Fredrick Aandahl supervised the initial planning of this volume. William Z. Slany succeeded him as editor in 1975 and directed the process of compilation, review, and editing with the assistance of Ralph R. Goodwin and N. Stephen Kane.

Mr. Goodwin prepared all of the documentation for this volume. Supplementary documentation relating to certain problems arising under the United States-United Nations Headquarters Agreement was prepared and incorporated into the volume by Thomas E. Donilon. David H. Stauffer arranged for declassification of the documents, and Ruth M. Worthing and Evans Gerakas provided editorial and technical assistance.

The editors acknowledge with appreciation the assistance provided them by the staffs of the Dwight D. Eisenhower Library and the United States Mission to the United Nations which helped in locating various documents and facilitated their declassification and publication. Thanks are also due to those foreign governments that kindly granted permission for publication of certain of their documents in this volume.

The technical editing of this volume was the responsibility of the Publishing and Reproduction Division (Paul M. Washington, Chief). The Index was prepared by Francis C. Prescott.

PRINCIPLES FOR THE COMPILATION AND EDITING OF "FOREIGN RELATIONS"

The principles which guide the compilation and editing of Foreign Relations are stated in Department of State Regulation 2 FAM 1350 of June 15, 1961, a revision of the order approved on March 26, 1925, by Mr. Frank B. Kellogg, then Secretary of State. The text of the regulation, as further amended, is printed below:

1350 DOCUMENTARY RECORD OF AMERICAN DIPLOMACY

1351 Scope of Documentation

The publication Foreign Relations of the United States constitutes the official record of the foreign policy of the United States. These volumes include, subject to necessary security considerations, all documents needed to give a comprehensive record of the major foreign policy decisions within the range of the Department of State's responsibilities, together with appropriate materials concerning the facts which contributed to the formulation of policies. When further material is needed to supplement the documentation in the Department's files for a proper understanding of the relevant policies of the United States, such papers should be obtained from other Government agencies.

1352 Editorial Preparation

The basic documentary diplomatic record to be printed in Foreign Relations of the United States is edited by the Historical Office, Bureau of Public Affairs of the Department of State. The editing of the record is guided by the principles of historical objectivity. There may be no alteration of the text, no deletions without indicating where in the text the deletion is made, and no omission of facts which were of major importance in reaching a decision. Nothing may be omitted for the purpose of concealing or glossing over what might be regarded by some as a defect of policy. However, certain omissions of documents are permissible for the following reasons:

- a. To avoid publication of matters which would tend to impede current diplomatic negotiations or other business.
- b. To condense the record and avoid repetition of needless details.
- c. To preserve the confidence reposed in the Department by individuals and by foreign governments.
- d. To avoid giving needless offense to other nationalities or individuals.
- e. To eliminate personal opinions presented in despatches and not acted upon by the Department. To this consideration there is one qualification—in connection with major decisions it is desirable, where possible, to show the alternatives presented to the Department before the decision was made.

1353 Clearance

To obtain appropriate clearances of material to be published in Foreign Relations of the United States, the Historical Office:

- a. Refers to the appropriate policy offices of the Department and of other agencies of the Government such papers as appear to require policy clearance.
- b. Refers to the appropriate foreign governments requests for permission to print as part of the diplomatic correspondence of the United States those previously unpublished documents which were originated by the foreign governments.

I. UNITED STATES FOREIGN POLICY IN THE UNITED NATIONS SETTING

A. UNITED STATES—UNITED KINGDOM DISCUSSIONS REGARDING THE BASES OF THEIR UNITED NATIONS POLICY (1952)

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson)<sup>2</sup>

CONFIDENTIAL

[WASHINGTON,] February 26, 1952.

Subject: US—UK Divergence of approach to the United Nations

Participants: Mr. Gerald Meade, Counselor, British Embassy
Mr. John D. Hickerson, UNA
Mr. Ward P. Allen, EUR

Mr. Meade stated that the UK Foreign Office continues to be somewhat disturbed at the difference between the UK and the US approach to the United Nations and the differing concepts as to its basic purpose. In the UK view the US is too inclined to regard the United Nations as an instrument of collective security against a certain group of states, whereas, the UK believes primary emphasis should be placed upon the UN as a world forum for discussion and for east-west rapprochement. The Foreign Office is now studying the last General Assembly from this point of view and is preparing a brief for high-level discussions with the US. Mr. Paul Mason from the Foreign Office had asked Mr. Meade to apprise us of the fact that they had planned in the near future to seek to have such frank discussions with us on the general topic.

Mr. Hickerson replied that we, ourselves, had been giving a good deal of thought to this divergence in our approach and to the general question "whither the UN". We would welcome a full and frank discussion with the UK on this and believe it would be mutually profitable. In our view the General Assembly should be both the world forum which the UK has in mind and, since the Security Council is paralyzed, the action body for the United Nations in such matters as Korea, for example, where action is clearly necessary. In its role as an action body when action is necessary it should be a collective security instrument not "against a certain group of states" as such, but against any state or group of states that commits aggression. At the same time we must recognize that while the Charter<sup>3</sup> places no limits on the General Assembly in its role as world forum, nevertheless there are definite limitations both in the Charter and in the nature of the institution on its role as the UN action body.

Mr. Meade stated that he felt the Foreign Office would in general agree with the concept as Mr. Hickerson had just stated it, although we agreed that, when confronted with specific problems in the General Assembly in the application of the principle, our positions might be different. We agreed to reserve further discussion of the general problem until the Foreign Office has completed its study.

[WASHINGTON,] March 24, 1952.

Subject: Possible US-UK Conversations concerning the future of the UN and forthcoming UN Problems

Participants: Miss Barbara Salt, First Secretary, British Embassy
Mr. Ward P. Allen, EUR
Mr. William B. Sale, EUR

During an informal luncheon conversation, Miss Salt read to us a letter from Paul Mason of the British Foreign Office concerning the possibility of high-level US-UK talks on the future of the UN and on the supposed basic divergence in the US and UK approaches to it. The letter indicated that the Foreign Office is now veering away from its original idea that the talks be held promptly on the basis of a review of the last GA and is now more inclined to the view that the talks should be held somewhat later when the outlines and probable course of the next GA are a little more clear. As to the locus of the talks, Mason's letter indicated that the Foreign Office would warmly welcome a visit by Mr. Hickerson if he could arrange to make his often postponed trip to London this summer.

Miss Salt expressed the personal view that it might be more desirable to hold conversations here or in New York since almost all of the British personnel directly concerned with UN problems would be at UN headquarters. If necessary, Mason and others could come over to join the discussions. Mr. Allen expressed the personal view that whether held in London, Washington, or New York, conversations might be most helpful and he repeated Mr. Hickerson's earlier advice to Mr. Meade that we would welcome such conversations.

It was generally agreed that it would be helpful to analyze and review our respective basic approaches to the UN and just what type of problems the UN can and cannot be expected to cope with successfully, that it might be helpful to give particular attention to the numerous important issues of concern to the Arab-Asian bloc and also that we should examine together all possibilities of breaking the membership deadlock. It was also agreed that the general conversations would be more meaningful if they could be related to the concrete problems which might be expected to come before the next Session.

Referring to the possibility of a third series of talks on colonial problems in the UN,<sup>1</sup> Mr. Allen suggested that any such talks should preferably follow rather than precede the broader discussions envisaged in Mr. Mason's letter.

We informed Miss Salt that we would explore the general question further in consultation with other interested offices of the Department; she will inform us of further views of the Foreign Office.

GENERAL PLANNING RE UNITED NATIONS ACTIVITIES AND THE UNITED STATES ROLE IN THE UNITED NATIONS

INTRODUCTION

A combination of facts suggest the desirability of our formulating our views on a consistent over-all policy about United Nations activities projecting at least to if not through the next session of the Assembly. A principal unknown quantity in the outline that follows is the substantive development of the Korean case. The following are some of the facts that suggest such a re-examination.

(a) Given the development of the NATO Council, the MSA, Technical Assistance and our Voice of America program, the United Nations is simply one in a series of instrumentalities affecting American multilateral diplomacy. A summary of our foreign policy contained in State Department publication 4466 of March 1952 contains nine pages about our United Nations activities, beginning at page 60.

(b) The United Kingdom, through a letter from the Foreign Office, has asked for high-level US-UK talks on the future of the United Nations and on the divergencies in the US and UK approaches to the United Nations. The State Department has indicated that it would welcome such talks. It is agreed that we should analyze and review our respective approaches and consider what problems the United Nations can and cannot be expected to cope with successfully. Arab-Asian problems were specifically mentioned.

(c) Public opinion, at least as reflected by NGO's, is in a depressed mood about United Nations activities. For example, the YWCA at its Chicago National Convention will have before it a resolution that the YWCA should no longer support US participation in the UN. This attitude is also reflected in the approach of the Congress to the size of appropriations for US participation.

CHECK LIST OF PROBLEMS

1. The Role of the United Nations:—The statement that the UN is the cornerstone of our foreign policy needs to be tested against political and economic developments of the last four years, especially the creation of NATO. It is understandable that the British are arguing more strongly for the original Churchillian position that a general international organization should be a loose confederation of strong and powerful regional groupings.<sup>3</sup> The French view since before the attack on Korea has been that because Soviet cooperation is lacking the UN should be kept intact as an organization but given no substantive tasks of a serious nature. The French and the British would agree that the US in particular has been guilty of setting in motion a series of projects and creating a series of commissions for purposes that have not stood the test of time with a resulting embarrassment in having in existence various organs with no important purpose or work. In this connection, they are particularly concerned about the Interim Committee and the Collective Measures Committee.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>4</sup> For documentation regarding the establishment of the Interim Committee in 1947 by General Assembly Resolution 111 (II), see Foreign Relations, 1947, vol. I, pp. 166 ff. For documentation on the establishment of the Collective Measures Committee by General Assembly Resolution 377 (V)—the Uniting for Peace Resolution—in 1950, see ibid., 1950, vol. II, pp. 303 ff.

The British and French together with the other colonial powers, emphasizing the need for the solidarity of NATO areas, feel that on all issues we and they should stand together. This is consistent with the UK attitude toward the NATO-UN relationship.

Vishinsky stated in Paris in 1948 when discussing the veto that UN Assembly sessions pretty generally reflect tensions in the world. He, of course, was speaking of the Soviet-free world tension but it can at least be argued that this generalization is correct and applies also to tensions between members of the free world itself, so that as the free world's feeling of security grows in relation to the Soviet Union we can expect to see stresses become apparent among members of the free world itself.

A formulation of what our own approach to the UN is today would include its usefulness to us in the event of general war, its usefulness to us during a twenty or thirty year period of a war of nerves and its general psychological importance for the future as the clearing house for planning and thinking about political and international economic and social problems. It may well be that we can be more effective in maintaining a strong and sound relationship among NATO members by being able to take a middle position in the UN in adjusting differences between the British and the French and the Arab-Asian group. Also, we shall need to consider what our attitude should be toward the independence of dependent people. Perhaps we cannot generalize, but there is some thinking in the State Department that while we should stand firm in favor of self-government and home rule, we should stand equally firmly against independence on the theory that more small states create added insecurity in the world.

2. The Role of the General Assembly:—Now that the Uniting for Peace Resolution is two years old, one can conclude from the infrequency of meetings of the Security Council that the Assembly has largely taken over the role of handling political security problems, or one can conclude that they are not finding their way into the UN. Whichever conclusion or combination of them is valid, the result is that the most important work of the UN takes place in the Assembly. On the other hand, there is a large element of dissatisfaction with the time wasted on unimportant questions in the Assembly. Also, since the Assembly must be prepared to meet on twenty-four hours' notice on urgent questions at any time during the year, the question arises whether it should not have standing machinery for comparatively unimportant housekeeping items throughout the year. The concept of the Uniting for Peace Resolution has largely superseded the real reason for the Interim Committee.

This suggests the whole field of organizational questions involving the Assembly.

a. Membership:—The trend of opinion in the General Assembly has developed steadily, over our opposition, in favor of admitting all applicants however good or bad and whether or not this involves a deal. Our position has been strongly against this and the opinion of the Court, construing Article 4, supports this point of view. There are certain very great advantages in trying to find a solution to the membership question in which we will not be in the minority and which will make it possible for Japan as well as Italy to join the organization. I consider it would be a serious thing for Japan to be excluded. We have promised the British and the Italians to re-examine this question.

The re-examination must be of a political nature. A proposal to amend Article 4 to exclude the criterion of peace loving would be one means by which in supporting such an amendment we could, pending its adoption, support an arrangement that could admit all applicants upon a two-thirds vote of the Assembly.

b. Chinese Representation:—If there is a truce in Korea, we shall immediately have to consider this issue with the British as well as the large majority of members of the Arab-Asian group.

c. The Proliferation of Committees:—We are committed to discuss with Lie his idea of an inter-sessional committee which is one logical consequence of Secretariat thinking about the growing role of the General Assembly. This will necessarily involve the question of ending the Interim Committee and the Collective Measures Committee. In this connection, the whole question of the development of international law in the UN needs review. There is great and general disappointment with some of the work of the International Law Commission, especially in the field of codification, and the Sixth Committee, not having any real work to do, has not attracted outstanding delegates and has got into various difficulties. We shall have to consider this question in the Ad Hoc Committee which will meet this spring. One solution which the British may suggest is the abolition of both organs and the creation of a standing fifteen member committee to work on legal questions that particularly need the attention of lawyers. Since the General Assembly is fundamentally a political organ, it is difficult if not impossible to separate the legal and political ingredients in any particular resolution or any debate. The British are properly concerned about the standards of legal draftsmanship. For example, one request to the International Court for an advisory opinion was drafted by Arce in the Delegates Lounge. However, Cordier feels that the informal help of a legislative drafting clerk is more effective than any procedure for having First Committee resolutions passed on by the Sixth Committee.

My conclusion is that the development of international law and its usefulness as a tool to the United Nations is of basic importance and it is being retarded rather than helped.

d. Miscellaneous Devices for Saving Time:—This is probably the time for a re-examination of the question of what General Assembly sessions are for and how long they should be. If we want important political questions considered in the Assembly and, therefore, if we want Foreign Ministers present, the length of sessions should be shortened and the unimportant or Grade B problems prevented from encumbering them. There are various ways of doing so. It is hard politically to call any question unimportant. However, the other councils, especially ECOSOC, have been offenders in putting on the Assembly agenda items that they found it embarrassing to handle themselves.

Therefore, one solution would be to make access to the Assembly agenda more difficult, especially in the non-political field. Another device would be an inter-sessional committee or perhaps a spring session admittedly for matters of minor importance and handled by permanent delegations.

e. Economic, Social and Trusteeship Matters:—These are simply flagged here to be developed later. The Third and Fourth Committees in the general attitudes expressed by their members created a danger in our own sound relations with our friends and to the fabric of the organization. How we meet these problems depends on what our approach to the UN now is. I have mentioned above our attitude toward independence versus home rule. One of the ways of changing this atmosphere is to screen the material that comes into these committees without, of course, attempting to screen any material of substance from UN consideration.

3. Public Relations:—American public attitudes about the United Nations, as about automobiles, develop on a yearly-model theory. The 1945 model was good; the 1951 was bad. We probably over-sold the 1945 model. This subject is being separately studied by our Public Information Office. Some State Department thinking is that in the light of the attitude toward the 1951 model, we should go into the UN in the future and play a comparatively minor role, getting behind one or two issues and simply state our point of view of vote on the others. This, I believe, is inconsistent with our size and our political and financial contribution to the organization. Whether we like it or not, we had a big hand in creating it and as long as it exists or as long as it has any agenda items, we have got to discuss them and negotiate about them.

[WASHINGTON,] June 3, 1952.

Subject: Conversations with the British on United Nations Problems

Participants: UNA—Mr. Hickerson

                   EUR—Mr. Allen
                   UND—Mr. Cargo

                   Mr. Popper

A meeting was held in Mr. Hickerson's office on June 3 to determine our position on the British proposal that Anglo-American conversations be held on the attitudes of the two countries toward United Nations problems.

It was the consensus of the meeting that :

1. Ambassador Gross should be authorized to agree to Sir Gladwyn Jebb's request to discuss basic viewpoints on the United Nations with him informally in New York.<sup>2</sup> It is assumed that the exchange of views on United States and United Kingdom policies toward the United Nations will be helpful in later conversations.

2. On the assumption that the General Assembly will open on October 14, we will suggest to the British that the general discussions on the United Nations requested by them be held in Washington, say between September 15 and September 25. Holding the talks in September rather than August will give us more time for preparation; permit Mr. Hickerson, Sir Gladwyn Jebb and Sir John Martin to be present; and make it possible to test our views on general principles by applying them to the discussion of specific items on the Seventh Assembly's agenda.

3. During the September conversations the regular exchange of views on General Assembly problems would take place.

4. Colonial problems would be included as a subject for discussion. However, we would not repeat previous discussions on general principles, but would concentrate on consideration of specific problems arising in the Seventh General Assembly.<sup>3</sup>

5. A telegram will be prepared for New York, embodying the foregoing, and the British will be informed accordingly.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>2</sup> The Department of State was informed of Jebb's request by USUN in telegram 825, May 16, 6:19 p. m. (310/5-1652) The British Embassy made informal contact with the Department on the matter on May 29 (Allen memorandum of conversation, May 29, 1952, USUN files).

<sup>4</sup> In telegram 469, June 4, 6:57 p. m., the Department of State authorized USUN to conduct informal talks with Jebb on "basic attitudes US and UK toward UN". (310/5-1652)

933. Re US-UK talks on UN problems. Appreciate info Deptel 469, June 4, and authority to comply with Jebb's request for informal discussions here re basic attitudes of UK toward US and UN. As Dept aware, Jebb in series recent public speeches—notably at Syracuse, Dallas and Chicago—has been expounding thesis which has been regarded by many as minimizing UN present and potential collective security role while stressing concept UN as "universal" forum which might be useful to "conciliate" East/West differences.

I am aware from reftel that Dept contemplates conversations with Brit possibly in Sept, which will enable Dept to test US general principles by discussion of specific items. Talks with Jebb would accordingly be general as well as "preliminary and informal." However, general discussions of sort Jebb has in mind may necessarily involve some particularly on issues such as membership, CMC future, etc. In order to make certain we understand what Dept has in mind, and to avoid risk of prematurity and confusion, I would be grateful if Dept would give us general guidance for discussions in accordance with offer in ref. tel.

The Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson) to the Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom at the United Nations (Jebb)

PERSONAL

DEAR GLAD: It was good of you to send me with your note of March 31 the text of your Syracuse University speech and invite my comments on it.<sup>1</sup> I had read the press accounts of the speech but had not previously received the full text of it. First of all let me apologize for the delay in commenting on this speech which puts forth your views in brilliant and persuasive fashion.

I read your speech carefully and I asked several of my senior associates to read it and give me their comments on it. It would be trite for me to say that I agree with a large part of your statements. In several important respects I don't know whether my disagreement is with substance or with emphasis and the following comments are to be read in that light.

What you seem to me to be saying is that since we can't have the five-power cooperation we hoped for at San Francisco (and, incidentally, better five-power cooperation than was in sight at the time of the Conference), we ought to keep the United Nations, by and large, out of the center of the cold war struggle and to use it in the political field primarily as a forum and a conciliation instrument. I cannot believe that you mean by this that in these circumstances a fundamental purpose of the United Nations to maintain peace should be ignored or allowed to lapse. Surely you do not mean that we should stop efforts to develop a collective security role for the United Nations under current conditions. We have made a good start, and I emphasize it is only a start, in the Korean experience and the Uniting For Peace program. It may take a long time to make the progress which we would like to achieve but I feel strongly that we should continue these efforts and I hope you agree.

Perhaps you feel that if the United Nations concentrates too much on developing itself as an agency for collective security it will be at the expense of its functions of peaceful settlement. It seems to me that this thesis is of doubtful validity. It seems to me that the more the United Nations is developed in all of its aspects the more effective it will be in each one of them. In other words, I feel that the stronger the United Nations is as an agency for collective security the more effective it can and should be as an agency for conciliation.

One of your colleagues once said to me that, in his opinion, the United Kingdom regarded the United Nations as a forum in which we could deal with the opposition (that is, the Soviet Union) while the United States seemed to wish to develop it into an anti-Soviet alliance. I told him that this is not true in regard to our attitude. I see great advantages in the continued presence of the Soviet Union in the United Nations. If they ever change their policy and decide to begin to behave as a responsible member of the international community, they will be members in good standing of a going concern and they can begin to cooperate in the United Nations without loss of face or embarrassment. I should not like to see the free countries take action to force the USSR out of the United Nations on that account and, moreover, I should dislike very much to see the free nations take action which would, in effect, help relieve the Soviet Union from the important commitments which they undertook when they signed the Charter. If the Soviet Union decides itself to leave the organization, that is a matter over which none of us has any control, but I, myself, hope that they will not reach such a decision.

In working to build up under the Charter a system of collective security, let me emphasize that we are not endeavoring to forge an anti-Soviet alliance but a means for dealing with aggression. If the United Kingdom should aggress, it would be directed against the United Kingdom; if the United States aggressed it would be against us. If the Soviets feel that these efforts to carry out the Charter are directed against them I can only recall the Biblical statement that "The wicked flee when no man pursueth."

As I went over your speech I felt at some points that you were saying, in effect, that using the United Nations against some future Soviet aggression would risk breaking up the organization; that, therefore, we should leave this job to NATO and so preserve the United Nations as a forum and an instrument of conciliation. I must say that this seems to me to be a doctrine which, if carried out, would condemn the United Nations to early oblivion. In my opinion, if the United Nations ever takes the line that it must stand aside from the most important political conflicts of our time it is not going to be taken very seriously or supported by anyone. My own view is that while NATO is the cutting edge of the East-West struggle, the moral motive power behind the blade must come from the United Nations with its over-all appeal to the conscience of mankind.

To put this in somewhat more specific terms, let us suppose that the USSR committed an overt act of aggression in Germany. NATO would, of course, move immediately in accordance with its terms, especially Article 5. I am sure, however, that all of us would wish to see this action reinforced by United Nations action. I visualize that the General Assembly would meet in emergency session, make a finding of aggression, designate the NATO machinery as the Executive Military Authority, recommend that all Members of the United Nations give urgently military and other assistance in the struggle and recommend that the military forces made available be placed under the command of the NATO machinery. It seems to me that it is of the utmost importance that we be able to count on such action. It may well provide the margin, in terms of outside assistance to the NATO powers, between ultimate victory and defeat if this crisis ever has to be faced. Moreover, I believe that the only way to prevent fragmentation in the free world would be to preserve its unity in the United Nations. All this seems to me to underline the importance of continuing efforts wisely and prudently to build up the collective security function of the United Nations.

In your speech you do not mention the United Nations as a moral force, either in connection with NATO relationships or otherwise. Rather, you seem to evaluate the United Nations more in terms as an operating agency and conclude that the United Nations itself is not necessarily the best means of waging war. I agree and feel that if a major war comes it will be waged as set forth above. The United Nations should be involved in a war not because it is a well-oiled machine (which it isn't yet), but rather because it represents the collective moral judgment of the world community. Indeed, it is the only body which is responsive to the collective judgment of the people of the world.

Of course I agree with you that wherever the United Nations can be used for conciliation it should be so used. Of course I agree with you that the United Nations is an important forum and a center for harmonizing the relations of nations. The highly developed United Nations machinery for these purposes is always available. But I feel strongly that fortifying the United Nations ability to resist aggression will strengthen rather than weaken its conciliation and forum functions. I feel even more strongly that we must continue to try to build up the United Nations strength to resist aggression if we are going to continue to have a United Nations in existence for conciliation, as a forum, or for other purposes.

I am sending Ernie Gross a copy of this letter. He and I will be glad to discuss with you from time to time these matters.

With regards and every good wish, I am

Yours sincerely,

JOHN D. HICKERSON

16. Re: US-UK talks on UN Problems. Urtel 933, June 13. We hope you will be able hold informal, gen discussions with Jebb before his departure.

We suggest that in your conversations you focus on Jebb's public speeches and points raised in Hickerson's letter to Jebb (on his Syracuse speech) dated June 13, copy of which has been pouched USUN. Purpose of conversations wld be develop info and ideas for Sept talks re UN and GA (Hickerson-Burrows-Salt Memo Conversation June 24<sup>2</sup> pouched USUN) with greater realism.

Dept leaves to your discretion way in which you shld approach conversations. We wld suggest that you might begin by referring to great interest in Jebb's speeches in Dept and pointing out feeling that implications these speeches go deeper than might appear on surface. We wld like ascertain exactly how far Brit thinking has gone in direction Jebb's apparent emphasis on UN as instrument of conciliation rather than as collective security organiz useful in coping with aggression.

You may wish cover some or all fol points with Jebb :

1. In our view UN is capable serving both as instrument of conciliation and as organ for collective action against aggression. Under Charter we think it must perform both functions. We are committed to use of UN for both purposes, and we do not feel that they are in any way mutually exclusive. UN, in its various organs, offers sufficiently diverse and flexible procedures for both procedures.

2. We wld be interested in having Jebb's views on UN experience re Kor. If aggression in Kor were to be repeated, how wld Jebb propose UN shld react? What is his view re future of CMC? For our part, while we recognize CMC operation can not proceed in future at speed attained during its first year, we hope it will be possible continue gradual improvement of planning techniques in prep for potential future aggression.

3. We have some difficulty in knowing what can be done to improve UN machinery for conciliation. Presumably Jebb wld agree that if there is will for conciliation, UN machinery is fully adequate. Has he any suggestions as to way in which UN might be made more effective for this purpose?

4. We wld be interested in anything Jebb wishes say re relationship between UN and NATO. We are impressed with importance of using "UN umbrella" in event aggression in NATO area, in order mobilize that part of free world not included in NATO on our side in what may be a desperate struggle for survival. We are equally impressed with need for use UN aegis if def against future aggression is needed outside NATO area.

5. While we wld not expect you to go into detail on NAfrican problems in your discussions with Jebb, you might inquire whether he has any particular views on long-range preps for handling problems such as Morocco and Tunisia in UN organs. We shld imagine, for example, that Nehru's strictures against NATO powers and UN for their attitudes on NAfrican problems wld confront Brit with difficult dilemma, as it does US. Has Jebb any particular ideas as to way in which we can reconcile apparently irreconcilable tendencies on colonial issues in UN?

6. We wld be interested in Jebb's reaction to question whether we shld carry out strong anti-Sov campaign against USSR in 7th GA. We appreciate possibility carrying anti-Sov campaign too far, but feel we cannot fail utilize GA for this valuable propaganda purpose. We may wish raise Katyn massacre; we may wish bring up treatment of aliens such as "Hungarian fliers" in Sov areas.

7. In course your discussion with Jebb, you may have occasion refer to Charter revision conf. We wld be interested in knowing whether Brit have given any thought to this subject.

As stated urtel 933, you may become involved discussion GA issues. If this shld happen we suggest you make any comments contingent upon studies now beginning in Dept with view to fixing positions on specific issues prior Sept talks.

The talks convened at 5:30 P. M. Mr. Hickerson welcomed the United Kingdom group. He explained that it was his understanding there were to be no agreed minutes, since these were informal talks on matters concerning which final decision had not yet been reached, and each side was to keep its own summary of the discussion. If a joint position should be agreed upon, or for any other reason of importance, agreed minutes might be arrived at if necessary.

Sir Gladwyn Jebb offered a general statement of the UK attitude on the role of the United Nations. He suggested that, probably, the UK and US agreed on objectives but not on tactics, and hoped that agreement could be reached on the latter. There could be no doubt that, in the event of aggression by Stalinist communism, the core of resistance would be the US supported by the UK and the Commonwealth. NATO, while important, was not this hard core. The Commonwealth was a solid anti-Stalinist bloc, determined to resist aggression as much as was US. There appeared to be more emphasis in the UK in avoiding war if possible, while safeguarding freedom and honor at the same time. Thus, the British belief that there should be avoidance of provocative statements toward the Soviets gave rise to the suspicion in the US that the UK was less willing to resist aggression in Asia, and wanted concentration on defense in Europe at the expense of other parts of the world, notably the Far East. This was an unfounded suspicion.

Sir Gladwyn referred to his speech at Syracuse University, which had been approved by HMG, by Trygve Lie, Mr. Pearson (Canada), and many Americans who supported his general thesis. He noted the criticism which had been expressed, notably by Hamilton Fish Armstrong of "Foreign Affairs", that these views militated against the organization of collective security under the UN. If one inquired into the meaning of this term, one had to look at the history of the League of Nations, where the concept involved was that of an overwhelming coalition against an individual aggressor. Under the League, if the US had participated, this might have worked against Mussolini in his Ethiopian adventure and against Hitler when the Nazis moved into the Rhineland. Now, the world situation involved 800 millions under Stalin's aegis against 800 millions grouped around the UN, with another 800 million odd fence-sitters. Thus, it was probable that the effort to resist aggressive Stalinism with force would be a bloody affair, unlike the collective action envisaged in the League of Nations days, when there was no such precarious balance of forces. We must bear in mind today that resistance to aggression today may not cause the aggressor to desist but rather would be likely to set off World War III. It would be more advisable, therefore, to refer to collective security rather as "collective resistance to aggression", this being the more realistic phrase. In practice, how might this concept best be realized?

He believed that one of the principal State Department tenets was that this should be done by UN collective action, lest other UN members not belonging to regional groupings be left out of this collective action. This implied perhaps that the UK would leave out these states not members of regional groups, but that was not HMG's intent—if there were direct aggression. If there were indirect aggression (internal), it was conceivable that the UK and US might not want to declare war on Russia and that both governments would have to ascertain the attitudes of many neutrals before deciding upon action. On the other hand, if the indirect aggression involved the Yugoslavs or Swedes, then it was likely this would commence World War III, these being situations which should be resisted by force of arms. However, trying to plan the defense of non-regional group countries through the UN would not help the organization of assistance to these countries. Sweden, for example, wanted to remain neutral and probably would object strongly to UN discussion of how to aid them in case of aggression, on the basis that this would provoke the USSR to Sweden's immediate danger. If Sweden were attacked and prepared to resist, then obviously the Swedes would welcome UN support. In other words, too much pressure on neutrals such as Sweden to prepare in advance for aggression would make them believe these were preparations for World War III, instead of preparations to prevent this occurrence. Further, he could not agree with the US view that "roping in" marginal states in UN collective action would make the difference between victory or defeat in World War III.

Sir Gladwyn continued by emphasizing the UK belief that the US-UK objective should be to induce the neutrals gradually to enter into more Article 51 organizations as in their more direct and immediate interest. This did not imply that it was easy to extend such pacts to Asia and the Middle East, but this should be sought. If Article 51 pacts were to be linked, this should not be done through the UN. Thus, NATO should not be tied too closely to the UN because it might involve UN control over the NATO Organization, with consequent overly rigid relationship. Moreover, UN debate over the relationship between Article 51 organizations and the UN would raise such difficult issues that this would retard the further development of Article 51 pacts, particularly in the Middle East.

If war should break out, then of course the UK wanted to move under the aegis of the UN and to follow the pattern developed in the "Uniting for Peace" resolution. However, the more attempts were made in time of peace to foster these relationships between such organizations as NATO and the UN, the more the impression was fostered that the UN and NATO were indistinguishable. This had a bad effect on the neutrals.

Sir Gladwyn adverted to the role of the UN in conciliation. He believed that the US tended to de-emphasize the UN's role in this regard. It was clear that, in point of time, conciliation must be applied prior to resistance to aggression in order to be effective. If it were possible ever to reach a modus vivendi with the USSR, this would be achieved through negotiations or through an indefinite deadlock. In either event, the UN could help achieve the result, as it did in the Berlin Blockade and the Italian Colonies Cases.

To sum up, the UK's position might be stated in the following propositions:

a. We should not push ahead further in the Collective Measures Committee with measures which exacerbate relations with the Soviets, although we should not abandon the CMC and its work.

b. In public statements, the US and UK should not exaggerate what the UN can do in the field of collective resistance to aggression, as opposed to Article 51 organizations. This actually weakened the UN since its abilities in this regard were limited. It also gave the impression to some that we were more interested in organizing for World War III.

c. We should not diminish the potentialities of the UN in the field of conciliation between East and West.

The UK had been much struck by the State Department's fear that failure to emphasize and develop the importance of obtaining the moral support of the UN in the field of collective resistance to aggression would cause many Americans to propose that the US go it alone, and that the US should withdraw from the UN and limit its commitments to defending the approaches to the U.S. The UK, however, thought that the best way to secure an advantageous moral verdict was to make it clear that the West was absolutely sincere in attempting to avoid World War III, and that the West was doing everything in its power to avert this war. Such an approach might also induce the people of the US to be less disillusioned with the UN.

Sir Gladwyn rhetorically queried whether, in regard to the Arab-Asian countries, it might be worthwhile to make concessions to those states, if the UK thesis on the role of the UN were correct. He declared that such a course might be logical, but it would be extremely dangerous insofar as aiding general collective resistance to aggression on the part of Stalinism, which he assured was the great evil to be met. He cited, in particular, the deleterious effect of the destruction of the French empire, which would immeasurably weaken the collective defense against Soviet aggression in Europe and elsewhere. The UK strongly believed that the proper course to be pursued was to advance on the economic side, particularly in support of Point Four programs and land reform, and to channel nationalist sentiment in the Arab-Asian area into Article 51 pacts.

Sir Gladwyn concluded by referring to a letter he had written to Hamilton Fish Armstrong, setting forth his views on the UN's useful purposes. In this category he included the following: peaceful settlement of some of the thorniest international issues; developing means to regulate and control armaments; assisting the development of greater self-rule in the non-self-governing territories; and aiding the US and USSR at some future date in their efforts to reach a settlement.<sup>1</sup>

Mr. Hickerson believed any disagreement that might exist probably was one of emphasis rather than substance. He hoped it was not necessary to assure the UK that the first objective of the US is to prevent war. One sure way to make war inevitable would be to make concessions that should not be made. (Sir Gladwyn agreed). Mr. Hickerson continued that building up the strength of the US and its friends was the best way to prevent war. He indicated his disagreement with the contention that US absence from the League of Nations had been a major cause of the League's failure. Even though the US was outside the League, it had been willing to do its part to a greater degree than many League members, notably in the Ethiopian and Manchurian affairs. He accepted the phrase, "collective resistance to aggression" and thought that it would be well to use it in the future.

Mr. Hickerson expressed the fear that if wisdom were not exercised in handling major issues in the United Nations and in collective defense arrangements, sentiment might build up in the United States similar to that which prevented our joining the League. The United States recognized that no country's defense could be prepared in the United Nations. We have merely tried to induce states to ready their forces slightly; and to notify the United Nations of the maintenance of forces which might be made available if the United Nations and the individual states so agreed. We have all seen that the Security Council has been rendered useless as an agency to organize the resistance to aggression. The Uniting for Peace resolution did not give the General Assembly new powers; it cannot give orders but it can make recommendations. He pointed out that, in fact, the forces in Korea are voluntarily furnished national forces. If within such a framework the free world could make advance preparations to facilitate the joint effort to resist any such aggression as might occur, valuable experience would be gained. Mr. Hickerson emphasized that the United States had not tried to pressure countries into a commitment to use their forces if it would endanger their security and that the United States did not believe a universal Article 51 pact is at all feasible. Nor do we agree that it is desirable to have any form of statement that aggression anywhere in the world will be met with armed might; each situation would have to be judged individually at the time of actual occurrence.

Mr. Hickerson said there are two major gaps at present in our efforts to organize resistance to communist aggression: (i) indirect aggression and (ii) aggression by proxy.

The United States, Mr. Hickerson stated, agreed that we should avoid debate in the United Nations on UN-NATO relationships. In wartime and in case of aggression such relationships could be easily established. He illustrated by pointing out that if aggression took place, say, in Germany, action would be taken under NATO and that, while this was going on, a special session of the General Assembly would be called (the Security Council being used first if a veto were desirable), and we would try to make the war a war between the communists and the rest of the world. We anticipated that the General Assembly would recommend that member states render aid and would designate NATO as the executive military authority to conduct the war. Thus the United Nations would not interfere with the conduct of the war.

With respect to the UK views on the importance of conciliation, Mr. Hickerson indicated his agreement. He said, however, that as a result of Jebb's recent speeches, he had been concerned that the UK believed all defense against aggression should be left to regional pacts. The United States believed it was essential that the United Nations take some action in this field.

Mr. Bancroft noted that the Uniting for Peace program was not the sort of program in which you could reach a terminal point. The United States wanted a successor to the Collective Measures Committee.

Mr. Gross remarked that, while the US-UK differences might be a matter of words, the problems of stress and direction were real. We should determine what it was that we were trying to do in organizing collective resistance to aggression. Those who must bear the major burden in the event of aggression face a strong insistence that there be developed an equitable method of sharing the burden. How and under what conditions could this equitable burden be developed? It might be a mistake to stress too exclusively resistance against Stalinist aggression. There is the problem of intra-free-world aggression. In addition there is the broader problem of defense against undermining the morale of the free-world, as by dictatorship of the right and by thwarting nationalist desires. We should lay greater stress on the development of common interests, and here the UK statement underestimated the importance of the United Nations economic and social programs.

The first meeting terminated at 6:45 p. m.

The meeting convened at 10:30 A. M.

Mr. Hickerson, in commenting on Sir Gladwyn's statement of the previous day, asked if the British believed that there was any difference in concept between "collective security" and "collective resistance to aggression". Sir Gladwyn replied that there was no difference in fact but considerable difference in the relative appeal of the two phrases; "collective resistance to aggression" made it easier to put across to the public what was expected of it. The British did not want to give the impression that their preferred phrase indicated less willingness to make prior preparations to meet aggression.

Mr. Hickerson referred to Sir Gladwyn's statement that in the event of Soviet aggression the hard core of resistance would be the US, the UK, and the Commonwealth, and asked if there was any significance to the omissions. Sir Gladwyn said that no overtones were intended, that of course we must go ahead with the build-up in NATO, but we must recognize that the hard core might be merely the US, UK, and the Commonwealth.

Mr. Gross remarked that many UN Members are not now so much concerned with the possibility of immediate Soviet attack as they are with long-range economic and social dangers that are peculiar to their areas. What role, then, should the UN play in terms of the long-range future? He wondered if the UK felt that the next few years were so critical that we should concentrate on the immediate problem of defense against Soviet aggression.

Sir Gladwyn stated that he was not suggesting that the UN not be used to deal with certain types of aggression, i.e., possible conflict over Kashmir, and certainly we all wanted to avoid giving the Arab and Asian countries the impression that the West was concerned exclusively with Stalinist aggression. In reply to a comment by Mr. Gross that, because one of the major problems of the foreseeable future was how to deal with the cold war, economic and social questions are extremely important, Sir Gladwyn said he did not mean to underestimate the importance of such questions.

Mr. Hickerson referred to the deterrent motive and effect of NATO. He pointed out that US strength had never been forces in being, but, rather, industrial capacity and potential, and that while the US had more forces in being today than in previous non-war periods, it had not and never would have the forces sufficient to meet at the same time all its commitments. The organization of collective resistance in the UN should have, as was the case with the NAT, a deterrent effect, morally as well as materially.

Sir Gladwyn replied that UN efforts might have a minor deterrent value. However, many in the US overemphasized the deterrent effect of any UN action, for the Soviets are not much concerned with what the UN might do in case of aggression.

Sir Christopher Steele granted that it might be convenient to have the UN as a "front" or "blanket" under which resistance to aggression might be organized and that such a "blanket" might be of value to someone like Tito in case of aggression. However, what really deters the Soviets is NATO, for here there is a command in being.

Sir Gladwyn commented that use of the UN in collective action helped the morale of the West but did not affect the Soviets. Some danger exists that if the UN is "overstretched" it may not work. The UK agreed with the desirability of obtaining a more equitable sharing of the burden in Korea.

Agreeing that Article 51 pacts are, of course, desirable, Mr. Hickerson expressed the view that the prospects for additional pacts in the next year or two are not good. Furthermore, the development of collective UN action would seem to appear to most "fence sitters" as less provocative than Article 51 pacts. Certainly the CMC can be used to turn their minds to the importance of Article 51 pacts. While we do not want to push the development of the CMC too fast, we do not want to abandon the Committee or its work.

Mr. Gross pointed out that, according to Trygve Lie, both Schuman and Eden had agreed the Soviets had been successful in their propaganda efforts (i) to isolate the US from other UN Members and build mistrust of the US in the Middle East and Asia and (ii) to create the impression in the Near East, Asia and to some extent in Western Europe that Korea is an American War. Sir Gladwyn agreed that this was true and that additional "token troop units" would be desirable. Mr. Hickerson replied that divisions would be of more value. Mr. Bancroft commented that it would be helpful to the prospects for an effective deterrent if others were made more aware of their responsibility to help and the Soviets saw a developing community of nations conditioned to collective action.

Mr. Gross felt that the continuous development of the security provisions of the UN Charter had real value. Reference was made to recent private comments by Austrian and Yugoslav officials to the effect that connection with the UN carried security advantages. Sir Gladwyn expressed some disagreement with Mr. Allen's view that the "neutral" states would be more likely to join UN security arrangements than Article 51 pacts. Such states, he said, would feel that they were losing their position as neutral conciliators if they became too involved in UN security arrangements. Mr. Laskey added that, while in theory the CMC has a universal application, in fact everyone knows it is directed against the Soviets.

The US, Mr. Hickerson stated, doubted whether the more passive UN role contemplated by the British would be as likely to attract the fence-sitters as the more active role for the UN that we contemplate. Sir Gladwyn agreed that how to treat the fence-sitters is a basic problem.

Sir Gladwyn said the only way to use the UN to bring about change in the Soviet system without war was to continue to use the organization as a propaganda forum and possibly to use it to split away the Satellites. While the British desired to play down the propaganda aspects during the coming GA, they generally favored the use of the UN as a propaganda forum. Mr. Hickerson noted that we had found it necessary not merely to ignore or vote down Soviet resolutions but to answer them with modest counter-offensives.

Referring again to the CMC, Mr. Bancroft said some form of stimulus, some further recommendation by the GA, was necessary. Sir Gladwyn indicated the UK would support a resolution commending the CMC and giving it the right to receive communications from states. The British did not feel that it had accomplished as much as the US believed. Furthermore, other states do not agree that it is not anti-Soviet. The British agreed that you could not drop the CMC but doubted that much more could be achieved through it, for all who were willing to support its work were already cooperating. In reply to Mr. Hickerson's comment that the CMC's new term should not be limited to one year, Mr. Laskey said he understood it would be re-established with no mention of the term but with an understanding that the GA could undertake a review next year. This would mean that the GA would not be committed to having the CMC for longer than one year.

It was agreed that further consultations on CMC membership would be necessary.

Mr. Gross remarked that due to the publicity it had received the American people tended to view the development of the CMC as a symbol indicating whether the UN was growing or dying. Mr. Laskey replied that there was no value in launching a program if the results will not match your objectives, for this had the opposite effect to that of a deterrent. Mr. Bancroft commented that all the results were not yet in, that progress was being made, and that each step forward brightened the prospects for the future. This was true, Mr. Laskey replied, but the British were skeptical regarding the "speed and size" of the US program for the CMC; he referred once again to the widespread suspicion that the CMC was anti-Russian.

It was agreed that when the time came for GA speeches there should be further consultation on how to present the CMC question.

Turning to the relationships between the UN and NATO, Mr. Gross said that Article 2 of the NAT was not intended to diminish the paramount importance of the UN facilities on such questions. Mr. Hickerson pointed out that in case of aggression against Yugoslavia, a meeting of the NATO Council might decide, if it were felt that the action could be localized, that NATO members should put on their UN hats and act through the universal organization. Consultations in this case would take place first within the NATO, whereas in case of aggression against Afghanistan, consultations probably would take place primarily in New York in the UN. Sir Christopher added that if NATO decided to act in case of aggression against Afghanistan, it would undoubtedly want to use the UN "blanket". Referring to possible use of NATO consultations in anticipation of armed invasion where there is general disquiet or border incidents, Mr. Gross raised the question of the relationship of NATO and the UN's Peace Observation Commission. France, for example, had resisted the use of the POC in Indochina. There was general agreement that action would probably be taken through the UN in case of a major war in Indochina.

Mr. Parsons pointed out that NATO discussions were of two types: (i) consultations within the scope of NATO where decisions involved action and (ii) consultations on outside matters for the purpose merely of discussion and exchange of information rather than action or use of NATO as a public forum. Mr. Hickerson referred to his reference in the previous meeting to UN designation of the machinery of NATO as the executive military authority in case of a general war; the machinery referred to was not the NATO Council but rather the military machinery already established. Mr. Wainhouse added that if similar action were taken by the UN in case of aggression in other areas, the machinery would have to be improvised.

In answer to Mr. Gross's question regarding the steps that might be taken to meet the Soviet GA propaganda attack on NATO and blunt its effect in Asia and the Near East, Sir Christopher suggested that we counter by pointing to the Soviet relationships with their Satellites. Mr. Hickerson thought that this was unwise. We should continue with the line that NATO is legal under the Charter and that it does not become operative until aggression against one of the members occurs. Sir Gladwyn noted that Nehru objected to the build-up of western power and unity because he believed it meant the West would speak with one voice in the UN on such matters as Tunisia. It was agreed that if the Soviets attacked NATO in the GA we should restate the basic relationship between the UN and NATO.

Item 5. Development of UN Pacific Settlement Functions

Mr. Hickerson stated the US view that equal efforts should be placed upon efforts in the pacific settlement and collective security fields. We supported the employment of the POC in Greece and believe that it has proved beneficial there. We have no specific proposals for the use of the POC in other areas, although some thought has been given to the possibility of sending a POC team to Berlin to observe along the Western Sector's boundary lines if the situation there worsens. We do not believe any additional machinery is required at this time.

Sir Gladwyn stated the British view that the peaceful settlement function was the primary function of the UN. There was at this time no need for additional machinery. Mr. Laskey added that the UK would accept any solution on POC membership that would gain general support. It was agreed that, at the present time, it was not wise to tamper with the existing membership.

Mr. Gross asked whether consideration should not be given to the possibility of making the POC self-starting. Mr. Hickerson replied that a great deal could be said for such a step, assuming, of course, that the countries involved wanted to use the POC. However, use of the POC had been limited and there was no real value in making such a change now.

Sir Gladwyn said the UK wanted to see the POC continued but resisted as provocative the idea of sending observation teams to the Soviet frontiers.

It was agreed that the over-riding consideration at this time was to avoid unnecessary debate on the POC.

Mr. Hyde questioned the wisdom of a recent British effort to find a way to send controversies to the Sixth Committee when legal questions arose. Such a procedure would formalize action whereas the mediating function works best when it is not formalized.

There was general agreement that there was no reason to expect pressure at the coming GA for an intersessional ad hoc committee of all members. It was noted that the Soviets had rejected Lie's ideas on the subject.

PART I—D. THE UNITED NATIONS AND THE COLD WAR

Item 1. Attitude and Probable Policy of the USSR Toward the UN.

Mr. Barbour thought that the Soviet objectives in the UN were to use it as a propaganda forum, to oppose measures which would help develop the UN into a more effective collective security instrument, to gain an external appearance of respectability through membership, and to use the UN as a listening post. The US did not anticipate that the Soviets would withdraw from the UN in the near future, both because of the above advantages and because withdrawal would (a) under-cut Soviet claims to be working for peace, (b) might be interpreted as advance warning of war, (c) it might be difficult to lead the neutrals with them out of the UN now, (d) there did not appear to be satisfactory alternative organs to take the place of the UN. The US thought the Soviets might withdraw either if the UN should become discredited as impotent, or if it appeared to represent only a single bloc of states, or if the UN contrariwise became an extremely effective collective security instrument in which the USSR could not delay or hamper action.

Sir Gladwyn agreed with this general statement of Soviet objectives, adding that the Soviets might possibly wish to use the UN for a deal on some issues if to their advantage. He also recalled that the USSR had been expelled from the League of Nations, and that this might militate against their withdrawing from the UN.

It was generally agreed by both the UK and US conferees that if the General Assembly should decide to vote into membership the Western-backed applicants and vote down Soviet applicants, the USSR might possibly think about withdrawing. In this connection, Sir Gladwyn said that the UK remains opposed to the seating of the Chinese Communists so long as they were aggressors.

Item 2. General Posture Regarding Soviet Participation in the UN.

a. Desirability of continuing Soviet membership.

Mr. Gross said that the US thought it was definitely desirable to maintain Soviet membership, since withdrawal would not give the UN or the Free World any significant advantage but on the contrary would cause many neutral countries to withdraw and leave the UN merely one of two hostile camps with no claim to universal authority. We believed the USSR was not likely to be driven out of the UN by mere prestige considerations and would probably remain as long as its long-range purposes were served, including maintaining a check in the UN against use of the organization as a hostile coalition.

Sir Gladwyn agreed.

b. Election of Soviet bloc members to UN posts.

Mr. Gross explained the UN believed we should not agree at this time to return to the Soviet bloc the old Eastern European seat in the Security Council. In ECOSOC the Soviets share of three out of eighteen seats was disproportionate and, while the US was not proposing now as a general principle that the Eastern European areas should be reduced from three to two seats, we believed that this could be justified. We understood that the UK agreed with us that Yugoslavia should be elected to ECOSOC this year. On the General Committee post, the US might agree to a Soviet bloc member as chairman of Committee 2 and also to a Soviet Vice President.

Sir Gladwyn agreed with this position.

c. Attitude toward Soviet proposal in the UN.

Mr. Gross said that the US did not believe that rigid tactics could be followed with regard to all Soviet proposals; that we did not believe it necessary to reject every proposal out of hand but they usually needed either to be voted down or amended so that we could really agree with them or else had to be met by Western counter-proposals, according to the circumstances.

Sir Gladwyn agreed with this.

Mr. Laskey remarked that we may have given the impression to the Arab-Asians that the Western Powers automatically opposed the Soviet proposals, and that this should be avoided.

Item 3. Use of the UN as a Propaganda Forum by the USSR.

Mr. Gross suggested that it was better to rebut Soviet arguments right away when they were raised, rather than follow our usual custom of waiting until more carefully developed arguments had been prepared. This was advisable because of the propaganda benefits which the Soviet arguments derived unless countered simultaneously by Western rebuttal. Such immediate rebuttal would cut down the propaganda charges to size, if properly reported in various information media. It would be helpful if states other than the US would make such rebuttal.

Sir Gladwyn agreed with these views, and proceeded to give the UK approach toward dealing with the Soviet "hate campaign". The UK was opposed to placing a specific item on the Assembly agenda concerning this matter, preferring to deal with it: (a) in speeches made after awaiting the expected Soviet vituperative addresses, so that we could demonstrate specifically by references to their statements how dangerous Soviet attitudes were to the maintenance of international peace and security; (b) by then introducing a resolution phrased in broad terms deploring the hate campaign, the specific terms of the resolution depending on the development of the situation in the Assembly. The UK was prepared to take the lead in dealing with the hate campaign question.

Mr. Gross thought we should have a resolution at least as strong as the one which the US had introduced in the Security Council during the discussions on germ warfare and the 1925 Geneva Protocol.

The meeting rose at 6:05 p. m.

Mr. Hickerson expressed appreciation for the British decision to take the lead in meeting the Soviet hate-America campaign and suggested the US and UK exchange the information each had on the subject. Mr. Gross commented that we would have to work out a common line on the Geneva Protocol.

PART I. THE UN IN THE POLITICAL AND SECURITY FIELD

D. *The UN and the Cold War*Item 4. Utility of UN Organs as Propaganda Forums

Sir Gladwyn said the UK group had given further thought to the general bacteriological warfare question. If the Soviets avoid any charges and merely push a resolution on the Geneva Protocol, the West should estimate the GA situation at that time and if it appears a majority can be obtained, we should try to refer the resolution to the Disarmament Commission. If the voting situation appears doubtful, we should raise the question of the communist charges and, after emphasizing that the Protocol resolution was merely part of the Soviet propaganda campaign, should attempt to refer the resolution to the Commission.

Mr. Hickerson stated that the US probably will not raise the Katyn massacre question as a special item. This tentative decision, however, is subject to review by the Secretary and consultation with other delegations. Sir Gladwyn replied that the subject was "old stuff" as propaganda. Mr. Davis said the US would refer to the Oatis case<sup>1</sup> in various speeches. Mr. Allen commented that a possible occasion for this sort of thing would be during the discussion of the Yugoslav item.

In a discussion of the question of violation of human rights by the Satellites, Mr. Gross expressed the view that we should not soft-pedal the subject of forced labor. Sir Gladwyn did not want it made a special issue. It was agreed that our joint efforts on this subject should not cut across the work of the Ad Hoc Commission on Forced Labor. Mr. Hickerson said we could not merely rely on the report of the Commission for our attacks for the report will not be good propaganda material. Mr. Davis added that the Soviets had been very sensitive on the subject of forced labor. Sir Gladwyn believed we should not raise the subject in a separate speech but rather should continue to needle the Soviets in various speeches not specifically devoted to forced labor.

Mr. Watson said the West should endeavor to get a suitable Commission report that can be used to quote from in broadcasts into the Satellites. In the GA, however, we will be aiming at the delegates, particularly those of the "neutral" countries. Therefore, we should gear our speeches to their reactions and if they object to a forceful attack, we should not play up the subject. Sir Gladwyn quickly added, however, that we must, of course, keep up the references to the conditions existing behind the Iron Curtain. Mr. Gross commented that while the forced labor question could be referred to in various committees and not treated as a special item, it should be considered as a major subject to be run in on various other items. It was agreed that the US and UK delegations should keep in close touch with each other on this subject during the GA.

Item 5. Selectivity in Determination of Problems To Be Regarded as East-West Issues

There was general agreement that a selective approach should be followed in determining issues to be treated primarily as East-West items. Such an approach would enable the West to preserve voting support on the most vital issues. Determination of such questions should be on an ad hoc basis following consultations among the Western delegates.

Item 6. Relations with "Neutrals" on East-West Issues

Mr. Hickerson outlined the US position which followed the general line that our paramount objective should be to build up the unity and strength of the free world and, therefore, effort should be made to avoid antagonizing the "neutrals" by undue emphasis in the UN on East-West issues. The US, however, is perhaps more impressed than the British with the urgency of mobilizing the broadest possible free world support against Soviet tyranny and aggression and is also inclined to assess more highly the usefulness of UN discussion of East-West issues. Furthermore, we might be somewhat less solicitous than the British of "neutral" reactions in deciding to press a specific issue possessing major East-West connotations. If the West is to get maximum support from the "neutrals" in dealing in East-West issues, we must as far as possible adopt a moderate and reasonable policy on "colonial" issues. The US program for the Seventh General Assembly is extremely moderate and should not arouse "neutral" suspicion or resentment. The only exception we now foresee concerns the Korean problem, which we think has reached a stage where additional measures against the aggressors must be considered. Sir Gladwyn concurred in the general line of the US approach and agreed that differences were those of emphasis and possibly in the approach to particular items. However, the UK believes that on "colonial" issues, there is not much value in "buying off" the "neutrals" with one concession after another.

[Here follows a brief and inconclusive discussion of the last item of Part I of the agenda, item 7, "Admission of New Members". After item 7, the conferees proceeded to Part II of the agenda, "Nationalist and Racial Problems in General Assembly Political Committees". Agenda Part III deals with items regarding colonial policy; see pages 1075 ff.

The United States-United Kingdom discussions ended on September 26.]

B. THE ARAB-ASIAN PROBLEM (1952)

320/1-1852: Circular airgram

The Secretary of State to Certain Diplomatic Offices<sup>1</sup>

WASHINGTON, January 18, 1952—4:35 p. m.

Subject: Halfway Mark in Sixth General Assembly: Preliminary Observations on Arab-Asian Attitudes<sup>2</sup>

At the halfway stage in the Sixth Session of the General Assembly, the attitudes of the NEA Delegations in the General Assembly with respect to the United States give some cause for reflection. Mr. Vyshinsky and Soviet propaganda, generally, have asserted on a number of occasions recently that during the Sixth Session the United States' "Voting machine" has "cracked" and that the "moral defeat" of the West cannot now be concealed. Mr. Vyshinsky has noted particularly the vote in the General Assembly in Committee I on December 22, with respect to the Soviet resolution against the United States Mutual Security Act, in which no less than 9 of the 11 abstentions came from the NEA area, as proof of his assertion. Only Greece, Iraq, Israel, Lebanon, Liberia and Turkey voted with the United States on this occasion. Mr. Katz-Suchy, of Poland, thought the Sixth Session has revealed a weakening of United States leadership and diminishing agreement outside the Soviet bloc, citing the fact that it took 19 ballots to elect Greece to the Security Council, and the 11 abstentions on the Soviet resolution against the Mutual Security Act. This situation would be increasingly reflected, he thought, in the Seventh and Eighth Sessions in the critical years 1952 and 1953. The Australian Delegation has indicated that the outstanding characteristic of the Sixth Session thus far has been the "revolt" of the Arab-Asian states against Western leadership. The London Times editorially remarked on January 2: "Two decisions—on disarmament and on the reunification of Germany—were taken against the opposition of the Soviet Union and its adherents, and with a large group of Arab and Asian States abstaining. . . . On two major questions the Western Powers have first displayed a tactical superiority and then assembled an overwhelming vote; there has been an apparent gain, but the effective result is insubstantial."

Particularly noteworthy among the attacks on the position of the United States was that of Sir Zafrullah Khan, on December 13, 1951, in connection with the Moroccan problem when the United States, in the plenary session, voted to postpone consideration, the vote being

28-23-7, with only Turkey and Israel supporting the United States position, Greece and Liberia abstaining, and all the other NEA states voting in the negative. Sir Zafrullah charged that the United States always supported freedom in the abstract, but seldom did so in a concrete case. Another instance came on December 19, 1951, in connection with the Anglo-Franco-American proposal for disarmament in Committee I, when Andraos Bey (Egypt) asserted that while the League of Nations had failed because the United States did not participate in its work, the United Nations might well fail because the United States "had too much to do with it." The vote on this resolution was 44-5-10, but 8 of the 10 abstentions came from the NEA area, with Ethiopia, Greece, Iraq, Israel, Lebanon, Liberia and Turkey supporting the resolution. The vote in the plenary session was 42-5-7. While the NEA states, with the exception of Ethiopia, which was absent or abstained, supported the United States position with regard to Italian membership, this was not a significant test of Arab-Asian attitudes, however important the United States considered the resolutions involved. On the other hand, the vote on the resolution with respect to the Collective Measures Committee in Committee I, on January 8, was a test and only India abstained, all others voting for the resolution as finally passed (51-5-3), the plenary vote being identical.<sup>3</sup>

The record in the Sixth Session, thus far, shows a deepening and broadening of trends observed in previous sessions of the General Assembly, in which the United States, while enjoying a general support from the Arab-Asian states, has received only partial support on critical issues involved in the East-West struggle, and on issues in which these states have had very particular interests. The most consistent supporters of the US have been Turkey, Greece, Liberia, Ethiopia, Iraq, and Lebanon and Pakistan. There does not appear to be any significant change in the voting records of India and Afghanistan, which abstain on controversial political issues. Saudi Arabia and Iran have demonstrated more than a usual tendency toward abstention this year, while the record and the cooperative attitude of Lebanon and Iraq have been in striking contrast to those of the other Arab states. In addition to the usual issues of Palestine and Korea, the US position at the Sixth Session has been decidedly complicated by the Moroccan, Egyptian and Iranian questions. The US still has the general support of the Arab-Asian states, although the atmosphere in the Fourth Committee has been discolored by the Moroccan problem and there appears to be an increasing skepticism concerning the colonial powers and the West generally. Part of the hostility is due to the belief that the United States is tied too specifically to the British position in Egypt and the French in Morocco. The US is therefore, the object of an indirect hostility, privately regretted by certain members of the Arab bloc, who state that it would not normally be directed against the US. The US has, however, through the processes of discussion and consultation with Arab-Asian representatives in this Committee, and consequent compromise, generally been able to reach agreed solutions as to resolutions emanating from this Committee, and has exercised a moderating influence in many instances, notably in connection with the question of South West Africa. Political differences do not necessarily arise in connection with questions in the Second, Third, Fifth and Sixth Committees, so that the voting record in these Committees is not always significant politically, although serious differences arise in the Second and Fifth Committee, particularly in connection with economic and financial problems, where the United States has not been able, at times, to join with representatives from the NEA area in support of resolutions.

<sup>3</sup> In a letter of Dec. 21, 1951 to the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson), written from Paris, Durward V. Sandifer, Deputy Assistant Secretary, and Senior Adviser, United States Delegation to the General Assembly, said: ". . . The most troublesome thing here is the developing neutralist and anti-United States attitude of the Middle East and Arab states. This has reached a stage of intensity of feeling which it is difficult to understand. The violence of it is epitomized perhaps in the remarkable statement made by the Egyptian Delegate . . . on the Disarmament Resolution. . . ." Sandifer then described the "outburst" by Sir Zafrulla Khan as "an amazing display of violent emotion when you consider the normal character of the man who made it . . . . These states, together with a number of under-developed countries, are following a line . . . which causes us and will continue to cause a great deal of difficulty. It is the one problem which we will have to devote most attention to during the coming year. . . ." (Letter, Sandifer to Hickerson, Dec. 21, 1951, Hickerson-Murphy-Key files, lot 58 D 33, "Mr. Sandifer")

The Department would appreciate any views as to these reflections.<sup>4</sup>

Roosevelt, Acting Chairman of the United States Delegation at Paris from mid-December, 1951 until the close of the General Assembly on February 6, 1952, set forth her preliminary observations concerning the Sixth General Assembly. Inter alia, she commented: "I would like to say that I think Ambassador Jessup did a most extraordinary piece of work with the Arabs. Most of us who have had to deal with them in this session recognize how difficult it is and that in some way we must try to change this attitude before we come to another General Assembly." CONFIDENTIAL

[WASHINGTON,] May 21, 1952.

Subject: United States Policy with Respect to the Admission of Items to the Agenda of the Security Council and the General Assembly.

The United States' policy in the United Nations has taken an important turn within the last six months as a result of our failure to support the inclusion of the Moroccan case in the agenda of the General Assembly and the Tunisian case in the Security Council agenda.<sup>2</sup> Until 1951 the United States had been most hesitant to sanction any restriction on the right of a Member to raise for discussion in the United Nations any important political problem of international concern. Only rarely have we opposed such discussion, and then for clearly defined reasons. Our experience in the Moroccan and Tunisian cases suggests the desirability of a review of our past practice.

Basic Approach in Organizing the United Nations

Our non-restrictive attitude on the scope of discussion within the United Nations was implicit in the original thinking with regard to the new organization during the latter years of the war. It is clear from the record that the United Nations was established to serve as an international organization in and through which Member States might freely bring to the attention of world opinion problems of international concern, and in which appropriate remedies might be sought within the limits laid down by the Charter.

Our basic philosophy on this point was considered so important that it very nearly resulted in a breakdown of the San Francisco Conference, when the Russians insisted that the veto should apply in the Security Council even to the question whether or not the Council should take up and discuss a question. When Harry Hopkins visited Moscow in May and June 1945 to discuss pressing political problems with Stalin, President Truman sent Hopkins an urgent message asking him to put to the Marshall the United States view that

“the Yalta formula as agreed on safeguarded the freedom of discussion and the right of any Member to bring before the Council any situation for discussion. And that this right, which was rightly a question of the agenda, should therefore be decided by the Council by simple majority without any power having the right to veto it.” (Robert E. Sherwood, Roosevelt and Hopkins, p. 911)

Stalin accepted the American position, and the San Francisco Conference<sup>3</sup> was saved.

The Charter<sup>4</sup> provides (Article 35) that any Member of the United Nations may bring any dispute, or any situation which might lead to international friction or give rise to a dispute, to the attention of the Security Council or of the General Assembly. The implication is that the organ concerned will permit discussion of such a dispute or situation. Under the Charter, moreover, the General Assembly enjoys (Article 10) the right to consider and discuss any subject within the scope of the Charter, including any questions relating to the maintenance of international peace and security brought before it by any Member of the United Nations (Article 11); and, subject to one qualification, the General Assembly is authorized to recommend measures for the peaceful adjustment of any situation, regardless of origin, which it deems likely to impair the general welfare or friendly relations among nations (Article 14). In the report of the Secretary of State to the President on the results of the San Francisco Conference, it was stated that the United States Delegation at San Francisco consistently supported the general proposition that an effective international organization must be constructed on the most broadly democratic basis if it is to operate effectively. Senator Vandenberg expressed the hope of the delegation that the General Assembly would be "the town meeting of the world."

To be sure, the Charter does place limits upon the type of action which can be taken by the Security Council and the General Assembly. Except for enforcement action taken in the Security Council with the concurrence of the five permanent members, both the Security Council and the General Assembly are limited to the making of recommendations which are not legally binding upon the Members of the United Nations, although they have great moral weight. Moreover, the Charter provides (Article 2, paragraph 7) that none of its provisions authorizes the United Nations to intervene in matters essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state. The Charter also prohibits the General Assembly from making recommendations with regard to any dispute or situation while the Security Council is dealing with it. Neither of these restrictions, however, prevents discussion in the appropriate body. The practice has developed in both the Security Council and the General Assembly of permitting such discussion even when the competence or jurisdiction of the organ concerned is in the question. A decision on competence takes place after discussion, either on the specific question of competence, or as an element in the voting on any resolution dealing with the question at issue.

United Nations Practice, and United States Attitude

In deference to the desirability of ensuring free discussion, the Security Council and the General Assembly until 1951 exercised extreme forbearance in barring contentious political items from their agenda.

Security Council

Prior to the Tunisian case, the Security Council failed in only two instances to include in its agenda an item proposed by a Member state.

In the first instance—a Soviet item entitled "Information on Allied Forces on Non-Enemy Territory" (1946)—the item was not received because the Soviets failed to meet minimal procedural requirements by demonstrating where or how international peace and security were threatened. The subject matter of the Soviet complaint was later discussed in the General Assembly.

The second instance arose from a Soviet complaint, on August 29, 1950 of "The Unceasing Terrorism and Mass Executions in Greece." Again the Council felt that no showing had been made that the allegations constituted a threat to the peace or fell within the jurisdiction of the Security Council. It was noted that this and all other United Nations aspects of the Greek case had been repeatedly discussed in the General Assembly; and it was clear that Council members regarded the Soviet item as another diversionary parliamentary manoeuvre designed to stall further action on the Korean problem.

In both of these cases, the United States voted with the majority to exclude the items.

In all other contentious cases, the item was admitted to the agenda on the ground that a prima facie showing of a potential threat to international peace and security had been made. The United States consistently voted for inclusion. It emphatically welcomed Security Council consideration even of Chinese Communist complaints that the United States was guilty of armed invasion of Formosa, and that its air forces had bombed Chinese territory.

This pattern was disturbed when, in April 1952, the United States, joined by the five other NATO members of the Security Council (United Kingdom, France, Netherlands, Greece and Turkey), failed to support consideration of the Tunisian item which had been introduced by eleven Arab-Asian states. The United States rested its position not on considerations of substance but of timing; it maintained that the parties should be permitted to negotiate on the basis of a French program of reforms without United Nations interference. The United States did not support a Chilean suggestion that the item be admitted to the agenda with discussion postponed for the time being.

General Assembly

Until the Fifth General Assembly (1950), no contentious political case had ever been barred from the agenda of a General Assembly session. Nor did the United States ever object to the inclusion of such a case on the agenda. United States representatives were among the strongest advocates of broad Assembly authority to discuss international political problems.

We were particularly emphatic in supporting the fullest consideration of any allegations made against the United States. We maintained this position even in the face of Soviet charges of warmongering and of aggression, in connection with our Formosa and Far Eastern policies and in 1951 with the Iron Curtain escapee provisions of the Mutual Security Act.

In the last eighteen months, the General Assembly has had occasion, however, to keep items off its agenda.

In November 1950 an exceptional procedure was adopted to deal with an item submitted by El Salvador entitled "Invasion of Tibet by Foreign Forces." By unanimous agreement, the General (steering) Committee of the General Assembly decided to adjourn consideration of the item, largely owing to the Indian view that the question might still be settled by peaceful means. In the light of the unanimous Committee decision this can hardly be considered a contentious case.

In December 1951 the General Assembly decided to "postpone for the time being" consideration of charges of "Violation by France in Morocco of provisions of the Charter and the Declaration of Human Rights," by the narrow margin of 28 votes to 23. The United States favored postponement to permit the French and Moroccans to carry on conversations looking toward the execution of reforms. We held that it was proper under the Charter that the parties should exhaust direct bilateral channels before the General Assembly debated the case, and that the best interests of the Moroccan people would not be served by debate at the time. In the bitter debate on the subject Zafrullah Khan (Pakistan) declared:

"On this issue the United Nations is on trial and will be judged by the people of Asia and Africa by the stand it takes on it. . . .

"Our experience in this Organization has been that we hear a great deal about freedom, democracy, and the self-determination of peoples from the group which might be called the Western states; but whenever we have had to deal concretely with the freedom, liberty, independence, and self-determination of a particular people, that role is, by and large, with rare and noble exceptions, abandoned by the Western States. We have on such occasions always found the Eastern European States in the same lobby with us. We have been forced emphatically to take note of it time after time, and we have been compelled today to give expression to our grateful appreciation in all humility. . . ."

Although the statement is overdrawn, it illustrates the emotional response generated by the colonial problem in the United Nations.

At its sixth session (1951) the General Assembly also refused to accept on its agenda a Soviet proposal on "The Representation of China in the United Nations" and decided to postpone consideration, for the duration of the Paris session, of any further proposals to alter the representation of China. This action was taken on the ground that the matter had repeatedly been raised by the Soviet Union and discussed in the General Assembly and other United Nations organs, most recently at the close of the fifth session a few days previously, when the General Assembly had expressed its desire not to refer the matter for consideration to the sixth session.

It seems fair to conclude from the foregoing that the Moroccan case represents the only departure from the concept of an open General Assembly, the other cases cited having been barred for special reasons unrelated to the principle of free discussion.

Results of United States Action on Morocco and Tunisia

The effect of our position in the Moroccan and Tunisian cases has been to impair seriously the basic United Nations premise that in principle the Organization should be open for the discussion of all international political problems. A failure to permit consideration of an item submitted by eleven of the sixty United Nations Members could leave no other impression.

It is not the purpose of this paper to argue the wisdom of the tactics adopted to deal with the two cases. The importance of avoiding action which would gravely alienate or weaken the French at this particular juncture is fully appreciated.

It is relevant, however, to review some of the adverse effects of the policy we have followed. We have debased our moral leadership in the Arab-Asian world. We have convinced many non-Europeans that despite our lip service to concepts of self-determination and racial equality, we are actually seeking to perpetuate the old-style colonial system. We have allowed the Soviets to take credit for championing the cause of dependent peoples. We have exhibited NATO solidarity in defense of the colonial interests of a NATO member, rather than as an association of free states against external aggression. In large areas of the free world we have given a fillip to neutralism. At home we have puzzled and disappointed large sectors of American public opinion. And by taking our stand on the agenda question, we have been cast in the role of opponents of freedom of discussion—a peculiarly vulnerable position for our leadership in the United Nations and among the free peoples.

In assuming these liabilities, we have gained only a temporary respite. We did not prevent acrimonious discussion of the Moroccan and Tunisian problems in the General Assembly and the Security Council, before the decision to exclude the items was taken. We may be confronted with a special session of the General Assembly on Tunisia, where we will have less control over the situation than we would in the Security Council. As a practical matter, we cannot prevent discussion of North African problems in other United Nations forums; the issue is bound to arise at the next regular General Assembly session, either by inclusion in the agenda or during debate in Committee Four (Trusteeship and Dependent Areas) or elsewhere.

Meanwhile, the agitation in French North Africa and throughout the Arab world continues. The experience of frustration in the United Nations strengthens extremist elements seeking complete independence by violent means. The utility of the United Nations as a safety valve and a means of facilitating the peaceful adjustment of tensions is impaired, and its stature correspondingly diminished.

It is no doubt impossible fully to reconcile in the United Nations the conflicting demands of loyalty to our closest allies, vital strategic considerations, support for the advancement of dependent peoples, and a concern for our moral position in the non-European world. It should be possible, however, to avoid adding to our difficulties the burden of opposing freedom of discussion. Once this hurdle is cleared, we can seek to use the varied and flexible United Nations procedures to blunt and moderate emotional forces, stimulate compromise, and damp down extremism.

What conclusions are to be drawn from our recent experience?

1. Without rigidly tying ourselves down to the automatic acceptance of all political items proposed for inclusion in the Security Council or General Assembly agenda, we should revert to our pre-1951 policy of holding to an absolute minimum the cases in which we will not support free discussion.

2. Grounds for the exclusion of political items might include:

- a) failure to make a prima facie case that the item may fall within the jurisdiction of the organ concerned (this is more significant in the Security Council than in the General Assembly, with its broad field of operations);
- b) repeated introduction of the same problem for obvious propaganda purposes;
- c) general agreement that the item is frivolous or trivial;
- d) agreement among all parties at interest that a matter should not be discussed.

3. We should favor consideration by the General Assembly or Security Council of cases involving charges against the United States.

4. If we wish to avoid United Nations action because we believe it would be prejudicial to our interests or to settlement of a dispute, we should not do so by seeking to prevent discussion. We should attain our objective through normal United Nations procedures, including agreement to postpone substantive discussion after admission of an item to the agenda; a decision by the organ concerned to make no recommendation; or passage of an acceptable resolution.

5. We should attempt to persuade other friendly Members of the wisdom of this view; to dissuade them from rash action such as threats of non-participation or of withdrawal from the United Nations; and to convince them that it is more advantageous to debate matters like the Tunisian problem in the Security Council, where we have a large measure of control, than to force their introduction in the General Assembly and other United Nations organs whose action may be more distasteful to us.

Annex A

Security Council Experience

Under the Charter the Security Council has the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security. Members of the Council have seldom challenged the inclusion of a question on the agenda if there was a prima facie case of a dispute or a situation which might lead to international friction.

There are only two instances (prior to the Tunisian case) in which the Security Council failed to include on its agenda an item proposed by a Member State.

The first case of this character involved a Soviet item entitled "Information on Allied Forces on Non-Enemy Territory" which was considered by the Security Council in August and September 1946. The United States opposed inclusion of the item on the agenda on the ground that the USSR had not made a case justifying its consideration by the Security Council. He pointed out that United States troops were stationed on foreign soil in all cases with the agreement of the government concerned; hinted that the Soviet proposal was made only for propaganda purposes; and attacked the formulation of the item because it did not specify which troops in which foreign countries were a menace to international peace, or in what way international peace and security were threatened. Other delegations also criticized the Soviet formulation as pure propaganda and as lacking in the necessary precision as to where and how international peace was threatened. The Security Council decided by a vote of 7 to 2 (Poland, USSR) with 2 abstentions not to include the item on the agenda. It may be noted that the French representative abstained in the decision, on the ground that the mere fact that a proposal was motivated by political or propaganda considerations was not in itself a cause for barring it. He made the point that the question whether peace was in danger could only be determined after study had been given to it.

The position of the Security Council in this instance, as supported by the United States, was that minimum procedural requirements had not been met in the submission of the item. The subject was subsequently raised by the USSR in the General Assembly and was debated there.

The only other instance in which the Security Council, prior to the Tunisian case, refused to admit a political item to its agenda occurred in 1950, when the Council refused to discuss an item proposed by the USSR on August 29, 1950 entitled "The Unceasing Terrorism and Mass Executions in Greece". Only the USSR and Yugoslavia voted in favor of the inclusion of this item. Other delegations opposed its consideration because no showing had been made that the allegations constituted a threat to the peace or fell within the jurisdiction of the Security Council, and because all United Nations aspects of the Greek case had been repeatedly considered in the General Assembly where the discussion would undoubtedly be carried forward. The United States representative, moreover, criticized the introduction of this question as a parliamentary maneuver by President Malik of the Security Council.

The other Security Council cases in which, prior to 1952, a substantial question was raised regarding the introduction of an agenda item may be summarized as follows:

1. The Greek Question

In August 1946 the Ukrainian S.S.R. sought to place the Greek question on the agenda, alleging that as a result of the policies of the Greek Government a situation had arisen in the Balkans which represented a grave danger to international peace and security in that part of the world. The United States took the position that the Council could not deny to any Member of the United Nations which alleged the existence of a situation likely to threaten international peace and security the opportunity to present its case. The French representative stated that it was illogical to contend that, before having examined an application, it was not sufficiently serious to be examined. Therefore, despite Netherlands and United Kingdom objections on the ground that no prima facie evidence had been presented, the Security Council placed the item on the agenda.

2. The Indonesian Question

In July 1947, the Security Council included the Indonesian question on its agenda without dissent, on the application of Australia and India. The President ruled that this action would not prejudice the Council's competence or the merits of the case. Not being a member of the Security Council at the time, the Netherlands representative was unable to state his views before the item had been admitted to the agenda. In his subsequent remarks, however, he argued that the matter was solely within the domestic jurisdiction of the Netherlands. The United Kingdom took the position that although it had not been demonstrated that there was a war between sovereign states, the situation might endanger international peace and security and should be left on the agenda. The United States representative felt that the Council must take cognizance of fighting on such a scale and in such conditions as to endanger the peace of the region.

Although the Dutch repeatedly contested the Security Council's jurisdiction in the case, they cooperated in the efforts of the Security Council (which were ultimately successful) to settle the problem.

3. Czechoslovak Question

In 1948 the Chilean Government proposed the inclusion of an item based on Papanek's charges that the political independence of Czechoslovakia had been violated by the threat of the use of force by the USSR, thus endangering the maintenance of international peace and security. Although the USSR opposed inclusion of the item on the ground that it constituted interference in the internal affairs of Czechoslovakia, the United States and eight other delegations voted to include it on the agenda.

4. Hyderabad Case

In September 1948 the Security Council agreed to discuss the dispute between Hyderabad and India, despite doubts as to the political status of Hyderabad and therefore as to the competence of the Security Council, on the understanding that the adoption of the agenda could not be considered to prejudice the Council's competence. Although India was not then a member of the Security Council, the Indian representative strongly maintained that Hyderabad was not a state and that the usefulness of the United Nations would be impaired if areas not possessing the characteristics of states could present their grievances before the Security Council.

5. Berlin

Despite Soviet contentions that this question did not fall within the competence of the Security Council; that under Article 107 of the Charter (relating to relations with ex-enemy states) it could not be considered by the Council; and that there was no threat to international peace and security, all the Council members except the USSR and the Ukrainian S.S.R. voted to place the item on the agenda. The United States representative pointed out that the blockade was a threat to the peace, and that Article 107 was not applicable since this was a dispute among the victorious powers. After the decision on the agenda question, the Soviets announced that they would not take part in the discussion, although they did eventually cast a veto.

6. Complaint of Armed Invasion of Taiwan (Formosa)

This was a complaint brought by the Chinese Communist regime against the United States in August 1950 as a result of the latter's neutralization policy for Formosa. One day after the complaint was submitted the United States replied welcoming consideration of the case in the United Nations and approving a full United Nations investigation. Although China opposed placing the question on the agenda on the ground that there was no prima facie case and that its government had no complaint to make, the item was included on the agenda.

7. Complaint of Bombing by Air Forces of the Territory of China

The United States position on this complaint by the Chinese Communists, accompanying their charges on Formosa, paralleled its attitude on the Formosa case. The United States indicated that it would welcome an investigation on the spot. Although the Chinese representative criticized the item as a propaganda maneuver without any basis, made by a body not properly qualified to bring a complaint to the Security Council, the item was admitted to the agenda.

8. Iran

In October 1951 the Security Council debated at length the admissibility of the United Kingdom complaint of failure by the Iranian Government to comply with provisional measures indicated by the International Court of Justice in the Anglo-Iranian oil case. Objection was made to inclusion of the item by the USSR and Yugoslavia on the ground that it represented interference in the internal affairs of Iran and an infringement of the sovereign rights of the Iranian people. The United States supported inclusion, since a prima facie case had been made, the matter had been the subject of litigation in the International Court of Justice, and the Security Council was competent to consider the dispute on its merits. The item was included by 9 votes to 2.

Annex B

General Assembly Experience

The jurisdiction of the General Assembly extends to all matters within the scope of the Charter, and the General Assembly is authorized under the Charter to recommend measures for the peaceful adjustment of any situation, regardless of origin, which it deems likely to impair the general welfare or friendly relations among nations.

The agenda for a regular session of a General Assembly normally includes 60 to 80 items, most of them without direct political significance. It is not unusual for minor items to be withdrawn, scheduled for later consideration or otherwise disposed of without inclusion on the agenda. However, until late in the 1950 session, there were no instances where a contentious political case was barred from the agenda of an Assembly session.

The United States, until late in 1950, consistently favored the inclusion of political items on the Assembly's agenda in the light of the Assembly's broad jurisdiction under the Charter. We were particularly solicitous in ensuring that items involving charges against the United States should be fully discussed in the General Assembly. Thus, the United States never opposed General Assembly consideration of the annual major Soviet political proposal, introduced at the beginning of each session. We recognized that even Soviet charges of United States warmongering could be raised for discussion, false though they were, if the USSR so desired.

The United States point of view was well illustrated at the beginning of the 1950 session of the General Assembly in connection with three proposed agenda items. The first, "The Question of Formosa" was placed on the Assembly's agenda at American initiative and over the opposition of both China and the USSR for differing reasons. In the discussion Ambassador Austin, "maintained that the very fact that the item under consideration was clearly a cause of dispute warranted its inclusion in the agenda of the General Assembly as a matter of international concern. The United States Government had consistently favored the fullest and freest discussion of any charges brought against it, and would continue to do so." The second case was a Soviet item charging the United States with aggression against China; in this instance Ambassador Austin stated that, "The Delegation would vote in favor of including the item since it believed that the United Nations should hear every complaint brought before it." The third case involved Soviet charges that United States planes carried out bombing and strafing missions in China. Ambassador Austin declared that, "In conformity with his government's policy of favoring full investigation of charges brought against it, he would support the inclusion in the agenda" of the item.

The same considerations impelled the United States to agree in 1951 to the inclusion on the Assembly's agenda of the Soviet attack on the alleged aggressive aspects of our mutual security legislation. In commenting on the Soviet charges Ambassador Gross stated that, "The United States had never objected to the inclusion of a complaint against the United States in the agenda of organs of the United Nations. The United States Government considered that any Member of the United Nations was entitled to express its grievances against another Member, if its complaint related to a question which fell within the purview of the Charter and if the consideration of such a complaint was not liable to prejudice the settlement of the dispute by means of direct negotiations or by any other means."

By contrast, at all regular sessions of the General Assembly the Soviet Union has opposed a wide variety of political items on grounds that their discussion was illegal or inconsistent with various Charter provisions, or for other reasons. The Soviet record shows consistent opposition to consideration of proposals involving the abuse of the veto, Greece, Korea, the Interim Committee, violations of the human rights provisions of the satellite peace treaties, Chinese charges of Soviet violations of the Sino-Soviet Treaty of 1945, and charges of Soviet failure to repatriate World War II prisoners of war.

As is indicated in the body of this paper, the question of the "Invasion of Tibet by Foreign Forces," introduced by El Salvador in November 1950, was not included in the Assembly's agenda, by unanimous decision of the General Committee. The Committee acted largely on the strength of British and Indian assertions that the Tibetan question could best be settled by peaceful means if the item were not discussed. Noting the unprecedented character of its position, the United States reiterated that it "had always supported any proposal to refer to the United Nations international disputes or complaints of aggression, which could thus be aired, considered and settled at international hearings." In this case, however, the United States representative announced that he would support the proposal for adjournment of consideration made by the states most directly concerned.

The circumstances in the Tibetan case may be distinguished from those surrounding the Moroccan question. In the former, there was no appreciable support for the El Salvador initiative, not even from the Chinese (Nationalist) spokesman. In the latter case, the complaints against France was made by six Arab states, and the request for inclusion in the agenda was supported by a large number of other Members. The Assembly's decision on Morocco may thus be said to represent a clear departure from previous Assembly practice.

[WASHINGTON,] September 17, 1952.

At the 9:30 meeting this morning the Secretary brought up the question of preparing the US position on the various issues which the Arab-Asian group are placing on the agenda of the General Assembly. He said that in the past we have tried to stay in the middle with the result that everyone is mad at us. He referred to Byroade's suggestion that we should just blaze ahead and "be true to ourselves". He said we don't want to Balkanize the Middle East. We must consider what we will have in the end. The UN has put us in a terrible situation in which any irresponsible person like Nehru can make us discuss and vote on any question at all. Debating and voting constitute actions although they accomplish nothing. They have us across a barrel. Is there any course to take in the national interest which will bring us to a better outcome than we have reached now or must we drift on in a middle position? He would like to avoid last minute briefing on details which require him to make a quick decision on such questions as inscribing an item on the agenda. In such cases he is presented with conflicting advice from the different offices in the Department. Some say we should vote to inscribe the item but then shift to the other side of the controversy when we deal with the resolution. We need the best thought the Department can supply on the problem as a whole. There has been no such general thought as yet.

Mr. Bruce referred to the discussion of the same subject in the Secretary's office yesterday afternoon and said they had concluded that I should be asked to take charge of pulling together the recommendations which the Secretary desires.

The Secretary inquired whether he should meet at once with Nitze and me and Byroade and Perkins and Hickerson. Mr. Nitze suggested that he and I first look into the matter and get it lined up in shape for discussion. The Secretary agreed.

Subject: Study of Arab-Asian Cases in the General Assembly

At the meeting in the Secretary's office today to discuss the outline on the study of the Arab-Asian cases in the General Assembly<sup>1</sup> the Secretary made the following comments.

He said of course in the general consideration of the problem we must have Egypt and Iran in mind and not limit ourselves to the cases in the General Assembly.

Before we get to decide technical problems in the General Assembly with differing views coming up to him from the several offices (which it is natural they should have) he would like to try to have everyone who has responsibility in these matters think where our interests are and where we are headed. It may be that the question is unanswerable in spite of the best thinking we can put on it. If that is so, we should know that this is the fact. The kind of study he had in mind might, however, bring out some guide lines. There are very many things to be borne in mind and the difficulty is to have all of these considerations in the mind of the same man at the same time. One person may, for instance, bring up the question of the effect of the developments in the election campaign while another mentions the effects inside Tunisia. If you reach a decision in principle and forget one of the important elements you have to reconsider your decision. We need to see where we stand in this whole struggle of the people inspired by the nationalist wave on the one hand and including in some cases the politicians who manipulate the movement and on the other hand the position of the Europeans who in some cases have been holding on too long. We need to know whether our allies are on the skids and we need to know whether we can really get stability in the Middle East. It needs to be thought of generally. On the other hand, you must have the impingement of detail on broad statements so that the generalizations can be tested.

We need to know whether the UN can actually help in any of these situations or whether it can affect them in any way. If it can't and we are merely faced with a mess we ought to have that in mind.

Various criticisms were voiced by the participants of the complexity of the paper work called for but it was generally agreed to go ahead and try it out. The Secretary said that he was particularly interested in the points under heading II and suggested that everyone might take a whack at them.

I suggested that information under various headings could be fed in piecemeal and that much of it could be based on papers already in existence such as the NSC Senior Staff study on North Africa.<sup>2</sup>

The Secretary suggested we should have something to discuss with him next Tuesday.

[WASHINGTON,] September 23, 1952.

Subject: Preliminary Analysis of Considerations Affecting Decisions on the Arab-Asian Problems in the United Nations General Assembly

General Conclusion

Careful study of all the papers prepared by the various offices of the Department leads to the conclusion that no one is able to suggest action which the United States or the United Nations can take at this time which will solve or put an end to any one of the current issues which involve the problem of our relations with the Arab-Asian group. There is no such action for instance which will terminate the nationalist agitation in North Africa, end "Malanism" or the opposition to it, or put an end to Arab-Israeli antagonism. It may be stating the obvious, but it is well to bear in mind that policy decisions on these cases must therefore be made with a view to alleviating difficulties, reducing frictions and contributing to ultimate progress toward solutions, while avoiding so far as possible actions which would have the opposite results. More broadly, the United States should endeavor to follow a course of action which will maintain in the world the moral position of the United States as a counter to the communist appeal. The actions which the United States can usefully take in pursuing its general objectives in regard to these issues are not confined to actions in the United Nations but the elaboration of these other courses of action is not included in this paper.

I. The Issues Arising in the United Nations.

A number of cases which will come up for consideration in the United Nations General Assembly involve issues about which the Arab-Asian group feel very strongly and on which their positions are sharply opposed to those of the so-called metropolitan powers, especially France. These cases include Tunisia, Morocco, and the new item on the racial policies of the Union of South Africa. So far as South Africa is concerned, they include also the old cases of the Indians in South Africa and the case of Southwest Africa. The Palestine case, from the point of view of the United States, also presents problems in terms of our relations with the Arab-Asian group but does not strictly involve the so-called "colonial" issue and the related problem of "nationalism". A number of other cases which will arise in the Second,

Third and Fourth Committees of the General Assembly dealing with human rights, the development of underdeveloped areas, and the administration of dependent areas and trust territories will also involve some of the same antagonisms and conflicts. This situation is one in which the whole is greater than the sum of its parts.

II. Use of Terms.

It should be explained also that to avoid at each step an examination of the differences which exist between the attitudes and positions of the countries of the Near East, Middle East and Far East, the term "Arab-Asian group" is employed as indicative of a general attitude which creates a problem for the United States. Similarly, for convenience the case of France is, in the first instance, treated as illustrative as an attitude and position of the metropolitan or "colonial" powers. The necessary distinctions and differentiations will be analyzed subsequently.

Similarly, for convenience of analysis, the word "nationalism" is used to indicate the powerful force which inspires or excites a very large part of the human race today. It is recognized that the motivating force is not confined to "nationalism" in the strictest sense. It includes the reactions of those who consider that they are unfairly kept in underprivileged conditions and who have been awakened to the belief that historic inequalities whether social, economic or political can now be removed. Racism is another element contributing to the same turmoil.

III. The Problem.

It is recognized that the appearance of these cases in the General Assembly does not mark either the origin or the extent of the general problem confronting the United States in terms of the conflict between "Arab-Asian nationalism" and "French colonialism." The cases in the General Assembly require specific decisions but those decisions cannot be made wisely without a consideration of the much broader and continuing problem. No one supposes that the "ideal" decision on these cases will finally dispose of the agitation over the particular cases or the long-range difficulties confronting the United States in terms of meeting the general issues. Primary reliance in our approach to these difficulties must probably be placed on actions falling outside the scope of the United Nations and other traditional diplomatic processes, such as are discussed under VII, at the conclusion of this paper. Our United Nations action will, however, have a considerable effect in helping to create the atmosphere and background which will influence our prospects of success in carrying out these other types of action.

For convenience of preliminary analysis, attention is focused here on the problems raised in the case of Tunisia and Morocco. Reserving for later a detailed analysis of the distinctions between the Tunisian and Moroccan cases, the two are considered here in terms of the problem of French North Africa.

This memorandum also attempts to concentrate at this stage upon factors to be considered in making general policy decisions, as distinguished from arguments which could be advanced and tactics which could be followed to sustain such decisions when made.

IV. Major United States Interests and Objectives.

In regard to the particular case of North Africa in the General Assembly, certain specific major United States interests and objectives can be identified.

In regard to France, it is to our interest :

a. to maximize France's internal strength and external contribution to the Western position in either a prolonged cold war or a general war;

b. to enhance the possibility that North Africa will contribute to French strength rather than cause a weakening drain upon French resources;

c. to preserve North Africa as a stable area for basing Western operations in the event of general war.

In regard to the Arab-Asian countries, it is to our interest :

a. to prevent a further deterioration in the internal stability of the North African area such as might involve a drain on Western strength or an accretion to Soviet strength;

b. to promote a sympathetic attitude which will in turn affect favorably the actions of these countries on such issues as participation in MEDO, granting of base rights, availability of raw materials particularly oil, and cooperation in the United Nations especially on such problems as the joint effort in Korea or a possible similar joint effort in case of any new communist aggression.

The United States also has an interest in strengthening the United Nations. Although it is not demonstrable that any country would withdraw from the United Nations if it felt a sense of outrage as a result of United Nations action in these cases, if such an eventuality appeared likely the United States would wish to prevent such a development. Whether or not the short-range interests of the United States are served by the discussion of such cases as those here under consideration in the General Assembly, the United States is at present committed to the generally popular concept of the United Nations as the "Town Meeting of the World" and that concept could not be eradicated overnight.

V. Alternative Courses of Action Open to the United States.

The United States' freedom of action in choosing a course of action on these cases is limited. An extreme course of action in favor of either one of the antagonistic interests would be likely to place in real jeop-ardly the attainment of two lines of objectives of American policy neither one of which can be disregarded.

For example, if the French were suddenly to withdraw from North Africa, the result would probably be local chaos in the area since there is no other country to fill the vacuum. France would lose an important source of military manpower, the loss of which would seriously affect not only the French military position in Europe but also its capacity to continue the effort in Indochina. Moreover, the French have the determination to stay and the present power to do so despite any resistance of the local populations even with such support as their Arab-Asian friends could give them. If, however, the French maintain their position solely by force without progressive improvement in the local situation, the drain on French resources could have an equally crippling effect. It is possible to look forward to developments wisely guided by the French which would enable them to salvage at least many of their interests without excessive cost.

The various positions which the United States might take on these cases are subject to numerous variations. Factors to be considered in choosing among these variations would include the actual merits of the cases, the effect on the general French position in the promotion of our European policies, the effect on the effort to increase the cooperative attitude of the Arab-Asian states, the effect on the attainment of other objectives of the United States in the United Nations especially in connection with Korea, the effect on the future of the United Nations itself, and the maintenance of the moral position of the United States throughout the world as a counter to the communist appeal.

It is therefore concluded that the United States can best serve its [ramified?] interests, both with respect to the states concerned and with respect to our stake in the future of the United Nations, by resisting the role of partisan for either camp and by adopting—with such variations as are required by our national attitudes toward each dispute—a mediatory role.

VI. Execution of Recommended Course of Action.

A. Introduction.

In proceeding with an amplification of this intermediate course of action, it becomes more difficult to segregate the particular cases under discussion from other cases in the General Assembly involving relatively the same or comparable line-ups of antagonists. The United States' attitude in a discussion of the Palestine issue, for example, might exacerbate the passions of the more extreme representatives of the Arab-Asian nationalists. On the other hand, if the United States should decide to take an attitude generally in support of the Arab-Asian position on the issue of "Malanism" in South Africa, the atmosphere would be less highly charged in regard to a possible United States intermediate position on the North African cases.

B. The North African Cases.

It seems to be true that the French anticipate, although they may not be fully reconciled to, United States' support for the inclusion of the North African items on the agenda. (This may be more clearly true in regard to the Tunisian item than in regard to the Moroccan item.) It is not anticipated therefore that United States' support for the inclusion of the items on the agenda would subject our relations with France to a very severe strain. Possibly there would be a somewhat stronger French feeling if they raised the issue of competence and the United States votes against them on this issue. Depending upon the general nature of the debate in the United Nations and the final decision of the French Cabinet, it would appear from the most recent indications that this further step would also be supportable without serious damage to Franco-American relations. Since the Arab-Asian group, supported in this respect in general by the Latin Americans and some other small states, attach great importance to these preliminary questions, it would seem that action of the United States along these lines would be distinctly helpful in terms of our Arab-Asian relationships.

It must be further recognized that the situation in regard to our relations either with the French or with the Arab-Asian group might be changed by the position taken by the United States concerning the adoption of any resolution by the General Assembly concerning these cases. It is probably true, however, that the Arab-Asian group would not expect the United States to join in the kind of strong resolution of condemnation which they would probably favor. The failure of the United States to support such a resolution would probably therefore have only the negative effect of not advancing our cause with the Arab-Asian group. On the other hand, if the United States supported a strong resolution of condemnation, it would undoubtedly surprise and shock the French and might well represent the limit of extreme action which would seriously prejudice French cooperation in support of our policies in Europe. It must be admitted that it is difficult to discuss this point in abstract terms since there are many variations in what might be considered to constitute a "strong resolution of condemnation."

It does not appear that United States' refusal to go along on a General Assembly resolution obnoxious to the French would in and of itself seriously affect (a) the Arab decision to participate in MEDO, (b) the present status of base rights in those countries, or (c) general support of the United States' position in the General Assembly on such questions as Korea. Neither does it appear at the present time that such an intermediate United States' position would have a determining effect (a) on the fate of the Pinay Government, (b) on French ratification of EDC, or (c) the actual solution of the basic problem in Tunis and Morocco.

The basic situation in Tunis and Morocco cannot be improved without the cooperation of the French. It is doubtful whether the cooperation of the French can be induced by action in the General Assembly. It is at least possible that favorable French action can be induced at least over a period of time by steady, quiet pressure from the United States. On the other hand, there are strong arguments to the effect that any strong action in the form of a resolution by the General Assembly would encourage the recalcitrant elements among Tunisian and Moroccan nationalists to resist profitable negotiations with the French even if the French took a more forward-looking position.

It may further be noted that it seems to be the judgment of officers of the Department that, while the Moroccan and Tunisian situations are inherently ripe for communist agitation, there is not in the present situation or in the immediate future any prospect of communist control of the nationalist movements in North Africa.

C. Certain Other Issues.

Earlier sections of this memorandum have formulated the general role in terms of the issues posed by the Moroccan and Tunisian items, which exemplify most clearly the problem to which this memorandum is addressed. The general line of action to be followed with respect to these two items has been suggested. But application of the general line to other concrete situations—disputes which differ from the North African questions in one or more significant respects—is not an automatic process.

1. Palestine

The Palestine case, for example, differs from the North African items in that, inter alia, (a) the complainants include only a portion of the Arab-Asian group; (b) their adversary is not a "metropolitan" power; (c) the Arab complaint is not directed against a colonial overlord but a rival neighbor-state. Notwithstanding these differences, the free-world need for a strong Israel (and ultimate peace between Israel and the Arab states) requires that here, as in the North African cases, the United States must remain in a middle position, doing all in its power within and without the United Nations to assist the parties to a permanent settlement. (Indeed, since the most fruitful approach to solution of the Palestine question seems to lie in direct negotiations between Israel and the new Naguib government, the immediate objective of United States' action in the United Nations should be to see to it that United Nations debate does not so exacerbate existing tensions as to make direct negotiation outside the United Nations impossible.)

2. South Africa

The Palestine case, despite its significant differences from the North African items, does not call for rejection of the indicated mediatory role. However, the new South African item, which likewise differs from the North African prototype, does not offer ready ground for the assumption of a neutral position on the merits.

In terms of impact on American interests, the South African case differs significantly from the North African cases. Our cordial relations with South Africa, although important to us, are relatively minor as compared with the importance of maintaining French cooperation. Furthermore, the merits of the South African case are significantly different, in terms of United States national attitudes, from the merits of the North African questions. In the latter situations, the American presumption in favor of self-government is balanced by the American realization that the establishment of self-government is a delicate process calling for statesmanlike efforts jointly agreed upon and carried forward by the metropolitan power and the dependent peoples. In the South African case, fundamental principles of American democracy, embodied in the United Nations Charter, dictate refusal by this Government to countenance any policy of governmentally-imposed racial oppression.

Whether debate in the General Assembly will reach the merits of "Malanism" is problematical, since the competence of the General Assembly may well be called into question. This issue of competence involves both legal problems and policy decisions concerning the effects of the precedent established. If the debate does reach the merits of the controversy, the United States can exercise a moderating influence by privately urging the futility of a sharply condemnatory resolution, but the United States should not put itself publicly in the morally untenable position of supporting or condoning the racial practices of the South African Government.

It is recognized that strong condemnation of the South African Government may provoke South African withdrawal from the United Nations. On the other hand, refusal by the United Nations to discuss "Malanism", or acceptance by the United Nations of a double standard of Charter observance, might provoke the response of Indian negativism toward (or even withdrawal from) the United Nations. On balance, it would seem that the possibility of South African withdrawal must be accepted as a calculated risk. In any event, it should be the special concern of the United States, through private approaches to the South African Government and the South African Delegation, to prevent any precipitate South African response.

VII. Other Types of United States' Action.

Previous parts of this paper indicated that the United States could not, if it was to avoid jeopardizing its vital interests, follow a course of action that would be wholly consistent with Arab-Asian aspirations. There will be both a continuing frustration of these aspirations and a continuing tendency to blame the Western powers, including—at least to some extent—the United States, for that frustration. This will be one of the factors strengthening extremist anti-foreign groups and weakening the position of more moderate and responsible leaderships in the Arab-Asian area, and particularly in the Middle Eastern countries. This emphasizes the need for considering carefully whether parallel United States' actions of other types might not be taken which would, to some extent, offset the consequences of the continuing and unavoidable non-fulfillment of Middle Eastern aspirations that impinge on vital Western interests.

Such a consideration calls for at least a cursory examination of the forces underlying the presently accelerated trend toward anti-Westernism and political instability in the Middle East. That trend results, in large part, from recent economic and social changes within this area, which have expanded the numbers and heightened the aspirations of certain groups—notably the urban middle sector—far beyond the point at which they can be satisfied or absorbed under this area's existing social, political, or economic organization. These emerging groups are consequently moved to seek to overthrow that organization, and particularly to challenge the established position of the traditional ruling elite, which is largely composed of members of the landed and tribal hierarchy. While this traditional elite has previously perceived in some degree of Western influence a guarantee of its domestic position, the emerging urban middle sector has found in anti-foreignism a potent issue with which to accelerate its accession to power. So long as the leaders of this urban sector consider that their position as aspirants for, or holders of, power is insecure, they will continue to emphasize this issue in relation to the foreign scene as well as to press for more extremist policies at home. They will, in all probability, continue to be strikingly successful in creating and mobilizing articulate "popular" support for their anti-foreign goals, particularly among the urban proletariat and possibly among the military, since the activism of both of these groups is becoming a factor of increasing political significance in this area.

In the long run, therefore, any approach to the difficulties that we face in our relations with this area (difficulties which the debates in the General Assembly necessarily will not reduce and may compound) must deal with their basic causes rather than symptomatic manifestations. It is doubtful that any practicable United States or indeed Western policy in the United Nations could fulfill Middle Eastern demands and lead to a cooperative partnership with these countries, so long as the exigencies of domestic politics compel their governments to find a xenophobic outlet for the feelings that contemporary social and economic changes are engendering. Most of these governments are leading or confronting internal revolutions, which are nonetheless real for not following the pattern that was established by the events of 1789 in France or of 1917 in Russia. Underlying these revolutions is the aspiration of a new emerging group to alter the area's existing internal structure and external posture in such a way as both to enhance its own position and to give effect to certain of its "reformist" and "nationalist" concepts. In proportion as these emerging groups succeed in attaining their goals, their revolutions may "come of age", as in Mexico and Turkey, and thus create a new pattern for political stability. It is by assisting this process that the United States can perhaps best maximize the long-term prospects for fulfilling its objectives vis-à-vis this area. For only stable and reasonably secure Middle Eastern governments will, in the foreseeable future, be able to react to a friendly Western attitude on outstanding issues affecting Arab-Asian interests by limited collaboration rather than by "raising the ante" in their demands on the West. Perhaps the most that can be expected of United States' action in the General Assembly is that it should not so violently disarrange our relations with these countries as to render impossible United States' actions of other types that might help to bring such governments into being.

The processes by which the United States might seek to accomplish this purpose are set forth in the Staff Study appended to NSC 129/1. This paper indicates that "we should seek to use the social and economic tools available to us in ways that will reduce the explosive power of forces pressing for revolutionary change to the point where necessary changes can be accomplished without uncontrollable instability. . . . As new leadership groups emerge, we should also work to associate their interests with our own and, if and when they gain power, cooperate with them in working out programs that will assist them to attain constructive objectives—a course of development which will tend to give a measure of moderation and stability to their regimes. . . . Maximum results, at least in the next several years, will be assured by programs directed towards meeting certain aspirations of urban groups, which include both the leadership and principal supporters of the new political movements in this area."

With regard to our actions outside of the United Nations, it is clear that complete and lasting Arab-Asian cooperation cannot be "bought" by military or economic aid programs.

In some of the countries included in the Arab-Asian group, it is impossible to ignore the importance of the role of certain personalities and equally dangerous to neglect a study of the psychology of such personalities and their peoples in order to determine what kinds of measures they will find appealing. It is a commonplace that aid programs do not, in general, engender such a strong sense of gratitude that this alone brings the countries to our side. In many instances, the local view is that we are under an obligation to share our wealth and instead of gratitude we are reproached for not doing more.

The conclusion is that actions by the United States which appeal to the special characteristics of the peoples or governments of certain countries and which in themselves seem to us rather intangible and perhaps insignificant, may be among the effective actions we could take. For example, operation "Magic Carpet" in taking the pilgrims to Mecca may well have proved more valuable in building up good will in the Arab states than all the money and effort we have put into the problem of settling the Arab refugees. But it has also been pointed out that memories are short and we need to have recalled constantly such favorable factors as our liberation of the Philippines and our help in establishing the independence of Indonesia.

It must be recognized that the execution of such policies by the United States will be more difficult if the French and more especially the British attitudes are at variance with ours. The same observation applies to colonial areas, in Central Africa for example. Persistent effort to overcome the antagonism of the metropolitan powers to what they consider unrealistic American idealism will be required.

It is beyond the scope of this memorandum to carry further the consideration of these broad problems although their relevance to the specific issues which confront us in the United Nations is clear.

[WASHINGTON,] September 23, 1952.

Mr. Nitze, Mr. Byroade, Mr. Sandifer, Mr. Allison, Mr. Bonbright, Mr. Kitchen and I met with the Secretary this afternoon to go over the memorandum on the Arab-Asian problem. The Secretary said he thought it was along the right line and indicated his agreement with the general conclusion. He said it indicated the position we are in and it was necessary for us to act on that basis. We are not able to get out of the middle position.

Mr. Nitze commented on Part VII on pages 9 and 10, saying that S/P had some reservations about this point of view since it left out of account certain other elements in the situation. I noted that these pages really dealt particularly with the situation of countries in the Near East and the views were not fully applicable to South Asia, Southeast Asia and the Far East.

Mr. Allison said that he was in general agreement with the paper. He emphasized the importance from a tactical point of view of advance talks with representatives of governments to make our position clear. He said he planned to talk along the line of this memorandum in the various countries which he will visit on his trip. I mentioned the memorandum for Ambassador Bowles which was being prepared and Mr. Allison said he would like to have a copy.

Mr. Byroade said he also agreed with the general line of the paper. He questioned the first paragraph on page 11 which he thought might imply too much playing down of the benefits we get from our military aid program. He said it is the view of NEA that the British and French are through in that area and that the problem is ours. He suggested that Egypt was a good example of the case in which we had taken action which annoyed the British at the time but which they now agree was right. Mr. Nitze pointed out that if we take over these problems as we had to in Greece, we are left holding the bag and cannot fall back on the easier position of trying to help the British for example. Mr. Byroade said that we did have to take on more and more responsibility and eventually we became the hope of the Arab-Asian States. The Secretary inquired whether we did not ultimately also become identified as the enemy and Mr. Byroade agreed that that might be true.

Mr. Allison suggested that in terms of tactics in the General Assembly we should not press too hard to make all of our friends vote with us on every question. We should recognize their right to be neutral. Mr. Sandifer agreed in general but pointed to the necessity of avoiding building up an Arab-Asian bloc which would oppose us on all issues.

Mr. Bonbright wondered whether we were thinking of ways to block Arab-Asian extremism. He thought the first sentence on the top of page 9 suggested that all of the Arab-Asian aspirations are good which he thinks they are not. He thought we should explore ways in which to split the bloc.

The Secretary agreed that this was something to which we should give our attention. He thought that it was very important that we work on the Egyptians, keeping our discussion of possible military aid running along.

There was then some discussion as to whether there was any possibility of persuading the Arab-Asian States to take the Palestine issue off the agenda. The Secretary wondered whether we could suggest that the PPC [PCC?] hold conversations with all of the parties during the Assembly and report at the end. Sandifer and I pointed out that we would get the same orations on the refugee question anyway and Byroade agreed that we could not take the initiative in trying to keep the question off the agenda.

The Secretary both in connection with this memorandum and in connection with a recent message from Kennan wondered whether we had to start out with such a row as we usually do in order to secure appropriations from Congress. Mr. Nitze thought that on one detail it might be possible to include our military aid items in our domestic defense appropriations although we would still have to justify the power of allocation which would need to be written into the bill.

We discussed the telegram to London about inscribing the Tunisian item on the agenda and agreed on what the telegram should contain.<sup>1</sup> The Secretary did not like either the NEA-EUR draft of the statement or the UNA draft. In talking about this the Secretary wondered whether we couldn't make a brief statement in which we would merely make the following points:

We thought the French proposals were pretty good; we are sorry they were turned down; we hope the discussion in the General Assembly will help; the real result, however, must come from discussions by the French and Tunisians; we will do our best to help to get good results.

[WASHINGTON,] September 24, 1952.

Subject: Possible Conferences of the Secretary With Various Foreign Ministers at the time of the UN General Assembly

1. In line with our discussion I have explored the desirability and feasibility of developing a definite program of bilateral talks with the Foreign Ministers attending the UNGA, concentrating on those from the Latin American, the Far Eastern, and the Near Eastern areas.

2. The following is a tabulation by areas of the Foreign Ministers who will or may attend the General Assembly:

	Certain	Probable	Possible
ARA (1)	Brazil		(2) Costa Rica Paraguay
FE (4)	Indonesia Korea Nat. China Thailand
NEA (7)	Iraq Ethiopia Liberia Israel Egypt Pakistan India (Mme. Pandit)	(2) Greece Turkey	(1) Libya
Total (12)		(2)	(3)

EUR (10)	At opening                      Australia                      Canada                      Luxembourg                      Netherlands                      New Zealand                      Sweden Later than opening                      Denmark                      Norway                      France                      UK		(5) Belgium                      Czechoslovakia                      Poland                      USSR                      Yugoslavia

3. Political area attitude toward talks and suggested agenda:

a. NEA is very favorably disposed toward holding bilateral talks and, although it has not yet furnished specific agenda items, feels that there are unquestionably numerous subjects that can be profitably discussed. NEA is equally interested in just permitting their clients to blow off directly to you.

[Depending on its status, this may prove an exceptional opportunity to further Arab interest in the establishment of MEDO.]

b. FE is particularly desirous that you discuss with the Indonesian Foreign Minister American technical, economic, and military aid; the Indonesian internal security situation; the American Oil Company contracts; and a US-Indonesian treaty of friendship and commerce.

Talks with other Far Eastern Foreign Ministers could be somewhat shorter and are less urgent.

c. ARA thus far is certain only that the Brazilian Foreign Minister will come to the General Assembly. You will doubtless want to reciprocate his hospitality and, depending on the outcome of talks now going on, you may be asked to discuss financial matters with him.

d. EUR assumes that you will wish to have discussions with Schuman and Eden, but may wish to suggest talks also with the Norwegian and Danish Foreign Ministers.

4. Conclusions:

a. The Foreign Ministers from ARA, FE, and NEA with whom bilateral talks would have to be scheduled will number between 15 and 20. The talks will require between 20 and 25 hours, exclusive of luncheon or dinner talks, spread over about 6 weeks. This does not include time for discussions with Schuman, Eden, or any other European Foreign Ministers.

b. If the talks are kept within the above limits, they can be fitted into your UN schedule or conducted in Washington in between or after your visits to New York. UNA regards bilateral talks of these proportions practicable and desirable. However, all of the political areas but NEA in particular, will endeavor to have you see all of the heads of their client delegations, and therefore the formal bilateral talks must be confined to Foreign Ministers and persons of Madame Pandit's status. The others will have to be handled either through regular UN appointments or in groups. The tentative time schedule does not take these group meetings into account.

c. Bilateral talks of the character envisioned provide an unusual opportunity to carry out the attack on the Arab-Asian problem which we have been discussing during the past week.

d. The agenda for the talks can best be suggested to the Foreign Ministers after their arrival in New York by our political area representatives to the UNGA. Pre-arranged fixed agenda would seem undesirable.

e. The political area representatives would also furnish you with the necessary briefing papers and arrange to have the appropriate Assistant Secretary or other qualified officer in attendance at the talks.

f. The following is an approximation of the schedule which could be set up:

October 9	Thailand (dinner)
October 20-22	Indonesia (luncheon if possible) or Brazil (dinner or luncheon) India and Pakistan
October 23-25	Brazil (dinner or luncheon) or Indonesia (luncheon if possible)
October 27- November 5	(in Washington) Turkey (probable) Egypt Any of remaining Foreign Ministers who happen to come to Washington
November 5- December 1	Iraq, Ethiopia, Liberia (1/2 hour), Israel, Nationalist China, Korea, Greece (probable) (Schuman and Eden, if desirable)

Editorial Note

As projected, Secretary of State Acheson conducted a far-reaching series of conversations with the foreign ministers or other ranking representatives of the areas designated, during the weeks of the Seventh Regular Session of the General Assembly, October 14-December 21, 1952. Many of the memoranda of conversation are scattered throughout the extensive 320 decimal file (General Assembly). There is a complete file in the Jessup files, lot 53 D 65, "For. Min. Meetings—N.Y. Memorandum by the Deputy Assistant Secretary for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (Jernegan) to the Deputy Under Secretary of State (Matthews)<sup>1</sup>

WASHINGTON, December 30, 1952.

Subject: Attitude of the Arab States toward the Incoming Republican Administration in the United States.

Problem:

The Arab States greeted the election of General Eisenhower with enthusiasm, as marking a probable turning point in U.S. policy toward the Near East. They expect from the new Administration a greater appreciation of the strategic importance of the area and a recognition of the greater importance of the Arab countries relative to Israel in the strategy of Near East defense against the USSR. The question is how to deal with this Arab attitude, which presents both an opportunity and a problem to basic U.S. interests in the Near East.

Background:

The conviction of the Arab world that the outgoing Administration is heavily biased toward Israel was reaffirmed recently by U.S. support of the Eight-Power Resolution at the United Nations General Assembly, operative paragraph 4 of which urged the Israelis on the one side and the Arab States on the other to seek a peace settlement by entering "at an early date, without prejudice to their respective rights and claims, into direct negotiations for the establishment of such a settlement, bearing in mind the resolutions as well as the principal objectives of the United Nations on the Palestine question, including the religious interests of third parties". This paragraph is regarded by the Arab States as relegating previous United Nations resolutions concerning Palestine into a position where they could be ignored, and as requiring negotiation to be on the basis of the de facto boundary and refugee situation in Palestine. Arab bitterness on this subject during the General Assembly debate was recently reflected in a violent press campaign against the West in the Arab States. In addition, the Arab League is holding a threat of economic boycott over the Federal Republic of Germany, effective at such time as the German Parliament ratifies the Restitution Agreement which it signed in 1952 with Israel, and has charged the U.S. with responsibility for this 'un-neutral' document, which they say, ignores the compensation rights of the Arab Palestine refugees.

Discussion:

The Arab attitude towards the election of General Eisenhower has been more clearly indicated by press reactions in the Near East than in official statements. The press was particularly vocal in Beirut and Baghdad, less so in Syria and Egypt where military regimes exercise a more strict control over what is printed.

The Arabs appear to hope vaguely for a new orientation of U.S. policy towards the Near East which will include: (1) greater emphasis on economic and military assistance to the Arab States as compared with Israel; (2) an affirmation of U.S. determination to prevent aggression by Israel against the Arab States; and (3) pressure on Israel to implement the obligation (which she has accepted in principle) to compensate Arab refugees; to repatriate to Israel a substantial proportion of the Arab refugees; and to rectify her boundaries with the Arab States at least in rough equivalents to the allocations of territory outlined in United Nations resolutions which have gone unobserved by both Israel and the Arab States.

However vague and imprecise may be the feelings of the Arab States, there is no doubt that their hopes are very high. This fact presents both an opportunity and a risk at a time when the U.S. Government is moving to effect a settlement of differences between the U.K. and Egypt and to establish a Middle East Defense Organization. The alternatives are three:

(1) that the present mood in the Arab States may be turned to U.S. advantage by certain friendly gestures and actions by the incoming Administration; or that

(2) this wave of Arab enthusiasm, if given no encouragement, may spend itself rapidly in such disillusionment that currently dwindling faith in U.S. friendship for the Arab world might be completely lost and the leadership of moderate Arab opinion, which favors closer ties with the U.S. and the West, would be supplanted by extremist opinion of an anti-Western and a neutralistic nature; or

(3) that Arab enthusiasm may be over-encouraged, beyond capacity to later satisfy.

Recommendations:

It is recommended:

(1) that you call the attention of Mr. Dulles to the problem of Arab-Israel relationships and to the declining prestige of the U.S. throughout Arab lands which has resulted from Arab conviction that present U.S. policy favors Israel against the vital interests of the Arab States;

(2) that a special opportunity exists for the incoming Administration to capitalize on Arab hopes and expectations, without raising the latter too high;

(3) that in the best interests of the U.S. these hopes and expectations should not be allowed to collapse;

(4) that, accordingly, it is suggested that the incoming Administration consider the desirability of several initial moves designed to convince the Arab States of (a) its deep interest and impartiality toward all states in the Near East; (b) its determination to discourage aggression within as well as upon the Near East area; (c) its desire to work steadily for peace between Israel and the Arab States by whatever means seem best calculated to produce that result; and (d) its determination to weld the states of the Near East into a workable structure for defense against Soviet aggression;

(5) It is also suggested by NEA that the following might be considered as suitable initial moves by the new Administration designed to create the desired effect:

(a) a brief general statement in the President's Inaugural Address embodying a recognition of the importance of the Near and Middle East area to the U.S. and to the defense of the free world, and the friendly and impartial interest which the U.S. entertains towards all states of the area. An example of the type of general statement which this Bureau believes useful is attached.<sup>2</sup>

(b) an early reaffirmation by the new Administration, in conjunction with the governments of the United Kingdom and France, of the principles of the Tripartite Declaration of 1950 regarding non-aggression within the Near Eastern area.<sup>3</sup> It is hoped that this reaffirmation might strengthen the earlier language, so as to re-emphasize that (assuming the new Administration pursues current plans to develop a Middle East Defense Organization) any arms aid extended to states of the Near East are to be used only for area defense against an outside threat and not for intra-area aggression.

(c) an early visit by Secretary Dulles himself to the Near East to discuss with heads of states top policy problems regarding U.S. relations with the Near East. It is suggested that if Mr. Dulles finds this idea congenial, announcement of the intention to make such a trip might be made as soon as feasible after the Inauguration.<sup>4</sup> The purpose of the trip would be primarily to underline U.S. interest in the area by breaking precedent. No Secretary of State has visited the Near East in recent years, although many visits have been made to Europe and Latin America. The dramatic aspect of such a visit would recall to Near Easterners General Eisenhower's pre-inaugural visit to Korea and would serve to emphasize an awakened U.S. understanding of the rising importance of Asian peoples in the panorama of U.S. foreign relations. From a practical standpoint it would embolden moderate, pro-Western leadership in the Near East at a moment when the Soviet Union is redoubling its efforts to discredit the U.S. and its Western Allies throughout the area by alliance with extremist, anti-Western groups.<sup>5</sup>

C. THE 1953 REVIEW: ORGANIZATION OF UNITED STATES
PARTICIPATION IN THE UNITED NATIONS SYSTEM

310/6-353

Memorandum Prepared in the Department of State for the White House<sup>1</sup>

[WASHINGTON,] May 29, 1953.

THE ORGANIZATION OF UNITED STATES
PARTICIPATION IN THE
UNITED NATIONS SYSTEM
BASIS FOR PARTICIPATION

The United Nations and its related agencies deal with a wide variety of problems which are of major concern to the United States as a leading world power. This is the fundamental reason for United States participation. The United Nations is an instrument for the accomplishment of certain objectives. Our own national interest is served by the use we make of the instrument, and by our effectiveness in preventing its misuse by others. In the Cold War the UN has become a major means for diplomacy and propaganda in combatting the political warfare of the Soviet Union and in rallying the strength of the free world through a wide variety of measures.

In addition, the technical complexities of problems which cut across national boundaries have required us, in our own self-interest, to cooperate with other sovereign states in dealing with them.

For these reasons, the Congress has provided a body of legislative authorization under which the Executive branch develops and carries out policies and programs through international organizations in order to further the interests of the United States. (Tab A lists the pertinent treaties, statutes and other legislative acts.)

THE UN SYSTEM

In the UN proper, the parent organ, so to speak, is the General Assembly, which meets annually for approximately three months, and in addition holds special sessions almost every year. All 60 member nations participate with equal voice and vote.

The Security Council has eleven members, always including the Big Five who have the right to veto important matters. The Economic and

The paper was requested by the White House for the use of Sherman Adams, Assistant to the President. Bloomfield coordinated the project in the Department of State. The paper was forwarded to the White House on June 3. (A small collection of documents illustrative of its operational history is in decimal file 310.)

Social Council consists of eighteen nations, the great powers in practice always being reelected. This has also been the case on the Trusteeship Council (twelve members). The Disarmament Commission has the same membership as the Security Council (plus Canada, because of her atomic development). The Military Staff Committee consists of military representatives of the Big Five's Chiefs of Staff, including our own. Temporary intergovernmental UN bodies include the Collective Measures Committee (fourteen members), and Peace Observation Commission. UN operating programs include the Technical Assistance Administration, Korean Reconstruction Agency, Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, and the Children's Fund.

Under the Economic and Social Council are eight functional commissions (Fiscal, Statistical, Population, Social, Human Rights, Status of Women, Narcotics, and Transport-Communications) plus three regional economic commissions (Europe, Asia, Latin America). The US is a member of all these bodies.

Outside the UN proper but considered part of the UN system are the so-called Specialized Agencies—intergovernmental bodies in technical fields where problems cross national and regional boundaries and require cooperative efforts. These are the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO), World Health Organization (WHO), International Monetary Fund (IMF), International Bank (IBRD), Universal Postal Union (UPU), International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO), International Telecommunications Union (ITU), World Meteorological Organization (WMO), International Labor Organization (ILO), and the Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO). Through agreements between these agencies and the Economic and Social Council, as prescribed in the UN Charter, their programs and administration are reviewed and to a considerable extent coordinated by the UN. In general, however, they are autonomous and directed by their various governing bodies, on which we and other member governments sit.

(Completely outside the UN system but performing functions of concern to the UN operation are such ad hoc intergovernmental organizations as General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), and the Intergovernmental Committee on European Migration (ICEM).)

CHAIN OF COMMAND

The President is responsible, in the words of the Hoover Commission, "for the conduct of all aspects of foreign affairs within the purview of the Executive Branch". As Chief Executive, as Commander-in-Chief, as Chairman of the National Security Council, he presides over the process of defining world objectives and coordinating foreign affairs activities to achieve those objectives.

In directing US participation in international organizations the President under his constitutional authority determines policy and designates representatives and agencies for its execution.

The National Security Council advises the President as prescribed by statute, and acts on major policy problems arising in the UN—Korea and disarmament are two current examples—in the same way as with other foreign policy issues before it.

The Secretary of State “advises the President in the determination and execution of US foreign policy” and “directs the discharge of the functions of the State Department”. In managing US relations with international organizations, the Secretary performs his functions in the same fashion as he does in all fields of international relations.

The Assistant Secretary for United Nations Affairs is one of six executive or “operating” vice-presidents of the State Department, who in the words of the Senate Committee on Government Operations have “responsibility for decisions within clearly defined limits” and “serve as focal points of contact between the Department and the Missions in both substantive and administrative matters”. (Committee Report No. 4, January 9, 1953.)

These officers, according to the Hoover Commission, have “the responsibility for the formulation of foreign policy proposals and for action in line with approved policies”. The Commission described the Assistant Secretary for UN Affairs as “in charge of relationships with international organizations, including the United Nations and its affiliated organizations”, and as “the channel for instructions to and from United States representatives and delegations at the United Nations and all other international organizations and conferences”.

The Assistant Secretary for UN Affairs has the function of servicing or “backstopping” the US Representative to the UN, and US delegates to other UN agencies (and some non-UN bodies). In a nutshell, his job is to see that the policies these representatives express in the name of the US Government always represent White House policy.

To furnish this “staff support”, the Assistant Secretary supervises the Bureau of UN Affairs (UNA) which provides three types of services:

- 1) it coordinates the policy views and technical requirements originating in various other parts of the Department and other agencies, so that US representatives in international organizations can be sure they are always stating consistent and unified US positions.

- 2) it develops the actual US policy positions on questions which are peculiarly “multilateral” in nature, which cut across the bilateral functions of the geographic units and the specialized “subject” units in other agencies, and which no other office is staffed or equipped to handle.

- 3) it assembles in one unit the special knowledge and experience the US has built up in the field of multilateral diplomacy so that the Government can prepare itself most efficiently to uphold its interests in international organizations.

Thus, according to 1) above, where another part of the executive branch is responsible for relations with one area or one subject, it furnishes policy guidance to the Bureau of UN Affairs, which develops it for use in the international organizations in terms of precedents, relation to other UN matters, parliamentary problems, UN personalities, etc. In the second category, the Bureau of UN Affairs, as indicated, has the primary "policy responsibility" for specialized multilateral questions. Examples of these are: political matters of an inter-regional nature (in the UN this has meant such items as admission of new members, general Cold War moves and resolutions like "Peace Through Deeds" and "Essentials of Peace", counter-strategy to Soviet propaganda charges of "warmongering", and biological warfare, etc.); collective security preparations in the UN (e.g., activities under "Uniting for Peace" program, additional measures against Communist China, contributions of troops for Korea, etc.); world refugee problems; parliamentary tactics which have been proven best by experience in specific UN agencies; international secretariat problems; operations of the UN Trusteeship system; world health and human rights problems; interpretations of articles of the UN Charter; international budgets; the diplomatic aspects of arms regulation.

In the third category, the Assistant Secretary for UN Affairs contributes to the whole process of policy-making and servicing the technical "know-how" in the field of multilateral diplomacy. This means chiefly the political and organizational side of the work of UN bodies. It includes questions of credentials (e.g., the tactics of defeating moves to seat Communist China, in 135 separate UN meetings to date), elections (the balancing of interests, blocs, and geographic distribution in the membership and officers of multilateral bodies), budgets, secretariat organization and practices, agenda problems, relationship of other multilateral bodies to the UN, etc.

The US Representative to the UN is, as prescribed by Executive Order 10108, the Chief of the United States Mission to the UN (USUN). The Mission includes: various other US Representatives (i.e., those serving in the UN Economic and Social Council and its Commissions, the Trusteeship Council, Disarmament Commission, Military Staff Committee, etc.); the Deputy Chief of Mission; and the Deputy Representatives to the UN Security Council and to other UN bodies in New York. Ambassador Lodge coordinates "the activities of the Mission in carrying out the instructions of the President transmitted either by the Secretary of State or by other means of transmission as directed by the President". He thus guides all US Government activities at the UN headquarters, administers the US

Mission, is the Chief US Representative in the UN Security Council, Chairman or Acting Chairman of the US Delegation to the General Assembly, representative ex officio and principal US spokesman in any UN body at UN headquarters, and principal US negotiator vis-à-vis the UN Secretariat and representatives in New York of other member governments. In addition, Ambassador Lodge participates regularly in the President's Cabinet meetings, and takes part in other top-level meetings within the Government, such as meetings of the State-Defense-AEC Committee on Regulation of Armaments, etc.

The status of the US Mission to the UN, while unique in many ways, is in a sense comparable to a major American Embassy abroad in terms of the normal working relationships with the State Department. Just as the Bureau of European Affairs is the "home desk" for our London Embassy, so the Bureau of United Nations Affairs is the "home desk" for USUN. The American Ambassadors in both cases are appointed by and responsible to the President. They are instructed by and report to the Secretary of State, acting for the President. In practice, the Assistant Secretary of State, acting for the Secretary, is in both cases responsible for ensuring that they are instructed and advised, that such instructions and advice represent the coordinated views of the Government (including where necessary the decisions of the Secretary, the NSC, and the President), and for receiving the information they report and seeing that it is properly used and acted on at the Washington end. In practice also, the head of the UN Mission takes an active part in the formulation of US policy and tactics both prior to and during UN meetings, and recommends changes in policies if in his opinion conditions "on the ground" so require.

PARTICIPATING AGENCIES

Multilateral diplomacy involves a wide variety of subjects, only some of which are "purely political". The State Department, in collaboration with military and other agencies directly concerned, directly manages US interests in problems which are primarily of a political or security nature, such as: disputes between states, organization of collective defense against aggression, administration of colonial areas of the world, regulation of arms, and world trade, to name but a few.

Since World War II the US has undertaken to collaborate with large numbers of nations on essentially "technical" questions of mutual interest, such as epidemic control, famine relief, currency stabilization, flight safety, labor conditions, dope smuggling, radio frequency allocation, and comparative statistical methods, again to name only a few of the problems in which world conditions affect US interests.

This has meant that other parts of the US Government where experts work on these subjects must be looked to for defining this country's international interest in the matter, often in consultation with private groups such as business, farm, professional and labor organizations. Because of the diversity of subjects dealt with internationally, these expert "source" areas range across much of the Government, from the Atomic Energy Commission to the Tariff Commission, from the Narcotics Bureau to the Department of Agriculture, from the Budget Bureau to the Civil Aeronautics Board. In addition to the State Department at least 24 other executive agencies are concerned with UN activities, often on the ground that the success of the domestic programs they operate are materially affected by what happens in the particular UN body which is dealing with the same subject.

THE COORDINATION OF POLICY

The Process of Coordination

The machine of US participation in international organizations is somewhat like a funnel. At one end experts in various government agencies recommend policies for the US to adopt in the UN on a large number of topics. At the other end US spokesmen in international forums are expected to state with clarity and authority the views and wishes of their government, often at meetings separated by thousands of miles, and on subjects which bear on each other significantly. This fact presents the Government with a formidable task of coordination.

When real conflicts of views exist as between interested parts of the Executive branch, they must somehow be resolved before a unified and agreed to American position can be confidently presented in an international forum. Even when no substantive conflict exists, varying approaches and methods are often suggested by the interested agencies. These contributions from different standpoints must be brought into harmony with each other, and with what the US is currently saying and doing in other similar international situations and meetings.

The ultimate purpose of the coordination process is to ensure that when the US speaks officially to the world at large, it speaks with one voice, and with the knowledge that in the next room, the next city, or the next continent, other US spokesmen are, so to speak, on the same wave length. US policies on different subjects must be consistent with one another. They must fit together into an effective program for the advancement of US interests throughout the whole UN system.

The Machinery of Coordination

The process within the Government of funneling to a single point of action all necessary views and interests on a host of political and non-political subjects requires machinery of coordination. For this function of coordination, by definition one central point is required. The coordination machinery thus runs on the principle of narrowing the funnel at its end to a single organizational unit. This is the Bureau of United Nations Affairs in the State Department.

Under the Assistant Secretary for UN Affairs, UNA's four offices [political security (UNP), economic-social (UNE), dependent areas (UND), and international administration-conferences (OIA)], plus its International Refugee Staff, pull together the many threads throughout the executive branch with the purpose of ensuring that throughout the whole system of international organizations and conferences the representatives of this Government are adequately serviced with agreed policies on all topics of concern to the US.

The Hoover Commission recommended that the Assistant Secretary for UN Affairs, "while participating in the formulation of foreign policy . . . should, so far as possible, obtain his policy guidance from the various regional units, the Planning [Staff], and from other staff advisers . . .". In accordance with this, as indicated earlier, UNA operates in the first instance as a working coordinator of Department-wide and government-wide policy-formulating operations.

A considerable part of the coordination job is done through in formal day-to-day contacts between the desk officers in UNA on the one hand and the "subject specialists" elsewhere in the Department or other Departments, on the other. Often this is the only way in which deadlines can be met at UN meetings, imminent votes, or sudden shifts in position by other countries. In this way also the countless minor matters that arise in various international organization operations can be resolved with a minimum of bureaucratic "layering" or "clearances".

In the political field this is particularly the case. When there are indications that a political problem will come before the UN a working team is formed. The subject may be Korea, or Palestine, or Kashmir, or currently Laos. The representative of UNP usually chairs the group, prepares papers for consideration by the group, and drafts instructions for the UN representative. His responsibility is to ensure that the views of all interested offices are secured and that any information required is obtained from Department and overseas files. He furnishes the knowledge of UN Charter considerations, precedents established in various UN bodies, past performance of various delegations and delegates, voting probabilities, operation of regional and special-interest blocs in the UN, etc. He frequently acts as principal adviser to the US Representative during the UN meetings when the case is considered.

Also on the "team" are representatives of the affected geographic areas, who provide the general US policy toward the country in question (although these must be reconciled where one desk officer is speaking of our interests in the UK and the other on our interests in Iran, as in the Iranian oil case in the Security Council). In addition they furnish the knowledge of geographic factors, national idiosyncrasies, and official personalities, and often they participate in the actual GA or SC sessions as political liaison officers with delegates from countries in their areas.

These teams also frequently include representatives of the Legal Adviser's office and, when necessary, of the public affairs, economic and research offices. The UNP member often consults informally on military aspects of the cases with officers in the Defense Department. The team members turn to their respective Assistant Secretaries for major decisions, and these in turn consult higher echelons, as required, before approving final US positions. Either UNA or the geographic offices undertake consultation with appropriate US Missions abroad and foreign envoys in Washington (e.g., the Assistant Secretary for UN Affairs is responsible for the regular briefings of representatives in Washington of countries with troops in Korea in addition to his frequent consultations with foreign representatives on other UN problems).

An essentially similar process takes place within the Department on economic and social questions before the UN, and on problems of dependent and colonial areas. In the latter case, issues of the greatest perplexity arise in different parts of the world vitally affecting US relations with both our principal allies and with the strategically important regions of Asia, the Middle East and Africa, where most dependent areas are located. Conflicts between these two groups on colonial questions come to a head in the UN, both in the Trusteeship Council and in the General Assembly. UNA's Office of Dependent Area Affairs (UNDA) teams up with the geographic desk officers concerned and with Defense and Interior Department officers for the task of harmonizing both within the US Government and in our UN policies, traditional US attitudes toward colonial peoples on the one hand, and the pressing need to maintain a united front alongside our major European allies, on the other.

During the entire process of developing US policies the Department of State, through UNA, constantly consults the US Representative to the UN and members of his staff, seeking his views and judgment on all matters of importance. For his part Ambassador Lodge conducts consultations with his diplomatic colleagues in New York, and of course carries the burden of top-level negotiation on behalf of the US Government on all matters under discussion in the UN. As a source of political intelligence, the US Mission to the UN is one of the key listening posts in the world, with US representatives constantly in contact with high officials from 59 other countries. This flow of information, combined with Ambassador Lodge's recommendations, significantly influences the formulation of policy, of strategy, and of tactics.

Coordination by Committee

More formal coordination within the State Department is afforded by the UN Liaison Committee. This is chaired by the Assistant Secretary for UN Affairs, and includes representatives from other parts of the Department and from USUN. On such relatively long-term operations as the preparation of US positions on agenda items in the UN General Assembly, this Committee meets regularly prior to the session so each item can be worked out in an orderly fashion (71 items were on the agenda of the first part of the last session, ranging from Korea and Tunisia, through regulation of armaments and admission of new members, to tensions in colonial areas and the loyalty of US employees of the UN).

A group of inter-departmental committees furnishes the chief means of coordination in the economic and social field, where members of other government agencies are involved. Several of these committees deal exclusively with international organization problems. Others have wider jurisdiction. There are also a few which make recommendations on certain special political and security questions (such as colonial problems and regulation of armaments). Tab B lists some of the major interdepartmental committees in this field.

Unless another agency clearly has a predominant interest (e.g., Agriculture, for FAO), the State Department furnishes the Chairman or at least the Secretary of these committees. Within the State Department, UNA usually provides either or both, particularly in the political-military, trusteeship, and social-human rights fields.

In the technical-economic committees, State's economic area generally leads the Department's participating group, which usually includes UNA.

ADMINISTRATION AND FINANCE

General Administration—International

The question of administration of international organizations is really a foreign policy question. It involves our relations with other governments and with international secretariat officials. It includes the domestic problem of US budget estimates for the US share of contributions to the international organization budgets. But this operation is related closely to the formulation within the organizations themselves of their own budgets and assessments on members. A similar field is that of international administrative and personnel practices in the UN system. These questions are handled as policy problems by OIA, an office of UNA, in collaboration with the Department's administrative and security area, the Budget Bureau, and the Civil Service Commission. Continuous advice and liaison with the UN Secretariat is provided by the US Representative to the UN and his staff.

General Administration—US

The field described in the last paragraph is distinct from the purely internal administrative aspects of US participation in the UN. The Bureau of UN Affairs is staffed and financed as an integral part of the State Department's regular operation. The US Mission to the UN (USUN) is financed under a special appropriation along with other US Missions to international organizations. USUN's organization and staffing are the responsibility of its Chief of Mission, who draws on the Department's personnel, finance, and service functions as needed, through UNA as his "home desk".

Conference Operations

Special funds to finance the sending of US delegations to international conferences are budgeted under the "International Contingencies" appropriation.

In the UN system most meetings are regularly scheduled, and can be planned for systematically. Other international bodies frequently issue invitations for special conferences. UNA's Division of International Conferences (IC) screens all such invitations, recommends as to US participation, negotiates throughout the Government the make-up of the US delegations, helps organize the preparations of US positions, allocates funds, makes all travel, housing, etc., arrangements, and, in meetings away from UN headquarters, furnishes the service staff of the delegation itself. After the meeting IC makes sure all official reports, documents, and other follow-up items are properly discharged. Formal steps in the process of administrative preparations are:

Staff Study—IC with concurrences of all policy units affected secures the written approval of the Assistant Secretary for UNA or, if necessary, the Secretary or President, for US participation in each international meeting.

