided missiles, launched alone or from subsidiary airborne, surface or sub-surface carriers.

d. There are no defensive measures now envisaged which will guarantee protection of vital points from atomic weapon attack.

e. The elements presently utilizable for manufacture of the bomb are uranium and possibly thorium. All major powers have access in some degree to the necessary raw materials, but control of areas of rich deposits and assured communications thereto will assume increasing strategic importance.

f. Radio-active materials can be produced as a by-product to either production of atomic bombs or power in an atomic energy plant. Consideration has been given to the utilization of such radio-active materials to force the evacuation of vital points or to deny sizeable areas of terrain to any enemy armed force. Present indications are that such use would not be of extreme military importance because of difficulties attendant to their proper utilization and to the fact that they probably are no more effective than existing known gases under many conditions. Moreover, such utilization of radio-active materials probably would be considered to be in the same category as gas warfare and therefore barred by existing agreements.

8. The "secret" of the atomic bomb is not so much a scientific secret as it is one of scientific, industrial and engineering "know how" and particularly "top notch" American management and the ability to produce in quantity the intricate instruments, equipment and machinery required.

9. The manufacture of fissionable elements for use in atomic explosives is a gigantic undertaking. Any great power, starting from scratch with presently available information and determined to produce atomic explosives, can be expected to do so within five to seven years, if it received assistance in the procurement and use of specialized equipment and machinery from nations best able to produce them, and within fifteen to twenty years without such outside assistance.

10. Atomic weapons increase the incentive to aggression by enhancing the advantage of surprise. They can most easily be used in such fashion by authoritarian or totalitarian nations. They would be most effective against highly developed nations where industries are centralized, the national mode of life would not easily accept the cost and disruption of decentralization, and where complete military preparedness is difficult to maintain. The United States falls in this latter category of nations, and, consequently, it is highly to its advantage to take the lead in establishing means to control atomic weapons. To this end, it is most desirable that the proposed commission on a Cabinet level, mentioned in paragraph 3 on page 131, be established at an early date so that international negotiations may be adequately directed.

11. Enemy states in possession of atomic weapons can deliver destructive force thousands of times more effective than previously possible. A nation attacked with such weapons must be highly courageous and disciplined to withstand the mass killings that would result, and still be able to continue to fight. Its most effective use would be against cities and industrial concentrations, and a relatively few bombs successfully delivered could kill millions of people and destroy a large percentage of the total critical industrial capacity. The implications of atomic warfare, so long as no effective international safeguards exist, emphasize the necessity for the United States to maintain:

a. Forward bases from which aircraft could intercept attacks against the United States and in counter-attacks could deliver bombs against possible enemies.

b. Balanced armed forces, including highly perfected air forces, in a state of readiness, capable of: holding these bases; maintaining sea and air communications to them; retaining control of the land, air and sea spaces around the United States; providing instantaneous defense against air attack or sea forays against the United States; delivering offensive action by a striking force to the limit feasible.

c. Additional forces capable of very rapid mobilization to provide full defensive organization against atomic weapon attack and to provide further augmentation to offensive or holding forces in the field.

d. Adequate plans for complete mobilization of the country, including the civilian population, in order to carry on production in the face of great destruction, to prevent sabotage and secret delivery of atomic weapons, and to avoid hysteria and panic.

12. Future peacetime uses of atomic energy are considered possible, but the threat of military use will overshadow them until a system of effective world-wide control of military use is established. Highly important in this connection is the fact that materials used in atomic-energy plants as presently envisaged could rapidly and comparatively easily be converted into bombs. Furthermore, atomic-energy plants could produce fissionable materials as a by-product of producing controlled energy. Any system of inspection for the purpose of controlling war-like use of atomic energy will be greatly complicated should industrial use be authorized and in practice. Therefore, international disclosure of technological information even for peaceful use should be withheld until effective inspections, controls and safeguards against military use are established.

