Employes, Inmates Profit From State Reformatory Study

An educational program in a Wisconsin correctional institution, first intended only for the inmates, has so proved its worth, according to a staff announcement, that it is now being extended to employees to increase their own vocational fitness. This development was reported at the Wisconsin state reformatory at Green Bay, where the educational program was started 20 years ago by the University of Wisconsin extension division.

B. P. Kramer, superintendent, and Steve C. Govin, director of education, disclosed that in cooperation with the state board of vocational and adult education 48 employees have just completed the junior course in first aid, have passed the final examination and qualified for the Juniper Red Cross first aid certificates.

Mr. Govin who is on the staff of the University Extension division at the reformatory, reported that the educational program of the extension division, involving several hundred courses of study, also plays its part in the educational activities of the employees as well as of inmates, and that during the past two years a number of employees have completed courses pertaining to their work in the institution.

The first aid course was conducted by Lee Palmer, vocational instructor in first aid for trades, industries, and municipalities. Through H. O. Eiken, director of the Green Bay vocational school, and Arthur Boufard, supervisor of trades and industries for Green Bay, the reformatory also offers instruction in barbering for inmate students. L. L. Kabat, circuit instructor in barbering, has been assisting in training prospective barbers in the institution for two years, and in furthering apprenticeship training in other trades.

Two years ago commercial students at the reformatory won high honors in a nationwide contest involving skills in commercial subjects.

Prof. Chester Allen, of the extension division, identified with the educational programs in Wisconsin's correctional institutions from the beginning, cited Green Bay's high ranking in its educational work as due to the individual treatment which seeks to find the best type of educational work activity for each inmate.

Students Warned of Risks In Aircraft Training Ventures

No connection exists between the aircraft manufacturers and private aviation training schools, and skilled help no longer is in great demand by the west coast manufacturers, according to the Los Angeles chamber of commerce in a statement sent to the University of Wisconsin extension division. Many young men not qualified physically or mentally have been brought to California by private schools, the chamber asserted, and have found themselves unable to secure the employment they sought.

The Los Angeles source asserted that the reservoir of skilled help has practically been absorbed by the industry, and warned against investing money in travel expense and courses of uncertain value without first learning all the facts.

The Extension division at Madison, which with several state government agencies has long been active in investigating commercial school claims in many fields, cautioned Wisconsin residents against accepting at face value the advertised claims of many residence or correspondence study aviation schools, now increasing in number. Schools of both types were represented as implying, if not actually promising, good paying positions at the completion of courses.

"Know the facts" and "investigate before investing" were two admonitions urged upon Wisconsin people interested in job-training opportunities. Prospective students were warned against making down payments, paying money to an agent away from the school premises, signing for a course upon promise of a job upon completion, or signing on money-back agreements. All such procedures were declared to violate the standards of fair practice set by the federal trade commission.

Students were advised to confer with their vocational school director and high school principal concerning job-training opportunities or on other courses not offered in connection with standard institutions of learning.

Throughout Business World, She Becomes "Saleslady" for U. W. Coeds

Her job is to be a sort of saleslady for a thousand or so Wisconsin coeds, but Miss Margaret Hebard is entering upon her new work on the University of Wisconsin campus here with all the confidence in the world.

She doesn't see how she can fail, she says, because Wisconsin women students get as good training as can be had at any school in the country, and she claims that during these days of defense preparations the business world is looking more and more to broadly trained women to fill in the jobs left vacant by men who have entered the services of Uncle Sam.

Miss Hebard joined the staff of Mrs. Louise T. Greeley, dean of women at the University of Wisconsin June 1. Her job in Dean Greeley's office in old Lathrop hall on the Wisconsin campus will be to give occupational advice and guidance to women students enrolled in the University's general arts and letters course.

The ultimate aim of her work will not only be to help the girls find jobs after graduation, but to also help the jobs, scattered throughout the business world of Wisconsin and the nation, find the Wisconsin coeds.

For some months, Dean Greeley has felt that Wisconsin needed someone with special training and experience to help Wisconsin women graduates in the general arts and letters course with their occupational guidance and job placement problems. But the University had no money with which to employ such a person. So with the usual womanly initiative, Dean Greeley obtained a right now she is busy on the campus interviewing women members of this year's graduating class. Later she expects to travel throughout Wisconsin and the mid-west, and even to the East, talking with employers in all business fields, to learn their needs and requirements for women employees, to find out the job possibilities they have now and for the future—and finally to "sell" them a Wisconsin trained woman graduate.

Miss Hebard is well-trained for her new work at Wisconsin. A graduate of Smith College in Massachusetts, she has been working in the business world for 10 years. She came to Wisconsin from the Macy store in New York, where she had charge of the training of junior executives, many of whom were college graduates.

She talks the language of the business world, and she expects her experience in it will help her to "sell" Wisconsin women graduates to it.