Naming of US Delegations—P.L. 341, in addition to requiring Presidential appointments of permanent US Representatives to UN organs, specifically makes him responsible for naming US delegates to the annual UN General Assembly. Other statutes similarly charge the President (such as P.L. 643 with respect to US delegates to the WHO Assembly). To ease the burden on the White House for the appointment of delegates to numerous lesser meetings, the President on February 26, 1948 approved a delegation of authority to the Secretary of State "to designate all . . . representatives and delegates as well as advisory and secretarial staff for all groups" other than those assigned by law to the President, or in special cases like the naming of Congressional consultants, etc. On March 6, 1953 the Secretary of State re-delegated his authority to the Assistant Secretary for UN Affairs (all delegation members are named subject to security clearance). UNA, which, in addition to coordinating all policy preparations, administers the funds for conference participation, decides on the advisory and service staffs of US delegations after weighing recommendations from all interested offices and agencies. The basic factors are: scope of the agenda and availability of funds. The specific criteria are: all members must be "working members", actually responsible for agenda items; they must be able to handle several items each; generally, they must represent the Government as a whole; and maximum use should be made of qualified US personnel at the conference site.

Financing

The Assistant Secretary for UN Affairs, through UNA's Division of International Conferences, administers the "International Contingencies" appropriation, for costs of US participation at various international conferences, and the appropriation "Missions to International Organizations", which finances permanent US missions at the seat of the UN, ICAO, etc. (although in the case of USUN, authority for encumbering the appropriated funds is immediately transferred to Ambassador Lodge).

Payments of US shares of UN costs are directed by the Assistant Secretary for UN Affairs under allotment authority made to him by the Department's Budget office, based on appropriations made by Congress for the purpose. UNA's Division of International Administration actually issues and records the obligation documents by authority in writing from the Assistant Secretary.

Tab A

STATUTORY AUTHORITY

The basis for US participation in the UN system resides in a body of legislation through which the Congress provided both the statutory authority and the means:

Both Houses of Congress went on record by a bipartisan vote in 1943 as favoring United States participation in an international peace organization, through S. Res. 192 and H. Con. Res. 25, both of the 78th Congress.

The Senate ratified the UN Charter on July 28, 1945 by a vote of 89 to 2.

The 79th Congress passed the UN Participation Act of 1945 (59 Stat. 619; 22 U.S.C. 287-287e) "to provide for the appointment of representatives of the United States in the organs and agencies of the United Nations and to make other provision with respect to the participation of the United States in such organization".

In addition, the United Nations Headquarters Agreement (61 Stat. 756-768), the Vandenberg Resolution of 1949 (S. Res. 239, 80th Congress), the UN Headquarters Loan Legislation (62 Stat. 1286), the International Court of Justice accession (61 Stat. (2) 1218), the International Organizations Immunities Act (59 Stat. 669-673; 22 U.S.C.

288-288*f*), and the annual appropriations of funds, all form parts of the legislative mandate for US participation in the UN.

Congress has also authorized participation in the various specialized agencies of the UN, as follows:

- International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO)—(61 Stat. 1180-1220)
- Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO)—(62 Stat. 441; 64 Stat. 902; 22 U.S.C. 279-279*d*)
- World Health Organization (WHO)—(62 Stat. 441; 64 Stat. 902; 22 U.S.C. 290-290*d*)
- International Labor Organization (ILO)—(62 Stat. 1151, as amended; 64 Stat. 903; 48 Stat. 1182; 49 Stat. 2712; 22 U.S.C. 272)
- International Monetary Fund (IMF)—(59 Stat. 512-517; 60 Stat. 535; 22 U.S.C. 286-286*m*)
- International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (IBRD)—(59 Stat. 512-517; 60 Stat. 535; 22 U.S.C. 286-286*m*)
- World Meteorological Organization (WMO)—(ratified April 20, 1949)
- UN Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO)—(60 Stat. 712-714; 22 U.S.C. 287*m*-287*t*)
- International Telecommunications Union (ITU)—(63 Stat. (2) 1399)
- Universal Postal Union (UPU)—(5 U.S.C. 372, as amended; 48 Stat. 943)

US participation in the UN Children's Emergency Fund (UNICEF)—a temporary agency of the UN—was authorized by 61 Stat. 125,939; 62 Stat. 157; 63 Stat. 412; 22 U.S.C. 1411, 1531-1536 and by Executive Order 9944.

(The designation and organization of the US Mission to the UN in New York is currently prescribed by Executive Order 10108 of February 9, 1950, which is a revision of Order 9844, dated April 28, 1947).

D. THE 1953 REVIEW: PRINCIPAL STRESSES AND STRAINS FACING THE UNITED STATES IN THE UNITED NATIONS

A/MS files, lot 54 D 291 (V), "UNA/P master file"

Memorandum by the United Nations Planning Staff to the Planning Adviser, Bureau of United Nations Affairs (Sanders)

CONFIDENTIAL

[WASHINGTON,] July 27, 1953.

Subject: "Principal Stresses and Strains Facing the US in the UN"

1. In your memorandum of February 10, 1953 to the Office Directors,<sup>1</sup> supplemented by meetings with Messrs. Hickerson and Sandifer and the Office Directors, the purposes of this project were described as follows:

a) To make an objective review and analysis of the major issues confronting the US in the UN in order that the new administration could have the benefit of this experience in charting future courses of action.

b) To take, in Mr. Hickerson's words, a "new look" at what we have been doing in the UN after seven years of operation in order to have a clearer picture of directions and trends.

c) To establish guides for a selective approach to the problem of UN Charter review.

2. In Mr. Sandifer's memorandum of April 30, 1953<sup>2</sup> it was stressed that the current stage of this project—the first stage—would consist of objective historical analyses of major stresses and strains, to be followed later by a second stage which would consist of conclusions, identification of new policy decisions required, and well-balanced presentation of alternative courses of action open to the US. He pointed out that the second stage would draw not only on the analysis of difficulties—the first stage papers—but on all other pertinent considerations and factors as well. The first stage studies with findings based upon them are in this sense background material and are being restricted to internal use within UNA only.

3. Of the fifteen studies originally scheduled eleven* were ultimately prepared, the others for one reason or another being found to be unsuitable for this presentation. All eleven papers were prepared in collaboration with the appropriate operating units of UNA and often other areas of the Department as well. Some of the papers were initially drafted by the operating officers, some by the UNA/P Planning Staff. In almost all cases extensive redrafting took place during a protracted period of discussion between UNA/P and other units. Most of the papers were fully cleared by all appropriate operating units. Others were approved in substance, and a few were dissented from by one or more units. Thus, although the studies are preponderantly a joint effort and full credit should be given to the many collaborating officers, UNA/P must take full responsibility for the final text.

4. It is inevitable that an attempt to state and analyze US experience in the UN should give rise to some apprehensions lest the presentation imply criticism of given policies and actions. No criticism (or advocacy) was intended. The sole purpose of the project was to secure a better grasp of what we have been doing, where we are heading, and what difficulties we must bear in mind.

5. Attached hereto is a brief paper of the most significant findings which UNA/P has derived from a number of the studies. The subject matter of a few of the studies did not bear on these central findings, but it should not be inferred that they are of any lesser importance, merely that they should be read as separate problems. The eleven basic papers are being made available under separate cover for background and reference.

Recommendation:

1. That this memorandum with its attachment be transmitted to Mr. Sandifer, and to Mr. Murphy, when he reports for duty, along with copies of the studies under separate cover.<sup>3</sup>

2. That copies be made available to the Office Directors and their staffs for background information, with a request for their recommendations as to the best way of carrying out the second stage.

3. That copies be sent to USUN for the background use of key officers.

4. That plans be formulated at an early date for the execution of the second stage.<sup>4</sup>

PRINCIPAL STRESSES AND STRAINS FACING THE US IN THE UN FINDINGS

Introduction:

This paper reports findings on a series of eleven studies (undertaken by UNA/P) of the persistent stresses and strains in the UN. In the resulting total picture two main features stand out as the central themes of most of the problems analyzed:

a) The General Assembly has become the predominant UN organ whose political dynamics govern the bulk of all UN business, so that policy problems in the UN field are increasingly affected by the various interests which nations single or en bloc have in this or that type of action by the General Assembly.

b) Politically, the General Assembly divides in two different ways, on the one hand between Soviet and anti-Soviet forces, and on the other hand between leading powers of the West and critics resentful of their colonial, economic and cultural positions. The two issues condition each other continuously in GA policies pursued by the US as well as other countries. Because of the predominance of the General Assembly, this interaction affects most UN activities with the exception of the more technical and purely organizational problems.

1. The Emerging Predominance of the General Assembly

Certain stresses and strains in the UN have arisen from the growth of the GA into the predominant organ where more and more of the important UN business is centered. This development can be observed in all fields of UN activities:

In the political and security field, the GA has gradually been given a predominant responsibility, although it operates on the basis of public opinion and recommendations rather than binding decisions. The GA has also been used as an instrument to shape, if not direct, important political change, particularly in the setting up of independent nations. Moreover, the GA has been looked upon as a suitable (though not the only) body for the overall organization of the non-Soviet world against the Soviet threat of aggression. In the colonial field, the GA, in annually reviewing the work of the Trusteeship Council, has gradually shifted from procedural questions to substantive resolutions recommending that administering states take certain specific measures in the interest of colonial peoples. In the human rights field, the GA has made its own and very significant additions to the work of the respective commissions set up for the purpose (the most important one being the addition of economic, social, and cultural "rights" to the civil rights in the draft Covenant, and the 1952 resolution on self-determination), and it has brought direct charges based on alleged commitments under the Charter against a particular country (South Africa) on account of domestic policies supposedly violating those Charter obligations. In the economic field, the GA, in reviewing the work of ECOSOC and its subsidiary institutions, has itself raised and pressed issues of great importance, e.g., the "nationalization" of resources resolution, internationally assured "fair" prices for certain commodities, and the project of an International Development Fund.

The increasing use of the GA by the US in the security field and by the anti-colonial states in their drive toward the liquidation of colonialism combine to create an area of strain. The general character of this area of strain springs from the dependence of the US on majority support for "free world" solidarity on Cold War issues, through GA votes in which all Member nations great and small participate on an equal footing.†

Under the heading "Majorities and Minorities", "Changes in Function and Scope of UN", "The Cold War", and "The Revolution Against the European West", particular difficulties in this general area are pointed out in the following sections. Besides these, however, certain stresses and strains result from the mode of operation that is peculiar to the GA as a parliamentary assembly and a forum of world opinion:

a) Much important UN business is now decided by majorities of the 60 GA members and to some extent by voting blocs formed among them (rather than being conducted in the SC, ECOSOC, and the TC, where composition and voting rights reflect a carefully balanced design). This means that the US, in order to exercise leading influence, must in addition to winning over its great power allies, continuously rally majority support among a great number of states many of whom have few international responsibilities, which occasionally requires high pressure liaison methods, and sometimes forces us to maneuver precariously between the various voting blocs in the GA.

b) We are now using, as the Soviets have done from the start, the GA as an instrument of active propaganda. Frequent appeals to public opinion not only by speeches and resolutions but also by substantive policies have come to constitute one of our main objectives in order to maintain the level of support for us in the GA, and, through the GA, in the world at large. Tensions in this respect have arisen between conflicting desires to satisfy domestic audiences and to appeal to foreign attitudes, between the use of the UN for Cold War propaganda and the danger of frightening parts of friendly majorities by the resulting increase of tension, and between our desire to consider certain issues (e.g., colonial questions) purely on their merits and the interest of others to make full use of the pressure and propaganda potential of the GA with respect to these matters.

2. Majorities and Minorities in the General Assembly

The political forces in the GA take the form of groupings of nations into relatively stable majorities and minorities, which is a key phenomenon of UN politics.

Most of these groupings are relatively permanent: the Soviet bloc, e.g., has been a minority from the beginning, at least on East-West questions, and has little chance of becoming the nucleus of a future majority. Other groupings are based on long-term common interests for which the GA provides possibilities of promotion. Thus the Arab-Asian bloc with 13-15 votes has occasionally joined forces with some or all of the 20 Latin American nations on matters concerning colonial issues and economic development, when other overriding interests (e.g., the Cold War) did not intervene. These two blocs together are capable of constituting a GA majority on a program of UN action to liquidate colonialism, and promote economic development, human rights, and national self-determination.† On the other hand, we should not forget the happy fact that on matters of real political importance the US is usually assured of 18-20 Latin American votes to start with.

The division of the GA on East-West issues (with the "free world" majority ranging between 40 and 53 votes) is vital to US interests. Other groupings divide the "free world" within itself, reflecting diverging views and interests on colonial, economic and social issues. All of these groupings, setting up on various issues relatively stable but non-identical majority-minority divisions, some of which are buttressed by organizing voting blocs, are the permanent political forces in the GA. They must be considered as given realities in any UN policy. The main problem in this respect is the effect that the division of the "free world" within itself has on the size of the combined "free world" vote which the US is interested in obtaining on Cold War issues (and vice-versa). On given occasions (e.g., the issue of Red Chinese aggression, and the Soviet charge of US "intervention" through the Kersten Amendment) we have seen "free world" solidarity reduced by the abstentions of those who often combine to pursue common interests on colonial and related issues.

The US has demonstrated an interest in being, on the whole, with the UN majority, on the assumption that the GA majority is an expression of world opinion and represents a political force which is at the same time conceived as a moral force. In the pursuit of this interest, we experience stresses and strains, trying to rally continuous majority support to the common cause against the Soviet threat while avoiding alienation of majority sympathies on issues on which our closest friends and occasionally we ourselves are in a permanent minority.

3. Changes in Function and Scope of UN

Under the pressure of majority forces in the GA, the character, extent and methods of many UN activities are changing. Trends point toward reduced commitment and concept of action in the field of collective security (as compared with original Charter notions), and a broader scope and concept of involvement and commitment, if not action, in the fields of human rights and economic operations as well as colonial administration. §

In the human rights field, there has been a trend (only recently checked by the US) to advance from declarations to treaty law and conceivably even establishment of international tribunals, and from general principles to specific censure of particular countries for alleged violation of general Charter principles. In the colonial field, GA discussion has moved from procedural questions to matters of substance, and again from general criteria to recommendations on specific cases. In the economic sphere, there is increasing desire to set up a UN economic development agency, to have the UN fix commodity prices, and to obtain UN endorsement of nationalization of industries. By contrast, in regard to collective security, the trend has been to move from SC decisions to GA recommendations, and from an international force in being to UN planning for optional facilities regarding coordinated training and equipment of military units.

These changes and fluctuations tend to raise in the minds of many governments the question of what the UN is (or was) meant to accomplish. As different blocs or groupings in the GA seek to use the UN in a way that best promotes their long-range interests and thus contribute to the change of UN functions and scope, disagreements between conflicting views about the organization come to light. Thus, in the UN, administering powers have become so disturbed over the trend of expanding functions that they may refuse to cooperate in given UN activities.||

4. The Cold War In The United Nations

It was conceived at San Francisco that the nucleus of great powers, with special rights of tenure and vote, would enable the Security Council effectively to deal with the peaceful settlements of disputes and threats to international peace. Accordingly, it was said that the UN security system could not work if the great powers themselves clashed. When, however, great power cooperation in the UN broke down, the organization did not fold up but rather, under the leadership of the US, attempted to adjust itself to the new situation. In the GA, which received now the major emphasis, a permanent Soviet minority confronted a majority that on major questions of the East-West conflict would unite against the Soviet bloc. This in turn brought about a new set of problems as nations formed different ideas of how to conduct a "cold war" in the UN, and how, in the presence of the Cold War, to maintain the impartial character and conciliatory features of the UN. Furthermore, tensions arose from differences of opinions of whether the "cold war" was more important business than UN attention to economic and other interests of underdeveloped nations.

While the absence of great power cooperation has affected practically all of the functions and activities of the UN, the greatest impact has been in the field of international peace and security. First, the UN security system under the Security Council has become unworkable and efforts have been made to develop alternative UN capabilities of collective security that would rally widespread support to resistance even against great power aggression. Secondly, the UN, particularly the GA, has become a scene of a running propaganda battle between the Soviet bloc and anti-Soviet forces, a development that has introduced new and important political problems and even functions into the organization. Thirdly, the question of UN membership has been given a Cold War significance that altogether overshadows other considerations in this matter. The related problem of Chinese representation has so far been the chief example of tension arising from different ideas of how to conduct the Cold War in the UN, or, differently put, how to handle UN problems in the presence of the Cold War. Similar tensions have occasionally arisen in the matter of slates for elections to posts within the UN.¶

|| Other facts, not mentioned in the original papers, but relevant to the findings, should be mentioned here: The UK has keenly desired to discuss with us the role of the UN, and has set forth its ideas not only in last year's talks about this subject, but also in a series of articles and speeches by Sir Gladwyn Jebb. On the other hand, the Soviet Union has constantly insisted on a "return to the original concept of the UN". Further reactions to changing UN functions have come from within the US, where strong groups have expressed fears that the UN might eventually subvert the Constitution, while others voice impatience that it does not yet have the capacity to secure world peace. And within the US Government, opinions are divided on whether the UN should be used primarily for propaganda or for substantive achievement. [Footnote in the source text.]

In general, different attitudes regarding these problems have developed along the lines of the following groupings:

First, the US, interested in the support of the UN as a cornerstone of its foreign policy, but at least equally inspired by its sense of leadership in opposing its own beliefs to those of Communism, is committed to an active and vigorous opposition to Soviet expansion, and to energetic leadership of all nations likewise determined to resist Soviet imperialism.

Second, leading European NATO members tend to believe that the present development of NATO is approaching a degree of security adequate for defensive purposes, and that NATO is the best instrument to effect a balance of power to which the UN could not make any significant addition. They incline to fear that vigorous conduct of the Cold War in the UN might endanger the chances of obtaining peaceful settlement with the Soviet Union.

Thirdly, many of the Arab-Asian states, who are above all interested in the liquidation of Western colonialism and the promotion of their own living standards and cultural recognition, tend to take a neutral attitude in the Cold War, which causes them to oppose what they regard as "punitive" or "condemnatory" functions of the UN.**

5. The Revolution Against the European West

Within the free world, colonialism has become the center of a cluster of issues the common denominator of which is objection to the political, economic and cultural predominance of leading Western powers in their relations with all kinds of non-European peoples, whether black, brown, or yellow, Moslem or Hindu, primitive or civilized, dependent or self-governing. As in the case of the Cold War, on many of these issues we find a permanent though slightly shifting minority (sometimes consisting of administering states, sometimes of the economically leading Western nations, and sometimes again of the politically most advanced countries) pressed by a potential majority that is often brought together by strong emotions of resentment and desires to bring about "revolutionary" change in the relative position of weak and "backward" countries.†† The colonial field itself is the center of this tension, but the same feelings also come to the surface in certain human rights questions, economic issues, and even legal matters (e.g., the attempt to introduce the concept of "economic aggression"). The racial element in this complex has produced a number of political disputes which have been given top billing among UN affairs.

¶The Cold War is reflected primarily in the following papers: GA and SC, Propaganda, Membership, and Collective Security. [Footnote in the source text.]

**In the light of the recent "change of course" of Soviet policy, the following observation is pertinent: The Cold War has confronted the world with the problem of bi-polarism and has given rise to the concept of a "third force". The UN reflects this problem in a characteristic way, since many nations choose to look upon the organization itself as the prime example of a "third force". With the new interests the Soviets have taken, during their present "peace" campaign, in cultivating and capturing "third force" elements, the entire problem is one of great and vital importance for the security of the US. [Footnote in the source text.]

In all of these matters, "free world" nations are divided against each other regarding the application of principles on which the West and the Soviets are ideological competitors, since both claim to be champions of equality, national self-determination, freedom from oppression, prosperity for all, human rights, and tolerance of other races and cultures. As these ideals are employed by a majority of ex-colonial and economically backward peoples in an emotional and frequently reckless campaign in GA committees, the US finds itself maneuvering on precarious middle ground between European colonial powers and their critics. Thus we experience, directly or as middle men, the stresses and strains of a "revolution" against European pre-eminence, but we also encounter difficulties in our relations with our main European allies whose concerns for their colonial position we can understand but do not always accept as guides for our own conduct. The Soviet bloc has turned these issues to its advantage, swelling the ranks of the anti-colonial states, widening the gap between developed and underdeveloped countries in the "free world", and using the symbol of human rights in attempts to discredit Western societies. Through such policies the Soviet bloc has utilized the UN to promote and increase rather than to reduce international tensions.

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AND THE SECURITY COUNCIL

CHARACTER OF ISSUE

The most noteworthy structural development of the UN to date has been the growth of the General Assembly into the predominant organ in the political and security field, following the paralysis of the Security Council by great power disunity. The GA, which is designed to reflect and crystallize world public opinion, works through recommendations on which small nations vote their views on a par with great powers. The US, as the leading nation of the "free world", is experiencing certain stresses and strains in endeavoring to reconcile the dynamics of sometimes reckless UN majority operations with the vital requirements of free world unity vis-à-vis the Soviet Union.

BACKGROUND

As the UN was considered originally, the Security Council was supposed to have primary responsibility for action on behalf of international security. Its effectiveness in this respect was clearly seen to depend on continued unity and cooperation among the great powers. By contrast, the Assembly was designed as a forum of discussion serving primarily for the reflection and formation of world opinion, although the Charter conferred upon it certain functions with respect to international peace that were susceptible of development in case of SC impotence. Voting arrangements represented these two different roles. In the SC, the crucial part of the great powers was reflected in their permanent membership as well as in the requirement of their unanimous concurrence for substantive decisions. In the Assembly, all nations, great or small, could be treated alike, and the majority of votes could prevail, as the GA was to pronounce views and make recommendations rather than decide upon substantive action.

The steadily deepening rift between the great powers since 1946 and the obstruction of the Soviet Union have rendered the SC incapable of assuming the active responsibility based on great power unanimity for which it was designed.

Accordingly, there has been a steady shift of the most important political and security work of the UN to the GA; since 1948 only four new cases have been considered by the SC, while during the same period at least a dozen have been brought into the GA. A number of forces have combined in bringing this about: First, there is the desire of the leading Western powers to overcome the UN stalemate caused by the paralysis of the SC; apart from this, smaller nations have always sought to strengthen the plenary organ as the instrument best suited to the pursuit of their particular interests, a factor which might have caused the GA to expand its functions even if there had been no cold war; thirdly, in view of the Cold War, there arose the need for the UN to rally non-Communist nations for determined resistance to Communist aggression, propaganda, maneuvers, and pressures. Whether or not these forces should be considered the sole causes, the fact remains that the functions and prestige of the GA have increased; while the SC remains available for use in limited circumstances.* Some of the principal milestones of this development are listed in Annex A.

UNITED STATES POLICY

In general, the US has considered the GA a potentially very strong organ, on Senator Vandenberg's famous analogy of the town meeting of the world. This reflects the traditional US concept of the role of public opinion, and confidence in the unifying, mediating, and restraining influence of world opinion expressed in discussions and recommendations that develop Charter principles and purposes. However, in this field of strong idealistic aspirations, it is important to distinguish between the pronouncements of principles and the decisions and practices of day-to-day policies. Keeping in mind that actions do not always live up to stated ideals, one can characterize US attitudes toward the GA in terms of the following positions:

1. As a matter of general policy, we have on the whole tended to look upon the UN as a "democratic" organization where world opinion is reflected in, and shaped by, the votes of the majority, and we have inclined to demand respect for, and deference to, the majority will.

(This has been our position above all with respect to the veto. We have decried the use of great power veto as an instrument to thwart the will of the majority, although we have never been prepared to relinquish entirely the veto as an instrument of legitimate self-protection against decisions requiring the use of force in which we could not concur.)

2. As a corollary of the above, we have as a matter of general policy postulated that UN Members must not lightly disregard or flout recommendations by the GA, that the GA could discuss anything within the scope of the Charter, that there would be an expanding area of operations for the GA, and that GA recommendations could greatly extend and develop the rule of law among nations.

(We have definitely taken pride in our record of compliance with GA resolutions, and we have intimated, particularly in our criticism of Soviet behavior, that recommendations passed by an overwhelming majority of UN Members are endowed with moral authority which to disregard is decidedly wrong. In the cases of Korea and Palestine, we have even attributed something like a constitutive force to GA recommendations.)

3. In accordance with our traditional respect for public opinion, we have been interested in being, on the whole, with the majority in the UN (although we have not hesitated to maintain an "unpopular" position when our interests and principles so demanded); and we have particularly desired to be surrounded by sizeable majorities in cold war matters.

*A similar trend has been noticed in the relations between the GA and ECOSOC and the Trusteeship Council, respectively. The development of expanding GA functions and prestige vis-à-vis these organs may in turn have been helped by the growth of GA authority at the expense of the SC. [Footnote in the source text.]

(This objective has been an important consideration, even in matters on which we might at the outset disagree with the prospective majority position. We have mostly attempted to meet this problem tactically, either by so diluting extremist resolutions that we could finally vote with the majority, or by methods of rallying the support of as many delegates as possible for our position—sometimes unkindly referred to as “arm-twisting”—or by a combination of both of these methods. As a result, we have often been accused of throwing our weight around too much in the UN.)

4. We have regarded UN majority votes as an important means of pressure as well as public justification of our case, and we have therefore brought important business (particularly cold war business) before the vetoless GA where large majorities can materialize.

(We transferred the Greek question and aggression in Korea from the SC to the GA, we brought the question of Chinese aggression before the GA rather than the SC, and we introduced into the GA such items as the conditions of free elections in Germany, and the Austrian Peace Treaty.)

5. On the other hand, we have made it clear that we do not want to abandon the SC altogether and are willing to use it fully, when it is capable of operating. Nor have we entirely discounted the function of the SC as a symbol of common interest to the great powers and as a possible background for future negotiations. On occasion, we have also looked upon the SC as a forum of propaganda, sometimes even in preference to the GA (when unfriendly voting blocs in the latter might embarrass us or our friends, as we anticipated, e.g., in the case of Laos). Finally, we have considered the SC valuable for the mediatory function it has discharged in non-Cold-War issues (e.g., Kashmir and Palestine).

ATTITUDES OF OTHER STATES

The Soviet Union regards the SC as the vital center of the UN both because of the Kremlin's emphasis on the directing role of the great powers and because of its apparent conviction that the one really significant function of international organization lies in the realm of great power relations. In the bi-polar world, the Soviet Union has made the best of the existence of the Assembly (in which it acquiesced at Dumbarton Oaks) and vigorously used the GA as a forum in which it could launch bitter attacks on the US, at the same time testing periodically the cohesion of the free world.

The UK is inclined to take a narrow view of the role of the GA and its recommendations and to look upon the SC as a matter of vital interests to great powers. Particularly in certain colonial questions, the UK, together with France, Belgium, and some Commonwealth nations, have tended to reject the concept of any even moral authority residing in GA majority decisions.† These countries have not objected to being outvoted, and they have at times even rejected majority decisions as not obligating them to any kind of cooperation.

The Arab-Asian and many Latin American states, as well as many other small nations, consider the GA as an instrument of change, an institution which lends them strong voice and voting power without demanding from them a commensurate responsibility for action. The GA is, for weak countries, a source of prestige and a device through which, organized in regional blocs, they can bring pressure to bear on the great powers. It enables them to press for quid pro quos in the pursuit of the extended reform programs in which they are interested. Accordingly they favor an increasingly wide scope of GA activity and authority.

IMPLICATIONS FOR THE UNITED NATIONS

It is difficult to estimate the power of precedents in the UN to shape the course of subsequent events. One cannot predict that because the GA has on certain occasions assumed certain functions or powers its members will agree that it continue to do so in the future. Yet, one cannot deny that a pattern of action observed in the past will exercise a certain channeling and motivating influence on delegations and their governments, although it is impossible to say just how much. With this in mind, one can characterize the past developments in the UN structure in the following way :

1. The GA, meant to be primarily an organ of discussion with a view to the formation of world opinion, has in a number of important cases been cast in the role of an organ of action (even though only through recommendations) and has been given a predominant responsibility in the political disputes and security field which, apart from the power to make binding decisions, resembles that originally assigned to the SC.

Items have been submitted to the GA which in the absence of the Cold War might have gone to the SC. There has been increasing use of the GA on a continuing basis between regular sessions. The GA has shown a tendency to perform as a quasi-legislative body. It has also used various devices to take on responsibilities (short of binding decisions) akin to those of the SC under Chapter VII. In particular, the Uniting for Peace Resolution establishes a voluntary basis for possible collective action with specially earmarked military contingents. Resolutions of the GA have been clothed with a moral authority that in some degree approaches and simulates in political—though not in legal—effect the force of SC decisions under Article 25.

2. The GA has been used as an instrument to shape, if not direct, important political change, particularly in the setting up of independent nations where there were none before, in recommending boundaries and forms of government.

The leading Western powers have in fact so employed the GA in the case of Palestine, Korea, and under special circumstances the Italian colonies. Now the Arab-Asian countries are endeavoring to make similar use of the Assembly for forcing the pace of liquidation of colonial rule and bringing about the independence of countries like Tunisia and Morocco.

3. The GA has been treated as a suitable (although not the only) body for the over-all political and military organization of the non-Soviet world against the Soviet threat.

The preparation of a broad framework for collective measures and collective military strength on a world-wide basis have, "for the time being", been placed under GA auspices. Furthermore, the determination of the non-Soviet world to stand together against the Soviet threat has become associated to a large extent with GA votes on Cold War items, so that a certain relationship has presumably emerged between such votes and the expectation of future solidarity in the face of actual Soviet aggression. Finally, Soviet opposition to the GA majority has often been branded as an indication of the aggressive nature of Soviet intentions.

MAJOR DIFFICULTIES FACING THE UNITED STATES

The UN in general, and the GA in particular, are only a part of the general setting in which the US exercises the responsibilities of a great power and leader in the "free world". Provided that the pattern of GA developments analyzed above has some influence on the future course of events, the US would have to face and meet there the following difficulties:

1. In the GA the US occupies the position, not of a legally privileged great power, but of one among many all of whom have one vote, regardless of their relative power and responsibility in the world.

If the US, in the parliamentary setting of the GA, wants to exercise influence commensurate with its position and responsibilities, it must continuously rally other nations' votes by appropriate methods. In general, our great power influence and role as the free world leader enables us to do this. Our voting strength in the GA therefore depends considerably on US policies outside of the UN, as well as on the moral appeal of our positions to the greatest possible number of delegations. Beyond this, however, our leadership in the GA requires highly effective liaison methods of persuading and occasionally pressuring delegations, frequently on vote after vote. Hence the US often finds it necessary to pose the "question of confidence", as it were, on matters of relatively minor importance and to put its power more in evidence than might be desirable.

2. The GA being a body that has been used both for organizing the non-Soviet world and to work political change, there is some danger of seeing the anti-Soviet majority in the GA weakened or reduced by the dissatisfaction of those pressing for rapid change in the colonial system, or alternatively by the fears of those who find their national interests vitally threatened by the "revolutionizing" tendencies in the GA.

3. Since the GA has been used as a body for quasi-legislative action (e.g., on control of colonial powers) by majority vote (as well as a forum for the reflection and formation of world opinion), we find ourselves in an ambiguous position between groups of friends who hold often mutually exclusive ideas about what the GA should or could do, and we may have to make choices on issues which we would rather not see crystallized.

THE COLONIAL QUESTION IN THE UNITED NATIONS

CHARACTER OF THE COLONIAL QUESTION

The colonial question has existed in one form or another ever since the Renaissance of Western Europe, and thus antedates by centuries the creation of the United Nations. Furthermore, it continues as a problem with ramifications far more extensive than those raised in the United Nations. In a period when the spirit of nationalism is spreading, the Charter of the United Nations has, however, provided a forum for giving expression to deeply held views on the colonial question. Thus, in the United Nations, broad aspects of the colonial question have become major issues, second only perhaps to the major security questions dividing the Soviet and non-Soviet worlds.

The simple fact that 200 million people* still remain in varying conditions of colonial dependence does not in itself explain the colonial question. Its roots are historical and psychological as well as political, economic, and strategic in character, to wit:

a. For most of the non-European countries the experience of direct or indirect domination by Europeans is part of their national heritage. (For instance: Nehru, who spent thirteen years in a British prison, cannot forget that India was a British colony, and therefore inclines to concentrate, in his speeches and policies, on the "evils" of colonialism, about which he has expressed himself more strongly than about communism.) These countries are disposed to act in accordance with a general "anti-colonial" ideology that rejects the premises of even a "liberal" colonial system and, in many instances, to use the colonial question as a lever in their effort to achieve power and influence in international relations.

b. The growth of an intense nationalism in countries of non-European civilization gives heightened significance to the colonial problem today. Since World War II national movements have led to independence for a dozen new nations containing some 600 million people, including such new states as India, Pakistan, Burma, and Indonesia. For most of these newer states, psychological considerations have frequently overshadowed economic or strategic factors in international consideration of colonial problems.

c. It has become increasingly evident that the colonial question is tightly bound up with attitudes relating to race. The right of one people to keep another (particularly one of different color) in an inferior status, is sharply challenged. Thus, non-European nations seize on colonial issues to voice their resentment against the dominant position in world political, economic and cultural activities of the states and peoples of European background.

The Charter sets forth certain responsibilities for Members which administer non-self-governing territories. The states which have voluntarily recognized and accepted such responsibilities are all European or of mainly European origin.† They number only eight out of the total membership of sixty. The six other members of Western European origin‡ give varying degrees of support to the administering states. However, the vast majority of Member states tend to assume the role of assessing or judging how the minority of colonial powers discharge these responsibilities, while they themselves do not acknowledge any similar accountability. Thus attitudes on colonial questions in the United Nations tend to polarize around the divergent attitudes and interests of two groups—those of the “administering” or colonial powers and those of a number of “non-administering” states that may generally be characterized as having an anti-colonial viewpoint.

The administering and the anti-colonial states, while differing on basic assumptions, diverge most sharply on questions of timing and method: they disagree as to (a) the rate at which advancement toward self-government or independence in colonial areas should be sought, and (b) the role which the United Nations should play in the process.

While there is considerable diversity of view within each group, the basic assumptions of each group, and particularly of its more extreme members, may be summarized as follows:

Administering Members

(1) The administering members start from the premise that the continuation of the dependency relationship is useful and necessary for varying periods of time.

(2) The more conservative administering Members regard the present activities of the UN as at best an unnecessary interference and at worst a positive danger to internal order and stability in their territories.

(3) The administering Members, while not excluding independence where conditions are suitable, see various alternatives to independence as a goal for their territories. They look with more favor on their territories achieving self-governing status within a larger association, union, or commonwealth.

(4) The administering Members maintain that the fixing of a date for the attainment of full self-government or independence cannot generally be determined far in advance.

(5) The administering Members hold that they alone are responsible for determining the constitutional position and status of territories under their sovereignty, including changes which would remove them from the scope of Chapter XI of the Charter.

Anti-Colonial Members

(1) The anti-colonial Members believe that colonialism in any form is bad and should be eliminated, if not immediately, at least in a very short time.

(2) The anti-colonial Members believe that the role of the UN in relation to dependent areas should be extended.

(3) The anti-colonial Members generally favor independence as the goal for colonial territories.

(4) The anti-colonial Members contend that for most, if not all, dependent territories, a fixed term of years for the achievement of independence or self-government should be set by the administering authority.

(5) The anti-colonial Members believe that in fact, the colonial territories do not really belong to the colonial powers, and therefore that any decision by an administering Member to remove a territory from the scope of Chapter XI as a result of a change in its constitutional position and status is subject to review by, and possibly even the approval of, the General Assembly.

Administering Members

6) With respect to the eleven trust territories as distinct from the other non-self-governing territories, the administering members, while not claiming sovereignty for themselves, reject the view that such sovereignty resides in the UN, and the consequential view that the UN therefore can exercise a directive authority over the administering state.

Anti-Colonial Members

(6) The anti-colonial Members tend, on the other hand, to assert the sovereign or quasi-sovereign authority of the UN over the trust territories and the exercise of far-reaching supervisory powers.

The special objectives and policies of the Soviet Union, on colonial questions in the UN introduces a further complicating element. Soviet strategy assigns decisive importance to the colonial field as an area of Communist expansion. The Soviet inveighing against the so-called "imperialist powers" for "economic exploitation" and "anti-democratic practices" in colonial areas, is obviously designed to divide the noncommunist world and to stimulate the neutralist tendencies of the Arab-Asian world. The Soviets also seek to weaken the strategic position of the West by creating division among the NATO powers, among whom are coincidentally the leading colonial powers, and also by bringing confusion and unrest to the colonial areas controlled by the West.

BACKGROUND OF THE COLONIAL QUESTION IN THE UNITED NATIONS

As early as San Francisco, the clash of interests on colonial questions was revealed. Sharply divergent views were expressed on issues such as (1) whether "independence" or "self-government" should be the political objective, (2) the composition, status, and powers of the Trusteeship Council, and (3) the obligations, if any, to be assumed by administering powers with regard to non-self-governing territories, particularly in the political field.

In its first year of operation the UN established the "Chapter XI system" in relation to some 60 colonial territories and also inaugurated the trusteeship system, now embracing 11 territories with nearly 20 million inhabitants. The Trusteeship Council held its first session early in 1947 and has carried out on a continuing basis its supervisory work in relation to trust territories—the consideration of the reports of the administering authorities, the examination of petitions, and the sending of visiting missions periodically to the territories. At the instigation of the non-administering states and against the opposition of the administering group, the General Assembly went beyond the provisions of Chapter XI and established a special committee, first on a yearly basis and then for three-year periods, to examine the information transmitted under Article 73 (e) on non-self-governing territories. The work of the Trusteeship Council and the Committee on Non-Self-Governing Territories has received an annual review in the Fourth Committee of the GA, and the emphasis in the work of these UN bodies has shifted gradually from procedural questions to substantive matters. § The cumulative effect of the resolutions adopted on these matters has seriously disturbed the principal colonial powers—The United Kingdom, France, and Belgium. They have now reached the point where they may refuse, in certain circumstances, to continue their co-operation in given United Nations activities in the colonial field.

In addition to the work of the Fourth Committee of the GA, in which the colonial question has been dealt with continuously in its broadest terms, the UN has also considered a number of other significant colonial questions during its first seven years: The problem of the Netherlands East Indies, the disposition of the former Italian colonies, the question of the mandated territory of South West Africa, and the questions of Tunisia and Morocco. In addition, the question of the right of peoples to self-determination, while it emerged in the Commission on Human Rights, has been largely treated as a colonial question.

UNITED STATES ATTITUDES AND INTERESTS VIS-À-VIS COLONIAL PROBLEMS

United States interests in colonial problems may be summarized as follows:

By history and disposition, the American people have maintained an attitude of sympathetic understanding and encouragement toward dependent peoples striving for political freedom. Accordingly, in most colonial issues, there is a strong psychological alignment of the American people with the peoples of the colonial area and against their European rulers. A related element is the traditional humanitarian interest of the American people, developed through the activities of missionaries and private institutions and foundations in Africa, Asia and the Pacific, in the development and welfare of the inhabitants of dependent areas.

On the other hand, the US has certain specific interests because of its role as an administering power of certain dependent territories, like Puerto Rico, Guam, and Samoa, and, including the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands administered under the International Trusteeship System. While the US is not uniformly regarded as a "colonial power", our territorial responsibilities clearly oblige us to defend our interests in this regard.

§ For example, whereas the Fifth General Assembly (1950) recommended a study of land questions in trust territories, at the Seventh General Assembly (1952) a proposal to restore a particular parcel of land to members of the Wa-Meru tribe in the trust territory of Tanganyika was approved by the Fourth Committee and only narrowly rejected by the Assembly in plenary. Another example of this trend is the Ewe or Togoland unification question, with regard to which the Trusteeship Council and the General Assembly have limited themselves in previous years to recommending various means of ascertaining the wishes of the people; whereas in 1952 the Fourth Committee approved a resolution which in effect recommended the unification of the two territories. While this proposal was also rejected in plenary by the Assembly, it, too, is indicative of the trend towards substantive proposals. Similarly, the question of the process whereby a given non-self-governing territory is eliminated from the category of territories on which information must be supplied to the United Nations under Article 73 (e) has in previous years been discussed as a theoretical matter; whereas the last General Assembly had on its agenda a specific case, namely the decision of the Netherlands to cease transmitting information on Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles, and the next Assembly will also consider the same question with regard to Puerto Rico. [Footnote in the source text.]

With regard to the colonial areas themselves, the US has in many cases clear economic and strategic interests. The uranium resources of a territory such as the Belgian Congo and the air bases available to us in North Africa are illustrative of these interests. Beyond this the US must also take into account the value of the friendship, on general grounds, of the peoples of colonial areas as they achieve self-government or independence. Our interest requires that they be oriented toward the West rather than toward the Soviet world.

A centrally important element is the fact that the European colonial powers are our principal NATO allies, and our common security interests may be jeopardized by actions which would result in political crises in the metropolises and turmoil in their colonial areas.

We must also take into account the strongly expressed concern of the anti-colonial nations, embracing the great population masses of India and South East Asia, in colonial questions.

Finally, there is the necessity of combatting Soviet efforts to lay successful claim to the title of "champion of dependent peoples".

UNITED STATES POLICIES AND OBJECTIVES RE COLONIAL QUESTIONS IN THE UNITED NATIONS

In the light of these varying interests, the US has pursued the following general objectives in relation to colonial questions arising in the UN:

1. To favor the progressive development of all dependent peoples toward the goal of self-government, and, where conditions are suitable, toward independence.
2. To favor the growth of responsible democratic movements and institutions among indigenous people in colonial areas (to encourage metropolitan powers to foster such movements, or, in some cases, to give direct US encouragement and support to such movements after consultation with the metropolitan power concerned).
3. To assist in the development of changing relationships between colonial peoples and metropolitan countries toward a suitable form of association in accordance with the wishes of the inhabitants.
4. To encourage a pace of metropolitan response to popular pressures rapid enough to prevent extremists from seizing control of national movements (yet recognizing the greatly varying conditions that govern the pace of a well-rounded orderly evolution of dependent peoples).
5. To have UN activities in colonial matters develop progressively in such a manner that the cooperation of administering powers is retained.
6. To seek the mutual understanding and cooperation between the US and the colonial as well as the anti-colonial powers and their acceptances of basic US objectives.
7. To seek the alignment of dependent peoples with the democratic world and to prevent the Soviet Union from being regarded as the champion of dependent peoples.

No general statement of US interests and objectives in the colonial field can serve as a formula for the establishment of the policy to be pursued by the US in a specific area. The policy which should be pursued will depend upon the weight which is given to the various, and perhaps, conflicting interests of the US; and this can be determined only with regard to the circumstances of the issues as it is presented.

However, in relation to specific colonial issues arising in the UN, the US, taking account of its varied interests and objectives, has usually found itself in a moderate, middle-ground position. The middle position which the United States has taken has also reflected the balance of views within the Government itself, where differing attitudes on colonial questions have been held by the various bureaus and agencies concerned. Thus, while the desire to maintain the greatest possible degree of cooperation between the colonial and anti-colonial groups has often led the US to support compromise positions, the search for compromise has been carried on within the framework of our policies and objectives. In other words, we have not sought compromise for its own sake; nor has our "middle-ground" position necessarily been in the geometric middle between two extremes. Insofar, however, as our position on the issues of principle would permit, the US has sought to serve as a moderator between the extremes and to bring about the greatest possible measure of agreement on such questions in the UN.

OBSTACLES FACED BY THE UNITED STATES IN PURSUING ITS POLICIES AND OBJECTIVES ON COLONIAL QUESTIONS IN THE UNITED NATIONS

The underlying obstacle to the achievement of US policies and objectives in this field is the highly emotional and symbolic nature of colonial questions, rendering objective consideration of their substance and on their merits almost impossible, at least among the more extreme members of the anti-colonial and colonial groups. In such an atmosphere the US policy of moderation frequently has little appeal.

Our position has also been made increasingly difficult by the growth of bloc politics in the UN. It is safe to say that the dominant feeling of the leaders of the Arab-Asian and Latin American blocs is anti-colonial. The more moderate members of these blocs generally hesitate to support a less popular position, even when they prefer it. It thus requires very considerable diplomatic activity to swing the members of a bloc to a middle-ground position, as was done in the case of the Latin American bloc's position on the Tunisian and Moroccan questions at the Seventh GA. Such a diplomatic campaign is too difficult to be used effectively except on major issues.

Both the emotionalism surrounding colonial issues and the existence of bloc politics in the UN render the achievement of US objectives on such issues in the UN difficult on account of the arrangement of voting power in the GA which in no way corresponds to the actual distribution of power and responsibility among the nations of the world. The majority of members may allow their emotions on colonial issues to lead them to use their majority voting position to exert pressures on the colonial powers which neither their strength nor their sense of responsibility to the world community justifies. In so doing the more extreme members of the anti-colonial group appear to overlook the extent to which this policy, regardless of its merits, may undermine the pillars of the very organization which is giving them such a conspicuous voice in world affairs.

In the UN, the US has sought to develop a sizeable group of states which would also take a middle position on colonial issues. This has become increasingly difficult. As was noted earlier in this paper, in recent sessions more and more decisions have been forced on important matters of principle and substance. In such cases, the middle-ground position which we would have wished to occupy has often been obliterated.||

Another difficulty faced by the US arises from the fact that many colonial issues when they first emerge in the UN are not of dramatic or easily recognizable significance so that often insufficient attention is given them until they become hopelessly controversial. A corollary of this difficulty is that in the Fourth Committee of the Assembly, where colonial questions are dealt with on a continuing basis, many member nations are represented by relatively junior members of their delegations. Furthermore, such delegates are frequently without precise instructions so that they are inclined to follow the dictates of their own emotions rather than a carefully thought-out, fully integrated government policy.

IMPLICATIONS FOR THE UNITED NATIONS

Certain broad trends are readily discernible:

1. The forums of the UN are used by the anti-colonial Members to exert pressure on the colonial powers to accelerate the transfer of authority in dependent areas to the colonial peoples, to attract world attention to colonial problems and world sympathy to colonial peoples. To these ends there is a consistent effort to expand the competence, powers and machinery of the UN in relation to colonial questions, and to expand the role of the GA in which the administering powers are but a small minority. In this effort the anti-colonial Members seek US

||For example, while at previous General Assemblies most of the anti-colonial Members had been willing to set up temporary committees to consider information on non-self-governing territories, at the last session a majority of them pushed a proposal for a permanent committee through the Fourth Committee; and it was only possible to obtain approval of another three-year committee when several colonial powers threatened not to participate in a permanent committee. When the three-year extension, originally a US compromise proposal, was rejected in the Fourth Committee, no further middle ground was left, and the United States voted with the colonial powers. [Footnote in the source text.]

support and sometimes endeavor to put pressure on the colonial powers through the United States.

2. The colonial powers have reacted sharply to what they regard as unwarranted encroachments, in many cases exhibiting a hyper-sensitivity to suggestions and criticism which has only stimulated their critics. The process of reaction provoking further reaction has hardened positions on both sides and narrowed, and in some cases eliminated altogether, the middle ground.

3. In the last two years there has been increasing evidence that some of the colonial powers, particularly the United Kingdom, France, Belgium, and the Netherlands will increasingly refuse to cooperate or participate in certain UN activities on colonial questions.¶

4. The "colonial question" is steadily expanding its role in the United Nations, both in terms of the number and importance of the issues considered and the emotional atmosphere generated. These issues pervade more and more organs and agencies of the UN and now arise in many technical and specialized bodies as well as in political organs and committees. For example, colonial issues have arisen in meetings of such widely differing bodies as the Commission on the Status of Women, the Pan American Sanitary Organization, UNESCO, WHO, ILO, FAO, and the Commission on Human Rights.

IMPLICATIONS FOR THE UNITED STATES

The intensification of European-non-European rivalries has coincided with the accentuation of the Soviet-non-Soviet conflict. This is not a mere coincidence; for, as the non-Soviet world is made up of both European and non-European peoples, the Soviet Union has a compelling interest in promoting discord between these two groups.

The non-European powers have increasingly employed the UN as a means of seeking a greater share of world influence, for, together with the Latin Americans, they form the preponderant majority in the UN and particularly the GA. While they undoubtedly recognize that their voting position does not reflect the current realities of world power ratios, they find the UN, with its world audience and considerable prestige, a useful device for promoting what they feel to be their rightful position in world affairs.

With a crucial stake in both of these conflicts, the US has been caught in an increasingly difficult dilemma. To counter successfully the threat of world communism we need the active support not only of our European allies but also of the peoples of Asia, Africa, and Latin America. We have therefore a vital interest in reducing the tensions between European and non-European peoples—tensions which have frequently been focused on colonial issues in the UN.

Our "middle-of-the-road" position is frequently uncomfortable for us and often unsatisfactory to a number of our friends on both sides of colonial issues, as well as to US public opinion. It has, however, left us in a position where we can still seek with some effectiveness to narrow the rift between our European and our non-European friends and to influence both sides to see more clearly the viewpoint of the other. The widening of this rift could be disastrous.

PROPAGANDA IN THE UNITED NATIONS

PREFACE

This paper attempts to make a preliminary analysis of the problem of US propaganda in the UN. It is hoped that an analysis of our experience to date may provide insights into advantageous courses of action in the future.

For the purposes of the analysis, it has been necessary to formulate a working definition which will distinguish "propaganda" from other aspects of US action in the UN. The definition used here is not meant to indicate what propaganda "should be" in all circumstances. It is merely a working tool to clarify the different motives and purposes which underlie our various actions and utterances in the UN.

For the purposes of this paper, therefore, the following meanings are used:

When our objective is primarily to influence the attitudes of others by communicating to them (through either words or actions) broad ideas or concepts, we speak of propaganda.

When our objective is primarily to attain certain diplomatic results, without primary consideration to how these may affect the attitudes of others, we speak of substantive policies.

(Most actions in the UN partake of both purposes in varying measure, and obviously in our substantive policies we often undertake propaganda operations to maximize or minimize their popular impact.)

SCOPE OF THE PROBLEM

1. The UN, by virtue of its wide membership, open meetings, and multiple news media coverage, is a unique forum for propaganda. Propaganda takes many forms in the UN. The main categories are: (1) the forensics of debate before representatives of 59 other states, all of whom theoretically are open to persuasion and all of whom presumably will report back to their governments; (2) exploitation through press releases and conferences, of the news services available in unique quantity at the UN; (3) substantive policies "dressed up" for their broadest possible appeal to special audiences; (4) "policies" actually conceived or primarily motivated by propaganda considerations; and (5) purposeful public conduct, through personal behavior, voting tactics, etc., by delegates seeking to create special impressions.

2. It is understood that many member nations exploit as best they can, for their own purposes, the propaganda potential of the UN, e.g., the Arab-Asians on the colonial issue. Because of the Cold War, the UN has increasingly been used as a prime instrumentality in the ideological struggle between Soviet Communism and the free nations led by the US. The Soviet Union has wielded its propaganda as a powerful instrument of the Cold War, with the UN as one of its favored platforms and sounding boards. In the UN as in other arenas, the US has had to accept the Soviet challenge and intensify its own propaganda activities. (Because the GA epitomizes the public and parliamentary nature of the UN, it provides the chief illustration employed here. The problem is generally similar in ECOSOC and the TC, and to a more limited extent, in the Specialized Agencies.)

3. The UN itself constitutes a special audience, and divides up into a series of different audiences as well. In one sense we are dealing with individual nations through their representatives. But at the same time we are also confronted with those nations arranged in special political and regional groupings. These groupings often coalesce on abstract general principles such as human rights, equality, self-determination, independence, freedom, etc. Since democratic governments have to mean what they say and expect to be taken seriously, there is here a special problem for us, since to meet these pressures we have had to supplement ordinary techniques of diplomatic negotiation with actions calculated to evoke a sympathetic and responsive emotion in our audiences.

In this sense we are engaged in continuous propaganda operations in the UN, since very few actions are devoid of implications conveyed to other peoples in this fashion.

4. Given our diverse and multiple interests in the world, it is likely that American motives and interests would express themselves somewhat ambivalently even if there were no UN. It is indisputable, however, that in a body where, for instance, the anti-colonial forces have equal voices and votes with the Western powers, and where the rules of politics apply to the rallying of political forces, we have had to sound to the anti-colonials as if we were anti-colonial and to our allies as if we actually supported them, all of which makes us often appear to our critics as if we couldn't choose between our conflicting interests.

5. The Soviets have from the beginning used the UN for important propaganda benefits. They have characteristically aimed at outside audiences. At other times, as at present, they have exploited the normal expectations of Soviet vituperation by deliberately varying the volume and degree of their invective. They have since 1946 submitted proposals combining "war-mongering", "Western imperialism", and Disarmament which are propaganda-motivated. They have tried recently to win Arab-Asian support away from western majorities through ostensible concessions and support on colonial issues. They have publicly built up their leading personalities, such as Vishinsky, and have recently used changes of personal demeanor (handshaking, smiles, etc.) to create impressions consistent with their "peace offensive". The general concepts they have attempted to convey in their propaganda include "peace" (usually unidentified), "imperialism" (in terms of Western capitalism and colonialism), and "dominance by US".

UNITED STATES POLICY

1. In its public utterances on broad foreign policy questions the US generally has sought to appeal to other peoples in terms of its own aspirations and ideals and has often reflected the American characteristic of wishing to be liked and approved of. By and large, we have in the UN Charter a statement of our own values and objectives, and we have tried to persuade other members to identify their self-interest in terms of that same standard of measurement. With this in mind, the ideals or concepts which generally underlie our public attitudes include: individual liberty and freedom (vs. tyranny); prosperity (vs. poverty); the desire to live and let live (vs. the use of force contrary to the Charter); the right of self-government and national independence (vs. national subjugation—although we reflect some ambiguities on this score in the context of Western colonialism).

2. The US from the beginning has taken a stand in support of open public UN sessions (which have provided the chief opportunity for propaganda exploitation in the UN.*

Our position from the start has been to identify the Purposes and Principles of the Charter with our own. The positions we took on various issues were generally motivated by a firm conviction of right and of helping the organization to flourish. In terms of broad propaganda, this stance conveyed to others the general impression we sought to convey as to where we stood on questions of justice, law, and human and political liberties. On the basis of this overall stance, it was possible for us, particularly in the first years of the UN, to formulate most of our individual policies without aiming primarily at a specific propaganda effect.

The chief differences between our propaganda operations from roughly 1946 to 1949, and those since the attack on Korea, are in method and tactics. In the first period we generally refrained from frontal assaults on the Soviet Union for a number of reasons: our determination to build up the UN through constructive action; our relative inexperience in political warfare; our belief it would be more effective to refrain from combatting Soviet propaganda at its own level; our uncertainty about results; and our sensitivity to criticism from neutralist forces abroad and conciliatory forces at home.

At the same time we vigorously utilized debate and speeches to defend ourselves against attack. We concentrated on making as clear as possible the contrasts between Soviet obstructionism and US cooperativeness. And in our speeches and press relations we attempted to emphasize those aspects of our policies most likely to have "general" popular appeal.

Generally speaking we brought to the UN problems we felt could be actually ameliorated by UN actions, rather than a wide range of Cold War issues, although we did bring in the Korean case in 1947 and joined in submitting the Berlin blockade item in 1948.

3. Since the attack on Korea we have accelerated our political and psychological offensive activities in the UN. This intensification of Cold War propaganda has been manifested in several ways:

(a) Our speeches, in particular the opening statements in general debate, have been designed increasingly to contrast our constructive performance with Soviet non-cooperation and wrecking activities. Furthermore, during the past session we sharply increased the tempo of our anti-Soviet propaganda by forceful statements and immediate rebuttal of Soviet attacks.

(b) We have taken limited advantage of press services available at the UN by releasing supplementary material designed to strengthen and popularize our case and by conducting numerous press conferences.

(c) Propaganda exploitation of major US policies, i.e., "dressing them up" for maximum appeal to certain audiences, has been a basic development. In any subject before the UN considered to be of public interest, the propaganda implications are analyzed and taken into account in our public presentation where feasible. (For example, in the South African cases we sought through our statements to soften Arab-Asian dissatisfaction with our failure to support condemnation of the Union of South Africa.)

(d) Since 1949 we have undertaken certain policies determined in large part by propaganda consideration—introducing or encouraging UN action on items which while sincere in the sense that we could live with them and even profit greatly if they were carried out, were introduced with the primary purpose of winning Cold War propaganda advantages with little or no expectation that their ostensible purpose would be achieved directly or within a reasonable time. This characterization is based on the fact, understood by us and presumably by the Soviets that acceptance of certain of our positions would work decisively to our advantage and to the disadvantage of the Soviet regime.

Examples are:

(1) Condemnatory resolutions such as "Failure of USSR to Repatriate POWs" (5th Session), "Observance of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms in Bulgaria, Hungary, and Rumania" (5th Session), as well as our initiative in exposing through ECOSOC forced labor conditions in the Soviet system.

(2) Items on basic power issues between the USSR and the US such as Formosa (5th Session), German Elections (6th Session), and Austrian Treaty (7th Session) items.

(3) Disarmament in 1951 was a political device for convincing our friends and the neutrals (as well as the Russians, within limitations) of our interest in ending the arms race and of our peaceful intentions. Until the recent Soviet "peace offensive" began we had little hope that in the absence of other settlements elsewhere the Soviets would be interested in disarming, and no real expectation that they would accept a plan calling for international controls and inspection which we regard as indispensable but which involved a breach of the Iron Curtain.

(4) Although prepared as counters to Soviet-sponsored resolutions, we took the lead for tactical and propaganda reasons in certain purely hortatory resolutions such as Essentials for Peace (4th Session) and Peace Through Deeds (5th Session) in which action was designed to enunciate high standards of international conduct which by inference or comparison condemned Soviet actions and policies but without expecting that it would have any real effect on Soviet attitudes.

DIFFICULTIES FACING THE UNITED STATES

Over the past seven years Soviet propaganda has generally followed a relatively narrow and predictable course. Considerations of responsible free world leadership have imposed on the US a far more complex propaganda problem. US propaganda is subject to heavy domestic and international pressures which, often because they may appear to be incompatible, must be carefully weighed in the formulation of our propaganda position at each UN session.

1. American Public Opinion and International Audiences

Considerations of influencing our international audiences are by definition fundamental to our propaganda position, but of course cannot be divorced from considerations of American public opinion. While our policies and our overseas propaganda are both constructed to reflect as faithfully as possible the wishes of the American people, the diversity of our public opinion and of the groups specially interested in particular causes often confronts us with real dilemmas in our choice of propaganda tactics. For example, while domestic audience reactions seem to favor strong, straight-forward, emotionally-tinged attacks on the Soviet system, and such an approach has definite appeal in the firmer anti-communist states, a subtle, reserved approach to the Soviet system has been more effective with the Arab-Asians—the major group which tends to view Soviet conduct least critically.

2. Conflicting Interests of Various Audiences

In general, we have pursued in the UN a broad scale appeal for support from as many quarters as possible for our position and our values, and both our diplomacy and our propaganda have had to balance in specific circumstances the various long and short term goals of US policy.

Attitudes on the vital issues of the Cold War and the colonial problem, to cite two paramount examples, go to the heart of our several policy objectives and confront us with serious dilemmas of propaganda. To understand fully the special nature of our difficulty in handling these matters to our own advantage in the UN, two phenomena of UN operations must be recalled: a) voting strength, however unconnected with power realities, is in one sense a test of the support we can muster in the struggle with the Soviets; and b) blocs have formed in the UN based not only on regional interests but on abstract general principles as well.

In fighting the Cold War in the UN, we are under great pressure to confront the Soviet single-mindedly with sharp attacks, notwithstanding the possibility that such an approach may frighten the timid or alienate the unconvinced. Despite these pressures, primarily domestic, we are competing for the understanding and, if possible, support of neutralist sentiment, both Arab-Asian and European. Our objective with these groups is gradually to lead them to fuller understanding of the threat of the Soviet system, and to increased willingness to support anti-Soviet measures. One way of achieving these ends is by seeking to impress them with US reasonableness and lack of belligerence, which has caused us occasionally to recede from positions which appeared to these groups to be unduly rigid or demanding (Indian resolution on Korea, CMC, etc.). To convey the same impression, we have at times given such policies as, e.g., disarmament an emphasis that the foreseeable possibilities might perhaps not have otherwise warranted. In a few instances we have possibly risked misleading other groups by joining in resolutions of general and pious intent, adherence to which by the Soviets permitted them to spread wholly cynical propaganda of their own.

Although our techniques for measuring comparative successes in our propaganda are imperfect, it can be argued that we have at least maintained our position vis-à-vis neutralism through restraining ourselves from inflammatory propaganda, and have probably improved our support where our tactics have recognized the sentiments and fears of those groups.

With respect to colonialism the demands of our various objectives have required us to walk an even more delicate tight-rope, in our propaganda as with our diplomacy. A major US objective has been to enlist Arab-Asian support in all feasible ways. One of the most significant ways available is through words spoken and actions taken in the UN on issues which touch on their basic interests and aspirations.

But the aggressive anti-colonialism of the Arab-Asian grouping has created a dilemma for us in which manifestations of our prestige strength through voting majorities on crucial East-West issues are increasingly dependent on our ability at least ideologically to disassociate ourselves from our European allies on colonial questions. Thus on the one hand we have pursued a policy of extensive support for the UK, France, Belgium, the Netherlands, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa. Simultaneously, we have: (a) at times sided in the UN with the forces having interests antagonistic to those allies in their dependencies (political information, UN flag in trust territories, visiting missions, independence of Libya, etc.) or at least, (b) essayed a role of "Impartiality" in the UN between both sides, to the dissatisfaction e.g., of the French in North African cases, and above all in the South African cases.

In sum, we have tried to follow a middle course. In doing this we have tried to meet ideological pressures from anti-colonial groupings through statements which in the eyes of our closest allies were damaging to their interests. On the other hand, our own profound convictions regarding free discussion and national independence have at times had to be suppressed to give our allies a feeling of support (inscription of Tunisian item on SC agenda, granting hearings to nationalistic spokesmen, etc.).

The problem of choice of audiences is equally acute in some other fields, such as human rights, where for example we have avoided condemning some of our friends (South Africa, e.g.) for deprivations for which we have unhesitatingly condemned the Soviets (or conversely, our soft-peddling of the 7th GA of Soviet anti-Semitism because of anticipated Arab hostility).

3. "Policy" and "Propaganda"

As the propaganda potential of the UN is increasingly recognized and exploited we are often tempted to give high priorities to consideration of expediency. The danger here is that when propaganda tends to become the master rather than the servant of policy, our varied and overriding policy objectives, particularly those of long-range importance, may genuinely suffer, and at a minimum may become obscure even to us.

Actions which we may take in the UN primarily for propaganda gain become a link in our total foreign policy operations. Our actions in the UN, however they are motivated, inescapably become connected with the body of American policy commitments, and can affect directly the substance of our policy efforts elsewhere. A prime current example of this is the powerful relationship of the Indian resolution on Korea to the conditions of negotiations at Panmunjon.

Exploitations of the UN propaganda potential can also suffer if policies adopted primarily with a view to propaganda are recognized by others to be insincere. For example, in the interest of demonstrating US concern for the underdeveloped countries, it was seriously suggested that the US support initial studies into an International Development Fund at a time when it was understood we could not support its establishment in the form it was then likely to take, and if this had been done the immediate propaganda advantage vis-à-vis underdeveloped countries might have been overwhelmingly offset when it became apparent that we had no intention of following through.

Note: Because the subject of this paper is in a slightly different category than the others in the series, it is felt appropriate to add to the above analysis at this stage the following questions which arise in the course of analysis but which can not be answered without further investigation by technically competent personnel:

a) Content of propaganda: what are relative advantages and disadvantages of types of propaganda use we have made of the UN? what is relative effectiveness of US and Soviet propaganda in UN? what is relation between propaganda operations and effectiveness of UN in carrying out its functions?

b) Audiences for propaganda: what are the chief audiences actually available in and through the UN? to what extent are they actually reached? to what extent do UN operations actually influence their attitudes? what priorities should be assigned to what audiences, and what effect would this have on future US propaganda operations in the UN?

COLLECTIVE SECURITY

CHARACTER OF THE ISSUE

In view of Soviet non-cooperation in the Security Council, attempts have been made to develop UN collective security functions under General Assembly auspices, attempts which have met with determined opposition on the part of the Soviet Union. Because of this Soviet opposition, the problem of collective security has come to be regarded as a Cold War issue. Certain Members have hesitated actively to support US efforts to organize a UN collective security system, fearing that such a system would provoke the Soviet Union, without necessarily increasing world security. Differences on this matter reflect divergent views on the role of the UN in the East-West conflict, and also certain contrasts between the strategic interests of the US and European or Asian powers.

BACKGROUND

The UN security system originally was supposed to center in the Security Council's capacity for instant decisions backed by the full weight of the united great powers. Their disposition to exercise this joint responsibility for world peace was supposed to express itself in an agreement to set aside military forces for the use of the UN under Article 43 of the Charter. It soon became clear that the absence of cooperation between the USSR and the other great powers reduced this system to impotence. The Charter, however, conferred on the GA certain functions with respect to international peace that were susceptible of development in case of SC impotence.

Long before Korea the US had publicly taken the position that failure of the great powers to cooperate in the SC and to agree on Article 43 military forces did not relieve UN Members of their responsibility to seek effective means of collective security by alternative avenues. Following the experience in Korea,* this idea was translated into the Uniting for Peace Resolution. The Resolution asserts the right and intention of the GA to recommend that members take collective measures to maintain peace whenever the SC, because of lack of unanimity of the permanent members, fails to do so. Practically this meant, of course, that the UN might be called upon to recommend collective action in a case of aggression even if the aggressor is one of the great powers, a case which originally used to be considered virtually outside of the UN system on the generally held premise that UN collective security action required a SC decision and thus agreement among the great powers.

The strong opposition of the Soviet Union against the Uniting for Peace Resolution undoubtedly lent pointed political meaning to this responsibility.

The Resolution established a Peace Observation Commission designed to observe and report on the situation in any area where there exists a danger to international peace. It also set up a Collective Measures Committee to study measures which might be used to maintain and strengthen international peace and security. Furthermore, it recommended that Members maintain armed forces so trained, organized, and equipped that they could be promptly made available for service as UN units. The purposes and use of these institutions of collective security have provided some of the concrete topics on which the various groups and forces in the UN have joined issue.

The Peace Observation Commission need not be discussed here since it has not figured prominently in the stresses and strains surrounding collective security arrangements.

The Collective Measures Committee has by now been continued into its third year, each time by resolutions supported by over fifty Members. All the same, its role has been the object of pronounced differences of opinion. More than other GA institutions, the CMC has been symbolic of the intent to develop collective security capabilities of the UN despite the paralysis of the SC. It is therefore significant that certain members of the Committee, notably the British and French, feared that certain aspects of preparatory planning by the CMC might give the UN the appearance of an anti-Soviet alliance. In view of these fears, the Committee agreed from the beginning to confine itself to studies of a generalized and abstract character, refraining from mentioning specific measures by specific countries and altogether avoiding certain topics (e.g. bases) even in generalized form. While the Committee's studies are meant to reduce improvisation in case of future collective action, they do not envisage such action in terms of any concrete strategic assumptions. CMC planning has been directed toward "aggression" in the abstract.

The CMC also requested Members that they inform the UN of steps taken to maintain armed forces in such a manner that they could promptly be made available to the UN. The replies, while generally in favor of the principle of collective security, were sufficiently evasive to suggest that most Member States are at this time unwilling to translate the general idea into concrete preparations. Only six countries (all small powers) † offered specific contingents. An overwhelming majority, however, indicated support in principle, and several pointed to their forces in Korea as a contribution to the UN collective security system. NATO members also cited their contributions under the North Atlantic Pact. The response from others was less positive, several states pleading prior requirements of self-defense or lack of resources. ‡ India frankly expressed its disagreement with the concept of collective military measures. Fourteen states have not formally replied. §

Collective security was furthermore put to the test in UN reactions to Communist China. The resolution condemning Communist Chinese aggression in Korea (February 1, 1951) clearly invoked the obligation to join in further collective action for international peace and security. It was strongly opposed by an Arab-Asian bloc under Indian leadership (it received 44 affirmative votes). The Additional Measures Committee, set up under this resolution to consider sanctions against the Chinese aggressors, under similar pressure confined itself to the recommendation of an embargo of arms, ammunition, and strategic materials, as determined by each state. (Collective security also played an indirect role in the problem of Chinese representation, since the refusal to contemplate the seating of the Chinese Communist Government has been, since June 1950, based on the argument that the UN could not consider the Chinese Communist Government's claim as long as the latter actively resisted UN collective action.)

In general, the development of collective security in the UN since 1950 shows strong and scarcely diminished voting support of the principle of solidarity against aggression, together with persistent fears, on the part of many states, to take any practical steps that might provoke the Soviet Union or draw unwilling Members into unpredictable military commitments.

UNITED STATES POLICIES

The objectives of our policy up to now can be broken down into long and short term categories. In the long run, we have desired to build in the UN the broad framework of a system of collective security that would gradually promote conditions of enduring peace. In the event of general hostilities, we would prefer to have the war fought between the UN and the aggressor rather than between the US (plus allies) and its enemy. In the short run we have been interested in finding ways and means by which collective resistance to aggression could be planned and prepared under UN auspices as much as is possible in advance of unpredictable situations which must determine the eventual decisions of states, and we have sought to promote a growing awareness on the part of states of their responsibilities to an effective system of collective security. With respect to regional arrangements like NATO, we have desired to obtain recognition of a mutually supporting relationship between them and the UN. These objectives have been pursued with the realization that even if they were not fully attainable at all or within a given period, their discussion in the UN would help to keep Members alert to the meaning of the organization and the common stake of the free world in it.

US interests with respect to Soviet aggression are involved in UN collective security in these two respects :

On the one hand the US wishes to obtain a maximum of political and military support in event of a future war provoked by Soviet aggression. On the other hand, political support in the UN for US sponsored measures to strengthen collective security in time of peace involves US prestige in the sense that the number of votes in favor of the US position in such matters is often considered to be indicative of the willingness of nations to side with the US in an ultimate showdown.

MAJOR DIFFICULTIES FACING THE UNITED STATES

Obstacles to rapid progress in this field have arisen chiefly from the attitudes of our main allies. In general, many of our friends look upon collective security in the present situation as an issue of the Cold War rather than as a normal and continuous function of the UN. They tend to fear that insistence on collective security would reduce the usefulness of the UN as an impartial agency for conciliation and negotiation.

Those who participate with us in regional arrangements also incline to rely for their security on the concrete commitments under those pacts rather than on the UN. The British privately insist that in the event of Soviet aggression, the core of resistance would be the US supported by the UK and the Commonwealth, that in view of the precarious balance of forces UN collective action might not cause the aggressor to desist, but rather would be likely to bring closer World War III, and that the attempt to organize collective action against aggression through the UN would, because of the East-West conflict, be likewise interpreted as preparations for World War III instead of preparations to prevent this occurrence. The British also discount the view that "roping in" marginal states in UN collective action could make any substantial difference in World War III. Regarding NATO, the British fear that the more attempts were made in times of peace to foster the relationships between such organizations as NATO and the UN, the stronger would be the impression that the UN and NATO were indistinguishable.—The French similarly believe that emphasis on a short-run program of planning and preparation for collective security would tend to convert the UN into an anti-Soviet alliance which would tend both to alienate the neutrals and further to exacerbate relations with the Soviets. Certain countries precariously exposed to the Soviet threat, like Yugoslavia and Turkey, have taken a different attitude and displayed a lively interest in the advantages they expect from UN preparations for collective resistance to aggression.

In the particular application of collective security to the problem of North Korean and Chinese Communist aggression, certain phases of our policies have encountered the resistance of those of our European allies who had recognized the Chinese Communist Government, and those Asian and Arab states who are inclined to view the Korean war, as it has developed, in terms of Chinese self-defense rather than aggression, and to dissociate themselves from UN sponsorship of the Korean action. In other words, different attitudes toward this particular case of collective security are heavily colored by differences in the national policies of various countries with respect to Communist China. Different interpretations of the role of the UN in the Korean conflict follow from, rather than motivate, these divergent national policies.

TRENDS

Discussion about the CMC has by now led to a considerable amount of agreement between the US and its main allies, so that this particular question would hardly be expected to cause further difficulties. Nevertheless, the underlying issue, of which the question of the CMC is but one symbolic aspect, continues as a latent difference of views about the role of the UN under present historical circumstances. The issue still is, whether, given the conflict between the Soviets and the "free world", the emphasis in the UN should be on security and enforcement functions or on negotiating and conciliatory functions of the Organization. As long as the US is vitally interested in the UN as well as in vigorous counter-action against the Soviet threat, under prevailing policy we would hold that de-emphasizing UN security and enforcement functions would mean to "put the UN on ice". Other leading nations of the free world will probably continue to desire a UN devoted mainly to conciliating and mediating functions, lest a firm UN front of resistance to the Soviet threat might "aggravate the tension". The extent to which this issue will cause further stresses and strains between the US and its friends in the UN depends mainly on the future development of the Soviet "peace" offensive and its effects on the leading non-communist powers.

BLOC POLITICS IN THE UNITED NATIONS

PREFATORY NOTE

Bloc voting in the UN is above all a problem of organized factions in the GA, a body where each nation has one vote and where parliamentary power therefore does not necessarily represent the realities of the international power and responsibility. The analysis of this problem in the following paper is confined to the Arab-Asian bloc and the Latin American bloc, which are the chief GA factions organized to use the UN for the promotion of their common interests. The Soviet bloc is ignored because it represents a centrally controlled system with five votes rather than a voluntary grouping of nations, and because factors other than those of parliamentary strategy in the GA are holding this system together. Bloc voting among other European countries is also left out because it has not developed to any degree of consistency (the reason being that, particularly with the development of regional institutions, the European countries by and large do not seek to use the UN as a principal mechanism for their conduct of foreign policy or as a means of influencing others to particular courses of action. They, broadly speaking, are the beneficiaries of the status quo and, outside of such broad issues of world order as disarmament, have no program of change for which the UN could serve as an instrument. Neither do they desire to see the UN become an anti-Soviet weapon. In short, they have little motive to develop a dynamic bloc comparable to the motives of the Arab, Asian, or Latin American states.).

THE ARAB-ASIAN-AFRICAN BLOC IN THE UNITED NATIONS

The so-called Arab-Asian group of states in the UN have, since December 1950, frequently operated as a bloc, in pursuit of certain common interests. In view of the wide geographic distribution of the countries in question* these common interests are not so much "regional" as they are in the nature of general ideas concerning the position and interest of Arabs, Asians, and Africans in a world led by nations of Western civilization. These common ideas can be characterized as:

- a) opposition to colonial rule and the Western economic domination;
- b) insistence on the rights and dignity of "native" vis-à-vis white people;
- c) demands for economic and technical assistance for underdeveloped countries;
- d) resistance to involvement of Arab-Asians in the East-West conflict.

The UN, offering opportunities for propaganda and parliamentary pressure on behalf of these ideas, has been for the Arab-Asian above all the forum which brings them together in a setting that makes bloc operations possible and effective. In the UN the degree of solidarity of this bloc has been influenced not only by the above named common viewpoints as such, but also by the attitudes and policies of the Western world, and by the ruses and enticements of the Soviets.

Unlike the Arab League (six of whose members are also UN Members and participants in the Arab-Asian group), the Arab-Asian bloc does not have a formal organization. It has, however, held increasingly frequent meetings since 1950, under orderly rules of procedure and with rotating chairmanship. The meetings have considered not only the Korean problem, but questions such as those of Palestine, Tunis, and Morocco, racial discrimination in South Africa, trusteeship and non-self-governing territories, and the so-called East-West issues. Occasionally, extraneous matters like personnel have also been made a matter of bloc policies. On matters of importance to them, the bloc could generally muster 13 to 15 votes. The bloc has used its voting strength to obtain UN action reflecting the broad principles favored by the bloc, or, if that was not possible, to express its displeasure by

*The Arab-Asian bloc is composed of Afghanistan, Burma, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Pakistan, the Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria, and Yemen. Turkey attended 2 or 3 meetings in December 1950 but cannot be considered a member of the group, nor can Thailand which sometimes votes with it. This a [is] likewise true of Liberia and Ethiopia which more frequently vote with the Arab-Asian group on matters of common interest. [Footnote in the source text.]

withholding support from positions favored by the Western countries. On occasion, it has also supported Soviet positions in exchange for what was believed to be Soviet friendliness to Arabs and Asians.†

In particular, the interests of Arab-Asian bloc countries can be analyzed as follows:

Colonial Questions—All states of the Arab-Asian-African group have professed a universal and abiding interest in colonial questions. This interest has a deep emotional basis, for the obvious reasons that most of these countries have only recently emerged from the status of colonial peoples or of peoples treated as inferiors by white aliens. They desire: (a) to help peoples who are still in a colonial status or experiencing unequal treatment to achieve independence and improved conditions of life, and (b) to identify their own national aspirations for a larger share of world influence and prestige with the cause of peoples which are thus being ruled or kept in an inferior status by white foreigners. The colonial problem tends accordingly in many—but not necessarily all—cases to merge with racial problems and problems of human rights. Frequently, however, the policy of these states on colonial questions is dictated by domestic political considerations. The Arab-Asians have preferred the General Assembly to the Trusteeship Council for discussion of colonial questions, because their more numerous representation in the former gives them a better chance to make their voice felt, and because they believe that their point of view is not sufficiently represented on the TC.

Human Rights and Related Questions—In this field, Arab-Asian votes have not been uniformly cast en bloc. On certain questions (e.g. the status of women) their interests turned out to be sharply divided because of domestic and religious considerations. Nevertheless, on the whole the delegates from this area have inclined to press for a far-reaching program of human rights, a program that reflects not so much measures which their governments are prepared to realize in their respective nations as it formulates ideal conditions which these countries aspire to attain, presumably with the financial help of the West.‡ The votes of Arab-Asian delegates in these matters also represent abstract, ethical principles (sometimes embodied in their respective religions) which they uphold in speeches in the UN often without any relationships whatsoever to realities in their own countries. Moreover, delegates from these countries frequently cast their votes on matters of this kind without the benefit of instructions from their home governments. In this connection, it is important to note that most of these free-wheeling delegates have been educated in the liberal philosophy of the West.

†(E.g., it has voted for the Soviet demand for the presence of North Korean and Chinese Communist representatives at the UN discussions on Korea as a quid pro quo for Soviet support of the Arab position on Morocco.) [Footnote in the source text.]

‡Accordingly, they generally favored the combination of economic and social rights together with political rights into one single Human Rights Covenant. [Footnote in the source text.]

In such matters as Self-Determination and Definition of Aggression the countries of the area find an additional opportunity to pursue their common anti-colonial interests, although other considerations may occasionally enter (as, e.g., when India objected to language in the resolution on self-determination that might be interpreted as applying to such areas as Kashmir, the Princely States, or the French Enclaves in India).

Economic Questions—The Arab-Asian bloc has shown interest, particularly during the last three sessions of the GA, in issues centering in the economic development of underdeveloped countries through the UN, a matter which they have generally stressed as one of vital and urgent importance. This attitude springs directly from the desire of these countries to advance the economic status of their peoples. At the same time, while they accept, in most cases, bilateral economic assistance, many of them prefer UN sponsorship in order to avoid the possible embarrassment of direct obligation or political commitment to another state in return for economic aid. While the countries of the group do not always vote solidly as a bloc (India and Pakistan frequently have individual views, and Thailand and the Philippines at one stage abstained even on economic development) they, by and large, have the same interests in UN economic questions and can be expected to vote in about the same way on most of them.

Political and Security Questions—Political and security questions, as far as the Arab-Asian states are concerned, can be divided into matters of the East-West conflict, and those that have specific interest to these states. On East-West questions, Arab-Asian votes indicate a certain neutralist attitude (particularly on the part of India, Indonesia, Burma, Egypt, and Syria). In the case of the Arab States, there can be no doubt that their resentment of US policies on Palestine has definitely colored their attitudes on matters of concern to us. § Still, the voting record demonstrates that on major East-West issues the US has enjoyed general support from the Arab-African-Asian group of states. Nevertheless, the US was disappointed when at the Sixth Session 8 of the 11, and at the Seventh Session 11 of the 14, abstentions on the Soviet propoganda resolutions condemning the United States Mutual Security Act came from the Arab-Asian bloc (Iraq and Lebanon, China, Thailand, and the Philippines voting at the Sixth Session in the negative with the US), the votes as a whole being 5-42-11, and 5-40-14. Similarly, in the case of the Soviet propaganda proposal as to "alleged mass murder of Korean and Chinese prisoners of war", by the US Armed Forces in Korea, at the Seventh Session, 8 of the 10 abstentions came from the Arab-Asian world, the vote being 5-45-10. (It is noteworthy in this latter instance that Ethiopia, Iraq, Lebanon, and Liberia, as well as China, Thailand, and the Philippines voted with the US). On the other hand, most Arab-Asians supported the US on the BW charges, with only India, Indonesia and Burma abstaining. On matters of collective security, the Arab-Asian-African states, with the general exception of India and the occasional exception of states like Saudi Arabia, Syria and Egypt, have gone along with the US. The question of the definition of aggression has not raised political issues to any significant extent, since at least the Arab States have favored such a definition from the period of the San Francisco Conference to the present. India, on the other hand, has not favored such a definition.

§ E.g., in connection with the Czech charge of US interference in internal affairs, etc., at the Seventh Session, on which 12 members of the Arab-Asian bloc abstained, Syria, Lebanon, Iraq, and Saudi Arabia explained their abstaining votes by saying that they were motivated by anti-Zionism, an attitude which at that time happened to be also the official policy in Czechoslovakia. [Footnote in the source text.]

Other questions of particular interest, in which the Arab-Asian-African bloc voted solidly are those pertaining to the treatment of peoples of Indian origin in South Africa, the South African apartheid laws, and the questions of Tunis and Morocco, involving at once the demand for racial equality and the emerging nationalism in this area.

Organization Problems of the United Nations—All the Arab-Asian-African states take a "broad" view on the question of competence, particularly when questions of racial discrimination and self-determination in non-self-governing or trust territories are involved. They, therefore, raise no question of jurisdiction, although they do so if problems involving their own domestic jurisdiction come up, as in the case of the Anglo-Iranian oil dispute in 1951-53, in the case of Hyderabad and in that of Moluccas. Moreover, when efforts are made to make those concepts universally applicable in Member states as well as territories, the Arab-Asians tend to take a restrictive view of UN competence. It may be noted in passing that the Arab-Asian-African states generally have favored universality of membership, since the San Francisco Conference, almost without exception. No particular political significance attaches to their attitude on this question, so far as the East-West conflict is concerned. In the matter of candidacies for membership on various UN Councils and other bodies, the Arab-Asian-African bloc, at times, and the states of the Arab League in particular, have been able to work with the Latin-American bloc in order to achieve their political desiderata.

LATIN AMERICAN BLOC POLITICS

I. General

With the strong similarities of language, cultural background, political history, and general outlook on life, it is only natural that there should be considerable amount of like thinking among the members of the Latin American group in the UN, considerable cooperation on issues, and a considerable amount of voting on the same side of an issue, either spontaneously or by previous understanding.

The Latin American countries have had a regional organization with the US for over sixty years. It is, however, rather important to distinguish between the Pan American relationship and the Latin American relationship, which is the essence of the Latin American bloc|| in the UN, the participation of the US being the differentiating factor.

Latin American group action may take various forms: (1) several Latin Americans spontaneously voting on the same side of the question; (2) group consideration of an issue, tending toward a unified Latin American position by the members of the group without a commitment to vote on either side, and (3) discussion by the group of an issue with agreement, or at least a tacit understanding, that the group will support the decision of the majority of the group.

The Latin Americans have held caucuses at all of the sessions of the GA, by custom under the chairmanship of the Latin-American Vice-President of the GA. At the outset, several of the Latins felt that their meetings should be completely informal and that any semblance of an organized or semi-organized bloc should be avoided. Inhibitions of this kind were soon lost and the caucus has operated at a number of sessions of the GA as a rather open, although not officially organized, institution.

Bloc action of the type described in No. 3 above, has in the past been almost completely limited to the matter of naming Latin American candidates for UN positions. On substantive issues, the caucus has generally followed the plan described in No. 2 above, discussing the issue without coming to any understanding that the members will vote as a unit. Such discussions do, however, sometimes have the effect of inclining uncertain members towards the majority or predominant viewpoint.¶

II. Economic Questions

Aside from problems arising from UN candidacies, Latin American bloc action has probably been most pronounced in the consideration of economic questions involving the typical interests common to all underdeveloped countries. This was demonstrated at the last session of the GA where Latin American-Arab nationalistic aspirations and emotions were channeled into the passage of the resolution relating to "nationalization" of foreign investments over strenuous US opposition. This one example of Latin American-Arab collaboration demonstrates the almost unlimited possibilities of the combined voting power of the two blocs when their members believe that they have something to gain by collaboration.

¶E.g., on the "nationalization" issue, 4 or 5 countries definitely opposed to the resolution who had orders to vote negatively did not dare to express their opinion and, at the time of the vote, either left the room or abstained. [Footnote in the source text.]

III. Social Questions

Although most Latin Americans are sympathetic to the international action in promotion of human rights and have similar ideas regarding freedom of information, they have not shown a great tendency toward joint action on these matters. Even when agreeing on substance they have often tended to go off in all directions on fine points of interpretation. As described below, differences over the question of intervention and competence represent another factor preventing unity of action.

IV. Colonial Questions

Traditionally, Latin Americans take a definitely anti-colonial line (with some of them, like Guatemala, Mexico, and Haiti sometimes in the vanguard of the anti-colonial Members), although their anti-colonial sympathies are tempered to an important extent by emphasis on the concept of non-intervention and by their traditional sympathy for France and Italy when interests of these nations are involved. This is illustrated by voting records showing that "strongly" led countries such as Venezuela, Colombia, Peru, Dominican Republic, and the Argentine tend, chiefly for this reason, to diverge from the views of their colleagues. Their attitude on non-intervention is not altogether consistent however, as they object to intervention in their own affairs, but not in territories under the sovereignty of Administering Members.

V. Political and Security Questions

On political and security questions where the interests of the free world are engaged, the Latin American bloc can generally be depended upon to be almost unanimously on the side of the free world. When there are deviations on any given questions, it can usually be explained by the fact that some domestic issues appear to the particular member to outweigh the importance of going along with the rest of the free world on the particular issue. They voted as a unit at the last session on the question of Korea and cooperated very closely, virtually as a bloc (although assisted by strong outside pressure), in checking Arab aspirations for strong resolutions of condemnation against France in the cases of Tunisia and Morocco.

VI. Organization

As might be expected from small, relatively powerless countries, and Latin Americans look upon the UN as an institution of great importance in world affairs. They are generally agreed on the iniquities of the misuse of the veto and many of them, including Peru, Argentina, Cuba, and the Central American countries, are strong advocates of restricting its scope. It is, however, unlikely that there is sufficient unanimity among the Latin Americans to anticipate bloc action on the matter.

As indicated above, Latin Americans are divided on the question of UN competence, when implications of intervention are involved.

The matter of candidacies for UN positions is an extremely important matter of prestige for the Latin Americans. The Latin Americans place great emphasis on equitable geographic distribution of UN posts; more particularly, they are concerned that there shall be no reduction in the number of positions that Latin America now has. When we ignore this deep-seated feeling, we are likely to be faced with a situation such as took place at the Sixth GA when the failure of the US to support a Latin American candidate for a seat on the International Court of Justice previously held by a Latin American aroused considerable resentment and discussion at caucus meetings and severely weakened Latin American support for the US-sponsored election of Greece to a seat on the Security Council.

At the time when caucuses first started, the question was raised whether the US should be a member of the caucus. The US took the position that we would be glad to consult with the countries on a day-to-day basis, thus discouraging invitations to meet with the group. At that time there was a distinct feeling that we should not exclude ourselves completely from the caucus, except on purely Latin American affairs. In succeeding GAs, however, the US trend seemed to grow stronger to avoid contact with the Caucus. In recent GAs, this trend has abated and several meetings were held, specifically for the purpose of meeting with some top delegate in the US Delegation to discuss one of the more pressing and important items on the agenda. Such meetings have proved very beneficial.

COORDINATION BETWEEN THE TWO MAJOR BLOCS

The definitely regional motives binding the Arab League together are often represented by the more general causes or grievances which the Arabs have in common with other nations recently emerged from Western dominance. Thus Middle Eastern regional politics, although not inherently anti-Western, tend to merge with a largely ideological movement of criticism, and emancipation from the tutelage, of the West. Racial segregation in South Africa may be selected as a vehicle for promoting some Middle Eastern state's immediate interests, or, by contrast, opposition to Israel may serve as a way of registering a general protest against the West. General ideological causes also have served as a common ground on which Latin American states have often found it profitable and possible to cooperate with the Arab-Asians. When not inhibited by specific considerations (e.g. regard for France, or interest in the principle of non-intervention), the Latin Americans have frequently entered into a mutually supporting relationship with the Arab-Asian bloc for the pursuit of respective interests, in the general framework of broad ideological objectives. This intermingling of practical national interests and widely held ideas of change and progress is characteristic of the UNGA, where the same set of delegates deal with economic, social, and humanitarian as well as political problems, in the same forum.

Countries which would otherwise have neither grounds nor opportunities to meet and plan for concerted action find here a setting in which their various and diverse interests can be reduced to a common denominator. They also find that group elaboration of GA resolutions allow them to articulate this common denominator in a particularly effective form.

Specifically, Arab-Asians and Latin Americans have discovered common ground in the field of economic development or general anti-colonial attitudes. More broadly speaking, however, their common cause can be described as a quest for improvement of their conditions together with recognition of their dignity and their problems on a footing of equality with the leading nations of the West, in consequence of which recognition they expect certain things to be done. This quest often appears to take the form of an assault on the hitherto dominant position of the foremost Western nations in their relations with all kinds of non-Western peoples, whether black, brown, or yellow, Moslem, Hindu, primitive or civilized, dependent or self-governing. The simultaneous consideration of political, economic, social, and humanitarian issues in one forum allows and encourages all nations advocating changes in this sense to enter into a loose parliamentary coalition to the end of marshalling majorities for all kinds of resolutions (often supported by the USSR) reflecting their common cause. The coalition of the two major blocs is neither solid nor continuous and certainly does not correspond to any political alignment effective beyond GA parliamentary strategy.

HUMAN RIGHTS

I. CHARACTER OF ISSUE

The Charter and the Universal Declaration established certain world-wide and long-term goals in the field of human rights which the US has consistently supported. From the outset practically all non-Soviet bloc Member States, including and often led by the US, set about to find agreed ways and means to promote the achievement of these goals. But in this process some voting majorities, in the main constituted by the African-Arab-Asian and Latin American blocs and often augmented by the Soviet bloc, began to direct their energies along lines which the US came to consider objectionable; specifically these majorities sought 1) to reach certain goals through UN resolutions purportedly based upon general Charter commitments and directed either at a particular state (i.e., South Africa) or a particular small class of states (i.e., possessing colonies), 2) to achieve establishment of a UN obligation to give effect within a reasonable time to certain new economic, social and cultural "rights" which the US at best could consider as long-range objectives (by contrast with purely political rights which have long been the subject of codification in our society), and 3) to employ UN treaties to establish these and other human rights. Consequently, there arose for the US a strain and stress in the UN, which has been accentuated by: a) certain fears aroused in the US and some other countries of "western" background that the UN might one day attempt to interfere in any one of them in human rights matters whether or not already provided for in their respective constitutional systems, and b) the use by both Soviet and anti-Soviet forces of human rights as a symbol in Cold War propaganda in the UN.

II. BACKGROUND

Charter Articles 55 and 56 provide for the promotion of "universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedom for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion". Articles 13 and 62 authorize the GA and ECOSOC to make recommendations to advance the realization of such rights and freedoms for all. Pursuant to Article 68 ECOSOC established in 1946 a Commission for the promotion of human rights. In the same year the GA adopted a number of resolutions relating to broad principles in the field of human rights, and also was asked to consider a human rights question in a particular country, namely, the treatment of the Indian minority in South Africa.

In 1947 the Commission on Human Rights started the drafting of a declaration of human rights and a covenant on human rights, the former a statement of long-range principles and the latter a treaty to give effect to the former. In 1948 the GA, by a vote of 48-0-8 (Soviet bloc, Saudi Arabia and South Africa), Honduras and Yemen being absent, adopted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights; and it also adopted a Genocide Convention. Work on the draft Covenant on Human Rights proceeded slowly in the Commission, and conventions on freedom of information and the political rights of women were considered in the Economic and Social Council and the Commission on the Status of Women respectively.

Unsuccessful attempts were made in the Commission on Human Rights to give individuals, as well as states, the right to charge a state with the violation of the draft Covenant on Human Rights. In 1949 Australia and the USSR proposed to add articles on economic, social and cultural "rights" to the civil rights in the draft Covenant, and in 1950 the GA decided to do so. The civil rights were comparable to those in the Bill of Rights in the US Constitution, and theretofore were the only ones enumerated in the draft Covenant. In 1951 the US, supported by India, France, UK, Lebanon and Uruguay, persuaded the GA to split the original draft Covenant into one on "Civil and Political Rights", and another on "Economic Social and Cultural Rights", which since then have been under consideration in the Commission. The proposed Convention on Freedom of Information continues to be considered in ECOSOC practically every year. In 1948 the GA completed the Genocide Convention, which has been ratified by forty-one countries but not by the US, and in 1952 the GA completed the Conventions on Political Rights of Women, and International Right of Correction. The US did not sign the latter two conventions.

The only GA actions with regard to human rights in specific countries have been on the Cold War charge by the US and its friends that Bulgaria, Hungary and Rumania were violating the human rights provisions of their peace treaties, and on the Indian and other Arab-Asian charges against South Africa on account of its racial policies. Anti-colonial states successfully limited practical application of a resolution on self-determination in the GA in 1952 to the 8 Member States with colonies. In a Cold War initiative directed against the USSR, the US and UK brought about the establishment jointly by the UN and ILO in 1951 of an ad hoc Committee to study and report on forced labor.

III. UNITED STATES POLICIES

Strong pressure from representatives of American non-governmental organizations, attending the 1945 San Francisco Conference to draft the UN Charter, led the US Delegation to take the initiative there to include human rights provisions in the Charter. The US has consistently supported the human rights objectives of the Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. President Eisenhower in a message to the Commission on Human Rights on April 7, 1953, described the Declaration as "a significant beacon in the steady march toward achieving human rights and fundamental freedoms for all".

The US has been in the forefront in initiating proposals for UN programs for the promotion of human rights and fundamental freedoms in the following fields: freedom of information, the status of women, genocide, forced labor, trade union rights and prisoners of war. But when American press opinion in 1951 and 1952 turned against the draft Newsgathering Convention, the United States dropped its interest in it and also continued to oppose two other draft freedom of information conventions, i.e., a general one and one entitled "International Right of Correction", because all of them included many restrictions as well as freedoms.

The US urged and supported strong condemnatory language in the resolution adopted in the GA with respect to the alleged violation of treaty obligations on human rights by Bulgaria, Hungary and Rumania; but it always has sought to moderate GA resolutions on the ticklish South African race questions, while maintaining that the UN was competent to discuss them notwithstanding Article 2(7) of the Charter.

Between 1947, when the initial draft of the Covenant on Human Rights was submitted to the Commission by the UK delegation, and January 20, 1953, the US supported completion of, first, one draft Covenant, and, later, the two Covenants. However, the US always and publicly emphasized the distinction between the civil rights long enumerated in the draft covenant, which were similar to those already established by the US Constitution, and the new social, economic and cultural "rights" which were added to that Covenant in 1951 by the Human Rights Commission at the direction of the GA and which the US has sought to confine to a second draft covenant.

On April 6, 1953, the US announced a new policy, rejecting in the following terms the use of covenants now to attain the long-term human rights goals of the Charter:

"While we shall not withhold our counsel from those who seek to draft a treaty or covenant on human rights, we do not ourselves look upon a treaty as the means which we would now select as the proper and most effective way to spread throughout the world the goals of human liberty to which this nation has been dedicated since its inception. We therefore do not intend to become a party to any such covenant or present it as a treaty for consideration by the Senate”.

In a statement issued April 7, 1953, President Eisenhower asked the US Delegation to present to the Commission on Human Rights in session at Geneva “positive” UN action programs “which we feel will contribute to that recognition of human rights and fundamental freedoms which people are seeking throughout the world”. The next day the US Delegation proposed the following three UN programs to the Commission :

(1) studies of various aspects of human rights throughout the world, which the Commission might then consider for possible general recommendations;

(2) annual reports on developments in the field of human rights by each Member Government, with the assistance of a national advisory committee, for consideration in the Commission; and

(3) advisory services on specific aspects of human rights similar to existing UN advisory services in the economic and social fields, providing experts to countries requesting the services, also scholarships and fellowships, and arrangements for seminars.

When announcing its new policy on the draft Covenant on Human Rights, the US also announced that it did not intend either to sign the Convention on the Political Rights of Women completed a short time earlier by the 7th GA, or to press at this time for ratification of the Genocide Convention pending since 1949 in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

IV. MAJOR DIFFICULTIES FACING THE UNITED STATES

The human rights questions that have created major difficulties for the US in the UN are: a) South African treatment of its race questions; b) efforts to convert general self-determination resolutions into specific anti-colonial measures; and c) various UN treaties on human rights including those on freedom of information. Growing US reluctance for various reasons to join voting majorities mustered in recent years behind these projects to give effect to certain broad principles, has placed the US more frequently in the minority opposition than it was wont to be in the early years of the UN. Moreover, failure of the US later to ratify and sign conventions such as those on Genocide and Political Rights of Women, for which we had earlier voted in the UN, increased our difficulties.

The perennial and ticklish question of South African treatment of its race conflict questions has confronted the US with three questions of importance, i.e., 1) whether the GA should consider the matter at all; 2) whether the GA should call upon South Africa to desist in enforcing a specific act of legislation; and 3) whether the GA should decide that South African segregation (apartheid) policy was based on racial discrimination. From the 1st GA in 1946 the US would have preferred to see the case settled bilaterally outside the UN; and finally at the 7th GA the US expressed doubt that the draft Arab-Asian resolution presented to that GA was expedient even if it did not transcend the powers of the UN as alleged by South Africa. US reluctance to join the voting majority grouped behind perennial Arab-Asian resolutions strongly condemnatory of South Africa has often led it into minority positions; for example, at the 7th GA the US and 15 other countries abstained in the Ad Hoc Political Committee vote (30-12-16) on a paragraph calling upon South Africa to suspend implementation of its Group Areas Act segregating races, although the US later joined the majority in voting (41-1-16) for the resolution as a whole including the contentious paragraph.

In the 7th GA the US found objectionable the efforts of the anti-colonial group to convert a general resolution on self-determination into one having practical application only to the small number of colonial powers including the US. When its efforts failed both to "universalize" the resolution, by making it applicable also to those states that had lost their independence, and otherwise to improve it, the US voted against the resolution which was nevertheless carried in the GA by a vote of 40-14(US)-6. This pressure by the Latin American, African-Arab-Asian and Soviet blocs had been foreshadowed by several votes at the 5th and 6th GAs.

Growing US reluctance to agree: a) to inclusion in the draft human rights covenant of the new social, economic and cultural "rights", b) to use the treaty process to achieve human rights objectives, and c) to the contents of the various draft conventions on Freedom of Information, and International Right of Correction, often brought the US into opposition to the positions of majorities, largely the Arab-Asian-African and Latin American blocs, in the UN on these matters. For example, after persistent US opposition to the Convention on International Right of Correction, the 3rd Committee at the 7th GA finally voted for the Convention 25-19(US)-10, and it was opened for signature in 1953.

Since announcement in April 1953 of the new US policy against signature and ratification of the proposed Covenants on Human Rights, no other country has yet expressed a willingness to take the same position. Although Australia, the UK, France and Belgium expressed dissatisfaction with the present draft of the Covenants, they did not preclude later approval of them if appropriately revised. The UK (together with 7 other European countries) has already ratified the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms.

In considering human rights matters in the UN, Arab-Asian-African-Latin American Delegates tend to have the following characteristics which make it difficult for the US to deal with them :*

(1) They generally attend UN meetings without instructions and speak idealistically, holding up to Western states western ideals in abstract form, while ignoring the inadequacies of their own Governments and countries.

(2) In matters concerning discrimination, their intensity and emotionalism make it next to impossible to reason with them. Many are colored, and those that are not feel a close bond to those that are. India has repeatedly taken the initiative in insisting that the GA condemn the policy of apartheid (segregation) practiced in the Union of South Africa with respect to Indians in that country. The Arab-Asian-African countries are increasingly exasperated that they cannot "force" South Africa through perennial GA resolutions to modify its domestic policies. South Africa is increasingly exasperated by these resolutions and threatens from time to time to withdraw from the UN if they persist.

(3) Although, as pointed out above in point 1, the Arab-Asian-African-Latin American countries are willing to urge a higher standard of human rights throughout the world, irrespective of low standards often prevailing in their own countries, they prefer to press for a greater application of the principles of human rights in non-self-governing territories than they are willing to see applied to the people in their own countries. They voted overwhelmingly to limit implementation of the principle of self-determination to people in non-self-governing territories, and were particularly desirous to avoid an express recognition of its application to people in their own countries.

(4) Delegates from the Arab-Asian-African-Latin American countries insist on use of the treaty process for the promotion of human rights, although they do not preclude the use of education, publicity and other means. Accordingly, they now sharply disagree with the US.

Soviet bloc action in the UN has the following characteristics :

(1) The Soviet bloc has declared that the UN should neither consider, nor give any judgment with respect to, either individual cases or individual countries; and accordingly they voted against consideration of charges of violation of human rights in Bulgaria, Hungary and Rumania. However, whenever the bloc senses an opportunity to aggravate trouble in the free world, it does so, as when it supported UN consideration of the South Africa race conflict cases raised by India and other countries.

(2) The Soviet bloc votes with the majority on general human rights issues, particularly those relating to non-self-governing territories in order to increase trouble in the free world.

(3) The Soviet bloc joins Arab-Asian-African-Latin American countries in voting for utilization of the treaty process in the human rights field. However, it insists on omission of any international implementation machinery from every treaty; and, when it signs or ratifies a treaty, it excludes by reservations the application of any such machinery provided in the treaty.

The US and the European-Commonwealth countries (other than India and Pakistan) fairly consistently vote together on human rights issues. However, the UK and several other European countries joined South Africa in voting against the competence of the UN to consider the South African race conflict case, while the US voted for inscription. The US has received some support from the European-Commonwealth countries as to its treaty policy in the field of freedom of information.

V. PENDING MAJOR TRENDS

Two matters continue to be of major difficulty to the US, namely, attempts by majorities of member states (a) to have the UN give attention to human rights in a specific country, i.e., the Union of South Africa, and (b) to achieve Charter objectives through treaties.

South Africa shows no inclination to deviate from its race segregation (apartheid) policies. Moreover, India and other Arab-Asian-African countries show no inclination to desist in demanding that South Africa change those policies to conform with Charter obligations.

Arab-Asian-African-Latin American countries continue to press for the utilization of the treaty process to implement the human rights objectives of the UN Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Extension of US treaty policy to all treaties in the field of human rights means that the US will be in a minority position in the GA as far as all treaties in the human rights field are concerned.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

PREFACE

Although the UN has considered at length a number of important matters in the economic field, such as increasing productivity of land, full employment, international trade and finance, transport and communications, emergency relief and rehabilitation, technical assistance, and financing economic development, only the last one has been a source of persistent stress and strain. However, both technical assistance and a new matter, "fair" prices for raw materials exported by underdeveloped countries, can not be ignored in a discussion of stress and strain; and the three matters are therefore treated together under the title "Economic Development" for the purpose of this study.

I. CHARACTER OF ISSUE

With increasing vigor and a voting majority, underdeveloped Member States outside the Soviet bloc have urged that the UN establish both a program and the financial means to provide what they would consider adequate aid in their economic development. The US opposes assumption by the UN of responsibilities on such a scale, because it would both increase very considerably the total financial burden and might be expected to place the major part of it on the US. This opposition of interests has given rise in the UN to a stress and strain affecting the US, which is accentuated by the fact that the voting groups on questions of economic development in some cases resemble those on colonial and certain human rights matters.

II. BACKGROUND

Ever since the first session of the GA in 1946, but particularly from 1948 onward, the underdeveloped countries have insistently urged institution by the UN of a program designed to assist their own efforts at economic development. They have warned eloquently of dangers in perpetuation of glaring contrasts between standards of living in underdeveloped and developed states, of a moral obligation as well as self interest of developed states to assist poorer ones, and of an integral connection between economic development and rearmament effort in strengthening the free world.

Because underdeveloped countries feel that, even with maximum feasible mobilization of their own financial resources, they still need external financial assistance for what they consider a satisfactory rate of development, debate has revolved around the question of both the sufficiency of financial resources provided by existing institutions, and the conditions under which these are made available. The debate tends to focus on the question or provision of additional assistance through governmental grants and loans whose terms would be more liberal than those of existing institutions. Since, except for Canada, the US has been the only country in a position to export large amounts of capital, the question is really how much financial assistance the US Government would make available. Most underdeveloped countries, particularly the Latin American states, point to the European Recovery Program as evidence both of US capabilities and of discriminatory treatment in favor of a group of countries whose standard of living even after the war substantially exceeded that in underdeveloped countries. Finally, the majority of underdeveloped countries not only urge that UN technical assistance programs be increased in size and otherwise liberalized,* but also desire to see these programs “backed up” by more capital and equipment.

With debate tending to focus on sufficiency of external financial assistance, and particularly on provision of grants and long-term low-interest loans to underdeveloped countries, the UN is considering the following possible lines of action :

a) At behest of the GA, ECOSOC is considering what the UN, its individual members, and specialized agencies might do to stimulate international flow of private investment. ECOSOC also is about to consider the question of governmental tax incentives to foreign private investment.

b) At the request of ECOSOC, the IBRD has under study the establishment of an International Finance Corporation, first proposed in 1951 by the International Development Advisory (Rockefeller) Board. Such an organization would provide an internationally administered fund to encourage private enterprise through provision of equity capital and loans without government guarantee.

c) Establishment of an International Development Fund (now referred to as the Special United Nations Fund for Economic Development—SUNFED) to make grants and long-term, low-interest loans to governments. Practically every underdeveloped state supports SUNFED, and a group of experts has recently formulated a plan for organizing and operating such a fund to be considered by ECOSOC at its 16th session, this summer.

As to technical assistance, the questions are whether the US should :

a) agree to a liberalization of existing restrictions and an increase in the size of UN programs, and b) make available a greater proportion of its total foreign economic assistance through UN channels rather than bilateral arrangements.

A corollary to attempts to obtain greater external assistance is the increasing insistence by the Latin American states, upon internationally assured “fair” prices for their principal exports, raw materials, as compared with prices of manufactured goods which they import. At the 7th GA insistence reached a peak, and the matter has since been raised in ECLA, ECAFE, IA-ECOSOC. This price ratio is related to the question of external assistance because it is regarded as affecting considerably the total amount of foreign exchange available for development projects.

III. UNITED STATES POLICIES

By the late World War II years the US had decided that effective cooperation by the Allied Powers towards an expanding post-war world economy, depending in great measure upon economic development of underdeveloped states, would help guarantee the peace. To encourage such development the US took active part in convening the Conference at Bretton Woods in July 1944 and negotiating there the Articles of Agreement establishing the IBRD. The US desired that so far as possible economic development be achieved through private foreign investments, but felt that the IBRD should be in a position to finance important projects when private capital would be unavailable on reasonable terms.

Under stimulus of growing demand from Latin American and Arab-Asian states for measures to improve their standards of living in accordance with Article 55 of the Charter, the US at the 3rd GA (1948) agreed to two resolutions providing for technical assistance. This expression of policy was soon followed by the President's Proclamation in January 1949 of the Point 4 program for technical assistance. Although a US-financed agency, the Institute of Inter-American Affairs, had already begun in war-time a modest program of bilateral technical assistance in Latin America, only after its re-incorporation in 1949 by Public Law 283 (81st Congress), did it expand its modest program to important proportions.† Moreover, the US took the initiative in expanding the UN TA program in the summer of 1949.

The US has declared in the UN that much more can and should be done by underdeveloped states to mobilize domestic resources for financing their own economic development, and that external governmental assistance should play only a supplemental role. In this connection, we have repeatedly stressed the importance of encouraging the flow of private investment; and we spiritedly opposed the so-called "nationalization" resolution at the 7th GA, but were heavily outvoted (36-4(US)-20).

As regards governmental assistance for economic development, we have pointed to US support of international lending through the Ex-Im Bank and the IBRD, and to the fact that both institutions still have resources available to help finance sound development projects. Moreover, we have recognized that in some cases international grant assistance may be required to provide an initial impetus to the development process; but at the 14th ECOSOC session and 7th GA we strongly expressed reservations in principle to a multilateral fund for this purpose, as well as skepticism that other potential capital-exporting-states could contribute. The US has not yet determined its position on the proposal for an International Finance Corporation.

†As Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs, Nelson Rockefeller conceived a program calling for use of substantial US budgeted funds for long-range projects to develop industry and transportation in certain Latin American countries. The Department of State and FEA blocked the projects as unwise excitations of expectations, because continuation of many activities in the "inevitable post-war retrenchment" would depend upon greater participation by responsible private interests and agencies. However, Rockefeller's subsidiary, Institute of Inter-American Affairs, established a modest bilateral technical program for placement of a few US "servicios" in LA administrations and for training in the US of a few LA engineers and officials. [Footnote in the source text.]

We have not yet developed a long-term policy on some of the basic issues involved in technical assistance. The new administration is re-examining the amounts of our contributions to UN programs, along with all of our other foreign commitments. By a self-imposed limitation we do not contribute more than 60% of the total, and in 1953 other countries were unable to contribute their full 40% share as counterpart of the full amount of our authorized contribution.

The US is considering also ways to make available a greater amount of equipment and supplies under the UN TA programs. This could be done by relaxing the present limitation of 25% of total cost which may be allocated to equipment. We could also provide equipment and supplies indirectly by making them available to the governments concerned through our bilateral programs. Such steps, could however, convert TA programs into supply programs, and too large a proportion of US materials could jeopardize the international nature of the program. Moreover, should the UN increase the proportion of its funds to be expended for equipment and supplies without also increasing the total size of the program, it might thereby severely limit the number of possible projects.

The US considers that even if manufacturing countries could overcome their objections to the Argentine proposal to finance economic development through establishment of "fair" international prices for primary commodities, the UN could not enforce such a measure for want of sufficient powers including that of taxation. On the other hand, if producing and purchasing countries are sufficiently interested in international agreements on individual commodities on a world-wide basis, the US is on record as willing to engage in appropriate negotiations.

IV. MAJOR DIFFICULTIES FOR UNITED STATES

The US emphasis in the UN on importance of encouraging the international flow of private investment for development is received by underdeveloped states with considerable reservation, reflecting such attitudes as: fear of exploitation by foreign interests; preference for governmental assistance, which states can channel and direct, over private enterprise; and a feeling that action by capital-exporting countries to make foreign investment attractive through tax incentives is required rather than action on the part of capital-importing countries.

Moreover, underdeveloped countries, while acknowledging assistance rendered by the Ex-Im Bank and the IBRD, feel that the rate of development which can be attained on the basis of present inter-governmental lending operations is insufficient. While acknowledging the US bilateral grant programs, most underdeveloped countries assert that even larger amounts of grant aid are necessary and that, for various reasons, such aid should be made available through an internationally administered fund.

Underdeveloped countries are apt to make very large requests, and the US position will remain difficult as long as the US remains by far the most important economic power in the UN. Moreover, the US has naturally found itself charged by certain underdeveloped states with having been unjustly generous in some of its aid arrangements with others. Finally, although the experts have recommended that SUNFED not be brought into existence until $250,000,000 shall have been pledged by a minimum of 30 contributing governments, the enthusiastic backers of the plan will make a considerable effort to collect the pledges necessary to put the plan into operation.

The Latin American and Asian producers of exportable raw materials are convinced that fluctuations in their foreign exchange earnings are excessive and harmful; and they see in the project to establish a "fair" ratio to import prices of manufactures a way to increase their supplies of foreign exchange, admittedly inadequate in most cases for economic development. Although the US has pointed out: 1) that raw material prices are now relatively higher than in any reasonable base period, 2) the impossibility of reaching any agreement on what would be a fair and equitable price relationship, and 3) the wholly unenforceable character of such an agreement, the US and other developed countries were in a persistent minority in UN debates on the issue until the early 1953 session of ECLA in Rio de Janeiro.

Although the US has usually found majority support on major issues connected with the technical assistance program, the US has been in the minority and in dogged opposition to the African-Arab-Asian and Latin American blocs on the SUNFED and price parity issues. Voting on these issues has tended to fall into a pattern of upwards of 30 to 17.‡ These matters might have serious repercussions in our relations with Asia, where need for development is greater than in Latin America and Communism makes a greater competitive appeal.

In the 6th GA Plenary vote the only exceptions to the solid front of the African-Arab-Asian and Latin American blocs in favor of the special development fund were China, Thailand, and Liberia among the African-Arab-Asian states, and Brazil, Uruguay, Dominican Republic, Haiti, Nicaragua, and Peru among the Latin American states. In the 7th GA Plenary vote on the so-called "nationalization" resolution (VI), on the right to exploit freely natural wealth and resources, the only exceptions to the solid front of the two blocs in favor of the resolution, which the US opposed, were China and the Philippines among the African-Arab-Asian states, and Cuba, Haiti, Nicaragua, Peru, and Venezuela among the Latin American states. Moreover, on this issue many European states, that normally vote with the US on economic matters, abstained, partly because of their own nationalization programs, and partly because they found nothing in the resolution really unacceptable to them. They did not, as did the US, feel that they should oppose the resolution because of certain omissions from it. On the other hand, they apparently did not desire to join on this issue the underdeveloped states whose ideas about adequate safeguards for the rights of private investors are not usually in consonance with those prevailing in developed states. In the 7th GA Plenary voting on the Argentine resolution about financing economic development through "fair" export prices, the only exception to the solid front of the blocs against the US were China, Lebanon, and Pakistan among the African-Arab-Asian states and Haiti among the Latin American states.

The West European and Commonwealth states have voted as has the US on most economic development questions. Communist countries are on the defensive in the UN on these matters, as they do not contribute to any UN development program and as they are basically opposed to any economic development except on their own terms.

V. IMPLICATIONS FOR UNITED NATIONS

Basically, UN success in channelling concrete assistance to the underdeveloped 2/3 of its Members (as the technical assistance program has begun to do), would greatly strengthen the prestige of the organization and should materially assist it in handling political disputes. Failure to establish substantial concrete assistance might intensify difficulties for the UN in, for example, the colonial and human rights fields.

VI. TREND

Progress is possible in the fields of private financing and technical assistance; but failure to find an adequate solution to the problem of following up technical advice with supplies and capital might lead to diminished interest in the program in many cases. As to the question of public financing, it is not likely that a generally satisfactory solution will be found in the near future. There is little indication that there will be soon a decrease in pressure for "fair" prices for raw material exports.

SCOPE OF UNITED NATIONS ACTION

(It is intended that this paper examine the persistent stress and strain in the UN that seems to have arisen from varying national conceptions of what is the scope of UN action. It is not intended that the paper do more than throw into bold relief the major matters that have arisen in the UN as a consequence of conflicting national interests and divergent national construction of Charter Articles, both affecting scope of UN action).

HOW QUESTION ARISES

When determining its attitude towards the question of whether or not a matter should be brought to the UN, an interested state asks itself in the first place whether its broad national interest would be advanced thereby. Determination of such interest involves weighing a varying combination of political and moral considerations, and in cases such as the Kashmir dispute between India and Pakistan such considerations have governed the decision to bring them into the UN.

But decision on the question of whether or not a matter should be brought to the UN is often further influenced by another factor, namely, the question of whether the UN has competence under the Charter to deal with it. Does the UN have competence to discuss it? If so, does it also have competence to make recommendations, provide for investigations, issue binding orders, et cetera? This is a question of construction of such Charter provisions as Article 2(7) which prohibits intervention in matters of domestic jurisdiction, Article 107 which prevents the UN invalidating or precluding action vis-à-vis ex-enemy states taken by the governments responsible, or Article 73 which relates to obligations of UN members with respect to colonial areas not under trusteeship. Mention in this paper of specific cases of national attitudes or positions on competence is merely by way of illustration of their divergency and regardless of the degree of their soundness.

When an interested state has decided that submission of a matter to the UN is in its broad national interest it tends to construe competence of the UN broadly. On the other hand, a state viewing such submission as detrimental to its broad national interest tends to urge a narrow construction of competence. The two questions, i.e., that of the political considerations, and that of legal competence under the Charter, which determine national attitudes towards the contents of UN agendas, are logically distinct; but in practice they influence each other, successive decisions for or against inscription tending to harden into a pattern which states in time may look upon as a rule.

STRESS AND STRAIN IN THE UNITED NATIONS

The question of scope of UN action has arisen in most acute form in the sometimes overlapping fields broadly denominated colonial and human rights problems, relatively new ones for international action.* Examples of colonial problems are the 1947-9 dispute over Netherlands actions in Indonesia, and French actions in Morocco and Tunisia in 1951-2. Examples of human rights problems are the two Indian-inspired complaints against the South African racial system now known as "apartheid", attempts to give legal status through treaties to certain proclaimed rights, and disregard for such rights in satellite, ex-enemy states. In related areas the problem of UN authority to review compliance by administering powers with Article 73 has created substantial conflicts between administering and non-administering powers, an illustration being an attempt in UN bodies to assert competence to review judgment by an administering power (Netherlands) that a given territory (Surinam) had achieved self-government and therefore no longer fell under the purview of the Article. The recent notification to the UN by the US of its decision to cease reporting on Puerto Rico because the latter had obtained self-government may spur non-administering powers to assert competence to review that decision too.

Over the years colonial problems have tended to divide the UN roughly into several groups, the general and somewhat flexible delimitations of which are about as follows:

- 1) a group of states emerged from colonial status (the Arab-Asian-African states with predominantly colored populations, and usually most if not all Latin American states), together with the Soviet bloc when it hoped thereby to create trouble in and among non-Soviet states, and in early UN years occasionally the US;
- 2) a group constituted of the European colonial states, sometimes also the Commonwealth states, and sometimes the US; and
- 3) a group constituted of sometimes the US, the Scandinavian states, and occasionally some Commonwealth, Latin American, and other states.

Votes on some human rights matters, such as the South African racial problem, and self-determination, have tended to divide the UN into groupings roughly similar to those on many colonial and economic development problems. On the other hand, when it came to voting on the Universal Declaration, no states voted against, only the Soviet bloc, South Africa and Saudi Arabia abstained, and only two countries, Honduras and Yemen, were absent. On the matter of alleged violations of human rights by satellite states the dividing lines took a Cold War tinge with neutralist Arab-Asian states abstaining. In general, the Soviet bloc abstained on the Universal Declaration, supported UN action when designed to extend human rights outside the Soviet bloc, and invoked Charter Article 2(7) against attempts to deal with such rights within the Soviet bloc.

POLICIES OF THE UNITED STATES

Guided by its traditional inclination to espouse the cause of any people seeking either self-government, if not independence, or human rights and fundamental freedoms, the US in practice has confronted, when such matters have been placed before the UN, one or another of two dilemmas: (1) either to join those (anti-colonial) states seeking UN action to advance towards self-government, if not independence, and also those seeking to utilize the UN to exercise authoritative supervision over administering powers, thereby incurring the ill-will of its most important NATO partners in the anti-Soviet coalition, or to join the administering powers, thereby disappointing anti-colonial states and peoples; and (2) either to join those seeking through UN programs to create legal obligations in the field of human rights, thereby arousing forceful opposition within the US in the form, for example, of the proposed Bricker amendment to the Constitution, or to oppose creation of such obligations and disappoint other elements in the US as well as those peoples and states seeking to utilize the treaty process in the UN. In either case sizeable political forces have been operative and we have had to choose where lie our own interests.

The US began its activity in the UN with a policy that encouraged efforts to bring before the UN a great variety of matters, including colonial and human rights questions. This was an expression of the so-called "sound growth" doctrine. The doctrine, practically all of which was officially enunciated by Ambassador Austin, Chairman of the US Delegation at the opening of the second part of the first session of the GA in 1946, postulated that members of the UN would not lightly disregard or flout recommendations by the GA which expressed the will of an alert and aroused world public opinion; that the organization could discuss anything within its scope particularly as defined by Articles 10, 11, and 14; that mere discussion of any matter within the scope of the Charter could clarify issues and promote mutual understanding among nations and peoples and did not constitute "intervention" under Article 2(7); that under the broad and flexible constitution of the Charter, which the US wished to develop, there would be a great and expanding area of operations for the GA, as functions which the Charter had not specifically provided for, but which it did not preclude, would be entrusted to the Assembly by the Member States; that Assembly recommendations, particularly under Articles 10, 11, 13, and 14, could greatly extend and develop the rule of law among nations provided its recommendations were such that they could be generally accepted and carried out by the Member States; and that the US must not prejudice free discussion by its vote on the question of inclusion of a matter on an agenda.

In practice the US has maintained with undiminished vigor the theses both that the GA was competent to discuss anything within the broad scope set forth in Charter Article 10, and that such discussion did not constitute "intervention" within the meaning of Article 2(7) of the Charter. Moreover, the US from the beginning has tried to prevent disputes about application of Article 2(7) from being brought to decisions, preferring that future development of the UN not be frozen at too early a date. The US feels that UN actions in competence matters taken together constitute a body of precedents interpreting Articles 2(7) and 107. Through such a policy the US has sought primarily to retain fluidity in areas, such as in the Tunisian and Moroccan cases, where taking of fixed positions would have been a grave political handicap; moreover, it has also sought thereby not only to avoid aligning itself on either side of highly-charged controversies dividing groups of states whose friendship is of great importance to the US, but also to reduce friction between adversaries by shifting the terms of dispute from the level of legal absolutism to that of political accommodation.

On the other hand, while firmly maintaining the doctrine of practically unrestricted competence under the Charter of the UN to discuss matters, the US on numerous occasions at least since early 1947 has exercised an eclecticism with regard to inscription of matters on UN agendas. Especially marked has been the concern shown by the US about the appropriate scope of UN action since the Arab-Asian states coalesced at the 6th GA to give dynamic force to anti-colonial measures. A number of weighty considerations have determined the US attitude towards the contents of agendas, of which the matter of competence under the Charter is only one; examples of others are: (1) the need to maintain security in the free world; (2) the desire to maintain unity in the free world; (3) the desire to take action most suitable to solution of a given problem; and (4) the desire to preserve through proper use of the UN (and its various organs) its long-run effectiveness as an instrument of US foreign policy.

US policy makers have judged that submission of a number of cases to the UN would be either premature or otherwise inexpedient; but when other states nevertheless brought them to the UN the US eventually voted for inscription. Examples of such cases are: Palestine (1947), Morocco and Tunisia (1951-2), Iranian oil (1951), and Nationalist Chinese troops in Burma (1952-3). Moreover, in certain instances, e.g., military aid to Greece and Turkey, and Marshall Plan aid, the US has chosen to act outside the UN. On the other hand, in certain cases, e.g., Berlin blockade, German unification, Austrian peace treaty, where we have thought it important that the UN act, we have initiated or supported such action notwithstanding challenges from the Soviet bloc that the proposed actions would be "illegal", i.e., beyond the legal competence of the UN. Likewise, when after 18 months the US and USSR had failed to work out an arrangement on Korea, the US in perplexity disburdened upon the UN the problem of creating and establishing an independent Korean state. With regard to both Korea and Palestine, the UN made recommendations for political settlements which the UN itself could not carry out by peaceful means in view of both opposition by parties most affected and of its own constitutional limitations.

RECENT ATTITUDES OF OTHER STATES

Illustrations of recent positions on legal competence taken by important Member States or groups of states can be culled from the 7th GA. At that session the French were adamant in refusing to recognize legal competence to any degree in the matters of Morocco and Tunisia. The UK supported the French contention. Moreover, it declared that such obligations as it had towards its dependent areas were limited to those set forth in Article 73, and that it would disregard any attempt to read into Article 73 greater powers for the UN than already appeared there explicitly. The Pakistan delegate, supporting the Indian case against South Africa, urged Member States in effect to overlook any legal limitations set forth by Article 2(7) in the interest of achieving certain objectives in Africa during 1952, the "year of revolution" there. Indonesia also supported the Indian case and Pakistani appeal.† Other states, such as the US, voted for the resolution finally adopted by the GA concerning the treatment of Indians in South Africa as not being inconsistent with the limitations of Article 2(7).

While generally favorable to broad legal competence of the UN, and while generally sympathetic to appeals to limit the scope of Article 2(7), many Latin American states, mindful of their traditional fear of foreign intervention within their own frontiers, drew a line in their main policy speeches in the South African debate against UN action extending to on-the-spot bodies.

As is well known, the USSR considers all institutions, including the UN, as mere instruments for possible misuse in execution of its foreign policies; and it determines its every action in the UN solely on the basis of how it can best promote its own narrow national interests

†However, when the shoe had been on the other foot, as in the cases of the revolt of the Moluccan Republic (Ambon) against Indonesia, and the attempt by Hyderabad to establish its autonomy vis-à-vis India, both Indonesia and India declared in effect that the UN was not competent and proceeded by armed action to extinguish the fires of revolt. [Footnote in the source text.]

thereby, generally by trying to exacerbate differences between states in the non-Soviet world.

TRENDS

Positions of certain countries are hardening on the issue of appropriate scope of UN action, a fact placing in bolder relief the earlier-described dilemmas that the US confronts. Most notable examples of the trend are:

- 1) The Arab-Asian-African and Latin American states probably will persist and perhaps even intensify their efforts to utilize the UN to hasten changes in the colonial and human rights fields, in great part by insistence on a broad construction of competence of the UN Charter;
- 2) The administering powers probably will continue to insist on a narrow construction of competence under the Charter on colonial matters; and
- 3) The US probably will continue to reject UN programs to create legal obligations in the field of human rights.

Annex A

SPECIFIC CASES IN THE COLONIAL FIELD INVOLVING THE SCOPE OF UNITED NATIONS ACTION

A. NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES ISSUES (CH. XI OF THE CHARTER)

1. Cessation of transmission of information on a non-self-governing Territory, to the United Nations under Article 73 (e) of the Charter.

The question is whether a decision by an administering Member to cease transmitting information to the UN on one of its territories as a result of a change in the territory's constitutional status is subject to review by, and possibly even the approval of, the GA. The general question has been the subject of much discussion by the GA, and two specific cases will be before the next GA, namely the decision of the Netherlands to cease transmitting information on Surinam and the Antilles, and the decision of the US to cease transmitting information on Puerto Rico. Both governments have held that the decision rests solely with them. Many members, however, contend that the responsibility for such decisions is held jointly by the administering member concerned and the GA.

2. Factors indicating whether a territory is or is not fully self-governing (i.e. whether or not it falls within the scope of Chapter XI)

The question is whether in drawing up criteria indicative of whether a territory is or is not fully self-governing, the GA can make, or share in, a determination as to the territories that fall within the scope of Chapter XI. This matter arose most recently at the 7th GA which adopted a resolution (648 (VII) which indicated that the GA would share in such determinations. Among the 15 Members voting against this resolution were the eight administering authorities, including the US. While the US has taken the position that the GA has the authority to discuss and attempt to define a non-self-governing territory (i.e. one falling within the scope of Chapter XI) and to recommend to administering members generally the consideration of any definition it might adopt, the US also considers that each administering member has sole responsibility for determining the constitutional position and status of territories under its sovereignty, as well as for decisions regarding reporting on them under Article 73 (e).

6. Transmission of political information on non-self-governing territories to the United Nations.

The question is whether in view of the exclusion of political information from the categories of information to be transmitted under Article 73 (e), the Assembly should nevertheless recommend that such information be transmitted. Although the US itself has submitted on a voluntary basis information on government in relation to its territories, it has been the policy of the US to oppose proposals by UN bodies recommending that such information be transmitted by administering states. The more conservative administering members have held that recommendations of this kind had the effect of imposing on the administering members obligations additional to those assumed by them when they signed the Charter. The non-administering members, however, have taken the view that recommendations by the GA in this field were proper, and that the use of the word "voluntarily" in them ensures that there is no imposition of additional obligations. Such a resolution was adopted by the Assembly at its Seventh Session. Resolution 637 B on self-determination recommends to the administering authorities that they voluntarily include in the information transmitted by them under Article 73 (e) certain political information indicating the extent to which the right of self-determination is exercised by the peoples of their territories.

7. Accepting petitions from and sending of visiting missions to non-self-governing territories.

While the Charter contains provisions for accepting petitions from and sending visiting missions to trust territories, it contains no such provisions with regard to the non-self-governing territories under the sovereignty of Member States. At the earlier sessions of the GA a number of efforts were made, particularly by the USSR, to apply these elements of UN supervision to non-self-governing territories. While such proposals attracted support from some of the more extreme non-administering Members, they have always been defeated by substantial majorities. The US has taken the position that such proposals went far beyond the intention of the framers of the Charter and has opposed the expansion of the obligations in Chapter XI to include obligations not stated therein. There appears to have been general acceptance of existing limitations in this field, as indicated by the absence of proposals such as those referred to above during the last two sessions of the Assembly. In particular, although there was considerable controversy over the renewal of the Committee on Non-Self-Governing Territories at the Seventh Session, no effort was made to enlarge its terms of reference.

8. Participation of indigenous inhabitants of non-self-governing territories, in the work of the Committee on Information from non-self-governing territories.

The question is whether the Assembly, having established a Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, should alter its character by making provision for inhabitants of the territories to participate in its work. This question arose at the Sixth and Seventh GAs and a resolution was adopted at the latter by a vote of 43-11-4 inviting the administering authorities to make possible the participation of "qualified indigenous representatives from non-self-governing territories", in the work of the Committee inviting the Committee "to study further the question of direct participation in its discussion . . . of representatives" of the more advanced territories. The US, along with the other administering members, voted against this resolution because it appeared to embody the concept of "dual representation" i.e. representation for the inhabitants of non-self-governing territories distinct from the representation of the UN members responsible for their administration. However, the US and some other administering members have indicated willingness to provide for closer association of indigenous inhabitants of non-self-governing territories with the work of the UN in this field by attaching suitably qualified inhabitants of their territories to their delegations to the Committee, and some, including the US, have on occasion done so.

B. TRUSTEESHIP AND RELATED ISSUES (CHS. XII & XIII OF THE CHAPTER)

1. The placing of League of Nations mandates under the Trusteeship System.

The question is whether Member states administering League of Nations mandates are under an obligation to place such territories under the UN Trusteeship System. This question has been debated in the UN since the First General Assembly (1946) in connection with the obligations of the Union of South Africa, the only mandated Territory which has not either achieved independence or been placed under trusteeship. The International Court of Justice, which was asked for an advisory opinion on this matter, held that, while the Union was not obligated to place South West Africa under trusteeship, the mandate continued to exist and the Union was accountable to the UN to the same extent it had been accountable to the League. The Union, while not accepting the Court's opinion, has carried on discussions with a UN committee with a view to reaching agreement as to some form of international supervision of South West Africa; however, no agreement has thus far been reached. The US, while favoring implementation of the Court's opinion, has opposed resolutions recommending or favoring trusteeship for South West Africa.

2. The granting of oral hearings regarding the question of South West Africa.

The question is whether the Assembly should grant hearings to individuals wishing to be heard on the question of South West Africa. This question is considered a special case, particularly in the light of the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice on South West Africa, wherein the Court held that, "the degree of supervision to be exercised by the GA should not exceed that which applied under the Mandates System and should conform as far as possible to the procedure followed . . . by the Council of the League of Nations". As the Council did not grant oral hearings to individuals on mandates matters, it has been held that hearings on South West Africa should not be granted by the GA. However, the question has arisen at a number of Assembly sessions and hearings have been granted to the Herero Chiefs from South West Africa (who have not in fact appeared before the Assembly) and to the Rev. Michael Scott as their representative (who has appeared).

3. The participation of indigenous inhabitants of trust territories in the work of the Trusteeship Council.

The question is whether the Assembly should attempt to alter the character of the Trusteeship Council by recommending that indigenous inhabitants of trust territories participate in its work. This question arose at the Sixth and Seventh GAs, and a resolution was adopted at the Seventh Session endorsing a Trusteeship Council resolution "expressing the hope that the administering authorities would find it appropriate to associate suitably qualified indigenous inhabitants of trust territories in the work of Trusteeship Council as a part of their delegations or in any other manner they deem desirable". In this resolution the GA also expressed the opinion that the objects of its previous resolution on this subject (Res. 554 (VI)) "would be better achieved through the active participation of members of the indigenous population of the trust territories in the government of those territories and in the work of the Trusteeship Council". Except for this somewhat vague expression of opinion, this resolution does not embody the concept of "dual representation" referred to in paragraph A 8. above. Consequently only one administering member (Belgium) voted against it; four abstained, and three (including the US) voted for it. In the view of the US no alteration in the character of the Council was involved but only increased opportunity for contacts between the Council and the inhabitants of the territories by means of fuller use of existing machinery.

4. The granting of oral hearings to inhabitants of trust territories by the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly.

The question is whether the Assembly should as a rule leave the hearing of trust territory inhabitants in the first instance to the Trusteeship Council. This question might be considered as one of the voluntary limitations on GA action in the interests of orderly procedure. The Charter (Art. 87) provides that the GA ("and, under its authority, the Trusteeship Council") may carry out the functions of the UN in relation to trust territories. While the details of UN supervision have generally been left to the Council, the Assembly has become increasingly dissatisfied with the Council and tended to undertake certain aspects of UN supervision itself. One consequence of this tendency was the granting by the Seventh Assembly's Fourth Committee of hearings to every group of petitioners from the trust territories seeking to be heard (11 groups), without regard for the merits of each case, or whether the Council had had an opportunity to deal with it, or even, in some cases, knowledge of the subject to be discussed. While several members, including some non-administering members, voiced the need for a more orderly procedure, no action was taken. However, the US and certain other administering members favored hearings by the Fourth Committee only when the Assembly felt that petitioners had not been adequately dealt with in hearings before the Council.

5. Competence of the Advisory Council of Somaliland

The Trusteeship Agreement for Somaliland provides for a 3-member Advisory Council to aid and advise the administering authority. While certain of its functions are set forth in the agreement, its competence in certain other regards is not defined. Perhaps the most difficult such matter relates to the right of the Advisory Council to deal with petitions presented to them in the territory. Certain members of the Advisory Council, particularly the representative of the Philippines have in the past sought to establish the right of the Advisory Council to deal officially with petitions. The administering members of the UN, including the US, have opposed delegation to the Advisory Council by the Assembly of any of the authority to deal with petitions granted only to it and the Trusteeship Council in the Charter. The representative of the Philippines, who raised this matter at the Seventh Assembly, did not present a formal proposal, and it is understood that his successor on the Advisory Council is less likely to pursue the matter.

6. Appointment to subsidiary organs of the Trusteeship Council of non-members of the Council.

The question is whether the Assembly should alter the character of the Council (including the violation of the principle of balanced composition), by favoring inclusion of non-Council members in subsidiary organs of the Council. This question arose at the 6th GA, where a resolution to the above effect was defeated. The administering members including the US held that this resolution violated the spirit of the Charter, particularly in so far as it affected the balanced character of the Trusteeship Council. While the resolution was defeated it was indicative of the pressure of non-administering members for an expanded role in trusteeship matters.

7. Administrative Unions between trust territories and neighboring colonial territories.

The trusteeship agreements for a number of trust territories authorize the administering authority to constitute these territories into customs, fiscal or administrative unions with one or more of its neighboring colonies. A number of non-administering members of the UN have been concerned lest such administrative unions be operated in a manner which might frustrate the achievement of the objectives of the Trusteeship System for these trust territories. They have thus sought to place these unions under continual UN scrutiny. The administering members on the other hand, have contended that the trust territories derived considerable benefit from participation in administrative unions and that they would in fact achieve the objectives of the Trusteeship System more rapidly because of such participation. The US has taken the position that while there were advantages to be derived from participation in administrative unions, the UN had a legitimate concern in keeping careful watch over their operation. Suspicious as to the operation of certain administrative unions (as well as of the status of the French Trust Territories in the French Union) led to the introduction by certain non-administering members at the 7th GA of a resolution which would have referred to the International Court of Justice the question of the compatibility of existing administrative unions with the Charter and the Trusteeship Agreements. Subsequently, however, this resolution, presumably for political reasons, was withdrawn.

ADMISSION OF NEW MEMBERS INTO THE UNITED NATIONS

CHARACTER OF THE ISSUE

The Cold War has come to predominate the matter of admission of new members, although Charter considerations have also been an important factor. The matter has been deadlocked in reality since 1946 because the USSR has persistently used its veto power in the SC against all except a carefully selected few non-Soviet candidates for admission, while the five Soviet candidates have never received seven favorable SC votes. Moreover, among Member States outside the Soviet bloc there are various positions vis-à-vis the influence which Cold War considerations and the criteria established by Charter Article 4 should have in determining decisions on admission to membership.