13. Effective international control to guarantee that atomic weapons could not be used by an aggressor nation is virtually impossible under the present concept of a world divided into nations maintaining their full sovereignty. No system of inspection can be expected to be one hundred per cent effective in such a world, and ninety-nine per cent effectiveness is no guarantee. The best possible system of inspection is a necessary adjunct to any effort at control but effective sanctions, should inspection uncover violations, are equally vital. Since such sanctions probably cannot be applied by the United Nations, at present, because of the veto provision, immediate consultation and agreement of nations other than the offending state will be necessary. Obviously the United Nations system will then have broken down as such. The final solution, as yet apparently unattainable, is the creation of a world state in which all nations surrender sufficient of their sovereignty to assure the rule of law and the prevention, if not of war itself, of illicit means of waging war.

14. The prospective negotiation of atomic energy matters by representatives of the United States must be done with the nicest balance between the requirements for international cooperation on the one hand and an enlightened understanding of the demands of national interest and national security on the other. In this regard, the probable intent of Congress to hold close control over atomic energy matters must be kept in mind. The United States is in fact the sole power which holds the necessary scientific knowledge and has existing manufacturing plants which permit the production of atomic weapons. The United States thus holds a position of pre-eminence in the field and by virtue of this position and the part played in developing the weapon has a great responsibility to the world to maintain enlightened leadership in formulating the international controls and safeguards required.

15. The declaration by President Truman and Prime Ministers Attlee and King, issued on 15 November 1945 (Appendix "B") states that they are of the opinion that a commission under the United Nations should be established to prepare recommendations on how to attain the most effective means for entirely eliminating the use of atomic energy for destructive purposes and promoting its widest use for industrial and humanitarian purposes. The commission should, according to the declaration, make specific recommendations:

"(a) For extending between all nations the exchange of basic scientific information for peaceful ends.

"(b) For control of atomic energy to the extent necessary to insure its use only for peaceful purposes.

"(c) For the elimination from national armaments of atomic weapons and of all other major weapons adaptable to mass destruction.

"(d) For effective safeguards by way of inspection and other means to protect complying states against the hazards of violations and evasions."

The declaration goes on to say that the work of the commission should proceed by separate stages, the successful completion of each one of which will develop the necessary confidence of the world before the next stage is undertaken. Work by separate stages is interpreted to mean that affirmative action along any fruitful lines is permissible so long as effective safeguards are in force before information contributing to the production of atomic weapons is revealed.

16. The communiqué from Moscow (Appendix "C") repeats almost verbatim the above missions for the commission and, in addition, clarifies its composition and competence and proposes to place it, for matters affecting international peace, under the Security Council of the United Nations. Neither in the declaration nor in the communiqué is it clearly stated in which order the separate stages shall be considered, except perhaps by implication.

17. The matter of the exchange of basic scientific information for peaceful ends as a possible first step, has raised considerable controversy, particularly if it is envisaged to mean completely free exchange visits of scientists. As stated above, the "secret" of the atomic bomb is less a matter of restricting the dissemination of knowledge related to nuclear physics than it is in retaining information as to the application of this knowledge to the mass production of essential ingredients and their assembly in the bomb. Pure science is international in times of peace and complete control of atomic research is virtually impossible. The interchange of scientific information and advances in scientific thought existed before World War II through the medium of technical journals and through conventions of scientists and their normal travel and study. Any restriction on such an interchange would meet great resistance and might slow down appreciably advance in peaceful fields. However, the interests of national and world security are jeopardized when scientists holding either the theoretical or the practical knowledge of production are given authority to exchange this knowledge with others who may, through lack of effective controls and safeguards, be free to apply the knowledge gained towards selfish individual or national aims not in consonance with the world effort to abolish all use of atomic weapons. In paragraphs 5 and 6 of Appendix "B" this problem is discussed and the answer there suggested appears sound, i.e., that detailed information concerning the practical application of atomic energy can be shared only so soon as effective, enforceable safeguards against its use for destructive purposes can be devised. Therefore, no interchange of information other than basic theory and no interchange of numbers of scientists holding detailed information regarding production and application of fissionable materials should be permitted until definite progress has been made in the field of safeguards and controls.