BACKGROUND

Article 4 declares that membership in the UN is open to all "peace-loving states which accept the obligations contained in the present Charter and, in the judgment of the Organization, are able and willing to carry out these obligations", upon "a decision of the General Assembly upon recommendation of the Security Council".* At San Francisco the founders formulated Article 4 with the intent of achieving qualified universality; but the requirement that the SC approve all applications has permitted the USSR to frustrate achievement of the goal.

Although as originally conceived the UN was destined to become practically, if not wholly, a universal organization, one where every state would have a voice, early dissipation of the "one-world" concept as a result of Soviet foreign policy, and its replacement by the Cold War, gave to the question of membership an entirely different turn than originally conceived. While the free world has taken its stand on sound Charter grounds against admission of Soviet-favored applicants, the fact that they were indeed Soviet bloc members, plus the fact that the USSR has indiscriminately vetoed non-Soviet bloc applicants, have made of the membership question one of the several facets of the Cold War as waged in the UN. An examination of rosters† of both the nine states admitted to and the nineteen rejected for membership, discloses the strong influence of the Cold War; moreover, in the light of the criteria of Article 4 the majority of free world states has found it impossible to approve admission of Soviet satellites. The nine applicants with regard to whom the USSR forebore to exercise its veto are those states where the USSR apparently hoped for or expected at least neutralist tendencies, engendered by either strong revulsion from colonialism in the cases of Arab-Asian applicants, or strong post-war local Communist parties in the cases of Iceland, Israel, and Sweden.

* The International Court of Justice has given two advisory opinions on Article 4. In the first, it said that a Member, while recognizing that a state fulfills the conditions of Article 4, cannot subject its favorable vote on the admission of that state to the additional condition that other states be admitted simultaneously. In the second, the Court advised that the General Assembly cannot admit a state in the absence of a favorable SC recommendation. [Footnote in the source text.]

The USSR has used its veto 28 times to block the admission of 14 of the 19 rejectees, all 14 of which the GA has determined to be qualified. The remaining 5 rejectees, all Soviet-sponsored, have neither received the seven votes required for an SC recommendation, nor been found qualified by the GA. Besides the 19 rejectees, the North Korean and Vietminh regimes have submitted communications purporting to be membership applications. In recent years the Soviet Union has proposed that nine ‡ of the non-Soviet applicants be admitted simultaneously with the five Soviet-sponsored candidates, always making clear, however, that it would continue to use its veto to block admission of the non-Soviet applicants unless its own candidates were also admitted.

The majority, including the US, on the SC has not accepted the Soviet package deal proposal, and as the USSR has persisted in vetoing non-Soviet applicants individually, the membership question has remained deadlocked. The GA repeatedly has requested that the veto not be used on membership applications, and that members base their votes exclusively on the conditions contained in Charter Article 4; but the USSR has ignored the requests.

The large majority of UN members have become ever more concerned with the stalemate, and the Seventh Session of the GA established a Special Committee to review the problem and report to the Eighth Session. To end the deadlock various proposals have been made in the UN, some (Latin American ideas) designed to have the GA take independent action to admit applicants vetoed by the Soviet Union, and others (principally supported by Scandinavian and Arab-Asian members) designed to give effect now to the principle of universality by admitting a large number of applicants, both Soviet and non-Soviet, under existing procedures. Moreover, within the US Government consideration has been given to amendment of Article 4, and also to the matter of non-voting participation in the GA for applicants excluded by Soviet veto.

UNITED STATES POLICIES

The US started its activities in the UN by advocating the thesis of universal membership as the ultimate goal, in 1946 even announcing readiness to overlook certain doubts about qualifications under Article 4 of Albania and Outer Mongolia and vainly proposing that all eight applicants § at that time be admitted en bloc. However, upon realization that its proposal would not be accepted, the US withdrew it and voted against the Albanian and Mongolian applications. Since then the US has followed a policy of exclusion of Soviet satellite states on the ground that they did not qualify under Article 4 of the Charter as "peaceloving" states able and willing to carry out their obligations under the Charter. But other equally important factors have been the fears that admission of these states would: (1) place upon their Communist puppet regimes seals of approbation undesirable for a variety of reasons, including possible discouragement of populations still looking with hope to the West; (2) increase Soviet obstructive capabilities in the UN; (3) be opposed by strong domestic congressional and popular opinions, and (4) create an encouragement, through admission of Outer Mongolia, for the USSR to create other sham states along its periphery.

While favoring admission of all non-Soviet applicants, the US has strongly condemned the recent Soviet package proposal as: 1) contrary to the Charter principle, supported by an ICJ opinion, that each applicant should be considered separately on its own merits, and 2) including 5 unqualified applicants while omitting other and fully qualified ones. With respect to the veto, the US has repeatedly announced that, while it would not veto any application which had received seven or more votes in the SC, it regards a recommendation on admission to be a substantive question, hence subject to veto. However, the US has not yet had to face giving practical effect to this policy because no Soviet satellite has yet received in the SC as many as seven votes.

SOME MAJOR DIFFICULTIES CONFRONTING THE UNITED STATES

The US desires very much to obtain admission of Japan, Italy, and other states; and their governments strongly desirous of membership have repeatedly pressed the US for aid in overcoming their frustration. Under existing membership procedures, a political settlement providing for admission of a large number of applicants, both Soviet and non-Soviet, might be the only way to achieve their admission.

§ Afghanistan, Albania, Eire, Iceland, Outer Mongolia, Portugal, Sweden, and Trans-Jordan. [Footnote in the source text.]

Some other arguments that are made in favor of such settlement are:

- 1) Because the UN was conceived to become eventually a universal organization, continuation of the membership stalemate builds up an atmosphere of depression and frustration in the UN;
- 2) A substantial increase in membership should add to the prestige of the UN, especially as, becoming more nearly universally representative, its actions would acquire greater moral sanction;
- 3) Soviet bloc states, having accepted Charter obligations, could be made more accountable if inside rather than outside the UN; and
- 4) Admission of Soviet bloc states would bring some benighted Communists into touch with non-Communist ways and ideas, and conceivably might also strengthen the position of domestic elements in those states opposed to Moscow domination.

Some of the arguments that are made against such settlement are:

- 1) Willingness to admit further Soviet bloc states might make it more difficult to maintain support for the US position on Chinese representation;
- 2) Admission of further Soviet satellites without solid concessions by the USSR in the field of its contentions with the US would be inconsonant with the general policy laid down by the President in his speech April 16, 1953.
- 3) Admission of further Soviet bloc states might be interpreted as tacit acquiescence by the UN in their present status, and might have an unfortunate effect upon the peoples in these states opposed to the present regimes;
- 4) The admission of Outer Mongolia would serve to give some sanction to Soviet efforts to organize Asia into pseudo-"states";
- 5) It probably would be impossible to obtain Soviet agreement to admit all of the states which in the view of the US should be included in any agreement, viz, Republic of Korea;
- 6) A reapplication of Article 4 so as to bring within the UN all current applicants would provoke strong and even outraged opposition from substantial elements of the population and certain members of Congress; and
- 7) A reapplication of Article 4 might appear to the Soviet Government and others as confirmation of the proposition that persistent efforts can eventually overcome strong US objections in principle.

The (Latin American) proposals to override or ignore the Soviet veto in the UN would achieve admission for most, if not all applicants that we favor; but the majority of UN members including the US have believed that the proposals are contrary to the Charter. Furthermore, there are fears that adoption of such proposals might both lead to eventual infringement of US interests in the veto, and also provoke the USSR to withhold participation in, if not withdraw from, the UN.

ATTITUDES OF CERTAIN STATES

UK-France—These states have publicly opposed, but less forcefully than the US, a political settlement; and in the past in private discussions have indicated greater disposition than the US to explore the possibilities of a political settlement. Although expanding UN concern with colonial problems in recent years has restrained France from favoring admission of all pending applicants, most of which would vote against colonial interests, there has been a recent slight indication of renewed French interest in re-examining the problem of en bloc admission.

Latin American States—These states have tended to favor proposals to circumvent the Soviet veto to admit non-Soviet applicants, especially Italy; but with several exceptions they have favored exclusion of further Soviet applicants. However, many Latin American states might accept a package deal, especially if the US changed its position in order to favor one.

Arab-Asian States—Most of these states favor universality, as well as a political settlement making possible admission of both Soviet and non-Soviet applicants. Generally, they view the membership problem apart from the Cold War; and, overlooking the preeminent role of the US in that struggle, are inclined to blame the US for the stalemate.

Canada—Recently Canada has indicated that it considers the Membership question to be political in character, suggesting a willingness to weigh a package deal.

Scandinavia—Scandinavian Member States have generally favored universality, and, moreover, have felt that Europe is heavily under-represented in the UN. They would acquiesce in additional Soviet bloc members in order to enlarge European representation by admission of a substantial group of non-Soviet European states.

China—This state probably might veto any recommendation of an application by Outer Mongolia.

TRENDS

The US can expect strong pressure at the 8th GA to break the membership stalemate through either direct GA action in favor of selected applicants and regardless of SC action, or political agreement directed to admission of a large number of applicants, both Soviet and non-Soviet. Most likely interest will center on the latter alternative. Moreover, the intensified Soviet peace offensive will serve to increase the pressure especially if material progress is made towards resolving other Cold War matters.

INTERNATIONAL SECRETARIATS

CHARACTER OF THE ISSUE

The international organizations which have developed since World War II are served by secretariats whose relationships to national governments have posed major problems for the United States. Some have been posed in terms of the political neutrality of the secretariat as an institution. Others have centered on the question of the loyalty to this country of US nationals employed on the secretariats. The philosophy which this nation adopted at the outset toward the role of the secretariats and their personnel has been significantly affected by the bipolarization of the world in the Cold War; current problems of individual loyalties have thrown into relief the fundamental issues which are involved. The two principal issues are taken up separately below:

A. Role of the Secretariat

1. Statement of Issue

The basic question regarding the role and functions of the secretariats is whether they should act only at the official direction of the political bodies representing the member governments, or whether they should have latitude for the exercise of independent initiative. The conflict for us is between a) our desire to create in the secretariats effective and vigorous instruments to forward the objectives of the organizations, and b) our displeasure with abuses which arise when secretariats assume excessive initiative. As a practical proposition, we are somewhat caught between a) our desire to minimize undesirable initiatives sponsored by unfriendly or irresponsible governments, which tend to encourage excessive secretariat initiative, and b) our own encouragement of certain initiatives by secretariat employees on our behalf, to serve immediate interests which we feel to be at stake.

While constitutional provisions vary from agency to agency, the international secretariats were in general conceived as agents of the organizations' governing bodies composed of member states. But certain circumstances have made it possible for the secretariats to exercise an increasingly effective influence over program development. This is especially true of the specialized agencies, such as UNESCO and WHO, which do not have governmental review boards meeting between conferences. The factors responsible for this trend are: a) the existence of rather well-defined and continuous institutional objectives or purposes which the secretariat can promote independently, b) strong personal leadership on the part of the secretary or the director-general, c) infrequency of and shortness of meetings of governmental bodies, d) lack of coordination of national policy from international agency to international agency, particularly with respect to the smaller nations, but generally a problem except in the Anglo-American bloc, e) inability of many governments to cope with the great volume of reports and papers prepared by the secretariats on issues before the Assemblies or Conference, with the result that often their delegations are neither briefed nor instructed on these issues and are easy prey to the lobbying of members of the Secretariat who are skilled in playing upon prejudices, ambitions and hopes, f) the fact that the US and others have actively encouraged the agencies' executive officers to take the initiative in promoting policies which we or others deem desirable and which have greater chance of success if not openly sponsored by the US.

3. United States Policies

For obvious reasons the US plays a role of primus inter pares in many international organizations. Beyond this, however, because we have the heaviest financial interest which can only be served through close attention to financial, personnel, and administrative matters in all agencies, we have taken a strong leadership role on organizational questions in the Assemblies and Conferences, and in fact have found this responsibility to be inescapable even when it would be expedient to play a passive role.

4. Difficulties Facing the United States

In many cases, US policy has been furthered as a result of secretariat initiative, particularly on technical matters, both program and administrative, where American techniques excel, and where competent secretariat officials of US nationality have a major role in secretariat planning. Generally speaking, the US has been careful to avoid seeking to influence the thinking of its nationals on secretariats, but as a matter of course, many of them in important positions have maintained a close liaison with the US delegations to their organizations.

On the other hand, particularly in the Specialized Agencies, US policy, in an increasing number of cases, has run head-on into secretariat "policy", often on matters of coordination between the UN agencies, and recently on the size of the agencies' budgets. Other heavy financial contributors, such as the United Kingdom, the Commonwealth countries, and many Western European countries, are usually persuaded by the same arguments of logic and economy which move us. Support for secretariat requests for general budget increases and for specific programs which seem to us undesirable usually forms around delegations of countries such as India, Egypt, and other underdeveloped countries who desire the proposed services, distrust the US, and are seeking to establish their own prestige.

B. Conduct and Integrity of Staff Members

1. Statement of Issue

The paramount question of the moment in this field, the answers to which will doubtless affect significantly the broader issue, is: a) how to ensure that international organizations select employees whose qualifications and integrity, as judged by their country of nationality, meets a sufficiently high standard to maintain the confidence of that country in the organization as a whole; b) how to achieve this without sacrificing the degree of independence conferred on the administrative heads in the charters and constitutions of the various organizations, which characteristically enjoin them to appoint persons who will serve only the interests of the organizations as a whole and not the exclusive interests of any one government.

2. Background

Experience with the League of Nations secretariat led the large majority of governments* to conclude in 1945 that the interests of the new international organizations, and thus the interest of all member states, would best be secured if the secretariat personnel were oriented to a postulated "general interest" rather than to the particular interests of individual member states. Consequently, the charters and constitutions of all the UN agencies placed the responsibility for selection of personnel with the chief administrative officer, and reflected the expectation that international officials were to discharge their functions and regulate their conduct in accordance with the "general interest" (of the international organization). Thus such officials were enjoined not to receive instructions from any government in the performance of their duties.

3. United States Policies

The US interpreted its obligations under the charters and constitutions of the various organizations as requiring it to follow a "hands-off" policy with regard to influencing the selection of personnel. In a few instances US officials informally supplied information and advice upon request, but the US scrupulously avoided governmental representations that might be regarded as pressure upon the agency heads.

By 1949 information reaching the Department of State indicated that in some instances US personnel appointed by the UN agencies had a record of Communist or Communist-front activities which cast grave reflection both on their basic loyalty to the US and on their integrity and ability to fulfill their fundamental obligations to serve the purposes and principles of the organization. Among the specialized agencies, UNESCO presented the major problem. Since UNESCO's appointment procedures provide for consultation with member governments and national commissions on professional posts, the Department was able to advise it when it had derogatory information concerning US nationals considered for employment.

In the case of the UN, a secret arrangement was entered into whereby the Secretary General submitted the names of US nationals for a US "name check", and the Department reported to the Secretary General on persons it believed to be Communist or under Communist discipline. As opportunity permitted, the Secretary General was to ease out persons so identified. This arrangement continued in operation in the UN until January 1953, at which time Executive Order 10422 was issued, following a reexamination of policy stimulated by various US investigations. This authorized arrangements to be made with the international organizations which would enable the US to conduct complete loyalty investigations on all US nationals employed or considered for employment in such agencies and report its findings to the head of the organization.

The problem of national "loyalty" is distinct from that of the impartiality of international civil servants. The latter, a matter of professional detachment in the presence of conflicting national interests and emotions, has been envisaged, since San Francisco, on the tacit assumption that international officials are generally people of good will, whose integrity as international servants is the outgrowth of loyal service in the national community.

The significance of the step recently taken by the US and the UN lay in the fact that while previously a "loyal" attitude of American employees—if not to the cause of international cooperation, at least to their homeland—was taken for granted, by the late 1940s awareness had become general that American communists must be suspected as potentially, if not actually disloyal to their country, and likely to engage in subversive activities; potentially hostile to international causes not dominated by communists; and without common bonds of public faith connecting them with the structure and fabric of their own society and environment or any society and environment dedicated to the preservation of peace.

The problem of communists was in the center of a general trend toward bipolarization of conflicts in the world and thus in the UN. In the face of this conflict, the force of United States opinion required that civic integrity be reaffirmed as the foundation for any attachment to a "general interest" symbolized by international organization.

The developing situation had by 1951 led the US to alter its original doctrine regarding international secretariats in the case of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Here US nationals not only are security cleared, but are carried on the US foreign service rolls and loaned on a reimbursable basis to the organization. Within this limitation the Secretary-General nevertheless continues to exercise the powers of direction, hiring, and firing which are consistent with the executive power. One major purpose in making these particular arrangements for US nationals (they are not applied to other nationals) relates to the salary and taxation problems, discussed in a separate paper.

While NATO represents a special coalition of selected nations sharing a specific and common interest, the experience there will still to a certain extent enable us to judge whether the maintenance of such national employment ties results in any more partiality than we now expect on the part of Americans employed in other secretariats, and whether other member governments will conclude that secretariat employees with such formal ties also serve the general interest satisfactorily.

4. Recent Developments in the United Nations

The Secretary-General on October 20, 1952 appointed a Committee of Jurists† who advised him: a) that the UN should not employ persons engaging or likely to engage in subversive activities against any member state, and b) that he had the power to fire persons on whom the preponderance of evidence convinces him that they fell into such a category. Likewise, c) he was advised not to retain persons who by invoking the Fifth Amendment on questions relating to subversion created doubt as to their fitness for public service. The Jurists strongly held that it was necessary for the power of decision in such matters to reside with the Secretary General, although they recommended that he appoint a panel of advisers to assist him in carrying out his responsibility.

The Secretary General reported to the second part of the 7th GA his intention of generally following these policies, and in the plenary debate the majority view was that the independence of the secretariat required that the Secretary General continue to exercise responsibility for selection of personnel without dictation from governments. There was also general acceptance of the policy that the Secretary General should refrain from employing anyone where the preponderance of evidence indicates that the person is engaging in activities aimed at subverting the government of a member state. In this connection, no government objected to the investigations the US is making under Executive Order 10422, regarding this as a matter between the US citizens and their government.

†E. S. Herbert (UK), William D. Mitchell, (US) and P. Veldekens (Belgium).

There was a wide variation of opinion regarding the policy to be followed by the Secretary General in (1) cases of refusal to testify before officially constituted national agencies investigating subversive activities, (2) cases where the derogatory information relates to conduct which is not such as to constitute evidence of present subversive activity but rather the "likelihood of engaging" in such activity. In addition, many delegations doubted the power of the Secretary General to take termination action in any case that fell short of serious misconduct. As a result of strenuous US efforts, the outcome of the debate was: (1) to defeat a 12-power resolution† the effect of which would have been to deny the Secretary General power to take further action in accordance with his announced policy until the whole matter had been carefully reviewed by a small committee of the Assembly and considered by the Eighth Session, after receiving the report of such a committee; (2) to endorse a proposal of which the US was a co-sponsor that permits the Secretary General to proceed with implementation of his policy but requires him to report further developments to the Eighth Session and requests the comments thereon of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions after consultation with the Specialized Agencies.§

5. Difficulties Facing the United States

US investigations and findings under the recent Executive Orders are related to the question of loyalty to the US Government. The UN and specialized agencies on the other hand are expected to apply a "subversive" standard which must have the same implications for nationals of all member countries.

There is little likelihood of any agency employing a US citizen against whom there is an adverse US "loyalty" finding. The US faces, however, the extremely difficult possibility that the heads of these agencies may, on the basis of their standards, decide to retain a present US employee who has failed to meet the US loyalty test. If we cannot accommodate ourselves to such a situation, if it should arise, we should probably be faced with major and possibly far-reaching policy decisions about our relationships with international organizations and their personnel.

At the 7th GA some other governments privately told us that while endorsing our principle that persons likely to engage in subversive activities should not be employed, they would favor the use of covert rather than overt means to implement it. This was in view of the extreme difficulties they foresaw in carrying out the program, in an organization composed of authoritarian and non-authoritarian states, in such a way as to permit the retention of Free Czechs, Poles, etc. It is apparent that the majority of member states, as indicated in their speeches, continue to attach great importance to maintaining the international character and independence of the Secretariat as the best means of furthering the objectives of the UN and its agencies.

§ While the Assembly took no action to veto the policy followed to date by the Secretary General, it was evident that many delegations desired to await the outcome of cases presently being heard before the Administrative Tribunal (an independent review body to hear appeals against non-observance of the contracts of employment) before determining whether any positive directives should be given by the Assembly. Persons whose cases are now before the Tribunal were terminated by the Secretary General after refusing to answer questions relating to subversion put by the Senate Internal Security Committee. [Footnote in the source text.]

6. Current Status

Arrangements under Executive Order 10422 of January 9, 1953, as amended by President Eisenhower by Executive Order 10459 of June 2, 1953, are well advanced. Forms setting forth the required information have been submitted by about 95% of the Americans on the international secretariats, and others are now being received. There are only 5 cases of UN nationals refusing to fill out the forms. The Department has approached all the organizations to secure informal assurances that they will not employ Americans until investigations have been completed, and satisfactory assurances have been received, with slight exception, from all international agency heads. The principal problem of the moment is that no adjudications are being undertaken pending establishment by the Civil Service Commission of the new review board provided for by Executive Order 10459.

While the Department is proceeding under the Executive Orders, a bill has been introduced in the Senate which would substitute legislation for the executive agreement approach. S. 3 would make it a criminal offense, under penalty of a $10,000 fine or 10 years imprisonment or both, for an American to accept employment with one of the UN agencies without first receiving a certificate of security clearance from the Attorney General. Americans now on the staffs would be subjected to a like penalty if they refused to supply information stipulated in the bill.

Both the Department of State and the Justice Department are on record as recommending that S. 3 not be enacted, on the argument that the Executive Order procedures should be given a fair trial. However, the measure has been approved by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, and has been passed by the Senate on the consent calendar. The House Committee has not scheduled consideration of the measure, although Ambassador Lodge has talked informally with its leaders. It is believed quite likely that, if the legislation is passed, other governments will place such restrictions on the employment of their nationals by the UN that little actual discretion will be left to the Secretary General in personnel matters.

INTER-RELATIONSHIPS OF INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS IN NON-POLITICAL FIELDS

CHARACTER OF ISSUE

Since the end of World War II the US has pursued a number of different paths in the field of international economic and social policy. It has been our stated objective to develop well-coordinated multi-lateral policies for the achievement of our purposes in these areas. To ensure consistency and economy, we have avowedly favored coordinating these policies through the UN. We have applied the same principles to the coordination of economic and social programs within the UN structure itself.

During the same period we have also supported the assumption, by regional and special-purpose organizations outside the UN, of certain economic and social responsibilities which in practice overlap those of the UN.

Without prejudice to the validity of purpose which led us to three different paths—centralization through the UN, regionalism, or ad hoc solutions—a serious issue is nonetheless posed by the widening gap between doctrine and practice in our efforts to achieve consistent and coordinated international economic and social policies.

Given the results of the three different approaches—i.e. the existence of a heterogeneous pattern of UN and non-UN organizations in the economic and social field—a second level of problems arises in day-to-day operations. This includes such questions as: how to exert constructive influence through various organizations; how to achieve consistent US policies in various organizations; how to avoid unnecessary international bureaucratic structure and attendant vested interests; how to mediate between those vested interests on the one hand and requirements of efficiency on the other; how to avoid inefficient competition, overlapping jurisdiction, and duplication among international organizations; how to keep the international structure responsive to changing needs and requirements; and how to justify to Congress and the public the diversity and apparent diffusion of effort to which we are a responsible party.

These problems appear in relationships: a) between the UN and regional organizations, b) among agencies within the UN system, and c) between UN agencies and non-UN technical and specific purpose agencies. Because there are significant differences in the particular manner in which they arise, these three types of relationships are described separately below.

A. Relations of UN with General or Multipurpose Non-UN International (Regional) Organizations

1. Problem

The most difficult problem of relationships among international organizations involves the general purpose regional organizations, independent of or nominally related to the UN, including OAS, NATO, OEEC, the Arab League, Council of Europe, and ANZUS machinery, if it is created. Most of such organizations have been created primarily for general political or security purposes, but there is a persistent tendency to expand their functions into economic and social fields, which has resulted in overlapping jurisdiction and competition with UN bodies and some lack of coordination of policies and operations both among international organizations and within member governments.

2. Background

Several of these regional organizations have been created and others have expanded since the establishment of the UN. The overlapping responsibilities are particularly marked between the UN regional organizations such as ECE and ECLA and the non-UN regional organizations in the same fields such as OEEC and IA-ECOSOC. OAS, the largest of the organizations which antedates the UN, was reorganized in Bogota in 1948, with many of its economic and social functions being increased (although this development has been handicapped by lack of funds and experience). NATO and OEEC were both created under US instigation. By its very nature OEEC overlaps with ECE, both being concerned with European economic problems. Within recent years there has been considerable pressure in NATO to extend its economic and social functions. The Council of Europe is also broadening its economic and social operations.

3. US Policies

US policies toward the proper location or division of responsibility in this field are not clear and seem to follow the direction of betting on all horses or of treating questions on an ad hoc basis without thorough consideration of the effect on overall policy. In many instances yielding to various pressures the US has supported the expansion of economic and social activities in the regional organizations, e.g., OAS and OEEC, while at the same time supporting expansions in the UN system but without consideration of the longer term disadvantages or difficulties such parallel expansion might yield.

4. Difficulties Facing the US

It may be possible for us to achieve in regional organizations results not attainable in a more universal structure because the regional organization was designed to deal with relatively concrete and immediate economic problems in a restricted context. OEEC undoubtedly has been able to accomplish results which ECE could not have because of Soviet membership, e.g., establishing plans to increase and allocate Western European coal production. But the same cannot be said of other organizations, and overlapping jurisdiction often results in excessive duplication of effort not commensurate with the results attained. For instance, general conferences of ECLA and IA-ECOSOC may cover the same problems without any particular advantage from separate discussions, e.g., the discussions of price parities on exports and imports, in both organizations. The assumption by regional organizations of economic and social functions also has a tendency to encourage regional bloc psychology and voting in the UN on these issues as well as on political issues, e.g., in the ECOSOC resolution on financing of economic development. When the same problems are being discussed in various organizations there is also a difficulty of coordinating our own policy, inasmuch as different agencies of the Government carry varying degrees of influence in preparing policy toward various organizations. Finally, the fact that other governments frequently do not take a consistent line in different international organizations makes the achievement of US goals more difficult.

5. Implications for UN System

Insofar as the regional organizations develop strong programs in the economic and social field and receive relatively large amounts of money to carry those programs out, UN prestige and UN influence are correspondingly diminished. This is particularly true if the attention of the responsible officials in an important government such as the United States is directed primarily to regional organizations rather than to the UN. ECOSOC, which was intended as a world forum in which multilateral economic and social problems could be worked out, has little influence over non-UN organizations and is non-productive to the extent to which the principal efforts in this field are carried on outside the UN. If projected into the future, the development of regional economic and social programs outside the UN system might result in a virtual abdication of many of ECOSOC's functions. Another observable effect on the UN system is in some instances a tendency to regionalize activities of UN agencies primarily in order to meet the competition of regional organizations. This is particularly notable at present in the ILO.

6. The situation is one of a progressive tendency on the part of non-UN organizations to increase their economic and social functions and a corresponding diffusion of effort and lack of coordinated approach.

B. Relations Within the UN System between the United Nations and the Specialized Agencies

1. Problem

The problem of pursuing an effective integrated economic and social policy within the United Nations system is a product of the autonomy of the specialized agencies, the occasional overlapping of jurisdiction among various agencies, and the limited authority of the UN to exert stronger coordination or more effective supervision. This has resulted, in some instances, in unproductive competition among agencies to handle the same programs and in diminished ability of the UN system to meet current problems quickly.

2. Background

From the beginning, the UN system in the economic and social fields has been conceived as a series of inter-related but autonomous agencies, each created to deal with fairly well defined functional areas of activity. The United Nations is generally regarded as the political body, and the other agencies as technical coordinate arms.

Under Articles 57 and 63 of the UN Charter, ECOSOC may, on behalf of the UN, enter into agreements with the specialized agencies and may coordinate their activities through consultation and recommendations and request reports on the implementation of its recommendations. Agreements have been reached with the specialized agencies which affirm their intention of cooperating in making coordination effective and in carrying out the provisions relating to ECOSOC's responsibility for specialized agencies. UN administrative machinery has been set up to oversee the coordination process.

While the UN, through ECOSOC, thus has responsibility for coordination, it has only recommendatory authority. The relationship between the UN and the Specialized Agencies has been the subject of considerable controversy, with the United States considering the UN as the parent body responsible for setting guide lines for the agencies, and the United Kingdom, for example, insisting that since the UN and all the agencies have equal and independent status, UN's coordinating role is limited.

In the administrative field, while much remains to be accomplished, there has been a fair degree of coordination between the UN and the Specialized Agencies. This has been due to the fact that they all have some common problems for which they find it mutually advantageous to work out common solutions. The United States, United Kingdom and Commonwealth countries have taken a strong lead in all these agencies to reduce administrative overhead costs and eliminate inter-agency competition through uniformity. These efforts in cooperation with the heads of agencies, through the Administrative Coordination Committee, have produced a joint pension system, common salary and allowance system, common financial and staff regulations, provision of services on a reciprocal basis, and the adoption of other common administrative practices.

However, the autonomy and physical separation of these agencies has necessitated the establishment in each of administrative management machinery, resulting in parallel administrative operations and expenditures. In addition to increasing the total administrative overhead in international organizations, each organization can thereby build up machinery which contributes to the power of the secretariat effectively to influence government representatives to support policies originating in the secretariat. The most significant outcome is unrelenting pressure that often results in ever-increasing budgets.

3. United States Policies

The US has supported the policy of decentralization of functions in order that technical programs could be carried forward expeditiously with a minimum of red tape and political controversy. At the same time, however, the US has been interested in seeing that available resources are allocated effectively. Toward that end, major US policies in ECOSOC have aimed at: the development of the coordination machinery of ECOSOC; effective concentration of effort and resources; and the establishment of priorities in the economic and social field. All these have been designed to strengthen the role of ECOSOC vis-à-vis the Specialized Agencies.

With a strong lead from us, the GA and ECOSOC have increasingly been reviewing the general program, administrative, and budget policies throughout the UN system with a view to better coordination of effort. This trend has been strengthened by having the Technical Assistance Fund maintained by the UN, which we strongly favored. While initially the Fund was arbitrarily divided up among the various agencies with each agency largely controlling the expenditure of its share, the US has been urging greater central control so that funds are allocated on the basis of the relative merits of projects rather than on the basis of agency claims and pressures.

4. Difficulties Facing the United States

The implementation of ECOSOC recommendations within the Specialized Agencies is often hampered because other governments do not take consistent positions, even when these policies have been supported by the same governments in ECOSOC. (It is also sometimes difficult to execute our own avowed policy of coordination because the interest of certain other US government agencies in relatively greater autonomy for the Specialized Agencies with whose subject matter they have a primary concern).

The relative influence of the US also varies from agency to agency, particularly where other governments have a particular interest in an agency, such as the UK in the ILO, and this contributes to the difficulty of carrying into actual operation the recommendations of ECOSOC. The requirement of, in effect, a second governmental review affords vested interest in the various international Secretariats opportunities to build backfires against policies which they may not approve. Insofar as there is overlapping of competence among agencies or duplication of functions, the US also bears its proportionate share of the additional expense.

5. Implication for United Nations

The chief difficulty for ECOSOC in coordinating the activities of UN's semi-autonomous affiliates is that while it undertakes full scale debate, and decision on policies in the broad field of economic and social matters is possible, its decisions must go through a second inter-governmental review at the specialized agency level, thus also tending to encourage inter-secretariat frictions and jurisdictional problems between the various specialized agencies and with the UN.

While there has been a fair degree of administrative coordination until now between the UN and the specialized agencies, program coordination continues to be a difficult problem.

So far as the basic principle of autonomy is concerned, an advantage in having separate structures for the Specialized Agencies is the fact that the USSR and the Satellites do not, as a general rule, take part. This has freed the agencies from some of the political difficulties we encounter in the UN. However, it has also proved possible to do this within the UN itself, as the experiences of UNKRA and UNWRAP indicates.

6. Some measure of success has attended these efforts and if it proves possible through centralized secretariat and governmental control, to improve, in general, the quality and organization of services which international organizations are rendering to governments, the implications for the regular operations of the various agencies should be examined.

C. Relation of UN with Non-UN Specific Purpose Organizations

1. Problem

The problem in this area is similar to that of the relationships between the UN and its specialized agencies, with the added factors that: the UN has no authority over the non-UN agencies; there may exist simultaneous jurisdiction or overlapping jurisdiction between these bodies and UN agencies. Where important functions are primarily undertaken by non-UN agencies, there is little opportunity for adequate integration of these activities with other economic and social activities being carried on within the UN system.

2. Background

The most important examples of the non-UN specific purpose organizations are ICEM, GATT and the International Materials Conference. ECOSOC documents E/2361 and E/2361/Add 1, February 4, 1953, lists 52 such organizations, most of them highly technical. Most of these were created prior to the establishment of the UN and many of them are not participated in by the US. A number of them are also quite limited in membership or in geographic scope.

3. United States Policies

While there is a general policy to oppose the proliferation of international organizations, and a presumption that specific purpose organizations with widespread membership should be created within the UN structure, US practice has not always followed the policy. The most important of the non-UN organizations of this type—ICEM, GATT, and the International Materials Conference—were all created outside the UN under UN initiative. (GATT was created after it became apparent that the ITO, within the UN structure, would not become a reality because the US Senate was not going to ratify its Charter. ICEM was created outside the UN after the US Congress passed legislation preventing the use of US funds by a UN agency for the migration function which ICEM performs (although the ILO had prepared plans for the assumption of these functions). The International Materials Conference was established outside the UN as a commodity allocations group among the most directly concerned Western nations.

4. Difficulties Facing the United States

These agencies are carrying out significant functions which for our own political reasons we did not feel able to further through the UN, although theoretically this was possible. However, in all three instances their existence outside the UN structure makes it much more difficult to prevent competitive and uncoordinated action, although the latter represents our general policy in international organizations. The competition among the ILO, the UN High Commissioner for Refugees, and ICEM concerning their respective policies and programs involving refugees and migration exemplifies the difficulty created by parallel and overlapping responsibilities.

5. Implications for Role of United Nations

Inasmuch as the Economic and Social Council has competence to deal with the broad field of economic and social matters it is difficult to maintain a consistent approach to these matters when important responsibilities are placed completely outside its purview. Either the UN must play a minimal role in such an area, in which case it gives up functions we have encouraged it to assume; or it continues to attempt to deal with them, with a resultant tendency to duplication of activities. In either case, if the financial resources and primary attentions of governments are directed outside, the UN loses a considerable amount of prestige.

6. There is a discernible tendency to rely on the establishment of non-UN agencies to meet special needs.

Discussion:

1. The Secretary has decided to oppose the calling of a Review Conference earlier than 1955 (attachment A), since preparations for the regular conference will occupy us until then.<sup>2</sup>

2. Because of the contemporary atmosphere, we do not welcome widespread debate on details of Charter Review for at least another year.

3. Senator Wiley's speech of March 3, 1953 (attachment B),<sup>3</sup> states that Congress should be planning for revision of the Charter. This and other indices suggest that the Department will be questioned soon about the nature of its preparations, and possibly about its attitude toward the creation of a national commission (which in the past we have opposed).

4. It is essential that the Department have a clear idea of the problems involved, the questions which will be raised, and the approach which we feel is desirable, before a widespread public debate gets underway.

<sup>2</sup> The reference to "the regular conference" is not clear. The attachment (Dulles letter to Senator Wiley) refers to the tenth regular session of the General Assembly, although preparation for this meeting would not begin ordinarily until 1954. The same would be true also of the projected 10th anniversary commemorative conference to meet in San Francisco in 1955.

5. In the meantime, it is important that the Department have a constructive line for use during this year when questioned, particularly by members of Congress.

Recommendations:

1. A general position be agreed upon consisting of the following:
  - a. The Department is commencing its own study of Charter Review.
  - b. This study will take the remainder of 1953.
  - c. In 1954 the Department plans to discuss Charter Review with members of Congress and representative private citizens, on the basis of its own tentative conclusions. (This will allow at least a year and a half for public discussion).
  - d. The Department intends to recommend that the American delegation to any Charter Review Conference be broadly representative.
2. This position be submitted to the Secretary for approval and for use by Department officers in response to questions on the subject.
3. The UNA Planning Staff be authorized to undertake during 1953 the first step, i.e., identifying the problems and exploring the alternatives as a background to tentative conclusions. This would be done in close cooperation with the operating units of UNA and other interested areas in the Department.
4. Plans to be completed by the end of 1953 for submission to the Secretary regarding the machinery for Congressional and public consultation.

[WASHINGTON,] January 28, 1953.

MY DEAR SENATOR WILEY: I refer to the Department's letter dated January 15, 1953, acknowledging your letter dated January 14, 1953,<sup>5</sup> which requested the views of the Department on Senator Gillette's draft resolution S. Res. 30 urging the President to take immediate steps, under the provisions of Article 109 of the United Nations

Charter, to bring about the holding of a General Conference to review the Charter.

Article 109 provides that a General Conference to review the Charter "may be held at a date and place to be fixed by a two-thirds vote of the members of the General Assembly and by a vote of any seven members of the Security Council", and that "if such a conference has not been held before the tenth annual session of the General Assembly, the proposal to call one shall be placed on the agenda of that session of the General Assembly, and the conference shall be held if so decided by a majority vote of the members of the General Assembly and by a vote of any seven members of the Security Council".

The Department has anticipated that a proposal to call a Charter Review Conference will be considered at the tenth regular session of the General Assembly, i.e., sometime during 1955. The development of an official United States position toward the question of Charter review, and toward the many individual issues involved, will require very careful and detailed preparation within the Government, including official studies, advice from members of the Congress, and private discussions with other governments. There should also be, in the judgment of the Department, full opportunity for the public to inform itself regarding the problems involved, and to express its views.

The necessity to make the most thorough preparations for a review conference suggests the wisdom of concentrating on use of the next two years to assure that there will have been adequate consideration of this matter on the part of the American Government and people.

Consequently, the Department believes that there would be no advantage in attempting to advance from its expected time of consideration the date of the General Conference as S. Res. 33 proposes.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN FOSTER DULLES

Memorandum for the Files, by Lincoln P. Bloomfield of the United Nations Planning Staff, Bureau of United Nations Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL

[WASHINGTON,] March 10, 1953.

Subject: Preparations for Charter Review Conference

At a meeting this morning in Mr. Hickerson's office attended by Messrs. Hickerson, Sandifer, DePalma, Chase, Niemeyer and Bloomfield, the attached memorandum dated March 4, 1953,<sup>1</sup> entitled "Preliminary Planning for UN Charter Review Preparations", was discussed.

Mr. Hickerson's views were as follows :

1. The recommendations which we proposed Mr. Hickerson make to the Secretary were approved and the Planning Staff will prepare a memorandum from Mr. Hickerson to the Secretary along the proposed lines.<sup>2</sup>

2. The proposed timetable was generally in order, i.e., to devote the remainder of 1953 to the development of the Department's tentative conclusions on the subject of Charter Review and to defer until 1954 consultations with members of Congress and with private citizens.

3. The Conference which we expect the General Assembly in 1955 will call would not in any event convene until some time in 1956 and preferably not until after the Presidential election in 1956, which would mean that the Conference would probably not be held until 1957.

4. The assumptions which should underlie our preliminary studies are as follows :

a. There will be no general war.

b. There will be no fundamental change in the present power lineup.

c. The USSR will still be a member of the UN.

d. In general, the present status quo would prevail and we would not at this juncture be planning to utilize Charter review as a means of drastically or dramatically altering it.

e. Our proposals, if any, would be made on the basis of our national interest and we would not be deterred from advancing them by the prospect of Soviet veto under Article 108.

f. Any proposal which would constructively strengthen the United Nations will probably be rejected by the Soviet Union, but this would not deter us from making it.

g. Our position on the veto will probably remain constant, i.e., no veto on membership and Chapter VI questions or any questions other than the use of force under Chapter VII. However, we would probably reserve our rights under Article 108 respecting amendments to the Charter in the absence of any clear-cut provisions for withdrawal.

5. Among the major questions which should engage our attention the following should have priority :

a. The UN Security system; under this heading we would review the failure to implement Article 43; the experience with the Uniting for Peace resolutions; as well as all other pertinent considerations.

b. Assuming that we are unable to come up with any more optimistic outlook on the security picture and must therefore give priority to regional organizations in the security field, what adjustments in the Charter would be necessary or desirable to institutionalize this situation?

c. Assuming that the Security Council will remain paralyzed by the use of the veto, the powers, structure, and relationships of the General Assembly should be reviewed with particular attention to the concurrent role of the General Assembly (and in fact of the United Nations as a whole) in the colonial, trusteeship, economic, and social fields.

d. The problem of weighted voting.

6. Mr. Hickerson suggested that the views of the office directors be solicited in order to ascertain the major problem areas for the purpose of Charter review. The Planning Staff explained that this had been done and that the Inventory or "new look" project now underway was being participated in actively by the operating officers and would, we hoped, furnish a number of useful insights into areas requiring concentration for Charter review.

7. It was generally agreed that rather than develop an article-by-article blueprint from the outset, we would concentrate initially on those critical areas which would furnish the most important raw material in any event for any new shapes which this project might assume.

Editorial Note *

In a Hickerson memorandum of March 11, 1953, Secretary of State Dulles was appraised of the essentials of UNA thinking on preliminary planning for United Nations Charter Review preparations, on a timetable projection of 1956-57 as the date of a conference. Hickerson recommended that in general consultations with members of Congress, non-governmental organizations and other governments be deferred until 1954. Hickerson informed the Secretary of State that UNA "currently is reexamining our seven years' experience in the UN in terms of outstanding problems which now confront us. From this we expect useful insights into the approach we may wish to make to Charter review." Hickerson proposed to assign the UNA Planning Staff "for the remainder of this year" to this onward review of the main questions affecting United States policy towards the United Nations. (Hickerson-Murphy-Key files, lot 58 D 33, "UN Charter Review Conference")

There is a presumption, although unsupported explicitly by available documentation, that the UNA study "Principal Stresses and Strains Facing the US in the UN" was the current review to which Hickerson had reference in this memorandum to Dulles. For documentation relating to this study, see pages 82 ff.

DEAR C. D.: I agree with you that the forthcoming revision of the United Nations Charter provides a great opportunity. I have for some time been giving thought as to how best to use it. Before I left the Carnegie Endowment, I got them to start a series of studies in different countries with a view to forming some idea as to what amendments member states of significance were thinking about.

Lack of law is a serious defect. At the San Francisco Conference of 1945, when the Charter was drawn up, I was responsible for getting in the clause requiring the Assembly to develop international law. However, very little has been done, because in fact most of the member states are not willing to subject themselves to law as developed and applied by an international body.

Law in the sense we use the word is a codification of moral principles. In the Soviet world, there is no such concept, because they deny the existence of moral law.

I believe that any organization which made and changed laws could not be universal, and there is at least a grave question as to whether and when Mr. Taft's idea<sup>1</sup> were actually expressed in a treaty, it would get Senate approval. The first of my books "War, Peace and Change", written in 1937, deals basically with this whole problem and the fact that, unless international law provides methods of peaceful change, then there will be violent change, because change is the one thing that can never be stopped.

I believe this whole subject deserves the consideration you suggest. I will try from my standpoint to provide it.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN FOSTER DULLES

<sup>1</sup>The reference is to Senator Robert A. Taft and his book entitled A Foreign Policy for Americans. In the book Taft said of the UN Charter: "The fundamental difficulty is that it is not based primarily on an underlying law and an administration of justice under that law. I believe that in the long run the only way to establish peace is to write a law, agreed to by each of the nations, to govern the relations of such nations with each other and to obtain the covenant of all such nations that they will abide by that law and by decisions made thereunder." Subsequently in a speech to the American Bar Association, Dulles called attention to this passage in the Taft book and quoted it; for the Dulles speech, see editorial note, p. 176.

I myself feel that the forthcoming revision of the United Nations Charter provides a great opportunity. I have for some time been giving thought as to how best to use it.

I continue to believe that final United States policies on this question must await full public discussion of the issues as well as consultations with members of Congress. However, I think it may be timely to state that the Department will favor the calling of the review conference when the question is put to the 1955 session of the United Nations General Assembly. I hope this information will facilitate the work of your Committee.

Editorial Note

The Secretary of State made public statements on August 26 and September 3, 1953, regarding the question of United Nations Charter review.

The August 26 statement was made in an address to the American Bar Association at Boston, Massachusetts, entitled "U.S. Constitution and U.N. Charter: An Appraisal". Dulles purported to demonstrate that the Charter reflected "serious inadequacies": it was a pre-atomic-age document, the Security Council veto, and the absence of an international rule of law. In connection with the latter point, Dulles cited the views of the late Senator Taft (see footnote 1, page 175, and Department of State Bulletin, September 7, 1953, pages 307-310).

The Dulles statement of September 3 consisted of a press conference statement made in elucidation of the Boston address. At this time, the Secretary of State said that the speech at Boston had been made "primarily to stimulate thinking by such bodies as the American Bar Association on this whole topic." Dulles reiterated his belief that the project review conference could be a conference "of very great importance". Dulles added: "I believe there are a number of respects in which the charter can be improved, but at the moment I am not prepared to take an official position indicating what the final view of the United States Government will be. We believe that this is a subject which ought to be studied well in advance, and that the study should not merely be Governmental. . . ." Dulles voiced the hope that preparation for the conference would be "throughout the world", by private organizations as well as governments. He noted finally that the Netherlands Government "quite independently of any suggestion from us and before my Boston speech, put an agenda item on this subject for discussion at the session of the General Assembly which will be convened on September 15." (Department Press Release 474, dated September 3; see Department of State Bulletin, September 14, 1953, page 343.)

Position Paper Prepared in the Department of State for the United States Delegation to the Eighth Regular Session of the General Assembly

[WASHINGTON,] September 8, 1953.

PREPARATORY WORK WITH REGARD TO THE POSSIBLE HOLDING OF A GENERAL CONFERENCE OF THE MEMBERS OF THE UNITED NATIONS IN ACCORDANCE WITH ARTICLE 109 OF THE CHARTER

THE PROBLEM

[The portion of this item dealing with documentation is covered in the position paper on the Argentine item (A/2415)]<sup>2</sup>

The Netherlands government proposes that the 8th GA invite member states to submit prior to the 10th session (1955) "their preliminary views with regard to the possible revision of the Charter and tentative proposals and suggestions." The motive of the Dutch is to stimulate governments to start their preparations now, and the submission of proposals before the 1955 session is designed to furnish a suitable basis on which that GA can vote on whether to call a review conference. Although the Dutch do not intend to advance the date of the review conference itself, which they agree will probably be in 1956 or 1957, they may contribute to the confusion already existing here and abroad as to timetable. While they, like the US do not wish to encourage or engage in debate at this GA on substantive aspects of Charter review, and they thus hope their item will be treated procedurally, there is a real danger that debate on the veto, membership, etc., is inevitable under the rubric of their item.

UNITED STATES POSITION

1. The United States should support the Dutch proposal, welcoming it as consistent with the Secretary's recent efforts to stimulate thoughtful consideration by governments and particularly by peoples as to how the Charter can be improved, but making clear our understanding that the submission of proposals by mid-1955 is optional, since some governments may not be in a position to publicize their policies a year or more before the review conference itself.

2. The U.S. should favor merging this item with the Argentine item and having it handled procedurally, with substantive debate to be avoided.

3. The U.S. should oppose the creation of any UN intersessional preparatory body at this time on the ground that such a group would not be useful until governments have had a chance to develop their own general positions. We should refer in this connection to the democratic process of public debate and consultation which this country will need to undergo before our government can formulate its final policies.

4. If the Secretary refers in his opening address to subjects such as voting procedures, membership, and disarmament in the context of Charter review, we should in general resist efforts by others to confuse the discussion of contemporary issues by connecting them too directly with their long-term Charter review aspects. However, the UK has indicated that it might attempt to avoid debate at this session on membership by referring to the possibilities inherent in Charter revision. While we can refer to the opportunity we will all have later to re-examine Article 4 as well as all other articles, we should in no way anticipate or prejudice any position we may wish to take later on this matter.

COMMENT

1. The Secretary's Boston Speech <sup>3</sup> plus his anticipated references to Charter review in his statement in the general debate will create an atmosphere of great curiosity as to U.S. positions regarding Charter revision, and will, in the light of the Dutch item, stimulate other governments to think and probably speak on the subject.<sup>4</sup> Since the U.S. has not reached any final policy decisions other than to favor the calling in 1955 of a subsequent review conference, an effort may be necessary to forestall substantive debate on such favorite topics as the veto, etc. Prior consultation will be necessary with friendly delegations to reach agreement that at this early stage the problem is purely procedural. The most authentic statement of the atmosphere in which the U.S. is thinking about the problem is contained in the Secretary's statement to the press on September 3 (State Department Press release no. 474), and this line should be used extensively in preliminary discussions as well as in our statement in committee.

Gadel 4. Re: Charter Review Department's initial reaction to agenda item on Charter amendment just submitted by Egyptian Del.

(Doc. A/2466) follows, although explanatory memo may cast further light when received:

1. Position paper on Dutch item (SD/A/C.1/433)<sup>1</sup> already states US opposition to creation by UN of any preparatory body for Charter review at this time. In addition to fact such body would be patently premature, we also had in mind that a "technical" body of this sort would a fortiori be counter-productive until basic governmental decisions provided some solid political base for drafting or interpretative operations.

2. Egyptian letter does not make clear when the proposed technical committee would be elected. Its contemplated task of studying and reporting "on the basis of proposals to be submitted by Member States" suggests that it may be related to Dutch invitation to submit such proposals prior to 1955 GA session. In any case we see no utility to setting up this or any other UN preparatory group at this session.

3. However, we should not oppose inclusion of item in agenda. Best way of handling it would be merging it with Dutch and Argentine items and seeking reach agreement among sponsors that creation of any UN body should await submission of concrete proposals by governments.

Gadel 10. Re: Charter Review

1. Principal US objectives in any action on Charter review this GA session are as follows:

a. Stimulate international and domestic interest and preparations so that positions taken when Charter Review conference actually called will reflect careful, thoughtful and realistic appraisal of problems by maximum number of people, private groups, etc.

b. Avoid committing US directly or by inference to adoption of any substantive position, and avoid forecasting probable US positions.

c. Keep GA debate procedural, emphasizing that governments including US are obviously not prepared with final positions; engaging in substantive debate now would needlessly increase world tensions.

d. Avoid creating UN machinery in form of committees, etc., which would have nothing constructive to do until governmental positions made known.

e. Utilize GA resolution(s) to clarify definitively the real confusion we detect at home and abroad as to timing of Charter review process. This need, recently emphasized to Department by Senate Foreign Relations Committee staff and officers of interested private groups, suggests desirability of single resolution which has this as an important purpose.

2. As to resolution, we can envisage one which clearly spells out timetable in preamble; operative section on Dutch proposal for submission of government views would be geared to need for a base on which 1955 GA can intelligently consider convening of review conference; Argentine proposals for preparation of documentation would follow in same context. In view of Delga 14,<sup>2</sup> if separate resolutions absolutely unavoidable, would be desirable for Dutch proposal re repertory of practices to cross-refer clearly to preparation of this and related materials by Secretariat pursuant to Argentine resolution. Dutch draft resolution seems to us susceptible of improvement on these various counts. Department suggests approaching various sponsors on possibility of one consolidated resolution, using argument of need for simplicity and clarification.

3. Would appreciate Delegation views on possibility of incorporating in Dutch proposal thought contained in Secretary's opening speech re views of non-member states. Could "Member States" in penultimate sentence Dutch draft resolution be changed to read "all States"?

4. If, as Meeker reported by telephone to Bloomfield, Egyptian item is meeting negative response, US Del might consider ways of quietly interring it before it is debated, possibly by persuading Egyptians to withdraw item. Alternative possibility would be to add to principal resolution a final operative clause suggesting that 1955 GA will doubtless wish consider creation of appropriate preparatory machinery both for review conference arrangements and to consider those proposals which will have by then been submitted by governments under Dutch item.

5. Soviet bloc reaction in GA and in commie press indicates this whole question could rapidly become an East-West issue even before policies are actually formulated. This is probably inevitable, but support among our friends for the active interest we wish taken in Charter review might be enhanced by reasoned line emphasizing our desire to see if there are ways to strengthen instrument of international cooperation, our open mind as to useful improvements, our desire to examine the views of all other members, and our consequent emphasis on purely procedural approach at this time. Where possible "Review" should be used instead of "Revision".

Gadel 20. Re Charter Review

1. If Egyptians envisage technical committee as intergovernmental body with "highly political functions" (Delga 79, Oct. 7)<sup>1</sup> we are even less disposed see it created by 8th.

2. Committee's functions as reported reftel seem to us to illustrate lack of realism and practicality which characterizes Egyptian proposal.

a) Creation of special intergovernmental body to guide Secretariat in preparing documentation seems waste of time and money, full of possibilities impeding execution of a technical job by a technical staff. Department believes this sort of job requires intelligent and single-minded supervision, which Secretariat should provide.

b) Second purpose Egyptians have in mind seems even more unrealistic. For one thing Dumbarton Oaks discussions<sup>2</sup> were negotiations conducted by top level diplomats under instructions from their governments. But above all they were based on drafts which had been laboriously developed by governments as end products of internal policy formulation process. Analogy appears meaningless in present setting, at least at this stage.

3. Department heartily endorses views expressed by Governor Byrnes and Von Balluseck. We particularly agree that premature involvement in substantive debates might prejudice any orderly development of preparatory procedures including vote at 10th GA on holding of review conference itself.

4. From our standpoint it would be clearly preferable if Egyptian proposal could be dropped. US delegation's suggestion that contemplated committee be restricted to guiding Secretariat in discharging its largely mechanical tasks seems to us open to objections cited paragraph 2 a) above. It might be added that if committee were model of non-interference once Secretariat chores were programmed, it would have nothing to do and might be sorely tempted involve itself in Charter re-drafting.

5. Our second choice would be possibility suggested in Gadel 10, Sept. 25, para. 4, i.e., final operative clause in consolidated resolution to effect that 1955 GA will doubtless wish consider creation of appropriate preparatory machinery both for review conference arrangements and to give preliminary consideration governmental proposals submitted by then.

6. Our third preference would be variation on latter, leaving way open for 9th GA in 1954 to evaluate progress to date and consider best timing and method of organizing collective preparatory work.

7. Suggested draft statement for US representative sent by MISUN this afternoon. Last paragraph will require adjustment depending on solution reached re Egyptian proposal.

The attached report (Tab A) which I thought you would be interested in looking over sums up the highlights of the Committee Six debate on Charter Review at the present General Assembly session.<sup>1</sup>

The main points of the report are that (a) the deliberate tactics of the US delegation to keep somewhat in the background on this item seem to have paid dividends; (b) our various objectives were satisfactorily achieved; (c) the committee was sharply split between governments favoring review of the Charter and those opposing it; (d) the same splits appeared within groups which usually vote together (other than the Soviet bloc); (e) through a combination of luck and good management only the Soviets were isolated in opposition in the final vote; (f) the strong disinclination by some of the leading colonial powers to face up to Charter Review probably rests on their fears that it will be used to undermine their colonial relationships.

Some of the preliminary votes were quite interesting. The lineup within various groups of states as reflected in speeches and in the Subject: Analysis of Committee Action in 8th GA on Charter Review.

The recent debate on Charter Review in the Legal Committee had some rather interesting aspects which I summarize below. Even at this preliminary stage their significance should, I think, be kept in mind as part of the general backdrop against which we will be maturing our own preparations. For brevity I have eliminated all background material in favor of the salient features of committee debate itself.

1. The overt role of the US delegation throughout the three-week debate in committee was deliberately minor, although our generally positive attitude toward Charter Review, as enunciated by the Secretary, was of course well understood. Our tactics were to work backstage, mainly through the Netherlands and New Zealand delegations which steered the six-power resolution. In retrospect, this role was effective because (a) it made liars out of the Soviets as they persisted in characterizing the various resolutions before the committee as reflecting a conspiracy led by the US, (b) on the same count the Soviet charges served to insult such sponsors of the various resolutions as Egypt and Pakistan, as well as the others (Netherlands, New Zealand, Cuba, Argentina, Canada, Costa Rica), and (c) it helped preserve our tactical freedom of action in committee.

2. US objectives in this matter were generally achieved, even down to some small details: (a) the final resolution (Annex A) contained a clear and unequivocal reference to Article 109, Charter Review, the 10th GA, etc.; (b) the Egyptian proposal for a preparatory committee was abandoned; (c) the final resolution was procedural and unprejudicial in character; (d) adequate documentation will be made available and the legislative history, about which we were not enthusiastic on grounds both of substance and economy, was rejected in favor of a comprehensive index; and (e) the Netherlands-sponsored invitation to governments to submit preliminary views which we had accepted only conditionally was [eliminated?].

3. The debates showed a marked diversity of views and approaches and, as we suspected would happen, often went considerably beyond procedure to the point of reflecting basic national attitudes, aspirations and fears. There were forty-six speeches in the general debate in committee. In the face of the splits which appeared within the free world and within blocs which usually stand together, it was rather extraordinary that in the final vote of 48-5, with no abstentions, the Soviet bloc alone was isolated in opposition to a heavy majority. The Dutch had been fearful that their proposal would drive a wedge into the free world, and it was a pleasant surprise to them and an illustration of the fundamental solidarity of the non-Communist world that at the end all but the Soviets rallied in support of the resolution.

4. The configuration of forces in the debate took the form of a spectrum, at one end of which were those countries enthusiastic for revision of the Charter and at the other end those strongly hostile to any mention of it. Within each of the several groupings the same shadings tended to appear. Perhaps the most egregious example was within the Western European group and the "old" Commonwealth. The Netherlands was bitterly opposed by Belgium and France; New Zealand and Canada appeared to be poles apart from the UK, Australia, and South Africa.

The motivation behind the opposition to Charter Review was varied. The Soviet bloc (which it will be recalled had opposed paragraph 3 of Article 109 at San Francisco on the grounds that any review conference in the future would be a club in the hands of opponents of unanimity) apparently felt their predictions were coming true, and were implacably hostile. They were joined all the way in spirit, if not in the final vote, by France, Belgium, Syria, Guatemala, and Liberia. The Syrian representative, Dr. Tarasi, made little attempt to disguise his obvious sympathy with the Communist line. Presumably Guatemala was similarly animated. However, the intensity of the French and Belgium challenges to the legality and constitutionality of preparations for Charter Review reflected deepseated apprehension that further inroads would be made in their colonial relationships. I cannot estimate the Liberian motives. These various "bitter-enders" were joined along a good part of the road by a number of others. Annex B is my rough classification of the shadings within each grouping as reflected in speeches and to some extent in the votes. I have shown at the end of Annex B the present profile of the NATO membership based on this evidence.

5. I believe some of the votes which preceded the final showdown were significant reflections of the real feeling of many delegations.

The sharp basic division within the committee was epitomised by the first test veto, when the Dutch invitation to governments to submit views was eliminated by 24-25 with 5 abstentions. This was a low watermark for the co-sponsors and, I might add, we worked hard to discourage their tendency to panic. However, after this controversial provision was eliminated their fortunes rose swiftly, and perhaps the most meaningful vote was on the four-power amendment to eliminate from the basic resolution any reference to Charter Review. This lost 15-28 with 9 abstentions. The 15 to eliminate were the 5 Soviets, the 4 co-sponsors of the amendment (France, Belgium, Mexico, Colombia) plus Guatemala, Iran, Liberia, Syria, Afghanistan, and Burma. The 9 abstainers were the UK, Australia, South Africa, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Israel, Saudi Arabia, and Thailand. Thus, 24 out of 52 had doubts as to any mention of Charter Review, essentially the same 24 who killed the invitation to governments to submit views.

6. As reported earlier, once the invitation was out of the way and the legislative history thrown out (on the motion of UK and Australia) and after the critical test of strength described above, only the Soviet bloc voted in the negative. In the final voting, the preamble citing Charter Review carried 36-5 with Syria, Mexico and Israel abstaining (seven others apparently did not want to be caught voting on this since there were 14 absentees, compared with only 7 absentees in the vote a few minutes later on the resolution as a whole). The preambular reference to the preparations required on the part of both governments and the SYG carried 41-5 with 2 abstentions; the preambular reference to the need for documentation 40-5 with 5 abstentions; and the remaining operative clause regarding documentation carried 44-5. The absentees on the final vote were Ethiopia (which had favored the resolution but had apparently retired in embarrassment after casting her vote the wrong way the evening before), Haiti, Lebanon, Luxembourg, Paraguay, Yemen, and Bolivia. Thus, if Ethiopia had been present, the vote would have been 49-5, and if the others had put in an appearance it might conceivably have been as high as 55-5.

7. In the plenary session on November 27th the resolution was approved 54-5-0.

8. There is good reason, in my opinion, to anticipate renewed discussion of this subject at the 9th GA, with likelihood that the proposal to establish a preparatory body will be revived.

Annex A

RESOLUTION ON CHARTER REVIEW AS APPROVED BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY, NOVEMBER 27, 1953<sup>3</sup>

The General Assembly,

Having regard to the provisions of Article 109 of the Charter under which a proposal to hold a General Conference of the Members of the United Nations for the purpose of reviewing the Charter is to be placed on the agenda of the tenth annual session of the General Assembly if such a conference has not been held before that session,

Considering that the examination of such a proposal will require considerable preparation on the part of both the Secretary-General and Member States,

Considering that study of the legislative history of the Charter and of the practice followed by the various organs of the United Nations is one of the best methods of acquiring knowledge of the Charter and will greatly facilitate the General Assembly's consideration, at its tenth annual session, of the question of calling a General Conference,

Having regard to the memorandum by the Secretary-General (A/C.6/343),

Requests the Secretary-General to prepare, publish and circulate among the Member States during 1954, or shortly thereafter:

(a) A systematic compilation of the documents of the United Nations Conference on International Organization not yet published;

(b) A complete index of the documents of that Conference on the lines envisaged in part II and part III C of the memorandum by the Secretary-General;

(c) A repertory of the practice of United Nations organs appropriately indexed.

Press Release No. 19 Issued by the Department of State, January 18, 1954<sup>1</sup>

STATEMENT BY THE HONORABLE JOHN FOSTER DULLES
SECRETARY OF STATE
BEFORE THE CHARTER REVIEW SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE
MONDAY, JANUARY 18, 1954

UNITED NATIONS CHARTER REVIEW

The United Nations Charter represents man's most determined and promising effort to save humanity from the scourge of war and to establish justice between the nations. In negotiating the Charter terms, the United States was represented by a distinguished bi-partisan delegation, largely drawn from the Congress, and the Charter was ratified by the Senate by almost unanimous vote.

The United Nations, thus launched, carried the ardent hopes of the American people, and indeed the peoples of all the world. The responsible leaders of our nation, without regard to party, have repeatedly said that the Charter represents the cornerstone of U.S. foreign policy.

It must in all frankness be recognized that the high hopes born of the San Francisco Conference of 1945 have not been fully realized. This is due to two principal causes.

In the first place, many initial hopes were exaggerated. War is not abolished, and a system of justice inaugurated, merely by strokes of the pen. If that were the case, we would have had international peace and justice long ago. Just and durable peace requires sustained and well directed efforts comparable in dedication to the efforts needed to win victory in war.

However, the written word continues to exert a peculiar fascination and there is a recurrent tendency to treat as done that which, according to a treaty, ought to be done. Hopes which had only this basis were doomed to be disappointed.

In the second place, many provisions of the Charter depended on cooperation by the so-called "great powers" and in fact the members of the Soviet Communist bloc have pursued policies which departed from the spirit, and indeed the language, of the Charter.

Nevertheless, the United Nations has a record of conspicuous accomplishment. Among major political results which flowed from its processes may be mentioned :

- The withdrawal of Soviet forces from Iran ;
- The support of Greece while under Communist attack ;
- The conclusion of a permanent armistice between Israel and the Arab States ;
- The establishment of the Republic of Korea ;
- The disposition of the Italian colonies in Africa and the creation of the State of Libya ;
- The establishment of the Republic of Indonesia.
- The organization of effective resistance to the armed aggression in Korea.

While the United States bore most of the United Nations burden in Korea, it should not be forgotten that 15 other members contributed armed forces and 46 nations made some form of contribution, either military or economic.

Thus, the United Nations became the first international organization to organize effective collective resistance to armed aggression.

The United Nations has helped to transform colonialism into self-government. The role played by the United Nations in this matter has been controversial and it is in some respects subject to legitimate criticism. Undoubtedly, however, it has exerted a useful influence in promoting peaceful rather than violent developments.

In addition to political achievements, the United Nations has provided means for economic and social developments which have benefited a large part of the human race.

In addition to its specific accomplishments, the General Assembly has served as a world forum for the presentation of different points of view. It has become a place where world opinion can register and exert a moral authority, which no nation, however powerful or despotic, publicly disdains or wholly disregards.

The greatest weakness of the United Nations—and this was foreseen at San Francisco—is the Security Council's inability to discharge its "primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security". (Art. 24) It has not proved practicable for the Security Council to organize the armed forces, assistance and facilities which it was contemplated should be put at the disposal of the Security Council (Art. 43) for the purpose of maintaining international peace and security.

The Council's inability to function as designed has been primarily due to the abuse by the Soviet Union of its so-called veto power.

This same veto power has been abused by the Soviet Union to exclude from membership in the United Nations many countries fully qualified for membership under the terms of Article 4, which provides that the United Nations membership is open to all peace-loving states which accept the obligations contained in the present Charter and are able and willing to carry out these obligations.

Nations excluded by the Soviet veto are:

Austria, Cambodia, Ceylon, Finland, Eire, Italy, Japan, Jordan, Republic of Korea, Laos, Libya, Nepal, Portugal, Vietnam.

II

We are now approaching a time when in all probability there will be a review of the Charter with a view to its possible amendment. Article 109 (3) of the Charter provides that a proposal to call such a conference shall be placed on the agenda of the tenth annual session of the General Assembly, i.e., that of 1955, and present indications are that a review conference will be held.

The United States has already indicated that it expects to favor the holding of a review conference.

The Executive welcomes this coordinate action of the Senate in studying the problems which will confront such a conference.

The Executive approaches this conference with an awareness of the desirability of perfecting the Charter, but also with a determination not to lose the good that is, in the search for something better.

We have not yet taken any firm position with respect to Charter amendments. We defer that until we have further advanced our own studies, and ascertained the views of our citizenry and Congress and of other nations.

In this connection we do not forget that Charter amendments require Senate consent.

Under the circumstances, I shall limit myself to indicating some of the major questions which might be brought before the Charter Review Conference, and as to which there should be an educated public opinion.

III

1. Universality

It is useful that there be an organization which is, generally speaking, universal and whose processes run throughout the world. Otherwise the association takes on the character of an alliance. Of course, universality inevitably means bringing together nations whose governments may strongly disagree. This has disadvantages. But such an organization maintains contacts between potential enemies, affords opportunities to dispel unnecessary misunderstandings, and, as President Eisenhower said in his State of the Union Message on January 7, 1954, it provides "the only real world forum where we have the opportunity for international presentation and rebuttal." This process tends, though slowly, to bring about conformity to a common standard.

It is, of course, unlikely that there will be universality in the complete and literal sense of that word. Unfortunately, there are governments or rulers who do not respect the elemental decencies of international conduct, so that they can properly be brought into the organized family of nations. That is illustrated by the regime which now rules the China mainland.

Even approximate universality does, of course, carry certain disadvantages. There are bound to be differences of opinion which limit effectiveness of action.

Doubtless, at the Charter Review Conference, consideration will be given to these problems of universality or limited membership. It will perhaps be considered whether Article 4, to which I referred above, expresses the desirable standards for membership.

In this connection, it should be recalled that Articles 5 and 6 permit of suspension and expulsion, although this requires Security Council action, which in turn is subject to veto.

It seems at the present time that most of the members of the United Nations feel that it is better to have even discordant members in the organization rather than to attempt to confine membership to those who hold the same views.

In this connection, it is to be borne in mind that few nations for long share the same views about every matter. Where they do share the same security views, or have regional community, they can organize themselves under Article 51 (collective security) or under the provisions of Articles 52-54 (regional arrangements).

2. Security

By the Charter (Article 24) the Security Council is supposed to exercise "primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security". Can Charter changes better enable it to discharge that responsibility? Or must that primary responsibility be left to security organizations, the formation of which is authorized by Article 51? Or should greater responsibility be given to the General Assembly, where there is no veto?

In this connection I should note the "Uniting for Peace Resolution" of 1950 which puts the General Assembly in a position to play a decisive role with reference to peace and security in the event that the Security Council is paralyzed by a veto.

3. Security Council

Are the present provisions for membership and voting in the Security Council conducive to its maximum effectiveness? Should the veto power be taken away in respect of questions involving Pacific Settlement of Disputes (Chapter VI) and in respect of the Admission of New Members, as recommended by S.R. 239 (80th)—the so-called Vandenberg Resolution? Presumably, the United States would itself hesitate to go much further than this in now surrendering its "veto power".

4. General Assembly Voting

In the General Assembly, each nation has one vote—is this the best arrangement? If the General Assembly is to assume greater responsibilities, then should there not be some form of weighted voting, so that nations which are themselves unable to assume serious military or financial responsibilities cannot put those responsibilities on other nations? Should there be, in some matters, a combination vote whereby affirmative action requires both a majority of all the members, on the basis of sovereign equality, and also a majority vote, on a weighted basis, which takes into account population, resources, etc.?

5. Armament

Since the Charter was adopted there has been a vast development of possibilities of mass destruction, particularly in terms of atomic energy and nuclear weapons.

As one who was at San Francisco in the spring of 1945, I can say with confidence that had the delegates at San Francisco known we were entering the age of atomic warfare, they would have seen to it that the Charter dealt more positively with the problems thus raised. Perhaps consideration should now be given to the creation of a special organ of the United Nations comparable to the Economic and Social Council and the Trusteeship Council to deal permanently with the problem of armament which carries so hideous a threat to the hopes of the peoples expressed in the Preamble to the Charter.

In this connection, I emphasize the President's epoch-making proposal of December 8, 1953 to the United Nations suggesting the creation of an International Atomic Energy Agency to receive contributions of normal uranium and fissionable materials and to devise methods whereby this available material would be allocated to serve the peaceful pursuits of mankind.

6. International Law

In view of the importance of law as an accepted standard of international conduct, are the Charter provisions adequate (Article 13(1) (a)) ? These call on the General Assembly to initiate studies and make recommendations for the purpose of encouraging the progress and development of international law and its codification. However, so far little progress has been made. This is a great handicap to world order, because it means that decisions and recommendations of the United Nations are apt to be governed by considerations of political expediency rather than by accepted international law.

In this connection I recall the late Senator Taft's conviction "that in the long run the only way to establish peace is to write a law, agreed to by each of the nations, to govern the relations of such nations with each other and to obtain the covenant of all such nations that they will abide by that law and by decisions made thereunder". (A Foreign Policy for Americans, 1951)

Simultaneous progress on a global scale is presently impeded by a sharp cleavage with reference to the nature of law. Most of the governments of the world regard "law" as man's effort to apply moral principles to human affairs. There is thus an objective standard of justice which can be appealed to. However, one third of the world's population is ruled by those who do not recognize any moral law and look upon human "law" as a means whereby those in power achieve their objectives and destroy their enemies.

7. The foregoing are the more important Charter amendment issues which particularly concern the United States. There are doubtless other aspects which are of great concern to other countries. However, I refrain from making any statement about those matters at this time.

CONCLUSION

It is in my opinion important that the United States should approach this problem of Charter review with recognition that the Charter as it is can be made to serve well the cause of international peace and justice. The defects in the Charter can to a considerable extent be corrected by practices which are permissible under the Charter. Already it is accepted practice that if a permanent member of the Security Council abstains from voting, that does not constitute a veto despite the fact that Article 27(3) provides for the "affirmative vote of seven members, including the concurring votes of the permanent members".

I have already referred to the Uniting for Peace Resolution which gave the Assembly a veto-less authority in security matters.

It is also necessary to bear in mind that much can be done within the framework of the Charter, but without actual dependence upon the procedures of the United Nations itself. I have referred to Article 51 which recognizes the right of collective self-defense. This has been extensively used. Many nations having similar security interests have banded together through security pacts. There are the Rio Pact, the North Atlantic Treaty, and comparable security arrangements between the United States and other countries in the Western Pacific. The Soviets have also built their own security system with a series of so-called treaties with their satellites.

Such arrangements operate free of Security Council veto, although self-defense measures are required to be reported to the Security Council.

I have stated some of the problems which will probably be raised in a 1956 Review Conference, without attempting to give categorical answers. That would, I think, be premature for me. Let me repeat, however, that while a Charter Review Conference should be welcomed as a means of strengthening the United Nations, difference of opinion about how to do this should not then be pressed to a point such that the Review Conference would result in undermining the United Nations or disrupting it. The United Nations as it is, is better than no United Nations at all.

It must be borne in mind that, under the present Charter, each of the permanent members of the Security Council has a "veto" on amendments which the General Review Conference may propose. The existence of this veto does not mean that the Review Conference is a futility. At San Francisco each of the nations which had joined to draft the Dumbarton Oaks Proposals had a "veto" over changes from these proposals. Nevertheless, they did not exercise that veto as against changes which were clearly reasonable and demanded by world opinion. We can hope that the same conditions will prevail at the prospective Review Conference. We can reasonably make our plans on the working hypothesis that no one nation will, in fact, be able arbitrarily to impose changes or to veto changes.

Let me end by reasserting my continuing faith in the United Nations. I fully share the view expressed by the Senate in its Resolution of June 11, 1948 that it is "the policy of the United States to achieve international peace and security through the United Nations". As President Eisenhower said to the Congress on January 7, 1954, "The United Nations deserves our continued firm support."

I believe that it lies within our power to advance the great objective of the United Nations provided we are patient, resourceful and resolute, and inspired by faith that man has the capacity to overcome evil with good.

Editorial Note

Throughout 1954 and into 1955, looking towards the tenth regular session of the General Assembly when Charter review would become a mandatory item on the General Assembly agenda, the position of the United States Government on this matter remained fixed on the Dulles statement of January 18, 1954. The Department of State, whether counselling the United States Senate subcommittee, encouraging research and discussion by private American organizations, or consulting informally with other governments, invariably referred back to the terms set forth therein, as terms which identified not only what might be desirable in the way of Charter revision (change) but also as to what was undesirable in the way of proposed change. A recurring theme of United States Government spokesmen was the demonstrated flexibility of the United Nations in the past and the urgent need not to lose the good already in the Charter in the process of Charter review.

Certain statements, articles, and speeches by governmental officials were recorded in the Department of State Bulletin on this subject in 1954:

They shall refrain from any action which might reflect on their position as international officials responsible only to the Organization.

III. Privileges and Immunities—Public Law 291, 79th Congress<sup>5</sup>

This act provides certain privileges, exemptions and immunities for international organizations as defined in section 1 of the act, for

Foreign Government representatives to such international organizations and for officers and employees of such international organizations.

The act recognizes the legal personality of international organization; confers upon the property and assets of such organizations' immunity from search and confiscation; makes the archives of such organizations inviolable and grants to such organizations same treatment with respect to customs, duties, taxes on importation, registration of foreign agents and treatment of official communications as is accorded to foreign governments. (Section 2)

The Act grants to international organizations' aliens immunity from customs duties and importation taxes on original entry. (Section 3); exempts from U.S. income taxes aliens employed by international organizations. (Section 4) International organization employees are exempted from the provisions of the Federal Insurance Contributions Act, the Federal Unemployment Tax Act (Section 4) and the Social Security Act. (Section 5)

Foreign government representatives to international organizations and officers and employees of international organizations are accorded the same treatment as is accorded foreign government officers and employees with respect to entry into and departure from the U.S., alien registration and finger-printing and the registration of foreign agents. International organization employees are immune from suit and legal process for acts performed in an official capacity. (Section 7)

Section 7 also amends the Immigration Act of May 26, 1924<sup>6</sup> by creating a new category of non-immigrants for visa and entry purposes: representatives of foreign governments to international organizations and employees of international organizations. Section 1 of the Act provides that the President may at any time revoke the designation of an organization as being entitled to privileges and immunities under the act or may extend in part only, or revoke in part, privileges and immunities under the Act.

Section 8 provides that the Secretary of State may revoke the privileges and immunities of individuals when their continued presence in the U.S. is no longer desirable.

- (b) Section 13.
- (c) Section 6, Public Law 357, 80th Congress.

V. Headquarters Agreement—Diplomatic Privileges and Immunities

Section 15 of the Headquarters Agreement. Privileges and immunities pursuant to the foregoing included the following: General immunity from legal process and immunity from arrest, exemption from personal property tax, exemption from fees for drivers' license and automobile plates, exemption from federal excise taxes and, in case of UN, from New York City sales tax and New York State fuel tax.

VI. Privileges and Immunities—General Convention<sup>8</sup>

The general convention on privileges and immunities of the United Nations has been acceded to by 38 members, but not by the United States.

Section 18(b) of the Convention provides for exemption of salaries and emoluments of officers of United Nations from U.S. income tax. Section 18(c) provides for the exemption of officials of the UN from national service obligations. In so far as these two sections might, in the absence of a reservation, apply to nationals of an acceding nation, they represent the principal differences between the privileges and immunities of the Convention and those currently provided for by P.L. 291, 79th Congress and section 15 of the Headquarters Agreement.

<sup>8</sup>The General Convention on Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations, and related instruments, was adopted by the General Assembly in Resolution 22 (I), Feb. 13, 1946. Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson) to the Secretary of State

[WASHINGTON,] February 6, 1952.

Subject: Regulation of Movement of Persons Covered by Sec. 11 of the Headquarters Agreement

At your staff meeting on January 31, 1952 you requested that a study be made of possible regulation of travel of persons covered by the Headquarters Agreement with the UN.<sup>1</sup> Attached hereto is a memorandum which considers in detail the position of delegations of UN Members, Secretariat employees, accredited correspondents and others having status under the Agreement. This memorandum reaches the conclusion that the U.S. has the right to restrict any UN aliens to the headquarters district and its immediate vicinity, but that this right should be exercised only for security reasons. It is noted that the restrictions recommended at your staff meeting on January 31, 1952 are based exclusively and plainly upon retaliatory grounds, and that it is in fact desired to avoid any implication that they have a security purpose. It is therefore recommended that no restrictions or travel regulation be imposed, at the present time, upon Soviet nationals having status under the Headquarters Agreement.

I understand that it is the intention of the draft note which was considered at the January 31 staff meeting that the proposed travel regulations, if placed in effect, would not apply to any Soviets in Washington who have status under the Headquarters Agreement. At the present time M. A. Federov, a TASS correspondent, is the only person having such dual status. To date, however, no effective means has been perceived of preventing the Soviets from increasing the number of persons having dual status if they should decide to do so.

The imposition of restrictions upon persons coming under the Headquarters Agreement would unquestionably produce adverse reactions among many friendly UN delegations and Secretariat employees. The failure to impose restrictions on UN Soviets when the travel of Soviets in Washington is being regulated will unquestionably produce unfavorable comment in some quarters in Congress and in some sections of the press and the public. It does not seem possible to assess the magnitude or effect of such reaction. It is recommended, however, in the event travel restrictions are imposed as proposed at the January 31 meeting, that the reasons for not imposing similar regulations or restrictions on UN Soviets be fully explained to the press.

Mr. Bohlen, Mr. Fisher and Mr. Barbour concur.

REGULATION OF MOVEMENT OF PERSONS HAVING STATUS UNDER THE HEADQUARTERS AGREEMENT

Sec. 11 of the Headquarters Agreement provides that "the federal, state or local authorities of the United States shall not impose any impediments to transit to or from the headquarters district . . ." of representatives of Members of the UN and specialized agencies, Secretariat employees of the UN and specialized agencies, experts performing missions for the UN or specialized agencies, representatives of the press and other information agencies accredited by the UN or by a specialized agency, representatives of NGO's recognized in accordance with the UN Charter and persons invited to the headquarters by the UN or specialized agencies on official business.

Sec. 13(d) provides that:

"Except as provided above in this section and in the General Convention, the United States retains full control and authority over the entry of persons or property into the territory of the United States and the conditions under which persons may remain or reside there."

Sec. 13(e) provides that:

“The Secretary-General shall, at the request of the appropriate American authorities, enter into discussions with such authorities, with a view to making arrangements for registering the arrival and departure of persons who have been granted visas valid only for transit to and from the headquarters district and sojourn therein and in its immediate vicinity.”

It would appear that Sec. 11 read in conjunction with the pertinent paragraphs of Sec. 13 would be sufficient to negate any United States obligation to permit access to the United States at large.

The UN Secretariat has, however, in the past contended that the United States does not have the right to restrict delegations of members and Secretariat employees. The contention is based upon provisions of the General Convention on Privileges and Immunities which grant to representatives of members and to officials of the Secretariat “freedom from immigration restrictions.” This contention is dependent upon a construction of the words “freedom from immigration restrictions” in which the United States does not concur. It also appears to ignore the fact that the United States has not acceded to the General Convention or views that Convention as creating obligations which the United States does not recognize. Furthermore this contention is dependent upon the fact that the UN in construing the obligations of the United States with respect to the admission and residence of aliens has never recognized Sec. 6 of the Headquarters Agreement.

Sec. 6 of P. L. 357, 80th Congress, which authorized the President to accept the Headquarters Agreement, provides:

“Nothing in the agreement shall be construed as in any way diminishing, abridging, or weakening the right of the United States to safeguard its own security and completely to control the entrance of aliens into any territory of the United States other than the headquarters district and its immediate vicinity, as to be defined and fixed in a supplementary agreement between the Government of the United States and the United Nations in pursuance of section 13(3)(e) [sic] of the agreement, and such areas as it is reasonably necessary to traverse in transit between the same and foreign countries . . .”

The legislative history of Sec 6 indicates that the first sentence is to be read disjunctively, i.e., that it reserves to the U.S. the right to do two things:

- (1) to safeguard its security, and
- (2) completely to control the entrance of aliens into any territory of the U.S. other than the headquarters district and its immediate vicinity.

This construction means that:

- (1) the U.S. may deny access to the headquarters to aliens for security reasons, and

(2) the U.S. controls the entrance of aliens into the U.S. at large "completely", i.e., the U.S. may act in its own discretion in denying to aliens the right to enter the U.S. outside the headquarters district and its immediate vicinity.

The UN Secretariat would not concur in the foregoing. While Sec. 11 and 13 of the Agreement clearly contemplate the right of the U.S. to control the entry of aliens into the U.S. at large, at least in some cases, the UN has contended that the U.S. does not have such a right in all cases. The UN has always avoided giving any recognition, whether express or implied, to Sec. 6.

The Headquarters Agreement was brought into effect by an exchange of notes of November 21, 1947. The U.S. note states:

"Pursuant to instructions from my Government, I have the honor to inform you that the Government of the United States of America is prepared to apply the above mentioned Headquarters Agreement subject to the provisions of Public Law 357."

The U.S. position is that the Agreement is to be read together with Sec. 6. In view of the language of the U.S. note, it is difficult to see how the UN position that Sec. 6 does not have legal effect could prevail if a case were taken to arbitration in accordance with Sec. 21 of the Agreement.

The UN would probably contend that the Headquarters Agreement requires the U.S. to give equal treatment to delegations of all Members. There is no express provision in the Agreement to this effect and it is difficult to see how it could be sustained, as a matter of law, at least insofar as the question of access to the U.S. at large is concerned. The concept of equal treatment, to the greatest extent possible, is probably implicit in the fundamental purpose of the Agreement and the U.S. as a matter of policy has always sought to avoid distinctions in the treatment of delegations. The Department has also, in the past, avoided giving different treatment to delegations for the purpose of assisting the achievement of bilateral diplomatic objectives. So long as this policy is adhered to UN delegations would be restricted in their movements only for security reasons.

The provisions of the Headquarters Agreement are the same in the case of Secretariat employees, representatives of non-governmental organizations and persons invited by the UN to the headquarters on official business as in the case of delegation members.

Two considerations, however, indicate the desirability of treating Soviet and Satellite nations of the Secretariat with even greater circumspection than delegation members. (1) Some Soviet and Satellite nationals of the Secretariat are not sympathetic to the present regimes in their countries. They should not be classed with those Secretariat employees who are loyal to the Soviet and Satellite regimes. (2) The U.S. should act in each individual case on a presumption, until rebutted, that the individual concerned will be loyal to his obligations as an international civil servant.

In the case of correspondents, representatives of non-governmental organizations and invitees of the UN, communists who could not qualify for official visas and were therefore inadmissible under the Immigration Laws have been admitted by the Attorney General under the so-called Ninth Proviso.<sup>2</sup> In each case, since the enactment of the McCarran Act,<sup>3</sup> in which the Attorney General has admitted such a communist, he has restricted him to New York City and Long Island. No other definition of the area comprising the "immediate vicinity" of the headquarters has ever been applied.<sup>4</sup>

Subject: Passport requirement for entry of "3(7)" aliens

1. The actual rule of law which clearly expresses and formalizes the passport requirement seems to be a regulation which appears both as 8 CFR § 176.106 and as 22 CFR § 42.106:

42.106 Documentary requirements for nonimmigrants. With the exceptions hereinafter provided, and with such other exceptions as the Secretary of State may authorize in individual cases under Executive Order No. 8766 of June 3, 1941 (3 CFR, 1943 Cum. Supp.), a nonimmigrant must present an unexpired passport. A nonimmigrant seeking to enter the United States under section 3 (1), 3 (2), 3 (3), 3 (6), or 3 (7) of the act must also present a passport visa unless he is a nonimmigrant who may be issued, and who presents, a limited-entry certificate, a transit certificate or visa, or a nonresident alien's border-crossing identification card.

A related regulation in each case defines "passport" and "passport visa". 8 CFR § 176.101 and 22 CFR § 42.101:

42.101 Definitions. As used in this part, the term:

(e) "Passport" means a document of identity and nationality issued by the appropriate authorities of a recognized foreign government to which the bearer owes allegiance, identifying the bearer and stating his nationality or, in the case of an alien unable to obtain such a document, a travel document in the nature of a passport issued by a duly authorized official and showing the bearer's identity and nationality.

(f) "Passport visa" means a stamp which includes the word "seen", placed by a consular officer on an alien's passport or other appropriate document, showing that the bearer is entitled to proceed to a port of entry in the United States to apply for admission in a status specified in the passport visa. The term "non-immigrant visa" is also used synonymously with the term "passport visa."

2. Authority for the issuance of these regulations are 8 U.S.C. § 222, 458 and 22 U.S.C. § 223.

8 U.S.C. 222. Rules and regulations.

The Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization, with the approval of the Attorney General, shall prescribe rules and regulations for the enforcement of the provisions of this chapter; but all such rules and regulations, insofar as they relate to the administration by consular officers, shall be prescribed by the Secretary of State on the recommendation of the Attorney General.

8 U.S.C. 458. Administration and enforcement of registration law.

(a) The Commissioner, with the approval of the Attorney General, is authorized and empowered to make and prescribe, and from time to time to change and amend, such rules and regulations . . .<sup>1</sup> as he may deem necessary and proper in aid of the administration and enforcement of this chapter . . . except that all such rules and regulations, insofar as they relate to the performance of functions by consular officers or officers or employees in the Postal Service, shall be prescribed by the Secretary of State and the Postmaster General, respectively, upon recommendation of the Attorney General.

22 U.S.C. 223. War-Time restrictions; generally.

When the United States is at war or during the existence of the national emergency proclaimed by the President on May 27, 1941, or as to aliens whenever there exists a state of war between, or among, two or more states, and the President shall find that the interests of the United States require that restrictions and prohibitions in addition to those provided otherwise than by sections 223-226b of this title be imposed upon the departure of persons from and their entry into the United States, and shall make public proclamation thereof, it shall, until otherwise ordered by the President or Congress, be unlawful—

(a) For any alien to depart from or enter or attempt to depart from or enter the United States except under such reasonable rules, regulations, and orders, and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe; . . .

3. Historically, it is the last quoted statute which has been the source of the passport requirement. A sequence of Executive Orders governing documents required of aliens entering the United States is set forth in Immigration and Neutrality [Nationality] Laws and Regulations (1944 ed.), pp. 204-269. The original passport requirement was imposed in 1917 by a joint order of the State and Labor Departments antedating § 223 of Title 22. After the enactment of the statute, however, subsequent Presidential proclamations and orders were made with reference to the authority granted thereby.

The first regulations under the statute were issued by Ex.O. 2932 of August 8, 1918. They confirmed the passport visa requirement of the Joint Order. "Passport" was defined to include "any document in the nature of a passport issued . . . by a foreign government, which shows the identity and nationality of the individual . . ."

After a series of amendments to the order of 1918, new regulations made under the statute were issued by Ex.O. 4027 of June 14, 1924; Ex.O. 4125 of January 12, 1925; Ex.O. 4476 of July 12, 1926; Ex.O. 4813 of February 21, 1928; Ex.O. 5426 of August 20, 1930; and Ex.O. 5869 of June 30, 1932. All of these provided, as to non-immigrants, that "with the exceptions hereinafter specified, they must present passports or official documents in the nature of passports issued by the governments of the countries to which they owe allegiance, duly visaed by consular officers of the United States".

A significant innovation was made by Ex.O. 6986 of March 9, 1935, also based on § 223, which changed the relevant regulation to read:

1. Non-immigrants must present unexpired passports or official documents in the nature of passports issued by the governments of the countries to which they owe allegiance or other travel documents showing their origin and identity prescribed in regulations issued by the Secretary of State, and valid passport visas . . .

This provision was confirmed by Ex.O. 7865 of April 17, 1938; Ex.O. 8029 of Dec. 27, 1938; Ex.O. 8430 of June 5, 1940; and Ex.O. 8766 of June 3, 1941. (Note that this last order is cited in Reg. 106, above, for the Secretary of State's authority to make exceptions).

4. Authority to issue additional rules under the above orders was throughout given to the Secretary of State and the officer charged with administering the Immigration laws, first the Secretary of Labor and later the Attorney General. However, the new wording initiated with the order of 1935 indicates that responsibility for passport regulations under § 223 was delegated specifically to the Secretary of State. The present regulations also were issued by the Secretary of State (June 13, 1946; 11 F.R. 8904) upon recommendation by the Attorney General "insofar as the provisions of the Immigration Act of 1924 and the Alien Registration Act, 1940, are concerned".

5. It has been established since the opinion of the Legal Adviser (Mr. Gross) of May 24, 1948—reaffirmed September 13, 1948—that the requirement of a national passport or other evidence of deportability as a prerequisite of entry of aliens covered by Section 11(1) of the Headquarters Agreement must, when a passport or other such evidence is not available, be regarded as an "impediment" within the meaning of Section 11. There should be no doubt that to arrest entering international organization personnel, take away their identification papers, and release them on parole is equally an "impediment". In addition to the cited legal opinion, a good argument has been made that it would

6. Conclusions. If we take as established from the above (1) that the United States is obligated to admit UN personnel without national passports and without "technical arrest" or similar equivocal status, and (2) that the Secretary of State has the authority and responsibility to deal with the passport requirement by rules or regulations, the problem is what action this Department can appropriately take to assure the unimpeded entry of Section 11(1) aliens without affecting any more than absolutely necessary of the normal procedures and operations of the immigration laws. One possibility which has been mentioned is to make ad hoc "emergency" exemptions or waivers under Part I, § 5 of Ex. O. 8766, referred to in Reg. 106, above. The objections to this alternative need not be spelled out here. Another alternative might be considered:

The regulations as presently written already contemplate the substitution for national passports—"in the case of an alien unable to obtain such a document"—of "a travel document in the nature of a document issued by a duly authorized official and showing the bearer's identity and nationality". In view of what has been stated above about the origins of this provision and the Secretary of State's responsibility for its administration, it should be possible by an informal interpretative ruling to establish that in the cases of "international organization aliens" who are unable to obtain national passports, a travel document in the nature of a passport, issued by a duly authorized official of the international organization and showing the bearer's identity, nationality, and status in the organization, satisfies the definition of "passport". The requirement of some authoritative document identifying the alien, as an alternative to a national passport, could not reasonably be regarded as an impediment under Section 11, as the United States must be able to establish an alien's right to claim the benefits of the section at all. It should be possible to qualify the UN laissez-passer as such a document, provided it would contain a statement of the bearer's nationality.

The assurance of eventual departure, as a condition of the admissibility of non-immigrant aliens, is required by 8 U.S.C. § 215, which reads:

The admission to the United States of an alien excepted from the class of immigrant by clauses (1)-(6) or (7) of section 203 of this title . . . shall be for such time and under such conditions as may be by regulation prescribed . . . to insure that, at the expiration of such time or upon failure to maintain the status under which admitted, he will depart from the United States . . .

This section could be the basis for very stringent requirements, but the text clearly shows that it is not self-executing. The regulations promulgated by the Attorney-General (Nov. 28, 1950; 15 F.R. 8106) applying the section with reference to 3(7) aliens are found in Part 123 of 8 CFR. The following are relevant:

§ 123.1 Definitions. As used in this part, the term:

(b) "Foreign government representative" means an alien who is a representative of a foreign government in or to an international organization designated by the President by Executive order as entitled to enjoy privileges, exemptions, and immunities as an international organization under the International Organizations Immunities Act (59 Stat. 669; 22 U.S.C. 288), or a member of the immediate family of such representative and is in possession of a visa entitling him to apply for admission to the United States as a nonimmigrant under the provisions of section 3(7) of the Immigration Act of 1924, as amended (43 Stat. 154, 59 Stat. 669; 8 U.S.C. 203), and the presentation of such visa at a port of entry of the United States shall be considered prima facie evidence of such status: Provided, That the term "member of the immediate family" as used in this paragraph shall mean a close alien relative by blood or marriage of such representative who is regularly residing in the household of such representative.

(c) "Officer" means an alien who is an officer or employee of an international organization designated by the President by Executive order as entitled to enjoy privileges, exemptions, and immunities as an international organization under the International Organizations Immunities Act or a member of the immediate family of such officer: Provided, That the term "member of the immediate family" as used in this paragraph shall mean a close alien relative by blood or marriage of such officer who is regularly residing in the household of such officer.

§ 123.2 Qualifications. The conditions under which an alien may be admitted to the United States as a foreign government representative, or officer, or attendant, shall be that he:

(a) Presents whatever document or documents are required by the applicable Executive order or orders or by Part 176 of this chapter, or any other applicable regulations prescribing the documents to be presented by aliens entering the United States. If in the case of an attendant a valid passport is required, such passport must be valid for at least 60 days longer than the period of admission, as prescribed in § 176.500 of this chapter.

(b) Establishes, if he is an attendant, that he will leave the United States within the period of his admission or any authorized extension thereof, and that he has the ability to leave.

§ 123.3 Authority to admit. If an alien who is qualified under the provision of § 123.2 presents to the examining immigrant inspector at a port of entry of the United States a valid passport visa issued to the alien as a non-immigrant by a United States diplomatic or consular officer under the provisions of section 3(7) of the Immigration Act of 1924, as amended, the immigrant inspector shall accept the United States diplomatic or consular officer's classification of the alien and admit the alien unless specifically directed to the contrary by his superior officer after consultation with the Department of State. In the case of such direction, the immigrant inspector shall, except as otherwise provided in Parts 174 and 175 of this chapter, hold the alien for hearing before a board of special inquiry.

§ 123.4 Time for which admitted. (a) A foreign government representative or an officer shall be admitted for so long a period as he shall maintain his status as a foreign government representative or an officer.

Far from imposing—independently of other rules discussed previously—a requirement that representatives or officers present national passports, these regulations—particularly § 123.2 (a) and (b) distinguishing between such personnel and “attendants”—indicate that the qualifications determined by the other regulations (Part 176) are to control.

WASHINGTON, March 6, 1952.

Attached for clearance is the revised text of a letter to Justice,<sup>1</sup> signed for the Secretary by the Acting Legal Adviser, which sets out the construction of the passport regulations under which consuls have in fact approved visas in cases of UN officers and employees lacking valid national passports, and which construction, as a matter of law and correct reading of the current regulations, is a correct construction.

You will recall that at a meeting in your office on Friday, February 29, you and Mr. L'Heureux, Chief of the Visa Division, agreed that the Department should transmit such a construction of its regulations for the guidance of the Immigration and Naturalization Service should the Department of Justice and the Service raise no legal objection and should they agree to act in accordance with the construction and to eliminate the practice of “detention and parole”. It was agreed at the meeting in your office that the correctness of the practice and construction involved would be confirmed to our Consular officials.

The present wording has been discussed with the Chief Counsel of the Immigration and Naturalization Service<sup>2</sup> and with Mr. Herzog Plaine of Justice and will be satisfactory to them. Justice has further reached agreement with us that in the cases referred to there is no bar to admission deriving solely from lack of evidence of future ability to gain admission to a foreign country, and this conclusion of law is specifically recited in the attached letter.

I realize that the Visa Division holds strong views to the effect that in most, if not all, cases of persons falling in categories (1)-(7) of the exceptions to "immigrant" status set out in 22 USC § 203 there should, as a matter of policy, be a showing of probable ability to gain admission to a foreign country. The present letter would make a specific qualification to such a policy only in relation to the officers and employees referred to in the second part of § 203(7).

I trust that on the basis of the express limitations set out in this memorandum and embodied in the present letter itself, you will initial and approve the present letter so that we may formally confirm to Justice and Immigration the understanding reached with them and secure the elimination of the harmful and futile practice of "detention and parole" which in fact does not assure admissibility of aliens to other countries but does place it in the power of the Soviet Union and its satellites unjustly to penalize their nationals who work for the United Nations when those nationals lose favor with the Communist political machine.

The need for an immediate and effective solution of this problem, which was first formally presented to Justice in January of 1951, seems obvious, and is emphasized by the expected return to the United States of Assistant Secretary General Kerno of the UN on March 9. I understand that Mr. Kerno has not been granted a renewal of his passport by the Communist Government of Czechoslovakia.

Draft of Letter From the Secretary of State to the Attorney General of the United States (McGrath)<sup>1</sup>

[WASHINGTON,] March 6, 1952.

MY DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: In a number of instances in the recent past a misunderstanding seems to have arisen concerning the adequacy of the documentation of alien officers and employees of the United Nations who have arrived at ports of entry bearing "3(7)" visas issued on the strength of documents which do not include national passports. As a result, the inspection and admission of these aliens have been deferred, and they have been paroled, pending determination whether their documents satisfy the requirements of the relevant regulations.

Passports are required of aliens entering this country by virtue of regulations issued by the Secretary of State under Executive Order 8766 of June 3, 1941. The current regulations define "passport" to mean "a document of identity and nationality issued by the appropriate authorities of a recognized foreign government to which the bearer owes allegiance, identifying the bearer and stating his nationality or, in the case of an alien unable to obtain such a document, a travel document in the nature of a passport issued by a duly authorized official and showing the bearer's identity and nationality." [22 CFR § 42.101(e) ; 8 CFR § 176.101(e).] <sup>2</sup>

Officers and employees of the United Nations are international civil servants, who are obligated by Article 100 of the Charter of the United Nations to remain independent of their national governments. Careful adherence to this obligation of independence could suffice to subject some to the deprivation of their national passports. The fact that several of the detained persons are Czechs illustrates that a restrictive reading of the regulations to require national passports would merely accomplish the objective of Soviet satellite governments to prevent, by denial of passports, the continued work abroad of nationals who will not support the policies of the present regimes. To aid these governments towards that objective would not only violate international obligations but would also be inconsistent with the policy of the United States generally towards individuals who may be political victims of totalitarianism.

The regulation quoted above contemplates the possibility that an alien may be unable to obtain a national passport. It has not been construed to deny a "3(7)" visa, for lack of a national passport, to an alien who cannot obtain such a document and whose documents otherwise show his identity, nationality and status with the international organization.

The need for resolution of the "detention and parole" problem has again become particularly acute with the return of officers and employees of the Secretariat who have recently been abroad in the performance of their duties for the United Nations. With reference to the cases of United Nations personnel now or in the future raising this problem, therefore, this letter will confirm that the definition of Section 101(e) is satisfied, as to officers and employees of the United Nations unable to obtain national passports, by a travel document (the currently used laissez-passer or other travel document) issued by the United Nations establishing the alien's present status with that organization and which shows, or which is presented together with an expired national passport, certificates or affidavits certified by or sworn before authorized officials or other official documents which show the alien's identity and nationality. It has been recognized that no bar exists to the admission of such aliens solely because their travel documents may not evidence ability to gain future admission to another country.

It is understood that the present letter will remove the doubts giving rise to the procedure of detention and parole in the cases above referred to and will result in its discontinuance. If in a specific case there should remain a doubt whether the documents underlying an alien's "3(7)" visa entitle him to admission under this construction, this Department would welcome an opportunity to consult and to assist towards clarifying the application of the regulations.

Sincerely yours,

For the Secretary of State:

The Assistant Attorney General of the United States (Duggan) to the Deputy Legal Adviser of the Department of State (Tate)

WASHINGTON, April 1, 1952.

DEAR MR. TATE: This acknowledges receipt of your letter of March 7, 1952 in which you describe, for the Secretary of State, the travel documents that may be regarded as acceptable for officers and employees of the United Nations seeking to enter the United States in connection with their employment. As the representatives of the Department of State were previously advised, this Department recognizes that under Executive Order 8766 the responsibility for defining passports and other travel documents is reposed in the Secretary of State. The regulations issued by the Secretary of State and adopted by the Immigration and Naturalization Service, 22 C.F.R. 42.101 and 8 C.F.R. 176.101, have provided some guidance as to the travel documents that generally are deemed acceptable. Your letter furnishes further guidance as to additional types of travel documents that may be appropriate in relation to officers and employees of the U.N.

The Immigration and Naturalization Service has instructed its officers to follow the formulations of the Secretary of State, expressed in your letter, regarding the travel documents that are to be regarded as acceptable for officers and employees of the U.N. I assume that those formulations are being communicated to the consular officers and other officials of the Department of State, so that the policies applied in these cases will be consistent.

Sincerely yours,

Subject: Visa Application by Jiri Stary, Representative of Czechoslovakia to ECOSOC.

Participants: Mr. A. H. Feller,<sup>3</sup> UN Legal Department
USUN—Albert F. Bender, Jr.

Yesterday Feller asked me to come to his office to discuss this matter. He said that he was anxious to know how the U.S. Government intended to proceed should it find it necessary to deny Stary's visa application. I said that at the present time I could not answer his question for no decision had as yet been reached concerning the issuance or denial of the visa.

Feller said that he hoped that if the U.S. found it necessary to deny the visa, it would not find it necessary to invoke the Section 6 reservation of the Headquarters agreement. He said that he hoped that the Department realized that such an action would cause real difficulty for the UN. He said that he believed that the Secretariat would eventually be compelled to contest the U.S. position and request arbitration. In such an arbitration proceeding he believed it most unlikely that the State Department interpretation of the Section 6 reservation would be upheld, that is, he did not believe that the reservation would be read as entitling the U.S. to bar persons covered by Section 11 of the Agreement from the Headquarters District on the basis that such action was necessary to safeguard the national security. He said that if the reservation were interpreted in line with State Department views, it would vitiate the entire Headquarters Agreement.

We then discussed the possibility of justifying the denial of Stary's visa on the basis of the principle of Section 13 of the Agreement dealing with the deportation of persons covered by Section 11 who abuse their privileges of residence. Feller said that he thought that such a course of action would make it much more easy for the Secretariat to go along with us. He said that it was clear that there was a gap in the Agreement, and that the framers thereof had not envisaged a case such as Stary's. He said that while the decision would be a close one, he did not think he could take the position that Stary, if he had abused his privileges of residence while here previously, was entitled to a "second bite" at the host country. He felt that if we did base our action on Section 13 we should follow by analogy the procedures set forth in that Section with reference to deportation proceedings.

Feller said that, because of the SYG's present strong feelings against the Czechoslovakian Government, he would not take the initiative in contesting U.S. action with reference to Stary whether it was based on the Section 6 reservation or on Section 13. The Secretariat's hand would be forced, however, if ECOSOC requested the SYG for a report, as it had done in previous cases. Feller believed that the SYG would act only on the basis of such a request for a report, or on the basis of a Resolution of ECOSOC or the GA.

NEW YORK, June 10, 1952.

Subject: USUN Note of June 10, 1952 to SYG UN re Denial of Visa to Jiri Stary.

Feller advised me this afternoon that he had received our note mentioned above and that he was very much distressed by it. He said that he simply could not understand why we insisted upon raising the issue of the Section 6 reservation to the Headquarters Agreement. He said that it almost looked as if we were trying to line up 59 countries against the U.S. He said that in his opinion recourse to Section 6 was wholly unnecessary in view of the possibility of relying upon Section 13 of the Agreement, and that he frankly believed it was a "bone-head play".

I advised Feller that I had previously communicated to the Department his feeling that it would be unwise to rely upon Section 6 in connection with the Stary case, but that the Department had nevertheless reached a decision to the contrary.

Feller said that he had not yet discussed with Lie what action would be taken on the basis of our note. He said that the Secretariat obviously could not acquiesce in our position with reference to Section 6. He said that if ECOSOC called upon the Secretariat for an opinion, the Secretariat would have to take a position contrary to that of the U.S. with reference to reliance upon Section 6. He said that if this did not happen, he believed that the SYG UN would at least wish to address a note to the U.S. Government reserving his position with reference to the application of Section 6. He said that the SYG UN might well be subject to severe criticism if he did not do this and further, that his failure to take such action would undoubtedly be construed by the U.S. Government at some future date as acquiescence in its position.

Feller said that he was quite certain that our note would receive no present distribution by the Secretariat, and that the Czech delegation would not be advised of its receipt. I told him that it appeared possible that the Czech Government might shortly give some publicity to the matter because of the presentation of a note by our Embassy in Prague concerning our position on Stary. I said that, if this occurred, the Department would wish to release in Washington a copy of our note to the SYG UN, and that I would advise him immediately if there were any intention of doing this.

Feller said that he would let me know of any further thoughts the Secretariat might have on the subject.

NEW YORK, June 16, 1952.

The Secretary-General of the United Nations presents his compliments to the Acting Representative of the United States of America to the United Nations and has the honour to acknowledge the receipt of his note UN-2002/133 of 10 June 1952, concerning the application by Mr. Jiri Stary for a visa to proceed to the Headquarters of the United Nations as a member of the Czechoslovakian Delegation to the fourteenth session of the Economic and Social Council.

The Secretary-General takes note of the opinion of the Secretary of State that, had Mr. Stary not left his prior post on the permanent staff of the Czechoslovakian Representative to the United Nations and departed from the United States on 31 October 1951, it would now have been necessary to require, in accordance with the provisions of Section 13 of the Headquarters Agreement, that he depart from the United States. The Secretary-General is unable to take any position as to the applicability of Section 13 of the Headquarters Agreement in the present case, since he is in receipt of no official information from the Government concerned.

It is noted that the Secretary of State also considers that, in refusing a visa to Mr. Stary, the United States is acting within the authority which it reserved to itself by the provisions of the United States Representative's note of 21 November 1947, making the United States acceptance of the Headquarters Agreement subject to Section 6 of Public Law 357 to the effect that nothing in the Agreement shall be construed as in any way diminishing, abridging, or weakening the right of the United States to safeguard its own security and completely to control the entrance of aliens into any territory of the United States other than the headquarters district and its immediate vicinity. In this connection, however, the Secretary-General notes that, in the event that this provision had been intended to constitute a reservation, it was never considered by the General Assembly nor accepted by it. Accordingly, whether or not it has the effect of conditioning obligations under the Headquarters Agreement is a question for the General Assembly, which adopted the Agreement and authorized the Secretary-General to bring it into force.

[NEW YORK, July 1, 1952.]

Subject: Jiri Stary Case—Effect of Section 6 Reservation to Headquarters Agreement

Problem:

USUN and the Department presently face the problem of what action, if any, is to be taken in view of the exchange of notes, dated respectively June 10, 1952 and June 16, 1952 between USUN and the SYG UN, concerning the denial of a visa to Jiri Stary, a Czech representative to ECOSOC. USUN's note, based upon the Department's instructions, advised the SYG UN that in denying the visa, the U.S. acted within the authority reserved to it by the provisions of USUN's note to the SYG UN of November 21, 1947, making the U.S. acceptance of the Headquarters Agreement subject to Section 6 of PL 357-80th Congress. The SYG UN's reply noted that, if Section 6 had been intended as a reservation to the Headquarters Agreement, it had never been considered by the GA nor accepted by it and accordingly, whether or not it conditioned U.S. obligations under the Headquarters Agreement was a question for the GA.

Recommendations:

1. A reply to the SYG UN's note of June 16, 1952 should be deferred for the present to ascertain whether the Czech Government intends to raise the issue in ECOSOC.

2. If the Czechs raise the issue in ECOSOC, a reply should be made to the SYG UN's note of June 16 pointing out that U.S. action in denying a visa to Stary is based upon Section 13 of the Headquarters Agreement wholly apart from the Section 6 reservation, and concentrating on the justification of the visa denial under Section 13. With reference to the Section 6 reservation, the reply should state that the U.S. is prepared to discuss fully with the SYG UN the interpretation and effect of that Section.

3. If the issue is not raised by the Czechs during the ECOSOC session, a reply should be made to the SYG UN's note of June 16 after the close of the session, suggesting the need for consultation and discussion of the interpretation and effect of the Section 6 reservation.

Discussion:

The recent exchange of communications between USUN and the SYG UN, dated respectively June 10 and June 16, 1952, re the application of the Section 6 reservation to the Headquarters Agreement to the case of Jiri Stary, a Czech representative to ECOSOC, raises a serious problem.

USUN's note, charging that Stary had engaged in espionage activities when previously in the U.S. as a member of the Czech Permanent Delegation to UN, stated in accordance with the Department's instructions: "The Secretary of State also considers that in refusing a visa to Mr. Stary, the U.S. is acting within the authority which it reserved to itself by the provisions of the U.S. Representative's note of November 21, 1947, making the U.S. acceptance of the Headquarters Agreement subject to Section 6 of PL 357-80th Congress." The note earlier stated "Section 6 of PL 357-80th Congress provided in substance that nothing in the Headquarters Agreement shall abridge, diminish or weaken the right of the U.S. to safeguard its security."

The SYG UN's reply took note of USUN's reference to the Section 6 reservation and stated "In this connection, however, the SYG notes that, in the event that this provision had been intended to constitute a reservation, it was never considered by the GA nor accepted by it. Accordingly, whether or not it has the effect of conditioning obligations under the Headquarters Agreement is a question for the GA, which adopted the Agreement and authorized the SYG to bring it into force".

USUN's note to the SYG also made reference to Section 13 of the Headquarters Agreement indicating that, if Stary were at present in the U.S., it would now be necessary to require, in accordance with the provisions of that Section, that he depart from the U.S. because of his abuse of his privileges of residence while here.

The SYG's reply noted this reference to Section 13 and stated that "The SYG is unable to take any position as to the applicability of Section 13 of the Headquarters Agreement in the present case, since he is in receipt of no official information from the Government concerned".

Although the Czech government has been informed of the denial of Stary's visa in a note almost identical with that sent to the SYG UN, it has not and perhaps will not make an issue in the UN of the denial of a visa to Stary. The Government did file an official protest with the Embassy in Prague almost two months ago charging that the failure to issue a visa constituted a violation of the Headquarters agreement and of the Charter, but no publicity was given to it. There has been some publicity given in the Washington, but not New York, newspapers and on the radio to our note of June 10 to the SYG UN, but as yet no publicity has been given to the SYG UN's note of June 16.

It appears advisable to await possible action by the Czech Government during the ECOSOC session before replying to the SYG UN's note of June 16. A reply at this time might give rise to further publicity and induce the Czechs to take action in ECOSOC which they otherwise would not take. The U.S. position in ECOSOC has already been prejudiced by the discussion of visa problems of ECO representatives, and further discussion of such problems in that forum should be avoided, if at all possible.

A reply will obviously have to be made to the SYG UN's note of June 16 if the Czech Government raises the issue in ECOSOC. Feller (US) has previously advised that he believed the Secretariat could go along with a contention that the denial of Stary's visa could be justified upon the principle of Section 13 of the Agreement which provides that a person such as Stary may be required to leave the U.S. for abuse of his privileges of residence. In his note of June 16, the SYG UN specifically left open the question of the applicability of this section to the instant case "since he is in receipt of no official information from the Government concerned". Accordingly it seems advisable, should the Czechs raise the issue in ECOSOC, to reply to the SYG UN's note of June 16 by concentrating on the justification of U.S. action under Section 13 and advising the SYG UN that the U.S. is prepared to discuss with him the interpretation, application and effect of the Section 6 reservation. For reasons stated below, such consultation is necessary in any case.

Should the ECOSOC session conclude without such a protest, it appears desirable to make a reply at that time. The Department has taken the position with the Congress that Section 6 is effective as a reservation and does condition U.S. obligations under Sections 11 and 13 of the Agreement. In my opinion, the Department would be subject to Congressional criticism at a later date if it did not pursue the matter further after having received the SYG UN's note. In any case, clearly the matter at issue is so important that an attempt ought be made in the near future to resolve it with the SYG UN, by negotiation if possible, or failing that, by arbitration.

To understand the matter at issue between the U.S. and the SYG UN, it is necessary to review the history of the negotiation of the Headquarters Agreement.

[Here follows a lengthy exposition of the negotiation of the Headquarters Agreement and the events bringing it into effect.<sup>2</sup>]

In view of the history of the negotiation of the Headquarters Agreement and of the notes bringing it into effect it would appear that one of the following situations exists:

a. It is the Department's position as I understand it that the Headquarters Agreement is in effect and the obligations of the U.S. contained in Sections 11 and 13 of the Agreement (not to impose impediments to transit to or from the Headquarters District of certain categories of aliens regardless of laws and regulations of the U.S. relating to the entry of aliens) are conditioned by the provisions of Section 6 of PL 357. This position is based upon the Department's belief that the legislative history of Section 6 indicates a Congressional intent to condition U.S. obligation under Section 11 and 13 of the Agreement, upon the fact that the provisions of Section 6 were specifically called by the SYG to the attention of the GA which approved the Agreement, and the fact that Ambassador Austin's note of November 21, 1947 specifically stated that the U.S. was prepared to apply the Headquarters Agreement "subject to the provisions of PL 357".

b. The position of the SYG UN as I understand it is that the language of Section 6 is such that on its face it indicates no intention on the part of the U.S. to reserve the right to deny access to the Headquarters District should it believe its security was endangered and, accordingly, Section 6 does not condition obligations contained in Section 11 and Section 13 of the Agreement. The SYG UN presumably will claim that neither he nor the GA had cognizance of or was bound by the legislative history of Section 6 in the Congress, and that both he and the GA were entitled to rely upon a normal reading of the language of Section 6 when approving and bringing the Agreement into effect. Accordingly even though Section 6 was called to the attention of the GA which approved the Agreement and even though Ambassador Austin's note contained the above-mentioned reference to PL 357, the Agreement came into effect with the exchange of notes without any reservation by the U.S. conditioning its obligations under Sections 11 and 13 of the Agreement. The SYG UN has support for his position in the fact that the U.S. Representative in the Sub-Committee of Committee 6 of the GA opposed any discussion of the effect of Section 6 on the Agreement, and no attempt was made by the U.S. to make clear the position which it now asserts either in Committee 6, in the Plenary or in Ambassador Austin's note.

c. If the U.S. insists that its interpretation of Section 6 was made clear to the GA when the Agreement was approved and to the SYG UN when notes were exchanged bringing the Agreement into effect, and if the SYG UN maintains his position that this interpretation was not understood by the GA or himself, then it can be argued that there never was a meeting of minds and that the Agreement has never become effective. This is clearly a position which neither the SYG nor the Department would want to have established.

The SYG UN's note of June 16, 1952 appears to be incorrect in stating that whether or not Section 6 had the effect of conditioning the obligations of the U.S. under Sections 11 and 13 of the Agreement is a question for the GA. Presumably, if the SYG UN cannot be convinced by consultation of the soundness of the U.S. position, there should then be sought a decision by an appropriate tribunal with respect to the combined legal effect of the enactment of PL 357, the approval of the Agreement by the GA and of the exchange of notes purporting to bring the Agreement into effect. Such a legal determination could be had under the arbitration provisions of Section 21 of the Agreement. Although Section 6 is not a part of the Agreement as signed, nevertheless its invocation by the U.S. has now given rise to a "dispute between the UN and the U.S. concerning the interpretation or application of this Agreement" within the meaning of Section 21. This Section, of course, provides for arbitration only where such a dispute "is not settled by negotiation or other agreed mode of settlement".

It is my personal opinion that a court of arbitration might well refuse to uphold the position of the Department. I think it is clear that the arbitrators would consider the legislative history of Section 6 to be irrelevant since the Congressional intent claimed by the Department to be disclosed by that history was never brought officially to the attention of the SYG UN or of the GA when the Agreement was approved and brought into effect. Accordingly, only the language of Section 6 would be considered by an arbitration panel. While Section 6 does state that "nothing in the Agreement shall be construed as in any way diminishing, abridging or weakening the right of the U.S. to safeguard its own security . . .", it contains in the same sentence a specific clause dealing with the reservation by the U.S. of its right to control the entrance of aliens. The right reserved is that "completely to control the entrance of aliens into any territory of the U.S. other than the Headquarters District and its immediate vicinity as to be defined and fixed in a supplementary agreement between the Government of the U.S. and the UN in pursuance of Section 13(3) (c) of the Agreement, and such areas as it is reasonably necessary to traverse in transit between the same and foreign countries". (Underlining inserted.) In view of this language it might well be held that Section 6 did not evidence as intent to reserve any right of the U.S. to control the entrance of aliens into the Headquarters District, its immediate vicinity and areas to be traversed in transit. Further, in view of the specific language in Section 6 dealing with the control of the entrance of aliens, it would be unusual statutory construction to read into the general provision reserving the right "to safeguard its own security" an intent relating to the control of entrance of aliens. Full effect could be given to this general provision as relating to matters other than the control of the entrance of aliens. It is conceivable that the security of the U.S. might be threatened by the manner in which UN attempted to exercise rights granted to it in provisions of the Headquarters Agreement other than those of Sections 11 and 13, for example, the provisions of Section 4 permitting the UN to establish and operate short wave radio broadcasting facilities, and the provisions of Section 5 permitting the UN to establish and operate an airdrome.

The Acting Legal Adviser (Tate) to the Deputy Under Secretary of State for Administration (Humelsine)

[WASHINGTON,] June 20, 1952.

Subject: The Requirement of "Passports" for International Organization Officials

The requirement that non-immigrant aliens who seek entry into this country must present "passports" has created difficulties for a number of officers of international organizations, primarily from countries in Eastern Europe, whose official duties require their travel to and from the United States, but who are denied renewal of their passports by the present governments of their countries of nationality. Having only expired, or no, national passports along with their visas, such aliens have been detained at the port of entry and technically "paroled" into the United States by the Immigration and Naturalization Service, supposedly pending clarification of the adequacy of their documents.

The regulations define "passport" as:

" . . . a document of identity and nationality issued by the appropriate authorities of a recognized foreign government to which the bearer owes allegiance, identifying the bearer and stating his nationality, or, in the case of an alien unable to obtain such a document, a travel document in the nature of a passport issued by a duly authorized official and showing the bearer's identity and nationality." 22 CFR § 42.101 (e) ; 8 CFR § 176.101 (3).

On March 7, 1952, with the concurrence of Mr. Boykin and Mr. L'Heureux of your area and of UNI, I wrote to Assistant Attorney General Duggan to confirm the understanding reached informally with the Immigration and Naturalization Service that, as to officers and employees of the United Nations unable to obtain national passports, the above definition is satisfied by certain other documents. This letter was acknowledged by a reply dated April 1, 1952, which stated that the formulation in the letter would be followed by the Immigration and Naturalization Service.

Because inability to obtain or renew national passports confronts personnel of other international organizations than the United Nations (e.g., the Bank and the Fund), doubts concerning the adequacy of their travel documents have continued to create problems for the Immigration and Naturalization Service. Accordingly, a further letter was prepared in my office giving INS confirmation that the interpretation of our passport regulation set forth in the letter of March 7 applies equally to officers of other international organizations within the terms of Section 3(7) of the immigration law. We have been so far unable, however, to secure clearance for this letter in CON or VD, with the result that it has not yet been possible to send any communication to the INS on the International Bank case now before it, and concerning which the Service has renewed its inquiry.

The immigration laws and regulations of the United States are the same for personnel of the UN and of other public international organizations. To my knowledge there is no new factor in the situation since March to call for a change in the position we took then. I propose, therefore, that we proceed now to confirm that position to INS in the case of international organizations other than the UN, so that the unnecessary and embarrassing problem of these admissions on "parole pending inspection" can be eliminated.

Memorandum of Telephone Conversation, by the Assistant Legal Adviser for United Nations Affairs (Meeker)

[WASHINGTON,] July 1, 1952.

Subject: Passports for 3(7) aliens.

I called Mr. Winings this morning to inquire whether the Immigration and Naturalization Service might not consider that our understanding concerning passports, in the case of United Nations officials, would apply by strict analogy in the case of an officer of the International Bank who is unable to obtain a passport but possesses a laissez-passer and either an expired national passport or other official documents showing his identity and nationality.

Mr. Winings said he recalled very clearly the discussions which had been held between officers of the Department of State and the Department of Justice earlier this year on the subject, and he recalled that the Department of Justice had then taken the position that the passport regulations were regulations which the Department of State itself made and interpreted; on that basis the Immigration and Naturalization Service had accepted the interpretation of the regulations relating to UN officials.

Mr. Winings inquired how much of an extension would be involved if the interpretation of the passport regulations were applied by analogy to the officials of UN specialized agencies. I told him that we had considered this question and had concluded (a) that it would not affect all of the classes of persons entitled to come to the United States under the Headquarters Agreement, and (b) that the number of international officials involved would be very small, since most of the specialized agencies had their headquarters outside the United States and in any event very few of their officials were unable to secure passports.

Mr. Winings asked whether the Department of State had sent to the Department of Justice any communication regarding application of the passport regulations interpretation to specialized agency cases. I told him that the Department had not, and that the purpose of my telephone call was to see if the matter might not be dealt with on an informal basis. He said that he could not give an immediate answer, and that he would want to talk with policy officers of the Immigration and Naturalization Service. He thought they might wish to have a formal communication from the Department of State. Mr. Winings said he would let us know in a few days.

Subject: Passports for 3(7) aliens.

Participants: Mr. Gordon, Office of General Counsel, Immigration and Naturalization Service;
Mr. Meeker, L/UNA.

Mr. Winings asked Mr. Gordon to get in touch with me concerning my conversation last week with Mr. Winings, in which I asked whether the Immigration and Naturalization Service would consider that our understanding concerning passports in the case of UN officials would apply by analogy in the case of officers of specialized agencies who are unable to obtain passports but possess laissez-passeurs and either an expired national passport or other official documents showing identity and nationality.

Mr. Gordon said that he and Mr. Winings had discussed this matter with administrative officials in the Immigration and Naturalization Service. The conclusion had been reached that the cases of specialized agency officials in this category would be few and, it was expected, were likely to cause little difficulty. Mr. Gordon said that therefore the Immigration and Naturalization Service would have no trouble in agreeing with us that the same interpretation should be applied with respect to specialized agency officials as was agreed earlier this year with respect to UN officials. However, Mr. Gordon recalled that the understanding between the Departments of State and Justice concerning interpretation of the passport regulations had been intentionally limited to the case of UN officials. The Immigration and Naturalization Service, therefore, felt it should have a further communication from this Department covering the situation of specialized agency officials. He said that the passport regulations were regulations of the Department of State, and that while the INS was prepared to accept our interpretation of the regulations it wished to have some written record of the interpretation made by the State Department.

Mr. Gordon suggested that, to expedite the matter, the State Department send a further communication to the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization, for the attention of the General Counsel.

Subject: Use of Franking Privilege by Latin American Delegations to the United Nations

In accordance with your request, we have considered the question raised by Mr. Monsma (ARA) whether or not the Latin American delegations to the UN are entitled to the franking privilege under the Postal Convention of the Americas and Spain.

Our files show that this question was carefully considered last year. On July 10, 1951, L/UNA concurred, as did L/A and the Post Office Department, in a memorandum which Mr. Kerry (UNI) addressed to Mr. Hickerson, wherein it was concluded that the Latin American delegations to the United Nations were not entitled to the franking privilege under this Convention. It was generally agreed that the grant of the franking privilege for the "correspondence of members of the diplomatic corps of the signatory countries" of this Convention did not extend to members of delegations to the UN. We see no reason to change our position with respect to this question.

From a policy standpoint, moreover, we can well appreciate UNA's position that all delegations to the UN must be treated alike. To accord the franking privilege to a third of the delegations would place this government as host in a most untenable position with the other delegations. This is particularly true because we most probably could not obtain the franking privilege for these other delegations.

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Regional American Affairs (Cale) to the Director of the Office of International Administration and Conferences (Ingram)

[WASHINGTON,] July 25, 1952.

Subject: Use of Franking Privilege by Latin American Delegations to the UN.

Following receipt of your memorandum of July 2<sup>1</sup> concerning use of the franking privilege by Latin American delegations to the UN, we have very carefully reconsidered this matter and can come to no other conclusion but that it would be very undesirable to tell the Latin American delegations at the UN which are now reportedly using the franking privilege that they must discontinue its use.

We believe that such action would seriously affect cooperative working relations with the Latin American delegations on substantive matters at the forthcoming General Assembly and other UN meetings.

As you know we have also been apprehensive that if the Latin American delegations at the UN were denied the franking privilege, the next step might be to deny the privilege to delegations to the Organization of American States. Although the OAS privileges and immunities bill has now passed Congress we still feel that to deprive the Latin American delegations to the OAS of the franking privilege would have a serious effect on our relations with the other American Republics in the OAS. Because of lack of necessary legislation we were not able for many years to give the special ambassadors to the OAS appropriate privileges and immunities. If, now that the privileges bill has passed, we were to withdraw the franking privilege, they would have difficulty in escaping a feeling that we were intentionally trying to spite them. Incidentally, when ARA agreed to deferment of the question until after the 81st Congress it was specifically understood that ARA's concurrence in such a deferment did not carry with it an implication that we would agree to withdrawal of the franking privilege if the privileges and immunities bill passed.

L/UNA's memorandum of July 1 indicates that they "see no reason to change our position with respect to the question". ARA believes that the foregoing considerations are sufficiently weighty to merit a reconsideration of the position. ARA recommends that the Legal Ad-

USE OF FRANKING PRIVILEGE BY DELEGATIONS FROM THE AMERICAN REPUBLICS TO THE UNITED NATIONS

I have been asked to review the matter of whether or not delegations from the American Republics to the United Nations are entitled to the franking privilege under the Postal Convention of the Americas and Spain.

While under international law the property of a foreign state is not subject to taxation, postal fees are not in the nature of taxes but rather in the nature of charges for services rendered. Also, under international law, a receiving state has the obligation freely to permit and protect official communications of diplomatic missions. There is, however, no obligation for the receiving state to extend the franking privilege to diplomatic missions. Whether diplomatic officers are entitled to the franking privilege is therefore to be determined by reference to applicable provisions of treaties, if any, or to domestic law, or both. There is no authority under which foreign diplomatic officers in the United States may, in the absence of an agreement, use the frank in connection with the despatch of mail.

The Act approved December 29, 1945, "To extend certain privileges, exemptions, and immunities to international organizations and to the officers and employees thereof, and for other purposes", Pub. L. 291, 79th Cong., 1st sess., 59 Stat. 669, contains provisions in Section 2 that—

"(d) Insofar as concerns . . .<sup>1</sup> the treatment of official communications, the privileges, exemptions, and immunities to which international organizations shall be entitled shall be those accorded under similar circumstances to foreign governments."

By Section 9 of the Act it is provided that the benefits provided for therein "shall be granted notwithstanding the fact that the similar privileges, exemption, and immunities granted to a foreign government, its officers, or employees, may be conditioned upon the existence of reciprocity by that foreign government". Accordingly, the official communications of the United Nations as a "designated" organization under the Act are entitled to such treatment as the United States accords to foreign governments under similar circumstances and without regard to reciprocity. Foreign governments generally are not entitled to the franking privilege.

Article 5 of the Headquarters Agreement for the United Nations, signed June 26, 1947, TIAS 1676, provides with respect to "Resident Representatives to the United Nations" that they—

"shall, whether residing inside or outside the headquarters district, be entitled in the territory of the United States to the same privileges and immunities, subject to corresponding conditions and obligations, as it accords to diplomatic envoys accredited to it."

By Joint Resolution of August 4, 1947, the Congress authorized the President to bring the Headquarters Agreement into effect, thus approving this executive agreement. Pub. L. 357, 80th Cong., 1st sess. From this it appears that "Resident Representatives", as defined in the Headquarters Agreement—and they are defined—are entitled to the "same privileges" as the United States accords to accredited diplomatic envoys, subject to the same conditions and obligations. But the United States does not extend the franking privilege generally to diplomatic envoys accredited to it. It extends the privilege pursuant to treaty obligations.

So far as non-resident representatives to the United Nations are concerned, Section 11 of Article IV of the draft General Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations, adopted by the General Assembly February 13, 1946, but as yet unapproved by the United States, would stipulate:

"Representatives of Members to the principal and subsidiary organs of the United Nations and to conferences convened by the United Nations, shall, while exercising their functions and during their journey to and from the place of meeting, enjoy the following privileges and immunities:

"(g) such other privileges, immunities and facilities not inconsistent with the foregoing as diplomatic envoys enjoy, except that they shall have no right to claim exemption from customs duties on goods imported (otherwise than as part of their personal baggage) or from exercise [excise] duties or sales taxes."

Section 16 of Article IV provides that "In this article the expression 'representatives' shall be deemed to include all delegates, deputy delegates, advisers, technical experts and secretaries of delegations." It is unnecessary to dwell on the scope of these provisions for the reason that the Convention is not legally in effect. Even if it were, it would not include the franking privilege as diplomatic envoys generally do not in the absence of specific treaty provision enjoy the franking privilege.

Under the Pan American Postal Union Convention, signed at Buenos Aires September 15, 1921, 42 Stat. 2154, provision was made in Article 6 for granting the franking privilege to members of the Diplomatic Corps of the Contracting Parties. The Convention signed at Madrid November 10, 1931, for the Postal Union of the Americas and Spain, likewise contained provision for the extension of the franking privilege to members of the Diplomatic Corps, among others. 47 Stat. 1924. The Convention for the Postal Union of the Americas and Spain, revised from time to time, was last revised at Madrid November 9, 1950.

Article 14 of the 1950 Convention for the Postal Union of the Americas and Spain, TIAS 2286, contains the following provisions with reference to the franking privilege:

"1. The contracting parties agree to grant the franking privilege in their domestic service and in the Americo-Spanish service:

* * * * *

"b) To correspondence of members of the Diplomatic Corps of the signatory countries.

"c) To official correspondence which Consuls and Vice Consuls acting as Consuls send to their respective countries; to that which they exchange among themselves; to that which they address to the authorities of the country in which they are accredited and to that which they exchange with their respective Embassies and Legations, provided reciprocity exists.

* * * * *

* * * * *

"5. The exchange of correspondence of the Diplomatic Corps, between the Secretariats of State of the respective countries and their Embassies or Legations, will be reciprocal between the contracting countries, and will be effected in open mail or by means of diplomatic pouches, in accordance with the provisions of Article 107 of the Regulations of Execution. These pouches will enjoy the franking privilege and all the safeguards of official despatches.

"6. The franking privilege dealt with in this Article does not apply to the air service nor to the other special services existing in the Americo-Spanish regime or in the domestic regimes of the Contracting countries."

By Article 14 it is accordingly provided that members of the Diplomatic Corps of the Contracting Parties shall reciprocally be granted the franking privilege for all correspondence generally, and not merely "official correspondence" as designated for Consuls and Vice Consuls, and that the franking privilege shall also be granted to the official correspondence sent and received by the Pan American Union in Washington. The privilege does not extend to the air service nor to other special regimes existing in the Americo-Spanish regime or in the domestic regimes of the contracting countries.

Accordingly, "All correspondence (official and personal) of members of the diplomatic corps of Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Salvador, Spain, Uruguay, and Venezuela" is entitled to admission in the domestic and international mails by surface means free of charge. United States Official Postal Guide, July 1951, Part I, Ch. III, Art. 72; and Part II, Ch. II, Art. 31, Sections 37.1 to 37.21, Postal Laws and Regulations, 1948.

By the Act approved July 10, 1952, "To extend certain privileges to representatives of member states on the Council of the Organization of American States", Pub. L. 486, 82d Cong., 2d sess., it is provided that the President is authorized to extend, or to enter into an agreement extending, "to the representatives of member states (other than the United States) on the Council of the Organization of American States, and to members of their staffs, the same privileges and immunities, subject to corresponding conditions and obligations, as are enjoyed by diplomatic envoys accredited to the United States."

On July 22, 1952, the Bilateral Agreement between the Organization of American States and the Government of the United States of America, was signed, under Article 1 of which it is provided:

"The privileges and immunities which the Government of the United States of America accords to diplomatic envoys accredited to it shall be extended, subject to corresponding conditions and obligations:

"a) To any person designated by a Member State as its Representative on the Council of the Organization of American States;

"b) To all other permanent members of the Delegation regarding whom there is agreement for that purpose between the Government of the Member State concerned, the Secretary General of the Organization, and the Government of the United States of America."

It certainly was not intended by the drafters of the United Nations Headquarters Agreement that there should be a differentiation as between classes of diplomatic envoys to the United Nations (representatives of members of the Postal Union for the Americas and Spain and non-members of the Union) in the type of diplomatic privileges which they should enjoy. The United States draftsmen did not so intend. And there is nothing to indicate that the Congress of the United States in approving the Headquarters Agreement so intended.

The Convention for the Postal Union of the Americas and Spain was revised in November 1950, and there is nothing to indicate that the drafters of the Agreement intended that the provision granting the franking privilege reciprocally to members of the Diplomatic Corps of the signatory countries should be understood to refer to representatives to the United Nations. A similar provision had been in the preceding agreements relating to the Postal Union of the Americas and Spain and to the earlier Pan American Postal Union. The language was not changed with the advent of the United Nations having its site located in the United States. In addition, the Convention for the Postal Union of the Americas and Spain contains an express provision with reference to the franking privilege and the Pan American Union. Further, for the United States to assume the cost of paying for the postal services for the representatives of the other States Parties to the Convention so far as their representation in the United Nations is concerned, would place an inequitable burden on one member of the Postal Union of the Americas and Spain. Presumably this was not intended. Finally, the granting of the franking "privilege" is not to be lightly read into a Convention by implication, as it involves a serious financial burden on the part of the United States.

For all these reasons, it seems doubtful that the Department should take the position that the resident representatives of the American Republics to the United Nations are entitled to the franking privilege.

The Secretary of State to the Attorney General of the United States (McGranery)

[WASHINGTON,] October 14, 1952.

MY DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: The enclosed copy of a communication from the Secretary General of the United Nations, dated August 4, 1952, addressed to the Permanent Representative of the United States to the United Nations, concerning Section 247 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (P.L. 414, 82d Congress),<sup>1</sup> is forwarded to you for your consideration in regard to the actions to be taken by you under the above-mentioned provision.

Section 247 (b) of the Act provides that status as an immigrant can be maintained by an employee of the United Nations who has been lawfully admitted for permanent residence in the United States, and who presently "requests that he be permitted to retain his status as an immigrant and who, in such form as the Attorney General may require, executes and files with the Attorney General a written waiver of all rights, privileges, exemptions, and immunities under any law or any executive order which would otherwise accrue to him because of the acquisition of an occupational status entitling him to a non-immigrant status under paragraph 15 (A), 15 (E), or 15 (G) of Section 101 (a)."

As the Secretary General points out, it is necessary to distinguish between privileges and immunities which accrue to the employee in his personal capacity and which can be waived by the employee, and those which accrue to the employee in his official capacity and which can be waived only by the international organization itself. In regard to the first category, it may be surmised that Section 247 does not require the waiver by immigrant alien employees of any privileges or immunities enjoyed by employees who are United States citizens.

The fact that most privileges and immunities are contained in the second category follows from the very nature of the privileges and immunities themselves. This is particularly true in regard to immunity from legal process relating to the official acts of an international organization. This Department concurs in the assumption by the Secretary General that "no waiver by any such individual officer or employee will be deemed to constitute in any way a waiver of rights, privileges, exemptions, or immunities which accrue not to him personally but to the United Nations as an international organization."

In order that a clear distinction be maintained between privileges and immunities which may and which may not be waived by an employee in his individual capacity, the following draft of a waiver is submitted for consideration by the Department of Justice in carrying out its functions under Section 247(b) of the Immigration and Naturalization Act:

I, _____, an employee of _____, which has been designated as an "international organization" under the provisions of the International Organizations Immunities Act (P. L. 291, 79th Congress), hereby waive all rights, privileges, exemptions, and immunities which accrue to me individually as an employee of said international organization. This does not constitute a waiver of any right, privilege, exemption or immunity which can only be waived by the organization itself, and in particular it does not constitute a waiver in regard to an immunity from legal process relating to official acts of the organization.

Sincerely yours,

For the Secretary of State:

The Secretary of State to the Embassy in South Africa

CONFIDENTIAL
No. 10

[WASHINGTON,] October 31, 1952.

The Secretary of State refers to the Embassy's despatch No. 232, October 15, 1952<sup>1</sup> regarding the issuance of a visa to the Reverend Michael Scott to permit him to attend sessions of the General Assembly of the United Nations. The Embassy requests background information for guidance in answering questions that may arise on this case.

It will be recalled that the problem of the issuance of a visa to Mr. Scott last arose in 1950 when he wished to attend the Fifth General Assembly. It was determined at that time that he was not admissible to the United States under the immigration laws. The Office of the Legal Adviser in an opinion dated September 26, 1950 took the position that Section 11(4) of the Headquarters Agreement obligates the United States to permit the entry of representatives of non-governmental organizations only when they have come to consult with ECOSOC or its subsidiary bodies or in accordance with the arrangements made by ECOSOC for such consultation but not to attend meetings of the General Assembly. Mr. Scott therefore was not eligible for a visa as an NGO representative. Section 11(5) of the Headquarters Agreement, however, makes provision for the entrance of persons coming to the United Nations on official business when invited by the United Nations. Mr. Scott was finally invited by the Fourth Committee to attend its sessions and the United States was obligated to issue a visa to him as an invitee.

When Mr. Scott applied at Embassy London in August 1952 for a visa to attend the current session of the General Assembly, he again was found inadmissible under the immigration laws.

However, recent resolutions passed by the General Assembly and ECOSOC deal with the invitation of NGO's to attend public sessions of the General Assembly.

General Assembly Resolution 606 (VI) authorizes the Secretary General, upon request by ECOSOC or its Committee on Non-governmental Organizations, to make arrangements to enable the representative designated by any non-governmental organization having consultative status to attend public meetings of the General Assembly whenever economic or social matters are discussed which are within the competence of the Council and of the organization concerned". ECOSOC Resolution of June 25, 1952 "requests the Secretary General to invite each such [non-governmental] <sup>2</sup> organization in categories A and B to send its representative to attend public meetings of the General Assembly at which economic and social matters within its competence are discussed".

Invitations were extended in August 1952 by the Secretary General to such non-governmental organizations, including the International League for the Rights of Man. The League designated Mr. Scott as its representative, who then had the status of an invitee and was eligible for a visa under Section 11(5) of the Headquarters Agreement.

Considerable agitation had occurred in connection with Mr. Scott's admissibility in 1950, and it was the opinion of the Department that similar public interest would be taken in the case this year, particularly if any public discussion should take place concerning the United States attitude toward his admissibility. It was assumed that, if he were denied a visa on other grounds, the Fourth Committee would again issue him an invitation to attend its sessions, in which case a visa would have to be issued. Such a course, however, might involve public discussion in the United Nations which would be embarrassing to the United States.

In view of these considerations, therefore, and in view of the fact that Mr. Scott comes within the provisions of Section 11(5) of the Headquarters Agreement, the Department requested the Attorney General to authorize his admission under the Ninth Proviso.

On October 9, 1952, the Attorney General authorized Mr. Scott's temporary admission in transit to the United Nations Headquarters site, subject to the following conditions: 1) that he will proceed directly to New York City or Lake Success, New York and will not go outside of New York City or Long Island, New York except as may be necessary incident to his departure from the United States; 2) that he will remain in the United States no longer than is necessary for the purpose for which he is admitted to the United States; 3) that upon the expiration or cancellation of any invitation by the United Nations he will depart forthwith from the United States; 4) that in case of abuses of his privileges of residence in the United States by activity in this country outside his official capacities he will not be exempt from the laws and regulations of the United States regarding the continued residence of aliens.

Should questions on this subject arise, the Embassy may, in its discretion, point out that Mr. Scott is inadmissible into the United States as a visitor under the immigration laws. A person representing a non-governmental organization which has been invited by the United Nations to come to the United Nations Headquarters, however, is entitled to entry under Section 11(5) of the Headquarters Agreement, and the United States is thus obligated to issue a visa to such invitee for the purpose of transit to the United Nations Headquarters.

The South African Embassy at Washington has been informed of the substance of the foregoing paragraph.

The Acting Secretary of State to the Attorney General of the United States (McGranery)

[WASHINGTON,] December 19, 1952.

MY DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: On October 14, 1952, the Legal Adviser of this Department sent you a letter in regard to your functions under Section 247 of the new Immigration and Nationality Act (P.L. 414, 82nd Congress). That section reads as follows:

Sec. 247. (a) The status of an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence shall be adjusted by the Attorney General, under such regulations as he may prescribe, to that of a nonimmigrant under paragraph (15) (A), (15) (E), or (15) (G) of section 101(a), if such alien had at the time of entry or subsequently acquires an occupational status which would, if he were seeking admission to the United States, entitle him to a nonimmigrant status under such sections. As of the date of the Attorney General's order making such adjustment of status, the Attorney General shall cancel the record of the alien's admission for permanent residence, and the immigrant status of such alien shall thereby be terminated.

The Legal Adviser, in his referenced letter, made a suggestion that the waiver contemplated in Section 247 (b) should be put in such form as to specifically distinguish between privileges and immunities which accrue to the individual and those which accrue to the foreign government or international organization. Representatives of this Department have been informed by the General Counsel of the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization, Mr. Winings, that no such distinction will be made, and that it is intended to issue the waiver in a paraphrased version of the general language of Section 247 (b) itself.

This Department has received numerous inquiries from foreign governments, international organizations, and individuals who will be affected by Section 247 of the Act. In general, they seek clarification of the meaning of the language in Section 247(b). The foreign governments and international organizations are interested, among other things, in the effect of the contemplated waivers upon immunity of their officers and employees from suit for official acts, and the relation of the waiver to Section 116(h) of the Internal Revenue Code. There have been a myriad of questions in regard to the future immigration status of aliens who elect not to sign the waiver, but who wish to return to an immigrant status after termination of their employment by a foreign government or international organization. In addition, this Department has certain questions in regard to the privileges and immunities which are guaranteed under treaties, rather than under domestic laws or executive orders.

As a matter of sound administrative practice and in justice to the individuals concerned, it would seem highly preferable to have these questions answered before requiring that an immigrant elect whether or not to execute a waiver. In addition, such a course would obviate a great deal of unnecessary tension between this Government and foreign governments and international organizations. Therefore, I strongly urge you to delay issuing an Order under Section 247 which will make an adjustment in status until answers to the more important questions have been given.

In the next few days the Legal Adviser to this Department will send to you a legal memorandum covering the major points mentioned above. If you agree with the memorandum, it is hoped that you will adopt it in whole or in part as the basis for a formal Opinion on the subject.

Sincerely yours,

DAVID BRUCE

The Deputy Attorney General of the United States (Malone) to the Deputy Legal Adviser of the Department of State (Tate)

CONFIDENTIAL

WASHINGTON, December 23, 1952.

DEAR MR. TATE: Reference is had to your letter of November 24, 1952<sup>1</sup> concerning the Reverend Michael Scott whose temporary admission in transit to the United Nations Headquarters Site at New York was authorized under the Ninth Proviso to Section 3 of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917, as amended, notwithstanding his inadmissibility as one who had been a member of the Communist Party. This authorization was given for the sole purpose of permitting him to participate in the present session of the General Assembly of the United Nations on the recommendation of the Secretary of State that Mr. Scott's admission for that purpose would be in the national interest.

As you have pointed out, since Mr. Scott's arrival here, several individuals and organizations have sought his services as a public speaker and have requested this Department to lift the restrictions placed on Mr. Scott's admission which confine his activities to those within his official capacities with the United Nations. In each instance, it has been found necessary to deny these requests.

In accordance with your suggestion, I have reviewed our position with regard to these requests for Mr. Scott's services as a speaker. In doing so I have had in mind, as you have suggested, that a ruling that Mr. Scott may not undertake the engagements offered him without violating the terms of his admission may meet with criticism from some sources and that to authorize these engagements subject to this Department passing on his speeches in advance would be equally controversial. Indeed, forceful criticism of the Department's action might also result if these engagements were authorized under any circumstances.

After consideration of all the facts I have concluded that, in view of the nature of the ground which makes Mr. Scott an inadmissible alien, no change would be warranted in the position of the Department that Mr. Scott be required to adhere strictly to the terms of his admission which preclude any activities not within his official capacities with the United Nations.

You have also requested advice as to what the Department of State may say in reply to an inquiry received from the Right Reverend Horace W. B. Donegan, Bishop of New York, concerning an invitation extended to Mr. Scott to preach at services at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. For your guidance in that respect, there is enclosed a copy of a letter from the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization to Mr. Roger Baldwin, Chairman of the Board of Directors of the International League for the Rights of Man, which responds to a request for authorization for Mr. Scott to speak at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, as well as other places.

Sincerely,

The Acting Assistant Attorney General of the United States (Lyons) to the Legal Adviser of the Department of State (Fisher)

WASHINGTON, January 5, 1953.

DEAR MR. FISHER: I enclose herewith a copy of a letter dated December 30, 1952, from the Attorney General to Secretary of the Treasury John W. Snyder in his capacity as Chairman of the National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Problems. This letter deals with the regulation and form of waiver for the effectuation of section 247 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (P.L. 414, 82d Congress), as related to alien employees of certain international organizations in the United States; and I believe will serve to answer your letter on the same subject addressed to the Attorney General on October 14, 1952, which has been under consideration by the Immigration and Naturalization Service, and which was referred just a few days ago to this office after discussions by members of your staff and of the Treasury Department with the General Counsel of the Immigration and Naturalization Service.

While your letter related to alien employees of the United Nations, and the Secretary of the Treasury was concerned with alien employees of the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, I believe we can assume that the problems are the same and that the view and suggestion of the Attorney General can apply equally to the situation discussed in your letter.

Sincerely yours,

ELLIS LYONS

[Enclosure]

The Attorney General of the United States (McGranery) to the Chairman of the National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Problems (Snyder)

WASHINGTON, December 30, 1952.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: This is to acknowledge your letter of December 4, 1952,<sup>1</sup> relating to the waiver of rights, privileges, exemptions, and immunities by alien employees in the United States of the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, which waiver will be required under section 247 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (P.L. 414, 82d Cong.).

Section 247 of the act provides substantially that an alien, who was admitted to this country for permanent residence and is an employee of an international organization, shall have his status adjusted to that of a nonimmigrant unless he executes and files with the Attorney General a written waiver of all rights, privileges, exemptions, and immunities under any law or executive order which would otherwise accrue to him because of his occupational status.

You have expressed concern that the regulation or form of waiver for the effectuation of this section should make it clear that the waiver is not intended to apply to any right, privilege, exemption, or immunity which can only be waived by the employing organization itself. In addition, I understand that members of your Department and of the State Department met with the General Counsel of the Immigration and Naturalization Service on the same subject, and made the point that the foreign missions and international organizations affected desire assurance that the waiver of rights, privileges, exemptions, and immunities by the officer or employee of the mission or organization will in no wise affect the rights, privileges, exemptions, and immunities which accrue to the mission or organization, as distinguished from those which accrue to the individual officer or employee thereof.

The new regulation, which will become effective in this matter on December 24, 1952 (Title 8, Part 247), follows the language of the statute; and the waiver form pursuant to the regulation (Form I-508, copy of which is attached) does likewise, with neither of them including any attempt at interpretation. On the face of the statute, of the regulation, and of the waiver form, I see nothing which affects the international organization, as such, or its rights, privileges, exemptions, and immunities. Hence, I see no compelling need at this time for alterations or interpretations in the regulation or the waiver form, unless we have not understood the possible damaging implications that might follow from the execution of one of these waiver forms by an alien employee of one of the international organizations.

I would therefore suggest, if you or members of your staff are aware of or foresee any concrete situations in which the international organizations will be unintentionally prejudiced by the regulation or the waiver form, that you set these situations out specifically for us to consider and, if need be, to remedy the unintended results.

I trust that this procedure will meet with your approval and the approval of the National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Problems.

Sincerely,

[JAMES P. McGRANERY]

Memorandum for the Standing Committee, Interdepartmental Committee on Internal Security (ICIS)<sup>1</sup>

[WASHINGTON,] February 10, 1953.

In its report to the ICIS of January 11, 1951, the Standing Committee recommends that the Departments of State and Justice re-examine proposed unilateral definition or delimitation of the "headquarters site and its immediate vicinity" of the United Nations with a view to limiting the area drastically in the interest of protecting the security of the United States against aliens "actually or potentially" dangerous when coming to such an area but who might not constitute a serious threat to our internal security if they could be confined to a more restricted area in the United States.

Section 101(a) (15) (G) of Public Law 414 of the 82nd Congress, known as the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, defines the class of non-immigrant alien destined to an international organization. There is no limitation on the area within the United States in which such non-immigrant alien may travel once he gains entry into the United States. The privileges, exemptions and immunities of such aliens are set forth in the International Organizations Immunities Act (8 U.S.C. 203). Section 6 of the Joint Resolution by which Congress consented to the Headquarters Site Agreement between the United States and the United Nations provides that nothing in the agreement shall be construed as in any way diminishing, abridging or weakening the right of the United States to safeguard its own security and completely to control the entrance of aliens into any territory of the United States other than the headquarters district and its immediate vicinity as to be defined and fixed in a supplementary agreement between the United States and the United Nations and such areas as it is reasonably necessary to traverse in transit between the United Nations and foreign countries. The pertinent statutes and resolutions, above referred to, other than the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, are set forth in the report to the ICIS of January 11, 1951.

Since the adoption of the recommendation by ICIS, State and Justice Department representatives have conferred from time to time to re-examine the definition of the "headquarters site and its immediate vicinity." No resolution of the problem has been achieved, however, through these conferences. It is reported that the United Nations officials will refuse to confer regarding the immediate vicinity of the headquarters site of the United Nations until the Senate shall take action on the proposed Convention relating to privileges and immunities of the United Nations personnel.

Security considerations strongly suggest a drastic limitation of the area in which personnel attached to the United Nations may reside or travel while in attendance at or employed by the United Nations. The investigative efforts of this nation have been thwarted or seriously impeded, for example, by the purchase by the Soviet Union of a large estate on Long Island outside the boundaries of the city of New York. Surveillances of every type have been thwarted by the care with which personnel favorable to the Soviet Union have been able to take advantage of the Soviet estate on Long Island to avoid detection. There have been several investigations of espionage activities engaged in by United Nations personnel which have been rendered far more difficult because of the wide area that has to be covered in any such operation. While it is possible to limit the travel of diplomats of Soviet and Soviet-bloc nations assigned to Washington, there is no limitation at the present time on the travel of any Soviet or Soviet-bloc personnel or Communists of other nations who are assigned to the United Nations. The security problem applies not only to Soviet and Soviet-bloc delegates and employees at the United Nations but also to such of the delegates and employees from other countries who are Communists.

A drastic limitation of the immediate vicinity of the headquarters site of the United Nations which for security reasons should mean the Borough of Manhattan would, it is realized, seriously interfere with the activities of persons favorable to the United States. It is believed, for example, that several of the British delegates or employees live in surrounding counties such as Westchester. There is no reason, however, why persons engaged in activities inimical to the United States should be allowed freedom to travel or reside where they wish. If the desired objective, therefore, cannot be achieved without undue interference with persons and nations friendly to the United States, it is suggested that some other means must be examined by which the objective can be achieved.

It is proposed, therefore, that the ICIS give serious consideration to recommending that legislation be sponsored which will require that persons who fall within the category of Section 101(a)(15)(g) of the Immigration and Nationality Act be issued visas limiting them to travel within the city in which the international organization meets and for travel to and from that city from the port of entry. In the case of the United Nations, such a visa would be valid only for travel within the Borough of Manhattan of the City of New York. The Secretary of State should have the discretion, however, to issue visas to such non-immigrant aliens as he has at the present time or, in the alternative, the limited type of visa herein suggested. By this method the Secretary of State, acting through appropriate consular representatives abroad, could issue the limited visa to any suspected individual, including all persons from the Soviet Union and from Soviet dominated countries and the present type of non-immigrant visa to all persons from friendly nations concerning whom there is no reason to suspect that they might engage in activities inimical to the security of the United States. Such legislation should apply not only to persons to whom the visas are to be issued in the future but to all persons at present in the United States who fall within the category of Section 101(a)(15)(g) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, giving such persons, of course, a reasonable period of time within which to obtain the new visa. Furthermore, any violation of such visa limitations should be a ground for immediate deportation.

These proposals are forwarded on behalf of the Justice Department conferees and although these proposals have been discussed informally within the Department, there has been no opportunity to obtain a Departmental policy at this time and they are, therefore, submitted as the proposals of the Department's conferees.

[WASHINGTON,] February 27, 1953.

Subject: Section 247 of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952

1. During the last few days, the Legal Department of the United Nations Secretariat has brought to the attention of the U.S. Mission in New York some additional instances of difficulty arising out of Section 247 in the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952. The Legal Department states that in the last ten days three individuals covered by Section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement have been refused regular entry into the United States because they would not sign the waiver form (I-508) under Section 247. These three cases occurred at New York. Two of the individuals are Secretariat employees: Mrs. Lucienna Erville and Mr. Lyulph Stanley; the third is a member of the Belgian Mission in New York, Mr. Jacques Errera. In each of these cases, after considerable delay, the individuals were admitted upon signing a parole agreement. Under the parole agreement the individual is subject to call, to periodic reporting to the immigration authorities, and to subsequent hearing. In the cases of Mrs. Erville and Mr. Errera, hearings before a board of inquiry have been scheduled for Monday, March 2, and Wednesday, March 4. It is not known what action will be taken at these hearings.

The United Nations Legal Department has also called to the attention of the U.S. Mission in New York this case of Mrs. Erika Kuepfer, a Secretariat employee. Mrs. Kuepfer, holding a valid reentry permit, presented herself at Miami on February 7, 1953 for admission to the United States. She was denied admission unless she would execute a waiver form. She asked to sign a parole agreement instead, but was informed that it would be necessary to detain her until she executed the waiver. Mrs. Kuepfer and her husband were thereafter confined in a Miami hotel until she would sign Form 508. She asked to write upon the form a reservation of the position of the Secretary-General, her husband having telephoned to UN officials in New York. Mrs. Kuepfer was not permitted to write this reservation on the form, but was told that a statement in this regard would be appended to the form on a separate sheet of paper.

2. Yesterday a Mr. MacDonald of the Department of Justice telephoned me regarding Section 247. He said that he was in Hersel Plaine's office over there, and that the State Department's correspondence on the subject of Section 247 was assigned to him. He wished to ask various questions about the State Department memorandum attached to our letter of January 8.<sup>2</sup> He said that the issues were very difficult and that he did not know what could be done in replying to the State Department's letters. He said that for the moment he could only refer the tax aspect of the matter to the Treasury, to ascertain their views.

I asked Mr. MacDonald if the Justice Department could not hold up the enforcement of Section 247 until they had given us answers as to the effect which waivers under the section would have. He said this seemed to him a reasonable procedure, but that he was not in a position to do anything in this regard. I said that the Department of State urgently needed answers to the questions which we had posed earlier, in order that the situation might be clarified for the foreign governments and international organizations concerned, since we were receiving an increasing flow of protests from the latter. Mr. MacDonald said that he did not see any answer, and thought that perhaps the best thing would be for all individuals simply to sign the waiver, with the effects and consequences of the waiver left for determination in subsequent litigation.

[WASHINGTON,] March 6, 1953.

Subject: Possible Restriction of Alien Personnel at the United Nations

I am attaching a draft letter to the Attorney General prepared for the signature of General Smith, together with a copy of the tentative Justice Department proposal for the restriction of "international organization" aliens, particularly at the United Nations, to which the draft letter is addressed. The Justice Department memorandum has been under study within the Department and the United States Mission to the United Nations, and was the subject of a meeting in my office with Messrs. Tate and Meeker of L, Mr. Barbour of EE, and Mr. Ylitalo of CON.

The draft letter to the Attorney General is not intended to represent a State Department position which has been agreed to at this time, as the aforementioned meeting served only to clarify the issues involved and not to secure agreement on a given course of action. However it does represent an approach which this Bureau is prepared to support, and I would like to see if you will agree that it is adequate as a basis for discussion with the Under Secretary. If this is agreed to, and if the Under Secretary should determine that this is the position for the Department to take, he may wish to send a letter on this order or, alternatively, to discuss the matter orally with the Attorney General.

The Acting Secretary of State to the Attorney General of the United States (Brownell): Draft Letter

MY DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: Officers of the Department of Justice who are concerned with your Department's participation in the deliberations of the Interdepartmental Committee on Internal Security (ICIS) have developed a memorandum, dated February 10, 1953, for the Standing Committee on the subject of restrictions for United Nations personnel. This memorandum recommends for ICIS consideration that legislation be sought to authorize the issuance of visas, in the case of the United Nations, which are valid only for admission to the United Nations Headquarters District in New York and the immediate vicinity, and that such visas be issued in the future to persons whose freedom of movement should be restricted for reasons of security. The proposal states, in part:

“Security considerations strongly suggest a drastic limitation of the area in which personnel attached to the United Nations may reside or travel while in attendance at or employed by the United Nations. The investigative efforts of this nation have been thwarted or seriously impeded, for example, by the purchase by the Soviet Union of a large estate on Long Island outside the boundaries of the City of New York. Surveillances of every type have been thwarted by the ease with which personnel favorable to the Soviet Union have been able to take advantage of the Soviet estate on Long Island to avoid detection. There have been several investigations of espionage activities engaged in by United Nations personnel which have been rendered far more difficult because of the wide area that has to be covered in any such operation.”

The memorandum of February 10 makes it clear that the proposal is put forward on behalf of the Department of Justice conferees, and is not submitted as a proposition of departmental policy. We in the Department of State greatly appreciate having the benefit of these preliminary views of the officers of your Department and have given the proposal careful consideration. As a result of this consideration, we would like to ascertain if it is the formal conclusion of the Department of Justice that restrictions should be imposed on the movements of certain foreign delegation and Secretariat personnel at the United Nations.

As you know, the only foreign personnel at the United Nations who have been restricted to date have been a limited number of correspondents, invitees and representatives of non-governmental organizations, otherwise inadmissible, who have been issued visas under the discretionary authority of the Attorney General. In Washington there has been no restriction of foreign diplomatic personnel on security grounds, the existing regulations with respect to the travel of personnel of the missions of the Soviet Union, Hungary and Rumania having been adopted as measures of retaliation. For the United States to enter upon a policy of general restrictions at the United Nations will have repercussions on our relations with other members of the United Nations the full measure of which cannot be gauged at the present moment. At the same time, if it is the considered opinion of the Department of Justice that confinement of the movement of certain persons to a limited geographic area is essential to the conduct of investigations and surveillance operations necessary in the interest of national security, the Department of State will concur wholeheartedly in the imposition of such restrictions.

If restrictions are to be imposed, however, it is the opinion of the Department of State that an effective program of restriction can be entered upon without recourse to legislation as contemplated in the Department of Justice memorandum. The proposal put forward in the memorandum would have the Administration request special legislation requiring that aliens falling within Section 101 (a) (15) (g) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, i.e., members of the delegations of foreign governments to an international organization and alien personnel of the secretariats of international organizations, and members of their families and servants, be issued visas limiting them to travel within the city in which the international organization meets and travel to and from that city and the port of entry. In the case of the United Nations, it is proposed that the "city" be considered as the Borough of Manhattan of the City of New York. No suggestion is made as to the appropriate area in the cases of the International Monetary Fund, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the Organization of American States, and the Pan American Sanitary Bureau, all of which have their headquarters in Washington. The memorandum further suggests that the Secretary of State would be authorized to make exemptions in individual cases.

The legislative approach embodied in the memorandum would appear to have serious shortcomings. It makes no provision for the restriction of persons already admitted to the United States. If restrictions were to be imposed prior to admission only, the delays in the issuance of visas which would result would not purchase the degree of protection desired, inasmuch as the relevant security information would, in many cases, be developed after admission.

As stated above, it is the view of the Department of State that adequate authority already exists for the imposition of restrictions, and the delay which would be involved in the introduction and consideration of legislation can and should be avoided if restrictions are deemed to be necessary. In the case of the United Nations this authority is contained in the provisions of Public Law 357, 80th Congress. While the authority is not as explicit in the case of the organizations headquartered in Washington, we are confident that any necessary restrictions here could be applied and enforced without great difficulty. It is assumed that any cases deemed to require restriction would be occasional only, inasmuch as Czechoslovakia is the only Iron Curtain country holding membership in an organization located in Washington. In any event, it is our understanding that the immediate question exists with respect to the United Nations alone.

In the imposition of restrictions at the United Nations or elsewhere, the Department of State would expect the Department of Justice to notify it of those persons who should be restricted. While the Department of Justice would undoubtedly wish to apply the restriction uniformly to all persons within certain categories, such as delegations of Iron Curtain countries, it may be helpful toward an understanding that the restrictions are for the purpose of security rather than retaliation if they are generally considered as applying to individuals. While the Department of State would appreciate being informed of the particulars of each case requiring restriction which falls outside certain group categories, it would not propose to pass upon determinations of the Department of Justice in any way. Once a policy of restriction is decided upon, foreign policy considerations do not operate to make a distinction as between individual cases, and any distinction should be based on security considerations alone. For its part, the Department of State would attempt to keep the Department of Justice advised of any information pertinent to the determinations to be made by the Department of Justice.

The determinations of the Department of Justice that certain persons or groups of persons should be restricted would be conveyed by the Department of State, through the United States Mission to the United Nations in New York, to appropriate authorities at the United Nations. In the case of members of an international secretariat, their families and servants, the appropriate authority would be the Secretary General. This would also be true in the case of invitees, representatives of non-governmental organizations, and correspondents. In the case of members of delegations, their families and servants, the appropriate authority would be the chief of delegation. The Department of State would also notify the authorities of the conditions of restriction and the procedures whereby authority might be requested of the Department of Justice for travel outside the area of restriction. If the restrictions, once imposed, should be violated in any respect, this would be considered an abuse of privileges of residence within the meaning of Public Law 357 and the individual would lose his exemption from the laws and regulations regarding the continued residence of aliens. As it is assumed that any person restricted would be one not normally admissible under the provisions of Public Law 414, 82nd Congress, the removal of his exemption would make him subject to deportation.

If restrictions are imposed on persons at the United Nations in New York, the reliability of our statements to the effect that they are imposed on security grounds may be publicly challenged when it is recognized that comparable restrictions are not to be imposed on all diplomatic missions of Iron Curtain countries here in Washington. We would therefore wish to have the assistance of the Department of Justice in the development of such information as may be made public with respect to the differences in the security situation as between New York and Washington.

Mr. Skora opened the meeting with a restatement of the problem, emphasizing particularly the questions of immunity from suit, tax exemption on official salaries, and the question of the applicability of section 247 to international agreements. Stress was placed on the urgent need for a ruling by the Attorney General, in view of the scores of inquiries from foreign governments and international organizations and because of the actual cases which have arisen as a result of the requirement of waiver as a prerequisite for a reentry permit for an immigrant temporarily leaving the country.

Mr. Fensterwald added that it was unconscionable to require immigrants to execute a waiver, the effect of which is in doubt, and that foreign governments were not now permitting their employees to sign until the effect is clarified, particularly with respect to immunity from suit.

Mr. Rankin inquired regarding the views of the Department of State and was informed that the Department's position, as stated in its letter of January 9, 1953 to the Attorney General, was that the law did not require a waiver of privileges which inure to a government or to an international organization and that perquisites accorded by international agreements were not intended to be affected.

Mr. Rankin indicated an opinion that the law was intended to waive all benefits which an immigrant enjoyed by virtue of his employment with a government or international organization without any hair-splitting as to whether the employer or the immigrant employee was the prime beneficiary of the privilege. Mr. Rankin expressed doubt as to whether the Attorney General should render any ruling on the inquiries. It was his belief that the questions could be settled only by a court and that even if the Attorney General should render an opinion it would be subject to reversal by a court; that if a ruling were to be rendered it would of necessity be a liberal rather than a limited construction of the law in order to protect the Department of Justice. It may be desirable, he said, for each Department of the Government to administer those privileges which fall within its province.

Mr. Allen of the Bureau of Internal Revenue stated, in response to an inquiry by Mr. Rankin, that Internal Revenue had been studying the tax problem and while no conclusion had been reached, he was of the opinion that in the absence of a treaty provision, tax exemption provided by section 116 (h) of the Internal Revenue Code was waived. He had not reached any conclusion regarding the effect of the section on treaty provisions according tax exemptions.

Mr. Lyons of the Department of Justice said he construed the intent of Congress, in enacting this section, to place immigrants on a plane with United States nationals. Any perquisites which are enjoyed by United States nationals would continue to be enjoyed by an immigrant after executing a waiver. He was of the opinion that it was immaterial whether the privilege flowed from a statute or a treaty; the intent of Congress was to relate immigrants to the status of citizens.

Mr. Skora was asked what privileges are enjoyed by United States citizens employed by foreign governments or international organizations and he replied that immunity from suit was probably the only privilege accorded generally but there may possibly be treaties which accord citizens special treatment, although he was unaware of any such treaty.

Mr. Rankin then stated he realized the Department of State was in a difficult position and that the Department of Justice would try to be of assistance; that Justice would attempt a reply to the letter of the Department of State<sup>2</sup>, from the standpoint of an intent of Congress to relate the status of immigrants to the status of citizens; that the intent of Congress to affect treaty provisions would be investigated; however, if it is determined that treaty provisions are affected, that Justice would probably rule that section 247 is not inconsistent with nor abrogates any treaty provisions since the immigrant can continue to enjoy treaty privileges by not executing the waiver and suffering the loss of immigrant status.

Mr. Lyons asked that the Department of State furnish a list of privileges which are accorded United States citizens.

Further, this Commission cannot decide what position the SYG shall take in representing the UN on a question such as this. Participants: Mr. Rogers—Deputy Attorney General
UNA—Mr. John D. Hickerson

Upon the basis of Mrs. Hahn's telephone conversation with Mr. Rogers, Deputy Attorney General, yesterday evening concerning the Luckock case, Mr. Hickerson called Mr. Rogers this morning. We had understood from the report of Mrs. Hahn's conversation given to Mr.

Kotschnig that Mr. Rogers had not fully understood the requirements of the Headquarters Agreement and of the possible consequences of a refusal in this case, particularly the possibility of arbitration being requested by the Secretary General of the United Nations.

Mr. Rogers told Mr. Hickerson that subsequent to his telephone conversation with Mrs. Hahn he had reviewed the case again and had discussed it with the Attorney General. It had been decided that no change would be made in the Attorney General's decision transmitted to us by letter denying the request for Ninth Proviso action. The Attorney General is especially concerned by the association of applicant Luckock with the Rosenberg case and of the possible consequence of agitation in this country resulting from her admission. He said they were quite prepared to face the consequences of arbitration if it should be demanded by the Secretary General.

The Attorney General's decision should accordingly be transmitted to the Secretary General and Mrs. Hahn authorized to make whatever statement is required in the Commission on the Status of Women.

The United States Representative at the United Nations (Lodge) to the Department of State

CONFIDENTIAL
PRIORITY

NEW YORK, March 25, 1953—11:25 a. m.

578. For the Secretary. The first case in which the US has refused entry to the UN Headquarters District to a representative of a non-governmental organization with consultative status has just arisen from a decision of the Attorney General which precludes the granting of a visa to Margarett Luckock, a Canadian national designated by a Communist-dominated group, WIDF (see Deptel 348 of March 19). The implications of this decision in our relations with the UN I should like to set out:

1. Since Section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement between the US and UN provides that federal authorities shall not impose any impediment to transit to or from the Headquarters District by certain representatives of NGO's, of whom Luckock is one, recognized by the UN for purposes of consultation, the Attorney General has rested his decision in this case on Section 6 of the joint resolution of the 80th Congress, Public Law 357, which provides, in part, that nothing in the Headquarters Agreement shall be construed as abridging the right of the US to safeguard its own security and completely control the entrance of aliens into any territory of the US other than the Headquarters District and its immediate vicinity.

2. Since Margarett Luckock is in all probability an alien inadmissible under the Immigration and Nationality Act, in order for her to obtain a visa it would be necessary for the Attorney General to approve, under Sec 212(D) (3) of the act, a recommendation of the Secretary of State that she be admitted. In cases of this sort in the past, such approval has been given.

In the present case, however, the Attorney General has refused approval of a recommendation for admission. Finding that Mrs. Luckock is excludable under Section 212(A) (29) of the act as a person who would probably engage in subversive activities after entry into the US. Such a finding precludes approval under Section 212 (D) (3).

3. The SYG UN has in a note dated March 19 (mytel 569) called to my attention Luckock's entitlement to be admitted to the US under the provisions of Section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement. It has previously been the position of the SYG that Section 6 is not a valid reservation by the US to Section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement. Since the US in denying a visa to Luckock is relying on the determination of the Attorney General that she is excludable under Section 212 (A) (29) and that the denial of her admission falls under Section 6 of the joint resolution and arises out of the right of the US to safeguard its own security, I am wondering what facts, if any, we will be able to make available to the SYG in support of this finding. I think it is of some political importance to explain the reasons for this decision to friendly UN delegations as well as to the SYG.

4. In the light of the difference of opinion between the US and the SYG on the scope of Section 6 of the joint resolution in relation to Section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement, it may well be that the US will be drawn into arbitration of this question under Section 21 of the Headquarters Agreement which provides that any dispute concerning interpretation or application of the agreement shall be referred for final decision to a tribunal of three arbitrators. If this should occur, it might be particularly important to have available the facts on which the decision of the US is based, excluding Luckock pursuant to Section 6. This also raises the question, of course, what the position of the US would be in the event of an adverse decision arising out of such arbitration.

5. Another possible course of action other than excluding this alien, such as the imposition of restrictions on her movements and unofficial activities has, I assume, been considered and rejected.

6. If it is to be a general policy, broader than the instant case, for the Attorney General to give wide application to the provisions of Section 212(A) (29) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, this fact will have an important effect upon US-UN relations which probably should be considered at this time.

In conclusion, the Luckock case is being exploited in the Commission on the Status of Women in which the USRep, Mrs. Hahn, is finding the US position under daily attack. Any tentative or partial answers on some of the points raised above would help Mrs. Hahn in setting forth the rationale of the US position, although she and I understand that technically the legal questions are for discussion and negotiation between the US and the SYG UN.

Memorandum by the Assistant Legal Adviser for United Nations Affairs (Meeker) to the Legal Adviser (Phleger)

SECRET

[WASHINGTON,] March 26, 1953.

Subject: Headquarters Agreement with the United Nations

In the Headquarters Agreement with the United Nations, the United States has engaged to permit certain classes of individuals to come into the United States in order to go to the United Nations in New York. Section 11 of the Agreement defines these classes. The President was authorized to bring the Headquarters Agreement into effect by Public Law 357 of the 80th Congress. Section 6 of that public law provides, in part:

"Nothing in the Agreement shall be construed as in any way diminishing, abridging, or weakening the right of the United States to safeguard its own security and completely to control the entrance of aliens into any territory of the United States other than the headquarters district and its immediate vicinity, . . ."

Section 212(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act sets forth 31 categories of inadmissible aliens. Three of these categories are based on security criteria: Section 212(a)(27), 212(a)(28), and 212(a)(29). Section 212(d)(3) of the Immigration and Nationality Act authorizes the Attorney General to waive the grounds of inadmissibility for non-immigrant aliens other than the grounds set forth in subparagraphs (27) and (29).

In the past, a number of aliens entitled to enter the United States under Section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement have been inadmissible under Section 212(a)(28) of the Immigration and Nationality Act. In these cases, the Department of State has recommended that the Attorney General waive the inadmissibility, on the ground that such waiver in the particular case was in the national interest. Although at times there have been delays in securing a decision, the waivers have, in the end, been granted.

Two very recent cases, however, have been handled differently, raising problems. A Canadian national, Mrs. M. R. Luckock, sought to enter the United States to attend a meeting of the United Nations Commission on the Status of Women, under Section 11(4) of the Headquarters Agreement. She sought to come as a representative of the Women's International Democratic Federation, a Communist-dominated organization. She appeared to be inadmissible under Section 212(a)(28) of the Immigration and Nationality Act. This Department requested the Department of Justice to waive her inadmissibility. The Department of Justice, for the first time, denied the request, stating that the information forwarded to Washington by the consul showed that Mrs. Luckock fell within Section 212(a) (29) of the Immigration and Nationality Act. The information forwarded by the consul had covered two points: (1) Mrs. Luckock held hostile views toward the United States Government, and (2) at a public meeting in Canada, she sponsored a resolution criticizing the course of the Rosenberg spy case. Mr. Hickerson and Mrs. Hahn (our representative on the Status of Women Commission) talked by telephone with Mr. Rogers, the Deputy Attorney General, about the Luckock case, but apparently did not discuss the legal aspects under the Immigration and Nationality Act and the Headquarters Agreement.

A French national, Madame M.-C. Vaillant-Couturier, is now seeking to come to the United States for the April meeting of the United Nations' Economic and Social Council, again under Section 11(4) of the Headquarters Agreement. Like Mrs. Luckock, Madame Vaillant-Couturier would be a representative of the W.I.D.F. The Department's visa office has informed UNA of its determination that Madame Vaillant-Couturier falls within Section 212(a) (29) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, and of its decision not to request a waiver of inadmissibility by the Department of Justice. From the facts available to this Office, it is not clear whether the view of the visa office is based on Madame Vaillant-Couturier's status with the W.I.D.F., or on additional facts. Unless a recommendation is made to the Department of Justice, the applicant will not receive a visa and will not be admitted to the United States.

As you know, this type of problem under the Headquarters Agreement has given concern to Ambassadors Lodge and Wadsworth in New York. Attached to this memorandum is a telegram of yesterday from Ambassador Lodge.<sup>1</sup> There are difficult legal problems involved in individual cases, both under the Headquarters Agreement with the United Nations and under the Immigration and Nationality Act. These problems need to be carefully considered in each case, in order that the United States make a disposition which would leave us in a strong position if the case were later to be taken to arbitration by the United Nations under Section 21 of the Headquarters Agreement.

I suggest that careful consideration needs to be given to this type of case at two stages: (1) when this Department is considering whether to recommend to the Attorney General that inadmissibility under Section 212(a) (28) be waived, and (2) in discussing the matter with the Department of Justice after the State Department has recommended a waiver of inadmissibility. In the first stage, it is not satisfactory for the visa office alone to make a determination; there needs to be consultation among the Departmental offices concerned, including the Office of the Legal Adviser. In the second stage, the Department of Justice should not be put in the position of having to make a decision on waiver without the benefit of discussion with officers of this Department, including officers in L. If you agree, we should suggest to the visa office and to UNA the holding of appropriate consultations at both stages. In this way, I believe, the best application of the Immigration and Nationality Act would be secured, and we would minimize the possibilities of future arbitral difficulty under the Headquarters Agreement.

[WASHINGTON,] March 28, 1953.

MY DEAR AMBASSADOR WADSWORTH: Mr. Tate, the Deputy Legal Adviser, conferred this morning with Mr. Rogers, the Deputy Attorney General, concerning the case of Mrs. M. R. Luckock, about which we have talked on the telephone and which was the subject of a telegram from the United States Mission on Wednesday.

Mr. Tate discussed with Mr. Rogers at some length the questions referred to in the Mission's telegram, covering Sections 11(4) and 21 of the Headquarters Agreement, Section 6 of Public Law 357 (80th Cong.), the relationship among subsections 212(a) (27), (28), and (29) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, and the effort of the United States to terminate the consultative status of the WIDF. Mr. Tate recalled the past experience with cases of this sort, and the question raised by the Mission whether the viewpoint of the Department of Justice in the Luckock case reflected a changed United States policy toward the application of the Headquarters Agreement.

Mr. Rogers said that the Department of Justice would wish to consider the Luckock case further before giving us an answer; in particular, he wished to raise it again with the Attorney General. Mr. Rogers said that, if the Department of Justice adhered to its position concerning Mrs. Luckock, he would write to the Department of State a letter setting forth as fully as possible within the limitations of security the reasons for the Department of Justice decision that Mrs. Luckock could not be admitted to the United States.

We expect to hear from Mr. Rogers in a few days.

Sincerely yours,

HERMAN PHLEGER

No: LEG 240/2/03

NEW YORK, 7 April 1953.

SIR: I have the honour to invite your attention to my note relating to the United States Immigration and Nationality Act and dated 4 August 1952,<sup>2</sup> to which no reply has been received.

I there referred to two legal questions of importance to the United Nations which were posed by the terms of Section 247 of that Act. That Section requires the Attorney General of the United States to adjust to the appropriate non-immigrant (international organization) status any officer or employee of the United Nations who has been admitted to the United States for permanent residence. I therefore stated the understanding of the United Nations that, although the Section did not in terms appear intended to affect privileges and immunities accorded to an international organization rather than to the individual as such, nevertheless the Act would not be interpreted in any manner inconsistent with the legal status, privileges and immunities owing to the United Nations under the Charter, in particular as might relate to the immunity from legal process for acts performed in the course of official duty as already accorded without regard to nationality or residence by Section 7(b) of the International Organizations Immunities Act.

I likewise recalled that the exemption from income taxation on the salaries and emoluments paid by the United Nations was understood to have been accorded for the benefit of the Organization and not for the relief of the individual, and that the General Assembly had so regarded this exemption when calling for its extension to all the staff without respect to nationality. Any action by United States authorities to treat the tax exemption accorded by Section 4 of the International Organizations Immunities Act as capable of being waived by the individual seeking to retain his personal status as a permanent resident in the United States must be expected to impose an additional financial burden on the United Nations, by application of the tax reimbursement policies established by the General Assembly. You will therefore understand why it remains necessary for me to receive an assurance that the Section in question will not be interpreted in such manner as to affect the resources of the United Nations or to require specific budgetary action and other internal administrative adjustments.

My note of 4 August 1952 was written at a time when the Immigration and Nationality Act had not yet come into force, and it expressed the hope that some appropriate action could be taken in the preparation by the Attorney General of the Regulations to be issued under Section 247, in order to make plain the protected status of the Organization. Since that date, however, the Act has entered into force and the Regulations have appeared and been brought into effect without clarifying in any way the scope of the Section. Moreover, the provisions for the waiver of all privileges and immunities have been applied against affected members of the staff of the United Nations in a sufficient variety of situations that it is no longer consistent with the effective functioning of the Organization for me further to defer their execution of the waiver on the grounds that it was first desirable to seek an explanation from the United States authorities of the intent and legal effect of this legislative requirement. Thus, for example, departures from the Headquarters on travel affecting the operations of the United Nations have been seriously delayed because the immigration authorities of the United States have declined to issue re-entry permits to staff having permanent residence status unless they first executed the waiver in the general and inclusive language used by the Act.

I am therefore authorizing members of the staff under certain conditions to execute the waiver if required by the appropriate authorities.

I do this with every confidence that your Government will not apply its legislation in such manner as to impinge upon the legal status already granted the Organization as such, and this action does not constitute in any sense a waiver on behalf of the United Nations of any privilege, immunity, exemption or facility to which it might hereafter lay claim in any specific situation. It is the position of the United Nations that it would be a violation of Article 105 of the Charter for any governmental authority to treat the immunity from legal process relating to acts performed by an employee in his official capacity as waivable by the individual without the express authority in each instance of the Organization as such. This plainly conforms with the language of Section 7(b) of the International Organizations Immunities Act itself. Therefore, the authority which I now propose to give to staff members to execute the waiver relates only to any personal privileges and immunities contemplated by Section 247 which they may enjoy, and in no way relates to the immunity from legal process.

Finally, unless I should receive an authoritative indication from you to the contrary, I shall not be in a position to advise the staff members affected that by reason of such a waiver federal income taxes are payable by them on the salaries paid them by the United Nations. This is for the reasons already stated, and in the meantime there has come to my attention no amendment to the Internal Revenue Code, or to Regulations issued thereunder, on which I might rely as in any way altering the exclusion from income taxation on such salaries which was expressly written into law by Section 4 of the International Organizations Immunities Act amending the Internal Revenue Code.

Accept, Sir, the assurances of my highest consideration.

ADMISSION OF REPRESENTATIVES OF NON-GOVERNMENTAL ORGANIZATIONS ENJOYING CONSULTATIVE STATUS

MEMORANDUM BY THE LEGAL DEPARTMENT

1. This memorandum is transmitted in compliance with the request, made on 9 April 1953 at the 679th plenary meeting of the Economic and Social Council, for a legal opinion on the extent to which the denial by the United States of the applications by two representatives of non-governmental organizations for transit to the Headquarters District is consistent with the terms of the Agreement between the United Nations and the United States of America regarding the Headquarters of the United Nations.

A. Summary of Facts

2. In accordance with resolution 288(X) concerning consultative arrangements with non-governmental organizations, adopted by the Economic and Social Council under the authority of Article 71 of the Charter, the Women's International Democratic Federation, a non-governmental organization in consultative relationship with the Council in Category B, designated Mrs. Margarete Rae Luckock as its representative to attend the seventh session of the Commission on the Status of Women, which adjourned on 3 April 1953, and thereafter to attend the current session of the Economic and Social Council. The World Federation of Trade Unions, a non-governmental organization in consultative relationship with the Council in Category A, designated Mr. Jan Dessau as its representative to attend the current session of the Council. Both representatives made application for a visa at appropriate United States Consulates and the Secretariat of the Economic and Social Council made notification to the United States Mission to the United Nations of these applications, in accordance with established procedures.

3. The representative of the United States reported to the Economic and Social Council at its 679th plenary meeting on 9 April 1953 that his Government had found it impossible to grant these applications. He explained the position of his Government as follows:

"In denying these applications, my Government has found it necessary to invoke the right to safeguard its security which it reserved to itself in Section 6 of the Joint Resolution (Public Law 357) of the 80th Congress, which authorized the United States to enter into the Headquarters Agreement, and in the note of its Representative, dated November 21, 1947, bringing the Headquarters Agreement into effect."

B. Provisions of the Headquarters Agreement

4. Section 11(4) of the Headquarters Agreement provides:

"The federal, state or local authorities of the United States shall not impose any impediments to transit to or from the headquarters district of . . . (4) representatives of non-governmental organizations recognized by the United Nations for the purpose of consultation under Article 71 of the Charter . . .".

5. Section 13(a) of the Headquarters Agreement reads as follows:

"(a) Laws and regulations in force in the United States regarding the entry of aliens shall not be applied in such manner as to interfere with the privileges referred to in Section 11. When visas are required for persons referred to in that Section, they shall be granted without charge and as promptly as possible."

6. These are the only provisions in the Headquarters Agreement bearing upon the right of transit to the Headquarters District on the part of properly designated representatives of non-governmental organizations. Nothing in the text of the Headquarters Agreement reserves to the United States the authority to deny a visa to any of the classes of persons specified in Section 11. Indeed, Section 13 (d) specifies that, except as provided above, “. . . the United States retains full control and authority over the entry of persons or property into the territory of the United States. . .”.

7. By Joint Resolution (Public Law 357-80th Congress) the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States Congress authorized the President of the United States to bring the Headquarters Agreement into effect on the part of the United States.

8. Section 6 of the Joint Resolution stated that nothing in the Agreement should be construed as in any way diminishing, abridging or weakening the right of the United States to safeguard its own security and completely to control the entry of aliens into any territory of the United States other than the Headquarters District and its immediate vicinity, and such areas as it was reasonably necessary to traverse in transit between the same and foreign countries.*

9. The Secretary-General of the United Nations was authorized to bring the Headquarters Agreement into force by the General Assembly, which approved the text of the Agreement in its resolution 169 (II). But in the event that the provision in section 6 of the Joint Resolution had been intended by the United States to constitute a reservation, it was never made known to the General Assembly as such, and it was never considered by the General Assembly nor accepted by it.

10. It is an established principle of international law that a reservation to a bilateral treaty or agreement is in effect a proposal to amend the text of the agreement and must therefore be accepted by the other party if it is to have any effect. David Hunter Miller, for example, in his well-known work on “Reservations to Treaties”, after reviewing the history of qualifying declarations in United States treaty practice, states (p. 76), “One conclusion supported by all of the foregoing precedents is that the declaration, whether in the nature of an explanation, an understanding, an interpretation, or reservation of any kind, must be agreed to by the other Party to the treaty . . .

*“Sec. 6. Nothing in the agreement shall be construed as in any way diminishing, abridging, or weakening the right of the United States to safeguard its own security and completely to control the entrance of aliens into any territory of the United States other than the headquarters district and its immediate vicinity, as to be defined and fixed in a supplementary agreement between the Government of the United States and the United Nations in pursuance of section 13 (3) (e) of the agreement, and such areas as it is reasonably necessary to traverse in transit between the same and foreign countries. Moreover, nothing in section 14 of the agreement with respect to facilitating entrance into the United States by persons who wish to visit the headquarters district and do not enjoy the right of entry provided in section 11 of the agreement shall be construed to amend or suspend in any way the immigration laws of the United States or to commit the United States in any way to effect any amendment or suspension of such laws.” [Footnote in the source text.]

Accordingly, in a treaty between two Powers only, the difference between a reservation of any nature and an amendment, is purely one of form." (Author's emphasis.)

11. Pursuant to its section 28, the Headquarters Agreement was brought into force by an exchange of notes between the Secretary-General and the representative of the United States. The United States note, dated 21 November 1947, added :

"Pursuant to instruction from my Government, I have the honor to inform you that the Government of the United States of America is prepared to apply the above-mentioned Headquarters Agreement subject to the provisions of Public Law 357."

This observation is in general terms and did not make reference to any reservation. It was made subsequent to the final adoption of the Agreement by the General Assembly. For these reasons, and because it appeared in a formal note of entry into force, it did not give notice to the Secretary-General that the United States might claim the authority to restrict transit to and from the Headquarters District.

12. Finally, even if the United States had intended to formulate a reservation, it would not appear from a reading of section 6 of the Joint Resolution that it could have application to the present cases. It refers to control by the United States of the entrance of aliens into any territory of the United States other than the Headquarters District, its immediate vicinity, and the necessary area of transit.

D. Conclusion

13. It appears from the foregoing that persons falling within the classes referred to in section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement are entitled to transit to and from the Headquarters District, and that this right of transit has not been made the subject of any reservation.

14. Should the United States adhere to its position, it is clear that there would then exist a dispute between the United Nations and the United States concerning the interpretation or application of the Headquarters Agreement. The Council will note that section 21 of the Headquarters Agreement establishes the procedures for handling any such dispute. If the dispute is not settled by negotiation or other agreed mode of settlement, it "shall be referred for final decision to a tribunal of three arbitrators, one to be named by the Secretary-General, one to be named by the Secretary of State of the United States, and the third to be chosen by the two, or, if they should fail to agree upon a third, then by the President of the International Court of Justice."

Re USUN 607 and Deptel 389.<sup>1</sup> USDel has today discussed procedure for handling item 34 ECOSOC plenary a. m. tomorrow with President of Council and with French, UK, Swedish and Indian dels. Believes debate re political and legal aspects problem can be minimized and drastic measure such as resolution of protest or censure, or transfer item to GA, can be avoided if USDel speaks first along lines indicated below. Swedish representative has indicated he prepared to follow US statement with suggestion council await outcome discussion between SYG UN and US Government, or other action appropriate under Headquarters Agreement. French delegate has indicated will support Swedish position and move to adjourn debate. French delegate also speaking with Poles in effort dissuade them from presenting resolution re item. UKDel endeavoring dissuade Uruguayans from following instructions to vote for transfer item to GA.

Should resolution along lines Swed's position be brought to vote, USDel prepared abstain as interested party.

Proposed US statement as follows:

"The items before us deal with the inability of certain individuals to obtain visas in order to gain entrance to this country for the stated purpose of attending meetings of this council or its commissions as representatives of their respective NGOS. In a larger sense however, it deals with a disagreement between the Legal Department of the Secretariat and the US Government as to the nature and extent of the obligations undertaken by my government in entering into the Headquarters Agreement. In the opinion of my del, Mr. President, little can be gained by a debate in this body concerning this disagreement. The problem here is essentially juridical in nature and I submit that in section 21 of the Headquarters Agreement there exists clear and adequate machinery for the settlement of disputes between the UN and the host country concerning the interpretation and application of the agreement. My government has no intention of contravening any part of this agreement and will continue to recognize the validity of its provisions, including the reservation expressed by the 80th Congress in PL 357. Accordingly my government is prepared to enter into conferences and negotiations with the SYG concerning this matter and, should such negotiations fail to achieve agreement, is prepared to cooperate in the next step, that of arbitration.

<sup>1</sup> The ECOSOC item and the reference telegrams all dealt with the concern felt at the United Nations over U.S. refusal to grant visas to Mrs. Luckock and Mr. Dessau of the NGO. The reference telegrams are in Department of State file 340/4-1053.

Therefore, Mr. President, without presuming to suggest an unwilling silence on the part of my colleagues in this matter, I submit that a protracted debate today can serve only to raise unnecessarily the temperature of our climate here, and suggest that an immediate beginning of the conferences referred to above would be of far greater practical value.

Memorandum Prepared in the Office of the Assistant Legal Adviser for United Nations Affairs (Meeker): Part I

[WASHINGTON,] April 15, 1953.

I. The Secretariat's Legal Contentions

On April 10, 1953 the Secretariat issued a memorandum (E/2397), prepared by its Legal Department, upon the legality of the United States action in refusing to grant visas to two NGO representatives under Section 11(4) of the Headquarters Agreement. The memorandum was drawn up at the request of ECOSOC in connection with the applications for admission to the United States of Mrs. Luckock and Mr. Dessau. The memorandum makes two main submissions: that the reservation to the original Agreement made in Public Law 357, 80th Congress, was never made effective and that, in any event, it would not be applicable to the cases at hand.

In regard to the first point, paragraph 9 of the Secretariat memorandum states:

"But in the event that the provision in Section 6 of the Joint Resolution had been intended by the United States to constitute a reservation, it was never made known to the General Assembly as such, and it was never considered by the General Assembly nor accepted by it."

The referenced Joint Resolution is S.J. Res. 144, 80th Congress, which was enacted as Public Law 357, 80th Congress. It is difficult to see how a contention can be made that the reservation was never made known to, considered by, nor accepted by the General Assembly.

The complete text of Public Law 357, 80th Congress, was published in the official records of the Second Session of the General Assembly, 6th Committee, as Appendix I to Annex 11 (pp. 333 et seq.). Appendices II and III to the same Annex consist of an exchange of letters between the Legal Adviser to the State Department and the Assistant Secretary-General in charge of the Legal Department of the United Nations. Both of these letters make specific reference to Public Law 357. In addition, the report by the Secretary-General to the Assembly on the proposed Agreement (A/371), the document which formed the basis of study by Subcommittee 1 of Committee 6, contains this passage:

“As a result of the President’s approval on 4 August, this Joint Resolution became Public Law 357 (Appendix 1). Both the joint resolution and Public Law 357 refer to the interpretation placed on the Agreement by Congress, in particular to the right of the United States to control the entry of aliens into the territory of the United States. In this connection it would appear desirable to draw the General Assembly’s attention to section 6 of Public Law 357.”

Subcommittee 1 of Committee 6 was not only well aware of the reservations, but devoted a great deal of serious debate to them. Mr. Fahy, the United States representative on the Subcommittee, reiterated time and again in the most unequivocal terms that the President was empowered to sign the Agreement on behalf of the United States only subject to the reservations specified in Public Law 357. Certain members of the Subcommittee had doubts whether the General Assembly should authorize the Secretary-General to effectuate an agreement containing these reservations. Paragraph 4 of the interim report of the Subcommittee, as drafted by Mr. Beckett of the United Kingdom (Doc. A/C.6/SC.4/W.12), contained the statement that:

“. . . it was neither necessary nor appropriate for the United Nations to take official cognizance of this Resolution of Congress on the ground that the Agreement alone contained the obligations between the parties and that the actual contents of the Resolution of Congress was a ‘domestic’ matter for the United States.”

This point was consistently refuted by Mr. Fahy, and after much debate the statement as drafted by Mr. Beckett was deleted from the Subcommittee’s report, and nothing to this effect was contained therein or in the full Committee’s report to the Assembly (A/427).

In addition, paragraph 9(g) of the interim report of the Subcommittee stated that the exchange of notes “should not contain any other matter having any effect by way of interpretation or otherwise on the provisions of the Headquarters Agreement.” This was obviously unacceptable to the United States, and at its Tenth Meeting, at the suggestion of the Canadian representative, the Subcommittee decided to delete this language from its report (see UN Press Release GA/L/79 of 16 Oct. 1947).

As the Secretariat memorandum points out in paragraph 11, the Headquarters Agreement was brought into force by an exchange of notes. The United States note, dated November 21, 1947, stated that “the Government of the United States of America is prepared to apply the above mentioned Headquarters Agreement subject to the provisions of Public Law 357.” The records of the Department show that there had been discussion with the Secretary-General over the proposed use of the terms “in accordance with” and “subject to”. The United States had insisted upon the words "subject to" as having a more precise legal meaning. The Secretary-General acquiesced on this point.

Paragraph 10 of the Secretariat memorandum states that a reservation must be accepted by the other party if it is to have any effect. It quotes David Hunter Miller to this effect. There would seem to be no question as to the truth of this axiom. However, the real question at issue is not that one, but the question of whether, in this particular case, the United Nations did accept the reservation. In other words, the question is one not of the necessity of acceptance but of the fact of acceptance.

Acceptance of a reservation can be made in a number of different ways and can be evidenced by several different types of action. Characterizing the "subject to" clause in the United States note of November 21, 1947 as an "observation", the Secretariat memorandum states:

" . . . This observation is in general terms and did not make reference to any reservation. For these reasons, and because it appeared in a formal note of entry into force, it did not give notice to the Secretary-General that the United States might claim the authority to restrict transit to and from the Headquarters District."

There is nothing general about the proviso clause of the United States note. It specifically refers to "the provisions of Public Law 357". Both the Secretary-General and the General Assembly were fully and officially cognizant of the exact provisions of that Law. Also, the section 6 reservation was not adopted by Congress "subsequent to the final adoption of the Agreement by the General Assembly." It was approved by Congress on August 4, 1947. As the exchange of letters between Mr. Fahy and Mr. Kerns shows, the Secretariat was formally and effectively notified of the exact nature of the Congressional action in August of 1947. The Secretary-General called the specific attention of the Assembly to the reservations in his Report to the Assembly on the proposed Agreement (A/371, 3 Sept. 1947). The reservations were fully considered by the Subcommittee of Committee 6 before either the Sixth Committee recommended or the General Assembly adopted the Agreement. The United States representative on the Subcommittee repeatedly stressed that the President was authorized to sign the Agreement only subject to the reservation. Considering that this knowledge was made known to the Subcommittee, the Committee and the Assembly, and in view of the fact that the Secretary-General was authorized to sign on behalf of the United Nations without further negotiations with the United States, it is difficult to see how a contention can be made that the Assembly was not aware of and did not accept the reservation. Having been made perfectly aware of the reservation, if the Assembly did not wish to accept it, the Assembly would have instructed the Secretary-General not to sign the Agreement but to negotiate further with the United States. However, this is not what it did, and the Secretary-General accepted the United States note of November 21, 1947 including the proviso clause. The reservation was incorporated by reference into, to use the Secretariat's language, "a formal note of entering into force". It is hard to conceive of a more effective way of accepting a reservation.

Even if one were to make the argument that as of the date of the entry into force of the Agreement the United Nations had not accepted the reservation which had been added by the United States, the application of the Agreement for a period of more than five years would certainly constitute an acceptance. In this respect the law of treaties is very similar to the law of contracts: acceptance can be evidenced by practice as well as by formal agreement. In any event, if the practice over the last five years does not constitute acceptance, the only conclusion possible is that there is no agreement between the United States and the United Nations regarding the headquarters. If the United Nations has not in fact accepted the reservations of the United States, there has been no meeting of the minds of the two parties and no agreement exists today.

In this connection it is interesting to note the comment upon this subject which was made by David Hunter Miller, who was quoted in paragraph 10 of the Secretariat memorandum. His comment in fact is contained in the omitted portion of the paragraph quoted by the Secretariat and which is indicated by ". . .". It reads: "In default of such acceptance, the treaty fails, as in the case of the Naturalization Treaty with Turkey of 1874 . . ." David Hunter Miller, Reservations to Treaties, p. 76.

Paragraph 12 of the Secretariat memorandum states that :

"Finally, even if the United States had intended to formulate a reservation, it would not appear from a reading of section 6 of the Joint Resolution that it could have application to the present cases. It refers to control by the United States of the entrance of aliens into any territory of the United States other than the Headquarters District, its immediate vicinity, and the necessary area of transit."

This would seem to ignore the previous part of section 6, which reads as follows :

"Nothing in the Agreement shall be construed as in any way diminishing, abridging or weakening the right of the United States to safeguard its own security and . . ." (Underscoring supplied).

It is necessary both to consider this part of the reservation and to assign it some meaning. To ascertain its meaning it is helpful to consider the legislative history of the reservation.

The second part of the reservation, which deals with the entrance of aliens into United States territory outside the Headquarters District, was added by the United States Senate. It is more in the nature of an understanding than a reservation, in that it merely restates the provisions already contained in Article 13 (d) of the Agreement. It will be readily admitted that there is nothing in the Headquarters Agreement which obligates the United States to give free access to areas outside of the Headquarters District and its immediate vicinity, nor which prevents the United States from completely controlling the admission of aliens into the general territory of the United States. When the House of Representatives considered the Joint Resolution as approved by the Senate, it felt that a definite reservation was needed regarding the safeguarding of the national security of the United States. It was the opinion of the House that the United States must have at least some control over the entrance of aliens into the Headquarters District and its immediate vicinity, this control to be limited by the strict requirements of national security. To reiterate, this limited control extends to the Headquarters District as well as to the remainder of the United States from which we can exclude aliens for a number of reasons aside from requirements of national security.

Memorandum Prepared in the Office of the Assistant Legal Adviser for United Nations Affairs (Meeker) : Part III

III. Operation of Section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement

It is the United States position, as shown earlier [Part I],<sup>1</sup> that provisions of the Section 6 reservation in Public Law 357 (80th Congress) qualify the obligations set forth in the Headquarters Agreement. As the result of Section 6, the United States is not obligated to admit to the United States (for transit to and from the Headquarters District and its immediate vicinity) all aliens covered by Section 11. There are exceptions. For example, an espionage agent would be excludable under Section 6. There are other types of cases which would be exceptions also.

The Immigration and Nationality Act, in Section 212 (a), specifies a number of categories of persons who are ineligible to receive visas and excluded from admission into the United States. In the present context, categories 27, 28 and 29 of Section 212 (a) are particularly relevant. It is to be noted that the Attorney General has discretion, under subsection 212(d)(3), to authorize the admission of aliens falling into category 28, as in the case of other inadmissible categories except categories 27 and 29. Where an alien covered by subsection 11(3), 11(4) or 11(5) of the Headquarters Agreement falls into category 28, the procedure is for the Secretary of State to request the Attorney General to exercise his authority under subsection 212(d)(3) of the Immigration and Nationality Act. Aliens covered by subsections 11(1) and 11(2) of the Headquarters Agreement, who come within the terms of subsection 101(a)(15)(G) of the Act, are not ineligible to receive visas and be admitted to this country because they come within the provisions of subsection 212(a)(28) of the Act. In this connection, subsections 102(2), 102(3) and 212(d)(2) of the Act are relevant.

When Congress enacted the Immigration and Nationality Act, it recognized that certain aliens who would be otherwise inadmissible to the United States, under the terms of subsection 212(a)(28), would be admitted on recommendation of the Secretary of State and decision of the Attorney General because such persons were seeking to come to the United Nations under the Headquarters Agreement. However, subsections 212(a)(27) and 212(a)(29) provide for the unconditional exclusion of certain categories of aliens. The fact that in these cases the Attorney General is without discretionary authority to admit an alien temporarily under subsection 212(d)(3) despite his inadmissibility indicates the gravity of the security considerations where these two provisions apply. It likewise indicates that these provisions cover very limited classes of aliens, with respect to whom there is very serious information of a security nature.

The United States believes that the Immigration and Nationality Act can and should be given effect consistently with the Headquarters Agreement. Congress has regarded the two as compatible, and not conflicting, instruments. Furthermore, in giving effect to the Immigration and Nationality Act, the United States will take into account the consideration that aliens covered by Section 11 are seeking to come to the United Nations and not to travel the United States at large, and the consideration that, where necessary, geographical and other conditions can be imposed on their entry.

There have been given above [Part II]<sup>1</sup> the facts underlying the United States Government's conclusion that the Luckock and Dessau cases came within the provisions of subsection 212(a)(29) of the Immigration and Nationality Act. It is important to emphasize that these cases do not represent a new departure in American policy. The reasons for their exclusion are personal to them, indicating that the individuals personally would be a threat to United States security if they were to come to this country. They are special cases, each resting on its particular facts.

The United States considers that an alien coming within subsection 212(a) (28) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, and not subsection 212(a) (27) or 212(a) (29), is to be admitted to the United States if his entry is covered by Section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement, and that the reservation contained in Section 6 of Public Law 357 does not afford a ground for excluding such an alien. Subsections 212(a) (27) and 212(a) (29) of the Immigration and Nationality Act cover cases of inadmissibility to the United States where very serious security considerations are present. In deciding whether a case comes within either category 27 or category 29, the United States will take most careful account that these categories cover only very limited types of cases and of the circumstances (length of stay, purpose, conditions on entry) of the applicant alien's intended trip to the United Nations. The United States considers that an alien ineligible to receive a visa and excluded from admission under subsection 212(a) (27) or 212(a) (29) of the Immigration and Nationality Act is an alien whom the United States is entitled to exclude under the Section 6 reservation to the Headquarters Agreement.

Memorandum by the United States Representative at the United Nations (Lodge) to the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson)

[NEW YORK,] April 28, 1953.

Possible Restriction of Alien Personnel at the United Nations.

I have reviewed this question in some detail with the Mission staff. The basic assumptions which we have agreed on are as follows:

1. Action must be taken wherever necessary to safeguard the internal security of the United States against any clearly demonstrated actual or potential dangers.
2. The steps taken to safeguard the internal security should be such as to create the minimum possible disturbance and dislocation of our relationships with other free governments and international organizations and we should wherever possible be able to demonstrate a clear security requirement underlying any such restrictions.
3. Restrictions which apply to the Soviet Union and its satellites should be undertaken only after calculation of the probable consequences and possible retaliatory action.

The Mission is obviously not competent to judge the nature of the dangers to the internal security of the United States and the character of restrictions necessary to deal with these dangers. The Mission does have some concern, however, with the second and third assumptions above.

The United States brings to bear in the United Nations a major part of its foreign policy. It is a significant forum in which the United States and other governments of the free world can contrast their actions against the actions and words of the U.S.S.R. In the months to come I anticipate that it will be an increasingly important arena in the struggle for world peace; thus, any restrictions which are to be applied at the United Nations Headquarters should be framed with the following considerations in mind.

A. The United States needs the support and assistance of other delegations and members of the Secretariat for its foreign policy. If general restrictions or individual restrictions are imposed without adequate safeguards, we may lose some of that support.

B. In recent speeches United States spokesmen have contrasted the restrictions and extreme security measures of the Soviet Union with the great traditions of freedom of the United States and other countries of the free world. This has been effective propaganda. It would lose some of its effectiveness if restrictions are applied.

C. In applying restrictions to the U.S.S.R. and other Soviet delegations care should be exercised that the Soviets are not given an opportunity to play the martyrs. Denial of the use of the Glen Cove facilities during the summer months might have this effect.

D. Restrictions applied at the present moment to the Soviet delegations might also be misinterpreted by some delegations as being deliberately provocative and as contradicting the President's speech.

E. The imposition of general restrictions at this time, when the U.S. is attempting to settle a "dispute" with the SYG UN concerning the application and effect of the Section 6 "security reservation" to the Headquarters Agreement, may prejudice the attempt at settlement and deepen the concern which a number of friendly Delegations have already evidenced re the tightening of U.S. control over persons coming to the Headquarters District on official business.

F. If security is the reason for action then, as I have previously stated, exactly parallel treatment should be afforded delegations in New York and the diplomatic establishments in Washington.

Beyond these few points which I would wish to have the Department consider in reaching the final decision, I can add only our desire to cooperate fully with the security agencies of the Government in their effort to insure the internal security of the United States.

*The Attorney General of the United States (Brownell) to the

WASHINGTON, May 1, 1953.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: This is in response to requests from the former Legal Adviser of your Department, Mr. Adrian S. Fisher, and from the present United States Representative to the United Nations, Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge, Jr., asking for advice on the effect of waivers executed under section 247 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (66 Stat. 163, 218; P.L. 414, 82d Cong.).

Under section 247,* the Attorney General is required to adjust the status of an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence, and thereby enjoying immigrant status, to that of a nonimmigrant in one of three specified classes under section 101(a) of the Act† (roughly, accredited foreign government official, representative to or official of an international organization, or treaty trader), if the alien at the time of entry or thereafter acquires an occupational status which, were he seeking admission to the United States, would entitle him to a non-immigrant status in one of the three classes. The Attorney General's order of adjustment terminates the alien's immigrant status.

*"Sec. 247. (a) The status of an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence shall be adjusted by the Attorney General, under such regulations as he may prescribe, to that of a nonimmigrant under paragraph (15) (A), (15) (E), or (15) (G) of section 101 (a), if such alien had at the time of entry or subsequently acquires an occupational status which would, if he were seeking admis-

sion to the United States, entitle him to a nonimmigrant status under such sections. As of the date of the Attorney General's order making such adjustment of status, the Attorney General shall cancel the record of the alien's admission for permanent residence, and the immigrant status of such alien shall thereby be terminated.

(b) The adjustment of status required by subsection (a) shall not be applicable in the case of any alien who requests that he be permitted to retain his status as an immigrant and who, in such form as the Attorney General may require, executes and files with the Attorney General a written waiver of all rights, privileges, exemptions, and immunities under any law or any executive order which would otherwise accrue to him because of the acquisition of an occupational status entitling him to a nonimmigrant status under paragraph (15) (A), (15) (E), or (15) (G) of section 101 (a).” [Footnote in the source text.]

†Section 101 (a) (15) of the Act defines the term “immigrant” to mean every alien except an alien who is within one of the classes of nonimmigrants described in subsections (A) to (I), inclusive, of that section. The three subsections referred to in section 247 read as follows:

“(A) (i) an ambassador, public minister, or career diplomatic or consular officer who has been accredited by a foreign government recognized de jure by the United States and who is accepted by the President or by the Secretary of State, and the members of the aliens immediate family;

(ii) upon a basis of reciprocity, other officials and employees who have been accredited by a foreign government recognized de jure by the United States, who are accepted by the Secretary of State, and the members of their immediate families; and

(iii) upon a basis of reciprocity, attendants, servants, personal employees, and members of their immediate families, of the officials and employees who have a nonimmigrant status under (i) and (ii) above;

(E) an alien entitled to enter the United States under and in pursuance of the provisions of a treaty of commerce and navigation between the United States and the foreign state of which he is a national, and the spouse and children of any such alien if accompanying or following to join him: (i) solely to carry on substantial trade, principally between the United States and the foreign state of which he is a national; or (ii) solely to develop and direct the operations of an enterprise in which he has invested, or of an enterprise in which he is actively in the process of investing, a substantial amount of capital;

(G) (i) a designated principal resident representative of a foreign government recognized de jure by the United States, which foreign government is a member of an international organization entitled to enjoy privileges, exemptions, and immunities as an international organization under the International Organizations Immunities Act (59 Stat. 669), accredited resident members of the staff of such representatives, and members of his or their immediate family;

(ii) other accredited representatives of such a foreign government to such international organizations, and the members of their immediate families;

(iii) an alien able to qualify under (i) and (ii) above except for the fact that the government of which such alien is an accredited representative is not recognized de jure by the United States, or that the government of which he is an accredited representative is not a member of such international organization, and the members of his immediate family;

(iv) officers, or employees of such international organizations, and the members of their immediate families;

(v) attendants, servants, and personal employees of any such representative, officer, or employee, and the members of the immediate families of such attendants, servants, and personal employees;” [Footnote in the source text.]

However, as provided in section 247(b), the alien may avoid the loss of and retain his immigrant status, even though he is in one of the three classes of occupations, if he files with the Attorney General a written waiver of "all rights, privileges, exemptions, and immunities under any law or any executive order" which would otherwise accrue to him because of his occupational status. The Attorney General's regulations (Title 8, Part 247, effective December 24, 1952, 17 F.R. 11520) and the prescribed waiver (Form I-508) follow the quoted language of the statute; and the general question is, what are the rights, privileges, exemptions, and immunities surrendered by the immigrant alien who is in one of the three occupational classes and files a waiver? More specifically, as Ambassador Lodge's inquiry indicates, the chief concern, in the case of international organizations like the United Nations, is the effect of such waivers on the immunity of officials of the organization from legal process relating to acts performed by them in their official capacity, and the immunity of employees from income taxation on salaries paid by the organization.

The Congress in drafting section 247, and in the legislative history of the Immigration and Nationality Act, made no attempt to list the rights, privileges, exemptions, and immunities it had in mind. However, it did leave in the legislative history, an indication of the kind of rights and privileges it felt should be and would be waived by the immigrant alien employed by an international organization or a foreign diplomatic mission if he wished to retain both his immigrant status and his occupation. Based upon these references, we are in a position to offer some general advice on the effect of a waiver under section 247(b), but must leave to future administrative or judicial rulings the precise effect of individual waivers in the variety of situations that may arise.

The bill which became the Immigration and Nationality Act (H.R. 5678, 82d Cong.) was one of a number introduced as the result of an investigation and study of the entire immigration and naturalization system by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, pursuant to Senate Resolution 137 of the 80th Congress. In its report on the investigation made to the 81st Congress, the Committee considered the status of the various classes of nonimmigrants and made five recommendations for changes in the immigration laws relating to accredited officials of foreign governments and representatives and officials of international organizations. These recommendations, it stated, would not "in its opinion jeopardize the conduction (sic) of the foreign relations of the United States." S. Report 1515, 81st Cong., page 523. The fifth of these recommendations read as follows:

"5. It is also recommended that provision be made for the adjustment of the status of a lawfully admitted permanent alien resident to that of a nonimmigrant admitted under the foreign government official or international organization category where the alien acquires an occupational status which would entitle him to such nonimmigrant status if he were applying for admission. The subcommittee recommends that since such persons acquire the wide privileges, exemptions, and immunities applicable to such aliens under our laws, they should not have the privilege of acquiring citizenship while in that occupational status." S. Report 1515, 81st Cong., page 525.

This recommendation might have been carried out by including a provision of law depriving of their immigrant status immigrants who acquired the privileges, exemptions, and immunities attached to their occupations. Instead, the 82d Congress took a less severe course and, in adopting section 247, gave immigrants in those occupations a choice of retaining privileges and surrendering immigrant status or of waiving privileges and keeping immigrant status.

In so doing, both the House and Senate Committees said: "In section 247, the Attorney General is required to adjust the status of immigrants who, subsequent to entry, acquire an occupational status which would entitle them to a nonimmigrant status. . . . This is intended to cover the situation where aliens who have entered as immigrants obtain employment with foreign diplomatic missions or international organizations or carry on the activities of treaty traders. Normally, they would be classified as nonimmigrants and because of the nature of their occupation, would be entitled to certain privileges, immunities, and exemptions. The committee feels that it is undesirable to have such aliens continue in the status of lawful permanent residents and thereby become eligible for citizenship, when, because of their occupational status they are entitled to certain privileges, immunities, and exemptions which are inconsistent with an assumption of the responsibilities of citizenship under our laws. Such an adjustment shall not be required if the alien executes an effective waiver of all rights, privileges, exemptions, and immunities under any law or any Executive order which would otherwise accrue to him because of his occupational status." H. Report 1365, 82d Cong., pp. 63-64, S. Report 1137, 82d Cong., page 26. (Underscoring supplied.)

In other words, the concern was that the assertion of certain privileges and exemptions by immigrants, who were employed by international organizations and foreign missions but who entered this country ostensibly with the idea of becoming citizens, was inconsistent with their proposed assumption of the responsibilities of citizenship; accordingly such privileges should not be available to them. At the same time, the Congress disclaimed any intention of jeopardizing conduct of the foreign relations of the United States (supra, S. Report 1515, 81st Cong., page 523), which includes not jeopardizing the lawful activities of the international organizations and foreign missions located here, who normally engage Americans as well as aliens to conduct their business. In some instances our laws, granting the necessary protections and privileges for these organizations and missions and their employees, draw no distinctions between American and alien employees, treating all alike; in other cases, the privileges granted are not available to Americans but only to the non-citizen employees. Hence it is clear that the Congress intended to deprive immigrant aliens employed in the international organizations and foreign missions of the privileges and exemptions resulting from the occupational status which would not be equally available to American citizens similarly situated. Conversely, it was not the intention of the Congress to require immigrants in these occupations to surrender privileges which American citizens similarly employed may assert. Obviously, if American citizens may lawfully exercise such privileges, the privileges would not appear to be inconsistent with the responsibilities of citizenship.

The Congress might have discriminated entirely against immigrants in favor of citizens, but it did not do so. On the contrary it sought, by the election offered under section 247, to place immigrants and citizens in the specified categories of employment on an equal footing by denying to immigrants special privileges, exemptions, and immunities not available to citizens similarly employed.

For example, section 116(h) of the Internal Revenue Code, 26 U.S.C. 116(h), exempts from federal income taxation the compensation of an employee of an international organization if the employee is not a citizen of the United States. Thus, under this section of the law, American citizen employees of international organizations do not enjoy exemption from federal income taxes. Hence, to the extent that the federal income tax exemptions of employees of an international organization rest upon section 116(h) of the Internal Revenue Code, American citizen employees individually bear an obligation of citizenship (the payment of taxes) which immigrant employees, who are potential citizens, heretofore had no need to bear as individuals (disregarding any equalization of pay that the employer organizations may attempt to work out). Therefore, the tax exemptions under section 116(h), claimable by an immigrant alien in one of the specified occupations, is an exemption which he waives when he files the waiver under section 247 of the Immigration and Nationality Act.

A converse example, in the matter of legal process, is section 7(b) of the International Organizations Immunities Act, 22 U.S.C. 288d, under which officers and employees of international organizations shall be immune from suit and legal process relating to acts performed by them in their official capacity and falling within their functions as such officers or employees, subject to waiver of the immunity by the international organization. In the case of the United Nations, these privileges together with the others in the Act became effective pursuant to Executive Order 9698 of February 19, 1946, 11 F.R. 1809. No distinction is made in the statute between citizen and non-citizen employees of the international organization. Hence it would appear that an immigrant alien employee of the United Nations who properly claims the immunity from suit and legal process for official acts allowed under section 7(b) asserts no greater privilege than would an American citizen employee similarly situated. Accordingly, the waiver of immunities under section 247 of the Immigration and Nationality Act by the immigrant employee of the United Nations would not appear to be a waiver of the immunity from suit and legal process to which section 7(b) of the International Organizations Immunities Act entitles him.

Application of the foregoing principles in interpreting waivers under section 247, on a case-by-case basis as different situations arise, should accomplish the objective laid down by the Congress. It should result in placing the employee of an international organization or foreign mission, who happens to be an immigrant, in a position of parity with his fellow American employee of the same organization by allowing the immigrant employee no greater privileges in connection with the employment than an American citizen similarly employed. In maintaining his immigrant status and preparing for American citizenship, the immigrant employee of the international organization or foreign mission will not be asserting privileges which he could not obtain and assert were he an American citizen in the same employment. Whatever rights remain and accrue to him as a result of the occupational status will be consistent with his "assumption of the responsibilities of citizenship under our laws."

Sincerely,

HERBERT BROWNELL, JR.

POSITION PAPER

The Secretary of State refers to the action of the United States in withholding the issuance of visas to certain aliens seeking to enter the United States ostensibly for the purpose of acting as consultants on behalf of certain non-governmental organizations before the Economic and Social Council.

It is the position of the Government of the United States that the Headquarters Agreement between the United States and the United Nations was brought into force on November 21, 1947 by, and in accordance with the terms of, the notes exchanged on that date between the United States Representative and the Secretary General. As specifically stated in the note of the United States Representative, the Agreement was brought into effect subject to the provisions of the Joint Resolution of the Congress of the United States (Public Law 357, 80th Congress), by which the Government of the United States stated its understanding of, or its reservation to, the approval of the Agreement. The United States Representative had no authority to conclude the Agreement upon any other basis and in fact he did not do so, as he clearly specified in his note of November 21, 1947 that he was bringing the Agreement into effect subject to the provisions of Public Law 357.

Section 6 and other parts of the Joint Resolution of the Congress of the United States (Public Law 357) are therefore, so far as the Government of the United States is concerned, to be considered as integral parts of the Agreement, in so far as its meaning and application are concerned. On the other hand, if the contention of the Legal Staff of the United Nations should prevail, and it should therefore be concluded that the United Nations has never accepted the provisions of Section 6 of the Joint Resolution (Public Law 357), it would necessarily follow that there was never actually a meeting of the minds necessary to the conclusion of a valid contract or agreement and that no Headquarters Agreement actually exists in law or in fact.

Section 6 of the Joint Resolution constitutes an interpretation, an understanding, and a reservation on the part of the United States with respect to the whole of the Agreement and not to any one part thereof, in so far as the security of the United States is concerned. It applies, therefore, not only to the provisions of the Agreement relating to the issuance of visas and to the admission of aliens into the United States, but also to other provisions of the Agreement, including that part providing for the arbitration of disputes or differences arising under the Agreement, which affect the security of the United States, and there is no legal obligation whatever resting or imposed upon the United States under the Agreement to submit to arbitration any question affecting our security when determined in accordance with existing laws of the United States. Any other construction of the Agreement would disregard the plain language of the Congress of the United States in Section 6 of the Joint Resolution and would be tantamount to holding that the right of the United States to safeguard its own security has been weakened, abridged, or diminished notwithstanding the clear language of Section 6 to the contrary.

The Representative of the United States may assure the Secretary General that the Government of the United States has no desire or intention to exclude from its national territory any alien who is coming in transit to the Headquarters District of the United Nations in the United States exclusively on official business of, or before, the United Nations. Except for the provisions relating to the protection of our national security, the United States has exempted, and is prepared to continue to exempt, such aliens from the excluding provisions of our immigration laws. Mere membership in the Communist Party, for example, has never been considered by the United States to constitute a proper basis for the exclusion of an alien coming to the United Nations. The number of alien Communists who have been permitted to enter the United States for United Nations purposes, many of whom are still in the United States under the auspices of the United Nations, should constitute ample evidence of the views and practices of the United States with respect to its security in the light of the Headquarters Agreement, including Section 6 of the Joint Resolution. On the other hand, when there is in any alien's case clear and convincing evidence that the alien is coming to the United States for a purpose outside the scope of his proper activities within one of the five categories described in Section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement, and the competent authorities of the Government of the United States are satisfied that the admission of the alien would be prejudicial to the national security, the Government of the United States must invoke its sovereign right to exclude such alien from the United States. If the United States were estopped from exercising such authority its right to safeguard its own security would be impaired and this would be contrary to the terms of the Joint Resolution of Congress by which the Government of the United States agreed that the Headquarters of the United Nations could be located in the United States.

The pertinent provisions of the domestic law of the United States relating to the exclusion of aliens on grounds affecting the national security may be found in Section 212(a) (27), (28), and (29) of the Immigration and Nationality Act. It is submitted that there is nothing in the Charter of the United Nations or in the Headquarters Agreement which could reasonably be construed as requiring the United States to admit an alien who falls within the provisions of Section 212(a) (27) or (29) of the Act, as the activities envisaged in in these provisions of law are not within the scope of the legitimate activities of any alien who is seeking to enter the United States in transit to the Headquarters of the United Nations as provided in Section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement. So far as Section 212(a) (28) of the Act is concerned, those aliens who are covered by Section 11 (1) and (2) of the Agreement are exempt from exclusion, while those aliens who fall within the provisions of Section 11(3), (4), and (5) of the Agreement can be admitted only within the discretion of the Attorney General of the United States and under such terms and conditions as he may deem to be necessary to safeguard the security of the United States. Each such case is carefully and meticulously considered and reviewed by the top-ranking officers of the Government of the United States. The conclusion that such an alien must be excluded from the United States is never lightly reached but is the result of the most earnest consideration by the competent high-level authorities in the Government of the United States.

The Government of the United States does not consider that it is under any legal obligation to submit to the United Nations, or to any other authority, the nature or source of information of a classified nature which forms the basis of its conclusions in an individual alien's case, as the submission of such classified information is not only prohibited by the laws of the United States but the submission of such information to any other authority for review and consideration would be derogatory to, and inconsistent with, the sovereign right of the United States to safeguard its own security. The extreme liberality of treatment accorded by the United States to the thousands of aliens who have come to the United States for purposes connected with the United Nations should constitute ample evidence that the United States, as host to the United Nations, does not desire to act arbitrarily or wrongfully in exercising its prerogatives.

While the Government of the United States does not recognize any obligation to submit the facts in the cases of aliens from whom visas were withheld the representatives of the United States may be prepared to discuss the methods and procedures by which the Government of the United States arrived at the decision to withhold the visas, in order that the representatives of the United Nations may be convinced that such action was not arbitrary or capricious but was determined to be required only from the standpoint of the security of the nation, which is consistent with one of the fundamental purposes for which the Government of the United States and other Members created the United Nations, namely, the promotion of national and international security and the peace of the world.

[NEW YORK,] May 19, 1953.

Subject: Access by Aliens to the Headquarters of the United Nations—Related Problems—Working Paper for Discussion Purposes.

I carefully considered the helpful draft position paper dated May 4, 1953,<sup>2</sup> prepared by the Departments of State and Justice, setting forth the basis for the withholding of visas from two aliens seeking access to the United Nations Headquarters District ostensibly on official United Nations business. Subsequently I discussed the problem with Secretary General Dag Hammarskjold.

The Secretary General's position as stated to me is as follows:

"It is my understanding that the principle which should govern all classes of persons coming into the Headquarters on United Nations business is that no solution will ever be practical and lasting if it does not take into account both the necessity of the right of access being free from determination by any single government and the necessity that the security of the country where the Headquarters is established should not be endangered."

Mr. Hammarskjold is prepared to agree with the essential point in our position, viz., that the United States has the right to take the steps necessary to safeguard its security. He has at the same time, however, made it perfectly clear that he cannot accept the interpretation of Section 6 of the Joint Resolution (PL 357—80th Congress) set forth in the position paper. He relies heavily on the 1947 Senate and House reports concerning that Resolution to support his contention (a) that the Congress never intended that Section 6 have the meaning we presently attribute to it, and (b) that such an interpretation was never made known to the 1947 General Assembly. My own reading of these reports and of the General Assembly records leads me to the conclusion that, if this matter goes to the General Assembly as it will if we force this issue, a persuasive case can be made in support of the Secretary-General's position. I, therefore, recommend that we not force the issue, particularly in view of the extent to which Mr. Hammarskjold appears prepared to go along with us as a practical matter, apart from the legal interpretation of the Section 6 reservation.<sup>3</sup>

Since Mr. Hammarskjold, within the limitations indicated, is prepared to agree to practical steps aimed at protecting the security of the United States against persons seeking access to the Headquarters District ostensibly on official United Nations business, I recommend a policy along the lines indicated below. This policy, I believe, is basically consistent with the draft position paper.

1. Denial of admission to the United States to persons covered by Section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement and whose admission threatens United States security.

A. Principles which should govern.

In a limited number of cases the United States will wish to prevent the entry of an individual to the United States because of clear evidence that his admission is an active threat to United States security or that he is not actually coming to the United States primarily on United Nations business.

As is rightly indicated in the position paper, admission should be denied to persons covered by Section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement only in cases in which there is clear and convincing evidence that such persons are coming to this country for a purpose not required by United Nations business and which, in the opinion of the United States is undesirable or may even threaten its security. Mr. Hammarskjold, I am certain, will agree to this position provided that he is offered an opportunity to participate in the determination that the persons in question are coming for a purpose not directly connected with United Nations business. I believe he will agree, on the other hand, that a determination that the purpose in question is undesirable or constitutes a threat to United States security is wholly for the United States itself to make, provided I can be supplied enough information to satisfy myself and thus assure him that clear and convincing evidence does exist—information which I have been extremely unsuccessful in getting so far.

B. Application of Principles.

The application of these principles will vary somewhat with the class of persons involved.

(1) Secretariat and Specialized Agency Employees, Accredited Correspondents and Representatives of Non-Governmental Organizations.

In the case of persons falling within these classes, I suggest that the United States ought to be prepared to show to the Secretary-General, for his confidential information, the evidence in its possession indicating that the persons in question are coming to this country for a purpose not directly connected with United Nations business. If the evidence is clear and convincing, as it obviously would be, I feel certain that Mr. Hammarskjold will raise no question as to the denial of admission.

(2) Governmental Representatives.

In cases of this type, the Secretary-General has made it clear that he does not wish to be placed in a position between the United States and the Government concerned. In such cases, I suggest that the United States deal directly with the Governments involved, just as has been done in the past, and simply notify the Secretary-General of such negotiations.

(3) Official Invitees of the United Nations.

There is not much likelihood of major problems in this field if the United States representatives in the United Nations are kept informed of the facts since the United States, as a member of all important United Nations bodies, can by its vote and its prestige normally control the issuance of invitations. Further, the United States presumably would never wish to be in a position of denying admission to persons formally invited by United Nations bodies and, if a problem case did arise, we could undoubtedly handle the matter by the use of restrictions along the lines indicated below. In the case of persons invited by the Secretary-General himself, the United States would of course deal directly with the Secretary-General, as in the case of Secretariat employees, correspondents and representatives of Non-Governmental Organizations.

I do not believe the foregoing principles would conflict with the application of Sections 212(a) (27) and (29) of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952. I suggest that it is appropriate to apply those Sections to persons covered by Section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement only if there is clear and convincing evidence of the existence of the facts referred to in those Sections, namely, an intent to engage in subversive activities or a probability that such activities will occur.

D. Co-ordination with United States Mission in cases of denial of admission.

I recommend further that there be no denial of a visa or entry to persons covered by Section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement before this office has been apprised of the proposed action and reasons therefor, and has had opportunity to comment concerning the United Nations reaction which may be anticipated as the result of such denial. Of course, in cases in which, as indicated above, evidence upon which the denial is based is to be shown to the Secretary-General, no denial should occur until after I have received the evidence and taken up the matter with the Secretary-General.

2. Admission of persons covered by Section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement concerning whom there is some—but not clear and convincing—evidence of an intent or a probability of engaging in subversive activities.

A. Principles to be applied.

I suggest that cases of this kind be handled by a restriction upon the unofficial activities of the persons in question, and a restriction of their movement and residence to the Headquarters District and its immediate vicinity, as contemplated by the Headquarters Agreement. These restrictions and limitations should be made known to the individual involved at the time of the issuance of a visa or at the latest at the time of entry, and the individual should make a specific undertaking to abide by them. It should also be made clear to the individual that a violation of his undertaking will be considered an abuse of privilege of residence, and that he will be required in such cases immediately to leave the United States.

I anticipate that such restrictions and limitations need to be applied in only a relatively few cases judging from the small number which have arisen in the past. It is true that the enforcement of restrictions will require the expenditure of a certain amount of manpower and money, but I believe that the cost will be justified by the necessity of respecting the obligations of host country which the United States assumed by the Joint Resolution of the Congress.

B. Definition of Headquarters District and its immediate vicinity.

The application of this suggestion of course depends upon a definition of the Headquarters District and its immediate vicinity. The Secretary-General is prepared to agree to such a definition immediately. The area to be defined must be small enough to make practical the enforcement of the limitations and restrictions imposed but must, at the same time, contain ample facilities for residence and for access to the offices of the several Delegations to the United Nations. Accordingly, I recommend a definition of the area as that segment of the Borough of Manhattan between 28th Street and 96th Street, bounded by the East and Hudson Rivers.

C. Co-ordination with United States Mission when restrictions are to be applied.

I recommend that this office be notified of any case in which it is proposed to impose restrictions so that it may comment, as appropriate, concerning the reaction which may be anticipated from such action.

3. Admission of Communists and Fellow Travelers covered by section 11 (3), (4) and (5) of the Headquarters Agreement where there is no evidence apart from Party membership or affiliation of an intent or a probability to engage in subversive activities.

A. Expediting handling of such cases.

The Department's position paper makes it clear that there is no intent on the part of the United States to bar aliens coming to the Headquarters District on official business merely because of their Communist Party membership or affiliation. However, since the admission of such persons falling within Section 11 (3), (4) and (5) of the Headquarters Agreement is barred in the first instance by Section 212(a) (28) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, these persons can be admitted only by special action by the Attorney General under Section 212(d) (3) of the Act on the basis of a recommendation by the Secretary of State or the Consular officer concerned. In view of the United States position on this matter mentioned above, I suggest that the Secretary of State make a blanket recommendation that all cases of this type be promptly turned over to the Attorney General under Section 212(d) (3). Such a blanket action should serve to expedite the handling of these cases. I suggest further that the Attorney General designate a particular officer in the Department of Justice to deal with all such cases for him, also for the purpose of expediting action. It is desirable that United States representatives in various United Nations bodies not be embarrassed unnecessarily by delays such as have occurred in the past in the processing of cases of this kind. Delay is clearly disadvantageous to us.

B. Imposition of restrictions in such cases.

I understand that the existing visa regulations already provide for the issuance of restricted visas to persons of this type, and suggest that their residence and movements also be confined to the area mentioned in the preceding section. (Section 2 B)

4. Difficulties which have arisen in the securing of visas by persons seeking entry into the United States on United Nations business.

From time to time our attention is called to cases in which the issuance of visas to United Nations personnel appears to be unnecessarily delayed, or in which United Nations personnel are subjected to what appears to be improper questioning by Consular officers. Such occurrences are unnecessary irritants in our relations with the Secretary-General of the United Nations and, in some cases, with Member Governments, and should be avoided if at all possible. I suggest that the visa regulations be reviewed with this problem in mind, and that Consular officers be instructed to give special care and consideration to applications by persons coming to the United States on United Nations business.

Memorandum by the Administrator of Security and Consular Affairs (McLeod) to the Under Secretary of State for Administration (Lourie)

WASHINGTON, May 26, 1953.

Subject: Memorandum from Ambassador Lodge, accompanying his letter of May 21, 1953,<sup>1</sup> regarding otherwise excludable aliens coming to the United Nations.

The following comments are offered on the memorandum above mentioned:

1. The Government of the United States has no desire to exclude aliens coming to the headquarters district of the United Nations, except upon the security grounds specified in the Immigration and Nationality Act. That Act specifies thirty-one general classes, some of which are subdivisible into a number of subclasses, of aliens who are ineligible to receive visas and are excludable from the United States at our ports of entry. Only three of these classes are applicable to some of the cases of aliens coming to the United Nations. (See Sections 102 and 212(a) (27), (28), and (29) of the Act.) None of the other twenty-eight categories of excludable aliens are generally applicable to aliens coming to the United Nations. Congress has spelled out in the Act what it meant by the security reservation contained in Section 6 of the Joint Resolution of August 4, 1947 (Public Law 357) approving the

Headquarters Agreement. (See Senate and House Reports on the Immigration and Nationality Act.)

2. On the question whether the standard of evidence should be "clear and convincing", as suggested in Ambassador Lodge's memorandum, it may be pointed out that the Immigration and Nationality Act and the previous law specifies that visas shall be withheld if the responsible consular officer "knows or has reason to believe" that a visa applicant is ineligible to receive the visa. This obviously does not envisage the necessity of any concurrence by the Secretary of State or the Secretary-General of the United Nations. However, the Secretary of State will exercise his general administrative supervision over all phases of the work of our consular offices to see that they do not act arbitrarily or otherwise abuse their authority.

3. The re-definition and delimitation of the area to be known as the "immediate vicinity" to the Headquarters District of the United Nations is now under consideration by the Interdepartmental Committee on Internal Security, which is considering a possible delimitation as the Borough of Manhattan in the City and State of New York, excluding therefrom any airports or docks, wharves, or piers.

4. The remaining portions of the memorandum involve questions which should be considered and discussed with the Attorney General before any conclusion is reached.

Memorandum by the Assistant Legal Adviser for United Nations Affairs (Meeker) to the Legal Adviser (Phleger)

WASHINGTON, May 27, 1953.

Subject: Ambassador Lodge's proposals for dealing with visa cases under Headquarters Agreement

The paper forwarded by Ambassador Lodge to Mr. Lourie in anticipation of Friday's meeting with the Attorney General states some constructive practical suggestions for dealing with cases where the United States, for reasons of national security, doubts that certain aliens covered by the Headquarters Agreement can be admitted to this country.

Particularly on the procedural side, Ambassador Lodge's paper recommends steps which would go far to eliminate delays and friction in visa cases.

On substance, the paper proposes that an alien covered by the Headquarters Agreement be excluded only if (a) it is clearly shown that he is coming to this country for a purpose not connected with United Nations business and (b) the United States Government determines that this non-United Nations purpose requires his exclusion. Under the first issue, (a), Ambassador Lodge would have the United States show the evidence to the Secretary-General in order to persuade him. Under the second issue, (b), the opinion of this Government would be conclusive. It seems likely that in many, if not most, cases the evidence bearing on (a) and the evidence bearing on (b) would be the same or closely intertwined. However, if the security officers of this Department and the Department of Justice believe that evidence bearing on (a)—perhaps paraphrased and shown on a confidential basis—can be made available to the Secretary-General without compromising sources or otherwise injuring security interests, Ambassador Lodge's proposal offers a practical solution under which decisions on what action is required to protect this country's security would be kept within the United States Government; persuasion of the Secretary-General would be limited to the factual issue of the purpose of the alien's travel.

The paper forwarded by Ambassador Lodge, in stating the criteria referred to in the preceding paragraph, employs varying formulae. At some points the element of "undesirability" is mentioned as an alternative to "security" requirements in connection with the United States Government's appraisal of the purpose of an alien's travel. The additional element of desirability versus undesirability seems off the mark in considering implementation of the Headquarters Agreement and protection of this country's security. Further, it would seem advisable to use consistent and uniform language in stating the criteria wherever they appear.

At one point the paper refers to an opportunity for Mr. Hammarskjöld "to participate in the determination that the persons in question are coming for a purpose not directly connected with United Nations business": I doubt whether this statement is advisable from the United States point of view and also whether the Secretary-General would be willing to assume openly a share in the responsibility for determining that a particular alien shall or shall not be admitted to this country. It would seem more accurate to describe this part of the process contemplated by Ambassador Lodge as the showing of evidence to the Secretary-General to persuade him of our version of the facts in a particular case.

In the section on the Immigration and Nationality Act (page 4 of Ambassador Lodge's paper) there is an abbreviated reference to "subversive activities" under subsections 212(a) (27) and (29) of the Act. The Department of Justice may feel this needs spelling out.

For convenience, there is attached a redraft of certain paragraphs from Ambassador Lodge's paper, to take care of the three matters just referred to.

A. Principles which should govern.

In a limited number of cases the United States will wish to prevent the entry of an individual to the United States because of clear evidence that he is coming to this country for a purpose which is not legitimately connected with United Nations business and which, in the opinion of the United States, poses a threat to this country's security.

As is rightly indicated in the position paper, admission should be denied to persons covered by Section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement only in cases where there is clear and convincing evidence that such persons are coming to this country for a purpose which is not legitimately connected with United Nations business and which, in the opinion of the United States, poses a threat to this country's security. Mr. Hammarskjold, I am certain, will agree to this position provided arrangement is made for the United States to show him the evidence that the persons in question are coming for a purpose not legitimately connected with United Nations business. I believe he will agree, on the other hand, that a determination that the purpose in question poses a threat to United States security is wholly for the United States itself to make, provided I can be supplied enough information to satisfy myself and thus assure the Secretary-General that this is so—information which I have been extremely unsuccessful in getting so far.

B. Application of principles.

The application of these principles will vary somewhat with the class of persons involved.

(1) Secretariat and Specialized Agency Employees, Accredited Correspondents and Representatives of Non-Governmental Organizations.

In the case of persons falling within these classes, I suggest that the United States ought to be prepared to show to the Secretary-General, for his confidential information, the evidence in its possession indicating that the persons in question are coming to this country for a purpose not legitimately connected with United Nations business. If the evidence is clear and convincing, as it obviously would be, I feel certain that Mr. Hammarskjold will raise no question as to the denial of admission in any case where the United States considers that the purpose so shown poses a threat to this country's security.

C. These principles are consistent with Immigration and Nationality Act.

I do not believe the foregoing principles are in conflict with subsections 212(a) (27) and (29) of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952. I believe that those subsections, properly applied, would exclude persons covered by Section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement if there is clear and convincing evidence on the matters referred to in those subsections—namely, intention to enter the United States to engage in activities covered by subsection 212(a) (27), or probability of engaging in activities covered by subsection 212(a) (29).

L/UNA files, "Headquarters Agreement—Section 6"

Memorandum by the Under Secretary of State for Administration (Lourie) to the United States Representative at the United Nations (Lodge)

WASHINGTON, May 29, 1953.

Subject: Implementation of the Headquarters Agreement and Section 6 Reservation

The following brief statement, based on the very helpful analysis and suggestions contained in your memorandum of May 19, 1953, sets forth our understanding of procedures which can usefully be followed in dealing with the access provisions of the Headquarters Agreement where a security problem exists.

1. It is highly desirable for you to agree with Mr. Hammarskjold on a practical working solution of the question of access by aliens to the United Nations headquarters, rather than to dispute with the Secretary-General, and the Organization at large, legal questions concerning the effect and scope of the Section 6 reservation.

2. In cases where an alien covered by Section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement applies for a visa and the consular officer considers that the alien is or may be excludable under subsections 212(a) (27), (28) or (29) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, the consular officer will refer the matter to the Department of State. No visa will be denied by a consular officer prior to such reference.

3. Within the Department, a conclusion will be reached whether the applicant alien falls within any of the three subsections referred to above, and, if so, which one. If the Department concludes that the applicant is not covered by any of these subsections, the consular officer will be so advised. If the Department concludes that the applicant alien is covered by subsection 212(a) (28), the Department will consider recommending to the Attorney General that he exercise his discretion to admit the alien. The consular officer will be informed of the conclusions reached in Washington by the Departments of State and Justice. No visa will be denied in a case under Section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement without the case having been referred to the Secretary or Acting Secretary for review.

4. When it is determined that a visa will be denied on security grounds (for example, because the Department of State or the Department of Justice considers that the applicant alien is covered by subsection 212(a) (27) or (29) of the Immigration and Nationality Act), the Department will communicate to you the reasons for this action. You would then be authorized in your discretion to discuss the alien's case with the Secretary-General, making known to him the substance of the information on which this Government based its decision to deny a visa. The information so given to the Secretary-General would need to be limited in such a way as not to disclose the source of the information. The Department would send its communication to you as soon as possible after the decision to deny a visa, and in any event before the visa is denied by the consular officer. As stated in your memorandum of May 19, you would not discuss with the Secretary-General the cases of governmental representatives, but of other aliens covered by Section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement.

5. In the event of an alien receiving a visa and subsequently being denied admission at the port of entry in the United States, or being subjected to unanticipated conditions of admission, the Department of Justice would make available the reasons for such action, which you would then be authorized in your discretion to make known to the Secretary-General in substance, without compromising sources of information.<sup>1</sup>

Memorandum for the Files, by Harris H. Huston, Special Assistant to the Under Secretary of State for Administration

[WASHINGTON,] June 1, 1953.

Subject: Implementation of the Headquarters Agreement and Section 6 Revision

On May 29, 1953 a meeting was held in the Office of the Attorney General which was attended by the following:

Representing the Department of Justice:

Herbert Brownell
 J. Lee Rankin
 Charles Metzner
 Thomas Donegan
 Robert Minor
 William E. Foley

Representing the United States Delegation to the United Nations:

Henry Cabot Lodge
James J. Wadsworth
William Hall

Representing the Department of State:

Donold B. Lourie
Herman Phleger
Leonard C. Meeker
Scott McLeod
Ray Ylitalo
Robert Alexander
Harris Huston

The group reviewed a memorandum prepared for [by?] Mr. Lourie for the benefit of Ambassador Lodge which discussed the procedures to be followed in dealing with the access provisions of the Headquarters Agreement, where a security problem exists.<sup>1</sup> This group was in complete agreement that the memorandum was a satisfactorily expressed practical solution. The Attorney General indicated he was entirely in agreement with the provision that the Department of Justice furnish Ambassador Lodge the essential information.

It was decided that an area of restriction placed upon a visiting alien would be referred to as a "restricted area" rather than as a "Headquarters area". It was explained that in general terms, this would be an area bounded on the west by 9th Avenue; on the north by 98th Street; on the east by the west side of Franklin D. Roosevelt Drive (except the United Nations Building), and on the south by 24th Street. It was understood that the U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations would simply state what the boundaries were to be in each individual case rather than negotiate as to what they should be. It was agreed that individual cases would directly affect the definition of the restricted area and that it could be modified with changing conditions.

It was further agreed that Ambassador Lodge should receive prompt notice in case a visa is to be withheld. This prompt notice would serve as a red light that the visa was being held up. It was further agreed that the Attorney General should be promptly notified. Mr. Alexander explained that an Operations Circular would be issued concerning this.

Mr. McLeod pointed out that this was a practical solution to the problem and that the arrangement was to be in effect only so long as Ambassador Lodge and Secretary General Dag Hammarskjold occupied their respective positions, and in the event other individuals replaced them, new arrangements should be made. All present accepted this interpretation.

It was agreed that the discussions by Ambassador Lodge with the Secretary General Dag Hammarskjold would be handled orally by Ambassador Lodge.

It was agreed that in connection with these matters, Ambassador Lodge should deal with Tom Donegan, in so far as the Department of Justice is concerned, and with Mr. Lourie or Mr. McLeod, in so far as the Department of State is concerned.

The United States Representative at the United Nations (Lodge) to the Under Secretary of State for Administration (Lourie)

NEW YORK, June 1, 1953.

DEAR DON: I have sent the Attorney General a copy of the attached paper stating the agreements we reached Friday with the request that he notify me of any points on which it does not represent his understanding.

I would appreciate your doing the same. If I do not hear from you within the week, I shall assume that I am free to proceed with my oral discussions with Mr. Hammarskjold using this paper and, of course, the earlier position paper from the Department as the basis for these discussions.

May I again thank you, Mr. Phleger and Mr. McLeod for your understanding of the problems facing us here and for your assistance in achieving a satisfactory solution.

I am particularly pleased that you will give future cases your personal attention. As you know I am only concerned that we should be certain that decisions are promptly taken and soundly based.

I am certain that our agreement on Friday will aid me in doing a more effective job of representing the interests of the United States at the United Nations and will help to fulfill the obligations which this country assumed under the unanimous invitation to the United Nations issued by both houses of the Congress in 1947.<sup>1</sup>

Sincerely yours,

HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.

Points Agreed upon with Respect to the Implementation of the Headquarters Agreement and Section 6 Reservation in a Meeting held in the Attorney General's Office, May 29, 1953.

1. It is highly desirable for you to agree with Mr. Hammarskjold on a practical working solution of the question of access by aliens to the United Nations headquarters, rather than to dispute with the Secretary-General, and the Organization at large, legal positions of each side concerning the effect and scope of the Section 6 reservation.

2. In cases where an alien covered by Section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement applies for a visa and the consular officer considers that the alien is or may be excludable under subsections 212(a) (27), (28) and (29) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, the consular officer will refer the matter to the Department of State. It shall promptly notify the Attorney General and the Ambassador at the United Nations of the cases.

3. Within the Department, the consul's conclusion will be reviewed as to whether the applicant alien falls within any of the three subsections referred to above, and, if so, which one. If the Department concludes that the applicant alien falls within subsection 212(a) (28) only, the Department will consider recommending to the Attorney General that he exercise his discretion to admit the alien. The consular officer will be informed of the conclusions reached in Washington by the Departments of State and Justice. No visa will be refused in a case under Section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement without the case having been referred to the Secretary or Acting Secretary for review.

4. When it is determined that a visa must be refused on security grounds (for example, because the Department of State or the Department of Justice considers that the applicant alien is covered by subsection (a) (27) or (29) of the Immigration and Nationality Act), the Department will communicate to you the reasons for this action. You would then be authorized in your discretion to discuss the alien's case with the Secretary-General, making known to him the substance of the information on which this Government based its decision to deny a visa. The information so given to the Secretary-General would need to be limited in such a way as not to disclose the source of the information. The Department would send its communication to you as soon as possible after the decision to deny a visa, and in any event before the visa is denied by the consular officer. As stated in your memorandum of May 19, you would not discuss with the Secretary-General the cases of governmental representatives, but of other aliens covered by Section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement. In a few cases it may be impossible to disclose any information to the Secretary-General but in these cases the United States Ambassador at the United Nations shall be fully informed so that he can personally assure the Secretary-General that clear and convincing information supporting the determination exists.

5. In the event of an alien receiving a visa and subsequently being denied admission at the port of entry in the United States, or being subjected to unanticipated conditions of admission, the Department of Justice would make available to you promptly the reasons for such action, which you would then be authorized in your discretion to make known to the Secretary-General in substance, without compromising sources of information.

6. In the present policy of restriction of certain individuals a specific area in the vicinity of the headquarters will be extended to cover other individuals following under Section 11 who would otherwise be inadmissible. The standard area for application of restrictions will be bounded as follows: Beginning at the southwesterly intersection of 97th Street and Franklin Delano Roosevelt Drive, thence running southerly along the west curb of Franklin Delano Roosevelt Drive to the northwesterly intersection of Franklin Delano Roosevelt Drive and 48th Street, thence running easterly to the East River, thence running southerly along the west bank of the East River to a point directly east of the southwesterly intersection of Franklin Delano Roosevelt Drive and 42nd Street, thence westerly to the southwesterly intersection of Franklin Delano Roosevelt Drive and 42nd Street, thence running southerly along the west curb of Franklin Roosevelt Drive to the northwesterly intersection of Franklin Roosevelt Drive and 26th Street, thence westerly along the north curb of 26th Street to the northwesterly intersection of 26th Street and 1st Avenue, thence northerly along the west curb of 1st Avenue to the northwesterly intersection of 1st Avenue and 28th Street, thence westerly along the north curb of 28th Street to the northeasterly intersection of 28th Street and 9th Avenue, thence running northerly along the east curb of 9th Avenue to the southeasterly intersection of 49th Street and 9th Avenue, thence easterly along the south curb of 49th Street to the southeasterly intersection of 49th Street and 8th Avenue, thence northerly along the east curb of 8th Avenue and Central Park West to the southeasterly intersection of Central Park West and Transverse Road No. 4 which crosses Central Park, thence easterly along the south curb of Transverse Road No. 4 and 97th Street to the point and place of beginning. The limitation of the movement of individuals who are restricted to this standard area shall not be deemed to prevent these individuals from having access by the most direct route from this area to offices of the Immigration and Naturalization Service at 70 Columbus Avenue.

No formal agreement for this purpose will be negotiated. However, the Secretary-General will be informed of this standard area and necessary steps will be taken to make the information available to the general public. In a limited number of cases, in each of which specific notice will be given to the Secretary-General, it may be necessary to circumscribe further the standard area. These decisions will be taken on specific grounds and where possible the Secretary-General will be informed in advance.

DEAR DON: Enclosed is a letter which Secretary General Hammarskjold handed to me today, together with the revised copy of the statement which we had given him and which was in furtherance of the procedure agreed upon by the State Department and the Justice Department. He discussed this matter with me at lunch and gave me at that time his letter and revised text.

You will see that the crux of the matter is in the language which he has added to the last paragraph—in particular the interpretation of “may” in the sentence reading “It is recognized that those rights may be exercised by granting a visa valid only for transit to and from the Headquarters District and for sojourn in its immediate vicinity.” You will note that Hammarskjold’s letter interprets this to mean “may only”; whereas we would, I should think, want to interpret this in a permissive character as merely indicating one of a number of procedures which were open to us.

I intend therefore to write him a letter, a copy of which I attach herewith,<sup>1</sup> which places our interpretation on his language.

Sincerely yours,

HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.

[Enclosure]

The Secretary-General of the United Nations (Hammarskjold) to the United States Representatives at the United Nations (Lodge)

UNITED NATIONS, New York, 22 June 1953.

MY DEAR LODGE: I have now had an opportunity to consider in detail the position of the Secretary-General in case of a solution of the Headquarters Agreement along the lines of your draft of points which might be included in a statement to be made by me to the Economic and Social Council.<sup>2</sup> I think we need not consider our positions very far apart, although, as I indicated in our conversation, there still remain a few points to be settled between us.

I should state at once, and I am sure you will agree, that in negotiating under the Headquarters Agreement I am necessarily bound by its terms, as I of course have no authority to reach an accord with you which would alter existing provisions of an Agreement to which the United Nations as an Organization is a party.

Because of this limitation on my authority, the following questions are raised in my mind when going deeper into those aspects of the problem to which I referred when we met last time.

Suppose that there arises in the future, along the lines of your suggestion, a "case involving a serious problem with respect to the admission to the United States of persons coming to the Headquarters District" and that you "consult with me and keep me as fully informed as possible". Let us further suppose that in this particular case I find myself in agreement with your evaluation of the information provided. I am not clear as to how our consensus as to that information "whether transmitted to me in confidence or not" will enable me to render to the organ of the United Nations principally concerned (whether it be the General Assembly, the Economic and Social Council, or another) an accounting for the ensuing decision of the United States to deny a visa—or how it would protect the United States from being accused of taking unilateral action against the principles of the Agreement. Our view of the facts would settle the problem only if the Secretary-General had been given authority in this respect.

It seems to me that either the organ concerned, or perhaps the Government principally affected, would still be able to refer to the fact that the right of "entry of aliens" to the Headquarters District provided in Section 13 is unqualified, and that only "the residence of aliens" is properly subject to the requirement of departure in case of activities abusing the privileges of residence.

On the opposite hypothesis, suppose that after the most earnest consultation we could not reach an agreement either as to your evaluation of the information at hand or else as to the adequacy of that information. How should we get out of such a situation?

The heart of the matter, at the present stage, seems to me to be that in either case, whether I agreed with the information or not, the very limited authority of the Secretary-General under the Headquarters Agreement could not be considered as extending to claiming before the organ concerned that the mere fact of consultation, though carried out in the best of good faith, should have the legal effect of authorizing an exclusion from access to the Headquarters not authorized by the Agreement itself.

As both the text and the history of the Agreement convince me that I would not have the authority to negotiate under Section 21 a settlement which had the effect of amending Section 13 (i.e., which would substitute for the right of deportation a right of exclusion, and would also substitute a prediction of possible or probable abuse of privileges for proven "activities" in abuse of the privileges of residence), I feel that, on the basis of your suggestion, we should try and solve the problem by moving closer to the technical construction of the security safeguards in the Agreement. As you will remember, the Agreement is express (and Congress was no less express) in specifying that the United States is provided with two safeguards for its security: the right to restrict to the Headquarters District and its immediate vicinity the visas of persons entitled to access under the Agreement; and deportation in case any such persons abuse their privileges in activities outside their official capacity. Having this in mind, I offer by way of annex some adjustments to your draft which would serve to bring it into better conformity with the main requirements, while remaining true to the basic principles on which we are fully agreed.

Yours very sincerely,

DAG HAMMARSKJOLD

CONFIDENTIAL

[NEW YORK,] 22 June 1953.

POINTS WHICH MIGHT BE INCLUDED IN STATEMENT TO BE MADE BY SYG UN TO ECOSOC

I and my representatives have, during the past weeks, discussed with the Representative of the U.S. to the UN and members of his staff problems which have arisen in connection with the application for admission to the U.S. by persons desiring to come to the Headquarters District. Although the discussions commenced on the point of the legal interpretation of certain provisions of the Headquarters Agreement and of the U.S. authorizing legislation, it quickly became evident in the course of the discussions that there was agreement concerning the basic principles to be applied to the problems which had arisen, and that only matters of procedure required detailed attention. The procedural aspects have now been settled in a manner which in practice should assure the mutual satisfaction of the parties concerned.

The basic principles which have been recognized are the following: it is certain that the provisions of the Headquarters Agreement cannot be permitted to serve as a cover to enable persons in the U.S. to engage in activities, outside the scope of their official functions, directed against the host country. It is equally certain that in view of the nature of the obligations undertaken by the U.S. as host country when entering into the Headquarters Agreement, it must not arbitrarily and for reasons known only to itself make decisions to exclude persons falling within the categories set forth in Section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement, although it clearly has the right to deport such persons for abuse of privileges of residence under the Agreement.

Accordingly, procedures have been devised to make certain that, should there arise in the future any case involving a serious problem with respect to the admission to the U.S. of persons coming to the Headquarters District, the matter will receive the most prompt and careful consideration at the highest levels, and that the U.S. will consult with me and keep me as fully informed as possible to assure that the decision made is in accord with the rights of the U.S. Government to protect its own security under the Agreement. It is recognized that those rights may be exercised by granting a visa valid only for transit to and from the Headquarters District and for sojourn in its immediate vicinity. It is further recognized that to implement that right the U.S. has authority to define (a) "the immediate vicinity" of the Headquarters and the necessary routes of transit, (b) activities outside the scope of official functions which would constitute an abuse of the privileges of residence, and (c) the time and manner of expiration of the visa following the completion of the official functions.

MY DEAR HAMMARSKJÖLD: This letter is in further reference to our conversation on June 23rd [24?] (and your letter dated June 23 [22?])<sup>1</sup> relative to the statement which you propose to make to the Economic and Social Council, a copy of which you handed to me and which is attached herewith.<sup>2</sup>

Upon further reflection I find that, while I do not agree in full with the statements in your letter of transmittal, I really cannot add anything to what I said when you first showed me the paper—that the clarification which you have added accurately depicts many of the procedures which are open to the United States and that, by virtue of this fact, the addition of your language is in the interests of clarity and completeness and actually improves the statement. I am glad, therefore, to say that I see no objection to your making the statement as you are planning to do it.

With best wishes,

Sincerely yours,

HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.

The United States Representative at the United Nations (Lodge) to the Under Secretary of State for Administration (Lourie)

NEW YORK, July 7, 1953.

DEAR DON: Enclosed is the latest letter from Secretary General Hammarskjöld—in reply to my own of July 2, 1953—concerning the statement he proposes to make before the Economic and Social Council on the problem of access to the Headquarters District.

You will note that he appears to concede the point I made in my letter to him, namely, that his statement sets out "many of the procedures which are open to the United States". He states that "there might possibly be other procedures open to the United States which would be consistent with the Headquarters Agreement".

Hammar skjold states that in the absence of further word from me he assumes that I accept—in the light of his interpretation of his authority under the Headquarters Agreement—that portion of his statement that the United States will consult with him and keep him as fully informed as possible to assure that decisions concerning the entry of aliens are made in accord with the right of the United States Government to protect its own security under the Headquarters Agreement. Hammar skjold's interpretation of his authority, as stated in his letter<sup>1</sup> which I transmitted to you on June 24th, is that he has no power to enter into any arrangements with the United States which will alter the provisions of the Headquarters Agreement, that is, increase the rights of the United States or decrease those of the United Nations. I think this interpretation is correct, as is Hammar skjold's assumption that his stated position is acceptable to us.

Unless you advise me that the Department feels differently, I do not propose to reply to Hammar skjold's letter of July 3rd.

I understand that you are considering the instructions to be sent to our ECOSOC Representative at Geneva concerning the position he ought to take there with respect to Hammar skjold's statement when it is submitted to ECOSOC. I believe it would be a mistake for our Representative to become involved in any discussion concerning this statement, and strongly urge that he be instructed to refrain from all comment, formal or informal, with respect to it.

Sincerely yours,

HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.

The Secretary-General of the United Nations (Hammar skjold) to the United States Representative at the United Nations (Lodge)

UNITED NATIONS, NEW YORK, 3 July 1953.

MY DEAR LODGE: I thank you for your letter of 2 July 1953, in which you tell me that you see no objection to my making the statement to the Economic and Social Council in the form in which I sent it to you by my letter of 22 June.

In your letter you mention in passing that you do not agree in full with the statements in my letter of transmittal. You also say that you accept my addition to the text as setting out "many of the procedures which are open to the United States". There might possibly be other procedures open to the United States which would be consistent with the Headquarters Agreement. But these two passages in your letter might be read as implying some reservations regarding my basic position, as expressed in my letter and draft statement of 22 June. However, I presume that—as you have not found it called for to elaborate your views—you accept what is summarized in the last paragraph of my statement—that is, that the United States "will consult me and keep me as fully informed as possible to assure that the decision is made in accord with the rights of the United States Government to protect its own security under the (Headquarters) Agreement"—in the light of my interpretation of my authority under the Headquarters Agreement as stated in my letter of transmittal, especially in the last paragraph. The text of my statement as it now stands will undoubtedly give rise to many questions in the Economic and Social Council. An interpretation of the statement in accordance with this conviction of mine as to the limits of my rights, is, of course for me, the basis on which I shall have to defend my view that the matter has now been settled "in a manner which in practice should assure the mutual satisfaction of the parties concerned."

If I do not hear from you, I shall take it that my assumption is correct and under these circumstances my replies to the Members of the Economic and Social Council will be in accordance with my position as I have already stated it to you.

Yours sincerely,

DAG HAMMARSKJOLD

12. For Lourie from Wadsworth (limit distribution). Following is text of communication and enclosure dated July 8 addressed by SYGUN to Lodge which I discussed with you on telephone today :

"I am sorry indeed to have to revert to the question of the Headquarters Agreement, but, in going over the text of my statement to ECOSOC, I have observed a couple of points which, to my mind, make necessary some minor amendments to the text. I send you a copy of the 'points which might be included' as I would like to have them finally drafted. The amendments are underlined.

"By way of explanation of the amendments now suggested, I would like to say that the amendment in the first line of the last paragraph is purely formal and is intended to get rid of a phrase which was adequate for the original draft, but now is not very good as an introduction to what follows. The other amendments represent in my view only clarifications of what must already be taken for granted.

"Of course, this whole statement of the results of our common sense approach is somewhat in the nature of a gentleman's agreement. It has been clear to me that you intend to treat any future cases in such a way that we shall get decisions in due time. I am also confident that, when you define the 'immediate vicinity', this will be done after consultation with us and in a spirit true to the purpose of the Headquarter's Agreement.

"I feel sure, however, the points covered in the amendments—along with several others—will be raised in ECOSOC discussion. I then shall have to state what is my interpretation of your intentions. If the text remained without the amendments I am now proposing, I would be in a somewhat ambiguous and weak position, as some del might retort that the agreement as I described it was not brought out in the text. For that reason, interpreting your intentions as I do, I feel that it would be both to your and to our advantage to make the text quite clear on the points mentioned. I draw your attention, however, to the fact that the text as amended may be said to have legal consequences which the previous text did not have as it explicitly makes both the question of time and the question of the principles guiding the definition of the 'immediate vicinity' of the headquarters area, etc., issues which can be subject to arbitration. But, of course, they are so on the basis of our agreement, independently of what we say in the statement; at all events, if my understanding of your intentions is correct, the amendments would not introduce any new element, as I take it for granted that on such legal issues, where you feel that it would be fitting for you to consult me if any case arises, you would not object to a common appeal to arbitration if we could not agree.

"I need not stress that what I propose does not express any distrust. It is just because of my trust in your attitude to this whole issue that I feel that the clarifications suggested should not present any difficulty for you".

Points which might be included in statement to be made by SYG UN to ECOSOC:

“Accordingly (procedures have been devised) (begin underline) it is intended (end underline) to make certain that, should there arise in the future any case involving a serious problem with respect to the admission to the US of persons coming to the headquarter’s district, the matter will receive the most prompt and careful consideration at the highest levels, (begin underline) that timely decisions will be made, (end underline) and that the US will consult with me and keep me as fully informed as possible to assure that the decision made is in accord with the rights of the US Government to protect its own security under the agreement. In our view, changes proposed by Hammarskjold are acceptable. Our position this matter remains as stated in Lodge’s letters to you dated June 24 and July 7.

Would appreciate your comments.

Memorandum by the Assistant Legal Adviser for United Nations Affairs (Meeker) to the Deputy United States Representative at the United Nations (Wadsworth)

[WASHINGTON,] July 22, 1953.

Subject: Draft Report by the Secretary-General to ECOSOC

We received yesterday the new draft report<sup>1</sup> of the Secretary-General, on visa matters, which you sent down from New York for our comments. We have gone over the paper, and the interested areas of the Department (Mr. Lourie’s office, UNA, and the Legal Adviser’s Office) have the following suggestions to make:

1. In the third paragraph of the draft report, there is a statement which begins "Subject to the Agreement, the United States also has the authority to make any reasonable definition . . ." In an earlier letter of transmittal, Secretary-General Hammarskjold stated that the words "Subject to the Agreement" had the effect of making definitions subject to arbitration under Section 21. We did not concur in this, and in view of the history which has gone before, believe that the expression "Subject to the Agreement" should be omitted from the present draft or replaced by a neutral expression such as "In accordance with the Agreement".

2. In the third sentence of the next paragraph of the Secretary-General's draft report, coverage is limited to "a representative of a nongovernmental organization". This is too narrow, since such cases might cover newspaper correspondents, invitees, or others. Accordingly, we think the expression should be modified to read "a person covered by Section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement" or, simply, "an alien".

3. The first and last sentences of that same paragraph in the Secretary-General's report give rise to some difficulty. We don't think there is a sufficient measure of agreement to warrant saying, at the beginning of the first sentence, "It is agreed that". This is the Secretariat's statement, and we think that quoted words should be omitted. In the last sentence of the paragraph the Secretary-General's theory of security cases under the Headquarters Agreement is attributed to "the United States representatives". It would be more accurate to rephrase the last sentence in either of the following alternative ways:

(a) "Such cases would appear to be outside the scope of the Headquarters Agreement.", or

(b) "The United States representatives hold that in such cases the United States Government is entitled to refuse a visa."

4. As you indicated yesterday, some of the statements late in the report, concerning arbitration and concerning the necessity of reference to the General Assembly, are unfortunate and undesirable. We think that the last two sentences in the fifth paragraph of the Secretary-General's report and the last two sentences of the sixth paragraph should be omitted. This material is not only objectionable in its substance but also strikes a dissonant minor chord on which to end the report. We would strongly urge a revision of the last paragraph of the Secretary-General's draft report along the following lines:

"In giving this account of the negotiations to the Economic and Social Council, I have therefore to report that there is a measure of agreement which may help to remove difficulties over the matter in the future, and I venture to express the hope that any remaining questions will be resolved satisfactorily in the application of the Headquarters Agreement or in further negotiations with representatives of the United States.”

This would seem not only an acceptable approach from the United States point of view, but also a statement which would clearly preserve the Secretary-General's position in the event that the hope expressed by him should not materialize. He could then, of course, refer the matter to the General Assembly or seek arbitration. Since this would be true whether or not the Secretary-General makes any express reference to it in his report, we hope very much that he will be willing to eliminate from the draft report the references to arbitration and to General Assembly decision.

5. The changes suggested above have been formulated not in terms of what we would consider to be the ideal report of the Secretary-General, but rather as alterations which would make it possible for the U.S. Delegation at ECOSOC in Geneva to acquiesce in the Secretary-General's report.

6. In view of the implications of this whole matter for the operations of the Department of Justice under the Immigration and Nationality Act, it would seem desirable for Ambassador Lodge to inform Attorney General Brownell concerning the proposed report of the Secretary-General to ECOSOC before the report is finalized.

SYG and I agreed today on following text for his statement before ECOSOC. This agreement was reached subject to his assurance that if a proposal is made in Council for reference this question to GA, he will strongly oppose it and with understanding on my part that if question is raised with respect arbitration of disagreements under headquarters agreement that SYG is free to express his opinion that arbitration applies to all sections of the agreement.

I consider this is a satisfactory solution and strongly recommend that appropriate instructions be issued to our ECOSOC delegation to support SYG's statement before ECOSOC. I believe statement by SYG and his general intentions are such that position of US fully safeguarded and I believe further that agreement between SYG and myself is such that we should experience no further serious difficulties.

Progress report by the Secretary General to the Economic and Social Council on negotiations with the United States of America concerning the interpretation of the Headquarters Agreement:

“Although the negotiations with the United States on the interpretation and application of the Headquarters Agreement are not yet concluded, it is appropriate that a brief report be made on the matter to the Economic and Social Council.

It will be recalled that earlier this year the United States, invoking a reservation it claimed to have made in becoming party to the Headquarters Agreement, declined to grant visas for transit to United Nations headquarters to representatives of two non-governmental organizations in consultative relations with the Economic and Social Council. On 9 April 1953, the Council requested a legal opinion on the matter. A memorandum by the legal department (E/2397), issued the next day, concluded that under section 11 of the Headquarters Agreement representatives of non-governmental organizations with consultative status were entitled to transit to and from the headquarters district, and that this right had not been made the subject of any reservation. The Council later included an item on the provisional agenda of its sixteenth session relating to a report on the result of my negotiations with the United States.

Since then, I and my representatives have been carrying on discussions of the problem with the permanent representative of the United States and his staff. It was recognized from the outset that the provisions of the Headquarters Agreement should not be permitted to serve as a cover to enable persons in the United States to engage in activities, outside the scope of their official functions, directed against the security of that country. It was also recognized that under the agreement, and subject to its purposes, the United States can protect its security by granting visas valid only for transit to and from the headquarters district and sojourn in its immediate vicinity, in accordance with section 13(e); the United States also has the authority to make any reasonable definition consistent with the purposes of the agreement of the ‘immediate vicinity’ of the headquarters district, of the necessary routes of transit, and of the time and manner of expiration of the visa following the completion of official functions. As provided in section 13(b), the United States can carry out deportation proceedings under its law and regulations against persons admitted under the Headquarters Agreement who abuse the privileges of residence in activities in the United States outside their official capacity.

In the case of aliens in transit to the headquarters district exclusively on official business of, or before the United Nations, the rights of the United States are limited by the Headquarters Agreement to those mentioned. However, other cases may arise, the treatment of which under the agreement will raise questions. I refer to cases in which there is clear and convincing evidence that a representative of a non-governmental organization is coming to the United States purportedly for United Nations business but also, or primarily, for a purpose outside the scope of such activities, and where further the competent authorities of the Government of the United States are satisfied that the admission of that person would be prejudicial to the national security of the United States. In the opinion of the United States representatives, such cases are outside the scope of the Headquarters Agreement, and they therefore hold that in such cases the United States Government is entitled to refuse a visa.

The United States representatives have assured me that, if in the future there should arise any serious problem with respect to the application in special cases of provisions concerning access to the headquarters district or sojourn in its vicinity, the matter will receive the most prompt and careful consideration at the highest levels, that timely decisions will be made, and that the United States will consult me and keep me as fully informed as possible, in order to assure that the decision made is in accordance with the rights of the parties concerned.

Also from the United Nations point of view it should be recognized that a person should be excluded from the host country if there is clear and convincing evidence that he intends, in bad faith, to use his trip as a cover for activities against that country's security. This particular problem may well not have been studied and resolved when the headquarters agreement was drafted. However I would consider it proper for me to accept a method of application of the Headquarters Agreement which is in accordance with the interpretation put forward by the United States representatives only if such method of application had been explicitly authorized by the competent organ.

In giving this account of the negotiations to the Economic and Social Council, I have therefore to report that there is a measure of agreement which may help to remove difficulties over the matter in the future, and I venture to express the hope that any remaining questions will be resolved satisfactorily in the application of the Headquarters Agreement or in further negotiations with representatives of the United States."

The Under Secretary of State for Administration (Lourie) to the Attorney General of the United States (Brownell)

[WASHINGTON,] September 11, 1953.

MY DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: The Reverend Guthrie Michael Scott, who was the subject of the Department's letter dated October 6, 1952 and of a communication from the Immigration and Naturalization Service dated October 13, 1952,<sup>1</sup> has applied at the American Embassy at London, England, for a visa to proceed to the United Nations Headquarters, New York, New York, for the purpose of attending the eighth regular session of the General Assembly of the United Nations which will convene on September 15, 1953.

Under date of August 20, 1953 the Department was informed by the United States Mission to the United Nations that the International League for the Rights of Man, an organization which has been granted category B consultative status by the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations, has appointed the Reverend Mr. Scott as its representative to the eighth regular session of the General Assembly of the United Nations and, accordingly, he is to be considered as coming within the provisions of Section 11 (5) of the Headquarters Agreement.

The Reverend Mr. Scott previously entered the United States on several occasions, the most recent being in 1952 when his temporary admission was authorized on October 9, 1952 pursuant to the authority contained in the Ninth Proviso to Section 3 of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917, as amended it having been found that he was inadmissible into the United States under Section 1(2) of the Act of October 16, 1918 as amended because of former voluntary membership in the Communist Party of Great Britain.

The Embassy at London has submitted a report indicating that Mr. Scott, born at Lowfield Heath, England on July 30, 1907, is a British subject, unmarried, whose present address is "Little Gardens" Layer de le Haye near Colchester, Essex, England. The report further states that he has resided in: Great Britain, South Africa, India, Switzerland and the United States, that he is a clergyman in the Church of England; a Director of the Africa Bureau; that he served in the Royal Air Force in 1940-41 and that he desires to be in the United States for the opening of the eighth regular session of the General Assembly on September 15, 1953.

The report from the Embassy further indicates that Mr. Scott's ineligibility to receive a visa is based on the same grounds as in 1950 and 1952, i.e., former membership in the Communist Party.

The Embassy at London also advised that Mr. Scott had declined to state, on grounds of principle, with what organizations he had been affiliated and that he also declined, for the same reason, to swear that he is not and never has been a member of the Communist or other totalitarian parties. The Department considers, since the replies to the question of affiliation would tend, at most, to make Mr. Scott ineligible to receive a visa under Section 212(a)(28) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, which the Department considers him to be on the basis of adequate security information on file, that his failure to answer is not material.

At the time Mr. Scott's application for a visa was under consideration by the Department in 1952, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Central Intelligence Agency furnished the Department with reports concerning this subject. . . . The Department understands that these agencies also furnished these reports directly to you.

State Department files reveal no information of a security nature tending to show anything not indicated in the aforementioned reports.

In view of the fact that Mr. Scott comes within the provisions of Section 11(5) of the Headquarters Agreement, it is requested that you exercise your discretionary authority for his temporary admission under Section 212(d)(3) of the Immigration and Nationality Act.

In as much as Mr. Scott desires to be present when the eighth session of the General Assembly convenes, on September 15, 1953, the Department would appreciate your urgent attention in this matter.

Sincerely yours,

NEW YORK, September 16, 1953.

DEAR DON: I understand that on September 15th the Department of State authorized the issuance of a visa to the Reverend Michael Scott concerning whom I wrote to you on September 1st. I am told that this authorization was based upon a decision made by the Attorney General, to whom the matter was referred by you on September 11th, that Scott might be admitted on United Nations business. Without, of course, commenting on the individual in question, I want to express my appreciation to you personally for the prompt action which you took when the case had reached your attention.

However, I am concerned to note that the Department of State required from August 25th to September 11th to transmit the Scott case to the Attorney General for his decision concerning Scott's admission. I venture to suggest that you and Mr. McLeod might wish to inquire into the reasons for the time involved in reaching a decision on this case in the Department. Although in this instance we managed to attain a decision within the time limits, thanks in the main to the Department of Justice and your own prompt action, in the future we might not be so fortunate.

Sincerely yours,

HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.

Memorandum by the Deputy United States Representative at the United Nations (Wadsworth) to the Under Secretary of State for Administration (Lourie)

SECRET

[NEW YORK,] November 30, 1953.

Subject: Visa Application of Anwar Youseff Elmeshry, UN Secretariat Recruit.

Attached is a copy of a file<sup>1</sup> I have received from Ingram (OIA) concerning this matter. The file deals with an Egyptian national being recruited by the UN Secretariat, and for whom the UN has requested a visa from the Cairo Consulate by telegram dated October 20, 1953. A copy of this telegram was forwarded by USUN to Maney (VO) on October 21st.<sup>2</sup>

The file indicates that the Cairo Consulate considers that there are reasonable grounds to believe that the subject is inadmissible to the U.S. under Section 212(a) (29) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, and that by OMV 4 of November 4th the Consulate has requested the Department's advisory opinion concerning the matter. This file also contains a memorandum dated November 19th from Maney (VO) to Ingram (OIA) and Chase (SCA)<sup>2</sup> stating that VO concurs in the Consulate's finding of inadmissibility and recommending that the UN Organization be requested to cancel the subject's appointment as a staff member. This recommendation appears, from Ingram's memorandum of November 25th<sup>2</sup> addressed to me, to be concurred in both by OIA and SCA. No clearance with the Legal Adviser's office or other office is indicated.

It has been my understanding that one of the decisions taken at the meeting held on May 29, 1953 in the Attorney General's office, and in which you, Ambassador Lodge and myself participated, was that a final finding of inadmissibility of persons covered by the Headquarters Agreement such as the subject would be taken only at the highest level and would have to be concurred in by the Secretary or Acting Secretary of State. Accordingly I assume that the finding in the instant case is only preliminary and has not yet been reviewed within the Department.

You will also recall that in our discussions with Secretary General Hammarskjold concerning the application of the Headquarters Agreement we assured him that decisions concerning the necessity for exclusion of certain persons covered by the Headquarters Agreement, including Secretariat officials, would be taken only after consideration of the case at the highest levels within the U.S. Government. Accordingly it appears unwise and inappropriate to request that he withdraw the appointment of the subject on the basis of the preliminary finding made in this case. This is especially true because of the fact that the subject is head of the Foreign Relations Department, Egyptian State Broadcasting, and thus presumably has the backing of the Egyptian Government for his candidacy for a Secretariat job. Further, we assured the Secretary General that we would furnish him with such information as possible to support any finding of inadmissibility which was made and, in the present case, we have not been authorized to transmit any supporting information.