18. As for the control of atomic energy to the extent necessary to insure its use only for peaceful purposes, this is inevitably only a phase of the elimination from national armaments of atomic weapons and the provision of adequate safeguards to protect complying states from the hazards of violation. As stated above, the materials used for the peaceful industrial applications of atomic energy are precisely those which are used in atomic weapons, and the problem of their production is more difficult than their final adaptation to form the bomb. Once produced, they can be relatively rapidly, easily, and secretly diverted from peaceful use and made into atomic weapons. Even the most extensive and effective inspectional machinery might find it impossible to detect on all occasions such a diversion, particularly if it were done bit by bit over an extended period of time. The surest guarantee against such action could only come from the basic conviction by all individuals and all nations concerned that atomic energy should not be used in weapons. This conviction must be recognized as impossible of attainment, certainly, at any rate, under the present world order.

19. Inspection can be relatively effective only if the inspecting teams are fully cognizant of the processes for manufacturing and applying atomic energy to warlike use. No great power is likely to trust the reports of inspectors of other nationalities. Furthermore, to admit inspectors of alien allegiance into U.S. industrial installations, let alone into U.S. plants producing fissionable materials, would be to violate all present day concepts of patent rights and the rights to secret commercial processes. To apply the concept of completely free inspection in all other nations of the world would be equally revolutionary and equally unlikely to be accepted. Therefore, to establish an even partially effective inspection system will be an unprecedented and most difficult task. One variation of the inspectional scheme envisages dependence on national inspection forces, each inspecting within its own country and being inspected in turn by an international inspection force. This is comparable to the present international system of controlling narcotic drugs and has, in that field, been relatively successful. However, it is a well-known fact that quantities of narcotic drugs are still sold in all parts of the world to those willing to pay the price demanded. Therefore, in view of the potentialities of the atomic energy, it is believed that such a system of control would be entirely unacceptable.

20. The provision of rapid and effective counter-action, including war, against any nation using or taking steps to use atomic weapons might be easier to attain. Under this concept the violation of the atomic agreement by any nations would be considered by all others as a prima facie act of war and all possible effective action against the aggressor would be enforced. The application of such measures would, it is true, be an admission of failure and would most probably mean the plunging of the world into atomic warfare. Nevertheless, such a system seems vital. The danger of any one nation electing to use atomic weapons should be measurably lessened if it were realized that all others capable of using atomic weapons or any other means of force would effectively apply these means against the aggressor. This is an extension of the present basis for the enforcement of world peace as set forth in the Charter of the United Nations, with one notable difference, i.e., no offending nation, whether it be one of the five permanent members of the Security Council or not, would be free from the threat of the use of force by all others. The whole concept of effective action against a great power intent on violating its agreement is a highly theoretical and controversial matter which can only be resolved, nationally and internationally, after much discussion and negotiation.

21. The United States already has available atomic weapons in some quantity, has used them, and is making more of them. Consequently, it would be logically difficult to forbid other powers from developing and making ready atomic weapons unless the United States ceases production and destroys all its bombs or unless all other nations agreed to make the United States the trustee of the weapons; agreed further that no others should manufacture them and that if any attempted to do so, it would be proper that U.S. atomic bombs, in conjunction with the forces of the balance of the United Nations, should be used to destroy the unauthorized manufacturing plants. The United States should not destroy its bombs, and as to the second alternative, it seems unlikely that other major powers, as for instance the USSR, would agree. However, appointment of the United States as a trustee of the bomb might profitably be explored, since, if universally accepted, it would provide an interim means for enforcing the safe development of atomic energy.