In view of the delay which has already occurred, I would hope that you can give urgent consideration to this matter so that a final decision concerning the subject's admissibility or inadmissibility can be made promptly. In this connection, UN officials have informally advised USUN of the Organization's urgent need for the subject's services. (USUN Tel No. 269, Nov. 23, 1953).<sup>3</sup>

I am not in a position to pass on the merits of this case, but it does appear on one reading that it ought to be possible to obtain additional information concerning the subject's alleged Communist Party membership, if necessary going directly to the Egyptian Foreign Office on a confidential basis.

My only other suggestion with reference to the merits of the case is that it appears possible that the Cairo Consulate is equating Communist Party membership, which is dealt with by subparagraph (28) of Section 212(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, with inadmissibility under subparagraph (29). It is my understanding that this is not the intention of the Act for, if it were, then no nationals of Communist Bloc Governments could be admitted to this country as Secretariat officials. I think it would be helpful to have the Legal Adviser take a look at this.

Finally, should it be decided that we ought to attempt to dissuade the Secretary General from this appointment, I trust that we will be furnished with information which we can submit to the Secretary General in support of our position.

WASHINGTON, December 30, 1953.

MY DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: I refer to a meeting which was held with Ambassador Lodge in your office on May 29, 1953 to consider procedures to be followed in dealing with the cases of aliens seeking admission to the United States in connection with the work of the United Nations. It was agreed at that time that close liaison should be maintained between the Departments of State and Justice with respect to any cases where questions of the admissibility of an alien under United States law were presented. I am writing to you now about such a case in order to secure a concert of views between our two Departments.

In November 1953 the Department of State was informed by our Mission in Cairo that Anwar Youseff El Meshry, an Egyptian national, had applied for a non-immigrant visa for the purpose of proceeding to the United Nations to take up a position as information officer within the United Nations Secretariat. The Mission in Cairo also reported that the United Nations had requested, in a telegram dated October 21, 1953, that G-4 visas be issued to Mr. El Meshry and his family.

Information available to the Department of State indicates: that Mr. El Meshry is a member of a Communist group in Egypt; that officials of the Egyptian Ministry of Interior had recommended his dismissal from a position with the Egyptian State Broadcasting because of this membership, but that no action was taken or is contemplated concerning the dismissal recommendation; that Mr. El Meshry has participated in four Communist-sponsored world-wide conferences; that he has written at least two anti-American articles appearing in an Egyptian newspaper.

On the basis of the above information, it is the view of this Department that Mr. El Meshry falls within the class of aliens defined in subsection 212(a)(28) of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, but that he does not fall within the classes defined in subsection 212(a)(27) or subsection 212(a)(29) of the Act. It has been considered in the Department of State that, in the light of Section 102(3) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, it is necessary to interpret subsections 212(a)(27) and 212(a)(29) of the Act in relation to subsection 212(a)(28), and as defining classes of aliens with respect to whom there is more seriously derogatory information than that covered in subsection 212(a)(28). To construe subsection 212(a)(27) or subsection 212(a)(29) as applying to aliens who were Communists and engaged in the regular activities of Communist Party members would bar completely from entry the members of Soviet-bloc delegations to the United Nations and many Soviet-bloc nationals employed by the Secretariat. It is not believed that the statute should be so interpreted, in view of its provisions such as those contained in subsection 101(A)(15). Subsections 212(a)(27) and 212(a)(29) are believed to apply to cases where more than Communist Party membership and the usual activities incident to such membership are involved. Espionage, sabotage, and conspiracy to bring about violent overthrow of the Government are examples of the type of threat to the national security evidently covered by the two subsections in question.

I would appreciate hearing from you at your early convenience whether you agree with the above stated views concerning the case of Mr. El Meshry, so that we might know in advance whether the Department of Justice would take the same view as this Department of the facts now known concerning Mr. El Meshry, upon the latter's arrival at a port of entry in the event a visa is issued to him. This Department would be happy to make available to you any relevant file materials which would be of assistance in your consideration of the matter.

Sincerely yours,

DONALD B. LOURIE

The Secretary of State to the Attorney General of the United States (McGranery)<sup>1</sup>

[WASHINGTON,] October 6, 1952.

MY DEAR MR. McGRANERY: The Secretary General of the United Nations has advised the United States representative to the United Nations that a number of United States nationals employed on the United Nations Secretariat have been subpoenaed to appear before a Federal Grand Jury now sitting in New York. The Secretary General has also stated that certain Secretariat employees have already appeared before the Grand Jury pursuant to these subpoenas and that the Grand Jury has inquired into matters pertaining to their discharge of their official duties at the United Nations. While he does not wish to interfere in the exercise by the Grand Jury of its legitimate functions, the Secretary General is concerned lest those employees in the Organization who are still to appear before the Grand Jury will be asked such questions in violation of the privileges and immunities of the Organization.

The Department of State is therefore bringing this matter to your attention at the present time in the hope that appropriate clarifying instructions may be issued to the United States Attorney in New York concerning the matter. This Department, of course, recognizes that United States citizens should not be able to avoid inquiry by a grand jury by reason of United Nations employment when the inquiry relates to matters outside the scope of their official functions. Accordingly, while protecting the regular and legitimate processes of the Grand Jury, this Department hopes that instructions may be issued to the United States Attorney to confine the questioning of United Nations Secretariat personnel to matters outside the scope of their official duties.

In a letter dated July 15, 1952, Mr. Jack B. Tate, the then Acting Legal Adviser of the Department, transmitted to you the Secretary General's letter of June 13, 1952 to Ambassador Gross setting forth the position of the United Nations with respect to certain requests which the Grand Jury was then making to the United Nations officials.<sup>2</sup> In transmitting this letter Mr. Tate stated: "The power of the United States investigatory bodies to question United Nations employees is of course also circumscribed by Articles 100 and 105 of the Charter and by the International Organizations Immunities Act."

It is therefore hoped that appropriate instructions may be issued to the United States Attorney in New York which would at the same time assure the legitimate scope of Grand Jury inquiry into the activities of United Nations employees while avoiding inquiry into matters falling within the official functions of United Nations officials. In this way, I believe we may avert the eventuality of the United Nations instructing its employees to claim the immunities of the organization when they are testifying before the Grand Jury. It would be in the interest of the United States relations with the Organization and with friendly Member States to resolve this question without resort by the United Nations to a strict legal position.

Sincerely yours,

For the Secretary of State:

[WASHINGTON,] October 12, 1952.

MY DEAR ALEX: I have your letter of September 25.<sup>2</sup> As you observe, the United Nations alone is responsible for the selection of the personnel, of whatever nationality, that it employs. It was decided at the outset that this should be so. It was believed that, if individual staff members were to be beholden to their individual governments with respect to their service on the United Nations Secretariat, it would be impossible for the staff to effectively support the Secretary General in his capacity as the administrative representative of the member governments as a whole. This concept is embodied in specific provisions of the United Nations Charter itself.

It follows that United States nationals on the Secretariat do not represent the United States but are representatives of the United Nations insofar as their official capacity is concerned. The United States, as every other Member Government, is restrained from seeking to instruct the Secretary General and members of his staff, and these officials in turn are pledged not to seek or receive instructions from any government or external authority.

It is within the context of this sort of relationship between the United States Government and the United Nations that you ask if the Department has impressed upon the administrative officials of the United Nations our attitude toward the employment of Communists. I would like to assure you that we have taken utmost care to impress upon the administrative officials of the United Nations that the employment of United States nationals who are Communists is not in the best interests of the United Nations. Accordingly, we make known to the administrative officials of the United Nations such information as is at our disposal on American citizens whom we know to be employed and contemplated for employment by the United Nations. The use made by the Secretary General of such information as he secures from this Government is, of course, a matter for him to decide.

Inasmuch as Communist governments are members of the United Nations, there will inevitably be nationals of these governments, who are Communists, on the Secretariat. At the present time, nationals of Iron Curtain countries on the United Nations Secretariat in New York number less than one hundred persons, which is less than 4 per cent of the total staff. The Yugoslav members of the staff account for about ten positions in addition to those filled by nationals of Iron Curtain countries. We do not send to the United Nations any classified information. Accordingly, the Communist employees of the Secretariat do not have access to secret United States information.

The above figures of less than one hundred persons representing less than 4 per cent of the United Nations staff exaggerate the significance of Iron Curtain nationality representation on the Secretariat in New York. A considerable portion of these Iron Curtain nationals are citizens of Czechoslovakia and Poland who were engaged by the United Nations before their countries were taken over by the present Soviet puppet regimes, and remain loyal to a free Czechoslovakia and a free Poland.

I would like to repeat that the officials of the United Nations are fully aware that we do not regard the employment of United States citizens who are Communists as being in the best interests of the Organization or of this Government. I do not see how a person who owes allegiance to the Cominform and its leaders in Moscow can be expected to be a devoted employee of an international organization which is resisting Communist impelled aggression on the battlefields of Korea. I therefore feel that there is no occasion for the employment by the United Nations of persons loyal to the Cominform beyond those necessitated by the requirements of nationality distribution on the staff.

The United States Government has done and will continue to do everything possible, within the framework of the relations between a Member Government and the United Nations laid down by the Charter, in assisting officials of the United Nations to identify those persons who would appear to be unfit for duty with the United Nations.<sup>3</sup>

Sincerely yours,

The Secretary-General of the United Nations (Lie) to the United States Representative at the United Nations (Austin)

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL

NEW YORK, 3 December 1952.

MY DEAR SENATOR AUSTIN: You are aware of my great concern over recent disclosures regarding U.S. citizens on my staff charged with having engaged in subversive activities and of the measures I have taken to meet this problem in a manner satisfactory to both the United Nations and its host country.<sup>1</sup>

I should like to express my appreciation to you for the assistance given to me by the U.S. Mission in regard to this problem and in particular for having made available to me the official records of the Senate Internal Security Sub-Committee relating to personnel of the Secretariat. I have found these records most helpful.

In this morning's paper I have read the presentment of the Federal Grand Jury "on disloyalty of certain U.S. citizens at the United Nations" which was submitted to the U.S. District Court yesterday. This presentment, as you are no doubt aware, contains a number of conclusions involving serious charges against members of the staff of the United Nations who are not specifically identified.

Although these conclusions bare directly on my responsibility as Secretary-General I have not received the records of the Grand Jury proceedings, nor have I received official information setting forth the facts on which the conclusions of the Grand Jury have been based. I am sure you will agree that in view of the conclusions made public there should be made available to me either the records of the Grand Jury relating to personnel of the United Nations, or, if this cannot be done, an official statement of the specific evidence on which the conclusions of the Grand Jury have been based. I wish to assure you that any such information declared to be confidential will be held by me in strict confidence.

In this connection I should like to draw your attention to the recent opinion submitted to me by a commission of eminent jurists which recommended that if the Secretary-General is satisfied that he has reasonable grounds for believing that a member of the staff is engaged

<sup>1</sup> On Oct. 11, 1952, Secretary-General Lie stated publicly his policy on the personnel question; he did not want Americans in the UN Secretariat who were disloyal to the United States, nor had he ever knowingly employed such Americans.

On Oct. 23, Lie announced his intention to submit the personnel problem to a group of jurists from three Member countries "for advice".

At approximately the same time Lie suspended certain U.S. personnel of the Secretariat who had refused to answer questions of the Senate Subcommittee.

The background of these events is outlined comprehensively in the Secretary-General's "Report . . . on Personnel Policy", UN Doc. A/2364, Jan. 30, 1953. For this and texts of related items, including the "Opinion of the Commission of Jurists, 29 November 1952", see United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, Seventh Session, Annexes, agenda item 75.

or is likely to engage in activities regarded as disloyal by the host country the officer concerned should no longer be employed in that country.

The Commission pointed out that where such allegations have been made against a staff member a full inquiry by the Secretary-General is required and that in such an inquiry it would be highly desirable if the Member State in question could give the Secretary-General not only the general conclusions but also the evidence upon which the Member State has come to that conclusion. They state in this connection "to put the Secretary-General on inquiry and to withhold the evidence places him in a position of great embarrassment". It is recognized by the Commission of Jurists that the information received would have to (be) kept confidential if the Member State so requests.

In view of the wide publicity given to the conclusions of the Grand Jury I consider it highly desirable, indeed essential in fairness to me and my staff, that the evidence for the conclusions be made available to me as quickly as possible. I should be most grateful for your assistance in this respect.

Sincerely yours,

TRYGVE LIE

CONFIDENTIAL

[WASHINGTON,] December 6, 1952.

MY DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: Transmitted herewith is a copy of a letter the Secretary General of the United Nations has addressed to Ambassador Austin requesting that evidence be made available to him upon the basis of which he could reach his own independent conclusions concerning the continued employment of persons who have appeared before the Grand Jury.

You will recall that on October 9, 1952 officers of the Department of State conveyed to officers of your Department Mr. Lie's oral request that certain information concerning the testimony of UN employees before the Grand Jury be made available to him, and the reply made on your behalf that Rule 6(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure prohibited the disclosure to Mr. Lie of the information.

I am sure you will agree, as you did on that occasion, that it would be highly desirable to furnish Mr. Lie the information he has requested and that you fully appreciate his request. In the event, however, that this request should be subject to the same reply which you previously made, I would like to suggest another possibility appropriate to his purposes. The names of the persons appearing before the Grand Jury are known to you. Much information concerning them is available from sources other than the Grand Jury hearings, most particularly in investigative files of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. We would, therefore, appreciate your considering what evidence, from any sources, you might make available to the Secretary General. The foregoing would apply not only to those persons who have appeared before the Grand Jury but with respect to any other employees of the United Nations, concerning whom you may have in investigative files of your Department information which you consider significant in this consideration. I would note that there are presently still in full employment status on the United Nations rolls certain persons with respect to whose continued employment the Department of State has commented adversely to the United Nations.

You may wish to consider whether you would want to make such evidence or reports as you could furnish to the Secretary General of the United Nations available directly to him or through this Department.

Sincerely yours,

No. 153

[WASHINGTON,] January 9, 1953.

The Secretary of State requests that the United States Representative to the United Nations transmit the following communication to the Secretary General of the United Nations:

I have been requested by the Secretary of State to advise you of the issuance of an Executive Order "Prescribing Procedures for Making Available to the Secretary General of the United Nations Certain Information Concerning United States Citizens Employed or Being Considered for Employment on the Secretariat of the United Nations," signed by the President of the United States on January 9, 1953. A copy of the Order is enclosed.<sup>1</sup>

The Executive Order is intended to enable the Government of the United States to do all that it properly can to assure the achievement of the mutual objective of the Secretary General and the United States to assure that the United Nations shall not employ or continue in its employment United States citizens who are engaged, have been engaged, or are likely to be engaged in any subversive activities against the United States.

It is to be hoped that this action by the President of the United States will be accepted as further evidence of the importance which this Government attaches to the United Nations as an instrument for the promotion of international peace and security, and of its desire to strengthen the United Nations so that it can fulfill the purposes of the Charter effectively in accordance with its principles.

[WASHINGTON,] January 28, 1953.

MY DEAR SENATOR WILEY: With further reference to your interest in the question of the loyalty of Americans on the staffs of international organizations, I would like to report to you on the progress that has been made in implementing Executive Order 10422. The Executive Order was signed on January 9, and immediately upon its issuance the United States Mission to the United Nations transmitted a copy to the Secretary General of the United Nations. The Department had previously kept Mr. Lie fully informed concerning the development of the Order, and had shown him a final draft of the Order prior to its formal issuance. In his communication, the United States Representative stated that the United States wished to initiate at once the procedures provided by the Order, and requested that, in the meantime, the further appointment of United States citizens be deferred.

On January 12, representatives of the Civil Service Commission, the Department of State and the United States Mission met with the Secretary General and members of his staff in New York for a preliminary discussion of the arrangements and procedures to be worked out for the application of the Executive Order to Americans on the United Nations staff or considered for employment. Mr. Lie, while noting that he could take no conclusive action pending the outcome of the discussion of the Report of the United Nations Commission of Jurists at the February session of the General Assembly, expressed a desire to cooperate fully with the United States Government and agreed to the application of the Executive Order procedures, in fact, at this time.

<sup>1</sup> Drafted by George M. Ingram of UNA :OIA ; cleared by CON, A, URS, UNE, AV, AR, and by telephone with the Departments of Agriculture and Labor and the Public Health Service.

As a first step in the implementation of the Executive Order, the agreement of the Department of Justice was secured to the release to the Secretary General, on a confidential basis, of certain information concerning ten United States nationals, still on the Secretariat, on whom the Department of State had commented adversely under the previously existing arrangement. This information was transmitted as information submitted under the provisions of Part I, paragraph 6, of the Executive Order, i.e., as information developed in the course of investigations in progress and made available to the Secretary General for his use in terminating or suspending or taking other appropriate action in respect to the person in question. Since that time, two of the ten have been terminated, and one will be on compulsory leave until the date of his retirement, May 15, 1953. The status of the other seven continues to be under active consideration by the Secretary General.

Simultaneously with the above, the Department of State, with the concurrence of other interested departments in every instance and acting through its representatives at the seats of the organizations, transmitted copies of the Executive Order to the executive heads of the several Specialized Agencies. The Department requested that they enter into an arrangement with the United States for the application of the Executive Order to their United States employees as provided by Part III of the Order, and further requested that they suspend the further recruitment of Americans pending the working out of the necessary procedures.

This approach to the heads of the Specialized Agencies was, in effect, a second step to that already taken when the Department communicated to them your concern over the reported infiltration of the organizations by subversive Americans. Negotiations with the executive heads of the Specialized Agencies are now in progress. The executive heads of the agencies have, without exception, agreed to cooperate with the United States Government. We have secured the informal agreement of the great majority, and expect to secure the agreement of the balance of the agency heads to the principle of suspending the further employment of United States citizens pending the working out of necessary procedures under the Executive Order. A "freeze" on the employment of Americans is for all practical purposes in effect at the present time, the only exception being certain cases where the agencies have committed themselves to an individual long under consideration for employment and where particular commitments have been made to certain Member Governments that expert assistance will be provided which can only be provided by such persons.

While these negotiations have been in progress, the Department has initiated consultation with the representatives of certain key Member States of the United Nations for the purpose of gaining their support for the acceptance of the conclusions of the Commission of Jurists at the forthcoming session of the General Assembly. These discussions are underway both here in Washington and in New York, and will be undertaken as well by United States diplomatic representatives abroad at the seats of the various governments.

With respect to the provision of funds necessary to finance the investigations to be undertaken by the Civil Service Commission and the Federal Bureau of Investigation under the provisions of the Executive Order, a supplemental request for an appropriation of $1,000,000 to the Civil Service Commission has been submitted to the Congress (House Document 66). The bill provides that funds required by the Federal Bureau of Investigation will be secured by allocation from the Civil Service Commission. The appropriation of new money in this manner will be necessary for implementation of the Executive Order, and only when experience has been gained will it be possible to determine whether this appropriation will be adequate. As a beginning step, however, the Civil Service Commission has certain funds which it can use to undertake initially the investigations required.

Following the meeting in New York on January 12, the Civil Service Commission has bent every effort toward securing agreement within the Executive Branch as to the internal procedures necessary to effectively discharge the responsibilities of the United States Government under the Executive Order. These procedures have now been agreed to by all parties concerned, the Civil Service Commission, the Loyalty Review Board, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Department of Justice, the Department of State and the Bureau of the Budget. The Commission has done a particularly noteworthy job in developing a basic personal information form, to be used in connection with the fingerprint form, which should greatly expedite the provision of the necessary information by the international organizations and its handling within the United States Government.

The representatives of the Civil Service Commission, the Department of State and the United States Mission to the United Nations have scheduled a meeting today with the Secretary General of the United Nations for the purpose of providing the United Nations representatives with copies of the forms, and explaining the details of the procedure, in order that they may undertake immediately the provision of the necessary information with reference to persons on the staff concerning whom question has already been raised. It is our intention that the procedure to be finally agreed upon at this forthcoming meeting will be applied not only to the staff under the immediate direction of the Secretary General, but to United States personnel of the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund, the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency, and the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East.

In this connection, the most urgent attention will be given to the seven persons still on the staff concerning whom the Department had previously made representations, together with certain other persons on whom derogatory information is now available. The Department has been informed by the United Nations that the Advisory Panel of the Secretary General will be unable to reach a conclusion with respect to these seven cases until there has been a full investigation under the terms of the Executive Order.

I believe the paragraphs above represent a complete, but necessarily summary, account of our work to date in bringing the provisions of the Executive Order into practical effect. If there is anything I can add to this, please let me know as I and members of my staff would be most happy to discuss with you any questions you may have.

You have inquired previously as to whether or not any secret arrangements comparable to that which existed with respect to the United Nations have existed as between the Executive Branch and any of the Specialized Agencies. An arrangement somewhat comparable to the United Nations arrangement has existed with respect to UNESCO, the specialized agency for which the Department has very much the same sort of comprehensive responsibility, in terms of United States relationships, as it has in the case of the United Nations. An account of this arrangement is presented in an attachment hereto.

In the case of the FAO, the WHO and the International Civil Aviation Organization, there has been no comparable arrangement either on the part of the Department of State or the other Federal agencies at interest, the Department of Agriculture, the Public Health Service or the Civil Aeronautics Administration. The same may be said of the International Telecommunications Union. In the case of the World Meteorological Organization and the Universal Postal Union, there are no United States employees. With respect to the International Labor Organization, I believe you may have already been in touch with the Department of Labor. Similarly, I understand you have been in contact with the Treasury Department with respect to its relationships to the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

While the Department of State has had an arrangement with only one Specialized Agency, UNESCO, it also had an arrangement with the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency, which is under the direction of Mr. Donald Kingsley. This arrangement was arrived at directly with the Agent General, Mr. Kingsley, inasmuch as the agency has independent appointive authority. The nature of the arrangement is described in the attached separate statement.<sup>2</sup>

Finally, reference is made to your previous inquiry concerning the extent to which passport controls have in fact affected employment of U.S. nationals by the Specialized Agencies. The Passport Office of the Department has advised that inasmuch as its files are alphabetical it has been necessary to rely upon the memory of the officers responsible for the particular operations involved. On the basis of the recollection of these officers there has not been a case of denial of a passport to any Specialized Agency employee other than the case to which you yourself referred. Cases of the withdrawal or non-renewal of a passport to a U.S. national abroad and employed by a Specialized Agency are limited to the cases of UNESCO employees referred to in the attached statement about UNESCO.<sup>3</sup>

Sincerely yours,

JOHN D. HICKERSON

NEW YORK, January 29, 1953.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In the three days I have been on duty as the United States Representative to the United Nations, one of my first objectives has been to assure that prompt and effective actions are taken to investigate and report on the loyalty of United States citizens employed in the United Nations Secretariat.

I have obtained the Secretary General's assurance that he will turn over to this Mission within the next week or ten days the full information required by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Civil Service Commission for investigation of United States citizens employed in the United States by the United Nations. Submission of information on employees stationed outside the United States will require a somewhat longer time. Completed information on a number of individuals will reach the Civil Service Commission and the Federal Bureau of Investigation by the end of this week.

I understand that the Civil Service Commission and the Federal Bureau of Investigation have only the most limited funds to initiate this work. There are some 2,000 cases to be dealt with in the United Nations and I understand from the Department of State that there are approximately 1,500 cases in the other international agencies. The investigation and review of these 3,500 individual cases will require substantially larger amounts than are currently available. The Bureau of the Budget on January 19 approved a supplemental appropriation request, recorded in House Document 66, in the amount of $1,000,000 to start the program.

I understand that the Congress does not intend to take any action on this request unless you indicate your support for the program. I consider action by the Congress on this appropriation of the greatest urgency if we are to be able promptly to assure the people of the United States that the United States citizens employed in the United Nations are loyal to our country.

Accordingly, I recommend that you urge the Congress to act on this appropriation request immediately so that we can go forward with the task of strengthening the United Nations.

Faithfully yours,

HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.

*The Acting Secretary of State (Matthews) to Certain Diplomatic

WASHINGTON, February 5, 1953—5:35 p.m.

The General Assembly during the first part of its Seventh Session decided, on the initiative of the Secretary General as prompted by several delegations, to include in its agenda for the second part of the session a full discussion of the current personnel policies governing the United Nations Secretariat. Pursuant to this decision the Secretary General has prepared a report on United Nations personnel policy to be used as a basis for this debate.

This decision of the Assembly is a direct result of investigations conducted by United States authorities during the past year of charges of infiltration of the United Nations Secretariat by subversive U.S. citizens. It is anticipated that the question of personnel policy will be one of the major issues to be considered by the second part of the Seventh Session of the General Assembly.

For this reason arrangements have been made to supply the diplomatic posts in countries primarily concerned with full documentation on this issue. The position paper setting forth the position of the United States Government will be forwarded as soon as it is available.

Copies of the report of the Secretary General, which contains a copy of the letter from Ambassador Austin transmitting the Executive Order to the Secretary General and the Secretary General's reply, the report of the Commission of Jurists appointed by Mr. Lie to advise him on this question, and statements by former Secretary Acheson and Assistant Secretary Hickerson before committees of Congress, and a copy of the Executive Order issued by President Truman on January 9, 1953 are being pouched to you.

A Federal Grand Jury sitting in New York City initiated investigations of United States Communist infiltration of the United Nations Secretariat in the summer of 1952. This Grand Jury investigation, which has so far resulted in no indictments but which produced a presentment critical of the United Nations and the Department of State, has been supplemented by investigations of two sub-committees of the judiciary committees of the Congress. These investigations have dealt with the problem of United States nationals employed by the United Nations who are believed to be engaged in, or to have been engaged in, or who are likely to be engaged in, activities regarded as subversive by the United States Government.

In the course of proceedings before the Grand Jury and hearings of the Internal Security Subcommittees, a number of witnesses, some of whom were employed by the United Nations, took recourse to the Fifth Amendment and refused to answer questions, on grounds of self incrimination, concerning past and present membership in the Communist Party and past and present participation in espionage and subversive activities. As a result of these developments the Secretary General first suspended or placed on leave, and then dismissed, a number of United States nationals employed by the Secretariat.

These dismissals and the public investigations provoked a number of questions from other delegations as to the propriety of such actions in the light of the United Nations Charter (primarily Articles 100 and 101) and the pertinent Staff Regulations.

When the failure of United States nationals to respond to questions was first publicized, Mr. Lie appointed a group of jurists of high professional standing to assist him in deciding on these questions. This group was composed of Mr. William Mitchell, former Attorney General under President Hoover; Professor Veldekins, well known Belgian professor of international law; and Sir Edwin Herbert, former Director of Censorship in the wartime British Government and presently a private attorney of international repute. Mr. Lie placed before these jurists a series of questions with respect to United Nations staff members of United States nationality. The report of the jurists, as amended by them, will undoubtedly play a significant part in the forthcoming debates of the Assembly. This report and the related report of the Secretary General will provide a frame of reference for the debates and will constitute important factors in the future actions of the Secretary General.

When the Seventh Session of the General Assembly reconvenes on February 24, consideration of the Jurists' report and the report of the Secretary General will be the subject of prolonged discussion.

The Department would request, therefore, that you familiarize yourself with the issues involved, and be in a position to discuss generally with officials of the Government to which you are accredited the importance which the United States attaches to the elimination of subversive United States nationals from the United Nations Secretariat. This airgram is designed to provide the preliminary basic information needed to undertake such discussion at your discretion. Further suggestions as to precise representations to be made will be furnished later in the event the Department decides this is desirable.

Discussion

At the time of the creation of the United Nations, the United States, as a matter of basic policy, strongly supported the adoption of provisions in the United Nations Charter, and later in the United Nations Staff Regulations, which would guarantee to the Organization a free hand in the selection of personnel, and would safeguard the Organization from undue influence by Member States in this regard. In the discussions of the Preparatory Commission and the early General Assemblies, the independence of the Secretary General in employing staff was stressed as one of the factors required in developing an international secretariat of the highest integrity.

In consequence, the United States has followed the practice of not recommending its citizens for employment, nor has it cleared them for employment, by the United Nations. In the fall of 1949, however, the Department became concerned about the possible infiltration of the United Nations Secretariat by United States citizens who are Communists, or who are subject to Communist discipline.

It accordingly entered into a secret arrangement with the Secretary General of the United Nations whereby adverse comment was made on certain United States citizen employees, and upon a number of prospective employees.<sup>2</sup> Because of United States restrictions on the release of classified information such comment could only be made in the most summary terms. At that time the Secretary General believed that he did not have authority to dismiss any employees on the ground of Communist affiliation. Accordingly, wherever the employment of United States Communists was terminated by the Secretary General, such action had to be taken on the basis of some authority which the Secretary General believed he possessed under the Staff Regulation.

The significance of the Report of the Commission of Jurists is that, for the first time, there is an impartial and responsible pronouncement to the effect that the Secretary General can and should rid the United Nations Secretariat of United States citizens who engage in subversive activities against the United States. Following this the Department initiated, and the President issued, Executive Order 10422 on January 9, 1953.

It appears that as a consequence of public reports of a plan to revise the existing federal loyalty program, some procedures of the Order may have to be altered. You will be advised as to the exact nature of any changes as soon as they are made. However, you should proceed at your discretion with discussions on the basis of Executive Order No. 10422.

The issuance of Executive Order 10422, while calling for a loyalty determination on United States citizens who are or may become international civil servants, does not constitute a fundamental change in basic United States policy toward the selection of United States personnel by international organizations. It specifically recognizes the right of the heads of these organizations to make the final decision as to employment or termination. At the same time, the United States considers that it is appropriately in its interests to attempt to assure that no United States citizen be employed if he is believed to be engaged, or is likely to be engaged in activities regarded as subversive by the United States Government. Consideration of past activities of this nature would necessarily be an important factor in any determinations made by the United States in this regard. Consistent with, and in response to the Jurists' conclusions and recommendations, the Executive Order provides for the supplying of information to the Secretary General on persons decided upon adversely by the United States as a result of a United States investigation and review.

It is important to note in this connection that there is a distinction between the criteria of the Executive Order on the one hand, and of the Secretary General on the other, in arriving at conclusions in individual cases. The United States would first come to a determination as to whether there is a reasonable doubt as to loyalty to the United States. The Secretary General, operating under the terms of the recommendations of the Jurists, would base his decision on whether there are reasonable grounds for believing that the individual is, or is likely to be engaged in subversive activities against the United States. It is our expectation and hope that the information supplied by the United States will be such as to persuade the Secretary General that the individual on whom the United States has commented adversely does not measure up by the standards he must apply as well. Consequently the action to be taken by the Secretary General will be based upon somewhat different standards than those of the United States. This will help persuade other Member States that the United States is not attempting to destroy the personnel independence of the Secretary General under the United Nations Charter.

Should the General Assembly not permit an arrangement which would achieve the elimination from the Secretariat of subversive United States citizens, it seems inevitable that the United States Congress will act to withhold United States financial support, or enact legislation to make it illegal for United States citizens to accept United Nations employment without United States clearance. A bill imposing criminal penalties on any United States citizen accepting United Nations employment without such clearance has been introduced in the United States Senate. It is necessary that every effort be made to avoid severe United States unilateral action, if this is possible. It is for these reasons that the Department attaches such great importance to the action to be taken by the Seventh General Assembly when it reconvenes next month.

For your information, several delegations to the first part of the Seventh Session of the General Assembly were most anxious to discuss the Jurists' report prior to the recess on December 22. Such discussions were postponed as a result of a plea made by the President of the Assembly, the Chairman of the Fifth Committee, and the Secretary General. In a joint statement these three officials pointed out that Governments should have adequate opportunity to review the Jurists' report in detail. They stressed that the Secretary General should be provided time to develop in detail the course of action he would propose to follow on the result of the advice of the Jurists, should the Assembly indicate its approval thereof. Statements made by several delegations in regretfully agreeing to this postponement indicate considerable reservation on their part as to the wisdom and desirability of complete acceptance by the United Nations of the Jurists' conclusions. Most significant among these were India, Canada, the Netherlands, Egypt, Belgium, Sweden, Mexico, and France. Several members of a number of delegations also privately indicated their dislike for the Jurists' recommendations on the basis that it would make personnel on the United Nations staff so subject to the dictates of their own Governments that it would be impossible to recruit and maintain an independent body of personnel which could be expected to carry out efficiently the tasks of the UN Secretariat.

Advance indications of the attitudes of other Member States, leads the Department to believe that a majority of them will be persuaded to support the Jurists' recommendations only if they become convinced that this is the only way to insure continued support of the United Nations by the United States.

At the moment the details of placing the Executive Order into full effect are being worked out. The Secretary General and his assistants have demonstrated a spirit of cooperation during meetings held with representatives of the Department and the United States Civil Service Commission for this purpose. It is significant to note, however, that he has not publicly committed himself to postponing any further appointments of United States citizens until the Executive Order is in full operation. This assurance was requested in the Department's formal transmittal of the Executive Order to the Secretary General. His formal reply welcomed the assistance provided under the terms of the Executive Order, but made no reference to the requested assurance regarding new employment. This is because of the need for consideration of this matter by the General Assembly. In the meantime, the Department is pressing ahead to put the arrangement authorized by the Executive Order into full effect. In view of this it would be especially unfortunate if the General Assembly were to reject the Jurists' report.

Position Paper Prepared in the Department of State for the United States Delegation to the Second Part of the Seventh Regular Session of the General Assembly

[WASHINGTON,] February 18, 1953.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY GENERAL ON PERSONNEL POLICY

THE PROBLEM

The question of the current personnel policies governing the United Nations Secretariat was included in the agenda of the Seventh Session of the General Assembly at the request of the Secretary General. Inclusion of this item is a direct result of (1) investigations conducted by United States authorities during the past year of charges of infiltration of the United Nations Secretariat by United States Communists and subversive United States citizens, and (2) the opinion rendered by the Commission of Jurists appointed by the Secretary General to advise him concerning the issues arising out of these investigations.

The Secretary General has prepared a report on United Nations personnel policy (A/2364) to be used as a basis for the General Assembly debate. This report is based on the conclusion of the Commission of Jurists that the Secretary General already has authority to terminate or refuse to hire staff members who are subversives. The report states that the Secretary General "should not retain a staff member in the employment of the United Nations if he has reasonable grounds for believing that the staff member is engaging or is likely to engage in subversive activities against any Member government", and that he should not retain a staff member who has taken recourse to the privilege against self-incrimination in official inquiries concerned with subversion. The Secretary General further reports on the advisory panel that he has established to advise him on the cases referred to it by him. The report makes it clear that the final determination must and should rest with the Secretary General.

On its part, the United States, using the opportunity presented by the report of the Commission of Jurists, has promulgated Executive Order 10422, which calls for the investigation by United States Government agencies (Civil Service Commission and the FBI) of all present United States employees in the United Nations and all prospective United States employees. The purpose is to provide the Secretary General with the information he needs to exercise his authority. The Secretary General has agreed to cooperate, and as a result, personnel data and fingerprint forms are being completed by United States nationals now on the Secretariat and are being forwarded to the United States Government for processing. Should the United States Government loyalty-security practices be changed, consequential changes will be made in the Executive Order.

In the minds of many delegations, the activities of the United States are jeopardizing the independence of the international secretariat, and the United States delegation can expect them to be highly critical of the Secretary General's report, the report of the Jurists, and the action of the United States.

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. The Delegation should do all in its power to insure that the General Assembly approves the policies which the Secretary General proposes to follow, or, if this is not possible, notes the report without comment. This is essential in order that the United States may proceed with the investigation of current and future United States employees of the United Nations.

2. The Delegation should urge the consideration of this item early in the session and, in any event, before the appointment of a new Secretary General is considered.

DISCUSSION

The report of the Secretary General presents (1) a complete history of development of the present personnel policies and practices in the United Nations, (2) an account of how the question of subversive activities of staff members became an issue, and (3) his proposals for dealing with this issue. The essence of the policy he intends to follow is, as stated above, that he "should not retain a staff member in the employment of the United Nations if he has reasonable grounds for believing that that staff member is engaging or is likely to engage in subversive activities against any Member government," and that he should not retain a staff member who has taken recourse to the privilege against self-incrimination in official inquiries concerned with subversion. This policy is based on the conclusions of the Commission of Jurists. In accordance with the Jurists' advice, the Secretary General assumes that this policy can be carried out within the present Staff Regulations, either under his specific termination powers or under implied powers deriving from the fact that the activities described above constitute a violation of the fundamental obligations placed upon staff members in Articles 1.4 and 1.8.

In order to carry out his responsibilities in this matter, the Secretary General reports that, again acting on the advice of the Jurists, he has appointed an advisory panel. The Secretary General indicates that the terms of reference of this panel will be established after the Assembly has dealt with his report, but that in preparing the terms of reference, full consideration will be given to the requirement of due process of law. The panel consists of:

- Chairman of the Panel—Mr. Leonard W. Brockington, of Canada, appointed in his individual capacity
- Members
- Mr. Ralph Bunche, Principal Director, Department of Trusteeship and Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories.
  - Mr. Tor Gjesdal, Principal Director, Department of Public Information
  - Mr. Gustavo Martinez-Cabanas, Deputy Director-General, Technical Assistance Administration
  - Mr. Constantin A. Stavropoulos, Principal Director in Charge of the Legal Department

These policies which the Secretary General intends to follow give reasonable assurance that he will not retain or employ subversive United States nationals. It must be recognized, of course, that these policies employ criteria different from those now used or likely to be used by the United States Government in its own loyalty-security program. It is the hope and expectation of the United States, however, that the information supplied by it in respect of United States Government nationals will be such as to convince the Secretary General that any individual on whom the United States Government has made an unfavorable finding on the basis of United States standards does not measure up to the standards which the Secretary General must apply.

The United States is giving its support to the report of the Secretary General in the belief that it offers a feasible means of accomplishing U.S. objectives without either violating the Charter obligation to respect the independence of the Secretary General or jeopardizing the long-range U.S. interest in maintaining a secretariat responsible to the United Nations rather than to individual member governments.

Even so, indications from other governments are that the standards and procedures which the Secretary General proposes to use and U.S. actions and objectives will be under heavy attack. Under these circumstances, it appears that maximum United States effort and the full influence of the present Secretary General will be needed to prevent rejection of, or undesirable reservations to, the present report.

In its advocacy of the policies contained in the report of the Secretary General, the US Delegation will need to keep the following points in mind:

1. Executive Order 10422, which is included in the Secretary General's report, will be before the Assembly as representing the methods and procedures which the U.S. Government proposes to follow in submitting comments and making information available to the United Nations on U.S. nationals. Since the release of the report, it has become known that the Federal loyalty-security program will be revised. The development of this new program may not be sufficiently well advanced at the time of General Assembly discussion of this issue to permit the United States to explain its internal procedures. In particular, the extent to which or manner in which the new procedures will provide for hearings and appeals is unknown. The tactic of the Delegation can only be to shift the discussion of the Assembly and concern of other delegations away from processes which the U.S. Government employs in arriving at its decision, and in developing information to be supplied to the UN, and toward the standards and procedures which the Secretary General will employ to guard against the employment of subversives.

2. It is believed that the standards which the Secretary General proposes to follow and the procedures he has established are capable of providing the necessary protection to the interests of both the member governments and the employees. The test will be, of course, in the body of doctrine developed by the Secretary General and whether he distinguishes between sober representations of the U.S. Government and unsound representations of other governments. If the Secretary General applies his proposed standards faithfully, there should be no unwarranted dismissals of persons who are only out of favor with present governments. If the Administrative Tribunal should challenge the authority of the Secretary General to act in accordance with the policies contained in his report, the United States would support the recommendations of the Jurists that the Secretary General should refuse reinstatement and pay indemnities. Further, the United States would, in such an event, support revision of the staff regulations and the Tribunal regulations to insure that the Secretary General could proceed to carry out the policies outlined in his report without incurring unnecessary expense.

3. While the report of the Secretary General does not rest its case on the host country relationship, the report of the Commission of Jurists does lay a great deal of stress on this relationship. As a result, there may be a tendency for some of the governments supporting the Secretary General's report to build their justification around the particular situation which exists in the United States and the special consideration which may be due the host government of the United Nations. The Delegation should do everything possible to insure that this argument does not become a significant part of the legislative history of whatever action is taken by the General Assembly. The United States considers that the conclusions of the Jurists and the Secretary General should be applied in the Specialized Agencies in order to insure that subversives are not employed by such agencies. Efforts to obtain such application would be seriously handicapped if the basis for UN action rested, to any considerable degree, upon the special relationship which must exist between the United Nations and the United States, as host country.

4. Emphasis should be laid on US hope that by following the policies outlined in the report, the Secretary General will assure the development of a secretariat of high competence and integrity, meriting confidence of all governments. Care should be taken, however, to avoid any impression, particularly as regards aliens, that the United States proposes to rely solely on the personnel policy of the Secretary General to handle any case of a staff member actively engaged in espionage, as the United States can, take action to safeguard security under domestic laws and the Headquarters Agreement.

It is desirable from the United States point of view to dispose of the personnel issue before the question of the appointment of the Secretary General is discussed. Mr. Lie's conclusions on the personnel question are generally satisfactory to us and we consider that successful and expeditious handling of this problem requires consideration of his recommendations before his influence is in any way diminished. If a new Secretary General should be appointed before the personnel item is dealt with, the settlement of this whole problem may be jeopardized or at best delayed for a considerable period, pending a report by the new Secretary General.

Material suitable for possible use by the Delegation in debate on the item has been assembled by the Department and is being made available under separate cover.

The Secretary of State to the Mission at the United Nations<sup>1</sup>

WASHINGTON, February 21, 1953—8:21 p.m.

319. Following, for your information, is history of negotiations with specialized agencies on subject of arrangements under Executive Order 10422. Generally speaking, there has been much more difficulty in negotiating with the heads of the specialized agencies than with the Secretary General of the United Nations on this matter. Reasons for this are many, among which are (1) most of organizations are located outside the United States and not only is there no host government relationship involved, but also the full impact of the problem from the point of view of the United States has not been absorbed by them; (2) individual agency heads do not feel bound in any way by the report of the Commission of Jurists because they had nothing to do with the Commission's establishment; (3) the technical agencies pride themselves in their supposed divorcement from political considerations; (4) a backwash of criticism against Lie for cooperating so fully with the United States before GA consideration has reached them; (5) some of the agencies have executive boards or councils which have some responsibilities in respect to personnel matters, and executive heads hesitate to act without their sanction; (6) relatively short term experts are important aspect technical assistance programs and freeze on employment will allegedly seriously cripple technical assistance programs. Department, however, acting through its representatives in Paris, Geneva, Rome, and Montreal, and in some cases direct contact with agency heads in Washington, has taken strong position this matter and believes satisfactory arrangements will be concluded.<sup>2</sup> Situation in each agency is as follows:

FAO. Satisfactory arrangement has been effected. DG Dodd,<sup>3</sup> after demurring for a time on including TA experts under system, has agreed completely with our requests, has frozen all appointments pending receipt of U.S. findings. After issuance Order, and after telephone conversations with U.S. Surgeon General,<sup>8</sup> he appeared agree U.S. request. However, he refused participate in distribution forms, and has informed staff and others he will not await U.S. findings on short-term experts. <sup>9</sup> Chisholm outlined his position on the implementation of Executive Order 10422 in a letter to John D. Hickerson, Assistant Secretary for United Nations Affairs, dated Feb. 25, 1953. Chisholm stated inter alia: "Nor is it possible for me to take official action to insure that all employed or to be employed U.S. citizens complete forms for the purpose of the Government of the United States. I have no sanctions which could be employed to enforce such action. DEAR DON: Herewith is a report of what we have accomplished so far as regards the matter of American personnel in the United Nations.

When I presented my credentials on January 26th I told the Secretary General the personnel situation was one of the prime causes of American lack of confidence in the United Nations, that it deserved the highest priority.

On the following day I called again with two thousand forms to be filled out by the American employees, and the day thereafter the employees were being lined up in the corridors and being fingerprinted. Attached is a tabulation showing what has been accomplished to date.<sup>2</sup>

I also issued an order to all employees of the United States Mission on this subject, a copy of which is attached.<sup>2</sup>

I have informed the Chairman of the Senate Internal [Security] Subcommittee, the Senate Judiciary Committee, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the Senate Permanent Investigating Subcommittee, the House Foreign Affairs Committee, the House Committee on State Department Appropriations, and the House Un-American Activities Committee, and the reaction has been extremely favorable.

I attach samples of the fingerprint form,<sup>2</sup> the principal form and the instructions.

The General Assembly on April 1 approved the resolution, copy attached,<sup>3</sup> which we co-sponsored with twelve other delegations on this question by a vote of 41 in favor, 13 against and 4 abstentions. The resolution gives the Secretary General sufficient authority to deal with this problem between now and the fall session of the General Assembly. We defeated a proposal of the Arab-Asian group which would have stopped any further dismissals under Mr. Lie's policy by a vote of 21 in favor, 29 against and eight abstentions.

I intend to discuss this question with Mr. Dag Hammarskjold, the Secretary General elect, at the earliest opportunity to insure his full understanding of the problem and support for the procedure we have underway.

STOCKHOLM, May 20, 1953—11 a.m.

1218. UN Secretary General Hammarskjold said at well-attended press conference in Stockholm yesterday that he had previously been misunderstood or misquoted on his attitude toward question of UN personnel policy. He said he shared his predecessors standpoint but wishes to go farther by emphasizing that UN servants must not actively engage in any political activity whatsoever that does not concern UN proper; on this point he would make no distinction between "subversive" and other political activities. "I am personally inclined to apply this principle very strictly. It is essential that all UN member states have full confidence in Secretariat's impartiality, and this in final analysis will depend on the individual UN employee. Personnel will have to choose whether to serve UN's cause or other interests." Asked whether application of such principles would not make it difficult to find qualified persons willing to set aside all national and ideological interests to serve UN exclusively he said he had no fears on this point.

Concerning Alva Myrdal affair he said whole question of UN delegates visa rights would be straightened out with US authorities upon his return to New York.<sup>1</sup>

Editorial Note

The International Organizations Employees Loyalty Board was established by Executive Order 10459 (18 F.R. 3183) on June 2, 1953. This Executive Order amended Executive Order 10422 (18 F.R. 239) of January 9, 1953. The Board (commonly referred to as the "Gerety Board" after its first chairman) was established in the Civil Service Commission to inquire into the loyalty to the Government of the United States of citizens of the United States employed, or considered for employment by international organizations of which the United States was a member and to make advisory determinations under the standards set forth in Part II of the Order (i.e. "reasonable doubt") for transmission by the Secretary of State to the executive heads of the international organizations. According to a letter from J. Lee

Rankin, Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel to Donald B. Lourie, Under Secretary of State for Administration, dated May 5, 1953, the new Executive Order was drafted in Rankin's office. A copy of Rankin's letter is in Department of State file 315.3/5-1153.

The International Organizations Employees Loyalty Board was officially formed in July 1953 under the Chairmanship of Pierce J. Gerety. The other members of the Board were George J. Kaufman, H. S. Waldman, Lawrence Gilman, H. Grady Gore and Dr. Edward L. Trask.

The Secretary of State to All Diplomatic and Consular Offices

CONFIDENTIAL

WASHINGTON, June 8, 1953—6:20 p.m.

Subject: Investigations of U.S. Citizen Employees, International Organizations, Executive Order 10422

Executive Order 10422 establishes the requirement for the investigation of the backgrounds of all U. S. citizens employed by international organizations. The Department has been given the responsibility of covering all foreign leads in these investigations.

Procedures have been instituted to direct these leads to Foreign Service posts through established security channels. The Office of Security in the Department is presently forwarding all foreign leads in these cases to the responsible Regional Security Headquarters or Resident Regional Security Officer which in turn refers these leads to the Post Security Officers concerned within their respective regions. Since Resident Regional Security Officers function in the capacity of Post Security Officers, these investigations are handled directly by them.

The purpose of this Airgram is to bring to the attention of the Chief of Missions and Principal Officers, the extreme importance and urgency which exists to the coverage of these leads and the submission of investigative reports of the results. It is requested that all Chiefs of Missions and Principal Officers impress upon their Post Security Officers the necessity for immediately complying with investigative requests from Regional Security Headquarters on these cases.

The Regional Security Headquarters will give the post all the necessary guidance and instructions for the expeditious handling of these cases.

NEW YORK, August 7, 1953.

Subject: Proposal by Mr. Roy Cohn to Mr. Frank Begley re McCarthy Subcommittee Hearings Involving UN Personnel

Mr. Hammarskjold asked me to remain after I officially transmitted the text of the Armistice Agreement with annexes. He told me that Mr. Roy Cohn, of the McCarthy Subcommittee, had approached Frank Begley, who is head of the security force at the UN Secretariat, and proposed that the McCarthy Subcommittee would hold a series of hearings to which they would call various employees of the Secretariat. Mr. Begley indicated he would have to report this approach to Hammarskjold, which he did.

Mr. Hammarskjold left no doubt whatever in Begley's mind that a short-cut approach from a Senatorial Committee to a Secretariat employee could not be tolerated. He instructed Begley to inform Cohn that the Secretary General could not under existing agreements deal with representatives of the U.S. Government otherwise than through the regular channels; namely, the United States Mission to the United Nations.

He wished us to know about this oblique approach in the event something might come up in the future.

Memorandum for the Files, by William L. Franklin of the Office of Security

CONFIDENTIAL

[WASHINGTON,] August 11, 1953.

Subject: Transmission of Information under Executive Orders 10422 and 10459 by the Civil Service Commission's International Organizations Employees Loyalty Board <sup>1</sup>

On August 5, 1953, Mr. George Ingram, Director, Office of International Administration, Mr. Joseph S. Henderson, Chief of the Division of International Administration and William L. Franklin, Special Assistant to the Director, Office of Security, had an informal meeting with the members of the International Organizations Employees Loyalty Board of the Civil Service Commission to discuss the nature and types of information to be transmitted under the Executive Orders.

The Board pointed out that it was adopting its procedures and establishing its policies of operation. It requested information on the types of cases that it would be called upon to consider so that it would be in a position to formulate its policy. Mr. Ingram was the chief spokesman.

Two general types of cases were described by Mr. Ingram. He pointed out that the Board would be called upon to consider cases on employees and cases on applicants for employment. Mr. Ingram explained these cases would cover the United Nations organizations in New York and the separate specialized international agencies, such as UNESCO, WHO, etc. He differentiated between the problems involved in the cases of employees versus applicants. He called attention to the fact that in taking action against an employee the Secretary General of an international organization had to consider decisions reached by administrative tribunals or executive boards and in some instances he was bound by them. He said that the administrative tribunals of the United Nations in the past had ruled against the Secretary General's dismissal of a person unless that individual received a lump sum settlement of his contract with the organization. However, Mr. Ingram also pointed out that as a result of the International Jurists Report of December 1952, the Secretary General of the United Nations in cases involving disloyalty of American citizens, can remove those persons from their positions without being bound by the decision of the administrative tribunal. To give the Secretary General the support he needs, Mr. Ingram pointed out that any information the Board had to support extreme political activity, subversion, or the likelihood of a person's engaging in subversive activity would contribute to the success of the Secretary General's getting rid of undesirable Americans employed in staff positions, etc.

Upon hearing this, the Board concluded that it would be the policy to transmit interim derogatory information in employee cases when it appeared unlikely the completion of an investigation would not alter the adverse findings during an earlier stage of the investigation. Therefore the Department may not expect to receive very much information at an interim stage of an employee investigation from the International Organizations Employees Loyalty Board.

On applicants, Mr. Ingram pointed out that the same questions did not arise. He explained that the Secretary General had more freedom of action and if an applicant being investigated was productive of derogatory information, the receipt of that information by the Secretary General might result in the investigation being cancelled with the selection of another applicant, free of derogatory information, for the position.

The Board indicated it would adopt a less restrictive policy with respect to applicants. In the event that findings during an interim stage of an investigation warrant the transmission of information, the Board will act on that information to inform the Secretary General.

The question of suitability information was discussed. Mr. Ingram stated the Secretary General of each international organization would appreciate receiving this information. The Board also was informed that it was informally agreed that suitability information would be transmitted by the Board when the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Civil Service Commission and the Departments of Justice and State considered the amendment to Executive Order 10422. The Board agreed to make suitability information available to the international organizations.

Before transmitting information through the Secretary of State to the Secretary General, the Board raised the question as to the desirability of establishing an informal liaison group with the Department of State for the purpose of assisting the Board in making the determination of certain types of information to be transmitted to the Secretary General. The answer given was that in compliance with the Executive Orders the Department of State, to avoid any possibility of exceeding its authority of remaining merely a channel of transmission, would not desire the establishment of this informal working group. The Board then indicated it recognized its responsibility to make final determinations in the cases referred to it without the advice and assistance of the Department in deciding upon the information to be transmitted.

Another question the Board raised was what precautionary steps would be taken by the State Department's Office of Security to insure that the information transmitted by the Board for the Secretary General would not be prejudicial to the security interests of the United States. The answer given was that the Department would presume the Board had made that determination and would not transmit information of an internal security nature which should not be received by the Secretary General. It was suggested that investigative agencies submitting reports to the Board in all probability would identify any information which would be prejudicial to the security interests of the United States if transmitted to the Secretary General. However, on this point the Board was informed a new question had been raised and would be brought to the attention of proper officials.

The question of associations with the employees of the Department of State and other branches of the Government by subversive Americans employed by international organizations was discussed. Mr. Ingram explained that in the event an employee or applicant of international organizations with subversive tendencies should be associated with the employees of the Department of State or of other Executive Branches of the Government, that the names of such Federal employees should not be made known to the Secretary General. If the Board felt it was pertinent to call these associations to the attention of the Secretary General, Mr. Ingram indicated this could be done merely by stating that the United Nations employee was associated with employee of the Federal government who would come within the purview of Executive Order 10459. The Board agreed to delete from the summaries of information the names of any Federal employees who might be associated with subversive Americans employed by international organizations.

In cases in which derogatory information had been developed but was later overcome by favorable information the Chairman ruled that a summary of the derogatory information would not be submitted if clearance was granted. He explained the Board's practice would be merely the giving of a clearance in this type of case without reference to the derogatory information. On the other hand he explained that summaries of derogatory information with adverse findings against an individual would be transmitted.

The Board asked about those employees of international organizations who had refused to fill out the necessary form required for the investigation under the Executive Order. Mr. Ingram replied there were four individuals known to have refused to fill out the necessary form. Both he and the security office's representative explained that steps were being taken to have these persons investigated in accordance with the Executive Order.

The procedures outlined by the Board and the position taken by the Department's representative were discussed in general with Mr. Ylitalo<sup>2</sup> following the meeting with the Board. Mr. Ylitalo indicated that the positions taken and the proposed policies of the Board were in keeping with the Department's understanding of the responsibilities imposed by the Executive Order.

NEW YORK, August 14, 1953.

DEAR DON: Enclosed is copy of a letter from the Secretary General of the United Nations emphasizing the urgent need for clearance of United States nationals for positions in the Secretariat. A copy of my reply is also enclosed.

I am also sending this correspondence to Mr. Pierce J. Gerety, the Chairman of the International Organizations Employees Loyalty Board.

There is no need to stress to you the extreme importance of giving Mr. Hammarskjold as promptly as possible the reports he needs to place Americans in international programs for which the United States pays most of the bill.

According to my information, the plan is to have the Board meet only twice a week. It would help very much if you would personally contact the members to see whether they could not meet daily until the backlog of cases has been substantially reduced.

I really feel that your assistance is urgently needed in this matter.

Sincerely yours,

HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.

[Enclosure]

The Secretary-General of the United Nations (Hammarskjold) to the United States Representative at the United Nations (Lodge)

NEW YORK, August 13, 1953.

MY DEAR MR. LODGE: I should like to call to your attention the current situation regarding the recruitment of United States citizens to posts in the Secretariat of the United Nations.

As you know, the United Nations has a long-standing policy, approved by the General Assembly, under which the large majority of staff members needed in the General Service and Manual Workers categories are recruited locally, for reasons of economy. This, of necessity, means that the major source of such candidates is from among United States citizens.

Furthermore, additional staff needed for sessions of the General Assembly which are held in New York have also been predominantly local recruits and again United States citizens have constituted the large majority of this group. Due to somewhat abnormal turnover conditions, there are a large number of vacancies at the moment both in the General Service and Professional categories. The resumed meetings of the seventh session of the General Assembly beginning on 17 August will necessitate filling some of these vacancies. For the regular session beginning in September a much greater number of staff members must be recruited.

Beginning on 10 February 1953 we have sent personal data to your Government, in accordance with United States Executive Orders Nos. 10422 and 10459, on 429 prospective United States candidates for United Nations employment. Since that time we have received reports from your office relating to 59 of these candidates. Twenty of this number had already been employed, prior to receiving your reports, for the resumed meetings of the seventh session of the General Assembly held earlier this year. Of the remaining 39, however, only 4 were still available for employment following the receipt of your reports, and three of these resigned within a fortnight after employment due to commitments they had already made for other jobs.

The new Executive Order No. 10459 provided for what we hoped would be quick reports on candidates urgently needed for employment for periods of 90 days or less. Accordingly, we began to identify such candidates in sending information to your office; since 24 June we have submitted 25 cases. So far as I am aware we have received a report from your office on only one of these individuals.

I felt that you should be fully informed of this problem, trusting that the situation will be reviewed in order to see what can be done to expedite these reports. In the meantime, I feel sure that you will understand that in the urgent interest of the Organization I shall have to take all necessary steps in order to furnish the General Assembly and other organs with staff sufficient to their needs.

Yours very sincerely,

DAG HAMMARSKJOLD

NEW YORK, August 14, 1953.

MY DEAR MR. HAMMARSKJOLD: Thank you for your letter of August 13 concerning the recruitment of United States nationals for positions in the Secretariat of the United Nations.

You are right in saying that practical difficulties arise from the delays which you mention. I am confident that the log jam will be broken in the near future.

As you know, the International Organizations Employees Loyalty Board has now been constituted and is commencing its work. You have my assurance that everything possible will be done, through the Chairman of the Board and through the investigative agencies concerned, to expedite the reports for which you are waiting.

You will be interested to know that according to information which has just reached me, twenty-six investigations are being held up by the United Nations Administrative Officer, Government House, Jerusalem, who is reported to be under some doubt as to whether he has authority to release unprivileged information concerning individuals under investigation. I am informed that he will do so only on instructions from New York. May I suggest that you may wish to issue urgent instructions to ensure that the practice of the United Nations Jerusalem Office with respect to this matter is brought into conformity with the procedures being followed at the United Nations Headquarters in New York.

Sincerely yours,

The Deputy United States Representative of the United States at the United Nations (Wadsworth) to the Under Secretary of State for Administration (Lourie)

NEW YORK, August 28, 1953.

DEAR DON: Enclosed is a copy of a letter dated August 20, 1953 from the Secretary General of the United Nations concerning overseas investigations of U.S. nationals employed by the UN on missions abroad.

Mr. Hammarskjold expresses serious concern at the possible consequences of investigations of such UN officials in an area in which they have served on a mission. His concern is based upon the possibility that the enquiries may spread to the questioning of persons of other nationalities and of strongly partisan local inhabitants, with consequent loss of confidence in the integrity of their work and of the entire UN effort in the area. He is especially dubious about the wisdom of carrying on such investigations abroad with respect to persons like Ralph Bunche and General Riley.

We have replied to the Secretary General that we are not familiar with the nature and scope of overseas investigations of UN employees. We have also told him that we understand the basis of his concern, and that we are requesting the Department's comments regarding the entire matter. We would appreciate your furnishing us with as much information as possible concerning the subject, especially with respect to the nature and scope of the investigations in question so that the matter may be discussed fully with Mr. Hammarskjold.

We, of course, fully support the carrying out of complete investigations, including investigations abroad of Americans employed by UN. However, care must be taken not to undermine the prestige of loyal U.S. nationals serving on delicate missions in other areas in the world or to weaken the authority and effectiveness of the UN itself.

Sincerely yours,

JIM

MY DEAR AMBASSADOR LODGE: Thank you for letter of 14 August<sup>1</sup> in which you inform me that the International Organizations Employees Loyalty Board has now been constituted and is commencing its work. I am particularly gratified to have your assurance that everything possible will be done to expedite the reports concerning United States nationals employed by the United Nations and those who are candidates for employment.

With regard to the last paragraph of your letter, I have looked into the problem in Jerusalem and I find that the delays were caused initially by the fact that the finger-printing, in the United States Embassy in Tel Aviv and the Consulate in Jerusalem, of several of the persons concerned did not meet the requirements of the United States authorities here. The forms were returned to the field and in several cases the procedure had to be repeated twice.

Furthermore, certain information was requested of the officials in the area which was not readily available there. The necessary data has now been cabled to Jerusalem and there should be no further delays at that end.

My enquiry also showed that of the twenty persons listed as being under investigation, only one is still in the area; most of the others have returned to Headquarters and a few have resigned. Of the persons listed, three had never been in the employ of the United Nations. Indeed, one is an officer of the United States State Department—Mr. James W. Barco—who had represented the United States Government on the United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine. I presume that the other two were United States officials assigned to the

The review of this list raised a serious concern in my mind regarding the possible consequences of investigations about United Nations officials in the area in which they have served on a mission. You will appreciate how easily such enquiries may spread to the questioning of persons of other nationalities, and particularly of the local inhabitants who may have had contacts with the members of the mission. The officials of the United Nations now under investigation were sent to Palestine to perform a delicate and highly responsible mission requiring exceptional integrity on the part of all members of the staff. Their work was not always popular among the local inhabitants because of the strong partisanship and the heavily charged emotional atmosphere that surrounded the problems with which they had to deal.

An enquiry by officials of their own Government concerning the integrity of men like Dr. Ralph Bunche and General W. E. Riley, former United Nations Chief-of-Staff, both of whose names appear on the list, may result in raising doubts in the area about the integrity of their work in Palestine. These doubts in turn may place in question the integrity of the entire United Nations effort in Palestine and thus weaken the authority and the effectiveness of the mission and of the United Nations itself. I have learned since that similar enquiries about

United States members of the Secretariat are being made in other troubled areas where the United Nations has sent missions of enquiry, conciliation or mediation.

I feel sure that you will appreciate the delicacy and the importance of this problem.

Yours sincerely,

DAG HAMMARSKJOLD

[WASHINGTON,] September 2, 1953.

Subject: Telephone Call of Vice President Nixon

Vice President Nixon telephoned me this morning referring to the decision of the United Nations Tribunal regarding the employees dismissed by the Secretary General.<sup>2</sup> He said that he could only characterize the action as catastrophic, coming as it does at a moment when the situation in the United States as it concerns the United Nations is definitely unfavorable. He referred to a violent attack made by former Commander Wilson at the St. Louis meeting of the American Legion, from which the Vice President had just returned, as an indication of sentiment in that organization regarding the United Nations. He feared that the members of the Tribunal in considering the technical features relating to the status of the dismissed employees overlooked completely American public opinion as well as opinion in the Congress. He feared that a possible effect of the decision, unless Hammarskjold found it possible to stand up, would be to stimulate members of Congress to vote against appropriations for the United Nations.

I told the Vice President that the Secretary and the Department are fully alive to the problem and shared his concern.

I also talked with Ambassador Wadsworth in Mr. Lodge's absence, informing him of Mr. Nixon's point of view. He is discussing the matter with the Secretary General today. Mr. Phleger is making a careful examination of legal aspects of this matter.

Subject: Recent Decisions of the Administrative Tribunal

Secretary General Hammarskjold called on me today and set forth at considerable length his preoccupation regarding the recent decisions of the Administrative Tribunal granting awards to dismissed employees of the United Nations. He referred to an unexpected visit to the United Nations building yesterday by Senator McCarthy, accompanied by Messrs. Cohn and Schine, who appeared at the Headquarters building as unexpected and casual visitors, whom Hammarskjold met without prior arrangement in the Lounge.<sup>1</sup> Hammarskjold said that in his remarks Senator McCarthy suggested that Mr. Hammarskjold should not work too hard and acquire ulcers. Hammarskjold replied to the effect that he had no reason to fear stomach ulcers.

Hammarskjold said he referred to this meeting with Senator McCarthy because it related to his own belief that there will be a campaign directed against a number of minor American employees of the United Nations and possibly one or two more important members. In the latter connection, he mentioned the name of Dr. Bunche.<sup>2</sup> He stated that he feared that some of these minor cases, such as that of a certain Varley and several others involving morals charges, might be blown up to discredit the United Nations organization. He said that this will be most unfortunate and unhappy, and that he regretted it especially because proper administrative measures are being taken to handle these cases in a normal and effective manner.

With respect to the recent decisions of the Administrative Tribunal, it is clear from Hammarskjold's remarks that he feels that he has no discretion but to respect the decisions regarding awards. He suggested that, in his opinion, rather than a frontal attack on the Administrative Tribunal as such, he should work for an amendment of the regulations which would provide the Secretary General with larger discretionary power to determine the size of a given award within whatever ceilings might be established by the Administrative Tribunal. He believes that a frontal attack on the Tribunal in the General Assembly would be defeated because the majority of the Members do not share the United States' aversion for that body. He pointed out that it is, of course, a European concept which is generally accepted by a large percentage of the Member countries.

I suggested to Mr. Hammarskjold that I believed he fully understood the considerations of a domestic nature which concerned us in this matter and the danger which enforcement of the Tribunal's decisions might engender regarding future appropriations. He said that he fully understood our preoccupation in this regard and is extending every effort to avoid the unfavorable reaction about which he has been warned.

315.3/10-553: Circular instruction

The Secretary of State to Certain Diplomatic and Consular Offices<sup>1</sup>

WASHINGTON, October 5, 1953.

CA-1871. Executive Order 10422. By circular airgram of February 5, 1953,<sup>2</sup> the Department informed certain American Diplomatic and Consular Officers of the background involved in the UN General Assembly consideration of personnel policies governing the United Nations Secretariat. Various aspects of this question are now before the Eighth Session of the General Assembly, and the Department considers it desirable to circulate information concerning developments in this matter since the previous communication.

The General Assembly, during the second part of its Seventh Session, debated at some length the report of the Secretary General on United Nations personnel policy. Thirty-seven delegations, including those of most of the larger nations, made statements. In general the viewpoint that the independence of the Secretariat required that the Secretary General continue to exercise responsibility for the selection of personnel without dictation from governments was supported. There was also general acceptance of the policy that the Secretary General should refrain from employing anyone who the preponderance of evidence indicates is engaging in activities aimed at subverting the government of a member state. No delegation expressed objection to the United States investigations under Executive Order 10422.

Opinion expressed during the General Assembly debate varied widely on the policy to be followed by the Secretary General in cases of refusal to testify before officially constituted national agencies investigating subversive activities and in cases where derogatory information relates to conduct that is not such as to constitute evidence of present subversive activity but rather the likelihood of engaging in such activity. In addition, many delegations doubted the power of the Secretary General to take summary termination action in any case that falls short of serious misconduct. A number of statements were quite critical of the Secretary General's policies as expressed and as carried out in the dismissals that had taken place.

Largely as a result of strenuous United States efforts, the Assembly on April 1, 1953, rejected by a vote of 20-29-8 a resolution, sponsored by 12 members of the Asian-Arab bloc,<sup>3</sup> the effect of which would have been to deny the Secretary General power to take further action in accordance with his announced policy until after a careful review of the whole matter by a small committee of the Assembly and consideration of the question by the Eighth Session, to which the committee was to report. On the same day the Assembly adopted the following resolution, which had the United States as one of its 13 co-sponsors:<sup>4</sup>

The General Assembly, Recalling the following provisions of Articles 100 and 101 of the Charter:

ARTICLE 100

"1. In the performance of their duties the Secretary-General and the staff shall not seek or receive instructions from any government or from any other authority external to the Organization. They shall refrain from any action which might reflect on their position as international officials responsible only to the Organization.

"2. Each Member of the United Nations undertakes to respect the exclusively international character of the responsibilities of the Secretary-General and the staff and not to seek to influence them in the discharge of their responsibilities.

ARTICLE 101

"1. The staff shall be appointed by the Secretary-General under regulations established by the General Assembly.

"3. The paramount consideration in the employment of the staff and in the determination of the conditions of service shall be the necessity of securing the highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity. Due regard shall be paid to the importance of recruiting the staff on as wide a geographical basis as possible", and

<sup>4</sup> The 13-power resolution was an amended version of a three-power resolution proposed by France, the United Kingdom, and the United States as UN Doc. A/L.146. The other sponsors of the final resolution (UN Doc. A/L.146/Rev. 1) were Belgium, Colombia, Cuba, Denmark, Ecuador, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Paraguay, and Sweden. It was adopted by the UN General Assembly as Resolution 708 (VII) by a vote of 41 to 13 with 4 abstentions.

1. Expresses its confidence that the Secretary-General will conduct personnel policy with these considerations in mind;
2. Requests the Secretary-General to submit to the General Assembly at its eighth session a report on the progress made in the conduct and development of personnel policy, together with the comments of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions thereon;
3. Invites the Secretary-General and the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions to submit, after appropriate consultations with the administrative heads of the specialized agencies, their recommendations as to any further action that may be required of the General Assembly;
4. Calls upon all Members of the United Nations to assist the Secretary-General in the discharge of his responsibilities as chief administrative officer of the United Nations.

This resolution, while it did not specifically endorse the report of the Secretary General, nor the actions he had taken, kept the situation open and made it possible for him to carry out his duties in accordance with the policies he had stated, if he so desired. The new Secretary General, Dag Hammarskjold, who took office on April 10, 1953, made no commitments concerning the policy he would follow in this matter, making a remark in public that he would consider each case on its merits. After consideration of one case of an employee who had invoked the Fifth Amendment when being questioned by the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee concerning her previous affiliations, he discharged the person.

This person, along with twenty others who had been discharged by the former Secretary General, appealed to the Administrative Tribunal of the United Nations. Most of the twenty-one cases involved United States nationals whose loyalty had been questioned. The Administrative Tribunal, established in 1949 despite efforts by the United States to head it off, at the Fourth Regular Session of the General Assembly, is empowered to "hear and pass judgment on applications alleging non-observance of contracts of employment of staff members of the Secretariat of the United Nations or of the terms of appointment of such staff members. The words 'contracts' and 'terms of appointment' include all pertinent regulations and rules in force at the time of alleged non-observance, including the staff pension regulations".

The four members of the Tribunal who heard the cases were Lord Crook (United Kingdom), Mr. Bror Arvid Petren (Sweden), Mme. Paul Bastid (France), who is President of the Tribunal, and Mr. Omar Loutfi (Egypt).

The Tribunal upheld the action of the Secretary General in nine cases involving employees on temporary contracts, five of whom had invoked the Fifth Amendment before the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee. One case involving an employee on a permanent contract was remanded on procedural grounds to the Joint Appeals Board for a re-hearing. In ten cases involving employees on permanent contracts and one case involving an employee on a temporary contract, however, the Tribunal held that the action taken by the Secretary General was not in accord with the provisions of the staff regulations. All of the employees involved in these eleven cases had claimed the Fifth Amendment privilege when appearing before the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee. On the basis of these judgments, the seven who elected to receive indemnities in lieu of reinstatement were awarded amounts ranging from $6,000 to $40,000 by the Tribunal, and one individual was awarded her full pension rights. Reinstatement was ordered for four employees. The Secretary General announced on September 2, 1953, that, on the basis of his authority under the Tribunal's Statute, he had concluded that reinstatement of these four individuals "would be inadvisable from the points of view which it is my duty to take into consideration". He stated that he was informing the Tribunal of his decision and that "the Tribunal will determine the compensation as provided for in the Statute". He added that in all eleven cases the question of compensation would come before the General Assembly "which is the organ that is responsible for appropriating the funds necessary for the implementation of the decisions of the Tribunal".

Since announcement of the Administrative Tribunal's judgments, the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee has reopened hearings on the matter, inquiring particularly into the basis for the indemnities awarded. In addition, a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Government Operations has begun an inquiry into charges of subversive activity in the United Nations Secretariat.

Another pertinent development is the passage by the Senate on June 8, 1953, of S. 3, which would make it a criminal offense, under penalty of a $10,000 fine or 10 years imprisonment or both, for a United States citizen to accept employment with one of the United Nations agencies without first receiving a certificate of security clearance from the Attorney General. United States citizens now on the staffs of the agencies would be subjected to a like penalty if they refused to supply information stipulated in the bill. The House Committee has not yet considered the measure. The Departments of State and Justice have recommended against enactment of S. 3, arguing that the procedures under Executive Order 10422 should be given a fair trial.

On June 2, 1953, Executive Order 10459, an amendment to Executive Order 10422 of January 9, 1953, was issued by the President. The principal changes provided for by the amendment are: (1) establishment in the Civil Service Commission of an International Organizations Employees Loyalty Board to assume the functions given by the original order to the Regional Loyalty and Loyalty Review Boards which went out of existence as a result of revision of the Federal loyalty program; and (2) establishment of a simplified investigative procedure for persons to be employed by an international organization for no more than ninety days. Investigations have been proceeding under the Executive Orders for several months and as of October 2, 1953, final reports on approximately 2176 cases had been transmitted to the international organizations concerned.

The Department is gravely concerned over the Administrative Tribunal decisions<sup>6</sup> and is preparing to do everything possible to seek correction of the situation through General Assembly action. Certain foreign service posts may soon be asked to make representations to the Governments to which they are accredited, seeking support for the United States position, details of which will be sent at that time.

Position Paper Prepared in the Department of State for the United States Delegation to the Eighth Regular Session of the General Assembly

CONFIDENTIAL

[WASHINGTON,] October 16, 1953.

STATEMENT OF ALTERNATIVE UNITED STATES POSITIONS ON PROBLEMS ARISING FROM ADMINISTRATIVE TRIBUNAL DECISIONS

PROBLEM 1

Possible proposal to reinstate some of the dismissed staff members.

Position: The United States should vigorously oppose such a proposal and should support the Secretary General's action in refusing such reinstatement.

PROBLEM 2

Order of consideration of the Secretary General's report on personnel policy (including his proposed amendments to the staff regulations and the Tribunal Statute) and the appropriation of the awards made by the Tribunal.

Position 1: The United States should seek to have the appropriation of the awards considered before the proposals to amend the regulations.

Position 2: The United States should seek to have the policy questions debated before considering the appropriation of awards.

PROBLEM 3

Proposal by the Secretary General to amend the staff regulations and the Statute of the Tribunal to minimize possible recurrence of the present situation.

Position 1: The United States should argue that the present staff regulations are adequate and should request the General Assembly to so find and to reverse the findings of the Tribunal.

Position 2: The United States should argue that the present staff regulations are adequate but agree not to oppose the Secretary General in his determination to amend the regulation if he considers them necessary to clarify the present regulations.

Position 3: The United States should argue that the present staff regulations are adequate but agree to support the Secretary General's proposals if they can clearly be regarded as clarification of the present staff regulations and together with the proposed changes give assurance of meeting United States objectives for future.

Position 4: The United States should support the Secretary General's proposals without raising the question of necessity.

PROBLEM 4

Secretary General's budget request for payment of awards by the Tribunal.

Position 1: The United States should directly and most vigorously oppose appropriation of funds, basing such opposition on invalidity of the Tribunal decisions.

Position 2: The United States should propose that the General Assembly return the cases to the Tribunal for reconsideration based on procedural errors and misstatements of fact.

Position 3: The United States should abstain on a possible proposal by other countries or by the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions for appropriation of a reduced amount arising from substantial reductions in the amount of awards.

PROBLEM 5

Administrative Tribunal elections—to fill vacancies of retiring members Lord Crook (United Kingdom) and Outrata (Czechoslovakia).

Position 1: The United States should propose a U.S. national for election, without specification of post. (Result of this will be for the U.S. to be considered a candidate for the Outrata post.)

Position 2: The United States should propose a U.S. national and stimulate candidacies of additional nationals of other countries and should campaign vigorously to defeat Lord Crook as well as to elect a U.S. national.

Memorandum of Conversation, by William O. Hall of the Mission at the United Nations

[NEW YORK,] October 23, 1953.

Subject: Certain F.B.I. Activities at UN

Participants: Mr. Dag Hammarskjold, Secretary-General, United Nations
 Mr. Constantin A. Stavropoulos, UN Legal Advisor
 Mr. William O. Hall, US Mission to the UN

At the conclusion of my conversation on the personnel question this evening, the Secretary-General said he wished to give me advance warning of a formal note he would send to Ambassador Lodge on Monday or Tuesday concerning certain inadmissible activities by the F.B.I.

He said his note would deal only with the questioning of the head of the UN Washington Information Office by the F.B.I. concerning a luncheon which he had had with an official of the Soviet Embassy, but that he wished to tell me personally that an F.B.I. agent had recently attempted to question the secretaries of Madame Pandit, President of the General Assembly, concerning the identity of certain of Madame Pandit's visitors to her 38th floor office. The Secretary-General said the agent had apparently shadowed the visitors to the 38th floor and had approached the secretaries immediately after their departures. Madame Pandit is aware of this incident and, in reporting it to the Secretary-General, specifically asked that no action be taken.

The Secretary-General said he was asking his people to make certain that this did not recur. He said he thought the U.S. security agencies were assuming that inasmuch as the former Secretary-General had permitted personnel investigations on U.N. territory other investigations could also be conducted there. He said this was not correct and that he agreed with Ambassador Lodge that it had been a mistake to carry on the security and loyalty interrogations in the UN building, but that he did not wish to change this practice.

I did not comment except to express certain disbelief that the F.B.I. would engage in such activity and to promise the Secretary-General that his note would be given prompt and full consideration by the Department of State and Department of Justice when received. I then pointed out that the F.B.I. and Immigration Service did have the necessary and essential duty of questioning from time to time aliens concerning their activities even though they were employees of the Secretariat, and cited the recent example of a group of Chinese nationals employed by the Secretariat who were suspected of irregular entry into the U.S. The Secretary-General said he fully recognized the necessity for this activity and for security surveillance, but that such activity should not take place in the Headquarters building, should be selective, and should not concern itself with official UN acts.

facts in these cases. My views are based on a careful analysis which establishes:

A. Tribunal did not review SYG's action to determine whether it fell within bounds of reason as General Assembly intended, but substituted its judgment for SYG's as to standards conduct and service UN employees must meet fulfill Charter requirements (Article 101(3)) of highest integrity. Under Charter and regulations, this function SYG responsibility. General Assembly limited Tribunal's functions disciplinary cases to determining whether SYG acted arbitrarily, in bad faith, or contrary procedural requirements staff regulations.

B. SYG right in considering these employees guilty misconduct. In public inquiry by proper authorities of democratic government (i.e., US) they were asked numerous questions related subversive activities and refused answer by invoking Fifth Amendment, thereby raising serious questions any reasonable mind their integrity. SYG completely within rights under Charter and regulations in advising staff their position as international public servants required response to questions asked in instant cases. SYG did not deprive of constitutional privilege, but did make clear that exercise such privilege these cases not compatible obligations staff members under Charter and regulations. Privileges accorded by national laws or constitutional provisions not intended or effective to shelter staff members from requirement they meet Charter standards. US urging other governments support position decisions regarding nature such action by staff members one for SYG to make, SYG decisions in instant cases were not arbitrary or unreasonable, and they were not subject to reversal by Tribunal.

C. Tribunal based awards on facts presented by staff members without independent inquiry and verification. Subsequently, testimony under oath of number of these individuals before Congressional committee demonstrates Tribunal calculated awards without full knowledge of facts. Since Tribunal exceeded jurisdiction, erred in conclusions, and failed conduct inquiry in thorough and independent manner, US believes General Assembly has obligation rectify situation.

D. Since Tribunal subsidiary organ of General Assembly established under Article 22 of Charter to perform certain functions assigned by Charter to General Assembly itself, there is no question legal competence of General Assembly review Tribunal decisions; Statute's provision re finality and no appeal means only that neither SYG nor staff members who are parties to dispute before Tribunal have any right of appeal. Tribunal Statute modeled that of League which had same provision finality and appeal. Any question meaning settled by decision League Assembly 1946 which debated point, reviewed decisions its Administrative Tribunal and refused give effect 13 Tribunal awards (L of N, O.J., SP Supplement No. 194, Geneva 1946, pp. 61, 133, 263). UK took strong lead in supporting this result at that time.

League precedent directly in point since both League and UN Tribunals insisted on a misconstruction of Assembly intent and Assembly could correct only by review and reversal. UN Tribunal cases involve principle established by 1946 decision: '. . . it is within the power of the Assembly, which can best interpret its own decision, by a legislative resolution, to declare that the awards made by the Tribunal are invalid and are of no effect . . .'

E. Under Article 17 of Charter, General Assembly must approve UN budget which requires review of all items of expenditure, including Tribunal awards.

In US view, errors of UN Tribunal are so serious in substance and consequences that General Assembly should take following actions:

1. Refuse to pay any compensation;
2. Make clear to Tribunal that under regulations, SYG has broad discretion in disciplinary matters and in future Tribunal must give due weight to interpretations and applications of regulations by SYG, and not attempt to substitute its judgment for his in such cases."

bunal decisions which falls short of helpfulness needed. Please re-emphasize to Bidault the very deep personal concern of the Secretary with this matter and leave with him the following aide-mémoire:

"The Secretary received with gratification Ambassador Dillon's report on his conversation with Bidault in regard to his earlier note on the decisions of the UN Administrative Tribunal, and has looked forward to support of the French delegation for the US position in the General Assembly. However, Ambassador Lodge now advises us he is informed that the French Delegation, while refraining from campaigning for payment of the Tribunal awards, will vote for an appropriation for this purpose.

"A considerable section of the international public has been given a false impression of the true status of the UN Administrative Tribunal and the standing of its decisions, assuming the Tribunal to be a high court of constitutional establishment, similar to the International Court, and its decisions, however bad, to be immune from correction by the General Assembly. The dangers present in this misinterpretation should strengthen our determination, in the interest of the sound development of international law and the future of the United Nations, to have the General Assembly meet its responsibility and refuse to give its sanction to action taken by the Tribunal in usurpation of authority vested, in accordance with the Charter, by the GA in the SYG.

"Not only did the Tribunal substitute its judgment for that of the SYG in an area of decision which the GA clearly intended to reserve to the SYG when the Tribunal was established in 1949, but the Tribunal's decisions on the merits and with regard to damages will not stand the light of objective public examination. For the GA to permit such decisions to stand, given its power to take remedial action, would have very grave long-term consequences for confidence in the GA as a principal and responsible organ of the UN. We sincerely hope the French Delegation will not find it necessary to support an appropriation for payment of Tribunal awards."

Ambassador James J. Wadsworth, U.S. Delegation

During a luncheon meeting at Ambassador Borberg's residence today, Ambassador Lodge brought up the subject of the Administrative Tribunal Decisions, and explained the political implications rather than the legal and administrative imperfections of the Decisions. He pointed out the difference between a constitutional monarchy, such as Denmark, and a Federal Government, such as ours; he explained why the right of investigation was vested in the Congress of the United States, and why the perversion of the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution is impossible for the average American citizen to understand.

This in turn, Ambassador Lodge stated, was translated into the attitude of the Congressman representing the average citizen, and he predicted that Congress would never appropriate money which would be paid to individuals whose major aim was to overthrow the United States Government.

Ambassador Borberg pointed out that if the Congress withheld funds, it would be in violation of the Charter which the Senate had ratified. Ambassador Lodge retorted that regardless of this the Congress would not appropriate such funds. Ambassador Borberg then said that such action would penalize Denmark and all the other countries in the United Nations since they would have to make up the deficit, to which Ambassador Lodge replied that that was too bad, but all Delegations should understand clearly what the situation was, particularly as regards Congressional opinion.

Foreign Minister Hansen took little active part in the conversation, but very evidently followed it with great interest and seemed considerably impressed by the political implications of the Tribunal Decisions.

It would appear of value to have selected Embassies stress the political side of this matter rather than the strictly legal side. Wadsworth thinks that the Governments of some Member States would respond to this type of argument rather than agree that the Tribunal had overstepped its legal power or had substituted its judgment for that of the Secretary General. Particularly effective, Wadsworth believes, was the plea made by Ambassador Lodge to consider what the views of the Foreign Minister would be were he a member of the aggrieved Government in such a case. Both he and Borberg admitted that in our position they would probably feel and act exactly as we did.

WASHINGTON, November 9, 1953—7:26 p. m.

1779. Urtel 1791, Depcirtel 186 Nov 7, fol is summary of memorandum of law for use of French in their review of technical position.

B. Summary

GA has legal right and responsibility review and refuse give effect to decisions of Administrative Tribunal.

1. Background of international administrative tribunals and relevant international law support above conclusion.

(a) International administrative tribunals are relatively new institutions. They are sui generis. Their relationship to GA is not controlled by analogy to institutions of similar name or functions in municipal law.

(b) International administrative tribunals operate on basis of underlying agreement between states which makes relevant to them principles of international law. One such well settled principle, developed in connection with arbitral tribunals, is that an award is null or voidable if it involves excess of tribunal's power or terms of reference.

2. Under Charter of UN power and responsibility for personnel and functioning of Secretariat are vested in SYG and GA. Source of Assembly's power in establishing Tribunal is found Art 22 of Charter, which permits GA to establish subsidiary organs to assist in discharge of its responsibilities. Neither legislative history nor intent evidenced by other Charter provisions gives basis for conclusion that GA cld or shld be bound by decisions of such a subsidiary body.

3. Precedent of League of Nations Administrative Tribunal, Statute of UN Administrative Tribunal, and its legislative history combine to show that neither intent nor effect of GA's action was to place judgments of Tribunal beyond its power of review.

(a) When initially used in Statute of League of Nations Tribunal phrase "final and without appeal" meant that processes established by Statute ended and that no right of appeal was provided.

(b) That power to review and refuse to give effect to decisions of Tribunal was reserved to Assembly was established beyond any possible doubt by 1946 League precedent where this power was exercised respecting 13 judgments.

(c) Legislative history of UN Tribunal's statute shows that from outset League Statute was its model. Nothing occurred to cast even a shadow on clearly established meaning of "final and without appeal" as carried into new Statute.

Tribunal has gone substantially beyond its proper powers and has made number of important errors in applying regs as well as errors of law and fact in fixing amounts of awards.

1. Administrative Tribunal misinterpreted functions assigned to it by GA in disciplinary cases. It treated cases as though it possessed power to hear de novo, and substituted its judgment for SYG's in application of standards to staff conduct, all in disregard of need to have conclusion of arbitrariness or bad faith based on substantial evidence compelling such conclusion.

2. Tribunal committed serious errors of law in its application of Staff regs.

(a) Actions of staff members involved cld properly be viewed as "serious misconduct".

(b) These actions were clearly unsatisfactory conduct and Tribunal shld have sustained them on this ground.

(c) As to temporary indefinite employee (Crawford case), Tribunal acted contrary to intent of GA as recently clarified for its benefit in reg 9.1(c).

3. In setting amounts of awards Tribunal failed to base its findings on reasons capable of justifying varying amounts upon which it fixed, and it accepted as controlling unverified and erroneous representations of fact.

Both see great difficulty in changing previously adopted position of supporting ruling of administrative tribunal headed by French judge, but they both promised to give it further consideration from political point of view.

Schumann, whom Bidault has asked to try to work out solution satisfactory to us, said he had, last night, cabled Bonnet to discuss matter with you again along following lines:

If matter comes to vote, he believes we will be defeated. Accordingly, he suggests seeking to avoid a debate and trying to work out, in agreement with Hammarskjold, a procedure which would avoid, perhaps by simple consultation with the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary questions, any recourse to the Assembly. This would apparently involve payment of awards by Secretary General from funds already at his disposal. Should this suggestion appeal to us, French delegation would actively cooperate toward bringing it about.

In any event, we will continue to press French on both political and legal grounds.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Counselor of the Department of State (MacArthur)

[WASHINGTON,] November 19, 1953.

Subject: French Views on the UN Administrative Tribunal Problem

Participants: The Secretary
Ambassador Bonnet
Mr. MacArthur

Ambassador Bonnet called today at his request and said that he had one or two matters which he wished to discuss with the Secretary. He said that he had a personal and verbal message for the Secretary from M. Bidault regarding French cooperation on the UN administrative tribunal matter. He then went on to say that the French would find it very difficult to vote against payments because they believed that legally the administrative tribunal was empowered to make the awards. However, the French wished to be helpful and would cooperate fully with us in seeking to avoid a debate and vote and try to work out a procedure which would avoid recourse to the General Assembly. Furthermore, the French would cooperate in an amendment so that in the future this kind of a situation would not arise. Ambassador Bonnet again made reference to the fact that the French legal experts disagreed with the U.S. legal opinion which had been given them by our Embassy in Paris.

The Secretary replied that he was disappointed in the French position. At every hand France and other free countries were asking us to cooperate with them and to support their position in the United Nations or elsewhere. With respect to North Africa, the U.S. had supported the French position although much U.S. opinion had not believed it was the best course. The Secretary said that he found it discouraging that, when the French were requested to support us in a matter which would cost them nothing, they found it inexpedient to cooperate. If this were all the French could do, we would have to accept their decision but the failure on their part to understand our problems and support our position was not helpful.

PRIORITY

2007. Pass USUN. At Embassy's request Foreign Office has given us unofficial comments on various points raised US memorandum of law re UN Administrative Tribunal (Deptel 1779, November 9). These comments should not be considered as definitive Foreign Office juridical position but may provide guidance to Department and USUN on argumentation which other delegations may advance. Highlights of comments (copy being pouched) follow:

1. Re power of GA to review and reject decisions of administrative tribunal:

(a) Assembly made decision and gave its instructions to tribunal when it adopted November 24, 1949, resolution 351 (IV) creating tribunal. Assembly thus bound by its own action. It can modify statute of tribunal but not object retroactively to its functioning in conformance with statute adopted.

(b) SYG has never denied legitimacy of tribunal procedures nor has tribunal denied legitimacy of SYG decisions with respect to dismissals, thus at no time in past has there been irregular or contested functioning of application to concrete cases of decisions of the Assembly (resolution 351, IV).

2. Re precedent of League of Nations which French do not consider valid:

(a) League administration had considered that tribunal not competent under terms its own statute to consider decision of Assembly as non-applicable. Thus there was conflict between tribunal and administration on interpretation of Assembly decision. This not case with UN.

(b) Tribunal tried to protect interests of personnel against Assembly resolution, not against decision of the administration. This not case with UN.

(c) In its 1946 action Assembly reaffirmed its own earlier decision. In refusing to give effect to judgments of UN Tribunal, General Assembly would repudiate its own decision of 1949.

(d) Juridically improper to conclude that when SYG does not contest competence of tribunal and when the latter is only applying Assembly decisions, latter retains power to reject tribunal's judgments.

3. Re tribunal exceeding its powers:

(a) In matters of dismissals tribunal's authority remains complete and it has right to try cases de novo otherwise SYG should have contested tribunal's competence which he did not do.

(b) Impossible in effect to permit distinction between juridical procedures of member states. Otherwise it would suffice for national body (Congressional Committee, Grand Jury, etcetera) in particular country to complain of attitude of international employee for latter, in absence of any penal conviction or sentence, to be validly accused of serious misconduct. Independence of international staff would disappear.

(c) Arguments re awards established by tribunal completely valid. Awards certainly high and varied. As proposed by SYG, ceiling on future awards desirable. Re past, tribunal acting basis its own statute was not bound by any criteria and it would be juridically improper to contest amounts which it awarded.<sup>1</sup>

"Argumentation developed this aide-mémoire raises very complex juridical question. It is question knowing, in effect, whether and in what measure administrative tribunal's decisions may be opposed at UN Assembly.

"US Embassy considers Assembly's right intervention in such matter derives, not from right of appeal which is not recognized by any text, but from fact that Assembly constitutes UN's supreme control organ, therefore is competent express its opinion and revise, in last analysis, decisions taken by all organizations it has created.

"Belgian Government [garble] hesitates adopt this reasoning. It believes in fact most precedents existing on national plane in democratic countries are not of nature allow its adoption. Within framework of state, on contrary, fact that assemblies are highest sovereign organ, that judiciary power owes its organization and, in certain cases, appointment its members to them, does not prevent judgments from being in opposition to it, and any legislative measure which would have effect suspending their application is considered abuse of power. One can ask whether such conception must not also govern relations between various UN organs.

"Belgian Government not unaware this thesis far from unanimously accepted and that valid arguments could perhaps support contrary doctrine. It seems moreover that problem has never been given comprehensive solution, and present conflict could without doubt furnish occasion for extensive study of question. International Court Justice is particularly appropriate organization to proceed with such study and, if no basis for agreement found, it appears opportune consult it.

"In case amendments to tribunal statute adopted in order avoid renewal present controversies, another juridical question would be posed: that of knowing whether amended statute can be applied retroactively and would allow modification of decisions taken in conformity with preceding statute. In this field, observation of principle of non-retroactivity appears essential to maintenance of security which it is purpose of institution of tribunal to guarantee officials.

"In case of controversy, this second question could also be submitted to court.

"While waiting solution these prejudicial problems, it is difficult for Belgian Government not to consider statute of tribunal and that of officials enables this jurisdiction fix principle and amount of compensation for dismissed officials. It also difficult for it not to consider judgment rendered as sovereign and entailing moral obligation for member states to put it into effect."<sup>3</sup>

Great deal very serious consideration has been given this problem because government feels strongly that direct Anglo-American clash must be avoided at all costs; if British won, seriousness of effects in United States realized by all, if United States won, public opinion problem in this country would be equally serious. Therefore, after thorough consideration Eden has decided approve Selwyn Lloyd's suggestion that British support resolution referring to World Court question of tribunal's competence and validity tribunal awards. Eden realizes this will not solve problem but will at least postpone it for probably a year, in meantime awards will not be paid and serious conflict will be avoided for time being. Furthermore, it is most appropriate for conflicting legal opinions to be referred to World Court for legal solution. Eden earnestly hopes United States can support contemplated resolution as only possible way out of immediate serious situation.

I believe that direct Anglo-American clash on this issue should, if possible, be avoided in over-all Western interest. If, as I gather seems probable, we mustered sufficient votes to overrule tribunal's decisions, leftists here would charge that pressure politics had been used to settle legal question and this would enlist considerable moderate support on both sides of House. Resultant exploitation of this issue would further agitate public opinion here which is already disturbed by ramifications White case (see Embtel 2169, November 19).<sup>2</sup> I therefore hope that unless Department has better alternative suggestion it will be possible to accept British proposal.

As regards the administrative tribunal awards, the British position appears to be definitely and immovably one of favoring referral to the International Court of Justice. If they were willing to vote with us we could, of course, defeat awards. Several personal discussions with Selwyn Lloyd and exchanges of letters convinces me, however, that they are firmly set the other way.

Now I learn that, either on their own motion or through some other delegation, they intend to bring up the motion to refer the matter to ICJ in such a way as to forestall our getting vote on the substantive merits of question. If they do this, motion will probably carry and we will never get a vote on the substantive issue at all. This seems to me to be an extremely unfriendly thing to do and certainly if the US ever did anything remotely resembling it, we would call down upon our heads the condemnation of all the people with beautiful and superior minds from one end of the world to the other.

Frankly this matter has gotten to a point where only representations to Churchill can be expected to accomplish anything. WASHINGTON, January 22, 1954.

Subject: UNGA Action on Administrative Tribunal Awards

The Department desires to express its appreciation for the prompt action taken in response to the previous instructions relating to the above subject. For your guidance in future conversations or negotiations, the Department also wishes to report both the action taken by the General Assembly on the question of the Administrative Tribunal awards and the position taken by certain individual governments represented in the General Assembly.

The situation created by the decisions of the Tribunal was considered by the General Assembly in two different contexts. First, the Secretary General presented amendments to the staff regulations and the Tribunal's statute in an effort to clarify his powers and thus prevent future inroads on his powers by the Tribunal. Secondly, the Secretary General in submitting his supplemental budget estimates for 1953 requested the appropriation of $179,420 for the payment of the awards made by the Tribunal on the basis of its decisions in the eleven controversial cases.

The Secretary General's proposals for amending the regulations to clarify his powers were, in general, supported. Whether they will effectively serve their intended purpose remains to be seen. The United States Delegation and the Department have considerable reservations as to some of these amendments and the practical effect which will be given to them by both the Secretary General and the Tribunal. The amendments, and most particularly the interpretation given to them by the Secretary General in his statements before the Fifth Committee of the General Assembly, were general and did not appreciably clarify the respective powers of the Secretary General and the Tribunal. Because there is basically a wide variance of opinion in the Assembly as to the proper role of the Tribunal, it is our view that such a general formulation of policy is not likely to result in a resolution of the basic issues. It is the Secretary General's belief, however, that he will be better able to maintain his position with respect to both the Assembly and the Tribunal if the test of his power is made on the basis of specific cases rather than on the basis of obtaining approval of regulations which specify more fully the extent of his powers.

As indicated in the Department's previous communication, it was the United States position that the best way to clarify the Secretary General's position vis-à-vis the Tribunal was to reject the awards. The major United States effort was therefore directed toward defeating the appropriation for the awards.

When this item came up in the Assembly, the estimated support for the United States position, based on reports from the posts and negotiations in New York, totalled a maximum of 22 votes. Approximately 31 votes were known to be against the United States position and the remaining seven delegations were either undecided or had indicated an intention to abstain. It was obvious therefore that the United States would lose its position on the basis of a majority vote in the Fifth Committee. The United States had based its position on the possibility of defeating the appropriation for the awards by invoking the two-thirds rule of the Charter. An estimate of voting strength indicated that the United States, if all delegations honored their pledges, would have backing of at least one-third plus one of the delegations present and voting.

When the political and legal considerations became better understood, and when it became evident that majority support for the United States position was lacking and that a close plenary vote would seriously split the Assembly, concern over the gravity with which the United States viewed the issue impelled several delegations to achieve some sort of compromise. These included some who, though sympathetic, disagreed with the United States position and some who were instructed to support the United States. The lead was taken by the British Delegation, which basically did not agree with the United States position.

The United Kingdom proposed, in effect, to refer the dispute over the legal aspects of the question to the International Court of Justice for an advisory opinion. This proposal was widely circulated and discussed prior to formal introduction. It became clear that such a proposal would carry by a substantial majority. The major issue then became the kind of questions to refer to the Court. The United States Delegation sought to restrict the questions referred to the Court; others, led by the French Delegation, sought to refer the entire merits of the case to the International Court of Justice. The French position was defeated and the Fifth Committee decided by a vote of 37 to 7 with 12 abstentions to refer the following two questions to the International Court of Justice for an advisory opinion:

“(i) Having regard to the Statute of the United Nations Administrative Tribunal and to any other relevant instruments and to the relevant records, has the General Assembly the right on any grounds to refuse to give effect to an award of compensation made by that Tribunal in favour of a staff member of the United Nations whose contract of service has been terminated without his assent?”

“(ii) If the answer given by the Court to question (i) is in the affirmative, what are the principal grounds upon which the General Assembly could lawfully exercise such a right?”

The United States Delegation abstained on the decision to refer these questions to the International Court of Justice. While the United States considered that the Assembly could, should and in the end must make its own decision with regard to the issues in these cases, the United States could not prevent the referral by marshalling a majority against it. It was believed that a last ditch fight against referral on the issue would only injure the United States interests by casting doubt on the United States legal position and alienating United States supporters who regarded the Court referral as only reasonable. The United States made known its strong opposition to referring the merits of the cases to the International Court of Justice or committing the General Assembly in advance to appropriate money, depending upon what answer the Court might give to it. As a consequence, the Fifth Committee rejected proposals by the French Delegation to explore the merits of the individual cases and to grant the Secretary General authority to pay the awards automatically, if the International Court of Justice opinion upheld the position of the Tribunal. As a consequence, no appropriation was made for the payment of the Tribunal awards and the opinion of the International Court of Justice on the questions put forth will have to be considered by the Assembly at its Ninth Session together with all of the other considerations—political and budgetary as well as legal—before final disposition is made of the particular cases and of the awards fixed by the Tribunal.

The Assembly endorsed the action of the Fifth Committee by a vote of 41 to 6 with 13 abstentions.

For Ankara: The Embassy may in its discretion convey to the Foreign Office the appreciation of the United States Government for the position taken by the Turkish Government and delegation on this issue. Mr. Vaner, Turkish representative on the Fifth Committee, carried out his government's instructions in a particularly helpful manner.

- For Athens:* The Embassy may in its discretion convey to the Foreign Office the appreciation of the United States Government for the position taken by the Greek Government and delegation on this issue. The representative of Greece in the Fifth Committee carried out the instructions of his government exactly. The Embassy may wish to mention that Ambassador Agnides, in particular, while he could not as Chairman of the Advisory Committee participate in the debate as representative of Greece, was influential in developing a better understanding on the part of other delegations of the issue involved and the basis for United States concern.
- For Baghdad:* The Department assumes Embassy has already expressed United States appreciation for support of Iraqi Government on the basis of Delga 388, December 8, repeated Baghdad, USUN 1.
- For Bangkok:* The Embassy may in its discretion convey to the Foreign Office the appreciation of the United States Government for the position taken by the Government of Thailand and delegation on this issue.
- For Bogota:* The Embassy may in its discretion convey to the Foreign Office the appreciation of the United States Government for the partial support which the Delegation of Colombia was able to offer to the United States Delegation at the General Assembly. While the Colombia Delegation was instructed to oppose the basic United States position, it did collaborate with the United Kingdom in framing a compromise proposal and attempted to make this proposal as acceptable to the United States as possible.
- For Buenos Aires:* The Embassy may in its discretion convey to the Foreign Office the appreciation of the United States Government for the position taken by the Argentinian Government and delegation on this issue. Senor Leonardo Cafiero, Argentinian representative on the Fifth Committee, carried out his government's instructions exactly and collaborated in a close and helpful manner with the United States Delegation.
- For Canberra:* The Embassy may in its discretion convey to the Foreign Office the appreciation of the United States Government for the position taken by the Australian delegation on this issue. Sir Percy Spender's speech on the Tribunal awards was most forceful in its analysis of the Tribunal's errors and in its argument for respecting and preserving the powers of the Assembly and the Secretary General.
- For Capetown:* FYI—Although the instructions of South Africa were not favorable to the United States position on the appropriation of the awards, the South African delegate was helpful to the extent of abstaining or voting against the objectionable French amendments to the International Court of Justice referral.
- For Caracas:* FYI—The Venezuelan delegate supported the British proposal for International Court of Justice referral, but voted with the United States in opposition to all of the French amendments.
- For Ciudad Trujillo:* The Embassy may in its discretion convey to the Foreign Office the appreciation of the United States Government for the position taken by the Government and delegation of the Dominican Republic on this issue. Ambassador Franco y Franco carried out his government's instructions in a particularly helpful manner.

For Habana: The Embassy may in its discretion convey to the Foreign Office the appreciation of the United States Government for the position taken by the Cuban Government and delegation on this issue. Dr. Carlos Blanco, Cuban representative on the Fifth Committee, carried out his government's instructions exactly and collaborated closely and most helpfully with the United States delegation.

For Karachi: FYI—The Pakistan delegation followed, in general, the British position and helped the United States to the extent of voting against one of the objectionable French amendments to the International Court of Justice proposal.

For La Paz: The Embassy may in its discretion convey to the Foreign Office the appreciation of the United States Government for the position taken by the Bolivian Government and delegation on this issue.

For Lima: The Embassy may in its discretion convey to the Foreign Office the appreciation of the United States Government for the position taken by the Government and delegation of Peru on this issue.

For London: FYI—Our understanding is that the Foreign Office and Law Officer's position on the questions to be referred to the International Court of Justice was much less acceptable to the United States and much more rigid than the version eventually sponsored by the United Kingdom delegation. This imposed rigidity created great difficulties for both the United Kingdom and the United States delegations, and no doubt accounts for the disconcerting fact that while the United Kingdom delegation did not include the most objectionable questions in its proposal, in the hope of winning a United States abstention, it nevertheless voted for a French amendment designed to achieve the same purpose.

For Managua: The Embassy may in its discretion convey to the Foreign Office the appreciation of the United States Government for the position taken by the Government and delegation of Nicaragua on this issue.

For Manila: The Embassy may in its discretion convey to the Foreign Office the appreciation of the United States Government for the position taken by the Government and delegation of the Philippines on this issue. The Philippines representative in the Fifth Committee carried out the instructions of his government exactly and collaborated closely with the United States Delegation.

For Paris: FYI—The United States delegation considered that the French delegation by act and word went completely contrary to the previous commitments of both the Foreign Office and the delegation that they would be as helpful as possible within limitations of basic French position on the Tribunal awards. Andre Ganem in the Fifth Committee made a lengthy, strong, and unfriendly speech aimed at the United States. Subsequently, the French sponsored resolutions designed to broaden the questions referred to the International Court of Justice in a manner totally unacceptable to the United States and to authorize the Secretary General to pay the awards without further action by the Assembly if the International Court of Justice opinion upheld the Tribunal—a proposal even more unacceptable to the United States.

For Port-au-Prince: The Embassy may in its discretion convey to the Foreign Office the appreciation of the United States Government for the position taken by the Haitian Government and delegation on this issue.

For Quito: The Embassy may in its discretion convey to the Foreign Office the appreciation of the United States Government for the position taken by the Ecuadorean Government and delegation on this issue.

For Santiago: The Embassy may in its discretion convey to the Foreign Office the appreciation of the United States Government for the position taken by the Chilean Government and delegation on this issue.

For Taipei: The Embassy may in its discretion convey to the Foreign Office the appreciation of the United States Government for the position taken by the Chinese Government and delegation on this issue.

For Tegucigalpa: The Embassy may in its discretion convey to the Foreign Office the appreciation of the United States Government for the position taken by the Government and delegation of Honduras on this issue. Dr. Carias carried out his government's instructions in a particularly helpful manner.

For San Salvador: For your information, although Foreign Office had pledged support on this issue, unfortunately El Salvador was not represented in the Fifth Committee when this issue was discussed.

For Asunción: For your information, although Foreign Office had pledged support on this issue, unfortunately Paraguay was not represented in the Fifth Committee when this issue was discussed.

I. INTRODUCTION

The General Assembly of the United Nations, at its Eighth Session, by resolution dated December 9, 1953 (UN Official Records, General Assembly 8th Session, A/194, 11 December 1953), decided to submit to the International Court of Justice for an advisory opinion certain legal questions concerning awards of the United Nations Administrative Tribunal.

First, the General Assembly put the general question of its right to refuse to give effect to an award of compensation made by the Administrative Tribunal; and second, it inquired as to the principal grounds upon which such a right could lawfully be exercised. The resolution of December 9, 1953, reads as follows:

"The General Assembly,

"Considering the request for a supplementary appropriation of $179,420, made by the Secretary-General in his report (A/2534) for the purpose of covering the awards made by the United Nations Administrative Tribunal in eleven cases numbered 26, and 37 to 46 inclusive,

"Considering the concurrence in that appropriation by the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions contained in its twenty-fourth report to the eighth session of the General Assembly (A/2580), “Considering, nevertheless, that important legal questions have been raised in the course of debate in the Fifth Committee with respect to that appropriation, “Decides

“To submit the following legal questions to the International Court of Justice for an advisory opinion :

“(1) Having regard to the Statute of the United Nations Administrative Tribunal and to any other relevant instruments and to the relevant records, has the General Assembly the right on any grounds to refuse to give effect to an award of compensation made by that Tribunal in favour of a staff member of the United Nations whose contract of service has been terminated without his assent ?

“(2) If the answer given by the Court to question (1) is in the affirmative, what are the principal grounds upon which the General Assembly could lawfully exercise such a right ?”

These two questions were put to the International Court of Justice in order that the General Assembly in its further deliberations concerning certain awards made by the United Nations Administrative Tribunal in 1953 might be advised by an opinion from the principal judicial organ of the United Nations on the legal questions formulated in the Assembly's resolution. Before proceeding to state views on the questions submitted by the General Assembly, it is essential to consider the exact import of those questions. They speak of the Assembly's “right” to follow a given course of action.

It is necessary to understand this term in the sense of legal power on the part of the Assembly. Otherwise, there is not a “legal question” on which an advisory opinion can be sought and rendered under Article 96 of the Charter. The Charter does not provide here, and the Court is not constituted, for the rendering of advisory opinions on other than legal questions: for example, on political or moral questions. Accordingly, there must be excluded from the meaning of the term “right” in the Assembly's questions any elements other than legal considerations; the question is not whether there is a moral right, an ethical right, or any kind of right other than a legal right or power.

The questions submitted by the General Assembly, therefore, require that one consider what legal dispositions there are under the Charter of the United Nations and other relevant law, as drawn from the sources recited in Article 38 of the Statute of the Court, which relate to the Assembly's giving or refusing to give effect to awards of compensation made by the United Nations Administrative Tribunal. Article 38 of the Statute, in setting forth the sources of law to be applied by the Court, places first “international conventions, whether general or particular, establishing rules expressly recognized by the contesting states”. Under Article 68, the Court is authorized, if not indeed encouraged, to follow such provisions as Article 38 in the exercise of its advisory functions. In view of the nature of the Charter as the treaty under which the General Assembly was established, there could scarcely be another point of departure than the Charter in dealing with the questions which have been submitted by the General Assembly. As the Court said in its advisory opinion concerning Conditions of Admission of a State to Membership in the United Nations:

“The political character of an organ cannot release it from the observance of the treaty provisions established by the Charter when they constitute limitations on its powers or criteria for its judgment. To ascertain whether an organ has freedom of choice for its decisions, reference must be made to the terms of its constitution.” [1948]<sup>2</sup> I.C.J. 57, 64.

The Charter, as it applies to the General Assembly, does not speak of “rights” of the Assembly. Its language is that usual in most constitutional documents; “shall”, “may”, and similar terms are used where scope and content are given to the Assembly’s “functions and powers” in Chapter IV of the Charter. “Right” is used with reference to states, Members, peoples, and individuals. Articles 1(2); 2(2), (5); 13(1)(b); 18(2); 40; 43(1); 51; 55; 62(2); 68; 76(c); 80(1); cf. Articles 31(1) and 63(2) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice. In the language of the Charter, therefore, the questions now before the Court must be understood as whether and how the General Assembly is empowered in the execution of its functions to give or to refuse to give effect to awards of the Administrative Tribunal, and what, if any, limitations are imposed on the Assembly’s exercise of such a power. To reject those meanings of “right” which relate to political and moral propriety or to individual as distinguished from governmental “right”, and to understand the word in the sense of legal power, is to conform to “a cardinal principle of interpretation that words must be interpreted in the sense which they would normally have in their context, unless such interpretation would lead to something unreasonable or absurd”. See Polish Postal Service in Danzig, [1925]<sup>2</sup> P.C.I.J. Ser. B, No. 11, 39.

Before leaving the question of the scope and content of the Assembly’s questions, it may be worthwhile to consider the phrase “refuse to give effect” as used in the questions. Its meaning seems clear as importing any course of action other than simple appropriation of funds by the General Assembly to pay the Administrative Tribunal’s monetary awards. Thus, the General Assembly, like the League Assembly in 1946, where the same term (“refuse to give effect”) was used, might adopt a report by its Fifth Committee disapproving the awards for stated reasons and not appropriate the money to pay them. The Assembly might, as it has done in the present case, not appropriate the money at the session at which the item was placed on the agenda for consideration, or even indefinitely postpone voting on payment. It might vote on a proposal to pay and not adopt it at one or at several sessions. It might, as it has done in the present case, not appropriate the money at the session at which the item was placed on the agenda for consideration, or even indefinitely postpone voting on payment. It might vote on a proposal to pay and not adopt it at one or several sessions. It might, as it has done in the present case, refer one or more legal questions to the International Court of Justice. It might create a special tribunal to review Tribunal cases ad hoc. It might adopt a report approving payment of a different amount on grounds differing from those of the Tribunal. It might simply appropriate a part of the amount named by the Tribunal. It might appropriate the whole amount, but on the basis of a report expressly rejecting the ratio decidendi of the Tribunal and the authority of its judgment.

Would any or all of these actions, or other possible variants, constitute refusal to give effect? It is submitted that they would.

The intention of the first question submitted by the General Assembly would seem to be to ask the Court whether the Statute of the Tribunal, the Charter, or other relevant instruments or records constitute a legal bar to every course of action other than full and prompt payment and acceptance by the General Assembly of the Administrative Tribunal's judgments. The second question appears legally answerable, as will be developed later, only in terms of Charter limitations on action by the Assembly.

II. SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The responsibility and power of principal organs are superior to those of subsidiary organs. This principle dominates the relationship between General Assembly and Administrative Tribunal.

The General Assembly under the Charter bears exclusive responsibility for considering and approving the budget by a two-thirds majority vote. It cannot by delegation avoid the requirement of a two-thirds vote following its own full and adequate consideration of budgetary appropriations.

The Charter does not permit the General Assembly to create an organ capable of usurping the Charter power of the Secretary-General or its own function of final review and decision in matters arising out of its concern with the administration of the Secretariat pursuant to Article 101(1) of the Charter. Establishment of an Administrative Tribunal might be an implied power of the General Assembly, but establishment of an organ whose decisions must be regarded as legally binding upon the Assembly, or, in all cases, upon the Secretary-General, is not necessary to the discharge of the Assembly's functions and would indeed be contrary to the provisions of the Charter.

Articles 7 and 22 provide the only categories of United Nations organs, and these are "principal" and "subsidiary". The Tribunal is not a principal organ. Article 22 authorized the General Assembly to establish it as a subsidiary organ. The Tribunal cannot assume the role of a body legally capable of compelling the acquiescence of the General Assembly.

The interpretation of the Charter in regard to the Assembly's functions, and the interpretation of its own resolutions, is a matter which must remain the primary and final responsibility of the General Assembly. Not even the International Court of Justice can bind the Assembly to a given interpretation; a subsidiary organ is plainly incapable of such legal power.

Under the Charter, it is not possible to construct a theory of separation of powers as between the General Assembly and the Administrative Tribunal. Even if it were, however, the logical consequences would be, not that the General Assembly would have no right or power to exercise its powers in a fashion disapproved by the Tribunal, but rather that the Tribunal would lack legal authority to control how the General Assembly should perform its tasks.

Nothing in the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal can be considered to have diminished the responsibilities and power of the General Assembly or to have prejudiced its right or power to refuse to give effect to awards of the Tribunal.

In creating the Administrative Tribunal, the General Assembly did not seek or purport to endow the Tribunal with power to bind the Assembly. The work of the Preparatory Commission of the United Nations and the Drafting Committee for the Tribunal's Statute evidence predominant concern in securing the highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity among the Staff, as required by the Charter, and respect for the discretion vested by the Charter in the Secretary-General to permit establishment and maintenance of these standards. It was in this context, and with full appreciation of the fact that in 1946 the Assembly of the League of Nations exercised the right to refuse to give effect to awards of the League's Tribunal, that the present Statute was modeled upon that of the League and used the League Statute's language that judgments should be "final and without appeal".

Administrative Tribunals in the field of international law are new institutions, are sui generis, and necessarily lack both the established substantive law, and the constitutional safeguards, such as a mature appellate structure with internal checks and balances, which may afford an immeasurably greater assurance in any given municipal system that exhaustion of remedies within a judicial framework will result in substantial justice in all cases. Even in mature municipal systems, there can be no ultimate legal sanction depriving the supreme legislative body of its lawful authority over the matter of budgetary appropriations.

In a fully debated decision in 1946, the League of Nations Assembly authoritatively settled the question whether awards of the League Tribunal must be given effect by the League Assembly. The answer was that the Assembly had the right and exercised the power to refuse to give them effect.

The conclusion follows that the General Assembly has the right to refuse to give effect to awards of the Administrative Tribunal. As to grounds upon which it might do so, the Charter requires that the General Assembly shall make a policy decision, taking account of the relevant factors, based on the Charter principle of paramount consideration for maintaining the highest standards of efficiency, competence and integrity in the Secretariat. Any one or combination of a series of factors might create a situation in which the Assembly would judge that its Charter responsibility called for refusal to give effect to a Tribunal award.

V. CONCLUSIONS

(1) Question (1)

For the reasons above discussed, it is submitted that Question (1) should be answered in the affirmative.

(2) Question (2)

Question (2) reads:

“If the answer given by the Court to question (1) is in the affirmative, what are the principal grounds upon which the General Assembly could lawfully exercise such a right?”

It will be recalled that in its advisory opinion concerning Conditions of Admission of a State to Membership in the United Nations, the Court said:

“To ascertain whether an organ has freedom of choice for its decisions, reference must be made to the terms of its constitution.” [1948] <sup>3</sup> I.C.J. 57, 64.

In that case, the Court found such terms expressly stated in the immediately relevant Charter Article 4. Id. at 6. In Part III of the present statement the Articles immediately relevant to the present case—Articles 17, 18, 101, 7 and 22—have been examined, and they contain, it is submitted, as comparable express criteria only the provisions of Article 101(3) that

“The paramount consideration in the employment of the staff and in the determination of the conditions of service shall be the necessity of securing the highest standards of efficiency, competence, and integrity. Due regard shall be paid to the importance of recruiting the staff on as wide a geographical basis as possible.”

In the Admissions case, the criteria of Article 4 were exclusive. In the present case, the criteria of Article 101(3) are “paramount” but not exclusive. The area for the operation of factors of sound political discretion is necessarily wide and is the domain, not of a court of law, but of the competent political organs. The Court could, if asked, render advice on the legal “meaning” of the factors stipulated. It could scarcely advise on which ones or which combinations of express and non-express factors should be applied in a particular case to achieve a particular result.

Such considerations appear so fundamental, and already have been so clearly elaborated by the Court itself, as to preclude the need for more extensive treatment. It would not seem helpful to attempt a generalized treatment of such Charter provisions as Articles 103, 95, 55, 56, 48, or 2(7), for although they might conceivably, in some fashion, limit the area of General Assembly discretion in some particular case, they do not themselves expressly or inferentially establish grounds for decision of the type of problem here considered.

The following are illustrative of some of the types of situations which might give rise to careful review by the General Assembly and, in its discretion, to refusal to give effect to awards of the Administrative Tribunal:

Mistaken reliance by the Tribunal upon false representations of a party in a case;

Interpretation and application of Regulations established by the General Assembly with effect contrary to the express or reiterated intent and object of the General Assembly, such as: awards made in flagrant disregard of the Statute or Rules, to the prejudice of either party; ultra vires awards; decisions premised on serious misconstruction of the Charter, particularly in regard to the powers and responsibilities of the principal organs, such as: decision invading Charter powers or discretion of the Secretary-General, or decision violative of Article 101(3) of the Charter;

Decision contrary to an advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice;

Awards arbitrary or unreasonable on their face;

Important and inconsistent decisions giving rise to serious uncertainties in the administration of the Secretariat;

Awards entailing impossible financial consequences for the Organization. Needless to say, duress exercised upon the Tribunal, corruption of the Tribunal, or action evidencing prejudice and improper motives of any of its members would call for similar action by the General Assembly.

The weight to be accorded to any one or combination of these factors would have to be determined by the General Assembly in discharging its responsibilities as a principal organ of the United Nations under the Charter. This is an essentially political responsibility of the Assembly.

It is submitted that the answer to Question (2) is that, as a matter of law, the General Assembly must rely upon policy grounds in refusing to give effect to awards of the Tribunal, acting with due regard for relevant Charter provisions, such as the express stipulation of a "paramount consideration" in Article 101.

[WASHINGTON,] June 1, 1954.

Subject: Gerety Board Hearings

Pursuant to procedures established under Executive Order 10422 cases involving about 10 U.S. citizens on staffs of UN agencies at Geneva require hearings before Gerety Board (International Organizations Employees Loyalty Board, U.S. Civil Service Commission). Board tentatively plans to hold hearings Rome beginning June 21, Geneva June 28, and Paris July 7.

Department understands delicacy of problem with respect to Switzerland particularly in light of Swiss reaction to investigations carried out in Switzerland under Executive Order 10422. Thus we feel complete frankness with Swiss at outset is essential to allay any fears of our encroaching on Swiss sovereignty, Swiss responsibilities towards UN agencies, or possible intimidation of US citizens resident in Switzerland. At same time, we believe it desirable to avoid placing Swiss in position requiring an expression of approval of the Gerety Board hearings in Geneva; they have never in fact given their approval to the investigations.

Subject to your concurrence (Deptel 1420 to Bern, 690 to Geneva)<sup>2</sup> Department suggests that Embassy advise Political Department at appropriate level along following lines. Investigations carried out under Executive Order 10422 reveal a number of cases where information regarding individuals is not complete or where certain questions remain unanswered. In such cases persons located in US were invited to appear before Gerety Board. Distance makes it impractical for such individuals in Europe to appear before the Board in the US and consequently the Board is proceeding to Paris, Rome, and Geneva. Board, consisting of two panels of three men each (plus two administrative assistants) will convene on consular premises at Geneva on June 28, and will there conduct interviews with US citizens in question. These individuals, of which there are about ten, will be invited to take advantage of presence of Board at Geneva to appear for their interviews with no compulsion intended or involved. While purposes and movements of the Board are not classified, it is hoped that as little publicity as possible will occur in Europe.

You may wish to leave impression with Political Department that foregoing is for its information and no reply is anticipated. Modification of the suggested approach is left in your discretion in order to ensure full use of your ability and close associations you have developed at Bern to convince Swiss officials that U.S. motives and actions do not contravene Swiss political and institutional traditions.

UNITED STATES ORAL ARGUMENT PRESENTED TO THE INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE

The Government of the United States was represented today before the International Court of Justice at The Hague by Mr. Herman Phleger, Legal Adviser of the Department of State, who presented the oral argument of the United States in the advisory opinion proceedings regarding the effect of awards of the Administrative Tribunal of the United Nations.

In the present case the International Court of Justice has been asked by the United Nations General Assembly to advise whether the Assembly has the right, on any grounds, to refuse effect to awards of the United Nations Administrative Tribunal. It has also been asked, if the answer to the first question is affirmative, on what principal grounds it can lawfully exercise that right.

The awards in dispute are the compensation adjudged by the Tribunal as due to eleven United States citizens who, in 1953, were dismissed from the United Nations by the Secretary-General for refusing to testify before official United States investigating bodies regarding subversive activities. The Tribunal held that the action of the Secretary-General was not taken in accord with the staff regulations and was, therefore, illegal. Last fall, the Eighth General Assembly, instead of appropriating funds to pay the awards, sought the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice.

Under the Statute of the International Court of Justice, governments interested in an advisory opinion proceeding are afforded an opportunity to submit written statements to the Court and are allowed oral hearings. In the present proceeding, fourteen governments—including the United States—presented written statements setting forth the views of their governments, while four other governments sent communications referring to expressions they had previously made in General Assembly debate.

Mr. Phleger, in his oral argument to the Court, has summed up the United States position as follows:

In the view of the United States Government, the argument that the Assembly has no right to review the awards, and must automatically pay them, cannot be sustained. We think the Assembly has not only the right, but the duty as well, to examine requests for appropriations, and has the right to refuse appropriations to pay awards of the Administrative Tribunal in those cases where it believes that the relevant considerations so require. We think the grounds to support such action are found in the Charter provisions defining the budgetary and regulatory responsibilities of the Assembly, its relationship to subsidiary organs such as the Administrative Tribunal, the function of the Secretary-General as the chief administrative officer of the Organization, and in the Charter provisions regarding interpretation and judicial power.

Whether the General Assembly would decide, in a given case, to refuse an appropriation must depend on its judgment of many factors which are proper for the Assembly's consideration. The weighing of these factors adds up to a judgment of a legislative character, to be made by the highest United Nations body in which all Members are represented. The Charter basis and limitations of Assembly action can and should be stated, as a matter of law. The reasons and motivations of Assembly decision to vote or refuse an appropriation in a particular situation are otherwise to be left to the judgment of the Assembly, as the United Nations organ with immediate responsibility in the matter.

Subject: Hearings by Gerety Board in Switzerland.

In a conversation on June 14, 1954 with Minister Micheli, the Head of the Division of International Organizations of the Federal Political Department, I informed him that I had been instructed by my Government (CA 6991, June 1, 1954) to convey to the Political Department information about the proposed hearings of approximately ten American citizens before the Gerety Board in Geneva about July 9, 1954.

Mr. Micheli recalled the previous exchange of views of our two Governments on the subject of the conducting of American investigations in Switzerland. He stated that when the subject had last been discussed by the Counselor of the Swiss Legation in Washington and officials of the Department of State the position of the Swiss Government had still been that it could not give its approval to these hearings or investigations being conducted in Switzerland. Mr. Micheli stated that this continued so because there was a matter of principle involved.

Mr. Micheli continued that the Swiss Government had reservation on the subject of these investigations on two counts. First, there was the danger of establishing a precedent. If other countries attempted to follow the example of the United States and to conduct investigations in Switzerland it was impossible to see where this might lead. Second, such procedure touched Swiss sovereignty. Swiss sovereignty was not involved in quite the same way as if these persons were not employed by the United Nations agencies. Nonetheless, Mr. Micheli pointed out that Switzerland was the host Government and Swiss sovereignty and Swiss relations with the United Nations agencies should not be ignored in this context.

My reply to Mr. Micheli was to the effect that I thought in February there had been a measure of agreement between our two Governments, if not outright approval by the Swiss Government, about letting these hearings take place. Furthermore, I reassured him that these hearings were entirely on a voluntary basis. The persons would be notified and could appear or not as they chose at the Consulate General. I added that there would be no publicity from us about the hearings although the fact that they were being held was not classified information.

Mr. Micheli stated that he would bring the information I had given him to the attention of the Federal Councillor, Mr. Max Petitpierre. He added that this matter had been considered previously by the Federal Council and therefore might require further consideration by it. I replied that I had merely made the information I had given him available to the Swiss Government and that my approach was not made in order to obtain a reply. My Government merely did not wish to proceed with these hearings without the knowledge of the Swiss Government. Mr. Micheli indicated that he understood completely that what I had said had been purely for information but he left the impression that the Swiss misgivings are so great that we might hear more on the subject. He inquired what would happen to an American citizen employed by a United Nations agency abroad who elected not to appear at a hearing, whether he would lose his American passport, his citizenship, whether he would be dismissed from his position, et cetera. I explained that I was not in a position to answer all his questions in detail but that in the case of an American citizen who was a member of the Communist Party or where we had evidence that he was working against the interests of the United States we did not grant him a passport, or if he already had a passport and was abroad we did not renew it when it expired. Mr. Micheli also wished to know how recently the persons we wished to interrogate had been employed by the United Nations agencies and here again I was unable to supply the information he desired. It would be helpful if the Embassy could know whether the procedures now in use make it possible for the United Nations agencies in Geneva to continue to hire Americans before they receive a clearance and who may therefore later be requested to appear before a board, presumably in Switzerland.

There was no doubt from the tenor of Mr. Micheli's conversation that the holding of these investigations in Switzerland is a cause of concern to the Swiss. Even if nothing more is heard from the Political Department the silence could scarcely be construed as "approval" of these hearings. The most we can hope for from the Swiss Government, provided there is no adverse publicity in connection with the fact that the investigations are conducted in Switzerland, is reluctant forbearance from requesting that these hearings not be held.

BERN, June 19, 1954—6 p.m.

1126. For Secretary. Before receiving your telegram 1687, June 17 I had taken every effort to prepare way for holding Gerety Board hearings Geneva on basis of Department airgram June 1. Swiss Government continues to be reluctant to have such hearings held in Switzerland. In June 14 conversation on subject at Federal Political Department was told Swiss could not approve of hearings for two reasons: first, because objected to precedent established if they allowed one country to conduct such hearings in Switzerland, and second because they regard conducting of such hearing as coming too close to infringement of Swiss sovereignty.

In absence of positive approval which Swiss are not prepared to give, least we can hope for is reluctant forbearance from request by Swiss that hearings be not held in Switzerland.

I explained I was not requesting approval but merely informing Swiss Government about proposed hearings as we did not want to proceed without its knowledge.

I see no prospect of obtaining more favorable response from Swiss whereas if hearings are held discreetly and there is no publicity (which we of course cannot control) we may escape without a protest.

BERN, July 2, 1954.

11. Reference: Embtel No. 2 of July 1, 1954.<sup>1</sup> Subject: Hearings by Gerety Board in Switzerland.

As reported in my telegram No. 2 of July 1, 1954 Federal councillor Petitpierre, head of the Federal Political Department, requested me to call on June 30. There is given below a fuller account of our conversation on the subject of the hearings by the Gerety Board than it was considered necessary to give in my telegram.

Mr. Petitpierre opened the conversation by stating that as soon as it was reported in the Swiss press that the Gerety Board was coming to Switzerland, it could not be ignored as the fact became public knowledge. He had no choice but to bring the matter to the attention of the Federal Council. It had considered the matter and was opposed to having the Board hold hearings on Swiss territory on the ground that 1) the functioning of this Board on Swiss territory would constitute an infringement of Swiss sovereignty; 2) these hearings contravene in a sense agreements between the Swiss Government and United Nations organizations which have their seat in Switzerland, and 3) they would establish an undesirable precedent. Mr. Petitpierre elaborated that Switzerland could not tolerate having Russia, for example, send a commission to investigate anti-Communist opinions of UN employees. He also remarked that in a sense the function of this commission was judicial as well as administrative. He added that the same objections would not apply if an American citizen were discreetly requested to call to see an American official of the Embassy or Consulate General regularly stationed in Switzerland. He referred to the possibility of having the American employees of UN agencies in Geneva appear in Rome or Paris for their hearing before the Board. He said he mentioned this simply because our relations with France and Italy were on a somewhat different basis from our relations with Switzerland. He summarized by saying that both on juridical and political grounds the Swiss objected to having the Commission sit in Switzerland.

Mr. Petitpierre stated he was giving me no written statement as he preferred merely to request me to make clear to my Government the views of the Swiss Government. He added that no démarche was being made through the Swiss Legation in Washington as he believed that these oral representations would suffice.

I repeated the points about the voluntary aspect of the hearings, the reasons for holding them, et cetera. He replied that he did not take exception to "legitimacy" of the commission and added that the Swiss themselves had recognized the need for security procedures and had in fact established some of their own.

In the light of Mr. Petitpierre's statement indicating that the Swiss Government is opposed to having the Gerety Board conduct hearings in Switzerland, it was suggested in my telegram No. 2 that instructions should be sent to the Consulate General in Geneva to suspend preparations for the hearings there.

In the Department's CA-6991 of June 1, 1954,<sup>2</sup> it was pointed out that "distance makes it impractical for such individuals in Europe to appear before the Board in the United States and consequently the Board is proceeding to Paris, Rome and Geneva". In view of the shortness of the distance between Geneva and Paris, the most practical solution might well be to have the Americans employed by the United Nations agencies in Geneva invited to appear before the Board in Paris. As there are at least five persons connected with the Board who would have to have their round-trip expenses paid from Paris with per diem for the entire period the Board would sit there, it would cost very little more to have the Americans who are to be interrogated make the trip to Paris at Government expense.

In view of the firmness of Mr. Petitpierre's statement, there is no doubt that we should seek to make alternate arrangements for the hearings of the American employees of United Nations agencies in Geneva.

72. International Court by 9 votes to 3, Judges Alvarez, Hackworth and Levi Carneiro dissenting, has decided that General Assembly does not have right on any grounds refuse give effect award of compensation made by UN Administrative Tribunal. Court's opinion makes following points:

Administrative Tribunal was established by General Assembly as judicial body competent to pronounce final judgement without appeal. It is not advisory organ or mere subordinate committee of General Assembly. As judicial body, Tribunal's judgement binding on parties to dispute, and parties are UN and staff member concerned. UN legally bound carry out judgement and pay compensation awarded. In order that judgement Tribunal itself, it would be necessary, in opinion of Court, that statute of Tribunal contain express provision to that effect. In absence such provision in present statute, no legal grounds upon which General Assembly can review judgements already pronounced by Tribunal. Court further declared that General Assembly competent under Charter to establish Tribunal empowered to render judgments binding on UN, and specifically on General Assembly. Budgetary powers General Assembly under Charter does not mean that General Assembly has absolute power to approve or disapprove expenditures proposed to it since some part of expenditures arises out of obligations already incurred by UN, and to this extent, General Assembly has no alternative but to honor these engagements. Tribunal awards constitute such obligations. Finally Court rejected 1946 League of Nations precedent contending that there is complete lack of identity between two situations.

CONFIDENTIAL NIACT

GENEVA, July 16, 1954—4 p.m.

65. Your 41, July 14, and 44, 47 and 48 all July 15 carefully noted.<sup>2</sup> Gerety Board. My visit Gerety in Paris most useful. I accepted letters of invitation which he handed me for persons involved in international organizations at Geneva and said that I would not deliver such letter until I had received specific instructions do so from Department. Gerety and his fellow-members heartily agreed to this and were most cooperative. Having received today Department's telegram 47 mentioned above I promptly called on Pelt Director European UN Office and told him about letters of invitation which I am to deliver to certain persons in organizations under his jurisdiction here. I carefully explained nature these letters, their non-compulsory aspects etc. Pelt agreed have persons concerned call at my office to receive these letters from me this afternoon. He expressed much appreciation my having informed him of matter before I approached his subordinates or any other UN organization here. I thereafter called on Dorolle Acting Director General WHO (Director General absent on leave) and went through same procedure. Dorolle too was most appreciative and agreed have persons concerned in his organization call on me this afternoon to receive letters of invitations. I then called on Morse Director General ILO and again went through same procedure. Morse also most appreciative and agreed have persons concerned in his organization call on me this afternoon for same purpose. Am now awaiting receive all these persons. Will report developments.

For Department's information only. Pelt very pleased I had not intended deliver letters on premises UN because in his opinion this might have given rise legalistic questions and made it necessary for him temporarily waive diplomatic immunity enjoyed by UN premises lest someone might construe these letters as being legal summons. I told him how very much I appreciated his fine cooperation and thanked him for agreeing inform persons concerned call at my office receive letters.

<sup>2</sup> None printed; all dealt with the Gerety hearings in Europe. No. 41 (sent to Paris as 183) informed Mr. Gerety at Paris that the Department of State had approved holding the Board hearings in the French capital rather than at Geneva. This telegram also indicated approval of "proposed arrangement send 'liaison officers' from Geneva to Paris for purpose briefing and subsequent arrangements movements of individuals concerned from Geneva to Paris." Telegram 44 ordered Mr. Gowen to Paris to report to Mr. Gerety, while telegram 47 informed Mr. Gowen that the Department of State believed it was entirely proper for Mr. Gowen to transmit letters of notification to concerned individuals regarding the Gerety Board hearings without informing the Swiss Government. Telegram 48 simply authorized the Consulate General at Geneva to issue travel orders for the individuals travelling to Paris to appear before the Gerety Board. All the above telegrams are in file 315.3.

Believe this point should not be publicized lest press give it undue importance and publicity. Following also for Department's information only: Gerety telephoned me from Paris last night and again this morning saying he is under great pressure from press in Paris and feels he should tell press just what I am doing in this matter. These phone calls from him received prior my approach to Pelt, Dorolle and Morse. I told Gerety in my opinion it would be well for him consider not mentioning my name to press or otherwise saying anything that might well encourage otherwise avoidable publicity. I also told him that in case I received press inquiries about this I shall confine myself to saying no comment. Subject Department's approval am inclined believe such action on my part justified considering that Department's instructions to me this matter are confidential and I may not properly disclose them to press or otherwise violate their confidentiality. This, of course, quite apart from very delicate nature this matter. Perhaps Department may wish consider mentioning to Gerety desirability his doing everything consistently possible avoid publicity.<sup>3</sup>

WASHINGTON, July 16, 1954.

DEAR MR. AMBASSADOR: The Internal Security Sub-committee of the Senate is interested in the recent findings of the International Court of Justice, which upheld damage awards to the American employees of the UN staff, who had been dismissed by the Secretary-General because they refused to answer the Committee's questions about their Communist affiliations on the ground of self-incrimination.

Our Sub-committee, pursuing the duty assigned it by Congress, to investigate subversive activities by American citizens, made a thorough inquiry into the Communist connections of Americans on the UN staff. You were kind enough to appear at this inquiry, and testify about the problems involved.

Our Sub-committee found that certain American members of the UN Secretariat had close links with the Communist apparatus, directed from Moscow. They had, in many instances, been placed in their positions in the UN as part of the interlocking subversion between government departments, private agencies, members of the UN Secretariat and the Communist apparatus—obviously for no good purpose. When asked about these links, the UN employees invoked the Fifth Amendment and refused to answer questions because the answer might incriminate them.

Secretary-General Trygve Lie held that refusal to answer questions on such grounds was conduct unbecoming to international civil servants and dismissed the employees involved. This position is similar to that taken by our national government and various state governments, which dismiss civil servants who have need to invoke the Fifth Amendment.

The employees appealed to the UN Administrative Tribunal, which reversed the Secretary-General in eleven cases, and ordered reinstatement, payment of awards for damages, or both, to American employees of UN who would not state that they were not Communists.

As you know, the indignation among our people was wide-spread. For one thing, approximately one-third of such payments must come from funds voted by Congress and paid by American tax-payers. Even more important, the privileges and immunities we have given to UN employees, if abused, constitute a highly dangerous and well-protected opportunity to undermine our nation's security.

Our Sub-committee found, in its report of March 22, 1954, that a Communist Fifth Column exists within the UN staff, and that Soviet agents use UN privileges as a cover for espionage and subversion.

This concerns all non-Communist nations, though our concern is greater because most of this activity occurs within our borders. The question now is whether the UN Assembly will adjust its personnel policies to conform to the stated UN principle that staff members are not to engage in political activities hostile to member states.

The position of counsel for the dismissed employees was, in general, that Communist activities were not political acts but private beliefs. This flies in the face of all the evidence that membership in the Communist apparatus imposes the obligation of continuous political activity favorable to the Soviet Union and dangerous to the existence of the United States and other non-Communist states.

The UN Administrative Tribunal upheld the position of the lawyers for the dismissed employees, against the position of the Secretary-General. It ruled that the employees had been damaged, not by their connections with Communism or subversion, but by being asked to tell of their activities openly.

The International Court has upheld the curious position of the Administrative Tribunal. The situation now is that the position of the American government, the UN Assembly and the UN Secretary-General, has been reversed by a UN administrative agency concerned with employee grievances, and that this board, heavily biased in favor of the Soviet position, has been upheld by the International Court.

It may be too late to stop such shocking awards in the case of past services, but the United States Congress must make certain that no such awards to secret pro-Communists shall be paid again. It must also have assurance that the UN staff is truly non-political, and does not harbor an unrecognized outpost of the Cominform, working against the interests of our country and all other free nations.

The Senate has voted, but the House has not yet approved, S. 3, which will prevent employment of Americans in the UN Secretariat who cannot get clearance that they have not engaged in subversive activities. Passage of this bill should remove from the UN Secretariat Americans who have served the Fifth Column. Perhaps the representatives of other non-Communist nations will wish to cooperate in efforts to remove all members of the Soviet Fifth Column, claiming to be loyal citizens of any non-Communist nations.

The responsibility falls on the UN Assembly to make clear its position on the obligations of UN civil servants, and to insure that its stated commitments will be carried out by all parts of the UN establishment.

I hope you will be able to press for a final decision by the Assembly on whether employees may remain on the staff of the UN, if they are secret Communists, working for the ends of the Soviet Union, while asking to be accepted as loyal citizens of non-Communist states.

I trust you will urge the UN Assembly to reexamine the UN Administrative Tribunal, and decide how its policies may be brought into line with UN's stated objectives.

The UN Assembly should make its policies on this critical issue of the integrity of its staff clear beyond the shadow of a doubt.

If the UN Assembly is unable to impose its stated policies on its staff members, and the UN staff can be used as a beachhead for the advance of Communist power, then Congress should know the facts. It can then reexamine its legal ties with, and its financial contribution to, an agency whose staff includes secret collaborators with the Soviet attack on free nations.<sup>2</sup>

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM E. JENNER

Position Paper Prepared in the Department of State for the United States Delegation to the Ninth Regular Session of the General Assembly

LIMITED OFFICIAL USE

[WASHINGTON,] September 9, 1954.

ADMINISTRATIVE TRIBUNAL AWARDS: ADVISORY OPINION OF THE INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE

THE PROBLEM

The Eighth General Assembly considered the issues presented by the award of nearly $180,000 damages by the U.N. Administrative Tribunal to eleven U.N. employees of U.S. nationality whom the Tribunal held had been illegally dismissed by the Secretary-General because they invoked the Fifth Amendment and refused to answer questions relating to subversive activities. While the United States Delegation vigorously opposed payment of these awards, the majority of members were not certain that the Assembly had the legal right to refuse to give effect to these awards. As a consequence, it was decided by a vote of 41-6-13 (U.S.) to refer the question to the International Court of Justice for an advisory opinion, and to postpone action on the awards until the Court's opinion was available to be considered by the Assembly. The U.S. presented its views both in written and oral statements to the Court. The Court issued in July a 9-3 advisory opinion which holds that, as the Statute of the Tribunal is now drawn, the General Assembly has no right on any grounds to refuse to give effect to the awards of the Tribunal.<sup>1</sup> This opinion together with a request for the appropriation of funds to pay the awards will be considered by the Ninth Session.

UNITED STATES POSITION

1. As to the Opinion of the Court:

(a) Since the Court's opinion places the Tribunal in an all-powerful position vis-à-vis the Secretary-General and the Assembly, [its consequences for the future are likely to be such that] it is deemed essential to the interests of the U.S., the U.N. and the Tribunal to seek to amend the Statute of the Tribunal.

(b) The United States Delegation should therefore seek to obtain amendments to the Statute of the Tribunal that will adequately limit the discretion of the Tribunal. Four tentative proposed amendments are set out in Annex 1. It is recognized that while the U.S. prefers a full power of review in the General Assembly, (see Amendment 4, Alternative A), there is serious question as to whether our amendment to this effect could obtain majority support. If advance negotiation indicates this to be the case, the U.S. Delegation should seek to obtain, as a minimum guarantee, amendments along the lines of [those set out in the second alternative.] 1, 2, 3 and 4, Alternative B.

<sup>1</sup> This was the answer to the first question put to the Court by the General Assembly. As the first question was answered in the negative it was not incumbent upon the Court to answer the second question. The advisory opinion was rendered on July 13, 1954 (UN Doc. A/2701).

2. As to the Awards:

(a) Before action is taken on the Tribunal awards, the United States Delegation should seek to have a special fund established for payment of these and future Tribunal awards, this fund to be financed by profits from one or more of the commercial enterprises operated by the United Nations.

(b) The United States position on the issue of the actual payment of the awards should be to state our continued opposition to the awards and our disagreement with the Court opinion, but to indicate that the United States would not wish to take a position on the awards that might be interpreted as a departure from the historic United States tradition of respect for judicial opinions. Assuming that the objectives in section 1 and paragraph (a) above are accomplished the United States Delegation may, in line with the considerations just mentioned, abstain when the vote is taken on the payment of the awards. If the objectives in section 1 and/or paragraph (a) are not achieved, the Department should be advised and consulted as to U.S. position on the vote on the awards.

3. As to Procedure:

The United States Delegation should seek to have the question of payment of the awards separated from and considered subsequently to the broader constitutional and legal issues raised by the Court's opinion and need for amendment of the Tribunal Statute.

COMMENT

The issues involved in this item have a long and complicated history. What is to be decided at the Ninth Session is the disposition of the particular cases which have been adjudicated under the processes provided to date by the General Assembly and whether changes should be made in the adjudication process, as the result of the Court's opinion, in order to safeguard, for the future, the powers of the Secretary-General and the General Assembly.

The International Court of Justice opinion, by holding that the Assembly has no right of review, will mean that the debate this year will not be directed toward the merit or lack of merit in the individual awards. Instead, attention will be focused on the legal powers of the General Assembly with respect to the Administrative Tribunal. On this issue the Court's interpretation of the Tribunal Statute so far fails to meet the need for some lawful control upon the Tribunal that amendment of the Statute appears to be essential to the future interest of the United States and the United Nations.

In view of the character of the Court's opinion regarding the present legal powers of the Assembly vis-à-vis the Administrative Tribunal, failure to approve the awards on the controversial eleven cases would constitute repudiation of the advisory opinion of the Court. Such a repudiation would constitute a bad precedent for the United States, which strongly relies upon the lawful processes of international adjudication. Moreover, for the U.S. to take a position which would support such repudiation would be contrary to the principle of respect for judicial opinions, a principle for which the U.S. has stood strongly and for which it has been a protagonist for a long time.

The legislative history in connection with the attached concurrent resolution of Congress dealing with the subject of these awards (Annex 2)<sup>2</sup> appears to indicate that the major Congressional objections can be met if no part of the payments for these awards is charged to the U.S. taxpayer and if measures are taken which will assure that U.S. interests on matters of this sort are better served in the future.

The above recommendations are designed to meet these varying considerations in a manner which will best serve overall U.S. interests.

Annex 1

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO THE STATUTE OF THE ADMINISTRATIVE TRIBUNAL<sup>3</sup>

The following four proposed amendments to the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal are illustrative only. Final texts for use in negotiation with other Delegations have not been settled upon or cleared.

AMENDMENTS 1 AND 2

Two amendments, one to Article 2(1) and the other to Article 2(4) are intended to make express the proposition that competence is ex-

<sup>3</sup> The Administrative Tribunal was established by the General Assembly at its Fourth Regular Session (Part I) in Resolution 351 (IV), Nov. 24, 1949 (Part A—the Statute of the Tribunal), and Dec. 9, 1949 (Part B—enumeration of the appointed members of the Tribunal). For text of the Statute, consisting of 12 articles, see United Nations, Official Records of the Fourth Regular Session of the General Assembly, Resolutions, 20 September–10 December 1949 [Part I of the Two Part Session], pp. 49–51.

On March 12, 1954 the Secretary-General submitted an exhaustive brief to the International Court of Justice, "Awards of Compensation Made by the United Nations Administrative Tribunal (Written Statement by the Secretary-General of the United Nations)". This comprised three parts, Part III of which consisted of a 28-page survey of the legislative history of the establishment of the UN Administrative Tribunal. (IO files, Doc. UN/UND/315, undated)

cluded when decisions of the General Assembly are not followed or where the Tribunal invades the discretion of the Secretary-General:

Amend Article 2(1) to read as follows:

“Subject to the decisions of the General Assembly, including the Staff Regulations and the terms of the present Statute, the Tribunal shall be competent to hear and pass judgment upon applications alleging non-observance of contracts of employment of staff members of the Secretariat of the United Nations or of the terms of appointment of such staff members. The words ‘contracts’ and ‘terms of appointment’ include all pertinent regulations and rules in force at the time of alleged non-observance, including the staff pension regulations.”

Amend Article 2(4) to read:

AMENDMENT 3

A third amendment to Article 9(1) is designed to make firm the limit of two years base pay for awards of compensation.

The final two sentences of Article 9(1) should be amended to read:

*“If, in its opinion, special circumstances so warrant, the Tribunal may recommend to the General Assembly an additional ex ratia payment.”*

AMENDMENT 4

Finally, an amendment is proposed to provide for review of Tribunal decisions. One alternative—the preferred course—is to vest a full power of review in the General Assembly. This could be accomplished by an amendment of Article 10(2) along the following lines:

Alternative A:

Amend Article 10(2) to read:

“(2) The judgments shall be final and without appeal; provided, however, that they may be reviewed by the General Assembly on the motion of any Member Government supported by one-third of all the Members [or on the written request of any Member Government signed by the representatives of one-third of all the Members]. On such review, the judgments may be set aside, returned to the Tribunal for reconsideration, or approved by the General Assembly.”

Another alternative, which would have the advantage of analogous precedent in the case of the International Labor Organization Tribunal, would be to permit review by the International Court of Justice should the Tribunal exceed its competence or err fundamentally in procedure:

Alternative B:

Amend Article 10(2) as follows:

“(2) Judgments shall be final and without appeal, except that the General Assembly, upon initiative of a Member, or on the recommendation of the Secretary-General, may request an advisory opinion from the International Court of Justice relating to the jurisdiction or competence of the Tribunal, or the occurrence of a fundamental fault in procedure. Notice by or to the Secretary-General of his or a member’s intent to propose reference to the International Court of Justice must be given within 60 days of date of judgment, and the judgment will be suspended, pending action by the General Assembly.”

A very considerable range of possible solutions lies between these two alternatives for Amendment Four.

III. Amend Article 2(1) to read as follows:

“Subject to the decisions of the GA, including the staff regulations and the terms of the present Statute, the Tribunal shall be competent to hear and pass judgment upon applications alleging non-observance of contracts of employment of such staff members. The words ‘contracts’ and ‘terms of appointment’ include all pertinent regulations and rules in force at the time of alleged non-observance, including the staff pension regulations.”

IV. Amend Article 2(4) to read:

“The Tribunal shall not be competent, however, to deal with any applications where the cause of complaint arose prior to 1 January 1950, nor shall it be competent to substitute its judgment in areas reserved for the discretion of the SYG.”

V. Amend Article 9(1) to read:

“If the Tribunal finds that the application is well founded, it shall order the rescinding of the decision contested or the specific performance of the obligation invoked. At the same time the Tribunal shall fix the amount of compensation to be paid to the applicant for the injury sustained should the SYG, within thirty days of the notification of the judgment, decide, in the interest of the UN, that the applicant shall be compensated without further action being taken in his case; provided that such compensation shall not exceed the equivalent of two years’ net base salary of the applicant. If, in its opinion, special circumstances so warrant, the Tribunal may recommend to the GA an additional ex gratia payment.”

Editorial Note

The legislative history of the Administrative Tribunal item at the Ninth Regular Session of the General Assembly is documented in detail in United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, Ninth Session, Annexes, agenda item 48. The United States was successful in winning majority support for its position in the plenary meeting of the General Assembly on December 17, after experiencing a series of reverses in the Fifth Committee, December 3-9. The General Assembly in response to the urging of the United States and others accepted in principle judicial review of future judgments of the Administrative Tribunal; and appointed a special committee composed of 18 members (including the United States) to study the question of the establishment of a review procedure. This committee was to report to the General Assembly at its Tenth Session. For the official text of Resolution 888 (IX), "Awards of compensation made by the United Nations Administrative Tribunal; advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice", see United Nations, Official Records of the General Assembly, Ninth Session, Resolutions, pages 43 and 44. (Informative unprinted documentation is included in the minutes of meetings of the United States Delegation to the Ninth Regular Session of the General Assembly (IO files, lot 71 D 440)).

The documents that follow are illustrative of the United States diplomatic effort after December 9 in securing a reversal in the General Assembly of the earlier adverse (in the United States view) action of the Fifth Committee.

If principle accepted now GA expected during Tenth Session take action safeguard its powers and those SYG and prevent future ill advised opinions such as Tribunal gave when awarding $180,000 damages eleven UN employees U.S. nationality dismissed by SYG for invoking Fifth Amendment and refusing answer questions re subversive activities.

Doubt U.S. proposed amendment will carry however without special appeal at seat certain Governments not fully determined support Belgian view.

5. As situation stands, failure obtain approval acceptance in principle item means awards will be paid leaving U.S. with no assurance Tribunal Statute will be amended. Department seriously concerned consequences such failure. 302. 1. Ref Circular 301, important point out to governments proposed amendment in plenary by US with UK and other co-sponsors does not involve deletion of Belgian amendment from resolution. This point is in correction of first sentence paragraph four reference telegram. Instead, US amendment adds crucial language that GA "accepts the principle of judicial review of judgments of the UN Administrative Tribunal". Other relatively minor changes conform balance text to language ICJ majority opinion that is "judicial review" instead "appeal". Judicial review clearly conforms ICJ opinion, permits use advisory opinion procedure and expressly limits review to judicial process. "Appeal" might not be judicial and can be understood as excluding possibility using ICJ advisory opinion procedures.

2. Dels which supported Belgian amendment can support US amendment without any reversal or inconsistency since

(1) no stay of judgments involved US amendment. Opposition to stay was only substantial objection of most who supported Belgian amendment.

(2) Additional time to consider and consult governments has elapsed. Time factor was other substantial consideration for support of Belgian amendment since none supporters actually prepared oppose principle of judicial review.

Point out to Govts that US-UK etc. amendment offers them chance achieving substantial unanimity in plenary.

3. Believe basis latest conversations in New York that if governments clearly understand foregoing and instruct accordingly, most dels will be anxious accept this final US compromise and vote for US amendment in plenary.

Memorandum Prepared in the Bureau of United Nations Affairs and Circulated to the United Nations Advisers of the Geographic Bureaus<sup>2</sup>

[WASHINGTON, June 10, 1952.]

A. In discussions with the Canadians of Pearson's candidacy we should take the following line:

1. As Canada must know, we believe Pearson would be an exceptionally able President, we strongly hope that he will be elected, and we expect to vote for him. However, it is our opinion that his candidacy will, in the circumstances, be most effective if carried on for the time being without the announced backing of the U.S. The reason for this is that the Seventh Session will be concerned with colonial questions and that the Asian-Africa group might oppose Pearson's candidacy if it appeared to be a NATO-sponsored one. For the present, therefore, we wish to be able to say to others, when asked, that we are maintaining our usual policy on such matters and have not committed ourselves so far in advance of the session, and thus would wish to refrain from a formal commitment for the time being.

2. In our view it is important that the election of Pearson be by a large majority, including substantial support from the various areas represented in the United Nations. We therefore hope that the Canadians will make an active effort to secure wide support from other areas, including Asia, Africa and Latin America.

<sup>2</sup> This memorandum incorporated the results of a meeting on June 5 between the Director of the Office of UN Political and Security Affairs (Wainhouse), with staff, and the Assistant Secretary of State for UN Affairs (Hickerson), and the Deputy Assistant Secretary (Sandifer). It was drafted by Paul B. Taylor, Officer in Charge, General Assembly Affairs, and Paul W. Jones, both of the Office of UN Political and Security Affairs. After receiving the approval of Hickerson and Sandifer as drafted, the memorandum on June 10 was circulated to "the Membership Team", the group of officers from the geographic bureaus who met regularly with officers of the Bureau of UN Affairs for the determination of U.S. policy with regard to UN affairs at the working level. At this time the UN Advisers were: George N. Monsma, Bureau of Inter-American Affairs; Ward P. Allen, Bureau of European Affairs; Harry N. Howard, Bureau of Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs; and Ruth Bacon, Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs.

3. We wish to be helpful to Pearson's candidacy and will be glad to consult concerning the time at which it may be desirable to move from the above position to some other.

B. If asked by other governments concerning Pearson's candidacy we should state that we believe that Pearson would be an exceptionally able President but that it is our usual policy on such matters not to commit ourselves so far in advance.

Memorandum of Conversations, by the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson)

[WASHINGTON,] June 30, 1952.

Subject: A Summary of Three Conversations (June 17, 25, 27) Between Mr. Hickerson and Ambassador Wrong in Regard to Pearson's Candidacy for Presidency of the Seventh Session of the General Assembly.

Ambassador Wrong came in to see me at his request on the afternoon of June 17. He said that he was leaving early the next morning for Ottawa and that Mr. Pearson had indicated that he wished to talk with him about our attitude concerning Pearson's candidacy for the Presidency of the Seventh General Assembly. I asked Mr. Wrong if that meant that Pearson definitely was a candidate, adding that we understood his position was that he was available. Mr. Wrong laughingly replied that Mr. Pearson was not waiting for a draft but was a candidate although he had been reluctant to allow the Canadian Foreign Service to push his candidacy as actively as they wish to.

I told Mr. Wrong that the question of whether or not Mr. Pearson is to be a candidate is one for him and the Canadian Government, but that my frank advice would be that if he is a candidate he should not be at all coy but should authorize Canadian officers to seek support for his candidacy. Mr. Wrong said that on his own responsibility he had already informed me that Pearson was a candidate and would like our support. He said that he understood our reluctance to commit ourselves this far in advance but that Mr. Pearson really wished to know if he could count on our vote if he is a candidate.

I told Mr. Wrong that if Pearson actively campaigns for the Presidency we will vote for him. I said, however, that in my judgment it would be a mistake for us to make a formal commitment at this time or to allow the fact that we intend to vote for Pearson to become known at this time. I explained that the reason for this is that the Seventh General Assembly may well be concerned extensively with colonial questions and that the Asian-African group might oppose Pearson's candidacy if it appeared to be a NATO-sponsored one. I said that it therefore seemed to me that if Mr. Pearson wishes to be elected by the large majority which we would wish him to receive the Canadians should make an active effort to secure wide support from other areas, including Asia, Africa, and Latin America, without giving any indication of the attitude of the United States toward his candidacy. Mr. Wrong said that he thought this would be a wise course and that he would recommend to Mr. Pearson that it be followed.

I told Mr. Wrong that if we are approached by other countries about our attitude in regard to Mr. Pearson's candidacy we intended to say that we think highly of him and feel that he would make an able President but that we normally do not commit ourselves definitely so far in advance of the opening of the Session. I said that the one exception to this would be that if we were approached by a country stating that they were thinking of unveiling a candidate and would like our support; in that event I said I would be disposed to reply that we intended to vote for Mr. Pearson to head off the development of a situation similar to the one which developed in the Fifth General Assembly in 1950.

After the Canadians have built up the sort of support for Mr. Pearson's candidacy referred to above, I said we would be glad to confer with them about the timing of a revelation that we will vote for Pearson. I added that I hoped Mr. Pearson would understand that all of these things I mentioned were honestly designed to help him and did not mean that we had any doubt or hesitation about voting for him when the time comes.

On June 25 Mr. Wrong came in to see me after his return from Ottawa. He said that he had conveyed to Mr. Pearson in some detail what I said and that Mr. Pearson expressed his deep appreciation of our attitude. Mr. Pearson agrees that it would be desirable for us not to make a formal commitment at this time and that steps should be taken to gain support for his candidacy, especially in Latin America and among the Asian-African group. Mr. Pearson expressed his deep appreciation of the assurance that the United States will vote for him if he is a candidate at the time of the election, which he fully expects to be.

On June 27 Mr. Wrong came in to see me on another matter and again adverted to this subject. He said that although Mr. Pearson regards himself as an active candidate for the Presidency, he is not moving as rapidly as, in Mr. Wrong's opinion, is desirable to authorize Canadian representatives abroad to solicit support for him. I told Mr. Wrong that I made my views on this clear in our earlier conversations and that I could only repeat that I felt that if Mr. Pearson wishes to be President of the Seventh General Assembly Canadian representatives should get on the job immediately and round up support for him. I said that the United States will vote for Mr. Pearson if he is a candidate at the time of the election but that the Canadian Government will have to run the campaign and that we do not intend to do any lobbying in Mr. Pearson's behalf. I said that I am sure that Canadian representatives can adequately handle this end of the business.

CONFIDENTIAL

[WASHINGTON,] August 8, 1952.

Subject: Mr. Pearson's Candidacy for President of GA

Participants: Mr. George Ignatieff, Counselor, Canadian Embassy
Miss Marion MacPherson, Third Secretary, Canadian Embassy
Mr. Paul B. Taylor, UNP
Mr. Ward P. Allen, EUR

In response to our inquiry as to the status of Mr. Pearson's candidacy, Mr. Ignatieff advised that according to reports in late July, 26 favorable replies had been received to Canada's request for support. Of these, ten are regarded as definite, formal commitments including Chile (significant because of rumors of Santa Cruz' candidacy) and Thailand (further indication that Prince Wan is not interested). From the Arab-Asian countries, Turkey, the Philippines and Israel are formally committed. The Indian High Commissioner in Ottawa (or the Indian UN Del, it was not clear which) is recommending that India not only support Mr. Pearson but campaign for him. In addition, high level approaches have just been made to India and Pakistan through the Canadian High Commissioners. Iraq, Egypt and Lebanon have made generally favorable initial replies. Among the Latin Americans, Brazil as well as Chile is definitely committed and Ambassador Muniz reported to the Canadian UN Delegation that his canvass of the Latin American Delegations brought an enthusiastic response. Brazil intends to undertake an active campaign in Pearson's behalf, according to Muniz.

We recalled that, as Mr. Hickerson had explained to Ambassador Wrong last month, we have taken the position when asked that in our view Mr. Pearson would be an excellent choice, but we have avoided stating that any formal commitment has been made. Mr. Ignatieff seemed to believe that a continuation of this position would be satisfactory but stated he intended to seek Mr. Pearson's view as to whether a more positive indication of US support would be necessary or helpful at this time. He promised to keep us advised of the progress of the campaign.

CONFIDENTIAL

WASHINGTON, August 22, 1952—2:05 p. m.

Subject: Seventh Regular Session of the UN General Assembly

1. The next (seventh) regular session of the GA will convene in New York on October 14. Attached, for your background, is the provisional agenda for the session. We would, as in previous years, appreciate any information you may receive regarding any new agenda items which the government to which you are accredited is likely to propose. However, we wish to avoid giving any impression that we wish to stimulate the introduction of new items. In fact, in view of the size of the present agenda, the importance and urgency of a number of items, and the lateness of the session, we would be inclined to discourage the introduction of additional new items not strictly of an important and urgent character.

2. Advance Diplomatic Consultations

For your information, we are planning, even more extensively than in previous years, to consult other friendly governments in advance of the Assembly concerning the session as a whole and concerning certain significant agenda items. In respect of both, consultations will be held on the basis of our tentative views in order that we may be able to take the views of other governments into account, insofar as possible, in the formulation of our final positions. We will, therefore, between now and the convening of the GA, send several communications setting forth our tentative positions on a number of issues which you will be asked to discuss with the Foreign Office. We will parallel your approaches with consultations here in Washington with various diplomatic representatives and/or, through USUN, with members of the permanent UN delegations in New York.

There are indicated below the Department's tentative positions on a number of items. You are requested, in your discretion, to outline these views to the Foreign Office and to report its reactions as soon as possible. As indicated above, you should indicate that these positions are tentative and that we will wish to take into account insofar as possible the views of other friendly governments in determining our final positions. (Detailed background information on most of the issues you will be asked to discuss may be found in the President's Annual Reports to Congress on US Participation in the UN for 1951 and previous years.)

(a) President of the GA

So far as we know Pearson (Canadian Minister of External Affairs) is only candidate. Pearson appears to have very broad support and we believe he would be an excellent choice.

(b) Security Council Slate

The United States will support Denmark to replace the Netherlands and Lebanon to replace Turkey and both Denmark and Lebanon have been so informed. The United States will also support a Latin American state to replace Brazil. (FYI, with respect to the Latin American seat, we understand that the Latin American group is generally agreed on Colombia.) (The Assembly will also elect six members of the Economic and Social Council and two members of the Trusteeship Council. The Department has not yet formulated its positions on these slates and our views will be communicated in a subsequent circular.)

[Here follow discussion of seven agenda items and text of United Nations Document A/2158, August 15, 1952, "Provisional Agenda of the Seventh Regular Session of the General Assembly", enumerating 65 agenda items.]

TOP SECRET      PERSONAL      [NEW YORK,] August 25, 1952.

DEAR SANDY: Trygve Lie returned yesterday from his European trip and I had lunch with him today for a personal, very informal discussion with him. I think you will be interested in a full report, and you will notice there were a number of subjects covered which he is most anxious to keep confidential.

4. Slates

Lie assumes Pearson will be President of the Assembly. In this connection, Lie did a little probing on the question of who might succeed him as Secretary General. His opening gambit was the comment, with left eyebrow lifted, that Pearson was his candidate for the next Secretary General. I expressed the view that any discussion at this time of the next Secretary General was really premature because so much would depend upon developments during 1953. However, Lie proceeded, in great confidence, to tell me that he has received an offer from certain unnamed interests to head up a new international project on Technical Assistance, in which he said he was "very, very interested". I have no doubt he will soon start talking more and more openly about this, and I do not think it is unkind to predict that this will be his method of sounding us out on our attitude toward his re-election. I thought it best to "play it straight".

Sincerely yours,

In George's judgment fol 21 countries have given what amounts to firm commitments to support Pearson candidacy: Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, Chile, China, Denmark, France, Greece, India, Israel, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Peru, Thailand, Turkey, South Africa, UK, and US.

In George's judgment fol 11 countries have expressed strong sympathy and "probably" will support Pearson candidacy: Argentina, Cuba, Egypt, Iran, Lebanon, Mexico, Philippines, Sweden, Iceland, Luxembourg, Uruguay.

Canadian Embassy in Washington intends next week to discuss candidacy with Yemen, Iceland, Ethiopia and Luxembourg diplomatic missions.

In addition, Muniz (Brazil) has on volunteer basis consulted with other LA dels in NY and his govt has done same in LA capitals. According to Muniz, there have been 19 "interested and favorable" replies from LA dels and capitals.

George feels that Pearson candidacy is proceeding nicely except in NE countries with whom little work has been done. He takes seriously rumored Soviet-bloc candidacy for presidency 7th GA and has some apprehension lest Soviet-bloc might stand off Pearson and Santa Cruz (Chile) become successful dark horse compromise.

cordially welcomed Pearson's candidacy they thought it was time for a European president. Baron Silvercruys asked what I thought of this.

I replied that it was not only time for a European president of the General Assembly; a European president was overdue. We had done everything we could last year to bring about a European presidency—we had talked to a number of Western European governments (working mainly through the UK); and we had even for some time discouraged other candidacies including those of Latin Americans. I said that now Pearson's candidacy was very well advanced; in fact it would do harm to oppose it at this stage. I said that we had not actually instructed our Embassy to solicit support for Pearson.

Baron Silvercruys then asked whether we would agree to support a European president for next year. I told him we could not make such a commitment, mentioning the fact that we had heard a year ago that Prince Wan (Thailand) is interested in the presidency of the Eighth Session. I said that we had not made any commitment to anyone for next year. I pointed out that the election of a European president for the session immediately following Pearson's presidency would be particularly difficult; that, however, those who wished to work for a European presidency at the Eighth or Ninth Session would do well to begin their work at the preceding Assembly.

At no time did Baron Silvercruys make any mention of who the European candidate might be.

Ambassador Silvercruys came at his request to tell me that he had heard from his foreign office in response to his report of our earlier conversation on the General Assembly presidency. The Belgium Government was thoroughly in accord with the "I like Mike" slogan and would support and vote for Pearson at the coming session. However,

Mr. Van Zeeland felt very strongly that there should be a harmonious distribution of the post among the various regions of the world from year to year and felt very strongly that Europe should have it next year. He hoped that we would support and work for that principle and keep in touch with them on the matter. He had no candidate. Mr. Van Zeeland himself would take this up with the Secretary and with other members of our delegation when he came. At this stage the Belgium Government merely wished to record its views on the principle.

I said I thought I should repeat what I had told the Ambassador at our previous meeting on the subject, first, that we had done everything humanly possible to have a president from Europe last year, and we agreed that it was long overdue; that Prince Wan has indicated interest, and that, in any candidacy of this sort, it would be desirable to work at least a year in advance. I said that, quite frankly, I did not know, this far in advance, what our attitude toward the meeting would be next year. I again mentioned two political difficulties that might arise in connection with a European candidate next year—the fact that it would be following a president from a NATO country this year, and that the colonial question might be a factor with some delegations, depending on the circumstances.

I said that it would be desirable for a specific candidate to present himself.

The Ambassador said that probably the Europeans would wish to try to establish merely the principle that a European should be elected next year, but without any particular candidate making a campaign at this stage.

Delga 160. Verbatim text. Re: SyG Lie's resignation.

Following is text of statement delivered by SyG Lie in plenary this afternoon (UN press release SG/267) :

“Mr. President, distinguished delegates:

“Before you resume the general debate I feel it is my duty to inform you of the text of a letter I handed this morning to the President of the GA. It reads as follows:

‘Dear Mr. Pearson,

‘I wish to refer to our personal and confidential conversation on the 11th of September, in which I informed you that I had decided, after lengthy consideration over many months, to submit my resignation as SyG of the UN.

‘It had been my intention—as I informed you then—to take this step at the opening of the 7th session of the GA. I have delayed until today, when the Foreign Ministers of the five permanent members of the SC are all present for the first time during this session, in the hope that this will facilitate agreement on my successor.

'I shall be grateful if you would propose as a new item on the agenda

'“Appointment of the SyG”.'

“I have also informed the President of the SC, Dr. Tsiang, about my decision.

“I think you all should know that it was last summer, after long talks with my family and a few close friends, that I finally decided. Since then a very few others whom I consulted have tried to persuade me to go on. I thank them for that. But I am quite sure that this is the time to leave without damage to the UN, and that it would be better for the UN if I do so now.

“First of all, I ask you to remember that I wanted to retire in 1950 at the end of my five year term. I agreed to continue only because the aggression in Korea created circumstances that put me under an obligation to carry on.

“Now I feel that situation is somewhat different. The UN has thrown back aggression in Korea. There can be an armistice if the Soviet Union, the Chinese People's Republic and the North Koreans are sincere in their wish to end the fighting.

“If they are sincere, then a new SyG, who is the unanimous choice of the 5 Great Powers, the SC and of the GA, may be more helpful than I can be. On the other hand, if, the world situation should go from bad to worse, at least I would not want the position of SyG to hinder in the slightest degree any hope of reaching a new understanding that would prevent world disaster.

“There are other reasons why it is now more appropriate for me to retire than in 1950. The permanent headquarters buildings have been completed. It is not necessary for me to stay on for the last finishing touches—for the lawns to grow green, and the trees to be planted and the gardens to flower and the murals to be painted.

“The secretariat, also, is better established and organized as one of the principal organs of the UN. It can still be improved, of course, and made more efficient. But the UN now has a good secretariat. I have placed before this session of the Assembly proposals for the reorganization that I believe might contribute to improved administration in the future. I think a new SyG should be elected now, so that he may have time to make his own judgment about these proposals before the next session of the GA acts upon them.

“I know there is a risk that my action today may be misunderstood. Still, I must say as strongly as I can, that my resignation is caused by the reasons just stated and by no other.

“I would like the members to know that I am stepping aside now because I hope this may help the UN to save the peace and to serve better the cause of freedom and progress for all mankind.”

SECRET      PRIORITY      NEW YORK, November 11, 1952—11 a. m.

Delga 162. From Gross. Re Syg's resignation.

At Luns' dinner last night, Gromyko asked me whether we had any suggestions re Lie's successor. I replied that Lie's resignation had come as a surprise to me and I had not yet had an opportunity to obtain the views of the Dept. I commented that the Sov del two years ago had made a number of suggestions and had in fact indicated willingness to consider qualified people from any area. Gromyko replied that "the situation was different".

I said that we should probably consult about the question and Gromyko agreed, I thought rather emphatically. I thought it wise to tell him that I personally doubted we would take an initiative in suggesting consultations (having in mind protection of SC Pres Tsiang, although I of course did not mention this to Gromyko). Gromyko repeated that it would be a good idea to have informal consultations.

this was the case before taking precipitant action on trying to reach agreement on a successor. The Secretary did not believe that it was actually the case that Lie might reconsider his resignation but he felt this tactic would be a useful maneuver at this time. Mr. Eden expressed agreement with the Secretary's view. He also discussed the probability that the Soviets would seek to trouble the waters with suggestions in favor of candidates who are in no way qualified for the job.

Subject: Soviet Bloc Views on SyG Election

Participants: Dr. Manfred Lachs, Polish Delegation
Thomas J. Cory, US Delegation

During Senator Green's reception last night, Dr. Manfred Lachs of the Polish Delegation took the initiative in coming to me to inquire about US views concerning the SYG election. At first I joked with him, saying that I thought Simic of Yugoslavia would be a very good choice and that perhaps Modzelewski of Poland would be popular. It turned out, however, that he was serious and really wanted to talk. I explained that I was unacquainted with any US position on the subject and doubted whether there is one yet but personally believed that, in any event, there is no great hurry.

I then asked for his views. He said he thought Entezam would be a good Secretary General and Padilla Nervo would be an acceptable second choice. He rather dismissed General Romulo, but did not definitely rule him out. He replied negatively to my inquiry whether the Soviet bloc was thinking at all of an Indian as a candidate. I asked him point-blank whether he was making small talk or was under instructions to speak with someone from the US delegation on the subject. He said he was under instructions.

Dr. Lachs continued that the Soviet bloc would see as highly desirable, if not necessary, a private meeting of the Big 4 (excluding China) on the question. He dismissed as unimportant my views that China still has a veto and that Chinese feelings on the subject also should be considered. He argued that China is only a shadow state which will, in any event, fall in line behind the US.

Dr. Lachs added that the Soviet bloc would see US-USSR agreement on a new Secretary General as an important step forward in the reduction of US-USSR tensions. When I pinned him down, he admitted it would be only a very small step forward. Dr. Lachs also spoke with great piety of the high Soviet bloc regard for the UN and the importance it attaches to having at its helm a capable man who is acceptable to the major interested powers.

Saying that since I was without instructions I was speaking only personally, I observed that as I saw Lie's recent action, it was only an intention to resign rather than an actual and irrevocable resignation and that if no agreement is reached as to his successor, I would assume that Lie would return to the Secretary Generalship with a ringing vote of confidence from the General Assembly. This analysis was unpleasant to Dr. Lachs. He said he interpreted Lie's resignation as final and that, in any event, he could see no rousing vote of confidence from the General Assembly. We agreed that on this point our interpretations are for the present irreconcilable.

Dr. Lachs said he believed a large portion of our conversation probably was academic because he understood Mr. Eden had called a meeting yesterday afternoon or evening to discuss the question. Dr. Lachs did not specify who was attending the meeting, and I knew nothing of it.

(I would observe that Dr. Lachs' statements concerning Soviet bloc preferences for Secretary General coincide with Soviet-inspired rumors now circulating around the Delegates' Lounge. These rumors, however, to my knowledge make no mention of big power consultations.

Dr. Lachs' attitude during the conversation indicated that the USSR is strongly opposed to the continuance in office of Lie and that, if properly played by the US, Soviet aversion to Lie may be an important trump card for the US in negotiating an agreement with the USSR on his successor, should that be necessary. I also would observe that Dr. Lachs' insistence on a private Big 4 rather than a Big 5 meeting is probably bluff. Jacob Malik had no objection to sitting down with Dr. Tsiang last August to discuss membership.

In connection with this conversation as well as another we had on Korea (which is being reported separately), Dr. Lachs argued that the USSR has taken a small initiative toward private talks with the US bloc on both subjects and that it is incumbent on the US now to take a larger counterinitiative to meet the USSR and thus contribute toward bringing the two powers together. I argued that I had seen little real Soviet initiative on either question and that the proper thing would be for the USSR to be less coy, to come forward in an honest manner if it has anything it wishes to discuss with the US, and not to depend on the US falling all over itself trying to act on what are after all only the vaguest of hints from the USSR. Because of its bearing on the potentially much more important subject of Korea, I would suggest that the US be very cautious about taking any initiative in setting up private Big 4 or Big 5 talks on the SYG question.

This may turn out to be one subject on which we can let the USSR come to us. Alternatively, Dr. Tsiang—as President of the Security Council—might wish to call for private Big 5 consultations on the question.)

Subject: Secretary General's Election.

Mr. Price, Assistant Secretary General for Administration asked the U.S. Delegation to convey to the State Department and the President his strong recommendation that the U.S. should oppose the election of either a Latin American or Arab national as Secretary General. Price said he was not personally interested as he intended to retire at the end of 1953, and that the New Secretary General would have his resignation immediately. Price said it was no secret that he had experienced great difficulties with Mr. Lie on administrative questions. These difficulties would seem very small in comparison to those which would arise if the Secretary General were a Latin American or Middle Easterner. Price said the spoils system would be rampant and the financial system would be destroyed if Latin or Middle Eastern governmental ideas gained control. He said if the United States had any doubts on this it needed only to look at UNESCO.

Price said he thought Mr. Lie's resignation had put the Western powers in the drivers seat vis-à-vis the Russians and that they should use their position. In his opinion the USSR would be willing to agree to almost anyone to avoid the continuation of Mr. Lie on an acting basis. He asked that we urge care and caution in selecting a candidate.

Price reported that the French are actively pushing Picot for Acting Secretary General. He said Ganem (France) had approached him to determine if he would object to serving under Picot. Price told Ganem he would have no objection and that he thought Picot was an able man.

Bajpai made it clear that Nehru's call was designed simply to find out if he wld become GOI nominee if situation seemed favorable. Bajpai stated that he wld be willing accept appointment but requested that his name not be thrown out for public consideration unless there is reasonable chance of approval.

We believe Bajpai possibility shld be carefully considered. He has demonstrated complete integrity at all times in dealing with US on many delicate questions. He is emphatically anti-Soviet and harbors no illusions on subject of Chinese Commies. Indeed, I believe he is hardest-headed of all GOI officials and most realistic so far as cold war conflict is concerned. Bajpai's health is fully restored and he is bored with Governorship of Bombay.

Bajpai's availability also offers us opportunity to create some good will with GOI. We realize, of course, that there are many other considerations. If Bajpai's availability is suggested it should not come from this source.

I indicated surprise at trigger-happy attitude toward use of veto and asked whether UK is not giving any consideration to other candidates including, for example, Romulo, and to the possibility of continuing Lie. I pointed out that he, Jebb, had been talking favorably of Entezam's candidacy to other dels in past few days. With some embarrassment he said that although Entezam would be very good, British could not support him. He repeated that UK would veto anyone but Pearson or Boheman.

I assume from Jebb's positive and repeated statement of above position that it must represent some governmental decision. [Gross.]

Subject: Successor to Secretary General Trygve Lie

Participants: Mr. Charles Malik, Lebanese Minister

Mr. John D. Hickerson, UNA

Mr. James Ludlow, UNP

Charles Malik called on me this afternoon at his request to inform me that he had been instructed by his government to raise the following two questions:

1. Was the likelihood of Mr. Lie's resignation serious or could he be prevailed upon to remain; and
2. If a successor had to be named, what was the attitude of the US toward his—Malik's—candidacy?

He pointed out that, with regard to the first question, he sincerely hoped that Lie could be persuaded to remain for the rest of his term. With regard to the second, he said that the same inquiry was presently being made to the other four permanent members of the Security Council. He said that his candidacy, in the event Lie's resignation was accepted, would be put forward only if it had the approval of the Arab League members.

In reply I informed him that, with regard to the first question, we just did not know whether Lie could be persuaded to continue as Secretary General for the remainder of his term. I said that his resignation could not have come at a worse time in the history of the United Nations and we hoped that the problem of a selection of a new Secretary General now could be avoided. With regard to the second question, I said that we would give most earnest consideration to his candidacy just as we would to the other known candidacies and, should the occasion arise, he would hear from us on this matter.

UK RECORD OF MEETING HELD AT UNITED NATIONS HEADQUARTERS
BUILDING ON NOVEMBER 13, 1952

ELECTIONS OF JUDGES OF THE
INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE

An informal meeting was held upon the invitation of the United Kingdom Delegation, to discuss certain proposals related to the procedure for electing judges of the International Court of Justice. The meeting had before it a memorandum prepared by the Government of the United Kingdom.

2. The following were present:

Canada	Mr. A.R. Crepault
Chile	Mr. Horacio Suarez
China	Dr. Shuhsi Hsu
Egypt	Mr. El Tanamly
France	Mr. R. de Lacharriere
Norway	Mr. Dons
United Kingdom	Mr. Fitzmaurice and Mr. Vallat
United States	Mr. J. Maktos and Mr. J. Hyde
Uruguay	Mr. Darwin Bracco.

3. Three proposals were discussed:

(i) The separation of elections of judges of the International Court from other elections which take place during the session of the General Assembly.

(ii) The problem of ensuring that the voting in the General Assembly is conducted independently of voting in the Security Council.

(iii) The proposal arising from the choice of any particular ballot in the General Assembly or in the Security Council of more candidates than there are vacancies to be filled.

4. In discussion on problems (i) and (ii) the view was expressed that it would be a mistake to minimize the importance of the factor of geographic distribution. The general sense of the meeting was that any improvement should be on the basis that it is desirable to avoid as far as possible bargaining in connexion with the election of judges to the International Court. For this purpose it was thought to be desirable that the election of judges should be held on a day on which no other elections were being held. There was some difference of opinion as to whether the election of judges should be held at the beginning or at the end of a session. The balance of argument seemed to be in favour of holding the election early so that it might be complete before political pressures developed as they might do towards the end of the session.

5. With respect to point (ii) it was generally agreed that ideally the choice of candidates in the General Assembly and the Security Council should be carried out separately; that was the intention of the statute. It was pointed out, however, that it would be almost impossible in practice to ensure that the choice in one body was independent of the choice being made in the other. Communication either directly or indirectly between the two bodies could probably not be prevented. Moreover it was felt by some that it would be necessary for certain delegates to consult the group of States which they might be regarded as representing. In such circumstances it would be inevitable that the results of voting in one body would become known to the other body. A further point was made that rigid separation, even if it could be achieved, might result in undue delay.

6. It was agreed that the arrangements to be made to meet (so far as possible) points (i) and (ii) lay partly in the hands of the Secretariat, whose attention should be drawn to the matter.

7. As regards point (iii) the sense of the meeting was that the rules of procedure of the General Assembly and the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council should be amended so as to solve the problem as to what should be done if a ballot in either body resulted in the choice of more candidates than the number of vacancies. This was subject to a reservation on the part of one Delegation on the ground that there might be political objection to any attempt to amend the provisional rules of procedure of the Security Council. The concrete solution of the problem was not discussed; it was appreciated that there might be several solutions but they could all be effected by amending the rules of procedure. It was agreed that it would be undesirable to attempt to amend the Statute of the International Court, and that this would in fact not be necessary. On the other hand it was pointed out that the actual amendments to the rules of procedure would require careful consideration in the light both of their technical and their practical implications. Accordingly the solution of the problem in point (iii) above would require further careful study.

8. It was agreed that a short record of the discussion at the meeting should be drawn up and circulated to those who had attended.

9. It was also agreed that a copy should be given informally to the Legal Department of the United Nations Secretariat.

Subject: Appointment of Secretary General

I met with Sir Gladwyn Jebb and Ambassador Hoppenot, at latter's request. Hoppenot said he had talked to Lie a couple of days ago and Lie protested that he was serious regarding his resignation, but would be prepared to stay on until a "suitable" successor was found. Hoppenot said everyone he mentioned to Lie was considered "not suitable" by the latter. This included Boheman, Stikker and Entezam.

Jebb has instructions to the effect that the UK would prefer to have the Secretary General matter held over for the resumed session in February. UK feels that if the Russians should ask for a meeting of the Security Council or private consultations of the Five Permanent Members, it would be undesirable for us at this stage to put names forward.

Hoppenot agreed. He said that if the Russians press for a Security Council meeting, he would suggest prior Five-Power consultation.

The three of us agreed that if the Russians demand an SC meeting and, for example, put forward the name of the Polish Foreign Minister and insisted on voting on it, the three of us would vote against it.

Both the British and the French now hold Pearson as first choice; the French like Entezam, but the British have made it clear they could not live with that. The question came up of Stikker as second place to Pearson and Boheman. Hoppenot mentioned Spaak. He and Jebb agreed Spaak would be out of the question for a number of reasons.

I said we were not now in a position to talk about any specific names, but would prefer to have the matter go over to February. However, I added that we ourselves had been considering a list of possible names and of course Romulo was on that list, as well as several others. But I did not want to talk about names at this point. Hoppenot said Schuman was against Romulo, that he did not trust him. He felt Romulo wouldn't increase the prestige of the UN as Secretary General. Jebb agreed. I said I wasn't in a position to discuss the matter, but felt Romulo should not be excluded.

New Subject: Convening of GA Regular Sessions

Jebb said Eden is flatly opposed to the Spring session idea, not only this year but in general. He referred to budget problems in the Parliament, etc. Hoppenot was opposed to a Spring session for the same reasons. I said we might talk about it again and reminded them of Pearson's interest in it. They were aware of that, but Pearson has not the same problems which confront the French and British. We left it at that for the moment.

Briefing Paper Prepared in the Bureau of United Nations Affairs for Briefing Meetings for Ambassador Lodge<sup>1</sup>

[WASHINGTON, January 19, 1953.]

APPOINTMENT OF THE SECRETARY-GENERAL<sup>2</sup>

Discussion

1. The Secretary-General is appointed by the General Assembly upon the recommendation of the Security Council (Article 97 of the Charter). The veto applies to this question in the Security Council. In the General Assembly a decision is taken by a simple majority vote (although the Assembly could decide by a majority vote that a two-thirds majority is required). The rules of procedure of the Security Council and the General Assembly require "private" rather than "public" meetings for consideration of this question.

2. After informal consultations among the five permanent members of the Security Council and after three "private" meetings of the whole Council, the Security Council, on January 29, 1946, agreed unanimously to recommend to the General Assembly the appointment of Trygve Lie as Secretary-General. The General Assembly, on February 1, accepted the recommendation of the Security Council, 46 delegations voting in favor, 3 against and 2 absent.* At an earlier meeting (January 24, 1946) the General Assembly approved a resolution setting forth the terms of appointment of the Secretary-General. This resolution, inter alia, provided that "the first Secretary-General shall be appointed for five years, the appointment being open at the end of that period for a further five-year term".

3. Since Mr. Lie's term expired on February 1, 1951, the question of the appointment of the Secretary-General was placed on the agenda of the fifth session of the General Assembly. The Security Council, in October 1950, held several "private" meetings on the matter. The

<sup>2</sup> An Annex attached to this paper contained the text of Lie's message to the General Assembly on Nov. 10, 1952 which is printed on p. 423. (The Annex also included a short personal message to General Assembly President Pearson which is not printed.)

*On the suggestion of the President the Assembly waived the provision of the rule requiring a "private" meeting and took its action at a "public" meeting. [Footnote in the source text.]

United States strongly supported the re-appointment of Lie, stated that Soviet opposition to Lie represented an effort to punish Lie for his role in connection with the question of Korean aggression, and ultimately threatened to use the veto, if necessary, to prevent a recommendation from the Security Council on any other candidate. The Soviet Union strongly opposed Lie, initially put forward the name of the Polish Foreign Minister and subsequently the names of Padilla Nervo (Mexico), Malik (Lebanon) and Rau (India). China suggested Romulo (Philippines) and the Soviet representative indicated that Romulo would be acceptable to the USSR. The USSR (on October 12) vetoed a Yugoslav proposal to re-appoint Lie (9 members voted in favor, 1 against and 1 abstained). Prior to this vote the Council, at the same meeting, rejected the name of the Polish Foreign Minister (1 member voted in favor, 4 against and 6 abstained). On October 25 the Council voted on the nominations of Malik (Lebanon) and Romulo (Philippines) but both names failed to secure the necessary majority. In each case the vote was 4 to 0, with 7 abstentions. Prior to the votes on these two candidates the name of Padilla Nervo was withdrawn at his request by Chauvel (France), and Rau (India) withdrew his own name. The Council, in several communications, informed the General Assembly that it had been unable to agree on a recommendation.

Taking the position that the General Assembly which had determined the term of office of Secretary-General Lie could, in these circumstances, simply extend his term, the United States, with 14 other delegations, sponsored in the Assembly a resolution providing for the continuance of Lie in office for a period of three years (i.e., until February 1, 1954). This resolution was adopted on November 1, 1950 by a vote of 46 to 5, with 8 abstentions. The Soviet Bloc states announced that they considered this action illegal and that they would not take Lie into account and would not consider him as being Secretary-General of the United Nations.

4. On November 10 last Lie submitted his resignation to the President of the General Assembly and the President of the Security Council (Annex A), and requested that an item entitled "Appointment of the Secretary-General of the United Nations" be included in the agenda of the General Assembly. This item was included in the Assembly's agenda on November 13. In a letter, dated November 13, the President of the General Assembly informed the President of the Security Council of the Assembly's action.

5. A number of names have been mentioned for the SYG post, including: Romulo (Philippines), Spaak (Belgium), Pearson (Canada), Spender (Australia), Boheman (Sweden), Stikker (Netherlands), Van Royen (Netherlands), Entezam (Iran), Malik (Lebanon), Muniz (Brazil), Wan (Thailand), Skrzyszewski (Poland), Padilla Nervo (Mexico), Santa Cruz (Chile), Bajpai (India). There is also some possibility that Lie may not be entirely serious about his resignation and may be open to persuasion to withdraw it.

Suggested Position

1. We should make every effort to obtain a favorable recommendation from the Security Council for a new Secretary-General. We would be prepared to accept any of the following individuals in the order named: Romulo, Spaak, Pearson, Spender, Boheman, Stikker, Van Royen, Malik, Entezam, Muniz. This list is not exhaustive. There may emerge from consultations other names which we could accept. The order of preference of the names listed is tentative except for Romulo as our first choice. We could not accept Skrzyszewski or any other Soviet Bloc national, Padilla Nervo, Santa Cruz nor Bajpai.

2. We should hold informal consultations at an early date with the other permanent members of the Security Council. We should consult first, and separately, with the UK, France and China with a view to reaching agreement on one or more of the individuals mentioned above. We should endeavor to get the UK, France and China to agree that all of us must handle these consultations in such a manner that no one of us will be tagged with the responsibility for blocking a particular candidate. We should then approach the Soviet delegation with a view to ascertaining whether the USSR could agree to the four-power candidate or candidates.

3. If the informal consultations among the permanent Members indicate that no agreement is possible with the USSR, we should secure support among the non-permanent Members of the Council for the four-power candidate or candidates.

4. We should then (possibly with the UK, France and China) request that the Security Council be called to consider the question of the Secretary-General.†

5. If the Council is unable to make a recommendation on an acceptable candidate, we should seek action by the General Assembly under which an "acting" Secretary-General (an individual who could command the broadest support) would be appointed from the list set forth in paragraph 1 for a specified term (perhaps 3-5 years), or until the Security Council is able to reach agreement.

4. The appointment of a secretary general seems to me a particularly delicate negotiating problem. The alternatives seem to be whether there can be agreement on a new secretary general satisfactory to us or whether there must be an acting secretary general appointed by the Assembly. It is too early to say which solution will occur and precisely how to go about seeing to it that an individual satisfactory to us is finally agreed upon. At this time, however, I see disadvantages in the US joining any active group in promoting any particular candidate.

I share your feeling that we neither oppose nor identify US with UK initiative on behalf of Pearson. I also share your view that we should vote for Pearson if issue arises in SC and raise no objection to his name if no vote is taken.

You might indicate to UK that in event USSR vetoes Pearson candidacy you would hope to have their support for a candidate of our choosing.

Lodge had raised the question of the U.S. position vis-à-vis Pearson against the possibility of an early Security Council meeting on the problem, perhaps on Feb. 20. The United Kingdom seemed to be "pursuing Pearson candidacy on theory that Pearson would be acceptable to USSR." Pearson's name would be presented, and there would be an "attempt to get his name recommended without a vote on basis of there being no objection." Lodge concluded, "In my judgment it would be desirable to vote for and not oppose Pearson if issue arises in this way in SC. If we could get agreement on him quickly and expeditiously, I feel that would merit such US support." (315/2-1653)

During his call on Ambassador Lodge Johnson spoke with great warmth on the subject of Pearson's candidacy. He felt that either wilfully or otherwise the UK had spread the word that Pearson is acceptable to the Soviet Union, whereas in fact there is little basis for this position. He added that according to a letter which he had received from Wrong which he offered to show us, Zarubin had never gone beyond saying that he felt Pearson had done a creditable job in the GA. Johnson stated that he was upset and that Pearson was upset that his name was being bandied around in this fashion, and that he thought that all the rumors of Pearson's acceptability to the Soviets were, so far as he could tell, with very little foundation in fact. He added that naturally Pearson is concerned at this issue being pending, that for him it was "a big thing". Johnson therefore urged that we verify from Makins precisely what Makins said to Zarubin.

Johnson did not go on to say what action if any he expected the US to take about Pearson's candidacy.

Mr. Ignatieff came in this afternoon to inquire about the problem of the selection of a new UN Secretary General. He stated very frankly that Mr. Pearson would very much like to be chosen for the post. He did not give much credence to the rumor floating about that the USSR is not unfriendly to the Pearson candidacy and wondered whether the British activity in New York on Pearson's behalf at this time is not tactically unwise. Mr. Ignatieff confessed that he did not understand why Mr. Pearson wanted the post. He stated that Pearson is the "heir apparent" to the Canadian premiership. He supposed the reason why Mr. Pearson wanted the post is that he is extremely interested in the UN and its success.

I told Mr. Ignatieff that the matter of the selection of a new Secretary General, so far as the United States is concerned, is in the hands of Ambassador Lodge who has the widest possible discretion in this regard. I also told Mr. Ignatieff that the matter is a very delicate one and that any information with respect to our position would have to be obtained from Ambassador Lodge.

DEAR CABOT: You have doubtless seen Ambassador Butterworth's telegram No. 920, February 25, 5:00 p. m., from Stockholm, in response to our telegram sent at your request that we take some soundings from the Swedes about the possible availability of Erik Boheman for the post of UN Secretary General.

The Swedish Government immediately telegraphed Ambassador Boheman about this inquiry and he discussed it with us Monday night and Tuesday morning. Boheman said flatly that he did not want the job, that he felt that there was little likelihood that the Soviets would accept him, and that he hoped very much that his name would not be actively considered for the post. He said that we would receive our reply from the Swedish Government, and he predicted that the reply would be that the Swedish Government thought it unlikely that Boheman's name would break the deadlock with the Soviets; but that if a situation developed in which agreement could be reached on Boheman and on no one else, the Swedish Government would probably be disposed to urge him to accept. He did not say for sure whether he would accept, but I gathered that if the Swedish Government pressed him strongly enough he would probably do so although with reluctance.

Ambassador Boheman expressed his appreciation of the confidence in him shown by our inquiry of the Swedish Government. He clearly does not want the job and hopes that his name will not receive active consideration. He asked that I keep in touch with him and let him know before we formally propose his name if that situation ever arises. I agreed to do this.

I enclose a one-page biographic sketch of Boheman prepared in the Department.

Sincerely yours,

Subject: Appointment of a Secretary General

Sir Gladwyn Jebb told me yesterday afternoon he had discussed the question of the appointment of a Secretary General at lunch on Monday with six other members of the Security Council, excluding Lebanon (the Lebanese Representative not being here), the Soviet Union, China and ourselves. He said he was convinced from his discussion that "no candidate other than Pearson could get seven votes in the Security Council".

Jebb referred (more in regret than in anger) to your reluctance to discuss the question with him on any specific basis, and said he felt he had to "keep the thing moving". He asked me to tell you, therefore, that he is planning to request a Security Council meeting to take up the question, perhaps early next week.

I told Jebb I would report this to you, but that I did not think it appropriate for me to discuss the matter with him. However, I told Jebb that Pearson had told Jack Ross and myself that he did not want his name bandied about and was reluctant to have his name put forward merely to be rejected. Jebb seemed quite uncertain about Pearson's attitude in this respect and said he thought perhaps he should have a talk with Pearson.

Jebb's idea is that even if Pearson is turned down on the first round, if other names are put forward and they are turned down, Pearson could be advanced again and possibly would be accepted on the second round.

Jebb's proposal to call for a Security Council meeting to take up the question of the appointment of a Secretary General at this time seems to me to raise at least three questions:

(1) The unfortunate aspect of taking this problem up before the Personnel item is disposed of;

(2) The poor tactics, it seems to me, of putting Pearson's name, or anybody else's name forward, merely to be vetoed;

(3) Taking up the question of the appointment of a Secretary General before the Korean item is finished in Committee 1.

We have information that Bokhari has tried unsuccessfully to obtain Soviet reactions to Pearson.

Subject: Election of Secretary General

Participants: Sir Gladwyn Jebb, United Kingdom }
 Ambassador Henri Hoppenot, France }
 Separately with Amb. Carlos Romulo, Philippines
 Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge, United States
 Mr. John C. Ross, United States

At their requests Sir Gladwyn Jebb and Ambassador Hoppenot called on Ambassador Lodge at 3:30 this afternoon on the above subject. They indicated an interest in our "real" position on Romulo. The General Assembly was alive with rumors running from a story that we had nominated Romulo only to kill him off to the other extreme that we would veto Pearson. Ambassador Lodge indicated that while we definitely were for Romulo we were not against Pearson.

Hoppenot made clear his government's objection to Romulo because of his attitude on the colonial question in regard to which Hoppenot said the Philippine Delegation had always played a leading role to the detriment of the interests of France. Hoppenot was in a dilemma because if there were a real chance of Romulo being elected the question of a French veto would arise.

Both Jebb and Hoppenot went out of their way to indicate in quite strong terms that we had nothing to fear from Pearson on the personnel question. They both thought we could rely on Pearson to carry forward the work initiated under Trygve Lie. Hoppenot thought the appointment of Pearson, if elected, might be scheduled to become effective in June. This would give Pearson an opportunity to wind up his affairs in Canada and it would also provide an opportunity for Lie to continue moving the personnel question forward.

Jebb inquired whether we would abstain or vote against the Pole. Ambassador Lodge indicated we had been thinking of voting against him since we did not want to run the slightest risk that a Communist would be elected as Secretary General. If this happened it would be the end of the United Nations so far as the United States was concerned. Hoppenot hoped that it would not be necessary for us to vote against the Pole. He did not think anyone would vote for him except the Soviet Representative. He wondered if it would not be better for the other eleven Members of the Council merely to abstain. Ambassador Lodge did not commit himself on this point.

In view of the unpredictability of Soviet voting and other factors in the situation, it was generally agreed that anything might happen at Friday's meeting of the Council. It was quite possible that other candidates would emerge including, for example, Madam Pandit, Charles Malik, Padilla Nervo. If we did not consider any of these candidates or similar candidates desirable choices for the job it would be embarrassing for all of our governments to vote against them or even to abstain since an abstention was nearly equivalent to a negative vote. This discussion opened the question of whether balloting should be secret. Jebb thought quite strongly it should be. Hoppenot agreed but with a slight reservation that this might give Tsiang an opportunity to veto Pearson but not openly so. Ambassador Lodge gave his tacit agreement and it was understood that Jebb would approach Borberg with a view to moving a secret ballot.

In the course of the discussion of possible dark horse candidates Ambassador Lodge inquired if there were not an acceptable Western European candidate. Jebb mentioned the name of Stikker, former Dutch Foreign Minister who he said would like the job and who would be good. He doubted, however, that Stikker could get elected. Ambassador Lodge mentioned the name of Herman van Roijen, Dutch Ambassador in Washington. This discussion was, however, brief and inconclusive.

At about 11:15 last night Mr. Ross of USUN called me at home on the telephone and said that Ambassador Lodge had asked him to call me and tell me that he would need last ditch instructions on how he should vote in the secret balloting in the Security Council on March 19 on Madame Pandit for Secretary General. Mr. Ross said that there was a strong possibility that the Chinese would veto Madame Pandit and that most of the other members of the Security Council would abstain, but he said that Ambassador Lodge felt that we could not count on this and he wanted to know how much discretionary authority we could give him in the matter of voting. I told Mr. Ross that I would try to see Secretary Dulles the first thing this morning and call Ambassador Lodge as soon as possible.

I saw the Secretary at 9:20 this morning and immediately after the Secretary's Staff Meeting I talked to Ambassador Lodge on the telephone and gave him the following instructions, which I told him had the Secretary's personal approval:

I said that we thought it would be very bad for the United Nations and United States support for it if Madame Pandit were elected Secretary General. I added that the same considerations applied to the candidacy of Sir Benegal Rau. I said that apart from India's neutralism, we felt that neither of these candidates had the necessary administrative or executive ability to run a great organization like the United Nations. I said that the problem facing the United Nations now is stopping Communist aggression and that this can not be done with the passive resistance advocated by India. I said that naturally we would prefer not to have to vote against Madame Pandit or Rau unless it was necessary, but that Ambassador Lodge was authorized in his discretion to vote no if he felt it was necessary to prevent their nomination. I said that we had received a telegram from Taipei that the Chinese representative would veto the Indian candidates, and that we understood that most of the other members were going to abstain. I added that if this were in fact true, we would prefer that Ambassador Lodge abstain, but that we would have to leave this to his judgment, and that he was authorized to vote no if he considered it necessary.

Mr. Hickerson telephoned this morning pursuant to my request to him concerning the Secretary of State's views on how we should vote on the Indian candidates (Madam Pandit and Sir B. N. Rau) suggested by the Russian Delegate in the Big Five meeting. Hickerson cited the following as the Secretary's views: He said these two candidates would not do. Apart from the attitude of passive resistance and neutralism of their country, it was felt they did not have the necessary administrative or executive ability. We should see to it that they did not get elected. We would prefer to abstain rather than vote no but discretion was left to Ambassador Lodge to vote no if necessary to prevent their nomination.

Hickerson then went on to refer to indications we had had from Taipei that Tsiang would veto the Indian candidates. Hickerson realized we could not be absolutely sure that Tsiang would veto or that a sufficient number of others would abstain. He suggested that we try to get a definitive indication from Tsiang.

Subject: Philippine Criticism of Extent of U.S. Support for Romulo as Secretary General

Following our conversation this morning, I talked with David Key in New York about references to U.S. "snubbing" and "double crossing" in press reports from Manila about U.S. support for General Romulo's candidacy as Secretary General of the United Nations.

Mr. Key said that he thought the choice of words was inexact but the adverse criticism probably arose from a belief on the part of General Romulo that the U.S. was not solidly backing him in his candidacy. The General's criticism apparently was directed not so much to tactics and activities in New York as to the failure of the U.S. to exert pressure on other governments at the highest levels. It was evident, for example, that support for Pearson had been urged by the UK upon other Foreign Offices and Delegations were accordingly able to come to the Security Council with full instructions to vote for Pearson. It was likewise apparent that the U.S. was making no such all-out campaign on behalf of General Romulo. This situation, in Mr. Key's opinion, was the basis of General Romulo's dissatisfaction. The press comment from Manila reflecting his dissatisfaction might well be intended as a means of inducing the U.S. to greater activity.

Ambassador Key said there was now full consultation on the part of the top members of the U.S. Delegation with General Romulo. Although some question had been raised about the order of presentation of names to the Security Council which resulted in Romulo's name being voted upon first and thus being at a disadvantage, Mr. Key did not feel that this tactic or any other developments in New York were the basis of Philippine objections.

Mr. Key said that a memorandum of conversation between himself and General Romulo would be quite illuminating to the Department on this point and he would send a copy by pouch.

In response to your suggestion I shall see that a telegram to Manila is prepared explaining the UN procedures for election of a Secretary General and outlining developments so far.

I went to the Secretary's office and found that Ambassador Lodge had already talked briefly to the Secretary on the telephone about our views concerning Mr. Hammarskjold. I learned that Messrs. I then reviewed the biographic material which we have in the Department on Mr. Hammarskjold (attached) and talked about Mr. Hammarskjold with Mr. Ronhovde and Mr. Raynor of BNA, both of whom spoke well of Hammarskjold. I then discussed Mr. Hammarskjold with Mr. H. Freeman Matthews, who was American Ambassador to Stockholm. Mr. Matthews spoke in high terms of Mr. Hammarskjold's ability and pro-Western views. Mr. Matthews said that he felt that the United Nations would be lucky to get Hammarskjold and that they could do a lot worse.

Late this afternoon I called Ambassador Lodge on the telephone and referred to the Secretary's comments earlier in the afternoon about Hammarskjold. I said that our further inquiries had developed no adverse information but had rather confirmed the views which the Secretary expressed that Hammarskjold seemed like a good man whom we should support. In meeting of Cordier, Stavropoulos (UN), Vallat (UK) and Hyde, mechanics of GA action appointing new SYG-UN was discussed. General procedure is to be simple, have opportunity for Lie to present valedictory and offer new SYG same terms of appointment as Lie. This would include five-year appointment, the appointment being open at the end of that period for a further five-year term.

1. First item of plenary afternoon of 7 April will be SYG item. President will read letter of resignation of Lie, dated November 10, 1952, and SC recommendation of Hammarskjold.

2. In open meeting President will put to vote Hammarskjold's name with secret ballot—waiving closed meeting provision of rule 140.

3. Plan is to circulate as Canadian draft resolution following text, probably 3 April but not later than 6 April. This is simplest way of providing for new term of office, retirement rights and any other benefits Lie now enjoys. Vallat will tomorrow clear this with French and ask them to clear with Soviet delegation, assuming Canada approves this draft:

Begin verbatim text. "Recalling resolution 11 (I) of 24 January 1946 and paragraph 32 of GA resolution 13 (I) of 13 February 1946, "Decides that the terms of appointment of the second SYG shall be the same as those of the first SYG." End verbatim text.

4. Canadian draft will be put to vote.

5. Lie will make valedictory though technically he continues in office until Hammarskjold takes oath. US and others will have opportunity to express appreciation of Lie's efforts.

6. President will indicate Hammarskjold arrives New York 9 April and will take oath on 10 April in plenary.

7. On 10 April in presence of Council Presidents, Vice Presidents and Lie, President of GA will administer oath to Hammarskjold, whose term at that point legally begins. Hammarskjold today telegraphed Lie he would remain at headquarters some weeks before winding up his affairs in Sweden.

Subject: Election of Mr. Hammarskjold as Secretary General.

While Mr. Lie was waiting in my office today to go with Mr. Simmons, Chief of Protocol, to the White House, he referred to the election of Mr. Hammarskjold as Secretary General. He asked how we had discovered Mr. Hammarskjold. I expressed surprise and said that the first time we had had any inkling of Mr. Hammarskjold as a possible candidate was the time his name was suggested by Mr. Hoppenot in the course of the Security Council conversations. I said that so far as I knew, the suggestion came as a complete surprise to everyone here and we started scrambling around to find out who Mr. Hammarskjold was and what his qualifications were. Mr. Lie said that he had the impression that Ambassador Boheman or Ambassador Bonnet had originated the idea and he repeated the story we have heard elsewhere that the suggestion to them had originated with Mrs. Betty Jacob<sup>1</sup> who claimed that Mr. Hammarskjold had the support of the Administration. I told him this sounded like one of the usual "figments" of Mrs. Jacob's imagination and that while I could not profess to know anything about Mrs. Jacob's activities in this particular case I felt confident myself that there was no foundation for any impression she may have tried to give that she had access to special or secret consideration of Mr. Hammarskjold among responsible officials in Washington. I could only repeat that Mr. Hammarskjold's nomination came as a complete surprise to us and all of our information and ideas concerning him were developed after his name was brought forward in the Security Council.

Mr. Lie spoke in high terms of Mr. Hammarskjold's qualifications and work but remarked that he might let the political functions of the Secretary General wither. He said that Mr. Hammarskjold was a Conservative in Swedish politics and if he were in the United States he would belong to the conservative wing of the Republican Party.

Memorandum by Paul W. Jones of the Office of United Nations Political and Security Affairs to the Officer in Charge, General Assembly Affairs (Taylor)

CONFIDENTIAL

[WASHINGTON,] May 8, 1953.

Current Status of Slates

The current status of some of the major slates questions is as follows:

Eighth GA Presidency: Prince Wan informed us prior to the Seventh Session last fall that he was definitely a candidate for the post and that the Foreign Office was approaching diplomatic missions in Bangkok for support.

The Belgian Ambassador last September told Mr. Hickerson that Belgium felt strongly that a European should be elected. Mr. Hickerson said we agreed that the time for a European President was overdue, but stated that Prince Wan had indicated an interest in the post for the Eighth session and that we did not know what our final attitude would be. He also mentioned possible difficulties of electing a President from a NATO country immediately following Pearson.

You will also recall that before the Seventh Session there were rumors that the Soviet bloc might make a bid for the Presidency of the Eighth Session.

Security Council:

1. Peru and Brazil are candidates for Chile's seat. I should think we would leave the choice up to the Latin Americans.

2. New Zealand may be a candidate to succeed Pakistan which holds the Commonwealth seat, although we have heard of no definite decision. We have learned from the Australian Embassy that Australia is considering whether it should run if New Zealand does not. Mr. Hickerson told the Embassy that we have always considered the seat now held by Pakistan as a Commonwealth seat and that we have been prepared to support the choice of the Commonwealth members.

3. There is no announced candidate to succeed Greece. However, the Soviets will probably put up a satellite. I suggest that in the near future we ascertain from the Philippines whether it wishes to run for Greece's seat. It was a candidate in 1951 and no Far Eastern state has yet been on the Council.

ECOSOC:

1. The USSR and the UK are up for reelection.

2. Afghanistan, Indonesia, Pakistan and Thailand are candidates to succeed the Philippines. I should think we would vote for Thailand. Indonesia is also a candidate for the Trusteeship Council and we might support it for that post. Pakistan was a candidate for ECOSOC in 1952 and will probably run a strong campaign this year but I believe it would be difficult to support it for a Far Eastern seat.

3. Norway is a candidate to succeed Sweden.

4. Ecuador is thus far the only Latin American candidate which has asked for our support to succeed Uruguay. However, according to Mr. Meade of the UK delegation, Bolivia is running strong.

5. A Soviet satellite will certainly be a candidate for Poland's seat. Last year Czechoslovakia was defeated by Yugoslavia after 13 ballots, with the result that the Soviet bloc now has two rather than three members on ECOSOC, including the USSR. I doubt that we could again defeat a Soviet satellite this year without a major battle, and even then we might lose.

Trusteeship Council: Haiti and Indonesia are candidates to replace the Dominican Republic and Thailand.

Ambassador Munro came in to present formally the attached communication<sup>1</sup> informing us that the New Zealand Government had decided to stand for election to the Security Council at the fall session of the General Assembly.

I told the Ambassador that I was personally very pleased to hear of this decision. I asked him whether New Zealand had yet obtained full Commonwealth support. The Ambassador stated that the UK and Canada definitely supported the candidacy; that he was sure South Africa and Australia would do so; that he had every reason to believe Pakistan would be favorably disposed; and that he believed that India would likewise go along. Although he had no specific information with regard to India, he pointed out that the Prime Ministers of the two countries would be meeting at the coronation ceremonies with-[in] the next few days.

I told the Ambassador that we regard the seat now held by Pakistan, to which New Zealand now aspired, as a British Commonwealth seat and said that as soon as he could give us definite information to the effect that New Zealand was the Commonwealth candidate, we would determine our attitude and consider whether and when we could announce our decision. I asked him whether he knew of any other candidacies for the seat. He thought that possibly an Asian state such as Indonesia might aspire to it. He also stated that the New Zealand delegation in New York would be approaching all other delegations within the next few days to inform them of New Zealand's candidacy and commented that, if we should decide to support New Zealand, we could be helpful in bringing the Latin Americans along.

Subject: New Zealand's Candidacy for the Security Council.

Separate conversations:

Participants: Mr. Leslie Munro, New Zealand Ambassador
Mr. Hickerson

Mr. George Laking, Counselor of New Zealand
Embassy

Mr. Hickerson

The New Zealand Ambassador called me on the telephone yesterday and referred to an earlier conversation he had with me about New Zealand's candidacy for the Security Council to succeed India. He said that he was very happy to say that the New Zealand Government had received word from "the highest Indian authorities" that India would support New Zealand's candidacy. He went on to say that the UK, Canada, and Pakistan have also promised warm support for New Zealand. He said that the Australian Government has not yet indicated their view but they expect, of course, to have Australia's support. He also said that South Africa has not replied officially to New Zealand's inquiry but that Ambassador Jooste told him here that he was certain that South Africa would strongly support New Zealand.

The Ambassador said that his Government had circularized all friendly governments asking for their support. He said that the time would come between now and next September when he felt the United States might be able to help New Zealand in obtaining support from the American Republics and he would be glad to keep in touch with us about this.

I told the Ambassador I was very much gratified at what he had to say and recalled to him that I had told him earlier that if New Zealand had the whole support of the Commonwealth I was confident the United States would give its support to New Zealand. I added that I felt he should keep in touch with the State Department in regard to this matter since I hoped in this case we might be able to depart from our usual custom and tell him well in advance of the General Assembly session of our support.

The Ambassador expressed appreciation.

Today Mr. Laking, Counselor of the Embassy, called me on the telephone and said that they had received a further telegram from the New Zealand Government on this subject. He said that he and the Ambassador felt that they should tell me that in the light of this further telegram India's assurance of support was not as definite as the Ambassador had informed me yesterday. He said that they would give us further information about this later.

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of United Nations Political and Security Affairs (Wainhouse) to the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Sandifer)

CONFIDENTIAL

[WASHINGTON,] June 22, 1953.

Subject: Presidency of Eighth Session of General Assembly

I suggest that a UNA meeting be called soon to consider our position regarding the Eighth General Assembly Presidency.

Briefly, the situation is this. Prince Wan has been a candidate since last fall. On June 14, the Thai Ambassador called on Mr. Landon and, under instructions from Prince Wan, asked whether the latter could count on our support. The Ambassador indicated that Prince Wan assumed he could. Mr. Landon said the matter would be referred to UNA.

In May Azkoul of the Lebanese Delegation called on Mr. Ross and informally asked for his personal views as to whether Dr. Malik should enter the race. Mr. Ross was non-committal and asked the Department for advice. Pending further consideration in the Department, we have suggested that he not seek to influence Malik one way or the other.

So far as we know there are no other candidates. The Belgian Ambassador indicated last fall that the Western Europeans might make a bid for the Presidency but in view of the difficulty of electing a NATO country following Pearson, we doubt they will try this year.

It is, of course, possible that a Latin American candidacy will develop and Cordier was apprehensive last month about this possibility.

FE would like to make a commitment to Prince Wan now. NEA opposes this, at least as long as Dr. Malik is considering entering the race, and some in NEA believe we should encourage Malik's candidacy in order to demonstrate by concrete action our interest in the Near East.

Both Prince Wan and Dr. Malik would do an excellent job, and from the standpoint of geographic distribution the time is ripe for a President from either the Far East or the Middle East. However, Prince Wan's long interest in the post, his expectation that we will support him, plus the psychological advantage of electing an individual from the Far East, all seem to be in Prince Wan's favor. Furthermore, it would appear desirable to avoid the difficult situation which would result if both Dr. Malik and Prince Wan become strong contenders and we are forced to make a choice between them. For these reasons we are inclined to believe we should give the nod to Prince Wan's candidacy now, without, however, irrevocably committing ourselves, and at the same time should indicate to Dr. Malik, before he becomes a strong contender, that we may support Prince Wan.

We might tell Prince Wan that we believe he would make an excellent President and look most favorably upon his candidacy, but that our final decision would, of course, depend upon the amount of support he obtains from other Members. We could tell Dr. Malik that, as he well knows, we have the highest regard for him, that we believe he would make an excellent President and that his decision whether to run must be his own. However, in all fairness, we must point out that Prince Wan is a definite candidate, that he has been interested in the post for some time, that he has recently asked for our support, and that naturally we have to take into account his long interest in the Presidency. We would go on to say, however, that our final decision on any candidate would, of course, depend in large part upon the degree of support obtained.

Present: Mr. Sandifer—UNA
Mr. Sanders—UNA
Mr. Wainhouse—UNP
Mr. Green—UNE
Mr. Gerig—UNO
Mr. Cory—USUN
Mr. Jones—UNP

A meeting was held in Mr. Sandifer's office on June 26, 1953 to consider major slates questions which will arise at the Eighth Assembly. The following tentative conclusions were reached subject to further consultations with Ambassador Lodge and the geographic bureaus.

With respect to the Security Council, it was agreed that we should leave the choice as between Peru and Brazil, the two candidates to succeed Chile, to the Latin American countries, and that we should support New Zealand to succeed Pakistan if it is the choice of all the Commonwealth members.

It was also agreed that we should oppose a Soviet satellite for Greece's seat and that we would have to wage an active campaign for a non-Soviet candidate which does not recognize the Chinese Communist regime. Mr. Cory reported that Ambassador Lodge believed we should make a real fight on this election and should start early. He said that Ambassador Lodge also thought we should dispose of the expected Soviet charges regarding the so-called 1945 "gentleman's agreement" before the USSR even has a chance to raise this issue and should stress positive arguments for a particular non-Soviet candidate rather than arguments against a Soviet candidate. Mr. Cory also stated that we should be even more strongly opposed to Czechoslovakia than to one of the constituent republics, since the election of the former might be erroneously interpreted as legitimizing the Czech Government simply because it has made a few conciliatory moves.

The Philippines, Thailand, Turkey and Ethiopia were discussed as possible non-Soviet candidates. Most of those present believed that of all these possibilities it would be most difficult to elect the Philippines, and that Turkey would probably have the greatest chance of success. It was therefore tentatively decided that our preferred candidate should be Turkey, but we might also consider Thailand and Ethiopia.

Cory of the staff of the Mission at the United Nations (USUN), June 29, not printed (UNP files, lot 59 D 237, "Slates"). Minutes drafted by Paul W. Jones of the Office of UN Political and Security Affairs.

With respect to the ECOSOC slate, it was tentatively decided that we should vote for the reelection of the UK and USSR; for Norway to replace Sweden; and for the candidate (Ecuador, Uruguay, or Bolivia) chosen by the Latin American countries for Uruguay's seat. It was also tentatively decided that since Soviet bloc representation on ECOSOC was reduced last year, and in view of the need to concentrate our efforts on the defeat of a Soviet candidate for the Security Council, we should not campaign against a satellite to succeed Poland on ECOSOC. Mr. Green reported that as between Afghanistan, Pakistan, Thailand and Indonesia, UNE preferred Thailand for the Philippine seat, but it was agreed that a decision on this would have to await a position regarding a successor to Greece on the security Council.

For the Trusteeship Council, it was tentatively decided that we should support Haiti to succeed the Dominican Republic if it is the choice of the Latin American republics and that we should probably support Indonesia rather than India to succeed Thailand.

Lastly the group discussed the General Assembly Presidency. A tentative decision was reached that we should inform Prince Wan now that we are disposed to support him if he obtains sufficient support from other members and that we should also inform Dr. Malik of this. The basis for this decision was principally the fact that Prince Wan has long been a candidate and is under the impression that we will support him, whereas Dr. Malik apparently has not made a final decision to run and has merely asked for our advice. Mr. Cory reported that Ambassador Lodge thought Madam Pandit might be considered for the Presidency, since her election might serve to temper the Indian delegation. Mr. Cory said that he would discuss the matter further with Ambassador Lodge and let us know his views.

It was agreed that we should meet with the geographic bureaus and would be in further consultations with USUN before any final decisions on the above matters were reached. Mr. Sandifer noted that recommendations on the Council slates and the Presidency would have to be approved by the Secretary.

Candidates for Eighth Session

Prince Wan (Thailand)

Dr. Charles Malik (Lebanon)—possible candidate

Discussion

Prince Wan has been a candidate since last fall. On June 12, the Thai Ambassador, in a conversation with Mr. Robertson and Mr. Landon, said that he had been requested by Prince Wan to ascertain whether he could count on United States support. The Ambassador stated that Prince Wan was under the impression that he would receive our support but wanted confirmation, and added that he had already approached a number of countries and had instructions to secure as substantial a picture of possible support for Prince Wan as obtainable at this time. The Ambassador was informed that the matter would be referred to USA in order to secure a reply.

Askoul of Lebanon has twice called on Mr. [Ross?] in New York to ask his personal views as to whether Dr. Malik should run. Mr. Ross was non-committal and has asked for the Department's advice. In addition, a member of the Lebanon legation has indicated to the Department that Dr. Malik is seriously interested and that we might expect a formal communication later.

So far as we know there are no other candidates. The Belgian Ambassador indicated last fall that the Western Europeans might make a bid for the Presidency but in view of the difficulty of electing a NATO country following Pearson, it is doubtful that they will try this year.

<sup>1</sup> Source text attached to UNA memorandum of June 29 to USUN cited in footnote 1, infra. It was drafted by Paul W. Jones on the basis of the conclusions reached in the UNA meeting of June 26, and circulated to the geographic bureaus (Monsma, Allen, Howard, and Bacon) for discussion at a meeting on the same date, June 29.

It is, of course, possible that a Latin American candidacy will develop—Cordier was apprehensive last month about this possibility.

Both Prince Wan and Dr. Malik would do an excellent job, and from the standpoint of geographic distribution it is time for a President from either the Far East or Middle East. However, Dr. Malik does not yet seem to be a definite candidate, whereas Prince Wan has long been interested in the post and is under the impression that he can count on our support. These considerations, plus the fact that Thailand has contributed troops to Korea and the psychological advantage of electing an individual from the Far East to the Presidency of the next session, where Far Eastern issues will come to the fore, seem to be in Prince Wan's favor. Furthermore, it would seem desirable to avoid the difficult situation which will develop if both Dr. Malik and Prince Wan, and possibly others, become strong candidates and we are forced to take a choice between them. For these reasons it is believed that we should give the vote to Prince Wan's candidacy now and at the same time should let it be known to Dr. Malik that we may have to support Prince Wan. It would be easier to inform Dr. Malik now of our thinking on this matter than to wait until he might become a strong contender and then have to inform him that we intend to support another candidate.

Tentative Recommendation

1. We should inform Prince Wan, and others, when asked, that we believe Prince Wan would make an excellent President and that we are disposed to support his candidacy, provided, of course, that he attains sufficient support from other Members.

2. We should inform Dr. Malik that we have the highest regard for him and believe he would make an excellent President. However, in all fairness we must point out that Prince Wan has been interested in the Presidency for some time and has recently asked for our support. In view of his long interest in the Presidency, we are disposed to support his candidacy if he attains sufficient support from other Members.

Pakistan	New Zealand

Term expires 12/31/54

Permanent Members

1. Candidacies of Brazil and Peru

Brazil requested our support for its election to Chile's seat in May, 1952. It has already served on the Security Council for two terms (1946-47 and 1951-52). Last fall Peru announced its interest in being elected to the Council to succeed Chile, and pointed out that it has never been represented on the Council. (However, USUN has been advised recently that Peru might step down.)

It has been our usual policy in the past to support the candidate preferred by the Latin American Members. However, we have also taken the position that one of the two Latin American seats should always be held by a large State.

It is believed that either Peru or Brazil would be satisfactory members of the Council from our standpoint.

Tentative Recommendation

We should remain non-committal and leave the choice as between Brazil and Peru to the Latin American countries.

2. Candidacy of New Zealand

New Zealand has asked for our support for its candidacy to succeed Pakistan. Pakistan's seat has generally been considered a commonwealth seat and it has been our policy to support whichever country the Commonwealth Members have decided among themselves should occupy it.

<sup>1</sup> Source text attached to UNA memorandum of June 29 to USUN cited in footnote 1, p. 457. It was drafted by Paul W. Jones on the basis of conclusions reached in the UNA meeting of June 26, and circulated to the geographic bureaus for discussion at a meeting on July 2. (This memorandum follows rather closely discussion in an earlier memorandum of June 23, drafted by Jones for internal UNA use in the meeting of June 26, not printed. UNP files, lot 59 D 237. "Slates".)

It is believed that we should adhere to our past policy and support New Zealand if it has Commonwealth backing. The latest information available indicates that the UK, Canada, Australia, South Africa and Pakistan are certain to support New Zealand. The position of India is as yet unclear. The New Zealand Delegation still hopes for India's support and has pointed out that when New Zealand stepped down in favor of India's candidacy several years ago, Nehru assured New Zealand of India's support when it stood for this seat. However, the Delegation expressed some fear that India might now claim that Pakistan's seat is an Asian seat.

Tentative Recommendation

We should support New Zealand if it is the choice of all the Commonwealth Members and should inform it of our support at an appropriate point during the summer.

3. Successor to Greece

There are no announced candidacies for the seat now held by Greece. However, the Soviet Union will probably run a satellite in an attempt to recapture this seat, which was held by Soviet bloc Members from 1946 through 1949, but which was subsequently held by Yugoslavia and Greece. The Soviet Union claims that the Soviet bloc is entitled to one of the non-permanent seats on the basis of an informal understanding reached in London in 1945 under which one of the non-permanent seats was allocated to Western Europe, one to Eastern Europe, one to the Near East and Africa, one to the British Commonwealth, and two to Latin America.

In 1951, the United States strongly opposed the election of Byelorussia and waged an active campaign on behalf of Greece. We took the position that the 1945 informal understanding applied to the first year only, that the election of a Soviet candidate would seriously increase Soviet obstructive capabilities in the Security Council, and that a Soviet bloc Member did not qualify under Article 23 of the Charter. (This article provides that in electing non-permanent members, due regard should be given "in the first instance to the contribution of Members . . . to the maintenance of international peace and security and to the other purposes of the Organization, and also to equitable geographical distribution.") However, many countries outside the Soviet bloc, including the UK and France, opposed our position or at any rate did not wish to make a major issue out of what they considered to be a lesser matter. As a result, it was only on the 19th ballot that Greece was finally elected.

A number of Members at the Eighth session may feel inclined to make concessions to the Soviet Union as a result of the Soviet "peace-offensive", and might also argue that since the Soviet Union has not had one of the non-permanent seats for four years, it is time for a Soviet satellite to be returned to the Council. We might therefore run into strong opposition even from some of our key allies in opposing a satellite. In addition, it can be argued that the election of a satellite would probably not jeopardize our voting margin on the Chinese representation issue as long as the UK agrees to support the moratorium procedure on this issue and as long as Tsiang remains the permanent representative of the National Government, nor would it seriously weaken our position in the Security Council on East-West issues.*

However, if the UK changes its position on Chinese representation and if other Members on the Council should also switch, the election of a satellite could make it possible for the Soviet Union to muster seven votes in favor of a motion to exclude the present Chinese National Government representative and seat a Chinese Communist.† In this event the only way we could attempt to prevent the adoption of the motion would be to resort to the veto, but even this attempt might fail if the same seven Members which supported the Soviet motion also took the position that the veto was not applicable. Also, if the Chinese National Government should designate a new representative, it might be difficult in any case for us to muster the necessary seven votes needed to approve his credentials and the election of a satellite could be the crucial factor.‡ Moreover, the election of a Soviet candidate after the General Assembly has twice decided to reject a satellite, and in the absence of sufficient evidence to justify a reversal of its previous decision, would be politically undesirable. It would involve an important concession even though the Soviet Union has not demonstrated by deeds its intent of peaceful purpose and would lend encouragement to the Soviet Union to continue its obstructive

*Assuming that New Zealand and either Peru or Brazil are elected, we could probably count on 8 votes on East-West issues even if a satellite were elected: US, China, France, UK, Denmark, Colombia, New Zealand, and Peru or Brazil. With respect to the Chinese representation issue, we can probably count on four certain votes—those of the US, China, Colombia, and Peru or Brazil. As long as the UK agrees to continue the moratorium procedure, and assuming France, Denmark and New Zealand would follow its position, we could muster more than enough votes to prevent the exclusion of the present Chinese National Government representative or the seating of a Chinese Communist. [Footnote in the source text.]

†If the UK changed its position, and if France, Denmark, Lebanon and New Zealand followed suit, their votes, together with those of the USSR and a Soviet satellite, would total seven. [Footnote in the source text.]

‡The USSR, UK and Denmark would not approve the credentials of a new representative of the Chinese National Government, and Lebanon might abstain. Even if France and New Zealand could be persuaded to vote with China, the United States, Colombia, and Peru or Brazil to approve his credentials, we would still need one more vote. [Footnote in the source text.]

policies in the United Nations. For these reasons it is believed that the United States should support a non-Soviet state which does not recognize the Chinese Communist regime and that we should stimulate a candidacy which would have the best chance of defeating a satellite. Since the election of a non-Soviet candidate may depend in large part upon UK and French support, we should discuss the question with these countries in the near future.

With respect to possible non-Soviet candidates, it would be impracticable to consider a country from Latin America, Western Europe, the British Commonwealth, or the Arab League, all of which are adequately represented on the Council. From the standpoint of equitable geographic distribution, a country from the Far East would be most entitled to succeed Greece, since no country from that area has ever occupied a nonpermanent seat. There are two countries from this area which would be satisfactory to us—the Philippines or Thailand. However, many Asian states, which consider the Philippines to be a US “stooge”, and also the UK and France, would not be favorably disposed toward a Philippine candidacy and it would be difficult if not impossible to obtain its election. Thailand would probably be able to obtain wider support, although Prince Wan’s candidacy for the Presidency would be a complicating factor.

The other countries which could be considered as possible candidates are Turkey and Ethiopia. Of these, Turkey would be far preferable to us. Furthermore, it is believed that it could obtain greater support than Ethiopia or even Thailand. For even though it occupied the Near East seat on the Security Council in 1951 and 1952, it is a state which borders on and has a direct interest in the Eastern European area. A number of countries, particularly the Latin American Members, might fear that the election of a country from an area far removed from Eastern Europe would upset the geographic pattern which has generally been followed for the Security Council. For this reason, they might be more willing to vote for Turkey than for a candidate from the Far East or Africa even though these areas are more entitled to a non-permanent seat.

Should Turkey become a candidate for the Security Council, it would probably be desirable for it to resign from ECOSOC, to which it was elected last year.

Tentative Recommendation

We should in the near future hold discussions with the UK, France and a few key delegations from other areas on the question of a successor to Greece, stressing the strong importance we attach to the election of a non-Soviet candidate. We should mention Turkey as our preferred candidate, but might also suggest Thailand and Ethiopia as possibilities.

1. Candidacies of Afghanistan, Indonesia, Pakistan and Thailand

Thailand informed us of its candidacy for ECOSOC last fall, and expressed the hope that its candidacy would not adversely affect Prince Wan's election to the Presidency. It has never served on ECOSOC, but has served on the Trusteeship Council for one term (1951-1953).

Indonesia requested our support for election to ECOSOC (and also to the Trusteeship Council) this spring. It was also a candidate for ECOSOC last year but we supported India instead. It has never served on any of the major Councils.

Afghanistan and Pakistan also requested our support this spring. Like Indonesia, Afghanistan has never been a Member of a major Council. Pakistan is presently on the Security Council and served on ECOSOC for the period 1950-1952. It was a candidate for reelection last year, but we supported India.

From the standpoint of geographic distribution, Thailand or Indonesia would be the most logical successor to the Philippines. Of these two, Thailand would be preferable to us as far as the substantive work of ECOSOC is concerned, and since it is the only candidate for this seat which does not recognize the Chinese Communist regime. However, as noted above, we may wish to consider Thailand for the Security Council. In this event, we would have to consider other candidates to succeed the Philippines.

Tentative Recommendation:

We should take no decision on the successor to the Philippines pending further developments on the Security Council slate.

2. Candidacy of a Satellite

While no Soviet bloc candidacy has been announced, the Soviet Union can certainly be expected to run a satellite.

Until this year there have always been two satellites on the Council. Last year, however, Yugoslavia defeated Czechoslovakia after 13 ballots, thereby reducing Soviet bloc representation. The United States supported the election of Yugoslavia.

Most Members of the United Nations would probably be unwilling to further reduce Soviet representation on ECOSOC this year, and it is likely that we would be defeated if we should try to elect a non-Soviet candidate. Furthermore, the election of a satellite would not jeopardize our voting position on the Council. Finally, we might obtain less support for a non-Soviet candidate for Greece's seat on the Security Council if we also tried to defeat a satellite for election to ECOSOC.

Tentative Recommendation:

We should not campaign against the election of a Soviet satellite to succeed Poland.

3. Candidacy of Norway

Norway requested our support for its election to Sweden's seat in April. This seat has always been held by a Scandinavian country (Norway in 1946 and 1947, Denmark from 1948 through 1950, and Sweden from 1951 through 1953). According to the Norwegian delegation, Iceland, the only Scandinavian country which has not yet served on ECOSOC, does not intend to seek election this year.

Tentative Recommendation:

We should vote for Norway to succeed Sweden. After we have formulated our position on the total ECOSOC slate, we should inform Norway and others, when asked, of our decision.

4. Candidacy of USSR and UK

There has been a general agreement from the beginning that the five major powers should be represented on ECOSOC.

Tentative Recommendation:

The United States should vote for the reelection of the UK and the USSR.

5. Candidacies of Ecuador, Uruguay and Bolivia

Ecuador requested our support in November 1952, and Fabregat of Uruguay last month asked that Ambassador Lodge be informed of Uruguay's candidacy for reelection. We gave the usual non-committal reply. Bolivia has not yet asked for our support but is apparently a strong candidate for reelection.

Tentative Recommendation:

We should not decide which candidate to support until the views of the Latin American states are known.

1. Candidacy of Haiti

Haiti requested US support for its candidacy to succeed the Dominican Republic in January, and we gave the usual non-committal reply. To our knowledge, there are no other Latin American candidates.

Tentative Recommendation:

In accordance with our usual policy concerning Latin American candidates we should make no decision on Haiti's candidacy until the views of the Latin American States are known.

2. Candidacies of Indonesia and India

Indonesia requested our support for its election to the Trusteeship Council in March. In May India asked for our support. It was also a candidate last year for the Trusteeship Council, but stepped down in favor of Syria.

Liberia has often in the past expressed interest in election to the Trusteeship Council, but we have heard nothing definite on this lately.

As already indicated, Indonesia is also a candidate for ECOSOC. It will be recalled that it requested our support for election to ECOSOC last year but we supported India instead. In addition, Indonesia has never served on a major Council, while India has been a member of the Security Council and is presently on ECOSOC.

Tentative Recommendation:

We should probably support Indonesia to succeed Thailand.

Minutes of Meeting of Membership Team, Department of State, June 29 and July 2, 1953

SECRET

Present: Mr. Wainhouse—UNP
Mr. Jones—UNP
Mr. Monsma—ARA
Mr. Allen—EUR (June 29)
Mr. Barnard—EUR (July 2)
Miss Bacon—FE
Dr. Howard—NEA

A meeting was held in Mr. Wainhouse's office on June 29, 1953 to consider a UNA paper suggesting (1) that we inform Prince Wan and others, when asked, that we are disposed to support him for the Eighth Assembly Presidency provided he obtains sufficient support from other Members; and (2) that we also inform Dr. Malik of this.<sup>1</sup>

Miss Bacon said that FE hoped we could take this action, since Prince Wan has long been a candidate, since we have done nothing to discourage him, and since he is under the impression he can count on our support. She thought that it would save us embarrassment if we told Dr. Malik, before he formally enters the race, that we may have to support Prince Wan. Mr. Monsma and Mr. Allen also thought that it would be quite reasonable to take these steps now.

Dr. Howard, however, said that NEA did not wish to foreclose Dr. Malik's candidacy and thought that it might help our relations with the Arab States if we supported him. Mr. Wainhouse said that UNA had given careful consideration to the problem and thought that both men were well qualified for the job. However, it had come to the conclusion that we should probably give the nod to Prince Wan's candidacy now because of the special circumstances surrounding his candidacy which Miss Bacon had already mentioned. He also thought there were advantages of electing an individual from the Far East to the Presidency of the next session, where Far Eastern issues will come to the fore, and from a country which had contributed troops to Korea. He believed that we might avoid considerable embarrassment if we took the action suggested and did not wait until Dr. Malik entered the race and then perhaps have to tell him we would support Prince Wan.

Dr. Howard agreed to discuss the matter further within NEA in the light of the discussion.

A second meeting was held in Mr. Wainhouse's office on July 2 to consider a UNA paper giving tentative recommendations regarding the US positions on the Council slates.<sup>2</sup>

With respect to the Security Council slate, it was generally agreed that either Peru or Brazil would be a satisfactory successor to Chile and that we should make no decision on which candidate to support until the views of the Latin American states are known. There was also tentative agreement that we should support New Zealand to succeed Pakistan if it is the choice of all the Commonwealth countries. However, Mr. Barnard said that it was EUR's position that we should support New Zealand even if it did not have India's backing. In this connection Mr. Jones noted that India had just handed our Embassy in New Delhi an aide-mémoire indicating that India might try to replace Pakistan but wants our views first. It was generally recognized that failure of India to back New Zealand could create a difficult problem for us and that its election might jeopardize our voting margin in the Council on the Chinese representation issue.

With respect to a successor to Greece, there was general agreement that we should oppose the election of a Soviet bloc member, and it was recognized that we would probably have to wage a real campaign in order to win. In this connection, Mr. Wainhouse reported that he believed Ambassador Lodge was ready to fight hard on this election in order to elect a state which does not recognize the Chinese Communist regime. No decision was reached regarding the tentative recommendation that Turkey be our preferred candidate. Mr. Howard thought that Turkey would probably be a stronger candidate than Ethiopia, but that we should not exclude the latter as a possibility. Mr. Barnard mentioned that Turkey was not altogether satisfied with its relationship to NATO at the present time and that it might ease the situation if it was elected to the Security Council. Miss Bacon said that she wished to reserve any position on possible non-Soviet candidates pending further discussion in UN. She pointed out that a country from the Far East had never had a non-permanent seat and she believed FE might wish to consider the Philippines.

Regarding the ECOSOC slate, Mr. Jones noted that UNE favored Thailand for the Philippine seat. Dr. Howard mentioned that NEA did not wish to rule out Afghanistan as a possibility and Miss Bacon thought FE might favor Indonesia if it were not our candidate for the Trusteeship Council. In any case, it was agreed that we could not make even a tentative decision on a successor to the Philippines for ECOSOC until we reached a decision on a successor to Greece for the Security Council.

It was tentatively agreed that since Soviet bloc representation on ECOSOC was reduced last year and in view of the need to concentrate on defeating a satellite for the Security Council, we should not campaign against a satellite to succeed Poland on ECOSOC, although we might abstain.

As far as the successor to Sweden is concerned, it was tentatively agreed that we should probably support Norway. However, Miss Bacon said that while she did not want to press the issue now, she was concerned that one seat should always rotate among the Scandinavian countries and one seat among the Benelux states. She thought that at some point consideration should be given to a candidate from another area for one of these seats. Mr. Wainhouse and Mr. Jones agreed in principle, but thought that this was not the year to do so. They also pointed out the necessity of maintaining a safe balance on the Chinese representation issue and the importance of electing countries to ECOSOC which could make a constructive contribution to its work.

It was generally agreed that in accordance with the general understanding that the Big Five should always be represented on ECOSOC, we should vote for the reelection of the UK and the USSR, and that as between the Latin American candidates for Uruguay's seat (Ecuador, Uruguay and Bolivia), we should make no choice until the views of the Latin American States are known.

As far as the Trusteeship Council is concerned, it was generally agreed that we might support Indonesia rather than India to replace Thailand unless Indonesia is our candidate for ECOSOC. It was noted that Liberia has been interested in election to the Trusteeship Council in the past, although we have not heard anything definite on this for some time. Mr. Howard, after consultation with AF, reported that it might be best not to promote its candidacy. Lastly, agreement was reached that we should probably support the Latin American choice to succeed the Dominican Republic. Mr. Jones said that we have recently been informed by a member of the Dominican Republic delegation that Haiti might not run, in which event Uruguay might be the candidate.

It was recognized that no final recommendations would be reached on any of the slates pending further consultation with USUN and the geographic bureaus.

The Ambassador in India (Allen) to the Department of State

CONFIDENTIAL

NEW DELHI, July 1, 1953—5 p. m.

3. R. K. Nehru handed me aide-mémoire yesterday inviting US Government attention to fact that if New Zealand succeeds Pakistan on United Nations SC at next election, Lebanon will be only Asiatic country left on SC except Formosa which "can hardly be said to represent any country but itself". Aide-mémoire states that at moment when Asia's problems are of high importance Asia would have practically no representative on SC, that burden of expressing Asian viewpoint has often fallen on India, and that if one seat on SC goes to Commonwealth countries by rotation, India would be member only once in 14 years. India does not wish to contest seat unless she has concurrence of important powers and is approaching US and UK in hope that some way would be found to remedy matter of Asiatic representation.

I said situation would naturally be easier for us if Commonwealth reached agreement. R. K. said GOI expected UK to support New Zealand but did not know what attitude Canada would take.

Comment: Apart from reasoning in aide-mémoire. I am impressed by case for Indian membership and hope we can find basis for supporting it. In fact, good case could be made for permanent seat for India. Re-election after 2 year absence would be middle ground, giving India status in practice of semi-permanent seat but without veto. There can be no question that India has very considerable influence among Asiatic nations and has in fact often carried role of spokesman. India's role in Korean armistice is evidence of responsible position India has assumed in international affairs.

Moreover, I believe, there is still validity in original UN concept of permanent representatives for major powers. Re-examination of permanent representatives will come up in charter revision discussion of 1956, when India will doubtless make strong plea for permanent seat. Semi-permanent status seems justified and might prove good compromise. Moreover, pressure for replacement of Nationalist China by Peking regime rests largely on claim that Peking represents 400 million people. If Lebanon and Formosa remained only SC representative of half population of world, Peking's claim would be given additional color. If India is assured election to SC, less case can be made that Asiatic peoples will not be adequately represented in UN.

I suspect Commonwealth may try to obtain Latin American seat for India.

Text of aide-mémoire being pouched.

The United States Representative at the United Nations (Lodge) to the Secretary of State

CONFIDENTIAL

NEW YORK, July 7, 1953.

DEAR FOSTER: Some weeks ago we discussed the possibility of making use of Madame Pandit's interest in developing better relations between the United States and India, in particular the possibility of the United States supporting Madame Pandit for President of the 8th Regular Session of the General Assembly this fall.

The present situation seems to be that the Thai Government has solicited our support for Prince Wan's candidacy, and that we are considering him sympathetically; that Charles Malik of Lebanon has expressed an interest; and that there has been some talk among the Western Europeans of giving the post to a Western European this year. The Latin Americans may also be interested, although they have had the Presidency many times.

Yet it seems clear to me now that the advantage on our side would lie in supporting Madame Pandit.

We should take some initiative. The Indians are believed to be already actively campaigning for her and we should not allow ourselves to get into the position later on either of opposing her or of climbing on the bandwagon. We should gradually let it be known that the United States was inquiring among other delegations as to whether they would feel free to support Madame Pandit.

There are rumors that the Indians would like to be elected to the Security Council this fall. I do not think we can support them for this post, primarily because of their attitude towards representation of Communist China in the United Nations. Largely for this reason we should not only support but take the initiative towards supporting Madame Pandit for the Presidency of the General Assembly. If we are going to do so there is no time to be lost.

Sincerely,

HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.

LONDON, July 8, 1953—2 p. m.

120. Re New Delhi's 3 (London information 2) on India's desire succeed Pakistan on SC, two officials CRO have stated separately that UK, Australia, Canada (but not New Zealand) had received similar aide-mémoires. UK is annoyed and will certainly give New Zealand its support; New Zealand is now known to be a candidate and UK could hardly switch its allegiance, particularly since it took considerable coaxing to make New Zealand willing to run. If India had announced its intention during New Zealand's period of indecision, situation might have been different; also, UK is irritated because Indians made no mention this desire during their stay in London for Commonwealth conference.

CRO does feel, however, that India's argument about Asian representation has considerable validity, particularly "since in India's eyes Formosa is no Government at all."

Mr. Thacher, SOA

During his call Mr. Singh brought up among other things the fact that the Indian Government was considering putting forward Mrs. Vijayalakshmi Pandit, Prime Minister Nehru's sister and former Ambassador to the US, as a possible candidate for President of the General Assembly at its next regular session (the forthcoming eighth session scheduled to meet in September).

Mr. Singh said that the Indian Prime Minister was interested in this possibility but that he wished to know the views of the US Government before taking any steps in the matter. Mr. Singh declared that our attitude towards the candidacy would be a most important factor in determining whether the Government of India would actually propose Mrs. Pandit. Mr. Singh stated that it was a matter of some urgency for the Indian Government to know our attitude since if positive action was to be taken in the matter then it should be initiated in the near future. Mr. Kennedy assured Mr. Singh that the matter would be given prompt consideration by the Department.

In response to a query by Mr. Kennedy, Mr. Singh stated that he did not believe there was any chance of Mrs. Pandit being made Minister of External Affairs. Mr. Singh stated that the Prime Minister did not wish to favor his own family too much in the matter of important appointments, and that the Prime Minister would not wish to have his own sister in the cabinet.

Mr. Kennedy inquired as to the possibility of Mr. V. K. Krishna Menon's leading the Indian Delegation to a special meeting of the General Assembly to consider the Korean problem. Mr. Singh said that this was likely and was logical in view of Mr. Menon's having taken the initiative in negotiations concerning Korea at previous meetings of the General Assembly.

Mr. Singh alluded to his own service with the representatives of the Government of India on the UN Commission in Korea in 1945-48 and stated that at that time he and others had been impressed by the obstinacy of Dr. Rhee particularly as shown by his unwillingness to accept into his cabinet representatives of other parties. Mr. Singh stated that he might very well be sent as part of the Indian representation on the Neutral Nations Repatriation Commission whenever the latter body came into existence.

205. Re Embtel 128 on India's candidacy for SC, official CRO volunteered to Embassy officers that UK is making following reply to India:

- (1) UK is committed to New Zealand for Commonwealth seat;
- (2) Regardless of which SC seat India tries for, it will be competing against New Zealand and will lessen latter's chances; therefore, UK, will not support India if it tries for any other seat;
- (3) UK is sympathetic to claim Asia is underrepresented but thinks best way to deal with problem is to wait until UN Charter comes up for revision.

Since India is on ECOSOC, is candidate for Trusteeship Council and has told Canada that Mme. Pandit may run for President of GA, UK believes that if it aspires also to SC, it would be overreaching itself.

UK expressed hope that US will give India no encouragement to continue its SC candidacy, mentioning informally that if India were to be elected, it would not rest until Communist China were seated. CONFIDENTIAL

WASHINGTON, July 14, 1953.

Subject: Mrs. Pandit's Candidacy for the Presidency of the 8th Regular Session of the General Assembly

Discussion:

The attached letter from Ambassador Lodge (Tab B)<sup>1</sup> proposes that the United States actively support Mrs. Pandit's candidacy for the presidency of the 8th Regular Session of the General Assembly. Prince Wan of Thailand, Ambassador Malik of Lebanon, and possibly Mr. Van Kleffens of the Netherlands are also candidates; moreover, this particular election is closely connected with the Security Council and other UN elections which will be held in the fall. Accordingly, no firm decision should be reached on this point except as a part of our total policy on elections.

UNA is now considering, with the other interested Bureaus, what countries we should support for all of the major UN posts and I hope to submit recommendations within a few days on the slate as a whole. However, in view of the possibility of immediate inquiry by Ambassador Lodge, the attached interim acknowledgment (Tab A) is submitted for your signature.

As you indicate, however, the problem of the General Assembly presidency is closely connected with the problems of other United Nations elections which will take place this fall. Subject: Canadian Views on Madam Pandit's Candidacy for President of the General Assembly

Mr. Ignatieff informed me that the Canadian Government has informed its High Commissioner in New Delhi that if the Indian Government desires an answer now on Madam Pandit's candidacy for the General Assembly Presidency it would be "no". Mr. Ignatieff stated the Canadian Government expressed its hope that two Asian powers would not run as rivals for the Presidency of the General Assembly. (Mr. Ignatieff was undoubtedly referring to Prince Wan's candidacy for the GA Presidency.)

The Canadian Government stated to its High Commissioner that the Indian Government appears to be entirely too ambitious in its quest for UN offices. Mr. Ignatieff referred to the Indian chairmanship of the NNRC and their quest for the three Council seats, and now the Presidency of the General Assembly. Mr. Ignatieff stated that the Canadian Government felt that maybe if Madam Pandit was given the chairmanship of the Second or Fourth Committee that should be sufficient.

Memorandum by the Acting Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Sandifer) to the Secretary of State<sup>1</sup>

[WASHINGTON,] July 18, 1953.

Subject: Eighth General Assembly: Election of President and Three Non-Permanent Members of the Security Council

Discussion:

Ambassador Lodge has suggested to you that we support Mrs. Pandit for the General Assembly presidency (Tab A, Correspondence). This question and the related Security Council elections were considered at a meeting of the Assistant Secretaries of the Geographic Bureaus with Mr. Matthews, and the recommendations given below were approved.

<sup>1</sup>Drafted by the Officer in Charge of General Assembly Affairs (Taylor) and the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for UN Affairs (Sandifer) (who was in an "Acting" capacity at this time); and cleared by the geographic bureaus (ARA—Woodward, EUR—Bonbright, NEA—Jernegan, and FE—Johnson). This memorandum was approved by Secretary Dulles on July 22.

The recommendations herein presumably resulted from a meeting held on July 16 by the Assistant Secretaries of the bureaus or their representatives with the Deputy Under Secretary of State, H. Freeman Matthews. No record has been found of this meeting, which was called by Sandifer in a circular memorandum of July 15 to which was attached a memorandum entitled "Eighth Regular Session of the General Assembly Major Slates Problems", neither printed (UNP files, lot 59 D 237, "Slates").

The Indian Embassy has indicated to the Department that Prime Minister Nehru is considering putting forward Mrs. Pandit for the General Assembly Presidency and as asked for our reaction (Tab B). Ambassador Malik (Lebanon) has informally sounded us out here and in New York on his possible candidacy. The Thai Government, in a note of June 30, 1953,<sup>2</sup> formally requested United States support for Prince Wan. We have been on notice of Prince Wan's prospective candidacy over a period of two years.

As to the Presidency of the General Assembly, the problem is principally one of weighing the superior competence of Prince Wan as compared with Mrs. Pandit. There is general agreement here that on her record Mrs. Pandit would be unstable, unreliable and inadequate as President. The resentment in this country over the Indian position on Korea and the Chinese Communists would probably make our support of her candidacy, or of India for the Security Council, quite unpopular. Prince Wan, on the other hand, has demonstrated sobriety and political wisdom and can be counted on in crucial East-West issues. As pointed out by Ambassador Lodge, there would be some political advantage in supporting Mrs. Pandit. It might make it easier to oppose India for the Security Council. However, with Commonwealth opposition this candidacy may not prosper. The consensus here is strongly that the possible political advantage does not balance the clear liabilities involved in Mrs. Pandit as President.

Elections will be held for three Security Council seats being vacated by Pakistan, Chile and Greece. For the first—regarded as the Commonwealth seat—all Commonwealth Members, except India, favor New Zealand. However, India has just indicated its desire to run for this seat, urging the need for more Asian representation in the Council. The United Kingdom has informed us that it has advised India of its opposition to India for any Security Council seat. Particularly because of India's position on Chinese representation, we oppose its candidacy.

Brazil and Peru are candidates for the second seat. Either would be satisfactory to us. The Latin American caucus has not yet reached a decision between them.

The greatest difficulty arises over the seat vacated by Greece. Under a 1945 arrangement, this seat was allocated to the Soviet bloc for the first election. In 1949 Yugoslavia was elected to it with our strong support; in 1951 strong American efforts succeeded after 19 ballots in electing Greece. As a gesture to the Soviets a good many countries will probably be inclined to favor a return of the seat to a satellite. There are as yet no candidates for this seat. The existing political situation, national and international, makes it unwise and undesirable to support for this post a satellite or any state which supports the seating of the Chinese Communists. Although Asia is under-represented in the Council, there are no suitable candidates from that area since the Philippines would be extremely difficult to elect and the risk of a defeat makes it unwise for us to encourage a Thai candidacy. We could not support India, Burma or Indonesia because of their Chinese representation policy. Latin American devotion to the geographic representation principle suggests that Turkey might be the most effective candidate, since it adjoins the Eastern European area.

Recommendations:

1. That we inform Thailand and other friendly governments, particularly India and Lebanon, that we will support Prince Wan if there is reasonable prospect of his election.

2. That we support New Zealand for the Commonwealth seat if, as we understand, it has the support of all Commonwealth Members except India, and that we so inform other friendly countries.

3. That we take steps to develop a Turkish candidacy for the Greek seat, approaching the Turks first, and if they agree, other key governments. We should encourage the Turks to take the lead in developing their candidacy. While giving firm support to Turkey, we should not stake United States prestige on her election or for the election of our candidates to other General Assembly posts. We should not in any event accept or support a satellite for this seat, or any state which could be expected to support the seating of the Chinese Communists. If the Turkish candidacy does not prosper our preferred alternative candidates would be the Philippines and Ethiopia.

4. That we support a Latin American country to replace Chile but defer the decision until we know the views of the Latin American countries.

5. That we support the election of India to the Trusteeship Council for which it is also a candidate. (This is an adequate counter-balance for our declining to support Mrs. Pandit and India for the Security Council. India is now a member of the Economic and Social Council.)

(a) UK firmly committed to support candidacy of New Zealand for Commonwealth seat in SC.

(b) UK unable support Mrs. Pandit as candidate for presidency of GA. It has already indicated support for Prince Wan for that position.

(c) UK will gladly support Indian application for membership Trusteeship Council.

2. CRO has commented to Embassy Officer along following lines:

(a) India had in fact suggested that, if Latin America over represented in UN and if UK unable support India for Commonwealth seat, then UK should be willing support India for Latin American seat. UK reasoning was Commonwealth might then lose out in both cases. UK has decided against mention of any possible revision UN charter provide for greater Asian representation lest Indians interpret this as commitment.

(b) Prince Wan's candidacy already well-advanced and besides he capable officer and Asian. These facts being pointed out to GOI.

(c) Colonial Office had "spasms" about thought of India on Trusteeship Council, but CRO and Foreign Office successfully argued that India stood good chance of election whether or not supported by UK, and that responsibility would probably tend moderate Indian views toward "colonialism".

DEAR CABOT: I am sorry I did not have a chance to discuss with you yesterday the matter of the General Assembly Presidency. Our people here have recommended, and I concur in their recommendation, that we support Prince Wan of Thailand rather than Mrs. Pandit. I think you are familiar with most of the arguments pro and con in this matter, and of course if you have strong feelings that this is a wrong decision I would appreciate your getting in touch with me.

In reference to Security Council elections, I think we should support New Zealand rather than India for the Commonwealth seat being vacated by Pakistan if, as I understand, New Zealand has the support of all the Commonwealth members except India. On the Greek seat it is clear that we should not in any case support a satellite or any country which can be expected to support the seating of the Chinese Communists. Of the possible candidacies which might be developed, Turkey—particularly in view of its proximity to the Eastern European area—would probably have the best chance of effectively opposing the satellite candidate. We should, therefore, promptly take steps to develop a Turkish candidacy for the Greek seat, approaching the Turks first and, if they agree, other key governments, particularly the United Kingdom, France and the Latin American states. We should encourage the Turks to take the lead in developing their candidacy. While we should give them firm support, however, we should avoid staking United States prestige on her election or, for that matter, on the election of our candidates to other posts. If the Turkish candidacy should not prosper, I believe that our preferred alternative candidates should be the Philippines and Ethiopia. For the Security Council seat now held by Chile, we will, of course, support a Latin American state, presumably Brazil or Peru, deferring our decision until we know the views of the Latin American states.

It was good talking with you yesterday and I wish we could do that more often.

In response to Ambassador Munro's question, we stated that we were not yet in a position to advise them formally of our attitude regarding their candidacy, but we personally felt certain we could give them an official, affirmative response in a few days. The Ambassador is particularly anxious to be able to advise Prime Minister Holland (now in Rome) before he reaches Delhi for discussion with Nehru on August 3 or 4. The Ambassador agreed with Mr. Raynor's view of the importance of advance consultation with the Latin American Governments and in that connection reported that since New Zealand has no missions in the other American Republics the UK has instructed its missions in all 20 capitals to seek the support for New Zealand's election. In addition, Ambassador Munro has been very active in New York in consultation with many of the Latin American Delegations as well as others. He has received sympathetic favorable response from all he has contacted and definite commitments already from Guatemala and El Salvador. The fact that the Latin Americans appear predisposed against reelection to the SC after only a one-term absence will work in New Zealand's favor vis-à-vis India, but he observed may operate against Brazil's contest with Peru over the candidacy for one of the Latin American seats.

PERSONAL

NEW YORK, July 30, 1953.

DEAR FOSTER: In reply to yours of July 24th, I do feel strongly that we should support Mrs. Pandit rather than Prince Wan for Presidency of the General Assembly.<sup>1</sup>

Just look at the facts: We opposed Mrs. Pandit for Secretary General; we are opposed to India for the Security Council; we are opposed to having India take part in the Korean political conference. Here is one office—the Presidency of the General Assembly—which is largely of publicity importance—and we won't even take her for that. The fact that we may be supporting them for the Trusteeship Council is so minor as not to matter.

As regards New Zealand for the Pakistan seat, I would be opposed to that unless we get an ironclad assurance of the support of the American position rather than the British position on Chinese representation. I would certainly be glad to see Turkey in the Greek seat.

Sincerely yours,

HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Murphy)

CONFIDENTIAL

[WASHINGTON,] August 1, 1953.

Subject: Presidency of the 8th General Assembly

Participants: The Secretary
Under-Secretary Smith
Ambassador Lodge
Mr. Murphy

The Secretary said he wanted to discuss the question whether the United States should support the candidacy of Mrs. Pandit for the Presidency of the General Assembly. The Under-Secretary, Ambassador Lodge and Mr. Murphy having indicated their concurrence, the Secretary said that he had just discussed the matter with the President because the election of Mrs. Pandit as President of the General Assembly might evoke some political reaction in this country. The Secretary said that the President indicated that he would have no objection as long as it was felt on our part that Mrs. Pandit's election would be a satisfactory solution of the problem. The Secretary informed Mr. Lodge, in reply to his personal letter of July 30, that it would be O.K. to vote for Mrs. Pandit but that we should not enter into a campaign against Prince Wan.

Mr. Murphy also asked the Secretary regarding the New Zealand candidacy for the Security Council. The Secretary said that it would be all right to inform New Zealand that we would support its candidate.

In reply to Mr. Murphy's inquiry regarding the fact that India is also a candidate for a place on the Trusteeship Council, and as we are now supporting Mrs. Pandit for the Presidency of the General Assembly, perhaps we could consider supporting Thailand for a place on the Trusteeship Council in lieu of India. The Secretary thought this worthy of examination and said he saw no objection to the Thai appointment to the Trusteeship Council.

CONFIDENTIAL

[WASHINGTON,] August 1, 1953.

Subject: New Zealand's Candidacy for the Security Council

Participants: The Secretary
 Mr. Ward P. Allen, BNA
 Ambassador Munro of New Zealand
 Mr. H. Wade

Ambassador Munro calling on instructions, reviewed the status of New Zealand's candidacy for the Commonwealth seat on the Security Council and asked whether the US had reached a decision on the matter. If favorable, Prime Minister Holland (who is arriving this weekend for a 3 or 4 day stay in Delhi) hopes strongly the US can advise the Indian Government while he is there.

The Secretary, making clear there was no question of bargain or deal, referred to the problem of Chinese representation and inquired as to New Zealand's position. Ambassador Munro replied that in his Government's view, while the Mao government is the government of China, it must first "work its way back" into the international community before it can represent China in the UN. They should not be seated either at the resumed Seventh or at the Eighth GA session. Referring to the general similarity in our attitudes, the Secretary stated that neither he nor the President is committed to the position that the Chinese Communists should never be seated in the UN but, in our view, before that should happen, three conditions would have to be met: (1) it must show it is the real government and not a puppet of, or subservient to, the Soviet Communist party; (2) there must be adequate indication of its acceptance by the people it governs; and (3) it must show by conduct in Korea, in relation to the political conference, and in Indo China that it is willing to abide by decent international standards of conduct and the principles of the UN. We are, therefore, opposed to granting it China's seat now and opposed to agreeing to seating it as any part of a "deal" in connection with the Korean question.

The Ambassador said that he thought that our two governments' views were close together. In response to the Ambassador's question, the Secretary stated that we are disposed to support New Zealand for the Security Council, but it is difficult to give an irrevocable commitment at the moment, since problems of UN elections are somewhat inter-related, mentioning in this connection Madame Pandit's candidacy for the GA Presidency. Asked for his opinion on this, Ambassador Munro replied that, although he had no instructions, in his view Prince Wan would make a better president.

The Secretary agreed that we might be able to advise India of our support for New Zealand during Mr. Holland's stay in Delhi. We would give this serious consideration.

On instructions, I subsequently advised Ambassador Munro by phone that our support for New Zealand is definite, and that we will instruct our Ambassador in Delhi to advise the Government of India promptly. I suggested, however, that before Mr. Holland discusses the matter with Mr. Nehru, he check with our Embassy to be sure we have notified the Indians first. Ambassador Munro agreed.

decided support Mrs. Pandit for General Assembly presidency. While definitive statement whether she is candidate may be delayed few days, I think we may assume she will be.

New Zealand Prime Minister Holland was still somewhat uncertain about New Zealand candidacy for Security Council when he reached Karachi few days ago, but strong support assured by all Commonwealth countries and indication that Pakistan would be most unhappy if New Zealand stood down in favor of India convinced him New Zealand must stand. He had left New Delhi when I received Department telegram 126, but GOI is well aware of situation and when I told Pillai yesterday that we had decided support New Zealand, he said our decision would cause no surprise.

Indians will now probably concentrate on attempting obtain permanent seat when United Nations Charter comes up for revision in 1956.

Crosthwaite (UK) informed us today he was surprised this morning at receipt of information from London by UK HICOM Delhi that we would support Madame Pandit for presidency Eighth GA. He said information accompanied by "fairly pained comment" from London.

On basis our action, India has asked UK support. Crosthwaite went on to say this created "awkward" situation for them. They were not as yet committed to any candidate. They had been leaning in direction Prince Wan who stepped down in favor Pearson last year and who they had been thinking would make better president than Pandit.

On basis telecon with Sandifer we have informed Crosthwaite that decision was made over weekend, that we had inquired if Madame Pandit were coming to Assembly and would be candidate and had indicated we would support in this case. Necessity informing Thailand Government complicated by lack of definite information her candidacy.

Crosthwaite was also informed we had told Indians we were supporting New Zealand and not India for SC. Crosthwaite said Lloyd "hedged like mad" in talking with Indians in London, indicating they would be "extremely reluctant" to vote against a Commonwealth candidate.

Crosthwaite added some of Commonwealth countries (he mentioned Canada in particular) thought there should be some tie-in between Korean political conference and Eighth GA, e.g., some procedure analogous to that provided in last spring's session of GA. Crosthwaite observed this might be awkward for us if Pandit were in Chair.

Subject: Possible Candidacy of Mr. Van Kleffens for President of the 8th GA; UNCURK

Mr. Murphy, UNA
Mr. W. P. Allen, EUR

Minister de Beus called on instructions to seek our reaction to the possibility of Mr. Van Kleffens running for the presidency of the next GA. He stated a number of the European countries felt that since there has been only one European president (Mr. Spaak in 1946) it would be appropriate for a European to hold the post this time. Mr. Van Kleffens is prepared to be a candidate and the Netherlands Government is prepared to back him provided, of course, there is a reasonable chance of success. In response to Mr. Murphy's query, Minister de Beus said that the presidency of the 9th GA was, of course, an alternative possibility but the Netherlands Government was more interested in the forthcoming session. The Dutch realize that both Prince Wan and Mme Pandit are active candidates but envisage the possibility that there may be a deadlock between them and, in that event, Van Kleffens might offer a desirable solution. Mr. de Beus stated in the French view a deadlock is likely since the French themselves are committed to Prince Wan and since Mme Pandit will undoubtedly be opposed by the Muslim group under the leadership of Pakistan.

Mr. Murphy stated that we are of course committed to support Mme Pandit if she is a candidate (of which fact we have not yet been formally apprised). As to the possibility of a deadlock he raised the question as to whether, if Mme Pandit's candidacy gains strength, Prince Wan may decide to withdraw. He made clear, however, the very high regard which the US has for Mr. Van Kleffens and our conviction that he would make an excellent presiding officer. He agreed that we would consider the ideas put forward by the Netherlands Government and get in touch with them sometime in the near future.

Subject: Dutch Interest in European Presidency of the 9th General Assembly

Participants: Dr. J. G. de Beus, Minister, Netherlands Embassy
UNA—Mr. Sandifer

Mr. de Beus called with further reference to his conversation with Mr. Murphy on August 14 concerning the presidency of the 8th General Assembly. He said that after his conversation with us and also with the French and British and one or two others, his Government had decided not to put forward Mr. Van Kleffens' candidacy for the 8th General Assembly. Mr. de Beus said that his Government had instructed him, however, to indicate the strong interest of the Netherlands Government in European presidency of the 9th General Assembly. They hoped that the United States would be able to agree not to make any commitment with reference to the 9th General Assembly until they had had an opportunity to consider any possible European candidacy. His Government would not, of course, be able to say at the present time that Mr. Van Kleffens would be available as a candidate but they did feel very strongly that it was time for the presidency to be held by a European state.

I told Mr. De Beus that while, of course, I could not give any official commitment, I was sure that the Department would look sympathetically on this request and that if it were repeated at a timely moment after the adjournment of the 8th General Assembly it should receive favorable consideration in the Department.

"Department believes important we ascertain Turkey's chances immediately and requests you sound out NATO and Latin American countries soonest. At same time we believe you should urge Sarper assist in these sound'ngs." (330/8-2553)

1. For reasons of both domestic politics and national prestige, Turkey is reluctant to become candidate until and unless it obtains reasonable assurances of success.

2. He is not convinced Turkish candidacy will be successful. Much will depend on Arab-Asian votes, and preliminary soundings by Turkish delegation give little reason to believe many of them will support Turkey.

3. He has hesitated himself to sound out NATO and Latin American delegates, whose support he believes essential, because he thinks such approaches would be premature and might easily be more harmful than helpful. In this connection, he pointed out that some of these delegates are deeply interested in setting up political conference on Korea and also possible conference of Foreign Ministers and that their initial reaction at this time might be adverse to Turkey's candidacy against Soviet bloc candidate.

4. In light of above, Sarper urged that US should take initiative in sounding out NATO and Latin American countries on degree of their support should Turkey's candidacy be announced.

NEW YORK, August 31, 1953—8 p. m.

137. Re Turkish candidacy for Security Council :

Crosthwaite and Ramsbotham (UK delegation) today informed Wadsworth of preliminary UK views regarding successor of Greece on Security Council. They said views are to let "nature take its course" as they understand US intends to do in connection with Prince Wan-Madame Pandit candidacies for president of 8th General Assembly and thus to permit Soviet-designated satellite to succeed Greece.

As reasons, they adduced belief that no unnecessary obstacles should be placed in path of what may turn out to be a gradually developing Soviet initiative to reduce world tensions. UK believes Soviet initiative should be met by free world no more but no less than half way and that major conflict over Security Council seat may be detrimental to this larger goal. UK also believes that if US decides not to use its great influence against Soviet-satellite candidate, its election would be almost automatic.

As second reason they adverted to well known UK views concerning "gentlemen's agreement" and principle, which UK does not wish to endanger, of one seat going to British Commonwealth.

Third reason consisted of fear that, even despite possible British support of Turkey, there might still be considerable number Arab-Asian votes, some Latin American votes and few miscellaneous Western Europe votes which would force balloting to go way past 20 ballots necessary in 1951 before Greece was elected. In such situation, UK would be most reluctant again to be on opposite side of fence from US, as it recently was on Indian nomination to membership political conference. UK Foreign Office, they said, attaches high value to avoiding similar splits with US in future. As personal reason, Crosthwaite adduced his recollection of anti-UK resentments engendered in Greece in 1951 during balloting for Security Council. He said UK hopes strongly to avoid creating analogous anti-UK resentments in Turkey.

In light of above UK views, which he stressed as only preliminary Crosthwaite requested that USUN inform his delegation as soon as possible of degree of importance which US attaches to possible Turkish candidacy. He asked that this inquiry be held as strictly confidential.

Wadsworth agreed to seek from Department urgent instructions in regard to UK query and added that, in meantime, he can only say that US undoubtedly will remain strongly opposed to satellite election to Security Council but that US understands Turkey does not wish to press its candidacy unless it receives advance assurances of adequate support.

election non-Soviet candidate succeed Greece, and that it will give firm support to Turkey if it decides run or to some other suitable non-Soviet candidate. We therefore urge UK seriously consider following points in particular before reaching final decision :

1. In our view election satellite candidate would not reduce world tensions. USSR has not yet given any indication sincerity peaceful intent. Election satellite under these circumstances and after Assembly has twice decided election Soviet candidate unjustified would give Soviet bloc certification to which its conduct does not entitle it and thus encourage it continue its obstructive policies. USSR could interpret election satellite candidate as vindication Soviet bloc policies, using as basis this interpretation Article 23 which provides that in SC elections due regard should be given in first instance contribution of members to maintenance international peace and security and other purposes Organization.

2. Election satellite would give USSR additional vote on anti-free world and other issues on which safe voting margin important to UK.

3. So-called gentlemen's understanding was in our view commitment for first year only. However, US and others have supported continued allocation of seats on basis this understanding where justified. Rejection satellite candidate past two elections has not jeopardized election other countries, including Commonwealth, in accordance geographic pattern decided upon for first election and followed succeeding years. We therefore see no reason why rejection satellite candidate this year would endanger Commonwealth seat.

4. If UK supported Turkey we are inclined believe long deadlock and repetition difficulties experienced 1951 during Greek campaign could be avoided.

Re latter point until we know reactions Latin Americans and other NATO powers to possible Turkish candidacy we cannot assess accurately Turkey's chances or degree to which US would have to take strong stand obtain its election either with or without UK backing. It is therefore important you sound out others soonest.

89. Re General Committee slate (Delga 611 and USUN's 141)<sup>2</sup> following are Department's preliminary views. Would appreciate USUN's comments.

1. Broad objective should be to elect individuals who will be competent chairmen and to assure safe balance friendly members on Committee. Since question of agenda item on Chinese representation may very well be raised General Committee, safe margin on this issue particularly important.

2. We should endeavor in so far as possible support slate which follows geographic pattern usually adhered to in past under which Committee (exclusive Ad Hoc Committee Chairman) consists of Big Five, three Latin Americans, three from Near and Far East, and one each from British Commonwealth, Western Europe and Soviet bloc. We should also follow usual policy ascertaining views majority Latin Americans before deciding on Latin American candidates. However we would want to know immediately if Guatemala becomes candidate and appears have Latin American support.

3. We assume Big Five will have five Vice-Presidencies and we would support Latin American for sixth. For seventh we might consider Turkey if it does not run for SC, Israel which was candidate last year but lost by one vote, or Arab State if Arab is not elected Committee Chairman. We realize Pakistan and possibly Greece are candidates but these states were on General Committee last year.

4. Believe Soviet satellite Chairman would be least objectionable Committee six where controversial issues not likely arise and Soviet can be little more obstructive as Chairman than as delegate. Do not agree suggestion of Cordier and UK that Nosek be considered for Committee two or Danish suggestion Committee three. If Robinson or other non-Soviet candidate given Committee six, we believe only other spot for satellite would be Vice-Presidency.

5. Re remaining posts:

(a) Committee 1—Suitable Western European or Wan. However we would not wish suggest Wan unless he withdraws from Presidency race and in meantime should not even mention his name to others. Believe Sarper, who is apparently candidate, should not be considered as long as Turkey may run for SC.

(b) Ad Hoc—Latin American (possibly Urquia (El Salvador) or Perez-Perez (Venezuela)).

(c) Committee 2—Mates (Yugoslavia)

(d) Committee 3—Davidson (Canada) is candidate and we believe would be excellent.

(e) Committee 4—We would much prefer Latin American to Khalidy (Iraq). Believe Urquia (El Salvador) would be good possibility in view his TC experience. However, if he is not interested we might consider de la Colina (Mexico) or Nunez-Portuondo (Cuba) if he attends.

(f) Committee 5—Azkoul (Lebanon) would be acceptable to us and we hope his name not withdrawn. However, if his candidacy not feasible suitable Latin American or Western European should be considered.

147. Re Turkish SC Candidacy:

In addition to those previously reported, following represents summary of preliminary reactions to canvass requested in Deptel 87:

1. Canada: George reported his government had taken no final position. It was "working level" opinion which felt that was turn of satellite for seat being vacated by Greece.

2. Sweden: Van Otter and Westerburg indicated that Scandinavian Foreign Minister meeting had not given any real consideration to this point since no candidate had officially come forward. (Only decisions, in addition to one reported in New York Times today, were to support Norway's candidacy for ECOSOC, and Denmark for a commission which Van Otter could not recall.)

3. New Zealand: Scott said they had seen nothing about SC candidacies save their own. He understood Macintosh would bring full brief to Washington when he attends ANZUS meetings. Scott inclined to believe his government's view would not be too far from US view.

4. France: Ordonneau reported French delegation not inclined to favor Turkey who had vacated seat so recently. Also saw no substantial disadvantage in having satellite. West's support for satellite might show whether such gestures produced corresponding Soviet gestures.

5. Netherlands: Van Lynden said delegation had not yet received instructions, but believed Hague favored giving seat back to satellite, preferring Byelorussia or Ukraine to Poland or Czechoslovakia, since latter shaky part Soviet orbit and might be bolstered by election to SC.

6. Lebanon: Rizk said delegation uninstructed but personally doubted they would favor Turkey.

7. Egypt: Hassan said matter not yet considered, but wondered why Egypt should not have Greek seat.

8. Israel: Eliath reported question undecided but Israel tended favor giving seat to satellite as step toward encouraging accord on other matters.

9. Iraq: Khalidy said although no decisions taken on Greek seat, important question for them was making sure Iraq would succeed to Lebanon seat. Arabs wished keep "Arab" seat rather than have it allotted to larger area. If we able promise support Iraq, they probably would be able support Turkey. As between Turkey and satellite, would favor Turkey.

10. Pakistan: Tyabji said delegation was without instructions but believed Asian-African group would be opposed to Turkey. It seems early to put up Turkey again and he doubted wisdom increasing Turkey's appearance of US satellite. Recommended consideration be given Thailand or Philippines who would receive full support Asian-African group.

11. China: Kiang stated Turks had approached them for support which China had agreed give.

12. Colombia: Urrutia was of firm opinion that great majority of LA's would oppose election of Soviet satellite to replace Greece, and therefore would be likely to support Turkey.

13. Brazil: Pinto, on other hand, feared that argument in favor of electing Soviet satellite might appeal to number of LA's especially if such views were pushed by UK and others. On balance, however, he believed majority would share our views and could be counted upon to vote for Turkey, should that candidacy eventuate.

14. Ecuador: Trujillo was very much against idea of returning satellite to SC. He thought most LA's would take same position and believed Turkey probably would be acceptable to them. Since none presently has specific instructions, he urged desirability of taking up question promptly with other American republics through regular diplomatic channels. Also, he suggested that Turkey would be well advised to seek their support officially without delay.

15. El Salvador: Urquia was more cautious in expressing opinion. However, he was inclined to believe that his government as well as majority of LA's would prefer not to see Soviet satellite replace Greece and therefore probably would support Turkey if that country emerged as candidate.

16. Mexico: De La Colina was non-committal since, as he put it, he did not know what position Padilla Nervo would take. He suggested possibility, however, of going outside Eastern European geographic area for candidate to replace Greece. Specifically, he had in mind apportioning SC seat this year to Asian nation such as Thailand.

NEW YORK, September 8, 1953—6 p. m.

160. Re slates: Crosthwaite and Ramsbotham (UK Delegation) today called on me to discuss latest Foreign Office instructions on slates. They explained that Foreign Office has moved closer to US as regards opposing Soviet satellite candidate to succeed Greece on Security Council. Foreign Office sees some merit in Turkey to succeed Greece insofar as Turkey is NATO partner and is from area neighboring on Eastern Europe. However, Foreign Office sees serious disadvantage to Turkish candidacy in that Middle East would be over-represented on Security Council if Turkey were to serve simultaneously with Lebanon. Also, Turkey left Security Council only at end of 1952.