22. Whether or not such an interim step be feasible or even desirable, the important situation to plan upon is the ultimate one where some or all nations are using atomic energy for peaceful purposes. This implies that they have then readily available the basic materials for conversion to atomic weapons. Under this hypothesis and by that time the necessity for agreement on effective action to be taken against a violator is apparent, and the United States should take the lead in establishing provision for such action. It is not to be envisaged that the United States would ever use the atomic bomb except against an aggressor state. Therefore, the national interest of the United States would coincide with that of other non-offender nations and the threat of the use of the atomic bomb would be a great deterrent to any aggressor which might be considering embarking on an atomic war. A pool of atomic weapons under the Security Council, with provisions prohibiting the existence of any other atomic weapons, has been proposed. Were it not for the veto power this procedure might be of value, but, with the failure of the Security Council to operate, no legal means of using this pool against a major aggressor appears available. Again, the location and trusteeship of the pool present difficulties. The Council has no inviolate territory of its own; agreement as to custodianship of all weapons by any one nation seems impracticable to achieve. Division of them among several, or many, nations will be simply furnishing those trustee nations with ready-made surprise weapons. The realistic working out of a scheme whereby such a pool could be established is therefore exceedingly difficult since the location of the pool, the means of using the pool, and its protection against capture by an unscrupulous power are matters hard to resolve.

23. A system of inspection should not be considered as a completely reliable solution to the problems raised by the development of atomic energy. Correlative with the establishment of such a system, the United States should support, realistically and vigorously, development of education throughout the world, to push towards the establishment of the regime of world law and order wherein lies the only hope for a more permanent removal of the dangers inherent in atomic weapons.

24. The great complexity of the problems discussed above leads to the conclusion that progress can be expected to be slow. The United Nations in the first days of the existence of their organization will be hard put to solve the problems involved. Close integration of action proposed by the United States representatives on the Atomic Commission with the views of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the State-War-Navy Coordinating Committee, appropriate Congressional leaders, and finally with the President, is essential.

Department of State Atomic Energy Files

*Memorandum by Dr. J. Robert Oppenheimer*⁷²

[WASHINGTON, February 2, 1946.]

In these notes I shall write down some of the non-technical things that have seemed to me relevant to the establishment of effective international control of atomic energy, and make, in rather broad terms, proposals on the basis of which a sound solution can in my opinion be sought. I shall write these notes against the background of our discussions in the past days, and with the thought in mind that the technical basis of many of the judgments will be provided in a separate report.

1. It is probable that the main desire of our Government is the achievement of safety and protection against the threat of atomic warfare. Even if it were possible to achieve this without considering such positive features as the extension of knowledge and its application to constructive purposes, it might be argued that such a course should not be followed. It is my belief that quite apart from its desirability, the provision for constructive development of the field of atomic energy will turn out to be essential for the operation of any system of safeguards. You have seen in the last days evidence of the enthusiasm, inventiveness, and intelligence that has gone into the development of the field in this country, and that has manifested itself even in such relatively peripheral matters as the exploration of raw material resources. I believe that just these elements must be brought to bear on the problem of control if there is to be any chance for a real solution. In particular, it has become clear to us that not only politically, but scientifically and technically as well, the field of atomic energy has witnessed very rapid change and very rapid progress. I believe that this will be the case in the future, too, and that no organization and no proposal can be effective which does not have a flexibility adequate to these changes. I further believe that any proposed organization must itself reflect the changing character of the problem and the constructive purposes which are a complement to control. It is clear that quite apart from any organizational details, the objectives here outlined will require a genuine cooperation and not a mere acquiescence on the part of the participating powers and agencies. As I understand it, the primary function of the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission must be to lay the basis for such cooperative approach to the problem.

2. The position of the three powers, the United States, the United Kingdom, and Canada, that have in the past collaborated in the development of atomic energy, is a rather special one, and that of the United States perhaps the most special of all. There are two parts to this: our technical advantage put us in a position to exercise disproportionate influence in shaping the proposals made, and our greater scientific and technical mastery of the problem should give us greater insight into the implications of a proposed solution and the character of the steps necessary to achieve it.

It has from the first, seemed important to balance our technical superiority insofar as possible by allowing the proposals to be formulated as a result of multilateral discussion, rather than through acceptance of a plan elaborated unilaterally by us. It would seem to be inevitable that differences of opinion similar to those which appeared in the Panel, but far more profound, would be expressed in approaching the organizational problems of control. Here again it would seem to me neither desirable, nor in any long term practical, to avoid a discussion of these issues in an attempt at their constructive reconciliation. Just this possibility is in fact my ground for believing that the negotiations we are now discussing may provide a prototype for more difficult future problems.