Foreign Office therefore inquires whether US would agree to Security Council seat going to Far Eastern country, particularly Thailand. In light of fact that Pakistan has just announced decision to support Madame Pandit for president of Eighth General Assembly, Prince Wan's chances of obtaining Arab-Asian votes for presidency are considerably restricted, and his candidacy will probably fail. Consequently, Foreign Office asks, would US agree to support Thailand to succeed Greece on Security Council, both as consolation prize and as effort to strengthen Thailand's resistance against Communist pressure in Southeast Asia. Foreign Office believes it would be much easier for UK to support Thailand than Turkey.

On basis of UK delegation thinking, Crosthwaite continued that if Turkey does not become candidate for Security Council, Sarper should be supported for chairmanship of Committee 1. UK soundings in New York indicate that neither Sweden nor Denmark will have any delegate available for Committee 1 chairmanship and that only Scandinavian possibility will be Hans Engen of Norway. UK information of a month ago indicates that Van Langehove (Belgium) is not interested in Committee 1 chairmanship on grounds of age and health. Crosthwaite does not think it desirable further to pursue possibility of Western European chairman of Committee 1 until US views known on Sarper as chairman.

Crosthwaite said UK expects Urquia (El Salvador) to be Ad Hoc chairman; Davidson (Canada) to be Committee 3 chairman; and either a Venezuelan or Mexican to be Committee 4 chairman; For committee 2 chairman, UK still sees advantages in supporting Nosek (Czechoslovakia), but Wadsworth told him US by considerable margin still prefers Mates (Yugoslavia) for this post and believes Soviet satellite should be shunted into Committee 6 chairmanship. Crosthwaite saw some advantages in Azkoul (Lebanon) as Committee 5 chairman, especially as it would affect favorably Israeli chances for a vice presidency.

If Sarper is elected to chairmanship of Committee 1, Crosthwaite would see little room left for Greece as vice president. One vice presidency, he thinks, would go to Latin American candidate and other would probably be contested between Pakistan and Israel. UK delegation sees some advantages in supporting Israel, particularly in light of reports that Arab delegations may boycott any committee chaired by an Israeli, but had some doubts whether Israel could obtain sufficient votes for election. UK delegation has no instructions regarding Pakistan candidacy for vice presidency, but recognized that Commonwealth considerations may make it imperative for UK to vote for Pakistan which always strives to share UN honors equally with India. On other hand, UK delegation recognizes difficulties in electing itself, India, Canada and Pakistan all to General Committee and looks with some trepidation to next year when Commonwealth representation on General Committee as consequence presumably would be much restricted. I agreed to seek from Department urgent instructions for reply to UK initiative.

United States Delegation Position Paper

CONFIDENTIAL

[NEW YORK,] September 28, 1953.

ELECTIONS TO INTERNATIONAL LAW COMMISSION

THE PROBLEM

The terms of all fifteen members of the International Law Commission expire this year. Under the Commission's Statute, the General Assembly is to elect a new membership at the Eighth Session of the General Assembly. The new terms will be for three years. No two members of the Commission may be nationals of the same country. The Commission's Statute provides that the members shall "individually possess the qualifications required" and that, in the Commission as a whole, "representation of the main forms of civilization and of the principal legal systems of the world" shall be assured. Candidates for election to the Commission are nominated by the governments of United Nations members.

RECOMMENDATION

1) The United States present position is to support the following candidates:

Professor J. P. A. Francois (Dutch)
 Ambassador Hsu Shu-hsi (Chinese)
 Faris Bey el-Khoury (Syrian)
 Professor Hersch Lauterpacht (British)
 Mr. Justice Thado Maha Thray Sithu Myint Thein (Burmese)
 Dr. Radhabinod Pal (Indian)
 Judge John J. Parker (American)
 Mr. Justice A. E. F. Sandstrom (Swedish)
 Professor Georges Scelle (French)
 Professor Jean Spiropoulos (Greek)

2) The United States should support four Latin American candidates. In the absence of overriding circumstances, the United States should support the four Latin American candidates which have the majority support of the Latin Americans. If a Guatemalan should be the choice of the Latin Americans, the Delegation should immediately consult the Department.

3) The United States vote in regard to a candidate from the USSR for the remaining one seat is still under consideration.

DISCUSSION

Commission members are eligible for reelection, and of the ten candidates listed under paragraph (1) of the Recommendation eight have been members of the Commission. Owing to his ill health, Professor Hudson was not nominated by the United States for reelection. The United States nominated Judge Parker and will support and vote for him. Because of the underrepresentation of the Far East on the Commission, the slate which has been recommended includes Justice Myint Thein of Burma for the seat now occupied by Mr. Jaroslav Zourek of Czechoslovakia.

There are presently four Latin Americans on the ILC, but several more than four Latin American candidates have been nominated. The United States expects to vote for four Latin American candidates, and the Latin American delegations may be so informed. Before determining which four candidates, the United States would wish to know the choices of the Latin American caucus.

The United States vote with regard to the candidate from the USSR has not yet been decided. Mr. F. I. Kozhevnikov of the USSR, who has been a member of the Commission, has been renominated.

The slate recommended in this paper cannot be considered as final, since we do not now have a list of all the nominations which may be before the General Assembly this fall. In addition, the United States will wish to know the views of other delegations to the Assembly before coming to a final decision on the complete slate.

1. Point out precedents both ways, i.e., (a) withdrawal by states from one council upon election to another; and (b) instances where states other than great powers have served on more than one council at same time; and

2. Give him discretion as to whether and when to withdraw from ECOSOC to improve Turkey's chances on SC.

Sarper considered that clear import of his instructions was that he should ensure Turkey's election SC and at same time maintain membership ECOSOC if possible.

Sarper reported that to his knowledge announcement Turkey's intention withdraw from ECOSOC would affect only two votes in SC election, those of Pakistan and Argentina.

It seems apparent that Turkey does not intend announce any intention withdraw from ECOSOC until it becomes clear that this is necessary to ensure Turkey's election to SC, i.e., certainly not until after first couple ballots in SC election. Sarper intends, lest any misunderstanding may arise, to make this position clear to both Pakistan and Argentina before balloting in SC election begins. Sarper also reported that Israel has definitely agreed support Turkey for SC.

Gadel 16. Re: ECOSOC and TC Slate (Delga 53).

1. ECOSOC Slate

US should vote for Pakistan if it is a candidate. If it is not, or if an additional seat becomes available through resignation of Turkey, you should vote for Indonesia rather than Afghanistan. This decision based on following factors:

(a) Provides much better geographic balance in ECOSOC, since if Indonesia not elected China will be only Far Eastern area member on Council, while Middle East will be represented by Pakistan, India, Egypt and Afghanistan.

(b) US support for Indonesia would strengthen Indonesian elements opposed to increasing Communist dominance in Indonesia, whereas our opposition would embarrass non-Communist forces in Indonesia.

(c) While Afghanistan voting record re Chinese representation better than Indonesia's, since Afghanistan usually abstains, this factor not of overriding importance so long as current moratorium agreement survives. If agreement is terminated, since both states recognize Chinese communists, probability would vote against us on substance of Chinese representation question.

2. T.C. Slate

Indonesia is our candidate for seat being vacated by Thailand. If, however, Indonesia is elected to ECOSOC, or does not run for TC, you should explore alternatives to India's candidacy, and if it appears likely any other candidate could be successful, consult Dept.

3. Considerations re Chinese Representation

We recognize it would be more desirable to support for these posts states which do not recognize Communist China. However, Thailand and Philippines only two states in Far Eastern area which meet this criterion, and both informed us they not interested. We therefore see no alternative to instructions contained this telegram.

Delga 63. Reference SC Elections. Ambassador Malik of the USSR came in to see me this afternoon at his request. He stated that the Security Council elections are on the agenda of tomorrow's GA plenary and that this is a good time to restore the "gentlemen's agreement" which was negotiated in London in 1946 regarding the distribution of the six non-permanent seats in the SC. He went on to say that two of the seats, it was then agreed, were to go to Latin America, one to Western Europe, one to the British Commonwealth, one to Eastern Europe and one to the Middle East. To restore this "gentlemen's agreement", Mr. Malik went on to say, would be just and in accordance with the geographical requirement referred to in the Charter.

I replied that the "gentlemen's agreement" negotiated in 1946 was in our view an agreement for that year and was not intended to last indefinitely. Wainhouse stated that it was Stevenson who negotiated this agreement with Gromyko and that Mr. Stevenson<sup>1</sup> has since confirmed our interpretation with respect to the length of time it was to last.<sup>2</sup>

I stated to Mr. Malik that I was pleased that he came in to talk to me about this; that I would report this conversation at once to the State Department; and that it is our intention to vote for Turkey for that seat.

Mr. Malik expressed regret at having to break up my Sunday holiday. I replied that I am always glad to see him, and at any time.

Mr. Malik appeared in dark glasses as he entered the building, took them off in the elevator, and put them on again when he left the building.

As Wainhouse escorted Malik out of the building, the latter inquired about former Ambassador Jessup. 2 Park Avenue, Mr. Malik stated, is where he and Ambassador Jessup negotiated the Berlin (blockade) agreement.

Memorandum by the United Nations Adviser, Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs (Bacon), to the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs (Robertson)

CONFIDENTIAL

[WASHINGTON,] October 13, 1953.

Subject: Far Eastern Representation on Major UN Councils.

In the elections just concluded in the General Assembly for Major UN Councils, no Far Eastern states were elected. As of January 1, 1954, China will be the only Far Eastern state on the three Councils which comprise a total membership of 41 seats.

If present procedures are adhered to, there is little prospect of any increase in FE representation on the Councils within the next few years. Under the normal geographic distribution of non-permanent Security Council seats now followed, no provision is made for Far Eastern representation and no Far Eastern state has ever been supported by the United States for, or elected to, the Security Council. So far as the Economic and Social Council is concerned, if a Far Eastern state other than China is to be elected at any future election, it will have to displace a candidate from some other geographic area. So far as the Trusteeship Council is concerned, there will normally be no election until 1955 at which time a Far Eastern candidate would have to displace either a Latin American or a Near Eastern candidate.

I am aware of the special political considerations which influenced the selection of our slates this year, particularly the difficult problems relating to Thailand and Turkey and that our intention to support

Indonesia for the Trusteeship Council was frustrated by developments. I am not in any sense lacking in understanding of the decisions reached. The resulting situation, however, is not a salutary one in terms either of developing United States political relations with Far Eastern states most effectively or of strengthening the interest of these states in the UN. I believe, accordingly, that it would be desirable to re-examine our present practices to see if, with foresight and advance planning, we cannot work toward a distribution of seats on these Councils in the future which will give adequate scope to the Far Eastern area.

The following suggestions occur to me:

1. Economic and Social Council: Under present Departmental practices, one seat on this Council is reserved for rotation among the Scandinavian states and another seat is reserved for the Benelux countries. These two groups of states have received many UN posts and often have to be urged to put forward candidates for election. By contrast, this year we had four Asian states—Afghanistan, Indonesia, Pakistan and the Philippines—actively fighting to obtain the one seat which we regarded as available for an Asian state at this election. This situation might be eased if we reserved one seat for the combined Scandinavian-Benelux group and released the other to permit Far Eastern representation.

2. Security Council: Under existing procedures, no place is earmarked for the Far East at any time. One seat is, however, reserved for rotation among the Eastern European states and another among the British Commonwealth countries. Consideration might be given to releasing one of these seats on alternate elections for use in the Far East. As we are now proceeding, the "Eastern European seat" rotates between Yugoslavia, Greece and Turkey. Practically all of the Commonwealth countries have by now held the Security Council post. The present arrangement was worked out before several Far Eastern states had become UN members and the arrangement is clearly inequitable and obsolete. As it is our position that the "Gentlemen's Agreement" on geographic distribution of seats was applicable only to the first year and as we have subsequently expanded the application of that arrangement in the case of the Eastern European seat to include Greece and Turkey, there would seem to be no insuperable obstacle to making a further adjustment, so long as the Latin American states are assured that no effort will be made to curtail their representation. To operate under rules which in effect exclude Far Eastern states from any hope of election to the Security Council is to deprive them of privileges to which they are entitled under the Charter.

So far as Chinese representation is concerned, these two suggestions need not create new or added problems. While some of the Far Eastern states have recognized the Chinese Communists, the same is true of some states among the Scandinavian, Benelux and British Commonwealth groups. At the recent ECOSOC elections, for example, we supported Norway for the "Scandinavian seat" although it has recognized the Chinese Communists and does not adhere to the moratorium arrangement. India, which obtained the Trusteeship Council seat, is an ardent advocate of the immediate seating of the Chinese Communists.

Other and better ways of improving on the present situation concerning Far Eastern under-representation on UN Councils may exist. The problem is one which I bring to your attention in the belief that it deserves serious consideration at an early date. I believe also that the whole problem of equitable distribution of seats on major Councils should be kept in mind in connection with Departmental projects on Charter review.

You might point out that past practice, as well as Article 14 of Statute read in relation to Article 5, would argue for at least three months to elapse between issuing request for nominations and election. Furthermore, since it is not known whether or when Eighth GA might reconvene it would be difficult schedule election during reconvened Eighth GA. Subject: Request for Appointment from Dr. van Kleffens, Candidate for President of Ninth General Assembly.

Discussion:

The Netherlands Embassy has informed the Department that Dr. van Kleffens will be in Washington December 10 and 11 and would like to call on you. He was the Netherlands Ambassador to the United States from 1948 to 1950, and has been their Minister to Portugal since 1950. He was the Netherlands Representative on the United Nations Security Council in 1946 and 1947. A biographic report on him is attached (Tab A).<sup>2</sup>

Van Kleffens will probably wish to discuss his candidacy for the Presidency of the Ninth General Assembly. The Netherlands Delegation in New York has informed us that the UK, France and Benelux countries have agreed to support him and that it is almost certain the British Commonwealth countries will do likewise. To our knowledge there are no other candidates, although it has been rumored that Belaunde of Peru might be interested.

In October, Netherlands Foreign Minister Luns mentioned to me that there has not been a European President since Spaak was President in 1946 and remarked that the Dutch were considering proposing van Kleffens. I replied that the Dutch should have no false modesty in pressing his candidacy and that we would like to have him.

Subject: Elections to UN Security Council

Miss Salt called on instructions to advise us that recently the Belgian Government approached the UK to indicate their desire to be elected to Denmark's seat on the SC. They stated that the Swedish Government is also interested but has yet made no decision and asked the UK to seek to dissuade the Swedes from seeking the post. The UK replied that they could not do so, but in response to a further request from the Belgians have agreed to point out to the Swedish Government the desirability of an early decision by Sweden as to whether it desired to run. The UK position is that this is a matter primarily for Sweden and Belgium to resolve and that the UK will support whichever one decides to run. The Foreign Office pointed out, however, that Sweden has never been on the SC and in Miss Salt's view the Foreign Office was inclined to be more sympathetic to Sweden's candidacy.

In response to Miss Salt's question I stated so far as I was aware we had not yet been approached by the Belgians and this was the first we had heard of their interest. I recalled it has been the normal practice for the Scandinavians and Benelux countries to alternate in holding this Council post and that Sweden's candidacy would alter this practice. I added the personal view that we would probably be more sympathetic to Belgium's candidacy because of the problem of Chinese representation in the SC. However, I felt certain that we would be similarly reluctant to become involved in the conflicting desires of the Swedes and Belgians and would hope that the two of them could work it out.

[WASHINGTON,] March 11, 1954.

Subject: UN Security Council Elections

Miss Salt of the British Embassy has informed Mr. Allen (EUR) that the Belgians have indicated to the British their desire to be elected to Denmark's Security Council seat at the Ninth Assembly. The Belgians stated that Sweden is also interested in this seat, although it has made no decision, and asked the UK to dissuade the Swedes from running. The UK, however, believes that this is a matter for Belgium and Sweden to decide and does not wish to intervene.

One of the non-permanent seats on the Security Council has always been allocated to Western Europe, and it has been the normal practice for the Benelux and Scandinavian countries to rotate this seat. On this basis it would be Belgium's turn. However, Sweden has never been elected to the Council whereas Belgium has already served one term. For this reason the British Foreign Office seems inclined to be more sympathetic to Sweden, although it will support whichever country decides to run.

As far as "cold war" issues are concerned, we could probably count on 8 favorable votes next year (US, China, France, UK, Turkey, Brazil, New Zealand, and a Latin American country to be elected this fall) even if Sweden were elected. However, Sweden recognizes the Chinese Communist regime and sides with the USSR on the Chinese representation issue, whereas Belgium does not recognize the Communists and has supported the "moratorium" position in the UN. While we cannot predict Belgium's position in the future, since this will depend in large part upon the position of the UK and France, we would at least have a better chance of obtaining support from Belgium than from Sweden on the question of Chinese representation.

It has been the practice for the Europeans to agree among themselves on a candidate for the Western European seat. However, in view of the importance of obtaining as safe a margin as possible on the Chinese representation issue, it seems to us that we should take steps this year to stimulate Belgium's candidacy. The matter would have to be handled carefully, since interference on our part might be resented and prove counterproductive. Perhaps the best procedure would be to discuss the matter informally with the British. We could say that while the choice of a European candidate is a matter for the Europeans to decide, the Department has assumed that Belgium would be the European candidate in view of the past practice of rotating this seat between the Scandinavian and Benelux countries. We could take this same line if other Europeans approach us, including either the Belgians or Swedes.

If you agree with this approach, we will try to obtain clearance with the other bureaus concerned.

Belgians asked UK to seek dissuade Swedes from running but UK unwilling interfere and believes question which country should run for European seat is matter for Belgium and Sweden to decide.

Neither Belgium nor Sweden has approached us. FYI however, since Sweden recognizes Chinese Commies and supports USSR on Chinese representation issue whereas Belgium does not recognize Commies and presently supports our position on representation, and in view desirability obtaining as safe margin as possible on this issue, Department believes we should take steps stimulate Belgium's candidacy. Situation as stated by Langenhove is: (a) Swedes approached Belgians indicating interest on grounds Sweden had never been member of SC while other Benelux and Scandinavian countries had been. (b) Belgians advised Swedes they should make early decision whether to run. (c) Langenhove under impression UK has also advised Swedes to make early decision. (d) Decision now up to Unden. He observed also number of countries other geographic areas had never been member of SC. Swedish candidacy might give such other countries ideas.

Subject: Security Council and ECOSOC Slates

The following is the present situation regarding the Security Council and ECOSOC slates:

Security Council

Denmark, Colombia, and Lebanon go off the Council at the end of this year.

(1) Western European seat—Belgium and Sweden are both interested in Denmark's seat. We are trying quietly to stimulate Belgium's candidacy because of Sweden's position on Chinese representation.

(2) Latin American seat—Cuba and Peru have asked our support for election to Colombia's seat. We assume we would support the choice of the Latin American caucus.

(3) Middle Eastern seat—Iran and Iraq have asked our support for election to succeed Lebanon. However, we have heard that Iraq might withdraw because of a 1952 commitment to support Iran in 1954 if the latter would stand down in favor of Lebanon. From the standpoint of our relations with Iran in particular and the Middle East in general it would be difficult for us to oppose Iran if it is the Middle East candidate. However, there are other countries which would be preferable to us as Members of the Council, such as Ethiopia or the Philippines. We should consider very soon whether to support Iran if it is the Middle Eastern candidate or to support and, if necessary, urge some other country to run.

ECOSOC

The terms of China, France, Argentina, Cuba, Belgium and Egypt expire the end of this year.

(1) Two Great Power Seats—We will support the reelection of China and France.

(2) Two Latin American Seats—We should support two Latin American countries to succeed Argentina and Cuba (Argentina, Colombia, Chile and the Dominican Republic are candidates).

(3) Belgian Seat—The election to fill Belgium's seat will be a problem. Poland has just announced its candidacy for ECOSOC, probably with this seat in mind. Since Belgium may run for the Security Council and has had two consecutive terms in ECOSOC, since the Netherlands is running van Kleffens for General Assembly President, and since the Scandinavians are now represented on ECOSOC by Norway, it may be that the only country in Western Europe that might be a candidate is Luxembourg. However, the latter has not been interested in election to the Councils. Therefore, we should give serious consideration to possible candidates from some other area. Thailand or the Philippines are possibilities.

(4) Egyptian Seat—The election to fill Egypt's seat also presents a problem. Afghanistan has been trying to get the green light from us. Mr. Byroade has expressed a very strong interest in our supporting Afghanistan and feels it might even be a good thing, if it could be done, if we could give it some kind of assurance to clarify our position even at this early date. However, we have not wanted to encourage Afghanistan because candidates would probably appear which would be preferable to us from the standpoint of the Chinese representation and other issues. (Iraq is now considering whether to run.)

Suggested Action

That we have a UNA meeting to consider these slates questions, especially Lebanon's Security Council seat and Belgium's and Egypt's ECOSOC seat.

Subject: Election for Denmark's Security Council Seat

As you know, Belgium and Sweden are both interested in election at the Ninth Assembly to the Security Council seat now held by Denmark. The UK believes it is up to the two countries to decide which country will run and is unwilling to interfere. However, since Sweden supports the seating of Chinese Communists in the UN, we decided we should take steps quietly to stimulate Belgium's candidacy. Accordingly, we have informed the British we favor Belgium and have assumed it would be the candidate in view of the past practice of rotating the European seat between Scandinavian and Benelux countries. We also suggested that USUN tell the Belgians that we have assumed it would run. USUN has done this but reports that the Belgians seem to be taking a "modest" attitude toward a possible Swedish candidacy and gave no indication of a desire to dissuade the Swedes.<sup>1</sup>

The attached cable,<sup>2</sup> for your signature, suggests that USUN go back to the Belgians and express the Department's view that Belgium need not hesitate in seeking the European seat in view of the past practice of Benelux-Scandinavian rotation.

The question still to be resolved is whether we should also discuss the question with the Swedes, telling them frankly that their candidacy would cause difficulties for us.

The arguments in favor are:

a) that our objective is to obtain as safe a margin as possible on the Chinese representation issue. Since Belgium is safer on this issue than Sweden, and since we cannot predict accurately the voting situation in the Council on this issue in 1955 or 1956, we should do what we can to assure that Sweden does not run.

b) that we would probably best be able to assure that Sweden does not run by going to the Swedes directly; and

c) that it would be easier to go to the Swedes now than to wait until they announce their candidacy and then have to inform them we could not support them.

The arguments against are:

a) that the Swedes would deeply resent an initial approach from us, particularly since they probably feel they have a good claim to the European seat. (Belgium has been on the Council before whereas Sweden has not). Interference of this kind would also be resented by other Europeans and might complicate our problems in maintaining their support in the UN.

b) that the Swedes probably realize their candidacy presents difficulties for us and would talk to us before deciding to run. We could then give them our views; and

c) that as far as Chinese representation is concerned, we cannot be certain even of Belgium's future position, which will probably depend in large part upon the attitude of the UK and France.

EUR prefers not to make an approach to the Swedes. FE feels that we should do what we can to ward off Sweden's candidacy but leaves the tactics to us. I wonder if you would not want to get Mr. Murphy's judgement on this question.

Mr. Wainhouse recalled that it was not our practice to commit ourselves this far in advance but assured the Ambassador that we were delighted to know that Dr. van Kleffens' hat was in the ring.

The Netherlands Ambassador (van Roijen) to the Secretary of State

D-3838

The Netherlands Ambassador presents his compliments to the Honorable the Secretary of State and, with reference to previous informal discussions at the Department of State, has the honor to draw the attention of Mr. Dulles to the question of the Chairmanship of the Ninth Regular Session of the United Nations General Assembly, to be held in New York next fall.

As the United States Government will be aware, since 1946, the Chairmanship of the General Assembly of the United Nations has been held by the following persons:

1946	1st General Assembly	Spaak (Belgium)
1947	1st Special General Assembly	Aranha (Brazil)
1947	2nd General Assembly	Aranha (Brazil)
1948	2nd Special General Assembly	Arce (Argentina)

<sup>1</sup> Drafted by Paul W. Jones, Jr., of the Office of UN Political and Security Affairs.

1948/49	3rd General Assembly	Evatt (Australia)
1949	4th General Assembly	Romulo (Philippines)
1950/51	5th General Assembly	Entezam (Iran)
1951/52	6th General Assembly	Nervo (Mexico)
1952/53	7th General Assembly	Pearson (Canada)
1953/54	8th General Assembly	Mrs. Lakhsmi Pandit (India)

It appears from this list that the Chairmanship of the United Nations General Assembly has been held on four occasions by representatives of Latin-American countries, thrice by representatives from Asia, twice by representatives of the Commonwealth, while Europe has been allocated the Chairmanship only once, eight years ago.

It would seem to follow in the opinion of the Netherlands Government that it would be entirely appropriate that the Chairmanship of the Ninth General Assembly should once again go to a representative of a European country.

On the basis of these considerations the Netherlands Government has invited Mr. E. N. van Kleffens, Minister of State; Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary, Minister to Portugal, to consent that his nomination be put in for this office, to which suggestion Mr. van Kleffens has agreed.

In the opinion of the Netherlands Government Mr. van Kleffens is entirely qualified and eminently suitable for holding the high office of Chairman of the General Assembly. Reference is made in this respect to his enclosed curriculum vitae.<sup>2</sup>

Under instructions from his Government, Dr. van Roijen has the honor to solicit the good offices of Mr. Dulles in obtaining the support of the United States Government for this candidature.

The Netherlands Ambassador avails himself of this opportunity to present to the Honorable the Secretary of State the assurances of his highest consideration.

463. Re SC Elections (urtel 559).<sup>2</sup>

1. Department agrees you can inform Belgians we definitely will support their election to SC if they become candidate for European seat. Assume Belgium already aware of this (urtel 537 and second approach to Belgians suggested Deptel 456). While we cannot guarantee future Belgian position on Chinese representation, it is certainly safer than that of Sweden (or other Scandinavians) and as safe as that of other Western European members.

2. We agree you can also tell UK we will definitely support Belgium if it runs. Re (A) and (B) of urtel, seems to us it would be preferable tell UK we are anxious avoid differences with our allies on European seat and consequently hope Sweden will not run because its candidacy would present very serious difficulties for us and to say we are not at all sure we could support Sweden without, however, indicating definite decision. Objective in talking UK should be get them take lead in developing Western European support for Belgium so that there can be unified West position on a candidate all of us can definitely support. We believe kind of approach suggested above would be as successful if not more successful way of achieving this objective. Furthermore if we informed UK we could not support Sweden even if it is European candidate and might have to vote for non-European, and if others including Sweden heard of this, this would cause deep resentment and could have unfortunate effects on our relationships in UN with Europeans.

Election Belgian Parliament will not be completed until 46 Senators to be elected by Provincial Councils April 26 can join with 106 directly elected Senators to appoint 23 co-opted Senators on May 4. Process forming new government can get under way now but completion process requires vote of confidence by full Parliament. It is impossible now to predict when new government will be formed or to know the party make-up of government which almost certainly will be coalition.

As Embassy has previously reported, Socialists generally favor recognition Red China and its admission UN. Appears very likely Socialists will participate new government.

We do not believe that definitive Belgian Government position on this question can be determined prior to formation new government and its consideration of problem. Embassy is of opinion we should sound out new government this issue before assuring full support Belgian candidate if time permits.

[WASHINGTON, April 20, 1954.]

DEAR CABOT: As you know, the Netherlands Government has formally announced the candidacy of Dr. van Kleffens, Netherlands Minister to Portugal, for the Presidency of the Ninth Session of the General Assembly. I think we should seriously consider reaching a prompt decision to support him and so advising the Netherlands Government.

Van Kleffens has been very friendly to the United States. (He was Netherlands Ambassador here from 1947 to 1950.) He is an able man and well qualified for the Presidency. As Chairman of the Netherlands Delegation at the San Francisco Conference and as their Permanent Representative to the United Nations in 1946 and 1947, he has had valuable experience with the United Nations.

Moreover, it is time for a European to be elected. The last time there was a European President was in 1946, when Spaak of Belgium held the office. We understand that the UK, France and Benelux countries have agreed to support van Kleffens. To our knowledge there are no other candidates.

While it has not been our general practice to make a decision so far in advance of the Assembly, I think the circumstances of this case justify an early commitment. If we make a commitment now and van Kleffens' candidacy gains sufficient momentum, this might discourage the development of other candidacies and thus help avoid a difficult situation later.

I wish to sound out the regional bureaus in the Department on this matter but before doing so I would appreciate receiving your views.

Sincerely yours,

DAVID MCK. KEY

805. Pass USUN Deptels 1030, April 16 [15] and 1035, April 20 [19].<sup>1</sup> While we do not know extent to which UN practice calls for selection Benelux or Scandinavian candidate for UNSC this year, we offer following observations on Belgian aspects this problem in light reference telegrams.

1. Composition new Belgian Government not yet known, but all present signs point to coalition with Socialist participation. As stated in Embtel 777, April 13 Socialists have long favored recognition Communist China and its entry into UN. At same time Socialists have in majority supported European integration and other important international policies in line with US objectives and have not been alone in Belgian political circles in favoring recognition Communist China and its entry into UN. Perhaps majority Belgian political figures of all parties have had leanings in that direction. Unless there is radical change in situation, however, we do not believe that any Belgian Government in foreseeable future, any more than in past, could unilaterally change its present policy in this regard. Any change would be expected to come as result action or pressure by UK or France in which case any Belgian Government might well follow British or French lead. Impulse to do so would be stronger in case of government with Socialist participation.

2. If US failed to support Belgian candidacy to UNSC and gave support to nation from other area of world, Belgian resentment would likely be aroused particularly if other friendly western powers did support Belgian or Scandinavian candidate in accordance with what Belgians considered accepted UN practice. In that event it would seem difficult for us to give Belgians what they would consider convincing explanation our lack of support.

I have discussed this matter with my staff and they agree that van Kleffens would be a good man and that, in order to discourage other candidacies, it would be desirable to make our views well known in advance.

My only concern is that we should not publicize our position too widely too far in advance. We should tell the Dutch and I should like to do that here in order to get the maximum advantage out of it. Thereafter we could judicially leak our position to others as circumstances indicate.

WASHINGTON, April 26, 1954—7:25 p. m.

522. Re Brussels 777, USUN 628 and Brussels 805 :

1. Department agrees that in view major importance Chinese representation issue we must make every practicable effort obtain as safe majorities as possible in UN bodies with respect this question. Department also agrees Thailand or Philippines would be excellent SC members and that fact neither these countries has been elected to SC is strong argument in their favor. However effort take Western European seat away from Western Europe and give it to one of these Far Eastern countries or some other non-European would in Department's view involve following most serious difficulties :

a) We would have to engage our prestige in active campaign against our European allies. This would cause deep resentment in these countries and could have serious effects upon our relationships with them in UN. Would be particularly difficult for us to campaign against Belgium which has been strong NATO and EDC supporter and has contributed troops Korea.

b) It is more than doubtful we could obtain two-thirds vote for our candidate in such campaign. We have had difficulty enough in taking Eastern European seat away from Soviet bloc and giving it to Yugoslavia, Greece and now Turkey. It would be all the more difficult take Western European seat from Western Europeans. Concept of geographical distribution is deeply ingrained, and attempt to alter it would raise hornet's nest. In addition Western Europe we must expect British Commonwealth would oppose us. Many LA countries would probably also oppose out of fear further change in geographic distribution would jeopardize their own representation on Council, a matter which is of utmost importance to them. Soviet bloc might also join these groups against us out of desire try divide our allies from us or might put up own candidate against Western Europe.

2. Moreover, Department estimates we will be able keep Chinese Communists out of SC next year regardless of what country elected succeed Denmark. Even if UK should abandon "moratorium" arrangement and Western Europe and British Commonwealth should follow suit, we believe we could still count on five votes (US, China, Turkey, Brazil, and LA country to be elected this fall) to prevent adoption of motion unseat Tsiang and seat Communist.

3. In light of above it is Department's present conclusion it would be impracticable to try build up non-European candidate for Western European SC seat. In fact it seems to Department that since European candidate to succeed Denmark will be Belgium or Sweden, we should try now promote Belgian candidacy. Longer we wait before taking any steps this direction, greater the likelihood Sweden will run and actually be elected. Although we cannot guarantee Belgium's future position on Chinese representation, we definitely have better chance of getting support from Belgium which has not recognized Chinese Communist regime than from Sweden, which has recognized Chinese Communist regime and we expect will continue favor seating Chinese Communists in UN. Department agrees with Embassy Brussels comment (Brussels 805) that in absence radical change in situation, unlikely any Belgian Government in foreseeable future could unilaterally change its present policy. Actually since Belgian foreign policy so closely oriented toward US, seems to us conceivable we could influence Belgians maintain present position even if UK and France should switch.

4. Department therefore suggests you indicate to van Langenhove, without making any final commitment, our belief Belgium need not hesitate in seeking Council seat (Deptel 456). You might also tell UK this and inform it of our views on Sweden along lines suggested Deptel 463. We would later have opportunity if felt desirable sound out Belgium on Chinese representation issue before making final commitment.

5. Department would of course expect to examine again entire problem of election for Denmark's seat if Belgians do not run and Sweden should become European candidate.

6. Department aware that, apart from question of Chinese representation, general problem geographic distribution SC continues exist since under present pattern no provision is made to permit election Far Eastern States to non-permanent seat. This subject is being studied by Department. Possibilities of adjustment short of Charter amendment would necessarily involve some such scheme as alternate sharing of one seat by Far Eastern area with other area and subject is obviously a delicate one.

NEW YORK, April 30, 1954—6 p. m.

678. Re SC elections and presidency ninth GA. Department's 522 is very thorough analysis of reasons why we should support Belgium for SC seat. However, Department should consider following points in relation to Van Kleffens candidacy GA presidency before arriving at final decision on this important matter :

1. As reported in Usun 664,<sup>1</sup> Wan (Thailand) is apparently running for presidency GA and Department is aware of Wan's disappointment because we supported Pandit. If we support Van Kleffens (see letter from Lodge to Key dated April 22, 1954) and simultaneously support Belgium for SC vacancy, the two Benelux countries would hold a disproportionate share of the choice ninth GA plums.

2. We should not again rebuff Wan who has always been staunch friend of US and represents a country of key importance in development our Southeast Asian policy. His importance is crucial now in view of situation in Indochina.<sup>2</sup> Double support to Belgium and Netherlands would also weaken our influence with Arab-Asian bloc on large number issues of primary importance Western allies.

3. While true that traditionally one seat on SC has alternated between three Scandinavian and two Low Countries, yet this is very narrow application of principle of geographic representation, particularly if WE area is contrasted with Asian area. Also, at present juncture, maximum weight should be given to predominant principle (Article 23) of contribution to international peace and security. Without in slightest degree minimizing Belgium's contribution, one must at this time emphasize potential contribution SE Asian countries on our side.

4. Paragraph 1-B of reference telegram expresses doubt that we could obtain  $\frac{2}{3}$  vote for Thailand or Philippines for SC. USUN doubts if this is valid judgment. It is believed Arab-Asians plus LAs could obtain necessary support for either country, especially in view of fact that neither has been elected to SC heretofore.

5. Re paragraph 2, Department's estimates may be perfectly sound but nonetheless, we feel this narrow margin on Chinese representation is too thin and should be bolstered.

I propose following :

We want above all please Wan and he should be our first choice. For this reason I am strongly inclined to favor US offering him our backing for either the presidency or the SC. The [Then?], depending on his choice, we would have to work out as between Dutch and Belgians what offices we would support them for.

However, I recognize there are very strong reasons for supporting Van Kleffens for presidency this fall and there are also strong reasons for having Thailand on SC for next two years. Therefore, if Department feels all of these reasons outweigh strong reasons in favor of giving Wan his choice, I would acquiesce on condition that:

1. We promptly inform Thais our support their election SC. (Thais have not to my knowledge told us that Wan seeks presidency nor have Belgians sought our support their election SC).

2. We promptly inform Dutch our support Van Kleffens for presidency GA.

3. We promptly inform Belgians our decisions and reasons therefor and pledge them our strong support election some other important office they may desire. We should point out US has always strongly supported Belgium for election to various UN posts and bodies, including SC, whereas Thailand has never served in SC.

Subject: Candidacy of Sir Zafrulla for Position on International Court of Justice

Sir Zafrulla has asked Ambassador Hildreth to ascertain the United States' position regarding his candidacy for election to the International Court of Justice (see Karachi's 827, attached).<sup>1</sup> He told the Ambassador that there was now considerable pressure on the Prime Minister and the Cabinet, on the part of certain religious zealots, to force him out of the Cabinet. Although the Prime Minister has assured him of support, the pressure may develop beyond the Cabinet's power to resist, and the Cabinet itself may be seriously weakened at a time when Pakistan is well oriented toward the United States. NEA believes that meanwhile, if the Prime Minister could confidentially inform opposition leaders that Sir Zafrulla will receive United States support for a seat on the Court, the latter would be retained at least until winter with minimum risk. The Prime Minister has expressed "great interest" in learning the Department's views on Sir Zafrulla's candidacy.

NEA and UNA have asked the other interested bureaus and I whether they would agree to a commitment to support Sir Zafrulla for the vacancy on the Court caused by the death of Sir B. M. Rau, I believe that we should not now commit ourselves to Sir Zafrulla on the grounds (1) that his chances of election are poor (since there will probably be wide support for Dr. Pal, the Indian nominee, on the grounds that an Indian national is entitled to the unexpired portion of Rau's term) and will not be materially helped by our informing Pakistan of U.S. support at this time; (2) that a commitment would rigidly tie us to a candidate six months before the election, regardless of the chances and other factors which might pertain at a later date; (3) that our selection of a candidate to support should not turn on intra-party political strife within another country; and (4) that our support for Sir Zafrulla at this time might have a serious adverse effect upon the election of Justice Douglas Edmonds to the International Law Commission. (Edmonds is the "official" U.S. candidate for the vacancy on the Commission caused by Judge Parker's decision not to accept his seat. The Commission, which is empowered to elect an individual to fill a vacancy, will hold an election in June. I believe that if Pal, a member of the Commission, learns that we intend to support Sir Zafrulla for the Court in opposition to his own candidacy, this will lead him to concert with others on the Commission to defeat Edmonds, to whom there is opposition among other Commission members.)

FE also thinks that we should not commit ourselves to Sir Zafrulla now and asks that we consider a Far Eastern candidate. Myint Thein of Burma has already been nominated and FE believes that a judge from the Philippines and possibly Japan might also be suggested.

While it is not our normal practice to commit ourselves this far in advance, NEA is strongly of the opinion that we should agree to support Sir Zafrulla now because of the recent political developments in Pakistan and in the light of his eminent qualifications. UNA believes, and NEA concurs, that it should be made clear to the Prime Minister of Pakistan that there may well be considerable support for Pal, and that the burden of the campaign must in any event be borne by Pakistan. We also believe that particularly in view of the Department problem of Justice Edwards' election to the Law Commission, the Prime Minister should be informed that our decision to support Zafrulla must not become known to other UN Members, especially India. The attached cable, cleared by UNA, NEA, EUR, and ARA but not by L or FE, has been drafted on this basis.

I suggest that you call a meeting to be attended by Mr. Byroade, Mr. English, M. Drumright and me to consider this question. Since the Prime Minister is directly interested in the problem, we should give him an answer as soon as possible.

You will recall that the Pakistan ambassador raised the question of Sir Zafrulla's candidacy with the Secretary last December. The Secretary asked that his candidacy be given "sympathetic consideration", although he agreed with our recommendation that it was too early for us to take a decision at that time.

Re SC Election and Presidency Ninth GA (urtel 678) :

1. Understand Sweden definitely will not be candidate succeed Denmark on SC (Deptel _____) and assume from this Belgium will run. As pointed out Deptel 522 there could be serious consequences from standpoint our relations with Europeans in UN if we put up Far Eastern candidate against Belgium. Although present geographic pattern of non-permanent seats unfair to Far East fact remains other areas would strongly resist effort alter it and our Western European allies would fail understand why we would stimulate Thai candidacy against Belgium which is also well qualified under article 23 as major contributor international peace and security. While it is true we might get two-thirds majority our candidate if Arab-Asians and IAs supported us, Department continues doubt we could get sufficient support both these blocs even if we waged active campaign. Arab-Asians might seize upon split between US and Western Europeans over latter's seat as opportunity put forward India or other "neutral" candidate more acceptable to them than Thailand, and many LAs would be likely support Belgium on grounds change in present geographic pattern could prejudice allocation two seats to LAs in future. Department therefore continues believe impracticable try elect Far Eastern country against Belgium.

2. Department agrees points mentioned urtel 678 in favor doing what we can for Wan should be seriously considered in connection GA Presidency. However there are also strong arguments in favor van Kleffens. In Department's view it is too early for us take decision between these two and we should keep our position flexible and make no commitments for time being.

732. Re SC elections and presidency Ninth GA. Ambassador Franco y Franco of the Dominican Republic called at his request this afternoon to ascertain US position on Presidency of ninth GA. He said he had received letter from Netherlands requesting support of Van Kleffens and assumed this same request was being sent to all delegates. I told him our position had not yet become definite and that we knew about the existence of a Netherlands candidate and also about the availability of Thailand, but that I would try to find out and let him know. Strongly recommend that Department make up its mind as fast as possible along lines of mytel 678, April 30. Still believe it is vital to take care of Thailand in one way or the other, especially in view of situation in Indochina and of possibility that Thailand may at any moment bring in a complaint to the UN requesting peace observation commission in Indochina.

It seems to me elections to Presidency and SC must also be considered across the board in relation to elections to trusteeship council, ECOSOC and other important posts. For example, would it be possible to maintain a Benelux representative in ECOSOC in line with views expressed by Hotchkis in his memorandum of April 30, 1954 to Key? <sup>1</sup>

Subject: Attached Cable on UN Elections

Pursuant to a conversation with Mr. Wainhouse, we have drafted the attached interim reply <sup>1</sup> to the two cables from New York on the GA Presidency and the SC election. The reply expresses the belief we should keep our position flexible for the moment particularly in view of Indochina and Geneva.

EUR has cleared the cable. Mr. Drumright,<sup>2</sup> however, does not concur on the grounds that our reply should take cognizance of the arguments advanced in the two cables from New York<sup>3</sup> and that the Department should reach a decision without further delay on the elections in question.

We suggest that you discuss the problem with Mr. Drumright and, if necessary, with Mr. Murphy, to try to obtain Departmental agreement on the cable.

In consideration this question, Embassy is of opinion that Spaak's<sup>1</sup> re-emergence on the world scene as Foreign Minister and his effectiveness in supporting major policy objectives sought by US cannot be over-emphasized. It seems desirable in our opinion to overlook no means of enhancing his and Belgian prestige and we believe that support of Belgian candidacy for SC seat is warranted in light of foregoing unless there are other overriding considerations of which Embassy is not aware.

Subject: US Position on Election of Soviet Bloc Candidates to UN Posts

A meeting was held last week with the regional bureaus to consider the attached position paper on election of members of the functional commissions of ECOSOC.<sup>1</sup> Paragraph (d) under "United States Position" states that "no vote should be cast in favor of the USSR or any of its satellites for election to the Commissions", and Annex I, which is to serve as general guidance to the delegation on slates for particular commissions, suggests in some cases that we cast a blank ballot on Soviet bloc candidates and in other cases that we vote for a non-Soviet candidate as a replacement.

Mr. Allen said that EUR did not agree that in no case should we vote for a Soviet bloc candidate. He said that EUR thought this position would accomplish nothing, would not be in accord with our overall posture in the cold war and would constitute a source of difference between us and our European allies, who would see in it only an ineffectual move to irritate the Soviet bloc. Mr. Allen stated that EUR believed that we should, as a general rule, vote for Soviet bloc candidates for a proportionate share of appropriate UN posts unless (a) there is a friendly candidate we want to see elected instead, (b) the election of a Soviet bloc candidate would adversely affect our security interests, or (c) its election would prejudice our position in the UN body concerned or the body's work. In these circumstances we should not merely abstain but vote against. Mr. Allen asked whether there had been a firm policy decision that we should not vote for the USSR or any satellite.

The background on this question is as follows:

1. At the beginning of the eighth session our position on Soviet bloc candidates was taken up with the Secretary. A Memorandum of Conference with the Secretary, dated September 22, 1953, states that "the Secretary is against voting for Soviet candidates in Councils. We would not campaign for or against such candidates with the exception of course, of opposing the election of a satellite to the Security Council since we want Turkey elected".

2. FE, in a memorandum to Mr. Popper from Miss Bacon of September 30, 1953, expressed the view that "extension of this policy to secondary UN bodies may have a serious effect upon our efforts to obtain election for Chinese candidates in the future", since "in dealing with UN Members unsympathetic with the Chinese Government, one of our most effective arguments in seeking support for Chinese candidates is that the Big Five should be represented." FE accordingly urged that the policy "not be extended to lesser bodies."

3. Mr. Sandifer brought to Mr. Murphy's attention the statement of the Secretary's position quoted above and also FE's memorandum. Mr. Sandifer later informed us that Mr. Murphy thought the Secretary's view as reflected in the 'Memorandum of Conference' was intended to be applicable to all elections during the Assembly. He also told Mr. Sandifer that Mr. Merchant and Mr. Bonbright did not agree with the policy.

4. Ambassador Lodge, during a delegation meeting on October 1, said he understood the position to be that the US would never vote for the Soviet Union or a satellite for any position in the UN.

5. Mr. Sandifer, on October 30, 1953, sent a memorandum to the office directors of UNA which stated that in connection with elections to UN and specialized agency bodies and offices "it is our present policy not to vote for the election of the USSR or any Soviet bloc candidate. However, in some instances, as in the case of elections to bodies where the Big Five have traditionally been elected, we would not campaign against a Soviet bloc candidate but would abstain from voting".

6. The question was raised this year as to what our position should be with respect to Soviet bloc candidates for ECE and ECOSOC offices. In both of these cases, a Czech was the only candidate for a particular post and was certain to be elected by acclamation unless we demanded a vote in order to record our position. The Department decided that we would not ourselves demand a separate vote. It also decided that if for any reason a vote was taken, we would abstain.

It seems to UNP, on the basis of the above, that it may be said that current Department policy is against voting for a Soviet bloc candidate for any post, although whether we campaign and vote against a particular candidate or abstain must depend upon the circumstances of each case. If you agree, we suggest that you point this out to Mr. Barbour to obtain EUR's clearance of the position paper on the functional commissions on the basis of the policy.

In the light of the facts noted above UNE [UNP?] agrees that there is evidently a general policy not to vote for Soviet bloc candidates, although it does not agree that this policy should apply to all subsidiary bodies for the same reasons advanced by EUR and FE. I personally agree with the EUR position that we do not stand to gain by automatically failing to support any Soviet candidate, but I recognize that we are bound to follow the existing policy until it is changed.

The question arises whether we should now move ahead with respect to Wan's possible candidacy for the Presidency. Perhaps the first move would be to ask Wan if he wants the post (To our knowledge the Thais have mentioned Wan's interest only to the British and French). If he does, we would tell him we will be glad to vote for him, assuming he gets enough support from the members to assure his election. We would also want to inform the Dutch of this immediately.

In a conversation with Sir Zafrulla I informed him, with the approval of the Secretary, that he could count upon the US vote for appointment to the World Court vacancy which had been created by the death of Sir Bengal Rau. I told him the matter must be held in utmost confidence for the time being because of certain factors affecting the appointment of a US judge to another international post. Subject: Presidency of Ninth General Assembly

Discussion

The attached cable from Ambassador Lodge (Tab B)<sup>2</sup> reports that Prince Wan is arriving in New York today to discuss the Thai appeal for observers in the Assembly. Ambassador Lodge would like to indicate to him that we can support him for the Presidency of the Ninth Assembly or, alternatively, that we can support Thailand's election to the Security Council.

I believe Ambassador Lodge should be authorized to tell Prince Wan that we can support him for the Presidency if he wants the post. The reasons I favor this course are :

1. Prince Wan is a staunch friend of ours and a very able parliamentarian. He has unconditionally supported the policy of united action in Southeast Asia and has given us strong support at Geneva. Upon our suggestion, he requested the Security Council to appoint a Peace Observation Commission in view of the Indo-Chinese situation. Thailand's continued support is of key significance to us in the development of our Southeast Asian policy. Since Asian problems will be the center of attention at the Ninth General Assembly, it would be very desirable to have an individual from that area of the world elected President.

2. Prince Wan was a candidate for the Presidency last year, but we supported Madame Pandit instead, and she was elected. This was a matter of great disappointment to Prince Wan. We have heard through the British and French that Prince Wan is a candidate again this year. It seems essential that, if he is a candidate, we support him.

3. It would probably be more difficult to elect Thailand to the Security Council than to elect Prince Wan to the Presidency. Furthermore, the Philippines is a possible candidate for the Security Council.

I realize that van Kleffens, who has been advancing his candidacy for some time, is also a strong friend of ours and would make an able President. Moreover, a European has not been elected President since 1946; van Kleffens apparently has the support of the United Kingdom, France and the Benelux countries; and, in the light of the few conversations which we have had with the Dutch on the subject, they may well feel assured that we will not throw our weight in favor of an opponent. However, the considerations mentioned above in favor of Prince Wan seem clearly overriding.

Subject: EUR position on Presidency of Ninth General Assembly.

With respect to the attached memorandum from Assistant Secretary Key of June 28 <sup>1</sup> and the proposed telegram to Ambassador Lodge in New York, while EUR is reluctant to see withdrawn U.S. support of van Kleffens' candidacy for President of the Ninth General Assembly, EUR concurs in the proposed telegram to Ambassador Lodge provided the last sentence is omitted and a final paragraph added, for the following reasons:

EUR believes that Prince Wan is thoroughly qualified to serve as President of the Ninth General Assembly, both on account of his record as a staunch supporter of the West, particularly at the opening of the Geneva conference, and because, in view of his previous candidacy, we believe he has a certain moral claim to our support.

EUR is concerned, however lest a situation arise where there is a Far-Eastern President of the General Assembly without the Security Council seat which is about to be vacated by Denmark going to a Western European country. It would be disproportionate for both the Presidency and the Security Council seat to go to Far Eastern countries as is implied if the final sentence of the proposed telegram remains. EUR believes, therefore, that a firm decision should be made at this time to support Belgium, provided, of course, the Belgian Government's position on Chinese membership continues to be satisfactory, for the Security Council seat and that a paragraph in this sense be added to the outgoing instructions to Ambassador Lodge.<sup>2</sup>

I telephoned Ambassador Lodge this morning about an hour before his scheduled meeting with Prince Wan to inform him that the Department had not yet been able to reach a final and definitive decision as to whether or not the United States should support Prince Wan if the latter is a candidate for the presidency of the ninth General Assembly.

I added that this matter was receiving active consideration and that a meeting was being held later today under the chairmanship of Mr. Murphy for the purpose of submitting considered recommendations on this subject to the Secretary. However, it was extremely unlikely that any decision could be reached before Prince Wan called on Ambassador Lodge. For this reason, I cautioned Ambassador Lodge against sounding out Prince Wan about his possible candidacy. Subject: Sir Zafrulla Khan's candidacy for election to the International Court of Justice

Participants: Sir Zafrulla Khan, Foreign Minister of Pakistan
Mr. Donald D. Kennedy, SOA

I called on Sir Zafrulla Khan, Foreign Minister of Pakistan, at my request, to inform him of the latest developments with respect to his candidacy for the seat on the International Court of Justice vacated by the death of Sir Bengal Rau. Sir Zafrulla was informed that the election to the International Law Commission had been held which removed one of the obstacles to our being able to make known our willingness to vote for him at the time of election. The other factor which had to be resolved was the publication of the list of nominations which had not yet been done in New York. We had been in touch with our people in New York on this, and had been assured that the UN Secretariat would issue the list very shortly. When that had been done Sir Zafrulla would be free to indicate that he had our support and we would be prepared to answer queries to that effect. The point was made that we would not actively campaign for him so that it would be necessary for him to "carry the ball".

Sir Zafrulla said that he had not told anyone of our position as yet, since Mr. Byroade had enjoined him not to do so until the way was cleared, but that he had been talking to some people himself. He had discussed this with Ambassadors Monroe, Casey and Heaney, and they had indicated favorable attitudes and said that they would communicate with their Governments. He had also discussed it with Mr. Eden while he was here in Washington, and Mr. Eden, without giving any indication of his final position, had said that he would take it up in London on his return. Sir Zafrulla also expected very shortly to discuss the question of his election with the Arab States, possibly proceeding through the King of Saudi Arabia in the first instance. He also thought he would talk to the Ambassador of Liberia. He said that we would have to help with the Latinos. I said that the Latinos might be difficult because they tended to support the principle of precedent in these matters and might very well take the view that since the seat had been occupied by an Indian national, India had a claim to the election of another national from that country to fill out the unexpired term. I also reiterated the fact that we would not be able to carry on an active campaign. Referring to the fact that the seat which Rau had held had formerly been occupied by a national of one of the Latin American countries, he pointed out that perhaps one of the arguments that could be used with the Latinos was that a rotation in this seat which they once held would indicate that it was not finally taken from them but could be considered as available to anyone who could secure the necessary votes. Sir Zafrulla also referred to the fact that he was going to be nominated for one of the full term seats and thought this might be used as an argument to obtain support for his election to the short term seat, since his election in the first instance would remove him as a candidate for one of the full term seats claimed by the Latinos.

I agreed that Sir Zafrulla would be free to indicate our support for him five days after the list of nominations was published by the UN Secretariat.

Subsequently I learned that the seat to which Sir Bengal Rau was elected had formerly been held by a Belgian national, although our original position had been to support Sir Zafrulla for one of the Latin American seats.

Subject: Presidency of Ninth General Assembly

Pursuant to your request, a meeting was held in my office yesterday for the purpose of a further discussion of Prince Wan's possible candidacy for the Presidency of the Ninth General Assembly. The meeting was attended by Assistant Secretaries Key and Robertson, Mr. Barbour vice Mr. Merchant, and Mr. Kennedy vice Mr. Byroade. The following conclusions and recommendations were reached unanimously:

1. We recommend that Prince Wan should be sounded out as to whether he is a candidate for the Presidency and that, if he is, we should give him our full support. The principal reasons are:

(a) Prince Wan is a staunch friend of ours and a very able parliamentarian. Thailand's continued support is of key significance to us in the development of our Southeast Asian policy. Since Asian problems will be the center of attention at the Ninth General Assembly, it would be very desirable to have a friendly individual from that area of the world elected President.

(b) Prince Wan was a candidate for the Presidency last year, but we supported Madame Pandit instead, and she was elected. This was a matter of great disappointment to Prince Wan. We have heard through the British and French that Prince Wan is a candidate again this year.

2. We recommend that the decision to support Prince Wan be reached as quickly as possible since Van Kleffens has been actively campaigning for some time past, and the opening of the Ninth General Assembly is only a little over two and a half months away. This amount of time would be required to conduct an effective campaign for Prince Wan.

3. We believe that if his candidacy is put forward in the near future, and vigorously pushed, the prospects for his election are quite favorable. He would probably be able to count on a fairly solid group of votes from the so-called Asian-African bloc as well as from most of the Latin American group. In addition, he would perhaps get votes from Turkey, Greece, and Yugoslavia, although most of the European countries would vote for Van Kleffens. Ambassador Lodge feels that Prince Wan would have a good fighting chance of being elected if he and we conduct an active campaign.

4. For the above reasons we recommend that you give your approval to sounding out Prince Wan as to his candidacy and, if he is a candi-

I spoke alone to Prince Wan, asking whether he would like again to be a candidate for the Presidency of the United Nations Assembly at the next session. I said that if that were the case, I thought we might this year get in the position to give him support.

He indicated pleasure at my statement and said that he was thinking of the matter, but did not want to risk his candidacy if it was likely to fail. He thought that much would depend on whether the Latin American countries would support him or wanted to have a candidate of their own. I said that I thought he was wise not to run unless he had a good chance of success. I said that I assumed most of the West European and British Commonwealth countries had been lined up for the U.K. [Netherlands?], and that for him to win he would have to have the bulk of the Latin American votes and the Arab States.

He said that Prince Wan was, of course, very interested in becoming the President of the General Assembly at the first opportunity but that before openly announcing his candidacy he wished to sound out the Latin-American countries in order to avoid any possible feeling on their part that he was attempting to prevent them from having a Latin-American as the President in the natural

He desired first to canvass the Latin American Delegations since he did not want to risk failure. On July 13, Prince Wan informed Mr. Murphy that he had done so, that he was optimistic

In addition to Wan's bitter disappointment at failure be elected last year, tense situation in Asia and seriousness of problems in area (many of which may arise in UN) were larger factors which determined our decision.

53. Re presidency 9th GA. Von Balluseck (Netherlands) approached me in the Security Council lounge this afternoon and stated that Prince Wan had come to see him, had announced his candidacy for presidency of 9th GA, and had told him flatly that the US was going to support him.

In a further encounter shortly thereafter, Von Balluseck indicated that Mr. Murphy had notified the Netherlands chargé in Washington that Wan had determined he would make the run and that the US would "probably" support him.

Von Balluseck was considerably exercised and rather disposed to argue that Wan's candidacy at this late time could have no good effect regardless of who eventually won the race. He seems to be sure in his own mind that the US deliberately stimulated Wan's candidacy.

Re Deptel 95 to The Hague, July 20 (last paragraph) it is quite obvious that Netherlands chargé has not kept quiet this matter, since Dixon (UK) approached me with same information this afternoon at 3.

On basis Telecon Stein, we informed UK Delegate and French Delegate, which meanwhile had approached us, as well as Von Balluseck, of arguments stated by Murphy to Dutch chargé. None of them was impressed by these arguments, saying in effect that they cut both ways.

We added argument that Wan had stepped down in favor of Pearson two years ago. This made some slight impression. French, however, pointed out that they had stuck by Wan last year, despite our support Madame Pandit's candidacy. All three felt that situation in Asia indicated desirability of non-Asian president.

Both UK and French Delegates emphasized their very firm commitment to Van Kleffens indicating that this was a very considered decision which had been taken by the five Western European powers. UK and French Delegates expressed keenest disappointment and expressed hope that we would at least not lobby pending opinion of their governments to consider situation. We indicated that we were not lobbying, at least at this stage.

UK stated that the four Scandinavians supported Van Kleffens.

Von Balluseck gave us following analysis of commitment to them:

Four Western Europeans.

Scandinavians—not definite, but probable.

Iran, Pakistan, Turkey, and Greece—definite.

Canada, Australia, and New Zealand—very favorably inclined.

A few of the smaller Latins, including Chile definitely.

In last connection, deal is obviously a swap in favor of Van Kleffens this year, and Chile next year.

Argument Wan used this a.m. that made some slight impression on Dutch was that he is 63 years old and will not be Foreign Minister of Thailand forever.

Wan has apparently approached De La Colina (Mexico) in effort to get Latin American caucus support; De La Colina was apparently evasive.

impression of American support and encouragement. He emphasized there had been three Asian Presidents and only one European. To the Dutch he said this American decision is "proof positive" of complete lack of interest in or understanding of views of smaller countries by US. To gain a "cheap and ephemeral victory" in Asia he said the US is going back on its moral commitment to the Netherlands. After Dutch ratification EDC he said Under Secretary Smith had told Ambassador Van Roijen that because of that courageous step Dutch could ask "practically anything of US and it would be granted". He was now appealing to us to reconsider our position re Van Kleffens and to implement this "promise" of Under Secretary Smith.<sup>2</sup> He said Prime Minister Drees had directed him to inform me in name of entire Dutch Government that this would have deep and lasting effect on Dutch attitude toward other questions. Luns referred to delay in consulting Netherlands re "united action" Southeast Asia, to our unwillingness to support Dutch on Indonesia and New Guinea questions, to "Bonsal's open encouragement" to Indonesians on New Guinea which have already disillusioned Dutch Government but decision unwillingness support Van Kleffens is "the last straw". In conclusion he told me that Dutch have already received assurances of support for Van Kleffens from substantial number of countries not only in Europe but in Latin America and Near East and government is determined whatever the outcome to maintain the candidacy of Van Kleffens.

While I can understand reasons behind Department's decision support Prince Wan I must stress that if we do not support Van Kleffens we cannot expect further Dutch cooperation on EDC, NATO or any other important matter. It will poison the atmosphere of Dutch-American relations.

Shock and anger at US decision support Prince Wan instead Van Kleffens intensified by Dutch conviction US taking their friendship and support for granted while attempting, as Luns expressed it to me, to win "cheap and ephemeral victory" in Asia. Dutch will feel constrained demonstrate in other matters involving Netherlands-US relations that taking their support for granted is a mistake. 70. Re presidency Ninth General Assembly. It is essential that we do something right away to alleviate hard feeling on this subject (Hague's 124, July 21). This can be done in following way:

1. Matthews should inform Dutch that, in addition to arguments Murphy presented to Dutch Counselor, Prince Wan is a Foreign Minister, he has participated actively in all General Assembly sessions, he has served as committee chairman more than once, he stepped down in favor of Pearson two years ago and lost to Madame Pandit in friendly contest last year. Van Kleffens, despite all his other fine attributes, does not qualify under any of these criteria.

2. We have highest regard for Van Kleffens personally and sympathy for European and in particular Dutch aspiration to General Assembly presidency.

3. Van Kleffens' candidacy being well advanced, we can well understand Dutch Government would not like withdraw his name. We would propose, therefore, that Van Kleffens' candidacy be maintained but that all governments concerned do their best to create atmosphere of "friendly contest." If, as we now estimate situation, Wan is elected, this would be no disgrace to Van Kleffens or Dutch. We would then propose give our very strongest support to Van Kleffens for chairmanship Committee One. This, in turn, would build him up strongly for election to presidency next year. Meanwhile, since Latin Americans seem to be more interested in Charter Review Conference presidency, we would use our best efforts to enlist their support for Van Kleffens next year on understanding we would support Latin American candidacy (probably not Chile) for presidency of Charter Review Conference in 1956.

I think foregoing would be friendly, realistic and calculated to give substantial prizes to all three interested groups. I know that we traditionally do not like to commit ourselves so far in advance but in view of issues involved in this case I do not think we should be bureaucratic on this point.

I suggest, therefore, that Matthews be instructed discuss this matter with Luns in foregoing sense.

We discussed this program quite personally and unofficially with Prince Wan at lunch today. He reacted very favorably towards it because, while he is confident of his own chances for election, he also wants to maintain best possible relationships with Dutch. He is confident, not only because of his contacts with Latin Americans, but also because at an Asian group meeting this morning he said his candidacy was "welcomed".

DEAR BOB: A serious mistake has been made in not seeking a commitment from Van Kleffens that he would rule the Chinese Representation question an important matter requiring a  $\frac{2}{3}$  vote.

On July 13th, (mytel 31) I suggested to the Secretary that such a commitment be sought from Van Kleffens. In transmitting this telegram to the Secretary in Paris, the Department made the comment that such an approach to Van Kleffens might be embarrassing in view of the Secretary's conversation with Prince Wan on July 1st, (Deptel 167 to Paris).

In the light of this comment, I renewed my suggestion to the Secretary on July 16th, (mytel 45) particularly in view of the possible imminent pledge of support to Prince Wan.

I now learn that meanwhile a memorandum was sent to the Secretary recommending that the Dutch Embassy in Washington be advised, as soon as possible, of our commitment to support Prince Wan. I do not know whether my renewed suggestion of the 16th was brought to the Secretary's attention at the same time as the recommendation that the Dutch be informed.

On July 17th, (Deptel 42) I was advised that Van Kleffens should not be approached on the Chinese Representation matter because the US had made up its mind to support Prince Wan.

It seems perfectly obvious to me that there was no reason why the Dutch needed to know, at that moment, of our decision to support Prince Wan. Furthermore, there was every reason for trying to get Van Kleffens to commit himself on the all-important question before he knew we were supporting someone else.

Obviously it would be advantageous to the US for all candidates for the Presidency to be committed on the vital issue of a  $\frac{2}{3}$  vote.

The above resumé gives rise to a suspicion that someone had talked out of turn, and prematurely informed the Dutch of our decision to support Prince Wan, when there was absolutely no need to tell them—and before any commitment had been obtained from them.

Now it is too late and an opportunity has been missed for which we may have to pay a very heavy price indeed.

Sincerely yours,

HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.

Our present difficulty re Presidency and past experience with slates problem generally confirms desirability avoiding commitment for UN offices as far ahead as suggested urtel. CONFIDENTIAL

[WASHINGTON,] July 23, 1954.

Subject: Presidency of the Ninth General Assembly

Pursuant to a request from your office, following is a summary of the key events and considerations leading up to our decision to support Prince Wan for the Presidency of the Ninth General Assembly.

1. The Dutch made their initial approach regarding the Presidency of the Ninth General Assembly on August 21, 1953. The record shows that in that and subsequent conversations (Tab A) we did not make any commitment to the Dutch, but that we did encourage them, and they may well have interpreted our remarks as an indication that we would probably support Van Kleffens.

2. The Department first learned of the possibility of the Wan candidacy in late April 1954. USUN reported information received from the British that Wan desired the Presidency. In April and subsequently, Ambassador Lodge recommended that the United States support Prince Wan for the Presidency or Thailand for the Security Council. The latter course would have required us to support Thailand for a Security Council seat which has been held by a Western European state since 1946.

3. On June 28 Mr. Key raised with you the substance of a memorandum (Tab B), cleared by the regional bureaus and Mr. Murphy, which recommended that you authorize Ambassador Lodge to inquire of Prince Wan whether he was a candidate, and, if so, to assure him of our support. You decided to postpone the decision and requested Mr. Murphy to hold a meeting of the Assistant Secretaries to review the matter.

4. A meeting in Mr. Murphy's office on June 30 resulted in a unanimous recommendation that we sound out Prince Wan and offer our support if he were a candidate. The principal reasons for this decision are advanced in the attached memorandum sent to you by Mr. Murphy on June 30 (Tab C).

5. On July 1, after discussion with Prince Wan regarding arrangements for resuming the Eighth Assembly on the Thai appeal for a Peace Observation Committee, you asked Prince Wan whether he would like to be a candidate, stating that if that were the case "we might this year get in the position to give him support" (Tab D). Prince Wan said he thought it was not wise to run unless he had a good chance of success. He indicated that he would take soundings among the Latin American delegations in particular and inform us of the results. On July 13, Prince Wan informed Mr. Murphy that his canvass of the Latin American delegations had been completed and that he was optimistic over Latin American support. Under these circumstances Wan wished you to know he would be a candidate. In accordance with your decision of July 17, Mr. Murphy on July 19 informed the Dutch Charge d'Affaires of our decision to support Prince Wan.

I have your memorandum of July 23 and it sets out the complete record but does not answer the question which the Secretary wished answered.

He wants an explanation of how it is that we have gotten ourselves into a position where, according to Ambassador Matthews' cable, we have completely alienated the Dutch on this matter. The record indicates pretty clearly that we gave a lot of encouragement to the Dutch down to April 2 and very possibly there were additional appointments after that time. Mr. Key's memorandum of May 11 indicates that Ambassador Matthews told us that the Foreign Office appeared confident of our support of van Kleffens. The record also indicates cogent reasons as to why Prince Wan is a good choice. However, the record does not indicate that we considered the almost inevitably adverse Dutch reaction to this move, and it would certainly be deduced that if we did consider it, we rather badly underestimated it.

The result is that apparently unwittingly we have gotten ourselves into a most awkward imbroglio with one of our staunchest European friends, and the Secretary is at a loss to understand how we could have made such a mistake. It is that question the Secretary wants answered.

144. While certainly fact Van Kleffens is a distinguished and outstanding Dutchman plays important role in bitter Dutch resentment over our failure to support him for presidency Ninth GA, this is not the basic cause such resentment. From my talk with Luns and conversations other high Dutch officials who have raised matter with me basic cause of disillusionment is conviction that US is willing to disregard views European partners and to underestimate completely importance of Europe in world picture today. They believe support of third Asian president means that US, in what Dutch consider are desperate, vacillating and sometimes contradictory efforts to "hold on uncertain Asia" is ignoring and sacrificing the common heritage and dependability of allies who joined together in the Atlantic community. This belief is greatly strengthened by their belief we encouraged candidacy of Van Kleffens tacitly and otherwise before springing "bomb shell" our support of Prince Wan. Latter they believe to be a sudden and panicky reversal of our previous position and therefore further "evidence" of "instability of American leadership".

The more we lobby for Prince Wan or if we endeavor to upset commitments for Van Kleffens which Dutch feel they have obtained from other countries (seventeen formal and substantial number of probables they say they have) the deeper will grow this feeling.

For this reason I fully concur with Deptel 122 that to suggest Van Kleffens for presidency of committee one at this juncture would be decidedly unwise and counter-productive.

Subject: Presidency of UN General Assembly

Participants: Sir Roger Makins, British Ambassador

Mr. R. H. Scott, British Minister

The Secretary

The Under Secretary

Mr. McConaughy, Director, Office of Chinese Affairs

During the call on the Secretary by Ambassador Makins the following was discussed:

Ambassador Makins said that his Government had been firmly committed for some time to support the candidacy of Van Kleffens of the Netherlands for President of the forthcoming UN General Assembly. It was unusual for his Government to make such a commitment and he did not know the reason. His Government was surprised and rather disturbed to hear quite recently that the U.S. Government intended to support Prince Wan of Thailand. The British had taken it for granted that a European would be elected this year and a South American next year, in geographical rotation. Furthermore his Government thought it was questionable whether it was wise to support a candidate who had been defeated the preceding year, as Prince Wan had been. The Ambassador expressed the hope that we might find it possible to refrain from active campaigning against Van Kleffens or in favor of Prince Wan, assuming that our commitment to Prince Wan was irrevocable.

The Secretary said that perhaps the staff work on this matter had been incomplete. He regretted the apparent lack of understanding with the British as to the course to be pursued. It was a difficult decision as between Van Kleffens and Prince Wan. The Secretary agreed that Van Kleffens was a very good candidate. He was a personal friend of the Secretary's and the Dutch were a stout people. He said that when the recommendation first came up to him that we endorse the candidacy of Prince Wan, he had postponed a decision. However, it was the unanimous recommendation of the Bureau heads concerned that we support Prince Wan. Prince Wan was also a good candidate and there were various practical reasons for supporting him. The United States Government was not committed to any other candidate. We had regretted the necessity of denying our support to Prince Wan in 1953 when we had voted for Madame Pandit. The Secretary said that so far as he knew there was no rule or tradition of geographic rotation of the presidency.

In response to a question as to whether it might be possible to settle the matter by arranging to support one of the candidates next year, the Secretary said that he was opposed to advance commitments of one year in matters of this sort. An unforeseeable contingency might arise which would make it advisable to support another candidate. It was not wise to tie ones hands so far in advance.

The Secretary said he did not believe the British need feel any embarrassment in supporting Van Kleffens. The United States of course would not raise any objection to British support of a candidate other than the one we were supporting.

[WASHINGTON,] July 26, 1954.

DEAR CABOT: This is a belated reply to your confidential letter of July 22, as I followed your good example and was away over the weekend.

I talked with the Secretary about the contents of your letter. He, as you know, gave this question a great deal of personal consideration. It is his opinion, which in this case I frankly share, that to have talked to the Dutch about the Chinese representation question first in the hope of obtaining a commitment from them and afterwards informing them that we would not support the Van Kleffens candidacy would have really envenomed The Hague. The shock there was bad enough, but had it been done the other way, I really believe we would have had an exceedingly poisonous reaction.

The unfortunate part of this matter is that we all feel that Van Kleffens would make an admirable President of the 9th General Assembly. The Secretary did have very much in mind not only Prince Wan's disappointment of last year and the preceding situation (in 1951, I believe), but more especially our current need for all the support we can get in Southeast Asia.

Personally, I regret very much if this question has added to your full platter of troubles. It would be nice to do something to make life easier for you.

All the best.

Yours ever,

ROBERT MURPHY

CONFIDENTIAL

[WASHINGTON,] July 27, 1954.

Subject: Presidency of the Ninth General Assembly

Participants: M. Carlier, Chargé d'Affaires, Belgian Embassy
Mr. Murphy, G
Mr. W. P. Allen, EUR

M. Carlier called on instructions to express in the name of M. Spaak the concern of the Belgian Government at the apparent US decision to support Prince Wan for the Presidency. He pointed out that there has been only one European President in the eight General Assemblies while there have been three Asians. It is the general European feeling that this imbalance should be redressed and the position of Europe in the UN be recognized by the election of van Kleffens this year. Moreover, although Prince Wan is very highly regarded in Europe, the European countries feel that because the next General Assembly will have to deal extensively with Far Eastern matters, it would be better not to have an Asian president. In addition and speaking frankly from the Belgian point of view on colonial problems, they think it would be desirable that a national of a so-called colonial power hold the post. Because van Kleffens' candidacy is well advanced, the Dutch are reasonably confident of a majority of votes and Belgium is determined to maintain its backing for van Kleffens to the last vote.

Mr. Murphy referred to the current exceptional importance of the Southeast Asian area and its problems and the fact that Prince Wan was very disappointed in 1952 and 1953 when he failed to be elected. He said that frankly, while we did not doubt there would be disappointment, we did not anticipate a violent reaction from the Dutch and other European powers since we have not looked upon this office as a "great plum". He assured M. Carlier that our attitude was in no way designed to discriminate against Europe and pointed out that Europe's importance in the UN is obvious and is recognized in the composition of the Security Council and other UN bodies and does not of course depend upon holding the presidency.

In the course of the discussion as to the real basis of the European reaction to our position, M. Carlier suggested that the Europeans generally are feeling very sensitive as to their world position, are under considerable pressures from various sources and propaganda from unfriendly quarters. They have noticed what they regard as a slight reorientation of US policy towards Asia and our support of Prince Wan is construed as a further indication of this. So the question is raised, particularly among the opposition in European governments, as to "why so many favors for Asia and so little for us."

Mr. Murphy stated that we found it difficult to see why our policy should be regarded in that light and that it would be quite absurd to suggest that against the background of our demonstrated attitude and action on all basic matters affecting Europe, support of Prince Wan for the Presidency indicates any reorientation of our policy. When M. Carlier suggested the possibility of a change in our position, Mr. Murphy stated that Mr. Dulles will, of course, carefully examine the situation, and the Belgian point of view will be given most careful consideration. We have promised Prince Wan our support and while we are not engaged in any sort of campaign in his favor so long as he is a candidate, we do not have much freedom of action in the matter.

Memorandum by the Acting Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Wainhouse) to the Secretary of State's Special Assistant (O'Connor)

CONFIDENTIAL

[WASHINGTON,] July 28, 1954.

Subject: Presidency of Ninth General Assembly.

In response to your memorandum of July 24, the sharp reaction of the Dutch to our decision to support Prince Wan for President of the Ninth General Assembly was due to:

1. The belief that the Dutch had what they called a "moral commitment" from us to support Van Kleffens. The conversations which our various officers have had with the Dutch on this matter indicate that we gave them no moral commitment or any other commitment for that matter.

2. The belief that the Presidency of the Ninth General Assembly should go to a European.

The Assistant Secretaries (Messrs. Key and Robertson, Barbour vice Merchant, Kennedy vice Byroade) met with Mr. Murphy on June 30 and unanimously recommended to the Secretary that if Prince Wan is a candidate for the Presidency we should support him. Ambassador Lodge had previously recommended our support for Wan either for the Presidency or the Security Council (see Tab A—USUN telegram 678, April 30).

The recommendation of Mr. Murphy and the Assistant Secretaries was believed to be in line with what the Secretary had in mind on the need for all the support we can get in Southeast Asia. The discussion at the June 30 meeting did take into consideration the possible sharp reaction of the Dutch, but this it was felt was one of the risks that had to be taken to attain what was thought to be the Secretary's objective.

I suspect that the sharp reaction of the Dutch is designed to prompt us to reverse our stand on Prince Wan or, short of that, not to campaign for him.

While we have taken the decision to support Prince Wan, Mr. Murphy and Mr. Bonbright, whose views I share, believe we ought not to campaign or lobby for him. We are not committed to campaign for Prince Wan. This I desire to discuss with the other Assistant Secretaries and submit in due course a recommendation to the Secretary for his approval.

Ambassador Sarasin telephoned me this morning to say that Prince Wan has told him that certain Latin American countries are still in doubt as to whom they will support for the Ninth General Assembly Presidency. The Ambassador stated that Prince Wan had asked him to communicate this to the Department and to inquire whether the Department would assist by making representations to these certain Latin American countries.

I stated that this is a matter which I would take up in the Department and would let him know.

The Ambassador also stated that Prince Wan had suggested to the Dutch in New York a deal whereby Wan would guarantee Latin American support for Van Kleffens for the Presidency in 1955, and the Europeans and Wan would guarantee the Presidency to the Latin Americans in 1956, if Van Kleffens would withdraw this year. The Ambassador stated that the Dutch did not react favorably to this idea.

At dinner July 31 at the British Embassy, I had opportunity for a long conversation with Sir Pierson Dixon. . . .

We also discussed United States support of Prince Wan as a candidate for the presidency of the Ninth General Assembly. Dixon said quite flatly he thought we were wrong. This is an European year, in his opinion, and he said there is a growing tendency to believe, as a result of United States support of Madame Pandit last year, that the Americans have a tendency to slight Europe in favor of the Asiatics. He agreed that Prince Wan would be fully qualified from the standpoint of ability to act as President of General Assembly and said that he understood our reasons for promising Prince Wan our vote. He hoped, and in fact said he was confident, that van Kleffens would be elected.

CONFIDENTIAL

[WASHINGTON,] August 2, 1954.

Subject: Prince Wan's Candidacy for Presidency, Ninth General Assembly.Participants: Ambassador Pote Sarasin—Thailand

G—Mr. Murphy

UNA—Mr. Wainhouse

Ambassador Sarasin came in to discuss with me the question which he raised with Mr. Wainhouse on Thursday, July 29 with respect to our approaching certain Latin American countries to ask their support for Prince Wan's candidacy for the Presidency of the Ninth General Assembly.

I asked the Ambassador how Prince Wan was making out on his candidacy for the Presidency.

The Ambassador stated that there are five Latin American countries—Dominican Republic, Chile, Brazil, El Salvador, and Colombia—who are committed to vote for Van Kleffens. Prince Wan feels the Ambassador stated, that if he can secure the support of the 15 Latin American States he will win, since all the Arab-Asians will vote for him with the exception of Iran which is committed to vote for Van Kleffens. Canada and other Western European States are committed to Van Kleffens. A number of these commitments, he said, were made on the understanding that Van Kleffens would be the only candidate. It was his opinion that since there are now two candidates, a number of countries would have to reconsider their position.

I stated that in my conversation with Prince Wan at lunch on July 13, 1954, I understood Prince Wan to say that he had Latin American support. At this point Ambassador Sarasin said that what Prince Wan ascertained from the Latin Americans following his conversation with the Secretary on July 1, was simply that there would be no candidate from that group standing for the Presidency this year, since Prince Wan felt and as he told the Secretary then, that if there were a candidate from that area, he, Prince Wan would not want to run.

Ambassador Sarasin stated that the suggestion that Prince Wan stand for the Presidency came from the Secretary on the latter's initiative, and that Prince Wan so reported to his Foreign Office. Prince Wan himself, the Ambassador said, contemplated running for the Presidency three years hence.

I pointed out that in the conversation which the Secretary had with Prince Wan on July 1, 1954 on this matter the latter said that his decision to run would depend on whether the Latin American countries would support him. With this the Secretary agreed, and it was left that the Prince would find out whether the Latin Americans would support him, and to let us know after he made the soundings. On the 13th of July, Prince Wan told me that he did have Latin American support.

I stated that we are, of course, voting for Prince Wan and have so informed the Dutch, the Belgians, and the British, and are informing the others who are making inquiries, but that we would not campaign for him.

The Ambassador asked whether the Secretary could make a public statement that we will vote for Prince Wan. He mentioned that last year such a statement was made to the press by this Government in connection with the candidacy of Madame Pandit. I stated that I would take this request up with the Secretary.

WASHINGTON, August 3, 1954.

CA-819. Subject: Presidency Ninth General Assembly. Prince Wan, Foreign Minister of Thailand and Van Kleffens, Netherlands, are candidates for the Presidency of the Ninth General Assembly which convenes in New York in September of this year. Both candidates are excellent men for whom we have high regard and, in our view, either one would make a fine President. They are now actively engaged in securing support from other Governments.

We have promised that the United States will vote for Prince Wan. We have not, however, committed ourselves to lobby for him. Nor do we intend to lobby against Van Kleffens.

In the event you are approached by the Foreign Office as to our position on these respective candidates you should say that both candidates are outstanding and either would make an excellent President. We, of course, recognize that the Netherlands is a strong defender of the free world and that Van Kleffens is an able statesman with a distinguished record. We, however, will vote for Prince Wan. Thailand has been an equally staunch representative of the free world. Moreover, in view of the current seriousness of Southeast Asian problems and since Asian problems are likely to be the center of attention at the Ninth General Assembly, we believe that it would be desirable to have an individual from that area of the world elected President. Prince Wan has for many years had valuable U.N. experience and has served as chairman of a main committee of the General Assembly at three sessions. He has proved himself a very able parliamentarian in the United Nations and recently at the Geneva Conference as co-chairman of the Korean discussions.

THE HAGUE, August 3, 1954.

DEAR BOB: Many thanks for your personal letter of July 26<sup>1</sup> concerning l'affaire van Kleffens. As I said in one of my messages, I can well understand the reasons which decided the Department to support Prince Wan, especially in view of the tremendous emphasis on Asia in our Congress and in the light of the Geneva negotiations, etc. Nonetheless that does not make the situation much easier here.

There is one misapprehension which you mention in your letter that I should like to correct. You say that you think the Dutch "perhaps are unwise to advance the notion that their support of EDC is something which they did 'for the United States'". The Dutch have never advanced the idea that they ratified the EDC to please the US. In fact there is no country in Europe more resentful of or stubborn against the slightest form of pressure than the Dutch. While you were not in Washington at the time, some of us recall that they were decidedly lukewarm at the outset to EDC and van Roijen told me that several times when the idea first came up. It was only after, in their slow, deliberate and realistic way, they reached the conclusion that all alternative solutions were much less satisfactory from the Dutch point of view that they accepted EDC and became the staunch supporters of the idea that they are now. This came about not because of any pressure from the US or because the Dutch thought they would be doing us a favor. It was solely through the same logical reasoning that has brought the Department to feel so strongly that EDC is the only really satisfactory solution.

What Luns told me was not that they had ratified EDC as a favor to the United States, but in effect that Bedell in his satisfaction at the Dutch action had said the Dutch could ask practically anything of us and it would be granted. I am sure from Bedell's comment that this was a misunderstanding probably growing out of van Roijen's excessively enthusiastic reporting after Dutch final action. I agree Luns was unwise in mentioning this, which he did, somewhat understandably, due to extreme emotion and disillusionment.

As set forth in my several telegrams, the Dutch attitude is not so much based on their desire to have a Dutchman President of the General Assembly. It is rather that they feel, however erroneously, first that we had definitely encouraged the van Kleffens candidacy and second that Asia has been over-emphasized in the UN and Europe pretty much ignored. For this they largely blame the US.

There is no point in belaboring the matter further since the Department's telegram No. 159 of July 30 settles the matter. I can only take consolation that we will not in fact lobby either for or against either candidate and I do hope we can maintain that position. It would be helpful here if Prince Wan were also told that. Incidentally, the Dutch still feel confident that van Kleffens can win as their present box score does not include the three Scandanavian countries or others who do not formally, they say, commit themselves beforehand.

[Here follow personal remarks.]

As ever,

Subject: Colombian Position re Red China, Presidency of GA, and Seat on International Court of Justice.

Participants: Ambassador Zuleta Angel, Colombian Ambassador to the U.S.

José Maria Chaves, Counselor, Embassy of Colombia

David W. Wainhouse (UNA)

Byron E. Blankinship (OSA)

The Ambassador stated that Colombia was strongly opposed to the admission of Communist China to the United Nations. He stated that his Government was requesting the support of other Latin American countries for this position on the ground that Colombia would resent the admission of Communist China, against whom Colombian forces were recently engaged.

The Ambassador stated that although Van Kleffens had considerable support in Latin America, Colombia would support Prince Wan for the Presidency of the United Nations General Assembly. The Ambassador said that this was a difficult choice to make but that Colombia proposed by way of compromise to support the candidacy of Van Kleffens for the Presidency of the next General Assembly.

The Colombian Ambassador stated that Colombia will support Sir Zafrulla Khan for the unexpired portion of the International Court of Justice seat left vacant by the death of Sir Benegal Rau. The Ambassador stated that Colombia wished to preserve four seats on the Court for Latin American countries. Mr. Wainhouse thanked the Ambassador for Colombia's support on the Communist China question. He said that he was interested in knowing that Colombia would support Prince Wan, but that the U.S. was unable to commit itself for any candidate as far ahead as a year or more such as Colombia proposed to do in the case of Van Kleffens.

Subject: 1) Security Council and ECOSOC Slates and 2) Your Appointment with Ambassador Silvercruys at 3:00 p. m. Today

Discussion:

Mr. Murphy held a meeting yesterday to discuss elections to the Security Council and ECOSOC at the Ninth Assembly. Assistant Secretaries Robertson and Merchant, Mr. Jernegan vice Mr. Byroade, Mr. Jamison vice Mr. Holland, and I attended. The following recommendations were reached unanimously:

1. Security Council

a. We should support Belgium, which has Western European support, for Denmark's seat, and inform the Belgians now, at the same time urging their continued support for our position against the seating of the Chinese Communists;

b. We should support either Cuba or Peru to succeed Colombia, our decision between the two to depend upon the choice of the Latin Americans;

c. We should support Iran, a candidate to succeed Lebanon, but should make no commitment until Iraq, which has also been a candidate, withdraws. (We understand that it intends to bow out in favor of Iran).

d. It was noted that Garcia, Vice-President of the Philippines and concurrently Secretary of Foreign Affairs, asked the Under Secretary in June for our support for the Philippines for the Security Council and that the Under Secretary said he could be pretty certain of our vote. Since the Philippines had previously asked our support for ECOSOC, we enquired in Manila whether it was actually a candidate for both Councils. We have had no definite answer from the Foreign Office, but the Philippine UN delegate has indicated it is interested only in ECOSOC. We decided at the meeting that it would be impracticable to support the Philippines for the Security Council but that we should actively support its election to ECOSOC.

2. ECOSOC

a. We should support two Latin American candidates to succeed Argentina and Cuba, our choices to depend upon the views of the Latin American group. (Argentina, Colombia, Chile, Dominican Republic and Mexico are candidates);

b. We should support the reelection of China and France;

c. As noted above, we should support the Philippines to succeed Egypt, and assure it of our active support now. (Afghanistan, Burma and Egypt are the other candidates.)

d. If, as we have heard indirectly, the Netherlands is a candidate to succeed Belgium, we should support it. If it is not a candidate, we should consider whether we could support Afghanistan.

Recommendations:

1. That you approve the above recommendations.
2. That you inform Ambassador Silvercruys that we will support Belgium's candidacy for the Security Council and use this opportunity to urge Belgium's continued support for our position against seating the Chinese Communists in the United Nations.

Subject: Belgium's Candidacy for a Seat in the Security Council

Participants: Baron Silvercruys—Ambassador of Belgium
 Mr. Georges Carlier—Counselor, Belgian Embassy
 The Secretary
 Mr. C. Burke Elbrick—Deputy Assistant Secretary,
 EUR

Baron Silvercruys said that in accordance with an arrangement between the Scandinavian countries and the Benelux countries providing for rotation of one Security Council seat, Belgium would announce its candidacy for the seat which is about to be vacated by Denmark. He said that he hoped that the United States would support its candidacy. The Secretary said jokingly that he had become somewhat wary of offering U.S. support in matters of this kind in view of certain unfortunate developments in connection with the candidacy of Prince Wan of Thailand and Van Kleffens of the Netherlands for the presidency of the General Assembly. The Belgian Ambassador said that he supposed that our UN delegation had been informed of Belgium's desires in this respect and that, while he would not press the Secretary for an answer at this time he hoped that the response to his request would be in the affirmative. The Secretary assured the Ambassador that we would like very much to support Belgium's candidacy for this seat. (The Secretary, however, made no final commitment.)

The Secretary then referred to the question of Communist China's admission to the UN and said—while he wasn't proposing this in the nature of a bargain with the Belgians in return for our support for its candidacy for the Security Council—he hoped that Belgium would agree with the United States position in this matter. Baron Silvercruys said that he had discussed this matter recently with Minister Spaak who, apparently, was inclined to view this subject as one which cannot be ignored much longer, and he had reminded Spaak that Belgium had, along with the majority of the members of the UN, voted to label Communist China as an aggressor. The Ambassador said he thought there were certain legal matters which would have to be cleared up before any consideration could be given to Chinese membership in the UN, such as a resolution which (in view of the fact that hostilities have ceased in the Far East) would recognize this fact and would "clear the books".

The Secretary said that while we might view the General Assembly as a "universal" organization in which all nations might have membership, the Security Council is responsible for the peace and security of the world and it would be highly inappropriate for an aggressive power like Communist China to sit in this Council. In addition, the Secretary found it difficult to reconcile the thought of Chinese Communist membership in the UN when other powers such as Germany, Spain, Italy, Portugal, Ireland and Japan had not been admitted to membership.

NEW YORK, August 20, 1954—8 p. m.

157. Re presidency 9th GA. In meeting with USUN today, Prince Wan reviewed his present calculations re his candidacy for presidency. Wan said Latin Americans were prepared to agree not try for presidency next year, and to support Van Kleffens then if Wan elected this year. They would be willing to sign a letter to effect. Wan felt this indicated growing support for his candidacy among Latin Americans although he recognized it was going to be a "close fight". He said in view of Van Balluseck's earlier agreement that it would be a "friendly contest", he was somewhat surprised at such commotion among Dutch, who were making the question a European issue, as were the British. Latter seemed to be even more active in favor of Van Kleffens than Netherlands delegation.

In talk between Wan and UNSYG yesterday about presidency, Hammarskjold had said that he himself had been frequently attacked as pro-American and that Wan could expect to be attacked likewise.

Wan said that Dutch claimed two commitments among ASAF group: Iran and Pakistan. Entezam had told him that if Iran had known of Wan's candidacy earlier they would have committed themselves to him, but now, with operating company headquarters of oil consortium being set up in Holland, they would have to adhere to their commitment to Van Kleffens. However, Entezam promised Wan if there were a second ballot, Iran would then switch to Wan.

Pakistan, other ASAF claimed by Dutch, was as yet uncommitted, according to Bokhari, said Wan. Eban (Israel) had told Wan if it were his decision he would support Wan and hoped to have a decision from his government during his present stay in Israel.

Wan, who is departing for Bangkok tomorrow, will see Zafrulla (Pakistan) in Philippines and plans to be back in New York a week before GA opens.

Subject: Question of Re-election of China and France to ECOSOC

Discussion:

As you requested, we have examined the question whether, as a step toward breaking away from the present practice under which the Big Five are in effect permanent members of ECOSOC and many other United Nations bodies, the United States might this year vote for other candidates instead of China and France for ECOSOC.

As you know, the basis for the present practice is simply the idea that these five countries, which the Charter recognized as having the greatest power and the greatest obligations, should be in a position to influence ECOSOC decisions. We are, in connection with the problem of Charter Review, canvassing possibilities for recasting the membership and voting systems in various United Nations organs, and under your general instructions, will certainly pursue ways in which the membership of the Councils might be changed so as to improve their work. We have not yet reached any definite conclusions on the matter.

However, although we do not support Soviet candidacies, it is our interim view that the present system under which the Big Five are automatically re-elected to ECOSOC has definite advantages to us. It does secure, without any effort on our part, the constant membership not only of ourselves, but also of the United Kingdom and France, which have the same general orientation toward ECOSOC problems as we have. It helps keep the smaller countries from exerting too much influence and makes it easier for us to prevent irresponsible action on major issues like economic development.

Our chief and immediate concern relates to any action which we might take now to deny China the position on ECOSOC which it undoubtedly expects. However we handled it, our failure to support China's re-election to ECOSOC would undoubtedly be interpreted as a weakening of our support of Nationalist China and as a first step towards seating Red China. Congressional and public reaction in this country would be hostile in view of the emotional and explosive nature of this subject, and this would adversely affect the Administration. The Chinese Nationalist Government has always considered its prestige to be vitally involved in membership in the various United Nations bodies on which the Big Five have traditionally been represented. It would vigorously protest our failure to support its re-election to ECOSOC.

France also would strongly resent our failure to support its re-election. Moreover, as mentioned above, its membership on ECOSOC is highly desirable from our standpoint, since it has been one of the strongest supporters of our policies in that Council.

118. Re General Committee Slate. While undesirable freeze slate completely at this stage, believe we should begin promote slate satisfactory our standpoint through informal talks with Secretariat and other delegations. Our general objective this question should be to elect competent chairman and assure safe balance in General Committee of friendly members on major issues like Chinese representation. Following are our present views which you may use as basis informal discussions with Secretariat and key delegations.

1. Assume geographic distribution of 15 posts which make up Committee will be similar to pattern generally followed in past—i.e., Big Five, 3 or 4 Latin Americans, 3 or 4 Near and Far East and 1 each from British Commonwealth, Western Europe and Soviet bloc.

2. We are voting for Wan for President and in considering General Committee slate should proceed on assumption he will be elected. Also assume Big Five will be elected vice-presidents. (FYI we would not vote for USSR and therefore our ballot would contain 6 instead of 7 states for vice-presidents. End FYI.) We would support LA candidate for one of the two remaining vice-presidencies. For the other Greece is candidate but UK would undoubtedly oppose its candidacy in view Cyprus problem. While Greece satisfactory to us we would accept Turkey, which has expressed interest. Arab state would be another possibility for seventh vice-presidency if Asha not given Committee 4. Realize Secretariat has mentioned Indonesia for vice-presidency and that it has never had post on General Committee. However Barrington (Burma) is being mentioned for Committee chairmanship and believe we cannot support both. Of the two, we would prefer support Barrington for a chairmanship. In our view he would make good chairman, and FYI only, we cannot support Burma's ECOSOC candidacy.

3. Re Committee Chairmanships:

a) Latin Americans seem definitely interested in Committee 1, and we would be willing support suitable Latin American choice.

b) We concur in Secretariat suggestion of Thor Thors (Iceland) for Ad Hoc.

c) We oppose election of Soviet bloc candidate to Committee 2 as suggested by UK or to Committee 3 as suggested by Secretariat. We would be willing support British Commonwealth candidate for one of these Committees, leaving it to Commonwealth to decide which Committee it prefers. FYI Understand Copeland (Australia) has made poor showing as Chairman ECOSOC's Economic Committee this year but if Commonwealth presses his candidacy we would vote for him. End FYI. For the other of these two Committees Barrington or suitable Latin American choice (perhaps Sevilla-Sacasa of Nicaragua) would be satisfactory, although we might also have to consider Asha since he could do less harm in Committee 2 or 3 than Committee 4.

d) We share UK view Asha (Syria) would be undesirable for Committee 4. While it might be hard prevent his election if he has Arab support, especially since we did not support him for TC presidency this year, solution might be to offer Syria vice-presidency, or possibly give Asha Committee 2 or 3. Suitable Latin American (possibly Sevilla-Sacasa or Nunez-Portuondo of Cuba) could then be given Committee 4. Alternatively Engen (Norway) could be considered for this Committee if Thors not interested in Ad Hoc.

e) For Committee 5 we would consider suitable Latin American choice (perhaps Sevilla-Sacasa) or Barrington.

f) If majority contrary to our view favors continuing give Soviet bloc one chairmanship, believe it should be Committee 6 where fewer controversial issues likely arise. However we would strongly oppose Katz-Suchy for this post particularly in view issue raised concerning his attitude toward Chinese representative last year.

ELECTIONS TO THE INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE

THE PROBLEM

The Ninth General Assembly and the Security Council must elect a judge to fill the vacancy on the International Court of Justice caused by the death of Sir Benegal Rau. They must also elect five judges to succeed Judges Sir Arnold Duncan McNair (British), Jose Gustavo Guerrero (Salvadoran), Alejandro Alvarez (Chilean), Jules Basdevant (French), and Levi Fernandes Carneiro (Brazilian), whose terms of office expire on February 5, 1955.

UNITED STATES POSITION

1. The United States should support Sir Zafrulla Khan of Pakistan for the vacancy created by the death of Sir Benegal Rau.
2. The United States should support Jules Basdevant of France, Hersch Lauterpacht of the United Kingdom, and three Latin American judges for the vacancies which will occur on February 5, 1955. Decision on the specific Latin American judges to support should be made only after the views of the Latin American group are known.

COMMENT

The Statute of the Court provides that the "Court shall be composed of a body of independent judges, elected regardless of their nationality from among persons of high moral character, who possess the qualifications required in their respective countries for appointment to the highest judicial offices, or are juris-consults of recognized competence in international law". The Statute also stipulates that the electors are to bear in mind not only the individual qualifications of candidates, but also "that in the body as a whole the representation of the main forms of civilization and of the principal legal systems of the world should be assured." The General Assembly and the Security Council, proceeding independently of one another, elect the judges from a list of persons nominated by national groups. The term of office on the Court is nine years.

The principal candidates for the vacancy created by the death of Sir Benegal Rau are Sir Zafrulla Khan of Pakistan, Radhabinod Pal of India and Charles de Visscher of Belgium. India has claimed that an Indian national is entitled to the unexpired portion of the Rau vacancy. However, the United States does not subscribe to this view, and has decided to support Sir Zafrulla Khan, who is eminently qualified for a position on the Court. Sir Zafrulla has already been informed that we will support him for the Rau vacancy, but that we cannot support him for one of the five regular vacancies, for which he is also a candidate.

With respect to the five regular vacancies which will occur on February 5, 1955, it will be desirable to support the reelection of Jules Basdevant of France, who has been nominated by the French national group, and to support Hersch Lauterpacht, nominated by the British national group, to succeed Sir Arnold Duncan McNair, who no longer wishes to serve on the Court. There has been a general practice of electing to the Court judges from the countries which are permanent members of the Security Council.

It will be desirable to support three Latin American judges for the remaining three seats, which are now held by Latin American judges. While equally well-qualified judges from other areas have been nominated, any effort on our part to reduce the number of Latin American judges on the Court would be strongly resented by the Latin American countries and this could seriously affect our relationships with these countries in the United Nations.

A number of Latin American countries have requested our support for their candidates as follows: Argentina, Lucio M. Moreno Quintana; El Salvador, Jose G. Guerrero; Mexico, Roberto Cordova; Panama, Ricardo J. Alfaro; and Paraguay, Raul Sapena Pastor. The following Latin Americans have also been nominated: Hildebrando Accioly (Brazilian), Ramon Carmona (Venezuelan), Eduardo Plaza (Venezuelan), Modesto Valle (Nicaraguan), and Homero Viteri Laffronte (Ecuadorean). In accordance with our usual practice regarding Latin American candidates for UN posts, we will wish to ascertain the preferences of the Latin American group before deciding on which three candidates to support.

Department concerned that in remaining weeks before Assembly we carefully maintain position communicated to Dutch and Thai, namely, that while we will vote for Wan we do not intend lobby for or against either candidate for President (Deptel 159 to The Hague repeated USUN 68 and CA-819). Promotion by us of proposal that Van Kleffens be supported next year and Latin American in 1956 would be inconsistent with this position. Dutch have informed us they oppose proposal, and thus our promotion of it would amount to lobbying against Van Kleffens. Moreover our support for proposal would involve commitments two years ahead which could create difficulties for us later (Deptel 61 to USUN). Therefore believe we should not become partners to proposal or encourage others accept it, although we should not discourage them either since we of course hope Wan will be elected.<sup>2</sup>

CONFIDENTIAL

[WASHINGTON,] September 14, 1954.

ELECTION OF THE PRESIDENT, VICE-PRESIDENTS AND COMMITTEE CHAIRMEN

THE PROBLEM

At the beginning of the session the Assembly will elect a President, seven Vice-Presidents and Chairmen of the seven Main Committees. These fifteen posts constitute the General Committee. In the past, the permanent members of the Security Council have been elected to five of the Vice-Presidencies, and the remaining posts have generally been distributed as follows: three or four to Latin America; three or four to the Near and Far East; and one each to the British Commonwealth, Western Europe and the Soviet bloc.

UNITED STATES POSITION

1. The general objective of the United States is to assure the election of competent presiding officers and to assure a safe balance of friendly members in the General Committee on major issues like Chinese representation.

2. The United States should vote for Prince Wan of Thailand for President. However, it should not lobby for him or against van Kleffens of the Netherlands.

3. The present United States slate on the Vice-Presidencies and Committee chairmen is as follows :

- Vice-Presidents*—
1. China
  2. France
  3. United Kingdom
  4. United States
  5. _____ *
  6. Suitable Latin American choice (probably Ecuador)
  7. Greece or either Indonesia or Burma

Committee Chairmen

Committee 1—Suitable Latin American choice (probably Urrutia of Colombia)

Ad Hoc Political Committee—Thors (Iceland)

Committee 2—Copeland (Australia)

Committee 3—Nosek of Czechoslovakia is now the only candidate and will probably be elected. However the United States should vote for a non-Soviet candidate if one is nominated.

Committee 4—Asha (Syria) unless a more suitable candidacy develops with a good chance of success.

Committee 5—Suitable Pakistani or other candidate

Committee 6—Suitable Latin American choice (probably Bolivian)

---

*The Soviet Union will undoubtedly be elected a Vice-President since the permanent members of the Security Council have traditionally held that office. However, the United States should not vote for the Soviet Union and its ballot should therefore contain six instead of seven states for Vice-Presidents. [Footnote in the source text.]

SECRET

[WASHINGTON,] September 14, 1954.

Subject: United States Position on Election of Soviet Candidates to the Advisory Committee and Committee on Contributions

You have asked for our comments on the attached memorandum from Mr. Barbour, dated September 10, 1954.<sup>1</sup> In this memorandum, Mr. Barbour expressed the belief that "we should vote in favor of a suitable Soviet candidate" for the Advisory Committee and the Committee on Contributions if China does not put forward a candidate.

We have just learned that China has proposed a Chinese national for the Advisory Committee, and we will, of course, support his election. The only case in question, therefore, is the Contributions Committee.

OIA believes, and we agree, that the reasons in EUR's memorandum for supporting a Soviet national for the Contributions Committee are sound. However, you will recall that on June 7 of this year, after EUR raised the question of our position on Soviet bloc candidates for the ECOSOC functional Commissions, we sent a memorandum to Mr. Key, a copy of which is attached.<sup>2</sup> In this memorandum we reviewed the background on this whole problem and concluded "that it may be said that current Department policy is against voting for a Soviet bloc candidate for any post, although whether we campaign and vote against a particular candidate or abstain must depend upon the circumstances of each case." We understand that Mr. Key concurred in this and discussed the matter with Mr. Barbour, who agreed to continue the policy as we described it. We are not aware of any policy to examine cases on an ad hoc basis to determine whether we should vote for a Soviet bloc candidate. Therefore, while we agree that there are valid reasons for voting for a Soviet candidate for the Contributions Committee, provided the U.S.S.R. nominates a more suitable candidate than Mr. Saksin, this would be contrary to what we understand to be our overall policy on the election of Soviet bloc candidates.

Subject: United States Position on Election of U.S.S.R. Candidates to the Advisory Committee and the Committee on Contributions

Reference is made to your memorandum of September 10, 1954 in which you express the belief that we should vote in favor of suitable Soviet candidates for the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions and the Committee on Contributions if China does not put forward one.

China has now proposed a Chinese National for the Advisory Committee, and we will support his election. The only case in question, therefore, is the Contributions Committee.

I recognize that there are arguments in favor of voting for a Soviet national for this particular Committee. However, an affirmative vote would be contrary to current Department policy, which is against voting for Soviet bloc candidates for any United Nations post. While it is true, as you point out, that we examine Soviet bloc candidacies on an ad hoc basis, we do this not to determine whether to vote for them, but rather to determine whether we should vote against or abstain—in other words, whether we should vote for a non-Soviet candidate instead or cast a blank ballot.

In the case of the Contributions Committee, we will, of course, support a Chinese candidate if one is nominated. Even if China does not put forward a candidate, I think we should authorize the Delegation to vote for any other qualified non-Soviet candidate if Mr. Saksin of the U.S.S.R., who is particularly objectionable, is the Soviet candidate. However, if the U.S.S.R. nominates a more suitable candidate, I think the United States could cast a blank ballot.

ELECTIONS TO THE SECURITY COUNCIL AND ECOSOC

THE PROBLEM

During the Ninth Session it will be necessary to elect three states to the Security Council and six states to ECOSOC.

COMMENT

A. Security Council

The United States has made strong representations to United Nations Members for support for our position against the seating of the Chinese Communists. Before reaching decisions on the Security Council slate, and also the ECOSOC slate discussed in Section B below, the positions of the candidates on the Chinese representation issue were seriously taken into account.

It has been our usual policy to support the Latin American candidates preferred by the Latin American group for the Security Council seats held by countries from that area. Peru is now the only candidate and would be satisfactory to us as a successor to Colombia.

Denmark's seat has always been held by a Western European state. Belgium claims the support of all the Western European countries plus Yugoslavia, Greece and Turkey. The Department has informed the Belgian Embassy of United States support for Belgium's candidacy.

Lebanon's seat has always been held by a Middle Eastern state. Iran claims the support of the countries of the Arab League, India, Pakistan, Afghanistan, and Turkey. However, Iraq, which was originally a candidate, has not yet officially withdrawn. When Iraq definitely withdraws, it would be desirable to inform Iran that we will support its candidacy.

B. ECOSOC

As in the case of the Security Council, it has been our usual policy to support the Latin American candidates preferred by the Latin American group for the seats being vacated by countries from that area.

China and France will undoubtedly be candidates for reelection since the permanent members of the Security Council have always been represented on ECOSOC.

The Netherlands is a candidate for Belgium's seat. Poland is also a candidate, presumably for this same seat. The United States, of course, strongly opposes Poland's election. Belgium's seat has always been held by a Benelux country. Moreover, we want to maintain the present balance in the Council between developed and under-developed countries. For these reasons, and in view of the strong resentment of the Dutch over our position on the Presidency of the Assembly, it is desirable to support the Netherlands rather than a country from some other area to succeed Belgium. The Department has informed the Netherlands Embassy of United States support for the candidacy of the Netherlands.

Egypt is a candidate for reelection and Afghanistan, Burma, and the Philippines are also candidates. The United States has informed the Philippines that it would give its candidacy active support. There is no South-East Asian country on any major United Nations Council, and the Philippines can be expected to continue to support our position on the Chinese representation issue. (The Philippines had also indicated some interest in election to the Security Council. The Department sent an enquiry to Manila the end of June asking whether the Philippines was actually a candidate for both Councils. Although the Philippine Foreign Office has never given us a definite answer, its delegation in New York indicated that the Philippines was interested only in ECOSOC.)

SECURITY COUNCIL ACTS ON ELECTION OF JUDGES TO INTERNATIONAL COURT

The Security Council this morning elected Muhammad Zafrulla Khan, at present Foreign Minister of Pakistan, as a Judge of the International Court of Justice to replace Sir Benegal N. Rau of India who died on 30 November 1953.

Mr. Zafrulla Khan will serve out the unexpired terms of Sir Benegal. The term expires on 5 February 1961.

The Security Council held only one ballot to fill this vacancy. Mr. Zafrulla Khan received 6 votes and Radhabinod Pal (India) 5.

The Security Council was informed by the President of the General Assembly that, in the election conducted in the Assembly, Mr. Zafrulla Khan had obtained the required majority, receiving—on the second ballot—33 votes as against 29 for Mr. Pal.

As Mr. Zafrulla Khan had obtained the required majority in both the Security Council and the General Assembly, he was duly elected to the International Court of Justice.

The Security Council then proceeded to the election of five Judges of the Court to replace Sir Arnold Duncan McNair (United Kingdom), Jose Gustavo Guerrero (El Salvador), Alejandro Alvarez (Chile), Jules Basdevant (France) and Levi Fernandes Carneiro (Brazil), whose terms of office expire on 5 February 1955.

The candidates obtaining an absolute majority were:

Jules Basdevant (France)	—9
Roberto Cordova (Mexico)	—9
Jose G. Guerrero (El Salvador)	—7
Hersch Lauterpacht (UK)	—8
Lucio M. Moreno Quintana (Argentina)	—8

The same 5 candidates obtained the required majority in the election conducted in the General Assembly and have, therefore, been duly elected as Judges of the International Court of Justice. The term of office is nine years.

On the first ballot in the Council, Jules Basdevant (France) received 10 votes, Roberto Cordova (Mexico) 8, Jose Gustavo Guerrero (El Salvador) 7, Hersch Lauterpacht (UK) 9, Lucio M. Moreno Quintana (Argentina) 7 and Charles de Visscher (Belgium) 6.

Shigeru Kuriyama (Japan) received 2 votes. There was also one vote each for Dr. Ricardo J. Alfaro (Panama), Georges Sauser-Hall (Switzerland) and Raul Sepena Pastor (Paraguay).

As 6 candidates obtained the required majority of 6 votes or more for the five vacancies, the Security Council proceeded to a second ballot.

On the second ballot the votes were as follows:

Mr. Basdevant	—10
Mr. Cordova	—8
Mr. Guerrero	—8
Mr. Lauterpacht	—8
Mr. Quintana	—7
Mr. de Visscher	—7
Mr. Kuriyama	—2
Mr. Pastor	—2
Dr. Alfaro	—1
Mr. Sauser-Hall	—1

As once again six candidates obtained the required majority for the five vacancies, the Security Council proceeded to a third ballot.

The results of the third ballot were as follows:

Mr. Basdevant	—9
Mr. Cordova	—8
Mr. Guerrero	—6
Mr. Lauterpacht	—8
Mr. Quintana	—7
Mr. de Visscher	—7
Mr. Kuriyama	—2
Dr. Alfaro	—2

Six candidates again obtained the required majority for the five vacancies and the Security Council, therefore, proceeded to the fourth ballot.

The fourth ballot had the following result:

Mr. Basdevant	—9
Mr. Cordova	—9
Mr. Guerrero	—5
Mr. Lauterpacht	—8
Mr. Quintana	—8
Mr. de Visscher	—5
Mr. Kuriyama	—1
Mr. Pastor	—2
Dr. Alfaro	—2
Mr. Sauser-Hall	—1
Choucri Cardahi (Lebanon)	—1

As only four candidates obtained the required majority, the Security Council proceeded to a fifth ballot to elect a Judge to fill the fifth vacancy.

The results of the fifth and final ballot were as follows:

Mr. Guerrero	—7
Mr. de Visscher	—4

Mr. Guerrero thus obtained the absolute majority necessary.

The Secretary of State to Certain Diplomatic and Consular Offices in the Other American Republics <sup>2</sup>

WASHINGTON, April 18, 1952—8:15 a. m.

During the past two years there have been significant increases in the budgets of some of the large specialized agencies of the United Nations. In UNESCO, the voted budget for 1951 was $8,200,000, and for 1952, $8,718,000. The Director General is proposing up to $10,529,391 for 1953. In WHO, the voted budget for 1951 was $7,300,000 and for 1952, $9,077,782. The Director General and Executive Board are proposing $9,837,554 for 1953, of which $9,000,000 will be assessed, the remainder to come from other income. (In WHO, 16% of the assessments in each year represent members who have indicated withdrawal but whose withdrawal is not recognized. The actual expenditure budget for 1952, for instance, is $7,677,782.)

In ILO, FAO, and ICAO, the increases have been more modest and represent very little expansion in program. In ILO, for instance, the Governing Body at its last session just completed cut the Director General's estimates for 1953 back to approximately the 1952 level.

In these agencies, the United States pays from 25% of the budget (ICAO, ILO) to 30% (FAO) and 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ % (UNESCO, WHO).

Similar airgrams were sent also on Apr. 18 to the Embassy in Rio (A-543) and to certain diplomatic missions in the Near East and Africa (Athens, Beirut, Damascus, and Monrovia).

In the case of three of the organizations (FAO, ILO, WHO), the Congress imposed limitations on the size of the annual United States contribution when it authorized United States participation. These limitations were exceeded in the United States assessments for 1950 and 1951 and the Congress in Public Law 806, 81st Congress, set new and higher limitations. In the case of WHO, there is danger of the new limitation being reached immediately. The Director General's estimates for 1953 call for an assessment to the United States of $3,000,000, the exact amount of the Congressional limitation.

The House Appropriations Committee, in recommending appropriations for the United States contributions to international organizations for the United States fiscal year 1953 in full as assessed, stated that it expected the Department to make every effort to reduce the amounts of the budgets of the various organizations. In voting the appropriation, the House reduced the total amount, thus placing the United States in a position of partial default if the reduction is not restored. The Senate has not yet acted.

The United States position in respect to these budgets, subject to the legislative limitations on the size of the United States contribution, has been a judicious one. We have believed that budgets should stand on their own merits, as long as they represented an intelligently planned program of necessary activities and did not go beyond the capacity of members to support them. The United States has never in the past argued for stabilization of budgets, but has tried to insure that any increases in them were necessary to carry out the kind and amount of program the United States wanted, on a sensible priority basis. This position has most frequently required that a conservative attitude be taken toward the always larger budgets proposed by the Directors General of the organizations. The United States position has not always been successful. The United States has often found itself in a minority position, and the subject of a great deal of criticism from delegations of other members who were pushing, with some success, to expand rapidly the agencies' programs. Unfortunately, in some cases, the delegations who were most active in pushing for budget increases were representing Governments whose delegations in the United Nations were strongly supporting resolutions calling for attempts at budget stabilization. In the United Nations General Assembly, many delegations have expressed great concern over the precipitate increases in agency budgets, but, in significant cases, their counterparts in the agencies have not appeared to be similarly instructed.

For example, at the Fourth Health Assembly in 1951, the United States delegation was instructed to support a modest increase in the budget, but found itself almost alone in this position, with a majority of the delegations wishing a large expansion. Although the vote was largely on a developed vs. underdeveloped country basis, there were several delegations supporting the large increase while their Governments were taking a different line in the United Nations General Assembly.

Budgets for the UN specialized agencies for 1953 will be voted at meetings of their constituent bodies this summer and fall. The United States position will be to hold budgets at their 1952 levels. This position is prompted not only by Congressional developments, but by a conviction that if sensible priorities are established, considerable program improvement can result under the same budget figure as at present. For your information, the Department hopes, however, that more governments will have taken the necessary internal coordinative action to ensure a consistent approach on their part to this problem, and that the United States may not bear the whole brunt of opposing the large budget increase which some members may desire. The action of the ILO Governing Body, where the United States position was gained with other governments taking the leadership, indicates that this is possible.

It would be appreciated if you would in your discretion discuss this matter with appropriate foreign office officials in the government to which you are accredited indicating this Government's concern over the problem and ascertaining, if possible, their views with regard to it. The Department fears that the proposed precipitate increases in the WHO and UNESCO budgets may jeopardize future United States support of these and other United Nations agencies. In the case of WHO, the adoption of the Director General's budget would prejudice the level of future budgets when less miscellaneous income would be available, and the United States legislative limitation would be quickly surpassed.

The WHO Assembly convenes in Geneva on May 5, and the Budget Committee of the UNESCO General Conference convenes in Paris in November.

"Reduction US percentage contribution in UN to  $33\frac{1}{3}\%$  for 1953 will be important US policy issue in 7th GA. In 1948 UN GA accepted fact no member in normal times shld pay more than  $\frac{1}{3}$  but other members so far been unwilling put this ceiling into effect except in very gradual stages. US received reduction to 36.90% at 6th GA but when USDel pressed for full reduction to  $33\frac{1}{3}\%$  only NIC supported us. Congressional preoccupation this matter provides recurrent danger amount over that percentage not be appropriated. Current appropriation bill gives another year's grace but House bill as originally passed refused appropriate more than  $33\frac{1}{3}\%$  for current year.

"UN Contributions Comite, which will recommend 1953 scale to GA, begins session Aug 4. This Comite composed for experts serving as individuals but appointed by their govts. National of govt to which you are accredited is member of Comite. Dept wld appreciate your informing FonOff of importance US attaches this matter. Inasmuch as Comite members not instructed reps of govts, you shld handle matter with some delicacy, stating that US has intention prejudicing professional character Comite deliberations, but impress upon FonOff fol facts:

"(1) Dept believes immed reduction US share to  $33\frac{1}{3}\%$  most important if wholehearted support US other UN programs not to be jeopardized. US willingness pay higher percentage larger special programs predicated on assumption that ceiling on regular expenses will be quickly reached and maintained.

"(2) This not matter of cost but matter of principle as has been expressed by USDel since first GA. All elements USGovt feel strongly that ceiling shld be implemented now.

"FYI, recommendations of Contributions Comite have been accepted each year since first GA. US plans push its position strongly in GA whether or not Comite recommends such action, but adverse Comite recommendation will make success quite difficult.

"It wld be appreciated if appropriate officials cld be contacted before Contributions Comite convenes."

Request that Mission staff informally make same case in contacts with members of staffs of Missions to UN from same govts, to extent deemed desirable in your judgment.

Request Gross or Ross talk with Tsiang, setting forth case for revision US percentage outlined above and stating we assume China will not seek revision its percentage. Gross or Ross shld mention such action on China's part might seriously jeopardize US objective to which we attach great importance.

Position Paper Prepared in the Department of State for the United States Delegation to the Seventh Regular Session of the General Assembly

CONFIDENTIAL

[WASHINGTON,] October 6, 1952.

SCALE OF ASSESSMENTS FOR THE APPORTIONMENT OF THE EXPENSES OF THE UN:

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON CONTRIBUTIONS (A/2161)

THE PROBLEM

It is the objective of the United States to obtain a reduction of its assessed share of the regularly budgeted expenses of the United Nations to not to exceed one-third of total assessments.

The United Nations Committee on Contributions has recommended a reduction for the United States of 1.78 percentage points (from 36.90% for 1952 to 35.12% for 1953). The Committee recommends smaller reductions for 25 other States including a reduction of 0.26 for the United Kingdom. At the same time, an increase is recommended for the USSR (together with Byelorussia and the Ukraine) of 2.85 percentage points, an increase of 0.22 for Poland, and minor increases for 7 other States.

The reduction recommended for the United States is exactly one-half the remaining distance downward to the goal of 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ %. As to the other states, the Committee indicates that it is proposing corrections of about one-half the amounts of under- and over-assessment indicated by the data on capacity to pay. The Committee suggests further that unless new disturbing factors develop during the next year, the remainder of the adjustments for the United States and for the other states involved may be in prospect for 1954.

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. The United States Delegation should attempt to secure a reduction in the United States percentage share to 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ % for 1953. It should take the position that the principle of a  $\frac{1}{3}$  ceiling, recognized by the General Assembly in 1948, has been implemented all too slowly up to this point; that the special reductions granted in the beginning to certain war-devastated states have long since ceased to be justified in the face of the economic recovery experienced by these states; and that a full implementation of the  $\frac{1}{3}$  ceiling at this time can be carried through without working an undue hardship on any other state. At the same time the Delegation should acknowledge the efforts of the Contributions Committee in attempting to formulate a generally acceptable report.

2. If it should become clear that the United States cannot obtain a reduction to 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ % for 1953, and if in the opinion of the Delegation further United States effort in this direction would run the risk of a complete overthrow of the Contributions Committee's report with the resultant loss of the 1953 reduction recommended for the United States and of the basis for a reduction to one-third next year, the Delegation should so report to the Department and seek further instructions.

COMMENT

The scale of contributions for 1953 recommended by the United Nations Committee on Contributions continues the trend of adjustment that last year characterized the Committee's recommendations for 1952. The proposed adjustments are as follows:

It was foreseen last year that further substantial increases were in store for the USSR, Byelorussia, the Ukraine, and Poland which states had continued all too long to benefit from the initial dispensation which had been granted them in 1946 on account of their war devastation and the serious financial problems they then faced. Since 1946, economic conditions in Eastern Europe have improved greatly, leaving these states grossly underassessed. The present report of the Contributions Committee indicates that the increase recommended for the Soviet States for 1953 amounts to approximately one-half of the remaining increase for those states indicated by the statistical data. The proposed assessment for the USSR (including Byelorussia and the Ukraine) for 1953 represented an increase over 1952 of 25%. The increase a year ago was 40% over 1951.

The proposed increases for Belgium, Cuba, Greece, Mexico, Philippines, Venezuela and Yugoslavia are relatively small and reflect improvement in the economic positions of these countries. All but Belgium, Greece, and the Philippines were increased also for 1952 at the last Assembly.

The proposed decreases for Canada, New Zealand and Sweden are in acknowledgment of the principle enunciated by the Third General Assembly that no state should pay a higher per capita contribution than the per capita contribution of the country paying the highest assessment. As the US percentage assessment decreases, this per capita limitation comes to apply to a limited number of states with particularly high living standards. The Contributions Committee indicates that in spite of the proposed reductions, Canada, New Zealand and Sweden will be paying a somewhat higher per capita contribution than the United States in 1953. Iceland's contribution also exceeds the United States in this respect, but Iceland already pays only the minimum.

Many of the remaining reductions are due to the fact that the Committee decided to permit a somewhat heavier allowance for countries with low per capita income. The Committee took this action pursuant to Resolution 582 (VI) which had requested it to give particular attention to the assessments of such countries.

As regards the proposed reduction of the United States contribution to 35.12%, the Committee states that this is "another major step toward a ceiling of 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ % for the largest contributor". This reduction is one-half the distance to the one-third level for the United States, and the Committee indicates that it is proceeding also at approximately the same rate in removing "maladjustments" in the contributions of other member states arising from under- and over-assessment on the basis of capacity to pay. Further, the Committee states that, in the absence of new disturbing factors, it should be possible a year hence to remove the remaining major divergencies and to propose the establishment of a more permanent scale for 1954.

The United States Congress attached to the Department of State's Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1952 the following proviso:

"No representative of the United States Government in any international organization hereafter shall make any commitment requiring the appropriation of funds for a contribution by the United States in excess of  $33\frac{1}{3}$  per centum of the budget of any international organization for which the appropriation for the United States contribution is contained in this Act: Provided, That in exceptional circumstances necessitating a contribution by the United States in excess of  $33\frac{1}{3}$  per centum of the budget, a commitment requiring a United States appropriation of a larger proportion may be made after consultation by United States representatives in the organization or other appropriate officials of the Department of State with the Committees on Appropriations of the Senate and House of Representatives: Provided, however, That this section shall not apply to the United States representatives to the Inter-American organizations. . . ."

The Congress attached a proviso also to the State Department's Appropriation Act for fiscal year 1953 as follows:

"No representative of the United States Government in any international organization after fiscal year 1953 shall make any commitment requiring the appropriation of funds for a contribution by the United States in excess of  $33\frac{1}{3}$  percent of the budget of any international organization for which the appropriation for the United States contribution is contained in this Act: Provided, however, That this section shall not apply to the United States representatives to the inter-American organizations. . . ."

[This letter proviso clearly applies only to commitments made after June 30, 1953 (the end of fiscal year 1953).]<sup>1</sup> It is the view of the Department that the commitment of the United States to pay its duly assessed share was undertaken in 1945 when this Government ratified the United Nations Charter and is not a product of the vote of the United States on the UN budget or scale of contributions. In abstaining on the contributions scale vote in the plenary last year the US Delegate, Representative John Vorys, stated, "We believe, however, that the principle adopted in 1948 should now be applied and any commitment of the United States to contribute more than  $33\frac{1}{3}$  percent will be based on the provisions of the Charter, not on the vote of the United States representatives." However, the Department wishes to make every effort to achieve its established objective of a one-third assessment and to satisfy the clearly expressed desire of Congress in this regard without delay. Therefore, the United States Delegation should press for the full reduction for the United States to  $33\frac{1}{3}\%$  at once.

The Delegation should point out that in the four years since the one-third ceiling principle was accepted by the 1948 General Assembly, the implementation of the principle has been extremely slow and the United States contribution has been reduced in that time by only 3 percentage points. The Delegation should point out further that certain other member states are still enjoying the benefit of special reductions granted originally on account of war-damage and dislocation although today these states have an economic out-put that is even larger than pre-war.

The United States has recently made high-level diplomatic approaches to other member governments, presenting the United States case for a reduction at once to  $33\frac{1}{3}\%$  along the general lines set forth above. The responses of the governments approached are still being reported and an analysis of them will be made available to the Delegation at an early date. With the evidence furnished by these responses, the Delegation should undertake extensive discussions with other delegations to gain support for the United States position before it is formally stated in committee.

A reduction of the United States share to  $33\frac{1}{3}\%$  would entail consequential adjustments for certain other members, including further reductions for Canada, New Zealand and Sweden if the per capita limitation is to be applied. The application of such adjustments is an intricate matter and the United States Delegation should leave to other delegations the initiative as to the procedure to be followed. The United States Delegation should, however, give favorable consideration to the calling of a special session of the Contributions Committee during the course of the Assembly to draw up an amended scale, if this action is proposed.

If the states subject to the per capita limitation should be unwilling to waive at this time their claim to further reduction, the United States Delegation should support their move for such reduction. Although the per capita limitation is not an altogether satisfactory rule in practice, the United States is morally bound to support it if the benefiting states insist, since the United States in 1948 accepted the inclusion of the per capita limitation as a necessary condition in gaining acceptance of the one-third ceiling principle.

As stated under "Recommendations", if it should become clear that the United States cannot obtain a reduction to  $33\frac{1}{3}\%$  for 1953, and if in the opinion of the Delegation further United States effort in this direction would run the risk of a complete overthrow of the Contributions Committee's report with the resultant loss of the 1953 reduction recommended for the United States and of the basis for a reduction to one-third next year, the Delegation should so report to the Department and seek further instructions.

Plenary Position Paper Prepared by the United States Delegation to the General Assembly

RESTRICTED

[NEW YORK,] December 4, 1952.

SCALE OF ASSESSMENTS FOR THE APPORTIONMENT OF THE EXPENSES OF THE UNITED NATIONS: REPORT OF THE FIFTH COMMITTEE (A/2286)

1. UNITED STATES POSITION

The United States should abstain on the report and the resolution recommended by the Fifth Committee. This resolution adopts the scale of assessments for 1953, recommended by the Committee on Contributions, which reduces the United States share to 35.12%. The resolution also decides that from 1 January, 1954, the assessment of the largest contributor shall not exceed one-third of total assessments against Members. This is the first time that definite assurance has been given the United States regarding the implementation of the ceiling principle adopted in 1948. The United States should vote against the draft resolution proposed by the USSR (A/L.122). This resolution in practically the same form was rejected in the Fifth Committee by a vote of 5-37-6.

The United States should vote under Rule 67 against plenary debate of the Fifth Committee report. It is necessary, however, that the United States explain its vote by a statement along the lines of the attached draft (Annex A).

2. HISTORY IN COMMITTEE

The United States vigorously pressed for an immediate reduction of its percentage to 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ % during Fifth Committee discussions (Press Release #1579). Many delegations were sympathetically inclined toward the United States position, but were fearful that an overthrow of the scale recommended by the Committee on Contributions would lead to a chaotic situation. These delegations, led by the Canadians who agreed to forego benefits which they would otherwise derive from the per-capita principle as the United States share was reduced, supported the compromise solution contained in this report. This solution was designed to give the United States assurance that its wishes would definitely be accommodated by 1954. The United States abstained in the vote on the resolution now before the Assembly. The vote on the draft resolution as a whole was 38-7-3.

3. POSSIBLE DEVELOPMENTS IN PLENARY

It is anticipated that the Fifth Committee report will be adopted. The Soviet bloc may seize this opportunity to again attack the United States along the line followed in Fifth Committee, i.e., "failure to provide income tax exemption for United States nationals on Secretariat, requiring reimbursement to United States Treasury out of United Nations funds; restraint of trade which makes difficult payment of Member assessments; and war profiteering of United States, while others suffered immense devastation". (A full rebuttal to these charges was made by Senator Wiley in a speech in Fifth Committee, on November 14, 1952, Press Release #1583.)

DRAFT STATEMENT

Explanation of Vote on the Report of the Fifth Committee (Scale of Assessments) by the Honorable Alexander Wiley, United States Delegate to the General Assembly, in Plenary Session, November 1952.

MR. PRESIDENT: I appreciate this opportunity to explain the vote of the United States on the report of the Fifth Committee on contributions for 1953. This is a most important and complex question.

As I have repeatedly attempted to make clear to the Fifth Committee, the reduction of the United States' share of the regular expenses of the United Nations to the one-third ceiling, is a matter of great moment and a source of considerable concern within my government. This is evident from the fact that for two successive years the Congress of the United States has passed laws which place restrictions on our representatives to international organizations with regard to assessed financial commitments on the United States in excess of one-third of the total assessments. My previous statements in the Fifth Committee, urging action to implement the one-third principle now, were made with these legal limitations, as well as the United States Delegation's convictions, in mind.

For several years, delegations from the United States have stated the case for the one-third ceiling principle with earnestness and sincerity. They have attempted, as I have endeavored this year, to make it abundantly clear that the United States looks upon this question as one of principle—not one of money. I reminded my colleagues in Committee 5 of the vast contributions which the United States Government has freely made to the total undertakings of the United Nations and its related Agencies. Contributions which have reached a total of $580 millions since 1946—a total which does not, and cannot, take into account the thousands of American lives and billions of dollars being directly spent by the United States in support of United Nations principles in Korea. I mention these considerations, not in an effort to claim credit, but in an effort to again underscore the fact that my Government is primarily concerned about the principle at issue. We believe it is vitally important to the United Nations that it not be dependent upon any one Member State for more than one-third of its regular income. We believe that in an international organization composed of sixty sovereign states, with equal privileges and responsibilities, there should be more equality in contributions. We believe that contrary conditions mitigate against the best long run interests of the United Nations.

I shall not again repeat the many reasons why I believe it would have been both wise and just for this Assembly to have approved the resolution submitted by my Delegation. This resolution would have fixed the share of the largest contributor at one-third as of 1 January 1953. Since this did not find favor with the majority of the Fifth Committee, I had no alternative but to abstain on the proposal to establish the ceiling at one third for 1954. We also abstained on the resolution adopting the report of the Committee on Contributions. In any event, Sir, I believe that it is manifest, as the distinguished delegate and parliamentarian of Norway pointed out in the Fifth Committee, that any commitment of the United States to contribute more than 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ % is based on the provisions of the Charter, and not on the vote of the United States representative.

I should not like to close without a reference to the Committee 5 efforts of the Canadian and other delegates, who obtained Committee agreement on the resolution we have considered today. While this agreement is not all that my Government deems warranted under the circumstances, it does constitute a firm step forward in that, for the first time, there is definite assurance that the ceiling principle will be finally implemented beginning 1 January 1954. This in itself is gratifying, and those who labored to bring about this result, are entitled to the appreciation of all of us who have the best interests of the United Nations at heart.

In summary, Sir, I hope that this Assembly will accept the assurances of my Delegation that the United States will continue to do its part in the support of the United Nations. I hope also that you will understand that our abstention today was dictated by a spirit of cooperation. Since I could not vote for the report, I did the next best thing by abstaining. I did so because I recognize that there is much that is good in the report on contributions, and because I appreciate the goodwill which lies behind the 1954 assurance. It is my fervent wish, Mr. President, that this example of give-and-take—this product of a willingness to come at least part of the way toward accommodating differing points of view—might spur us on, in the same spirit, toward significant accomplishments in the settlement of the major problems which confront us.

I thank you, Mr. President.

SCALE OF ASSESSMENT FOR THE APPORTIONMENT OF THE EXPENSES OF THE UNITED NATIONS: REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON CONTRIBUTIONS

THE PROBLEM

Although the report of the Committee on Contributions has not yet been issued, it is expected to recommend a scale of assessments for 1954 in which the United States assessment is reduced to 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ % as directed by the last General Assembly (a reduction of 1.79 percentage points from 35.12% for 1953). The assessments of the 3 Soviet states and Poland will be increased somewhat but not to the full extent justified by these countries' capacity to pay. The recommended scale is also expected to include minor adjustments for a number of other states, including some reduction for the United Kingdom. It is not anticipated that other Governments will make a serious attempt to reject the Committee's recommendations. However, in connection with the reduction of the U.S. share to 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ %, an attempt may be made to inject the issue of the continued U.S. delay in granting any sort of exemption or credit to U.S. nationals on the Secretariat as regards U.S. income taxes on their UN salaries. What should be the U.S. position on the Contributions Committee's report if it follows the lines anticipated?

UNITED STATES POSITION

1. The United States Delegation should express appreciation for the conscientious work of the Committee on Contributions. It should express gratification in particular at the full implementation of the one-third ceiling principle.

2. The Delegation should express its concern that the Contributions Committee has not recommended the removal of all major discrepancies from the scale for 1954, and should draw attention particularly to the fact that certain countries, including the Soviet states, remain substantially underassessed. It should state the U.S. view that the continuance of these discrepancies is unjustified, and should urge that they be removed as quickly as possible.

3. If it should be proposed to instruct the Contributions Committee to prepare a semi-permanent scale for consideration at the next Assembly, perhaps along the lines contemplated by Rule 159, the United States should oppose such a move as being premature as long as substantial discrepancies remain in the scale.

4. If the issue of U.S. failure thus far to grant tax exemption or tax credit in respect of UN salaries of U.S. nationals is raised in connection with the U.S. assessment, the Delegation should take the position that this issue should be considered separately from the contribution scale.

COMMENT

Since the major United States interest in the scale of contributions for 1954 is the final implementation of the one-third ceiling, the Delegation should not take a leading part in the discussion of the scale unless the expected reduction for the U.S. should be called into serious question. The Delegation should, however, call attention to the fact that the Contributions Committee has not carried out its intention of completing the removal of all major discrepancies from the scale by 1954. In particular, the Soviet states remain underassessed and at the present rate of adjustment it would take at least until 1956 to bring them to their proper level. The fact of Soviet under-assessment continue to be a matter of concern to the United States even when the U.S. share is reduced to 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ %. The Delegation should urge that all remaining discrepancies be corrected as quickly as possible. If it would facilitate a solution to lay down specific instructions in this regard for the Committee on Contributions, the Delegation should propose or support such instructions.

OFFICIAL USE ONLY

[WASHINGTON,] September 11, 1954.

SCALE OF ASSESSMENT FOR THE APPORTIONMENT OF THE EXPENSES OF THE UNITED NATIONS: REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON CONTRIBUTIONS

THE PROBLEM

Although the report of the Committee on Contributions has not yet been issued, it is expected to recommend a scale of assessments for 1955 in which the United States assessment would remain at 33.33%, and the aggregate assessment of the three Soviet states would be increased by 1.08 percentage points to 17.61%. The assessments of 6 other states including Canada and France would be increased, and the assessments of 15 states would be decreased by minor amounts. What should be the U.S. position on the Contributions Committee's report if it follows these lines?

UNITED STATES POSITION

1. The United States should express appreciation for the conscientious work of the Committee on Contributions.
2. At the same time, the Delegation should express its concern that the Contributions Committee has not recommended the removal of all major discrepancies from the scale for 1955, and should draw attention particularly to the fact that certain countries, including the Soviet states, remain substantially underassessed. It should state the U.S. view that the continuance of these discrepancies is unjustified, and should urge that they be removed in their entirety for 1956 in order to clear the way for consideration of a more permanent scale.
3. If it should be proposed that the draft 1955 scale be applied also to 1956, the United States should oppose such a move as being premature as long as substantial discrepancies remain in the scale.
4. In regard to the principle that no Member shall be assessed more per capita than the per capita assessment of the largest contributor (per capita limitation principle), the Delegation should informally canvass the delegations of the countries which stand to benefit from the limitation. If it is clear that these countries are prepared to see the per capita limitation principle abandoned, the Delegation may support such abandonment. If this is not the case, the United States should make clear in any formal statement that (a) this principle is not necessarily a corollary of the one-third ceiling principle; (b) the United States supported the adoption of the per capita principle in 1948 at the time the one-third ceiling principle was adopted; (c) the U.S. agrees that full implementation of the per capita limitation should take place only as new membership and improved economic conditions permit such implementation to take place without hardship to other Member states; and (d) the United States does not believe reconsideration of the per capita limitation is required at this time.

COMMENT

Since the United States has accomplished its major objective of a full implementation of the one-third ceiling principle, it should not take a leading part in the discussion of the draft scale. The Delegation should, however, call attention to the fact that the Contributions Committee has been moving progressively more slowly in eliminating the remaining major discrepancies from the scale. In particular, the three Soviet states remain underassessed, and at the present rate of adjustment it would require more than another year to bring them to their proper level. The fact of Soviet underassessment continues to be a matter of concern to the United States even when the U.S. share has been reduced to 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ %. The Delegation should urge that all remaining discrepancies be corrected for 1956. If it would facilitate a solution to lay down specific instructions in this regard for the Committee on Contributions, the Delegation should propose or support such instructions.

With regard to the per capita limitation, the Report of the Contributions Committee is expected to propose a reconsideration of the principle as being of doubtful equity in the allocation of costs among Members. The United States supported the recognition of the per capita limitation in 1948 as a practical necessity in obtaining support for the one-third ceiling principle. Canada has been the most active promoter of the per capita limitation, and the United States is obligated to support the limitation in principle except in the unlikely event that Canada and the other beneficiary countries are ready to abandon it. It is more likely that these countries will insist upon the retention of the principle but will be willing to forego the benefits for the present.

UNITED STATES POLICY REGARDING PROBLEMS ARISING FROM THE QUESTION OF THE REPRESENTATION OF CHINA IN THE ORGANS OF THE UNITED NATIONS <sup>1</sup>

CA files, lot 57 D 663, "Chinese Representation at UN, 1952"

Memorandum Prepared in the Office of Chinese Affairs

[WASHINGTON,] March 20, 1952.

QUESTION OF CHINESE REPRESENTATION IN UNITED NATIONS AND SPECIALIZED AGENCY BODIES

By an informal exchange of communications between the Secretary and Mr. Morrison in June of last year, we reached an understanding with the United Kingdom on the Chinese representation issue. Under this "moratorium arrangement" it was understood that "our two delegations to the United Nations should consult in advance to concert on procedures which both delegations could support for avoiding a vote on this "issue". Pursuant to this agreement the UK and US have supported proposals to postpone consideration of the Chinese representation issue, whenever this question has been raised in the various UN and specialized agency bodies. This postponement procedure has been supported by a large majority of states, including certain non-Soviet states which recognize the Chinese Communist regime. The chief reason for the wide support for the postponement action was the Korean aggression.

If a Korean armistice is concluded <sup>2</sup> the Chinese representation problem may become acute, particularly in those UN and specialized agency bodies so composed that they contain a large number of states recognizing the Chinese Communist regime. Since a number of the European states which recognize the Chinese Communists tend to follow the lead of the UK on the Chinese representation issue, the key to our holding the line will be the continuance of the "moratorium arrangement" or some other agreement with the UK. There was no indication in the exchange of communications with the UK as to how long the "moratorium arrangement" would apply, but the general assumption was that it was operative at least for the duration of the Korean aggression, and the UK has made it clear in its UN statements that the Korean aggression was the reason for its support of the postponement action. We do not know precisely what the UK position is as to the continuance of the "moratorium arrangement" after an armistice. On February 27 of this year, however, the UK representative in the Trusteeship Council, in supporting the US postponement action, stated that "even if . . . the armistice negotiations were successful, it would still be inadvisable to discuss the [Chinese representation]<sup>3</sup> question during the next few months". We plan to have our Mission in New York informally ascertain from Mr. Jebb at an appropriate time whether this statement reflects UK intention to continue the "moratorium arrangement" after the conclusion of a Korean armistice.

A-78. Subject: Chinese Representation

1. Following is the basic position paper on Chinese representation which will be included in the instructions to US Representatives to those UN and specialized agency bodies which are composed of government representatives. (See Deptel 334 to USUN, dated March 13, 1952 for US position on the Chinese representation issue in all functional Commissions of ECOSOC, except the Narcotics Commission; since the Narcotics Commission is composed strictly of government representatives, the US Representative to that Commission will be instructed to follow the position set forth below.) Dept will revise the position paper, as necessary, for each body to take into account any special procedural problems or any general political developments affecting the Chinese representation issue.

2. The Department requests that a USUN political adviser assist US Delegations to technical bodies on the Chinese representation issue, both in the diplomatic preparations in advance of the session and at the first meeting. The Narcotics Commission is scheduled to convene on April 17, and the UNICEF Exbd on April 22.

The Problem

The problem is to determine US position in the event that the Chinese representation question is raised at the forthcoming session of _____

The Chinese representation issue is likely to arise at the outset of the first meeting of the session in the form of a Soviet bloc proposal to exclude the representatives of the Chinese National Government and/or to invite Chinese Communists to participate [or to seat Chinese Communist representatives].<sup>1</sup> It is also possible (although unlikely) that the question may arise in the form of a proposal to include the question of the representation of China in the agenda.

---

Recommendations

1. In the event that a proposal is made to exclude the Chinese National representatives and/or to invite Chinese Communists to participate [or to seat Chinese Communist representatives], the United States Representative should initiate or support a motion to postpone discussion of or action on such a proposal. He should ensure that this procedural motion is put to the vote first. It should be made clear that the adoption of this postponement motion would result in the continued seating of the representatives of the Chinese National Government. In advancing this procedural motion, the United States Representative should make a statement along the lines of paragraph 2 of the "Comment" section below.

2. In the event that a proposal is made to include the question of the representation of China in the agenda, the United States Representative should move that the question of the inclusion of such an item in the agenda be postponed. In advancing this procedural motion, the United States Representative should make a statement along the same general lines as paragraph 2 of the "Comment" section below. As in 1 above, it should be made clear that the adoption of this procedural motion would result in the continued seating of the representatives of the Chinese National Government.

3. If it appears that the Chinese representation question is likely to arise, i.e., if USSR or Soviet bloc representatives attend the session, the United States Representative should consult in advance with other friendly members, beginning with the United Kingdom, in an effort to obtain as wide support as possible for the postponement action.

4. If, nevertheless, the above postponement procedure (or some other procedure which avoids a vote on the substance) is not followed and the substance of the Chinese representation question is put to the vote, the United States Representative should actively oppose and vote against any proposal to exclude the representatives of the Chinese National Government and/or seat Chinese Communists. The continued opposition of the United States to any such proposal should be strongly reaffirmed.

Comment

1. By advancing a procedural position and avoiding a vote on the substance we can most easily achieve our objective with respect to the Chinese representation issue, i.e., the continued seating of the representatives of the Chinese National Government in all UN and specialized agency bodies. The postponement procedure set forth above has been followed in nearly all UN and specialized agency bodies since June of last year, when the United Kingdom agreed to support such proposals. A large majority of states (including most non-Soviet states which recognize the Chinese Communist regime) have supported this action. The postponement procedure should therefore be followed unless there is general agreement on some other procedure which will avoid a vote on the substance and which will ensure the continued seating of the representatives of the Chinese National Government.

2. Statement by US Representative

"The opposition of the United States Government to the unseating of representatives of the Chinese National Government and to the seating of Chinese Communists has been made clear time and time again. I now reaffirm this position. In the view of my government, it is out of the question even to consider a proposal to exclude the representatives of the Chinese National Government and/or to seat Chinese Communists at a time when the international conduct of the Chinese Communist regime departs so drastically from the normally accepted standards of international conduct, and when this regime has shown no respect for or intention to abide by the principles for which the United Nations stands as exemplified by its action and its defiance of the United Nations in Korea.

"For these reasons, I move that this body postpone further discussion of this question. This motion has precedence over the [Soviet] proposal to exclude the Chinese National Representative and/or to seat a Chinese Communist, and if it is adopted, as my delegation strongly urges, it would result in an indefinite postponement of any further discussion of the proposal and the continuance of the Chinese National representative in this body".

CONFIDENTIAL

WASHINGTON, September 12, 1952.

APPOINTMENT OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE

THE PROBLEM

The problem is to determine the position of the United States Delegation with respect to the composition of the Credentials Committee. This Committee is composed of nine members and is appointed by the General Assembly on the proposal of the Temporary President (Padilla Nervo—Mexico).

---

RECOMMENDATION

The United States Delegation should accept any slate proposed by the Temporary President provided that (a) the geographic distribution of countries approximates that of the last regular session; and (b) the slate reflects Assembly sentiment on recognition of the Chinese Communist regime. As of September 4, only 17 of the 60 UN Members had recognized the Regime, including Byelorussia and the Ukraine.* On this basis the Committee should include not more than three states which have recognized the Chinese Communists.

COMMENT

Rule 28 of the Assembly's Rules of Procedure provides that "A Credentials Committee shall be appointed at the beginning of each session. It shall consist of nine members, who shall be appointed by the General Assembly on the proposal of the President. . . ." The appointment of the Credentials Committee is normally the fourth item on the Assembly's agenda; it is preceded by the formal opening of the session, a minute of silent prayer or meditation and a statement by the Temporary President (the Chairman of the delegation from which the President of the previous session was elected, i.e., Padilla Nervo (Mexico)).

The Credentials Committee of the sixth session was composed of the following states: Bolivia, Byelorussia, Ethiopia, France, Haiti, Indonesia, Iraq, New Zealand and Norway.

The Temporary President, in proposing the Credentials Committee slate, acts on the recommendation of the Secretariat, and the Secretariat checks the slate in advance with major delegations, including the United States. In the past the Secretariat has always been amenable to changes suggested in the slate by the United States Delegation. In view of the Chinese representation issue, the Delegation should make every effort to ensure that the slate is drawn up by the Secretariat and proposed by the Temporary President in accordance with the above recommendation. In the unlikely event that such a slate is not proposed, the Delegation should move appropriate changes in the plenary session.

LONDON, November 26, 1952—6 p. m.

2988. UN political Dept FonOff yesterday called Embassy officer in to inform Embassy of seriousness with which FonOff views recent developments in US handling of moratorium on Chi Commie representation.

FonOff summarized US draft res at UNGA Oct 17 recommending that GA postpone consideration Chi Commie representation and that Chi Nationalist credentials be considered in order and developments at UNESCO mtg Nov 12 on similar subj. At latter mtg UK del had been instructed to enter reservation similar to that of India and Yugo, but had neglected to carry out his instruction and opportunity for UK to present its views had been lost. Also, when question was raised by Czech del at recent mtg of Internatl Sugar Council, no reply on Chi rep had been made.

FonOff stated that developments at UNESCO were not to be taken as a precedent and that, if question of Chi Commie representation comes up in this form in future, UK will either enter reservation about Chi Nationalist credentials or abstain. UK understanding is that moratorium is simply to have postponement of question of Chi rep without discussion on substantive matter; it fears that US wants not only postponement but also endorsement of Chi Nationalist credentials and in UK view this is going too far.

Next scheduled mtgs at which matter may arise are ITU and IPU [UPU?]mtgs in Jan; UK is anxious that Dept adhere to understanding originally reached in order that UK not be forced to enter reservation re Chi Nationalist credentials and that possible open US-UK disagreement be avoided.

Brit Emb Wash is being instructed to raise this question with Dept.

Subject: Chinese Representation

Mr. Wenner telephoned me on December 19 to inform me of the British position if the Chinese representation issue should arise in the Fiscal Commission, Population Commission, Statistical Commission and Transport and Communication Commission, which, he said, were meeting in January or February of next year. He stated that the UK took the position that these bodies were not competent to consider the Chinese representation issue and would support a ruling to that effect should the issue arise. I told Mr. Wenner that the United States also took the position that these Commissions were not competent to consider the question and that our Representatives would be so instructed.

At one point in the conversation, Mr. Wenner alluded to "minor deviations" from the moratorium arrangement recently and said that he wanted to be sure that the US and UK positions for the ECOSOC Commissions were coordinated. When I asked Mr. Wenner what the deviations were, he said that he was not concerned with that question at this point. (Comment: Presumably Mr. Wenner was referring to the method of handling the Chinese representation issue at the GA and UNESCO to which the Foreign Office has objected. However, I did not press him on the point since he obviously did not want to discuss the matter.)

CONFIDENTIAL

WASHINGTON, December 23, 1952.

A-907. Re urtel 2988 of Nov 26, UK Emb has not yet approached Dept re recent method handling Chi representation issue. However, if Emb raises matter we intend answer as fol:

(1) This year Chi representation issue at UNGA arose in Credentials Comite which must make finding on credentials of all Reps at each session. It was necessary adapt moratorium procedure to this function of Comite.

(2) Dept believes Res which US submitted to Credentials Comite after USSR raised Chi representation issue was in accordance with moratorium arrangement. First para called for postponement of consideration Chi representation issue while second para was finding, without going into substance of issue, that credentials of Chi Natl Govt Reps were in proper form. This Res discussed in advance with UK Reps who indicated it was entirely satisfactory. (Since UK is not this year a member of Credentials Comite, it was not required to vote on US Res there). After Comite approval of Res, UN Secretariat, in drafting final Comite Report, prepared Res for GA adoption which first approved report of Comite and second decided postpone consideration Chi representation issue. Because of change in order UK felt obliged abstain on first para of this Res when put to separate vote in GA plenary. US and UK Dels considered requesting vote on second para first, but agreed this procedure too complicated.

(3) In Credentials Comite of UNESCO Conf India and Yugo noted their objections to credentials Chi Natl Govt Reps but did not propose exclusion these reps. US suggested adjournment of discussion but UK and others did not speak in favor this suggestion and Chairman (Venezuela) finally observed report wld state comite had decided by majority to recommend acceptance of credentials Chi Del and had noted Indian and Yugo objections. While Committee might have decided first to postpone consideration of issue and then to accept credentials of Chi Del, postponement did not seem entirely appropriate in this case since India and Yugo had merely voiced objections without requesting consideration of issue. Further, fact remains that because Comite must report on credentials of all reps it wld still have had to make recommendation on credentials Chi Natl Govt Del even if it had postponed consideration of substantive issue.

Since we have not yet been approached by UKEmb, believe UK may have reconsidered and decided not raise matter. FYI only, Member US Del to GA informally mentioned FonOff objections to UKDel legal adviser who confirmed US Res presented UNGA Credentials Comite was satisfactory to UKDel End FYI. However, if FonOff again brings up question, you may discuss developments at UNGA and UNESCO and Dept views as outlined above, expressing hope UK will agree that when issue arises in Credentials Comites of UN bodies, Res along lines proposed by US in UNGA Credentials Comite is satisfactory method of handling issue in accordance moratorium arrangement and at same time of meeting Comite requirement that it make finding on credentials of all reps, and expressing hope that if issue arises in Credentials Comites in future UK will not feel compelled abstain on credentials of Chi Natl Govt Reps if issue disposed of by means of such Res.

Subject: Madame Pandit and Chinese Communist Representation in the UN.

According to Beirut's 1258, January 2,<sup>1</sup> there is a report that Madame Pandit, during her tour of the Middle East, is urging support for Chinese Communist representation in the UN and is reportedly arguing that the Arab-Asian bloc would be able to exercise a veto power through the Chinese Communists.

I. Madame Pandit's support for seating the Chinese Communists would be consistent with India's habitual position on this question in the UN and with Nehru's recent plea before the Central Committee of the World Council of Churches for greater Western recognition of the Chinese Communists. Support at this time for Chinese Communist representation in the UN might be regarded by Nehru as a means of (a) improving India's standing with Communist China through support of a policy known to be repugnant to this country and (b) covering India's embarrassment at its rebuff on the Korean proposal by suggesting that the basic difficulty was in fact Western rejection of the Chinese Communists.

II. Reference to the advantages of a Chinese Communist veto is somewhat obscure. On most questions of primary interest to the Arabs—colonialism, racial problems and economic development of underdeveloped countries—Arab positions coincide with Soviet positions so that a veto is already at hand. The one important exception is the Palestine question on which the Soviet position has wavered. At the recent GA, however, the USSR voted with the Arabs on the Palestine question—a move which Beirut has reported was a big surprise to the Arabs.

III. It has often been assumed that India would seek a Charter amendment in 1955<sup>2</sup> to enable it to become a permanent member of the Security Council, possibly in place of China. India has also clearly sought to assume a position of leadership among the Arab-Asians. For India to be pushing Chinese Communist representation in the UN on the argument that the Chinese Communists would protect Arab interests would seem accordingly to be somewhat inconsistent with India's previous positions. It will be interesting to see whether Madame Pandit does in fact advance this argument.

[WASHINGTON,] January 12, 1953.

Subject: Chinese Representation at the ECAFE meetings.

On January 9 Djakarta reported that according to the Indonesian Foreign Office the Chinese Communists were expected to send observers to the forthcoming ECAFE conference at Bandung. It was not clear from the message whether the Chinese Communists would seek official status as observers or merely be present in the audience. A further message from Djakarta (1235 January 10) now confirms that the Chinese Communists are definitely sending a group from Peiping. Djakarta adds, however, that Lokanathan, the Executive Secretary of ECAFE, has said that only UN Members may send official observers to the ECAFE conference, that all meetings are open to the public and that the Chinese Communists can only listen and lobby.

Comment:

I. Official Observer Status

An official observer delegation would have the right to speak but not to vote. If the Chinese Communists should seek this status, it is believed that, despite Lokanathan's reassuring position, many ECAFE members might be disposed to support the request. It appears improbable, however, that the Chinese Communists would seek or accept any status inferior to, or even co-equal with, that of the Chinese National representatives and, accordingly, it is more likely that they would try to have the Chinese National delegation unseated than to obtain observer status for themselves.

II. Probable Effort to Unseat the Chinese National Representatives.

It is to be expected that a vociferous effort will be made by the Soviet delegation, with all the assistance that the Chinese Communists can give, to unseat the Chinese National representatives and to seat the Chinese Communists. Failing in this maneuver, the Chinese Communists might remain on the scene for lobbying and other activities.

In the committee meetings preliminary to the main ECAFE meetings, Associate Members which include the three Indochinese States and three British colonial units have votes. Our voting position in these bodies on Chinese representation has accordingly always been favorable.

Membership in ECAFE itself—where only members have a vote—is evenly divided between states recognizing the Chinese National Government (Australia, China, France, New Zealand, Philippines, U.S., Thailand) and those recognizing the Chinese Communists (Burma, India, Indonesia, Netherlands, Pakistan, USSR, UK). Since working out the moratorium arrangement with the UK, however, we have been able to handle the Chinese representation question on a procedural basis with comfortable voting margins. At the last session of ECAFE, for example, a Soviet motion to unseat the Chinese Nationalists and seat the Chinese Communists was checked by a Thai motion that no action be taken on the question at the session. The Thai motion carried 10 to 4 (USSR, India, Indonesia, Burma).

The problems presented by the Chinese representation question at the ECAFE conference have already been discussed by the Department with the Chinese and British Embassies here. The Chinese Government is sending a delegation of five members. The British Embassy is checking with London to make sure that the positions of the two governments coincide. If all our friends attend and the moratorium agreement holds we should be able to handle the problem on a procedural basis as in past years, but with a more determined propaganda effort.

China" should have been entitled "Letter from the Chinese Foreign Minister to the Head of the World Health Assembly." Mr. Tsui referred to a resolution on China's budgetary situation with respect to WHO which was adopted by the Executive Board of WHO in January 1953. The resolution recommends that the World Health Assembly retain China's formal assessment at 720 units but that a token assessment be accepted from China for 1954 and until such time as China's financial condition improves; that a token payment of $15,000 be applied to the arrearages owed by China to the organization for 1953 and prior years and that the balance of China's arrearages for the years prior to 1954 shall be subject to future arrangements at such time as China's financial condition improves.

Mr. Tsui said that this resolution was very close to the proposal which China had made. If possible, however, China would like to have its token assessment placed at 14 units or about $10,000 and would also like to have a provision which would make possible the acceptance of payment in Philippine currency or some currency other than U.S.

3) Chinese Representation Question in the Administrative Council of the ITU. Mr. Tsui said that that Administrative Council of the ITU is to meet in Geneva on May 2 and it is anticipated that the Chinese representation question will arise. According to Chinese estimates an effort to unseat the Nationalists should be defeated by a vote of about 11 to 7.

4) Chinese Candidates for the Fiscal Commission and the Social Commission. China is now a member of both the Fiscal and Social Commissions and plans to run for re-election to both bodies. The election is to take place at the ECOSOC meeting which convenes June 30.

5) Chinese Representation Question in the Executive and Liaison Committee of the UPU. The Executive and Liaison Committee of the UPU is to convene in May at Bern, Switzerland. China is not at present a member having failed of re-election last year. If the Soviet bloc should nonetheless bring up the Chinese representation question the Chinese Government estimates that support for the National Government in the Committee at the present time should result in a vote of about 13 to 7 in China's favor. The Chinese Government does not actually expect that the Soviet bloc would attempt to raise the issue in some manner but because of the remote possibility that some such move might be made is taking the precaution of bringing the matter to the U.S. Government's attention.

I told Mr. Tsui that I would bring the Chinese Government's request for United States support in connection with the above matters to the attention of the appropriate officers in the Department and would let him know as soon as possible concerning the United States Government's position. I added that, of course, our position of support of China on the Chinese representation question was well known.

Miss Salt called on Mr. Kotschnig April 30 to discuss various WHO matters. Mr. Jones explained that China might resume participation in WHO and that the representation issue might arise at the Health Assembly. He explained the procedure we intended to follow to dispose of any proposals which might be made in a plenary session or in the Credentials Committee to exclude Chinese National Government representatives or to seat Chinese Communists. Miss Salt telephoned Miss Gough on May 4 to say that she had reported the matter to the Foreign Office and that while the latter's reply had been ambiguous, she felt confident that it agreed with our proposed procedure.

In the course of the conversation on April 30, Miss Salt remarked that developments at Panmunjom might have consequences for the UK position. In response to an enquiry from Miss Bacon on this point, Miss Salt said that the UK supported the moratorium procedure because of Chinese Communist aggression and that if there should be an armistice the UK would have to reconsider its position in the light of the circumstances existing at the time.<sup>1</sup>

Subject: President's Comments on Chinese Representation

According to press reports, the President was questioned at his press conference yesterday about British suggestions that Communist China be admitted to the United Nations. After discussing the recognition question, the President is reported by the press to have said that certainly he would not say at the moment that admittance of Red China should follow an armistice. (Note: In the report of the interview in the Department's "Wireless File", the question to the President is cast in terms of our policy toward recognition, not toward seating in the UN, and the President is reported to have said that he would not personally say that recognition of Communist China should follow an armistice in Korea. The two versions are probably the result of the mingling in one question-and-answer sequence of the two questions of recognition and admittance to the UN.)

Inasmuch as the press is in agreement that the President was discussing admission to the UN and that his statement was less than categorical, we should undoubtedly anticipate further questions on the Administration's position on the representation issue.

The President's avoidance of the easy and obvious answer that we are opposed to the seating of the Chinese Communists in the UN and his background discussion of the recognition issue as it relates to the representation question suggest that he was intentionally avoiding a closed door position at this time on our policy toward seating the Chinese Communists in the event of a truce.

The President's attitude does not necessarily imply a change of position on the basic issue of opposition to the seating of the Chinese Communists. It does, however, suggest a change in present strategy for handling the question and may be expected to present problems for the Department vis-à-vis the press and UN delegations as well as the Congress. FE/P and CA will undoubtedly wish to review with UNA the replies which we have heretofore been giving to inquiries on this question.

I am preparing a general analysis of the UN aspects of the Chinese representation issue for possible background use by FE and CA in advance planning in the event of an armistice.

Subject: Need for Planning U.S. Strategy on Chinese Representation Question.

The situation with regard to Chinese representation in the United Nations, in the event of a truce in Korea and no incontrovertible evidence of new Chinese Communist aggression elsewhere, will probably be as follows:

(1) Within a brief period the United Kingdom may be expected to seek to terminate the "moratorium" agreement under which the United States and the United Kingdom have been cooperating on procedural motions which retain the present Chinese representation. France, other states of Western Europe, Canada, and possibly a few others, will probably follow the United Kingdom example at about the same time.

(2) Assuming such a shift of votes, there would probably not be an immediate change in Chinese representation in any major UN organ. Changes in minor UN bodies might be expected, however, and if several such changes occurred the move to seat the Chinese Communists throughout the UN would be accelerated.

(3) In any case, with the opening of the General Assembly on September 15, the voting situation on Chinese representation would be close or perhaps adverse. UNP's informal estimate at present indicates a possibility of 31 votes for seating the Chinese Communists out of a total of 60. Political developments during the summer might, of course, subtract from, or add to, this estimate. A possibility that the General Assembly might decide to seat the Chinese Communists exists.

(4) If the Chinese Communists are seated by the United Nations, continued U.S. military aid to the National Government on any substantial basis would be subject to constant UN scrutiny and the spread of Communist influence throughout Southeast Asia would be accelerated. Thus, the Chinese representation question is closely linked to our Far Eastern policies as a whole.

Recommendations: A careful estimate of the means open to us of influencing the United Kingdom, France and others to maintain the present Chinese representation and the probable effectiveness of these pressures should be made urgently, and on the basis of these findings our strategy should be mapped in advance. Implementation of the strategy should, if possible, be commenced at the Bermuda conference<sup>2</sup> if a truce has been concluded by then.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>3</sup> Mrs. Dougall of the Office of Chinese Affairs on May 26 routed this memorandum to the Director of CA (McConaughy), the Deputy Director (Martin) and the Officer in Charge of Political Affairs (Jenkins); and wrote in a forwarding chit:

"Re last sentence of attached memo, I had already suggested to Mr. Martin that Chinese representation should be discussed at Bermuda, since it is one of the basic issues in our Far Eastern policy and since it may be assumed that the British will wish to terminate the "moratorium agreement" quite promptly in the event of an armistice. One of the main problems, however, will be to get an agreed position within the Department. I have since talked with Miss Bacon on the matter and will continue to discuss it with her and with CA, with the object of having some briefing papers prepared."

McConaughy noted on Mrs. Dougall's chit: "We might go into high gear on this next week, after Armistice meeting of June 1. W.P. McC". Martin followed up with "Agree ECM".

In returning the memorandum to Mrs. Dougall on the same date (May 26) the Deputy Director (Martin) wrote: "Miss Bacon raised this same question at FE staff meeting today. UAJ [U. Alexis Johnson, Deputy Assistant Secretary] felt that in view of present uncertainty about Korea it would be difficult to get a position now for use in Bermuda. EWM".

Subject: Need for Planning U.S. Strategy on Chinese Representation Question

In her memorandum to you of May 25, Miss Bacon notes that the General Assembly might decide at the Session beginning on September 15 to seat the Chinese Communists and recommends that we explore means of influencing the U.K., France, and other members to maintain the present Chinese representation.

I would suggest that before seeking to influence the policy of other nations with respect to China, we decide what our own is to be. Any rational policy toward China must have as its objective detaching China from the Soviet camp. At present, so far from directing our efforts to encouraging Chinese Communist independence of Moscow, we do not even admit for planning purposes that the possibility of a split exists. At the same time we are very far from developing the means required to liberate China from the present regime. The possibility of our eliminating this regime with any instruments now available to us or likely to be developed by us under present planning is almost nil, I would think. The Peiping regime's control of China is not being weakened by anything we are doing. The tendency has been for it to grow stronger. We may note also that our policy toward Formosa is self-liquidating. It is based upon a Chinese Nationalist military force that will become ineffective with age in a few years or be transformed by replacement into something quite different—that is, a provincial Formosan force that very likely will refuse to be ruled by mainlanders and that we can hardly expect to be regarded anywhere as Chinese or national.

If we are going to exercise leadership on the Chinese issue, then it seems to me that we must come forward with a policy and with programs that lead somewhere. I believe we will all agree that our allies have a right to demand as much. Our resort to "pressures" upon them, such as Miss Bacon's memorandum recommends, would be an acknowledgment that our position fails to elicit support by its reasonableness and would indicate that it requires re-examination.

The memorandum reviews the development of the Chinese representation question in the United Nations and the working out of the "moratorium" arrangement between the United States and the United Kingdom. ## MEMORANDUM

Subject: UN Aspects of the Problem of Chinese Representation in the Event of an Armistice.

Indications have been piling up of late that if a truce in Korea is concluded the United States may expect a renewed effort on the part of many of its friends and associates toward seating the Chinese Communists in the UN. Nehru has been reiterating his position; Soviet leaders, both in Moscow and in the UN, have given more than usual prominence to the question; UN Secretary General Lie, in resigning, emphasized this issue and his successor declined to comment; the British Labor Party has been vociferous and Churchill's answer has been "not while the actual fighting is going on." There have been suggestions from New York that the French might be contemplating a more receptive attitude and the interest of both the United Kingdom and French delegations in the possibility of a "political settlement" of the membership question has overtones for the Chinese representation problem as well.

The question of what we can and should do in this situation is tied in closely with our whole Far Eastern policy. As of possible assistance to FE and CA in advance planning on this question there are given below comments and background information on the specifically UN aspects of the problem.

I. Background

The Chinese representation question first became a major issue in the United Nations in January, 1950. Previously, a Chinese Communist regime had been proclaimed in Peiping in October, 1949, and had been recognized almost immediately by the Soviet bloc, Burma and India. The National Government established itself on Formosa.

On January 6, 1950 the United Kingdom announced its decision to recognize the Communist regime in China. During that same period, ten other states also accorded recognition.

Immediately following the British announcement, the USSR at a meeting of the Security Council on January 10, 1950 proposed to unseat the Chinese National Representative. Three days later, the Chinese Communist regime informed the Secretary General of the UN of the appointment of a Chinese Communist delegate to the UN. On January 13, also, the Security Council rejected the Soviet resolution to unseat the Chinese National Representative by a vote of 3-6 (U.S.)-2(UK, Norway). The Soviet Representative thereupon left the Security Council. He did not return until August, 1950, when his turn came to be chairman of the Security Council which was discussing the Korean aggression.

In order to avoid public differences in UN organs over the question of Chinese representation, the United States and the United Kingdom agreed in June 1951 upon the so-called "moratorium arrangement" through an informal exchange of communications between Secretary Acheson and British Foreign Minister Morrison. Under this arrangement it was agreed that the United States and the United Kingdom delegations would consult in advance of UN meetings in order to concert on procedures which both delegations could support and which would avoid a vote on the substance of the issue. In practice, the moratorium arrangement has usually been applied through resolutions calling for the postponement of consideration of the question of a change in Chinese representation, or through a motion that a Soviet proposal to unseat the Chinese National representatives or to seat the Chinese Communists was out of order for reasons which vary according to circumstances.

To date, the issue has arisen in UN organs or bodies over 135 times. The Chinese Communists have been seated in only one minor body of a Specialized Agency (the Executive and Liaison Committee of the Universal Postal Union) and that body reversed its decision the following year.

The success with which this policy has been applied has been in part a consequence of the outbreak of the Korean hostilities. There has been wide-spread agreement that it would be out of the question even to consider seating the Chinese Communists while they were engaged in aggression against the UN. The United States Representative, in supporting moratorium-type resolutions in UN bodies, has been instructed not to tie U.S. objection to the seating of the Chinese Communists to the aggression in Korea alone, but to refer also to other acts which illustrate Chinese Communist unwillingness to accept the principles of the United Nations.

So far as the United Kingdom is concerned, British representatives have on occasion said that UK opposition to the seating of the Chinese Communists would not be removed automatically with the conclusion of a truce but would continue for some time thereafter. In March 1953, British Foreign Minister Eden stated in the House of Commons that so long as he was Foreign Secretary he would not be prepared to advocate that the UN admit "a government that is in full aggression against the UN and shooting down our troops."

In a despatch of April 10, 1953 (4840)<sup>1</sup> our Embassy in London gives its estimate of the probable British attitude toward the Chinese representation question in the event of an armistice. This despatch concluded in part:

"In the Embassy's opinion, the extent to which the British Government might be prepared to go to accommodate the Chinese Communists is uncertain, but Her Majesty's Government will at least re-examine such issues as seating Chinese Communists in the UN. Once an armistice is achieved, the opposition in Parliament is sure to make a great play to establish Peiping as the legitimate Chinese Government. Responsible leaders, such as Attlee, Morrison and Younger, have already exerted some pressure to this end. There may be demands for the Government to proceed directly to the discussion of an over-all Far Eastern settlement and to ignore the UN resolution calling for the prior political settlement of the Korean question. In view of these pressures and for other reasons, the Government may feel required to give some ground. However, the Foreign Office states that the Government would not yield to any agitation for placing Formosa under Chinese Communist jurisdiction. Apart from its awareness of strong United States public opinion in support of the National Government, the British Government fully realizes the value of keeping Formosa from falling into the hands of a potential aggressor. The view held by the Foreign Office is that the only permanently workable solution for the Far East would be the neutralization of both Korea and Formosa."

More recently, British Embassy officials here have been suggesting that the Labor Party might force the pace of the present UK Government on this question if a truce is concluded. On May 12, 1953, when Attlee said in the House of Commons that Communist China "is entitled to be one of the Big Five on the Security Council", Churchill answered "not while the actual fighting is going on."

II. Effects for U.S. if Chinese Communists Should be Seated in UN.

The seating of the Chinese Communists in the UN might have the following consequences from the United States point of view:

1) It would be regarded as a major political defeat for the United States and a corresponding political victory for the Soviet bloc and Communism generally;

2) It would raise the prestige of the Chinese Communists throughout Southeast Asia, stimulate the spread of Communist influence in that region and weaken resistance to Communism on the part of Asian states;

3) Continued U.S. military assistance to the National Government might be challenged in the UN as action unfriendly to a UN member.

At present, we are technically aiding a government seated in the UN in dealing with a dissident element seeking to overthrow it. When the Soviet bloc in the past has sought to condemn our aid to China, there have been National Government representatives at hand to deny the charges on our behalf, to assert that a charge of aggression is ridiculous and that U.S. assistance is not merely desired but desperately needed. When a Chinese Communist was heard in 1950, he did not have standing as a representative of a member of the Security Council. If the Chinese Communists are seated in the UN, we shall then technically be in the position of aiding a dissident element seeking to overthrow a government seated in the UN, and Chinese Communist representatives will be at hand to charge us with aggression and to denounce U.S. policies. While we would, in all probability, be able to prevent the passage of a condemnatory resolution, we would be acting under a serious handicap and we might have difficulty in convincing even some normally friendly members of the justice of our position, although they still might vote with us.

4) A vote normally friendly to the United States would be replaced in UN organs by a vote consistently hostile.

The consequences might be especially serious in the Security Council if the General Assembly again accords a seat on the Council to Eastern Europe, a practice which many UN members believe to be required by a Gentleman's Agreement of long standing. In that case, we would start with three hostile Communist votes in a body in which five negative votes or abstentions can halt any action.

5) U.S. confidence in the United Nations, already shaken, would be undermined to an extent likely to prejudice continuing U.S. popular and financial support.

As this Government has characterized support for the United Nations an essential feature of our foreign policy, the consequences would be felt by the United States as well as by the United Nations. Considering the seriousness for the United States of these consequences, it would seem to be desirable to estimate the prospects of our being able to persuade the United Kingdom not to terminate the "moratorium" arrangement and to weigh the courses of action open to us in various possible circumstances.

III. Considerations Which Might Affect the Attitudes of UN Members.

A. The United Kingdom: The present UK Government would clearly be under strong pressure to terminate the "moratorium" arrangement within a brief period if a truce is concluded and there is no incontrovertible evidence of Chinese Communist aggression in other areas. Factors weighing heavily on UK opinion would be:

- 1) criticism from the opposition party in Parliament;
- 2) hope that this step might ease tensions in Europe and contribute to security there, at least for a brief period;
- 3) concern for the situation in Hong Kong in event of increased Chinese Communist gestures toward the colony;
- 4) different basic approach to the problem of the future of China;
- 5) desire to build up a counter-weight to Japan among Asian states in the area;
- 6) hope, despite recent rebuffs, of regaining some measure of UK's trade with mainland China;
- 7) hope of retrieving the embarrassing situation created by failure of the Chinese Communists to recognize the United Kingdom.

If the Chinese Communists should recognize the United Kingdom—an inexpensive gesture—the effect might well be decisive in changing UK policy toward immediate seating.

B. France: The French might be motivated by the following factors:

- 1) hope of easing Chinese Communist pressure on the Associated States—unless Chinese Communist complicity in the existing warfare there is so well established as to prohibit such a step;
- 2) hope that seating the Chinese Communists might contribute to the easing of tensions in Europe, even if only briefly.

Early in 1950 the French were on the point of voting to unseat the National Government Representative in the Security Council when the Chinese Communists recognized Ho Chi Minh. There have recently been indications from New York that the French might now be working with the idea of possibly seating the Chinese Communists. The French might, however, be disposed to take only a part-way step—to unseat the National Representative and to abstain or continue to vote against the seating of the Chinese Communists.

C. Latin America: Factors influencing the Latin American states might include:

- 1) a desire to support U.S. policies in matters of this sort;
- 2) deep-rooted opposition to the recognition or seating of the Chinese Communists;
- 3) personal ties of friendship between Latin American representatives and Chinese National Government representatives.

D. Arab-Asian States: The Philippines would continue to oppose any change in Chinese representation out of desire to support U.S.

policies and to oppose extension of Communist influence in Asia. The position of the Thais would naturally be influenced to a considerable extent by current developments among their neighbors in Indochina and by the degree of apparent danger of Chinese Communist penetration into Thailand. While basically sympathetic with our position the Thais might abstain if they believe that the Chinese Communists were likely to be seated in any case. Indonesia, Burma and India would vote to seat the Chinese Communists. Pakistan has recognized the Chinese Communists. While more sympathetic than India with our approach to the Chinese representation question, Pakistan at best might abstain.

The Arab states in general have not recognized the Chinese Communists and most of them would normally be reluctant to vote to seat them. The state of political relations between the United States and individual Arab members might, however, lead to some abstentions in place of negative votes.

E. The Old Commonwealth: Canada would undoubtedly vote to seat the Chinese Communists as soon as there was any change in the UK position. Australia, New Zealand and South Africa would be likely to continue to oppose the seating of the Chinese Communists.

F. General Considerations Advanced in Favor of Seating the Chinese Communists.

An argument in favor of seating the Chinese Communists which has weight with some UN members is based on the proposition that the National Government is not in position to make commitments which will actually be carried out on the mainland. This argument has particular relation to the Specialized Agencies such as the Postal Union, Telecommunications Union and the like. Experience with the Chinese Communists in connection with the Postal Union, however, has not been such as to inspire confidence in their willingness to carry out the obligations of a member of the Specialized Agencies. Participation by the Soviet bloc in these agencies also has in many cases been confined substantially to propaganda efforts rather than to substantive contributions to the actual work of the organization.

Many UN members have also been increasingly concerned with the continuance of this problem and some might favor seating the Chinese Communists in the belief that the Chinese Communist regime has come to stay and that the sooner its representatives are seated the sooner the issue will be settled. If a belief should become current that the Chinese Communists were likely to be seated, some UN members would be reluctant to cast a negative vote and thus, in their view, needlessly incur the hostility of the Chinese Communists.

It is also sometimes argued that the best way to win the Chinese Communists away from the USSR and into greater contact with the western world is to bring them into the United Nations. Some UN members feel that UN membership was an important contributing factor in Yugoslavia's decision to take an independent course. Other UN members point out that UN contact has had little, if any, appreciable effect on other Soviet satellites such as Poland and Czechoslovakia.

IV. Do the USSR and the Chinese Communists Actually Desire that the Latter be Seated?

There has long been a suspicion that the USSR did not, in fact, wish to have the Chinese Communists seated in the UN. Certainly, on several occasions the Soviet Union has not chosen the tactics best suited to seating the Chinese Communists although Soviet delegates are not lacking in knowledge of the technicalities of UN procedures. There has been reason to believe that the Soviet objectives in exploiting the issue have been (a) to create friction between the United States and many of its friends, and (b) to weaken the United Nations. It has been a ready-made propaganda issue.

Similarly, the Chinese Communists have appeared only half-hearted in their efforts to obtain a seat. They have gone through the motions of naming a delegation and demanding a seat on several occasions. Early in 1950, however, when France's position was known to be wavering and it was anticipated that the Chinese Nationalists might be unseated by the middle of February, the Chinese Communists proceeded to recognize Ho Chi Minh. This step made a change in vote in the Security Council on the part of France impossible. The Chinese Communists likewise showed coldness toward the British, Indian and Burmese recognition at a time when those votes in the United Nations were of importance on the seating question. When General Wu was permitted to appear before the Security Council in November 1950, he merely repeated the Soviet propaganda line and made no apparent effort to create a favorable impression to win friends or to give evidence of a cooperative attitude toward the United Nations. By that time, of course, entrance of Chinese Communist forces into the Korean conflict had closed the door for the time being to serious consideration of Chinese Communist admission on the part of most UN members.

It is now possible that under present political conditions the USSR or the Chinese Communists may believe that their interests would be best served by a seat for the Chinese Communists. The USSR may feel less apprehensive concerning the effect of western influence on Chinese Communists representatives. It may believe that the time has now come when admission of the Chinese Communists would weaken the United Nations and embarrass the United States with maximum advantage to the USSR.

The Chinese Communists may also be more interested now than formerly in improving their international status and increasing its influence by taking a place in the United Nations.

It is too early to conclude, however, whether there has been a change in attitude on the part of either or both of the parties chiefly concerned on this question. If there has, in fact, been a change, it may have political implications of considerable interest.

V. How the Situation Might Develop in the United Nations.

Assuming (a) no incontrovertible evidence of open Chinese Communist aggression elsewhere and (b) continuation of the Soviet peace offensive, an immediate ground swell toward seating the Chinese Communists on the conclusion of an armistice is to be expected on the part of most states which have recognized the Chinese Communists. India, Indonesia, Burma, some of the Arab states and probably the Scandinavians fall in this group. Only 17 UN members now recognize the Chinese Communists. Unless there are new recognitions, the movement would not accordingly be sufficient to seat the Chinese Communists so long as the United States and the United Kingdom remain united on the "moratorium" arrangement.

If, however, the United Kingdom should terminate the "moratorium" arrangement and openly champion the seating of the Chinese Communists, both in the UN bodies and in contact work with UN members generally, the United Kingdom would undoubtedly carry with it Belgium, the Netherlands, Luxembourg, Canada and France (unless the situation in Indochina absolutely precluded such action). A shift in the UK position might also inspire some new recognitions or a change in vote on the part of some states which have long been unstable on the Chinese representation question.

So far as the major UN organs are concerned, it would appear that termination by the United Kingdom of the "moratorium" agreement would not in itself result automatically in the seating of a Chinese Communist, although the change of a few votes would be sufficient to do so. The votes in question, however, are relatively stable and would probably not change except in response to a major ground swell or other strong pressure.

The situation on major UN organs might be as follows:

(a) Security Council: The Council consists of eleven members which, during 1953, are: China, France, USSR, United Kingdom, United States, Chile, Greece, Pakistan, Colombia, Denmark, Lebanon.

Assuming a shift in the UK and French positions there would be five initial votes for seating the Chinese Communists: United Kingdom, France, Pakistan, Denmark and the USSR. Those trying to seat the Communists would then have to pick up two votes from the following four states: Chile, Greece, Colombia and Lebanon. Of these states Lebanon must be counted doubtful and Chile an outside possibility. Greece and Colombia should remain firm, although conceivably Greece might be subjected to heavy pressure to change.

(b) Economic and Social Council: This Council consists of 18 members which, during 1953, are: Argentina, Australia, Belgium, China, Cuba, Egypt, France, India, Philippines, Poland, Sweden, Turkey, USSR, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

Of these 18, six have recognized the Chinese Communists: Poland, Sweden, USSR, UK, India, and Yugoslavia. If we are to assume the situation described above, the following votes would support the Chinese Communists also: Belgium and France. Those supporting the Chinese Communists would have to pick up two votes among the following: Argentina, Cuba, Egypt, Australia, the Philippines, Turkey, Uruguay and Venezuela. Of these, Egypt has wavered in the past and its attitude would probably be influenced by the current state of its relations with the United Kingdom. Similarly, Argentina might be influenced by various political factors.

(c) Trusteeship Council: This Council consists of 12 members, only two of which recognize the Chinese Communists (United Kingdom, USSR). Belgium and France would vote to seat the Chinese Communists under circumstances outlined above and those seeking to seat the Chinese Communists would then have to pick up three votes from among the following: Australia, El Salvador, Dominican Republic, Syria, Thailand and New Zealand. Whereas one or two of these votes is unstable, it seems unlikely that three votes could be picked up under the circumstances contemplated.

A somewhat similar situation probably exists in most other UN bodies because in recent years the Department in preparing its slate of candidates to be supported has attempted to avoid having a majority of States recognizing the Chinese Communists or wavering on the question elected to these bodies. In some case this strategem has, of course, not been successful and some UN bodies might seat a Chinese Communist. The Peace Observation Commission, for example, is evenly divided between states recognizing and not recognizing the Chinese Communists. The shift of the French vote alone would be sufficient to seat a Chinese Communist on this body. It seems probable, however, that the shift in votes in UN bodies would not occur at once, but an interval of time to permit a sounding out of a new political situation would probably be allowed by the non-zealous type of UN member. Once, however, Chinese Communists were seated on any considerable number of UN bodies or on a principal UN organ, the situation for the United Nations would become so clearly intolerable that a move toward the Chinese Communists throughout the United Nations might be accelerated.

(d) General Assembly: The General Assembly is now scheduled to convene on September 15. 17 UN members now recognize the Chinese Communists. If we add to these 17 states the European states which have not recognized the Chinese Communists or which in the past have voted for the moratorium, perhaps three Latin Americans (Guatemala, Argentina, and Bolivia or Chile), and possibly five Arabs, the voting situation would be close if not adverse. UNP's present informal estimate is that a possibility exists of 31 votes in favor of the Chinese Communists out of 60 members. Political developments during the summer would, of course, affect this estimate.

Although termination by the United Kingdom of the "moratorium" agreement alone would probably not result in an immediate change in the Chinese representation for the United Nations as a whole, it would make the maintenance over any considerable period of time of Chinese National Government representation far more difficult, if not problematical. By the opening of the General Assembly next September the situation might become acute. Termination of the "moratorium" would also result in the disclosure, at the opening of every UN committee, body or organ, of an open difference of views between the United States and the United Kingdom on a major matter of Far Eastern policy.

VI. Need for Advance Planning on Strategy.

If there is an armistice and the Soviet peace offensive continues with emphasis being placed on Chinese representation, the following courses of action would be open to the United States to meet rising pressures to seat the Chinese Communists:

1) We could attempt to hold the United Kingdom and France to support of the Chinese National Representative by exerting strong political pressures, probably in connection with the national security interests of the two states in Europe. Direct political pressures could also be applied to other "doubtful" states. This program would clearly engage our national prestige and if undertaken would have to be a vigorous, all-out program.

2) We could use normal diplomatic pressures in an attempt to prevent the unseating of the Chinese National Representative and the seating of the Chinese Communists. This program, while making clear our opposition to the seating of the Chinese Communists, would not engage our national prestige to the same extent as course (1) but would not be as likely to be effective.

In support of retaining Chinese National representation, the following arguments might be used:

1) Seating of the Chinese Communists in the United Nations would contribute politically to the growth of Communist influence in Asia at the very time when we are striving to curb the spread of Communist influence in Asia and in Europe. There is a basic inconsistency between building up strength to resist Communism in Indochina and in Europe on the one hand and seating the Chinese Communists in the United Nations on the other. Unless we are agreed in our objectives, the United States would have to reconsider its current programs for Europe.

2) Seating the Chinese Communists in the United Nations would undermine U.S. confidence in the Organization and seriously affect prospects for continued U.S. political and financial support. A drastic weakening of the United Nations to this extent would not be in the interests of the United Kingdom and France or of the free world generally.

This program would also involve the working out of a framework as persuasive as possible to other UN members for our position, including an answer to the question whether we intend to oppose the seating of the Chinese Communist indefinitely and irrespective of their conduct.

Our friends and associates may urge us to follow other courses of action such as :

a) support for the seating of two Chinas in the United Nations—the National Government and the Chinese Communists.

Such a solution has already been proposed informally by a member of the Japanese Foreign Ministry. Aside from the political objections to this proposal there are also certain technical difficulties involved. If two Chinas are to be represented, the admission of one of them would have to be as a new member and new members are subject to Great Power veto. Thus, the new China to be added would be subject to a veto by the China already seated on the Security Council.

b) support for the unseating of the National Government and the non-seating of the Chinese Communists. Under this proposal there would be no China seated in the United Nations.

This course has been discussed in the past by some UN members including France. The result would be only a temporary expedient probably satisfactory to no one. It would be generally regarded as a first step toward seating the Chinese Communists and open, consequently, to many of the same objections.

c) use of the Chinese representation question as a bargaining item in any proposed political conference for the Far East or other multi-lateral discussions.

This course assumes that we are prepared to seat the Chinese Communists and would again be open to the objections attached to that assumption as well as certain added ones related to the bargaining procedure.

VII. Conclusions

1. The Chinese representation question, while relating specifically to China's seat in the UN, has a direct bearing on our policies with respect to China and to the Far East generally.

2. If the US is to meet successfully the pressures to seat the Chinese Communists in the UN which present indications suggest will develop in the event of an armistice and no incontrovertible evidence of fresh Chinese Communist aggression, the US should :

(a) work out its policy in a framework which will be as persuasive as possible to other UN members, and

(b) study the means available to the US of influencing the UK, France and other "doubtful" members to continue to support proposals which would retain Chinese National representation in the UN, estimate the probable effectiveness of these means, and map out in advance the most effective strategy to be followed in the circumstances.

Subject: Chinese Representation and the Knowland Resolutions.<sup>2</sup>

There was a discussion Friday afternoon by UNP, L/UNA, FE and EUR of the problems presented for the Department by Senator Knowland's resolutions. These resolutions call for withdrawal of the United States from the United Nations in the event that Communist China is seated.

The two attached drafts<sup>2</sup> were discussed: (1) outlining possible arguments which might be used when Congress asks for comments on the Knowland resolutions and (2) a general statement which the Secretary might issue giving our position on the Chinese representation question.

In connection with the first draft it was pointed out that the Knowland resolutions apparently contemplate permanent withdrawal of the United States from the Organization rather than a temporary walk-out on the Soviet model. Some doubt was also expressed concerning Point 5 of the first draft both as to whether the argument was factually correct and whether it was a useful one to use at this time. (Note: I believe that the presence of the Chinese Communists on UN organs might have a more serious effect than indicated in Point 5—especially in connection with probable Chinese Communist charges with regard to U.S. military aid programs to China.)

There was otherwise general agreement on the tenor of the position to be taken on the Knowland resolutions and UNP is to work on a rephrasing of the points. Additional arguments or a new approach would, of course, be welcome.<sup>3</sup>

The second draft attached attempts to present our position on Chinese representation question in a framework which might be as persuasive as possible among UN members generally. Specifically, it attempts to answer the question whether we intend to oppose the seating of the Chinese Communists indefinitely. Clearly, the second draft requires

NOTES ON SPECIAL LEGISLATIVE CONFERENCE

[WHITE HOUSE,] JUNE 2, 1953

The President called this special Legislative Conference for the purpose of attempting to influence the Congressional Leaders to withdraw the rider to the UN appropriation bill which would have cut off all United States funds for the UN should Communist China be admitted to the UN.

The President had first shown his concern over the question at the press conference on May 28. By June 1 he felt it essential to communicate directly with the Congressional Leaders. At first, he planned to write a letter expressing his concern and urging elimination of the rider. In the process of preparing such a letter, he determined that it would be more effective to meet with the Leaders and thrash the matter out in discussion.

The meeting began at 11:55, Tuesday, June 2. Present were:

The President
Vice President Nixon
Sen. Knowland
Sen. Millikin
Sen. Bridges
Sen. Saltonstall
Rep. Martin
Rep. Halleck
Rep. Arends
Rep. Taber

The President initiated discussion by stating his distress that this rider might be enacted. He said he opposed the rider because he believed that the United States could not properly serve notice on the UN in such a manner and, more fundamentally, the United States could not live alone. The President emphasized that he was not attempting to tell the Members of Congress what their personal opinions should be or what they could say about it; but he was convinced that enactment of the rider would seriously hamper him in the conduct of foreign affairs. He described the UN as being the only machinery for bringing all these organizations of the world together to discuss problems, and as constituting the hope of the world for creating eventually an association in which laws would replace battlefields.

Such an association was essential because global war was now unthinkable as a result of new and devastating weapons like atomic energy. He pointed out that Communist China was not yet in the UN, that it was not wise to tie our hands irrevocably about affairs in advance, and he pointed to the change in the situation of Germany between 1945 and 1953 as illustrating how rapidly situations and attitudes can change. He asserted that the world situation demanded both patience and courage on our part to prevent frustrations from getting the best of us. He then noted the probable adverse effect in regard to world public opinion if Congress made the mistake of penny-pinching (taking a monetary approach) in order to prove its point of opposing entry of Red China into the UN.

Senator Bridges replied that he and Senators Saltonstall and Knowland had voted for the rider because they were disgusted with the situation now developing, that they thought their action strengthened the hand of the Government by virtue of laying down the rules of the game before the action became critical, that they had no desire to embarrass the President, and that they believed this a legitimate attempt to present to the world the position of Congress, particularly in view of the Republican position through the years and the Democrats' failure to handle the problem.

Representative Halleck stated his agreement with the President's position and his belief that the rider did not make sense, and that it would destroy the UN if the situation developed to the point where the provisions went into effect—that withdrawal by the United States would terminate existence of the UN.

The President then commented that he did not care how thoroughly any one stated opposition to the admission of Red China, but that he did not want the situation foreclosed. He said that the achievement of peace depended upon constantly struggling and working toward that end, whereas the rider would initiate a crumbling of the structure for peace which could have no end except disaster.

Senator Knowland stated the admission of Red China would violate all of his basic beliefs, that the Senate had passed a similar resolution in 1951, that many rumors existed which he believed true to the effect that Britain would press for the admission of Red China soon after negotiation of a cease fire in Korea, that under ordinary procedure the United States could not carry the UN with it on this subject, and that therefore the United States must now take an active aggressive stand.

The President disagreed on the basis that the rider was not the right way to oppose this development, and that if a workable world organization were to be produced, every nation must expect to undergo defeats in the UN from time to time. He asserted that destruction of the UN would result in the break-up of NATO; and he asked where we would be in that event and how could he possibly fulfill his responsibilities for America's security. He commented that he wanted to be reasonable in the matter, for that was why he had called in his friends to discuss it, and now they had to come to some agreement.

Senator Knowland replied that some other way of expressing Congressional disapproval might be satisfactory, such as a resolution which would have no legal effect on the President nor cut off funds for the UN.

The President then commented on the variations of Government policy in regard to recognition—that it had one meaning to most European Governments but that since the time of President Wilson it had in the United States unfortunately meant approval of the Government recognized.

Senator Bridges indicated his willingness to see the members of the Appropriations Committee individually or call a special commission to study the matter. He noted that Senator Dirksen had submitted the rider.

The President agreed to an alternative action so long as it was not a money approach. He would then be able to go to the leaders of foreign governments, impress upon them the attitude of Congress and its leaders, and warn them that if they forced the issue he would not be able to answer for the reaction of the United States. He then pointed out that no single person in a responsible position had suggested to him that the United States should support the admission of Red China. He repeated that any action which would completely forestall our freedom of action in the future would be unsatisfactory.

Senator Saltonstall pointed out that he had voted for the McClellan Resolution in 1951 and for this rider. He emphasized the Senate concern that should Red China shoot its way into the UN, it would shoot up the UN.

Representative Halleck then voiced his support for the President's proposals.

Representative Taber suggested the wording of the rider be reduced merely to stating that Congress opposes.

The President reviewed his efforts to improve the relations of the United States and its Allies by sending Messrs. Dulles and Stassen abroad twice, his brother Milton to South America, and his plans for the Vice President to make certain goodwill trips. The original wording of the rider would negate such efforts.

Senator Bridges then stated that he and his associates would withdraw the proposal.

The President then promised to begin immediately to inform other heads of governments about the Congressional attitude on admission of Red China. He added the warning that the budget of the United States would have to be increased greatly should our friends begin to fall away.

Senator Millikin urged that the President express his personal opinion in a statement.

The President concluded the meeting with the remark: "Let's not write off our friends".

WASHINGTON, June 2, 1953.

As you have probably been told, we had a conference this morning with the Congressional leaders on the amendment added by the Senate Appropriations Committee to the bill for the support of the United Nations. It was agreed that the Senate leaders would remove this particular amendment, but that the Administration would seek assurances from our allies, through diplomatic channels, that those allies would not use a Korean truce as an excuse for urging the acceptance of Red China in the United Nations. I stated that I would make it perfectly clear in these representations that the Congress of the United States would be badly shaken by any such development; that the temper of the Congress was such that any determined attempt on the part of our allies of this kind could have the most unfortunate results.

I further stated that so long as Red China was constituted on its present basis, under its present leaders, and so obviously serving the ends of Soviet Russia, that I would never be a party to its recognition and its acceptance in the United Nations.

Subject: Korean and Chinese Communist Representation in the United Nations.

Participants: Sir Percy C. Spender, Australian Ambassador
Minister A. H. Tange, Australian Embassy
Mr. Walter S. Robertson, Assistant Secretary for Far Eastern Affairs
Mr. Kenneth T. Young, Jr., Director, Office of Northeast Asian Affairs

Sir Percy referred to today's press accounts of President Eisenhower's meeting with Congressional leaders regarding Communist China's admission in the United Nations and the President's statement, as reported by Senator Bridges, that he opposed such admission at this time and that the United States Government would take active steps against it. I replied that I could not elaborate on what the President may have said to the Congressional leaders as reported in the press. However, I pointed out that there was strong opposition in Congress and among the American people to the admission of Communist China to the United Nations and that I, personally, thought it would be a calamity. I said that Sir Percy knew as well as I that there was an extremely strong feeling in the United States that there should be no deal regarding Korea which would let the Chinese Communists in the United Nations. Sir Percy then asked me whether the United States would vote against such admission if it came up in the United Nations. I told him that I could not add anything more to what the President was reported to have said. Sir Percy told me that he felt, and he knew his Government felt, that the admission of Communist China to the United Nations under present circumstances would be most regrettable.

[Here follows discussion of matters relating to Korea.]

757. Personal for the Secretary. Among other topics there are three questions I would like to discuss with you when we meet on Thursday [June 4].

1. Chinese representation. As follow-up to statesmanlike action by President with Congressional leaders yesterday, is there anything I can do to assist in execution of our policy? Policy was made clear by President's action but I feel there is no time to lose in consolidating our position and making sure that if and when this question arises again in UN we will get substantial majority of votes supporting our position.

First step would be to get assurances from British and French that they will support us in our desire not to seat the Chinese Reds or at the very least would maintain a completely passive attitude, and I suggest this be kept in mind in connection with other subjects currently being negotiated with Britain and France. We must also be as sure as we can that we have lined up Indians, Canadians, other Commonwealth members, LA's and Arab-Asians. Would it be good idea for me to discuss matter with Tsiang, Chinese representative here, who is very astute and whose government has vital stake in matter?

[Here follows Lodge's exposition of items 2 and 3. In item 2 Lodge dealt with "UN action if armistice talks fail." In the event of failure of the talks, Lodge anticipated that the United Nations would be subjected to strong foreign pressures "involving further concessions to Communists" and equally strong domestic American counterpressures "to adopt extreme measures against Communists." Lodge thought that it was "very important" for the U.S. Government to be prepared "to deal very promptly and effectively with this situation if and when it occurs because if we are unsuccessful the result could involve the destruction of the UN. . . ." Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson) to the Secretary of State

[WASHINGTON,] June 4, 1953.

Subject: Your Meeting With Ambassador Lodge This Afternoon.

Ambassador Lodge is coming in to see you and will discuss, inter alia, three problems which he refers to in his telegram No. 757, June 3, (Tab A)—Chinese Representation, Korea and Disarmament.

The following comments on each of the foregoing subjects might be useful in your conversation with him.

1. Chinese Representation

This question will pose great difficulties if a Korean armistice is concluded. As Ambassador Lodge points out, it is essential to take every feasible step at the earliest practicable time to secure such support from other governments as will be necessary to maintain our position in the post-armistice period. As Ambassador Lodge says, the first step in such an effort is to seek United Kingdom and French agreement to continue to support postponement of consideration of the Chinese representation question in all United Nations bodies. It would, in our view, be desirable for the President to seek such an agreement in principle at the Bermuda Conference.

It would probably be desirable to postpone pressing this issue with other delegations until this effort to secure an agreed tripartite formula is completed. The United Kingdom and French attitude will, of course, have great influence on the Commonwealth states and the countries of Western Europe. We do not, in any case, anticipate an important shift in the attitudes of the Latin Americans, in the near future.

India, Burma and Indonesia are a separate and much more difficult problem. It is highly doubtful that anything can be done to get them to recede from the position which they have consistently maintained even in the face of the Korean aggression.

The Arab states present a still different problem. They may well determine their position on this issue in the light of our attitude on issues of special concern to them like Palestine and North Africa. It will therefore be necessary to consider most carefully what the most profitable approach to them might be and the timing of such an approach.

Although Dr. Tsiang should be consulted at the appropriate time, it would prejudice our efforts with a number of delegations if he were to play a prominent role. At some point, he can be helpful in speaking to some delegations, particularly those from Latin America.

[Here follow Hickerson's views and recommendations regarding the other two items, his comments on Korea being limited simply to the observation: "You may wish to brief Ambassador Lodge on the developments at Panmunjom last night. This would appear to make it unnecessary to comment on Ambassador Lodge's points at least for the time being." (310.2/6-453)]

I have advised Senator Bridges in general terms that we were taking action pursuant to the President's talk with him and other Congressional leaders.

In view of the foregoing, the question of redrafting the letter to Bridges can be dropped.

781. Re Chinese representation. Lunched today with Jebb and Hoppenot at Hoppenot's invitation. Jebb immediately opened up by saying that he thought it was highly illogical for us to oppose the membership of Communist China in the UN when the Soviet Union was also a member. He said he could not see the difference. I said to him: "There is just this difference. In the Korean war, the Chinese Communists have inflicted more than 130,000 casualties on us and the Soviets haven't. To us this is quite a difference." I said that from our viewpoint it was utterly out of the question to bring this matter up. It was a matter involving deep feelings and we could not even consider raising it in the UN.

Hoppenot asked whether sometime in the future it could come up and I simply said that we would have to let time take care of that and cross that bridge when we came to it. I said that we would never ask the French to get into bed with the Germans after a Franco-German war had ended, and that our friends should not ask us to get into bed with the Chinese Communists. Hoppenot asked whether it would make any difference to American opinion if as a condition of membership in the UN the Chinese Communists were to agree to desist from their aggressive tactics in Indochina.<sup>1</sup> I said that of course the American public would take note of such a development with great interest.

Plans should be made now to provide him with necessary help to deal with such attempt. All other meetings which are being held in New York can be covered by me as need arises. My present feeling, subject to further thought, is that SC is most advantageous place for us in which to have Chinese Communist representation question raised because I will be presiding and veto can be used in SC. For this reason I am considering advisability of calling meeting of SC to communicate to its members armistice terms.

SECRET      PRIORITY      NEW YORK, June 9, 1953—8:38 p. m.

786. Personal for the Secretary. Re Korea—Chinese Representation.

1. As I have said before, we should make every effort bilaterally, (even going so far as to approach Soviet Government through American Embassy Moscow) to prevent question of seating Chinese Communists from coming up at all. If it does come up we should make every effort to get a substantial majority of members to vote against seating them. Those who feel they cannot vote against should be persuaded at least to abstain. I assume primary diplomatic targets should be UK and India, latter because they other than Communists are most likely to raise question.

It does not seem to me we can afford to wait until Bermuda to achieve high-level agreement with UK comparable to moratorium agreement reached under previous administration. In addition to any high-level approach President and you may have made or contemplate making to Churchill, I should think comparable approach might be made to Nehru. I can follow up any action you take by trying to build up favorable political climate here among various delegates. We must assume adverse climate is being built up systematically by UK and India, possibly others. Adverse climate will become worse upon announcement of armistice.

Even if it is not possible to reach agreement with UK and India before Bermuda, should we not meanwhile try to line up as many commitments to vote against seating Chinese representatives as possible? I think as soon as expedient we should try to get formal commitments. If we can build up majority against seating Chinese Communists, this simple political fact should strengthen President's hand in dealing with Churchill at Bermuda if latter is still recalcitrant.

2. We should start now developing all different arguments that can be used at various times and places in various ways, public and private, to defeat any attempt to seat Chinese Communists. We should make following points:

(a) This is not procedural question. It is about as substantive as any question can be and we should have all arguments to show that position Acheson and Austin took that it was procedural is fallacious. Has any other nation ever formally gone on record that representation questions are procedural?

(b) Chinese Communists are not peace-loving nation within meaning of UN charter proven by their wanton aggression in Korea and by their abetting aggression in Indochina.

(c) Chou En-lai frankly states that he is subject to orders of Soviets, therefore not head of a really independent government.

(d) It is emotionally and psychologically impossible to ask a people that has suffered over 130,000 casualties to turn around at once and welcome those who inflicted these terrific wounds on us.

(e) It is long-standing international practice that recognition of an enemy after a war awaits peace treaty and is not granted after armistice. Germany and Japan after eight years still await recognition by UN and some of their former enemies.

(f) It is inconceivable that UN should refuse recognition to ROK and grant it to perpetrator of brutal aggression on ROK.

3. A canvass should be made of all different places and ways in which question can be raised. If it is raised in SC it is, in my judgment, subject to veto but what if it should be raised in ECOSOC, in Trusteeship Council, in GA or in any of committees of GA? Of all GA committees, is not Credentials Committee most likely one in which this question would be raised?

4. If matter comes up in one of Councils, will it not be necessary to expel Chinese Nationalists first and, if so, what argument can be given for expelling them? If we are going to start expelling people, aren't there some other people that ought to be expelled before Chinese Nationalists are expelled?

5. Information should be made available on casualties which all other nations who fought in Korea suffered so that we can make common cause with these nations.

Chinese Representation in the Security Council

Opening the discussion, Ambassador Lodge referred to his conversation with Sir Gladwyn Jebb in which the latter considered the United States opposition to the seating of the Chinese Communists as "illogical"; Ambassador Lodge told Jebb that the fact of 130,000 United States casualties has created an emotional attitude in this country which makes the seating of the Chinese Communists absolutely unthinkable.

Turning to the problem of the use of a veto to block the seating of the Communists, Mr. Stein pointed out that the veto applies only in the Security Council, whose importance in fact has greatly declined in recent years. The Communists could do as much harm and probably more if seated in the General Assembly which has been doing most of the Security Council's work, in the ECOSOC or in the Trusteeship Council; the problem is to hold the majority on our side; if we manage to hold the majority in the Assembly, we will be able to do so in the Security Council where in fact we need only four other members to join us in blocking the Communists; on the other hand, if we lose the majority, and if seven members of the Security Council are willing to vote to seat the Communists, these same seven members might be willing to vote to overrule an attempt by Dr. Tsiang and the United States to exercise the veto quoting the statement made by the United States Representative in January 1950 in the Security Council to the effect that the veto does not apply to this issue.

It was the consensus of the group that if a Security Council meeting is held in June under the United States Chairmanship for the purpose of noting the armistice, we would be able to head off an attempt to change the Chinese representation. Recognizing that a defeat of the move to seat the Communists would not create a res judicata in the Security Council, Ambassador Lodge thought that if the United States takes the initiative in the Security Council and adopts a confident, vigorous attitude on the representation issue it might be psychologically advantageous and improve our chances to keep the Communists out of other organs. It was agreed that the position of the UK and the French is crucial and that a formula must be found possibly extending the present moratorium agreement. If such a formula is agreed upon, the British and the French in the Security Council and in the forthcoming ECOSOC meeting in Geneva might point to the so-called Cuban resolution adopted by the Assembly in 1950 implying that the Assembly is the organ to consider the representation issue; moreover, if and when the Seventh Session reconvenes following an armistice, it would take  $\frac{2}{3}$  majority to take up the Chinese representation question in view of the Assembly's decision to postpone this issue for the duration of the session. It was agreed that the representation issue will arise in a really acute form in the 8th Session.

Ambassador Lodge pointed out that a great deal of diplomatic preparation is necessary, particularly for the impending ECOSOC meeting in Geneva and it was agreed that a study of the attitudes of the ECOSOC members should be made and the member governments approached on an individual basis. Ambassador Lodge then requested that the Department prepare for him a brief statement of a formula which he would pass to the President for use at the Bermuda conference.

Returning to the problem of the veto, Mr. Bechhoefer pointed out the ambiguities of Article 27 of the Charter. The four precedents of the "double veto" were discussed in detail.

Turning to the problem of whether the decision on Chinese representation is procedural or substantive, Ambassador Lodge thought that there were three separate problems: (1) the question of admission of a state to UN membership, (2) the question of authenticity of credentials of a representative, and (3) the question which of the rival claimant governments is entitled to represent a United Nations member state. In his view, the Chinese representation problem falls in the last category, it involves a decision of far reaching importance as to whether a tyrannical regime which had usurped power over 400 million Chinese people will act as their representative and has nothing to do with the credentials problem. In Ambassador Lodge's view the decision on this issue is substantive and the contrary position of the previous Administration entirely fallacious as was its entire China policy. He added that the Secretary of State agreed with him on the applicability of the veto.

At Ambassador Lodge's request, the Departmental officers explained the thinking behind the position that the decision was procedural. Mr. Bechhoefer pointed out that in January 1950, there was a serious question whether the Soviet Union would attempt to veto the seating of the Yugoslav representative in the Security Council. The Soviets might have argued that if the veto applied to Chinese representation, the Soviet Union could veto the Yugoslav seating. He read the Department's letter addressed to Senator Connally as Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee which was approved by the National Security Council and President Truman and which pointed out the possible consequences upon the operation of the Security Council if a veto should be deemed applicable to the representation issue.<sup>2</sup> The Interim Committee recommendation that the credentials issue be considered procedural was discussed. The general United States position as the anti-veto champion in accordance with the Vandenberg resolution<sup>3</sup> was reviewed and the propaganda effect of a change in the United States position was considered.

Ambassador Lodge thought that the seating of the Chinese at this time would destroy the UN and reiterated his view that the representation issue cannot be considered a credential problem, and, therefore, most of the arguments in the Connally letter were not relevant. It was pointed out that while a good argument might be made to distinguish the representation and credential issues, it might not be possible to maintain such distinction in the Security Council once a precedent is established that the veto is applicable to the representation issue.

It was recalled that in the MacArthur hearings, Mr. Acheson suggested a reference of the question to the International Court of Justice for an advisory opinion; Ambassador Lodge thought that this approach would not be politically appealing.

The question of urgency of consultations with all other delegations in New York was discussed and it was agreed that such consultations should be held on the basis of the forthcoming Departmental message containing instructions as to the line to be taken. It was pointed out that other delegations would ask how long the United States will maintain its opposition to the seating of the Communists. Ambassador Lodge thought that the answer should be along the line of Senator Knowland's phrase that the word "never" does not exist in practical politics.

There was a consensus of the group that (a) any decision as to the applicability of the veto will have to be made in Washington, probably by the National Security Council and the President; (b) our principal problem is to keep the majority with us since the veto even if used might be overruled; (c) use of the veto while possibly preventing the seating of the Communists in the Security Council might do us harm in our efforts to keep them out of the Assembly and other organs; and (d) if it should be decided that the veto is applicable, any such decision should not be publicized and the veto would be used only as an extreme means where all other measures have failed.

NEW YORK, June 11, 1953.

DEAR FOSTER: I believe that I should receive authorization as promptly as possible to use the veto concerning the seating of the Chinese Communists if it appears expedient to do so.

It appears to me now that I would only want to do it as a last resort.

The arguments in favor of adhering to the Acheson position that the seating of the Chinese Communists is procedural seems to boil down to the two arguments—1) that the United States has made a great virtue of not using the veto and has made a big campaign in the past against the Soviets because they did use it; and 2) that if we use the veto in this case, it can be turned against us later.

The contrary argument seems to be much more persuasive. We face a situation of a magnitude which will probably not be repeated—which disposes of argument No. 2. Also the Acheson decision was based on special factors that existed at the time. Furthermore, his administration was so noted for its failure as regards China that it would actually tend to promote confidence if we made it quite clear that we did not consider ourselves bound by his actions.

Inasmuch as this will require action by the National Security Council, I request that such action be taken, so that I may be free to use the veto if it seems desirable.

Sincerely yours,

HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.

2. If there is Korean armistice, efforts will undoubtedly be made by Soviet bloc to seat representatives of Chinese Communist regime in UN bodies in place of representatives of Government of Republic of China, and argument will be made that armistice justifies such change. It is this government's earnest hope that matter will not be raised by countries outside Soviet bloc and that vast majority of free world, particularly those who with troops in Korea have borne major burden of repelling aggression, can remain united against any such move. US believes it imperative that representatives of Government of Republic of China should continue be seated in UN bodies. Following are main considerations which may be used in support our position (see para 4).

a) In this government's view, agreement by Chinese communists to military armistice does not constitute adequate evidence Chinese Commie regime has abandoned use armed force to seek its objectives and those USSR. There is nothing indicate change represents more than tactical shift designed create atmosphere in which resistance to Communist imperialism will be weakened. As result UN resistance Communists have found it unprofitable continue war in Korea but danger renewed aggression by them, particularly in SE Asia, remains.

b) In absence real evidence Peiping regime has changed its conduct and decided abide by Purposes and Principles Charter, seating of its representatives in UN would appear as reward for halting criminal aggression and would, in our considered judgment, not deter in any way Chinese Commies from further aggressive ventures. In fact, this international acceptance would be taken as an indication of free world weakness which Commies would seek to exploit to utmost.

c) US welcomes armistice as successful achievement and important milestone UN efforts maintain international peace. Full benefit may however be lost if essential unity not maintained post-armistice period. In interest solidarity on which common security depends, most important in coming period for countries of free world stand together on major issues and avoid public divergence.

d) I cannot emphasize too strongly most unfortunate effect which renewed attempt seat Chinese Commies in UN bodies would have upon American people who, in response request UN, have so recently suffered, as of May 22, 136,129 casualties and who have contributed so substantially of material wealth. Foreign Minister will be aware recent proposal in Senate, withdrawn only through intervention President, to effect that US contribution to UN budget should cease if Commie China were seated in SC, and concurrent resolution approved unanimously by both Senate and House expressing opposition to seating Chinese Commies.

3. US realizes that some friendly governments may honestly differ with its views as outlined above. In interest of avoiding open difference in UN, with minimum sacrifice by any government of its substantive position on question as to what regime is entitled represent China in UN, US would be willing continue present practice of avoiding vote on substance through some procedural action by which any proposal change Chinese representation would be postponed indefinitely. If any new procedural arrangements should prove necessary on this point, they can be discussed by UNDEls in NY.

4. Above material is to be used in your discretion in light circumstances of Government to which you are accredited, so as maintain maximum support our position. In few posts it may be judged counter-productive go beyond effort discourage them from raising issue in UN and minimize generally their opposition our position.

If any post believes approach would be counter-productive it should inform Department before taking action.

We intend discuss this matter at Bermuda meeting. However in view possible early armistice and consequently early UN meetings, please discuss soonest with Churchill and Bidault to assure continued UK and French support for such action as may be necessary in UN bodies to prevent change in Chinese representation.

While undoubtedly India and a few others may be expected join anticipated Soviet efforts change Chinese representation following armistice, and we are also again canvassing other free-world governments re problem, attitude UK and France remains a key factor to continued unity vast majority free world on this issue in immediate future. Thus, President and I consider it of utmost importance that UK, France and US continue stand together on this issue and avoid any public indication of divergence.

As UK and French Governments aware, we are convinced armistice represents no change in Communist objectives or willingness use force or any lessening of danger to SEA. We thus remain firm in our belief that seating its representative in UN now would appear as reward for halting aggression would not deter them from further aggressive ventures and would, moreover, be taken by them as sign of weakness on part free world. 1. USSR or other del will undoubtedly propose in post-armistice SC and GA meetings that representatives Govt Republic of China be unseated and Chinese Commies seated. Our objective should be to dispose of issue in both bodies in routine fashion and with minimum debate.

2. In SC, following procedure would accord with past practice and with existing "moratorium arrangement" with UK.

(a) If USSR, on point of order, moves that Council unseat representatives Govt Republic of China and seat Chinese Commies, President can state that while Soviet representative can, of course, request that Chinese representation issue be listed in provisional agenda of subsequent meeting, this question is not on agenda present meeting and Soviet motion is therefore not in order. If Soviet representative insists on immediate consideration his proposal, President should formally rule it out of order. If challenged, such ruling would undoubtedly be sustained.

(b) If Soviet representative should request SC meeting to consider Chinese representation issue, matter can probably be most easily disposed of at that meeting by adoption of motion postpone sine die consideration question of inclusion item in agenda. Such motion should preferably be made by another Council Member. Greece or Colombia would be appropriate sponsor and would probably be willing to do this.

3. In GA question should be handled on basis that any proposal unseat representatives Chinese National Govt and seat Commies is out of order or constitutes, in effect, motion reconsider decision already taken by this session GA (Rule 82). This should be done preferably on ruling by President. If Pearson does not agree make such ruling, US or another Delegation would submit formal motion in above sense in form designed secure maximum support. Action would be based on fact that GA, in resolution 609 (VII), approved credentials representatives Govt Republic of China and decided "to postpone for duration of its seventh session consideration all proposals exclude representatives of Govt of Republic of China and to seat representatives of CPG of the PRC".

4. Procedural questions re problem of possible attempts hear Chinese Commies or North Koreans, as well as any additional procedural points raised in urtels 781, 782 and 786 will be subject separate telegram.

5. In seeking support other delegations SC and GA for procedure outlined paragraphs 2 and 3, it will probably be desirable for you, in your discretion, restate major considerations which lead this Govt believe it imperative Chinese Commies should not be seated in any UN body and that representatives Government Republic of China continue be seated. In this connection you may wish make use of material in Department's circular telegram on Chinese representation, 1195, June 12.

Subject: Draft Paper on Chinese Representation for the Bermuda Conference

Attached is a revised edition of the draft paper on Chinese representation for the Bermuda conference. You saw the first version of this paper and approved its general substance.

UNP informs me that the Secretary personally added the following two sentences:

In numbered paragraph 4, relating to the need for retaining the present policy on Chinese representation pending a future reassessment in the light of the behavior of the Chinese Communists, the Secretary added "In Churchill's own words in connection with the admission of Germany into the League of Nations after World War I, 'They must work their passage back'".

In numbered paragraph 6, relating to the U.S. suggestion that the U.S., U.K. and France agree to continue a policy of postponement, the Secretary added "It may be desirable to continue to postpone the question, at least until the Charter Review Conference in 1955."

Note: The Secretary's reference to the Charter Review Conference is of special interest. It may be that the Secretary suggested it merely as a possible cut-off date sufficiently far in the future for present purposes. Beyond that the full implications of a possible connection between Charter revision and the Chinese representation question are not entirely clear. The U.K. and France might assume that a revision of the Charter was contemplated under which the provision for China as a permanent member on the Security Council would be deleted. On the other hand, it may be that the Secretary has in mind that a provision might be added to the Charter laying down rules for handling cases of rival claimants for seats in the UN.

CHINESE REPRESENTATION IN THE UNITED NATIONS

THE PROBLEM

To obtain UK-French agreement to continue in all United Nations bodies to support procedural action designed to ensure the continued seating of the representatives of the Chinese National Government and the exclusion of Chinese Communists.

POSITIONS OF UK AND FRANCE

Under a "moratorium arrangement" agreed upon by the UK and US in May 1951, US and UK representatives in all UN bodies have jointly supported action designed to dispose of the Chinese representation issue on a procedural basis and to avoid a vote on the substance. This action usually takes the form of motions to postpone consideration of the Chinese representation issue. The UK bases its support of these motions on the Chinese Communist aggression in Korea. The UK contemplates early abandonment of postponement and active support for the seating of Chinese Communists soon after the armistice is signed.

France, which has not recognized the Chinese Communists, has generally voted with the United States against the seating of Chinese Communists. However, the French attitude on this does not appear to be firm and France might be strongly tempted to recognize the Chinese Communist regime and to support the seating of its representatives in the UN if there were a prospect of successful negotiations on Indochina.

UNITED STATES POSITION TO BE PRESENTED TO OTHER GOVERNMENTS

1. We consider it imperative that the Chinese Communists should not be seated in any UN body and that representatives of the Chinese National Government continue to be seated, so long as the Chinese Communist regime is constituted on its present basis, under its present leaders, and so obviously serving the ends of the Soviet Union.

2. Agreement by the Chinese Communists to a military armistice in Korea does not constitute adequate evidence that Communist China has abandoned the use of armed force to seek its objectives and those of the USSR. There is nothing to indicate that it represents more than a tactical shift designed to create an atmosphere in which resistance to communist and Soviet imperialism will be weakened; it signifies merely that the Communists have found it unprofitable to continue the war in Korea, and the danger of renewed aggression by them particularly in Southeast Asia, remains.

3. In the absence of further evidence that the Peiping regime has changed its standards of international conduct, international political acceptance of the Chinese Communist regime, including the seating of its representatives in the UN, would have serious consequences. It would greatly enhance Chinese Communist prestige and weaken the resistance to communism of Asian peoples who are still free. It would appear as a reward for halting the criminal act of aggression; by minimizing the penalty it would encourage the Chinese Communists to embark upon or to lend greater aid to further aggressive ventures.

4. It is imperative therefore that the current policy on Chinese representation must be fully retained pending a future reassessment by the three governments in the light of the behavior of the Chinese Communists. In Churchill's own words in connection with the admission of Germany into the League of Nations after World War I, "They must work their passage back".

5. A new public divergence of policy between the US, the UK and France would have most unfortunate consequences for our combined efforts to build our defenses against communism throughout the world. Our Congress would be severely shaken if the US, with British and French concurrence, were to seat the Chinese Communists.

6. Because of the basic difference of view between the UK and the US on the Chinese representation issue, agreement should be reached, in principle, that the three governments will continue, in all UN bodies, jointly to support some procedural action by which votes on the substance can be avoided. The United States suggests that the three governments agree to continue a policy of postponement, leaving the delegates of the three governments to work out the necessary steps to achieve this result. It may be desirable to continue to postpone question, at least until Charter Review Conference in 1955.

DISCUSSION

An understanding with the UK and France on the Chinese representation issue is essential if we are to continue to keep Chinese Nationalists seated in and Chinese Communists out of the many UN bodies, particularly those smaller bodies which are so composed that a large number of their members recognize the Chinese Communist regime. The other UN countries of Western Europe (all of which recognize the Chinese Communists, except Luxembourg, Belgium and Iceland) and the Commonwealth countries will be strongly influenced by the attitude of the UK and France.

807. I. Re your 488, June 12, wish you would try to ascertain whatever advantages there might be in splitting motion which would at one and the same time unseat the representatives of the Government of the Republic of China and seat the Chinese Communists. If we can get the question of unseating the Chinese Nationalists considered separately would it not raise the whole question of expelling members from the UN? I believe this might be advantageous at this time. Could we thereby not raise the question of expelling members who have admitted aiding aggressors?

II. Agree that "our objective should be to dispose of issue in both parties in routine fashion with minimum of debate", but wish to underline that if it is not possible to be successful in a routine fashion then it becomes necessary to state our substantive arguments for the world and that we must be prepared to do so and to take three or four days in the process so as to give time for our various arguments to sink in and get adequate treatment and headlines throughout the world.

III. The suggestion that it is not in order to bring up the unseating of the Chinese Nationalists and the seating of the Chinese Communists because it is not on the agenda seems to accomplish nothing except to put off the question for one day and make it appear as though we were avoiding the issue which we have no reason to do.

IV. Heartily approve your suggestion of a motion to postpone sine die, but question whether we should not make the motion ourselves rather than having Greece or Colombia do so.

CONFIDENTIAL

PARIS, June 15, 1953—8 p. m.

6465. For the Secretary. In accordance with your instructions in Deptel 5985, I saw Bidault this afternoon. He expressed his acute embarrassment at governmental situation which forced him to receive an American Ambassador at a time when he could not speak with full authority for the French Government.

Regarding the substance of reftel, he said that he was sure that no French Government would take any unilateral decision on the subject of Chinese representation in the UN prior to the Bermuda conference, and he could guarantee that no such action would be taken as long as he had any influence on French foreign policy. He said that he had not been giving any time to detailed questions of foreign policy for the last ten days or so and did not want to make any detailed commitments. However, his own view was that the question of Communist Chinese representation in the UN should only come up as one of the questions to be considered by a broad Asiatic conference which would naturally follow a four-power conference. He did not give any details as to how he thought such an Asiatic conference should be constituted. He thought the situation in Indochina would obviously require such a meeting. All this, however, could be and would be discussed at the Bermuda conference as undoubtedly the question would be raised there by Churchill.

He said that Mendès-France's idea on Indochina was to tell the US at Bermuda: "We can no longer carry the burden in Indochina. What do you want to do about it?" This, he pointed out, was exactly similar to the British action in Greece some years ago. He said that he had opposed this Mendès-France policy with all his strength as being dishonorable, and he will continue to oppose any such policy. He pointed out that he personally had been responsible for preventing Robert Schuman from granting French recognition to Mao three years ago.

He closed by asking that I tell the Secretary for him that he would not continue in his present position in the next French Government unless there were full assurances of the continuity of French policy both in Indochina and in support of NATO objectives, including EDC, and that he would not support any government that would not give such assurances.

823. Re Chinese representation. Most significant aspect of Soviet representative's effort to get Chinese Communists seated in SC yesterday was fact he referred twice to his proposal as being a substantive one.

Following motion by Sears to postpone, Zonov said, "I have submitted a substantive question." Further along he said, "I ask that my proposal be put to the vote first as a substantive and important proposal."

This ineptitude on Zonov's part may be very substantial advantage to US if and when we are confronted with necessity of using veto in SC against seating Chinese Communist in that body.

This should help us demonstrate that question of seating Chinese Reds is substantive and not procedural.

499. Re: Chinese representation. Department has given careful consideration question raised urtel 807. Views given below follow numbered paragraphs urtel.

1. Re question whether advantage in splitting Soviet motion into two parts: (a) motion to unseat representative of Chinese National Government and (b) to seat Commies; Department convinced our interest lies rather in continuance of procedure under moratorium through which we have uniformly succeeded in keeping Soviet proposals from coming to vote at all, either as whole or in parts. This procedure is means whereby British and others can support us on vote to postpone consideration Soviet proposals although they would vote for Soviet proposals if these were put to vote. Device thus enables us (a) to obtain far better vote for continuing seating Chinese Nationalist representatives and keep out Commies than could be achieved by voting on Soviet motion either in whole or in part and (b) avoid open split with friendly countries over Chinese representation issue.

In light past Soviet practice believe likely Soviets themselves will submit their motion in two parts as you indicate since more votes might be obtained for exclusion Chinese Nationalists than for seating Communists unless firm understanding with friendly delegations covering both procedural gambits exists.

Apart from controlling considerations given above, Department does not believe that limiting Soviet motion to unseating Chinese Nationalists would in itself raise or be suitable vehicle for raising question of expelling members who have admitted aiding aggressors, i.e. Soviets. Expulsion of member state that has persistently violated its obligations is provided for in Article 6 of Charter. But expulsion is quite separate matter from determination who is entitled represent particular member state in UN bodies. It has never been suggested or contemplated, so far as we know, that expulsion of a state from UN under Article 6 could be effected by mere process of refusing seat or unseating any representative this member state in SC.

We believe above view so generally accepted throughout UN that vote on question of unseating representative opposed by another claimant would not be taken as opening way to unseating of representative of member in case where there was no alternative claimant.

Department believes any suggestion along these lines by us would be extremely disadvantageous our interests. Any US suggestions unseat USSR would be generally resented as move increase tension at precise moment when others look upon achievement of armistice as basis for further efforts reduce tension.

2. Vote of TC 10-1-1 Chinese representation question and preliminary reactions from field to Deptcirtel 1185 [1195?] indicate strong likelihood that at least in immediate future matter can be handled routine fashion and with minimum debate, in both GA and SC, on procedural basis suggested Deptel 488. This method likely secure maximum vote for our objective of continued seating representative Chinese National Government and exclusion of Chinese Commies all UN bodies. Assume domestic opinion concerned primarily with results rather than method.

Believe your advance inquiries will indicate 9 or 10 votes in SC for motion suggested Deptel 488. We would expect GA vote will probably not depart substantially from vote last fall which was 42-7-11, although returns Deptcirtel 1185 in next few days should show quite clearly what picture is.

3. Requirement that Soviet motion not be considered except under appropriate agenda item is nothing more than reasonable procedural protection against sudden and constant raising issue by USSR in SC proceedings on other questions. Moreover, in light past practice SC, this is normal way in which proceed. (See Annex memo Wainhouse to Lodge, May 29.)<sup>2</sup>

4. Reason Department suggested that Colombia or Greece make motion was that US will be President SC and it seems to us more appropriate for another delegate to make motion.

fronted with the problem of seeking to veto a Security Council decision on this matter, the political consequences are so great that my present thinking is that the decision to assert and use the veto or not to veto should be made by the President in the light of the precise circumstances existing at the time the decision is to be made. My first reaction is that neither the United States Representative to the United Nations, the Secretary of State, nor the two acting in conjunction, should make the final decision. If the United States is to be in a position to make its decision either way on the basis of the situation confronting us at the time, it follows that we should avoid disclosing our cards in advance. Certainly, however, we need not, in conversation, exclude the possibility of the veto, nor should we assert an intention to veto.

Incidentally, the first responses from our communications to the field indicate clearly that we shall not immediately be faced with the problem of exercising the veto on this question. For a time, at least, the majority of the United Nations Security Council will vote with us.

As taking this matter to the NSC, I have discussed this with our people here and I do not believe such a step to be necessary. I feel that this is a matter clearly within our own jurisdiction, subject of course to the President.<sup>2</sup>

We shall keep you fully informed of all developments. We are herewith enclosing a copy of a memorandum on this subject which is being prepared for the Subcommittee on Far Eastern Affairs of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

The moratorium procedure referred to in the US Ambassador's memorandum has worked reasonably well since 1950. In practice, the UK delegation normally votes for a procedural resolution, usually moved by the US, that discussion of the question of representation be indefinitely postponed.

HMG agrees that there is no question of changing this arrangement while fighting in Korea continues.

After the conclusion of an armistice this will need to be reconsidered and a decision taken after some reasonable interval in the light of the way events develop in the Far East.

Subject: China's Representation in the United Nations.

Forward:

This despatch is forwarded with considerable diffidence in view of the specialized nature of United Nations' activities, regarding which various persons in the Department and in New York have expert knowledge far beyond that possessed by officers of this Embassy. Technical treatment of the subject has been avoided, and only the broad lines dealt with as they appear from Taipei.

After describing the peaceful Purposes and Principles of the United Nations in Chapter I, the Charter of that Organization states in Chapter II (Membership), Article 4:

"Membership in the United Nations is open to all other peace-loving states which accept the obligations contained in the present Charter and, in the judgment of the Organization, are able and willing to carry out these obligations."

Experience since the Charter was signed in 1945 has established conclusively that no communist state associated with Moscow qualifies for membership in the United Nations under the clearly stated provision of the Charter. In fact, several of this group of states have, by their actions, made themselves liable to suspension or expulsion under the terms of the Charter.

The question arises whether it would be in the spirit of the Charter and would contribute to the purposes of the United Nations, either to admit additional communist states to membership, or to expel such states as are now members and have qualified for expulsion. Whatever may be said for or against expelling communist members, it may be stated without fear of contradiction in non-communist circles that, based on past experience, the admission of additional communist states would be more likely to hamper than to help the avowed purposes of the United Nations. The arguments in favor of such admission would, if stated honestly, relate to hopes of appeasement and of economic benefit to the supporters of these arguments, rather than to furthering the clearly stated principles and purposes of the United Nations Charter. All such considerations partake of the substance of the matter. There are also procedural considerations within the United Nations Organization; to date the admission of other communist states has been prevented largely in this way, without going openly into substantive matters, although non-communist states which are eminently qualified for membership have also been excluded in the process.

It has seemed natural and proper to the United States that communist governments should be excluded from the United Nations by procedural methods as long as these were effective. When there is indication that they may fail, however, it would appear to be a clear obligation of the United States to oppose such admission on substantive grounds. This obligation becomes of particular importance in the case of China, the first major country to undertake a deliberate attack upon the United Nations with its armed forces and to be formally branded as an aggressor in consequence. It would require the most convincing evidence of a very tangible character, and over a long period of time, genuinely to persuade the members of the United Nations that the Peking regime has experienced the fundamental transformation which alone could qualify it for membership in the Organization.

There is also to be considered the effect on the remaining non-communist states of Asia in the event of Red China's admission to the United Nations Organization. Certain of these countries appear to favor such action; others oppose. But all would accept it as representing acquiescence by the Free World in Mainland China's definitive loss to communist conquest. Depending upon their individual circumstances, all would either seek a larger degree of accommodation with Peking, or prepare to be overwhelmed by force when the communists got around to them.

If, despite all efforts of the United States, Red China were finally admitted to membership, it would generally be accepted in the Far East that the United Nations as such could no longer be expected to function as an agency of collective security. These responsibilities might then be expected to pass definitively to the field of mutual defense pacts and to the Regional Arrangements foreseen in Chapter VIII of the Charter.

To offset in part the tremendous impact of Red China's success in shooting its way into the United Nations, it would be necessary for the United States to negotiate additional mutual assistance pacts with non-communist states in the Far East, including Free China. This would best be done quickly, if possible before the formal entry of Red China into the United Nations, since the purpose of these pacts would be largely psychological. More important for the longer term would be the necessity of a speedy and substantial expansion of American military aid programs in the Far East. Nothing short of such measures would have any appreciable effect in keeping hope alive among our friends and in maintaining respect for the United States among both friends or foes. It would also be highly desirable to make clear at the earliest possible moment whether American policy toward communist states is to be one of containment or of liberation.

In pursuing a policy of non-recognition of Red China and of opposition to its acceptance into the United Nations Organization, the United States Government must expect to find itself recurrently in the position of explaining the circumstances under which it might modify this policy. Obviously, a great danger lies here. The exploitation by communist propaganda of the most measured statement on this subject, and the alarm among various non-communist countries of Asia at any suggestion of accommodation between the United States and Communist China, make it of transcendent importance that American policy be stated in the simplest terms.

Technically, of course, there is no necessary connection between the question of American recognition and the membership of Red China in the United Nations, but in the public mind these two are closely related if not to all intents and purposes identical. In explaining the American position, it may be fortunate that this is true. A case can be made out for extending American recognition to the Peking regime on the same grounds adopted by the United Kingdom and several other countries. American traditions are somewhat different in this respect, but from both substantive and legal standpoints, the case against Red China's acceptance into the United Nations Organization appears stronger than that against recognition. The United States is in a position to say that it opposes and will continue to oppose the entry into the United Nations of any and all regimes which fail to qualify under the express terms of the Charter. The various counts under which Red China must be excluded could then be detailed in such fashion that all could understand.

It might appear implicit in the foregoing policy that the United States would acquiesce in Peking's entry into the United Nations Organization, and presumably extend recognition, at such time as that regime could establish itself as qualified. There would be grave danger in positive statements to this effect by high American officials. But there could be a tacit acceptance of this implication. To qualify fully for United Nations membership under the clear terms of the Charter would require such far-reaching changes in Red China's relationships with Moscow, with the Free World, and with the Chinese people, that the China problem would be well on its way to the kind of solution which the United States desires. The Curtain, whether of iron or bamboo, would have been rolled up, and a friendly, stable China would be at hand. The United States should accept no less.

From the propaganda standpoint, there would seem to be considerable merit in representing what now appears to many as a negative position—objection to Red China's acceptance in the United Nations—in the positive light of firm support for the Charter. To place one's opponents in the position of seeming to attack the Charter has the same advantages as making them appear to oppose "peace".

APPOINTMENT OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE

THE PROBLEM

In accordance with Rule 28 of the Rules of Procedure, a Credentials Committee of nine Members will be appointed by the General Assembly, on the proposal of the Temporary President (Pearson—Canada), at the opening plenary meeting.

UNITED STATES POSITION

That the United States accept any slate proposed by the Temporary President provided that (a) the geographic distribution of countries approximates that of the last regular session; and (b) no more than three countries which recognize the Chinese Communist regime are included.*

COMMENT

1. The Credentials Committee appointed at the seventh session was composed as follows: Belgium, Burma, Lebanon, New Zealand, Panama, Paraguay, Sweden, the USSR and the United States.

2. The Credentials Committee should include not more than three states which recognize the Chinese Communist regime, because the Committee should reflect Assembly sentiment as a whole on the recognition question and only 17 of the 60 Members (including Byelorussia and the Ukraine) recognize the Chinese Communists.

3. The Temporary President, in proposing the Credentials Committee slate, acts on the recommendation of the Secretariat, and the Secretariat checks the slate in advance with major Delegations, including the United States. In the past, the Secretariat has always been amenable to changes suggested in the slate by the United States Delegation. Since the Chinese representation issue will undoubtedly be raised in the Credentials Committee, the Delegation should make every effort to ensure that the slate, as drawn up by the Secretariat and proposed by the Temporary President, is composed of a safe majority of states which are certain to support our view on the Chinese representation issue. In the unlikely event that such a slate is not proposed, the Delegation should move appropriate changes in the plenary session.

Participants: Miss Barbara Salt, First Secretary, British Embassy
Mr. Paul B. Taylor, UNP
Mr. Eric Stein, UNP

Miss Salt came at her request for a general discussion of problems to be expected at the Eighth General Assembly. In particular, she was under instructions to raise the question of United Nations membership.

[Here follows discussion of the membership question, see page 961.]

2. Chinese Representation

Miss Salt said she assumed we would probably wish to continue the moratorium in some form. She gave every indication of earnestness in stressing that it is the desire of the foreign office not to split with us on this issue at the coming session. It wants, she said, to avoid differences with us on this issue just as long as the political situation in Britain permits. She said that the foreign office is thinking along the lines of a motion or resolution, at the outset of the session, which would postpone, for the duration of the session, any proposals to change Chinese representation. We told her that when a position on this is approved, we will talk with the British further about specific procedures.

[WASHINGTON,] August 29, 1953.

QUESTION OF CHINESE REPRESENTATION

THE PROBLEM

The Soviet Representative served notice at the recent meetings of the Seventh Session on Korea that the USSR intends to press strongly at the Eighth Assembly Session for the seating of the Chinese Communists. It is probable that this issue will also be raised by such delegations as India which actively support the seating of the Chinese Communists. The issue is likely to be raised as follows: (a) as at the Fifth General Assembly, at the outset of the opening plenary meeting, in the form of a proposal or proposals to exclude the Representatives of the Government of the Republic of China and invite Chinese Communist Representatives; (b) as at the Sixth General Assembly, in the form of a request for the inclusion of the question of the representation of China in the Assembly's agenda; or (c) as at the Seventh General Assembly, initially in the Credentials Committee, in the form of a proposal calling upon the General Assembly to declare invalid the credentials of the Representatives of the Government of the Republic of China.

UNITED STATES POSITION

1. If the question arises as indicated in (a) above, the United States should initiate or support in the plenary a motion along the following lines:

I move "That the General Assembly postpone for the duration of its Eighth Regular Session consideration of all proposals to exclude the Representatives of the Government of the Republic of China and to seat representatives of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China".

The United States should take the necessary steps to ensure that this procedural motion is put to the vote before the substantive proposal and, upon its adoption, that the substantive proposal is not put to the vote.

2. If the question arises as indicated in (b) above, the United States should initiate or support in the General Committee a resolution along the following lines:

"The General Committee,

"1. Recommends that the General Assembly decide to reject the request of the [Soviet Union] <sup>1</sup> for the inclusion in the agenda of its

<sup>1</sup> Brackets in the source text.

Eighth Session of the additional item entitled '(precise title of item)'; and

"2. Recommends that the General Assembly decide to postpone consideration for the duration of its Eighth Regular Session of any further proposals to exclude Representatives of the Government of the Republic of China from the Assembly or to seat representatives of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China to represent China in the Assembly".

3. If the question arises as indicated in (c) above, the United States should seek to have the Credentials Committee adopt a proposal along the following lines:

"The Credentials Committee,

"1. Recommends that the General Assembly postpone for the duration of its Eighth Regular Session consideration of all proposals to exclude the Representatives of the Government of the Republic of China and to seat representatives of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China; and

"2. Finds that the credentials of the Representatives of the Government of the Republic of China conform with the provisions of rule 27 of the Rules of Procedure of the General Assembly".

The necessary steps should be taken to ensure that this proposal is put to the vote before the [Soviet bloc proposal] <sup>2</sup> and, upon its adoption, that the [Soviet bloc proposal] is not put to the vote.

4. In the unlikely event that procedural action along lines outlined in recommendations 1, 2, and 3 above, is not taken and the substance of the Chinese representation question is put to the vote, the United States should actively oppose and vote against any proposal to exclude the Chinese National representatives and/or seat Chinese Communists.

COMMENT

By taking a procedural position which avoids a vote on the substance we can achieve our basic objective (the seating of the Representatives of the Chinese National Government and the exclusion of the Chinese Communists) with minimum difficulty and with maximum free-world support.

In June 1951 the United Kingdom agreed to a "moratorium arrangement" under which United Kingdom and United States Representatives jointly support in all United Nations and specialized agency bodies procedural action (usually postponement) which avoids votes on the substance but results in the seating of Representatives of the Chinese National Government and the exclusion of Chinese Communists. This arrangement has been supported by a large majority of states including, in addition to the United Kingdom, most of our key allies which recognize the Chinese Communists. The support of the United Kingdom and other recognizing states (which follow the United Kingdom lead on Chinese representation) for the "moratorium arrangement" was based originally on the continuance of hostilities in Korea. The Chinese representation issue was raised by the Secretary in the tripartite meetings last June. The agreed communique stated that the Foreign Ministers of the United States, the United Kingdom and France "considered that, in existing circumstances and pending further consultation, the common policies of the three Powers toward Communist China should be maintained." Subsequently, UK officials have emphasized the need to handle the Chinese representation issue in the UN by way of extension of the "moratorium arrangement" (period unspecified but for the duration of the eighth GA) so as to make it unnecessary for the British representatives to vote directly on the issue of seating the Chinese Communists. Under this procedure, we would jointly seek to prevent the seating of the Chinese Communists through adoption of procedural action. While, for the present, we could undoubtedly continue to command the necessary majority to achieve our objective in the General Assembly and plenipotentiary bodies of the specialized agencies without the continued affirmative support, under the "moratorium arrangement", of the United Kingdom and states which follow its lead, it is essential that this working arrangement be maintained if we are to continue to achieve our basic objective in certain other smaller United Nations and specialized agency bodies which are so composed that a majority or near majority of their members recognize the Chinese Communists. Moreover, it should be noted that last June,<sup>3</sup> in view of the imminence of a Korean armistice, we instructed our ambassadors to express to other friendly UN Member Governments our continued vigorous opposition to the seating of the Chinese Communists, and to indicate that in the interest of avoiding open differences among the free-world states in the UN we would be willing to continue the present practice of avoiding votes on the substance through procedural action by which consideration of any proposal to change Chinese representation would be postponed indefinitely. The results of these representations show that we can continue to command the broadest support for our position through procedural action.

Salisbury plans put formula before cabinet on ninth. UK delegate would like US reactions before this Friday. Arguments made by Crosthwaite in course conveying new formula to USUN as follows:

1. UK wish avoid public split, as happened over Indian participation Korean conference. They favor "moratorium" but one with less rigid language than last year's. UK formula did not mean UK wished bring up substance of Chinese representation question.

2. UK wished not to tie own hands publicly for full year until Ninth GA by old language. In this connection, recalled decision of Sixth GA confined postponement of consideration Chinese representation only to meetings in Paris.

3. UK feel fact of armistice as "changed situation" should be reflected in a new formula which would not freeze situation unalterably for next 12 months. Crosthwaite hoped, if Salisbury formula not acceptable to US, that US would offer some alternative language.

ing and avoid if possible public airing of differences in forthcoming session UNGA.

2. In brief, UK position is that moratorium lasting throughout session would present practical difficulties, would be incompatible with statements by government spokesmen and would leave government vulnerable to attack by opposition. Selwyn Lloyd, for example, on July 30 stated in Commons among factors which would have to be taken into consideration would be results of political conference and behavior of Chinese outside conference. UK would wish explore with US possibilities of moratorium for shorter term, or until UNGA has had opportunity study report from political conference.

3. In explanation above views, Foreign Office stated UK wished avoid inflexibility in approach to this delicate subject. ROK, it was felt, would be more likely create difficulties than Communists, and UK has no desire have Rhee dictate British policy toward China. If, for example, Chinese Communists were to release foreign internees and give British businessmen in China a break, or if they gave satisfactory guarantees to French re IC, UK would be hard put to defend continuance moratorium. Foreign Office assures Embassy that it not indulging in wishful thinking as it quite likely Communists will prove as difficult at political conference as at Panmunjom; in such case moratorium would be continued indefinitely, UN would still retain freedom of action, and it would be in better bargaining position vis-a-vis Communists.

Subject: United Kingdom Position on Chinese Representation.

USUN is sending a telegram tonight giving full details of the UK instructions on Chinese representation. These instructions, which have not yet been approved by the Cabinet, are in effect to go along with the moratorium but to seek a change in the formula embodied in our various proposals. The Department has also received on an informal basis from the British Embassy the substitute formula which the UK proposes.

The formula which we have proposed would have the GA postpone consideration of all proposals for changing Chinese representation "for the duration of its 8th regular session".

The British substitute formula reads as follows: "The Assembly decides to postpone consideration of all proposals to exclude the Representatives of the Government of the Republic of China and to seat representatives of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China until such time as the Assembly has been able to consider the position in the light of developments resulting from the Assembly resolution of August 28 concerning the establishment of a Political Conference on Korea." The reason given by the British for this change is a fear that the 8th GA will continue all year after the manner of the 7th GA.

Comment: The UK raised a similar problem at the Paris GA in 1950 which was solved by a compromise formula postponing the Chinese representation question for the duration of the 5th GA "meeting in Paris."

My tentative views are as follows:

(1) The formula which the British suggest would not be acceptable to us.<sup>1</sup>

(2) We shall have to decide whether, in rejecting the British formula, to work through New York or direct in a message from the Secretary to London. The latter would probably be the more effective.

(3) The British will probably not be willing to accept our formula and we should now work actively at trying to find some form of words which will give us what we want and yet be reasonably acceptable to the UK. I have talked with UNP and we are both working to turn up all possibilities. No action need be taken until the telegram is received from New York.

I said that I did not care to make any comment until I had studied the matter fully. The Ambassador said his Government was anxious to avoid any open difference between our Governments at the United Nations as had been the case with reference to India, and that they would be glad to consider changes in language.

[Here follows discussion of other Asian matters.]

7. The Ambassador said that his Government was quite strongly opposed to the suggestion which he understood had been made at New York that there would be introduced into the United Nations General Assembly agenda an item attacking the Soviets for their conduct in the satellite areas. He felt that this was pushing the cold war too strongly and that this was not the right time for such an item to be pushed.

Subject: Credentials Committee for the 8th General Assembly

Mr. Tan called to express Ambassador Koo's concern about the possible composition of the Credentials Committee at the 8th GA. T. F. Tsiang had reported to the Embassy from New York that he had been informed by Ambassador Lodge that the US would vote on the first ballot for Madame Pandit as President of the GA. The Embassy said that if Madame Pandit won she might select a Credentials Committee which would find in favor of the Chinese Communists and against the Chinese Government representatives. In the Embassy's view the GA President would probably consult with the UN Secretariat for advice on the selection of the Committee and Ambassador Koo wondered whether there was not something that the US might be able to do in this situation.

I read Mr. Tan Rule 28 of the GA Rules of Procedure which provides for appointment of a Credentials Committee on the proposal of the President "at the beginning of each session". The proposal would accordingly be made by the retiring President, Mr. Pearson, prior to the election of a new President. I added that I believe it was customary for the President to obtain advice from the Secretariat and in past years the Credentials Committee had been broadly representative of the GA membership geographically and had also reflected the proportionate distribution between recognizing and non-recognizing states among the membership. Thus, in a committee of nine there had been in the past usually no more than three recognizing states and it was to be expected that the Secretariat would advise following a similar pattern this year.

Mr. Tan also mentioned the Chinese Government's hope that we would support Dr. Shuhsi Hsu for the International Law Commission. I repeated what I had previously told Mr. Tsui (April 20) that while we were not yet in position to make commitments with regard to our slate for the International Law Commission we believed that the Big Five should be represented on the Commission.

154. Re Chinese Representation. At luncheon conversation with Kiang (China) USUN discussed question Chinese representation, explaining our present view that last year's procedure be followed again, i.e., postpone consideration for duration Eighth GA. Kiang said Chinese delegation believed this wrong approach; would produce some [garble] of resentment on part their people as it already has by leaving impression time might come soon when we would change our position on substance of matter. They therefore favored simply voting down each motion on representation question wherever raised and leaving it at that. This would permit delegations like UK, for example, to vote for Soviet motions if they wished.

We pointed out two factors that ought be considered this connection: (1) We did not wish have public differences with our principal allies that could be exploited by Communists to disadvantage of all including China, and (2) that Kiang's proposal would mean issue would come up at each and every meeting of a UN body without convenient reply that issue had been postponed. Kiang said he recognized these difficulties but believed advantages of his suggestion outweighed them.

Kiang said in view importance of composition credentials committee to the Chinese representation question his delegation would like suggest following membership: Australia, Greece, Pakistan, ( a country who had recognized Communist China would have to be on the committee and Pakistan seemed best), USSR, two from the following LAs: Brazil, Cuba, El Salvador, Dominican Republic; Turkey, USA, and either Thailand or Philippines.

Mr. Robert Murphy, Assistant Secretary for United Nations Affairs

The Secretary said that he had carefully considered the language of the proposal suggested by the UK as reported to him by the Ambassador on September 3. It would not be possible for us to go along with this exact language, but he thought that perhaps the problem could be solved by the following language, of which he provided Ambassador Makins with a copy:

"That the General Assembly postpone for the duration of its Eighth Regular Session consideration of all proposals to exclude the Representatives of the Government of the Republic of China and to seat representatives of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China."

In addition to the language of the proposal, there would be an understanding that we would work for adjournment of the Eighth Assembly session in December 1953. The Secretary was given to understand, he said, that under present rules a firm date for adjournment sine die could be agreed by the Assembly. The Secretary explained also that for reasons of a purely domestic nature the United States was eager to have a definite adjournment of the Eighth Assembly session in December. For example, some of the delegates accepted their appointments on that basis and would not be available for later service, as in the case of Governor Byrnes and the two members of Congress.

Ambassador Makins explained that the language in the present British proposal is designed to retain a certain flexibility. He referred to the discussion in the House of Commons as illustrating the desire of his government to avoid freezing the position for a period as long as the session of the Seventh General Assembly, which lasted over eleven months. He thought that the Secretary's present suggestion might possibly meet the British point of view, and he would recommend it to his government.

The Secretary pointed out that should there be need for a further meeting of the Assembly in 1954 prior to the Ninth Session, this could be handled by a special session, for which there is precedent.

At both sixth and seventh sessions re urtel 1027 General Committee report acted on by GA several days before report Credentials Committee considered. Moreover, at both sixth and seventh sessions General Committee acted on question establishment target date for adjournment (old rule 2) before it took up question of inclusion items in agenda. We see no reason expect different procedures will be followed this year, and we could informally make arrangements with view ensuring this. On this basis, postponement formula will not be acted on until after action taken on fixing closing date, if Chinese representation issue raised (a) as at sixth GA in form inclusion new agenda item or (b) as at seventh GA in form challenge in Credentials Committee of validity credentials representatives Govt Republic of China. Issue might also be raised on point of order at outset first plenary meeting. In this event postponement procedure would have to be applied before establishment closing date.

Although likelihood is that closing date will have been fixed first, we do not as practical matter see why this is so important if we have firm understanding with UK that closing date will be set and if both Dels obtain necessary support in advance to ensure this. UK, in its statement in support our formula, could indicate it understands "for duration eighth session" to mean until closing date fixed by GA, i.e., approximately mid-December.

Referring to his previous conversations with Secretary Dulles on this matter, in which the US had proposed postponement for the duration of the session proposals on Chinese representation, with an understanding that we would seek to end the session before Christmas, Sir Roger stated that his government desired to meet our position so far as possible and felt that we were both in agreement on the basic idea of postponement until the end of the calendar year. The UK was, therefore, prepared to accept our suggested formula but in view of the slight uncertainty as to whether our plans for adjournment before Christmas would actually carry, they desired to have the following underlined words included: "That the GA postpone for the duration of its Eighth Regular Session for the current year consideration of all proposals, etc." Mr. Murphy indicated that although we were somewhat reluctant to make so specific the time qualification, nevertheless, he felt that the British suggestion might prove acceptable. In view of the Secretary's close personal interest in this matter, however, Mr. Murphy indicated we would have to discuss it with him before giving Sir Roger a definitive reply.

He pointed out this would make resolution conform with wording in resolution 609, December [October] 25 last year and avoid attachment undue significance to new wording.

He thought opportunity for such elimination might be provided in Credentials Committee consideration.

Comment: I pointed out to Minister that wording of resolution had undoubtedly been given careful consideration and in view of discussion in UN Assembly yesterday it was probably too late to consider revision, but at his request I agreed to report his views to Department.

Subject: Chinese Representation at this Morning's General Assembly

UNP reports the following developments on Chinese representation at this morning's plenary session of the General Assembly. When the report of the Credentials Committee was presented to the General Assembly, the Soviet Delegation moved that the credentials of the Chinese Delegation were invalid. (Note: UNP is vague on the precise nature of the Soviet motion.)

Mrs. Pandit ruled that she would have to consider the Soviet motion out of order in view of the decision on Chinese representation taken earlier in the session. The subject might, of course, be considered under Rule 82 which provides that when a proposal has been adopted by the GA it may not be reconsidered at the same session unless a two-thirds majority of the GA so decides. She added that, of course, her ruling could be contested. No objection to her ruling was made.

Mrs. Pandit then announced that speakers might be heard on the Credentials Report. Menon of India said that the Indian Delegation did not see how a ruling of the General Assembly adopted prior to the appointment of a Credentials Committee could bind that committee. The Indian Delegation did not regard the credentials of the National Government as valid and the Indian Delegation accordingly would not approve that part of the Credentials Committee Report relating to the Chinese credentials.

The Credentials report was then approved by a vote of 48-5-5.

(Note: Our Delegation talked with Mrs. Pandit yesterday and had received assurances from her on the handling of the Chinese representation issue when it came up this morning. Mrs. Pandit, in fact, took a firmer line in ruling the Soviet proposal out of order than did Mr. Pearson under similar circumstances at a previous session. Mr. Pearson chose to interpret the Soviet proposal as a motion to reopen the question and put the Soviet proposal to a vote.)

Subject: Chinese Representation and the ECOSOC Slate

The following comments are with further reference to our conversation this afternoon on the question whether the United States should support Indonesia or Afghanistan for ECOSOC, with special reference to the Chinese representation question.

As you know I am by strong personal conviction committed to doing everything possible to prevent the unseating of the Chinese National Representatives or the seating of the Chinese Communists in the UN. This position is also the firm policy of the United States Government. We are accordingly in complete agreement on this objective. When, however, it is urged that we support Afghanistan in preference to Indonesia in the belief that, if at some future time the moratorium is terminated and the United Kingdom and other states withdraw their support from postponement proposals on Chinese representation, Afghanistan will remain staunch in an abstention and that abstention may save the day for Chinese representation on ECOSOC, I am unable to follow the reasoning.

A basic factor in the situation is that both Indonesia and Afghanistan have recognized the Chinese Communists. We shall be indulging in dangerous self-delusion if we regard any recognizing state as "safe" after the moratorium terminates.

At the present time while the moratorium continues, we have an adequate majority on the Chinese representation question in ECOSOC. Whether we support Indonesia or Afghanistan there will be 8 states which recognize the Chinese Communists out of a total council membership of 18. Some of these 8 states, however, will vote with us while the moratorium holds. If we were to support Indonesia, accordingly, the vote on our usual postponement motion might be about 12-6-0 in our favor; if we support Afghanistan the vote might be 12-5-1. In either case, there would be no problem at the present time.

The problem will arise if the moratorium terminates. In that case we have to consider both Indonesia and Afghanistan as probably opposition votes. At the opening of the 7th General Assembly both states abstained on the Chinese representation question. At the opening of this General Assembly Afghanistan abstained and Indonesia voted against the postponement proposal. A few days later in the Credentials Committee, when the USSR was ruled out of order by the Chairman for attempting to reopen the issue, Indonesia abstained.

While in my view the Soviet proposal was clearly out of order the Indonesian position nevertheless indicates a willingness to avoid an extreme position. There is no assurance that Afghanistan, like Indonesia, may not move from an abstention to a negative vote. Similarly, it is conceivable that if we support Indonesia for something it strongly desires—instead of continually rejecting all its requests for United States support for UN council seats—it might move back from a negative vote to an abstention. As both are recognizing states neither can be considered as “safe” if the moratorium terminates and we do not need the vote of either state while the moratorium remains in effect. In the meantime, if we are to go to Indonesia, which has formally asked our support, and tell it that once again we will not support it for ECOSOC but intend instead to support Afghanistan, we shall be losing the opportunity which our support might afford for promoting our objectives in Indonesia, tightening its ties to the UN and developing its sense of responsibility through acceptance of a seat on a major council.

I may point out that our present slate contemplates our supporting Norway which has recognized the Chinese Communists and no longer can be regarded as supporting the moratorium. The Department also recently decided to support Pakistan, which has recognized the Chinese Communists and will follow the United Kingdom lead if the moratorium should be terminated, in preference to the Philippines which was at the time a candidate and which is completely firm on the Chinese representation question. Is it proposed that we should reconsider our position with respect to Norway and keep our support for Pakistan open in the event that the Philippines re-enters the race?

For the above considerations I believe that the case for our supporting Afghanistan in preference to Indonesia at this time is not convincing. I believe that there is no evidence that we can count upon any substantial difference between the position of Afghanistan and Indonesia on the Chinese representation question if the moratorium terminates.

Subject: The Secretary's Comments at his press conference of November 9, 1953 on Chinese Representation in the United Nations and Recognition of a Communist Government in China.

For your information in preparing guidance for USIA media on Secretary Dulles' press conference comments on Communist China, the following points should be noted:

1. The Secretary's discussion of the question of recognition of Communist China and the position of the U.S. on the admission of Communist Chinese representatives to U.N. bodies was not a part of his prepared statement, but developed in the question-answer period of his conference.

2. His statements were made in clarification and restatement of factual situations—clarification of the credential procedures of various U.N. bodies, restatement of some of the reasons the U.S. Government is unable even to consider the question of the recognition of the Chinese Communist regime as the government of China.

3. There is no indication that the Chinese Communist regime has any intention or ability to meet the conditions indicated by the Secretary as prerequisites to the consideration by the U.S. Government of the question of the recognition of the Chinese Communist regime as the government of China.

4. No speculation or dissemination of speculations of possible changes in the policies of the U.S. on these questions is warranted.

STRICTLY LIMITED DISTRIBUTION

Participants: United States—	President Eisenhower Secretary Dulles Assistant Secretary Robertson Lt. Colonel Walters
United Kingdom—	Prime Minister Churchill Foreign Secretary Eden Mr. J. Colville
France—	M. Bidault M. Bougenot M. Roux M. Andronikov

The President opened the meeting by saying that he understood that it was desired to have additional members of delegations present when the questions of security guarantees and Indo-China were discussed, but that the meeting should be restricted for the discussion of Far Eastern and Middle Eastern problems. Sir Winston Churchill then said he would like to discuss what was to be done if the truce were to break down.

The President then said that he would ask Secretary Dulles to express our position on this. He understood that the French would want additional members of the delegation in for the discussion on Indo-China. They could discuss the Far East in the first place, then the Middle East and finally follow with a discussion on Indo-China. Sir Winston then stated that he hoped the meeting would be held particularly secret. He said he wished to bring up the question of the Suez Canal in which the French also had a historic interest as well as a financial interest. The President then said that they might begin discussion by having Secretary Dulles make a statement on the Far East.

Secretary Dulles said that the Far Eastern situation was a very confusing one for our policies were at variance with each other. This was not surprising. The Soviets were also somewhat confused and, as M. Bidault had mentioned, they had had three ambassadors to China in eighteen months. The Secretary felt the Chinese Communist rule was pretty solidly established, though less so in the South and North. There did not appear to exist in an open form resistance forces seriously threatening the Communist rule over the mainland. In the question of relations between Communist China and the USSR, it was difficult to come to a clear conclusion but he thought we were justified in believing that there was strain. This would seem logical. Mao Tse-tung was himself an outstanding Communist leader in his own right. His prestige, while less than that of Stalin's was greater than Malenkov's. It was natural, therefore, that there should be a certain unwillingness on the part of Mao to be dictated to by Moscow as had been possible with Stalin because of the latter's enormous prestige resulting from his internal and external victories. Stalin's prestige had been such that Mao could be second to him. This was not the case with Malenkov. The very fact that the Soviet Communist leaders went to such extremes to eulogize Mao and push him forward as a major figure in the international scene was partly because of self-interest and partly because of the necessity of treating Mao as an equal partner on the world scene. The fact that this relationship exists is important and may eventually give us an opportunity for promoting division between the Soviet Union and Communist China in our own common interest.

There were major differences between the three powers in their approach to this problem, especially as between the United Kingdom and the United States. It was the view of the United States that the best hope for intensifying the strain and difficulties between Communist China and Russia would be to keep the Chinese under maximum pressure rather than by relieving such pressure. There were two theories for dealing with this problem. One was that by being nice to the Communist Chinese we could wean them away from the Soviets, and the other was that pressure and strain would compel them to make more demands on the USSR which the latter would be unable to meet and the strain would consequently increase.

The United States adhered to the latter view that pressure should be maintained on Communist China both politically and economically and to the extent possible without war, military pressure should likewise be maintained. In the view of the United States this was the course to be followed rather than to seek to divide the Chinese and the Soviets by a sort of competition with Russia as to who would treat China best. This would put China in the best of worlds. The Secretary felt that if contradictory policies were applied to China, none of them could make progress toward success and each would cancel out the other's efforts. He felt a very serious effort should be made to try to bring policies on China into closer harmony than was the case at present. We recognize the fact that the United Kingdom had given political recognition to the Communist regime in China. The Secretary had understood from what the Prime Minister had said the other day that this did not carry moral approbation. The British had said that one must recognize even one's enemies. This was true, but the fact that they were recognized did not mean that you had to give them aid of a political, moral or economic nature. The conduct of Communist China as a proclaimed aggressor in Korea, promoting aggression in Indo-China and generally attempting to arouse all Asia against the Western Powers created a situation which brought up the question as to whether they should be given de facto recognition. The Secretary did not feel that we should give them aid and comfort as was the case when some seemed to promote the admission of Communist China to the United Nations despite the standard of conduct required of members of the United Nations, i.e., to be peace-loving countries willing to undertake the obligations of the Charter. That seemed to be carrying recognition far beyond the conditions of the recognition of a de facto government. The Secretary felt that if we could align policies in the United Nations, taking the position that Communist China was an aggressor in Korea, as well as a promoter of aggression in Indo-China, and she had not proved her willingness to be peace loving and faithful to the obligations of the United Nations Charter, this would be helpful in establishing a common policy with some chance of success. As things stood now, some opposed the admission of Communist China to the United Nations while others were supporting it, despite its derelictions. This cleavage could be exploited by our enemies so that the policies of neither of us would be effective.

The Secretary said that he was mentioning the point at this time because the moratorium agreement at present in effect on preventing this issue from coming up in prolonged debate would expire at the end of December, and the whole question of future policy on this subject would force itself on our attention. It was probable that the United Nations would recess until January or February. The first thing we could expect after this recess would be the resumption of the move by Vishinsky for acceptance of the credentials of the Communist regime in China and we must have agreement on that point.

[Here follows extended discussion of other aspects of the Far Eastern situation: commercial relations with Communist China, Korea, and Formosa.]

Mr. Eden then said that they had listened with the greatest interest to every word in the masterly survey of Far Eastern problems by the Secretary of State. Mr. Eden said that it was a puzzling question to know how far we can by our actions help to foster a division of opinion between the Chinese Communists and the Russians. It probably to some extent exists and will grow. History was on our side, for these two had never worked harmoniously together for long, but it might be long for in China things take centuries which require but years elsewhere. They were trying to divide the three of us, just as we were trying to divide them, and that in itself was in a measure an excuse for argument for not thinking it wise to break off all contacts, however unsatisfactory our relationship with the Chinese Communists might be at present. The Foreign Secretary said that he would not go into the question of recognition at that time, all were familiar with the reasons for which it had been done and how it had been done. We should freely admit that we had a problem to face at the United Nations in February and we should immediately start talks. We would, of course, like to consult the Commonwealth Governments so that we might work out a common line to be used in February. It would be very bad if we found ourselves in disarray.

[Here follow other remarks by Eden. Bidault followed, and concluding remarks were made by President Eisenhower. Neither Eisenhower nor Bidault referred to the Chinese representation question.<sup>2</sup>]

CA-3371. Subject: Chinese Representation Issue at Forthcoming ECAFE Meetings.

The Tenth Session of the Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East (ECAFE) will meet in Kandy, Ceylon, from February 8 to February 18, 1954. Prior to this session, two of the Commission's subsidiary bodies will also meet at Kandy. These bodies are the Inland Transport Committee, convening on January 20, and the Committee on Industry and Trade, convening on January 26.

It is expected that the Soviet Union will raise the Chinese representation issue at each of these meetings, probably in the form of a proposal to exclude the representative of the Government of the Republic of China and to invite a Chinese Communist to participate. If any such proposal is made in the Inland Transport Committee or the <sup>1</sup> Drafted by Paul W. Jones of the Office of UN Political and Security Affairs, cleared with the geographic bureaus, and approved for transmission by the Director of the Office of UN Political and Security Affairs.

Committee on Industry and Trade, we believe that the best way to dispose of the proposal would be to declare it out of order on the grounds that these Committees were established to deal with specific technical subjects and not with political questions of the character of Chinese representation, and that as subsidiary bodies of ECAFE, it would be entirely inappropriate for them to consider the proposal and they should be governed by previous action of ECAFE. A firm precedent exists for such an out-of-order procedure in these Committees, since this is the procedure which has been consistently followed in the past by the Committee on Industry and Trade when the Soviet Union has raised the Chinese representation issue. (The Soviet Union has not attended meetings of the Inland Transport Committee and the issue has never been raised in that body.)

If the Soviet Union makes any proposal at the Tenth Session of the Commission designed to exclude the representative of the Government of the Republic of China and to invite a Chinese Communist, we believe that the best way to dispose of the matter would be to adjourn debate on the proposal for the duration of the Session. This is the same procedure followed by the Commission at its last two sessions. In support of a motion to adjourn debates, we would stress that the Soviet proposal should not even be considered since the international conduct of the Chinese Communist regime departs so drastically from normally accepted standards and since this regime shows no respect for the purposes and principles of the United Nations.

The Embassy will realize that by advancing a procedural position along the above lines which avoids a vote on the substance of the Chinese representation issue we can best assure the continued seating of the representatives of the Government of the Republic of China and the prevention of Chinese Communists from participating in any capacity. In addition to countries which recognize the Government of the Republic of China, certain others which recognize the Chinese Communist regime, including the United Kingdom, Netherlands and Pakistan, have supported our position on the Chinese representation issue in UN bodies if the matter is handled on a procedural basis.

In view of the great importance the United States attaches to the continued seating of the representatives of the Government of the Republic of China and the exclusion of Chinese Communists, the Department requests that the Embassy outline the above procedures to the Foreign Office, inquire whether it plans to send delegations to each of the meetings in question and express the hope that its delegations to these meetings will be instructed to support the procedures recommended. However, it is left to the discretion of the Embassies in New Delhi, Djakarta and Rangoon whether such representations would be counterproductive and therefore should not be made.

The Embassy at Bangkok is also requested to keep the Department informed as to the Members and Associate Members which have notified the ECAFE Secretariat whether they plan to attend the three ECAFE meetings.

CONFIDENTIAL

[WASHINGTON,] December 29, 1953.

Subject: Chinese Representation

In the course of a tour d'horizon of UN problems, Miss Salt recalled that the US-UK moratorium arrangement as embodied in the resolution of the 8th GA on this subject expires at the end of the year. Although no instructions have been received from the UK Foreign Office, the UK Delegation in New York suggested that the Embassy in Washington raise the problem with us. I stated that with respect to the forthcoming ECAFE meetings, which will be the first meetings of UN bodies in 1954 at which the question is likely to arise, we had already sent a circular instruction to friendly members, including the UK, proposing that the procedure previously followed again be adhered to. If the question should arise in one of the two ECAFE committees, we would take the position that it is out of order; if it should arise in the Commission itself, we would initiate or support a motion to adjourn debate for the duration of the session. Miss Salt did not indicate that she expected there would be any difficulty in the UK going along with this procedure, but preferred to withhold official comment until word from London.

On the general problem I stated it is our desire that the moratorium arrangement should be continued indefinitely. I pointed out that in our view there had been no development which would warrant any more relaxed attitude on the part of either government. I stated we had under consideration the possibility of making a high level approach to the British Government on this matter in the near future.

Miss Salt inquired specifically as to whether this continuation of the arrangement would apply to the forthcoming session of the TC and any resumed session of the GA. When I replied in the affirmative she sought to explore an appropriate type of wording for the motion to be introduced at the outset of any resumed session of the GA. I suggested that the simplest would be a motion to postpone consideration of the question "for the duration of the session". Miss Salt speculated that since the 8th GA did not terminate in December as originally planned and now is likely to resume its session in February, it is very likely that at the conclusion of that portion the Assembly will again simply recess rather than adjourn. She felt therefore that a formula to postpone the question "for the duration of the session" would probably not prove acceptable to the UK Government. She suggested instead language along the following lines: "The GA decides to postpone consideration of this question until the termination or until the next recess of the 8th session of the GA". I commented that if the probable resumed session did not adjourn but again recessed until later in the spring or summer, the only reasons for which it would again reconvene would be reasons connected with the refusal of the Chinese Communists to hold a political conference on any reasonable basis or a deadlock at the conference due to their intransigence. In either case the circumstances would be such that the US would continue to be opposed to any change in representation in the UN, and assumed the UK would likewise. It seemed to me therefore that the preferable course would be to postpone discussion for the duration of the 8th Session.

I mentioned to the Ambassador that our "moratorium arrangement" with reference to Communist China and the UN technically expired at the end of last year and that I thought we should know where we stand for the future. I urged that they should take a stronger position politically against the Chinese Communist government even though they do technically recognize it. I said that this would help them have a better press here despite their insistence on trade.

The British Ambassador said that he could assure me that so far as meetings of the subsidiary bodies were concerned that would not change their position, that the issue would only become active if and when the UN Assembly met again and that before then he would let me know about his government's position.

She also stated that the Ambassador is again seeing the Secretary today to propose that, regarding the probable resumed session of the GA in February, we agree to a formula which would postpone the question for the duration of that portion of the session only. Mr. Merchant—EUR

At the end of his call on the Secretary to discuss another matter, the British Ambassador stated that he had a reply from London concerning the question of dealing with the Chinese representation issue at the resumed session of the Eighth General Assembly. He stated that insofar as subsidiary organs are concerned, the British position will remain as heretofore. He went on to say that Mr. Eden felt that for parliamentary reasons it was not possible for him to tie himself down at this time with respect to the Ninth General Assembly opening next fall. The Ambassador said, however, that London was willing to go along with the present agreement at the February resumed session of the Eighth Assembly and he then handed the attached proposed formula to the Secretary. The Secretary indicated that the British answer seemed acceptable. The Secretary, however, reminded the Ambassador of the parliamentary confusion which arose on this issue at the opening of the Eighth General Assembly last fall. He said that it might not be possible to avoid a vote on the merits of the issue.

The Ambassador reiterated that the British have no intention of raising the question of Chinese Communist admission at the resumed session.

Subject: Chinese Representation—UK Formula for Resumed Eighth GA.

Miss Salt came in at my request to discuss the formula which Ambassador Makins gave to the Secretary on January 7 and which reads as follows:

"The General Assembly decides to postpone until the adjournment or the termination of its Eighth Regular Session, whichever is earlier, consideration of all proposals to exclude the representatives of the Government of the Republic of China and to seat representatives of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China."

I pointed out to Miss Salt that the words "adjournment" and "termination" in General Assembly parlance mean the same thing. The phrase "whichever is earlier", qualifying the words "adjournment or termination" is thus meaningless.

I suggested that the formula could be amended without changing the intention to read: "postpone for the duration of the Second Part of the Eighth Regular Session" or, alternatively "recess or adjournment" in lieu of "adjournment or termination".

Miss Salt readily agreed that the words "adjournment" and "termination" meant the same thing, and said that she thought London would be agreeable to the language "postpone for the duration of the Second Part of the Eighth Regular Session".

As soon as Miss Salt hears from London on the change of language in the formula she will inform us.

Miss Salt came in at her request to say that the change in the Chinese representation formula which I had discussed with her on January 18 is entirely agreeable to the Foreign Office, the UK Delegation and to the Embassy. The formula as accepted now reads:

“The General Assembly decides to postpone for the duration of the Second Part of the Eighth Regular Session consideration of all proposals to exclude the representatives of the Government of the Republic of China and to seat representatives of the Central People’s Government of the People’s Republic of China.”

Subject: Attitude of Secretary-General Hammarskjold re Chinese Representation

During a translation in the Security Council meeting today, after the Secretary-General had given me a note on another subject, I raised with him the matter of Chinese Representation in his speech before the Pilgrim Society in London and in his most recent press conference. I told him that his arguments for giving Red China a seat in the UN could justify the inference that he was trying to twist the UN into something different from what it was originally intended to be. The UN, I said, was not created to be a band of international adventurers not bound together by a common love of peace. The San Francisco conference envisaged a moral sanction in the words “peace-loving” which are in the Charter. Were the conditions prevailing now prevalent then, the US would undoubtedly have opposed Soviet membership.

Hammarskjold flushed visibly at this and answered that this question was very fundamental, with which I agreed. He stated that the Chinese Communists must some day become members of the UN—take China’s seat. To that I asked how he would feel if the Chinese Communists were occupying Stockholm as they are now occupying Pyong Yang. Would he not see things in a different light? I added that he was bringing to his concept of the job of Secretary-General new elements on which we had strong feelings, which were in opposition to our point of view, and which involved a change in the spirit of the Charter which would not be ratified by the US Senate if it were submitted to that body.

I broke off the conversation at this point as the translation had ended and a new speaker took the floor. He returned to his seat around the Council table still rather red.

Later, I understand, he spoke to Wadsworth to indicate concern at what he considered was a misinterpretation by me of his intentions. He claims not to have advocated seating the Chinese Communists now, or in the foreseeable future, unless and until they have purged themselves of aggression. He also stressed to Jerry the differences between a "good-boys" club and a universal organization.

Memorandum by the United States Representative at the United Nations (Lodge) to the Secretary of State

[NEW YORK,] March 30, 1954.

1. It is of the highest importance to reach another agreement with the British for postponing the question of Chinese Representation to the United Nations and I hope that such an agreement will be reached.

2. In view of the Geneva Conference,<sup>1</sup> however, and the recent remarks of Jebb, Hammarskjold, Prime Minister St. Laurent, and Pearson, new elements have been brought into this situation which raise a new doubt as to whether an agreement for postponement can be reached.

3. We must, therefore, be ready for an attempt to raise the main question at the next General Assembly and we must be able to debate the issue on its substantive points and meet it head on.

4. United States opposition to seating the Chinese communists is a matter of the utmost necessity. Admission of Red China would be a blow of major proportions to public confidence in our U.S. Administration. Apart from the fact that U.S. public opinion and the U.S. Congress is overwhelmingly opposed to it, there are two other reasons, relating particularly to the United Nations, which must be controlling:

A. To seat the Chinese communists would be to give formal sanction to a basic change in the nature of the United Nations. The United Nations Charter was based on the moral concept of an organization of peace-loving nations. This, of course, would be completely flouted by deliberately admitting a government which, at the time of admission, flagrantly advocates the use of war and aggression as an instrument of its national policy. The fact that the Soviet Union also believes in using aggression as an instrument of its national policy and that the Soviet Union is a member, is, of course, no argument whatever for seating the Chinese communists. For one thing, two wrongs don't make a right and for another, the United States would never have favored having the Soviet Union a member in 1945 if the truth about the Soviet Union had been known at that time. To change the United Nations from an organization devoted to maintaining peace into a "continuing diplomatic conference", to use Hammarskjöld's phrase, or into a group of opportunistic political adventurers, is a change of such magnitude that it should only be accomplished by a revision of the Charter and it is not hard to imagine how such an attempt to revise the Charter would fare when it came up for ratification by a  $\frac{2}{3}$ 's vote of the United States' Senate.

B. The United Nations at present is a marvelous vehicle for organizing the free world coalition in case World War III should ever come. It is only prudent to assume that World War III is a distinct likelihood, provided that our assumptions do not cause us to do things which will accelerate the likelihood of World War III. As regards the admission of the Chinese communists, there is no doubt whatever that their admission would seriously weaken the great potential of persuasion and voluntary action which exists in the United Nations and which would play a tremendous part in getting all kinds of support—moral, material and in manpower—in case World War III should come. If we have reached the stage in world affairs where it is either we or they—and prudent statesmanship must assume that this is the case—it would be folly to weaken and vitiate this great potential organ for organizing the free world in case of war.

5. The following steps should be undertaken in anticipation of an attempt to bring the matter up at the Ninth General Assembly:

A. There should be a series of carefully planned dinners, receptions and other entertainments now so as to establish friendly feelings and good personal relationships at a time when it does not appear that we want anything out of anybody. I have started such a program.

B. If the matter is brought up in Plenary Session, I would seek to have it referred to a committee, either the ad hoc Political Committee, Committee 1 or any other appropriate group.

C. In this committee, I would plan to deliver several full-length speeches, spaced several days apart so as to take fullest advantage of the opportunity to answer pro-Red arguments and with an eye to adequate press coverage. Subjects for these speeches might be generally grouped as follows:

- (a) Direct aggression in Korea—verdict of GA
- (b) Indirect aggression in Indochina—participation on Red Side at Geneva
- (c) Maltreatment of foreign nations—following communist practices
- (d) Enslavement of Chinese people—following communist practice
- (e) Expansionism—Tibet, Mongolia, North Korea
- (f) Subservience to Moscow, alien rule, etc.

(g) Violation of international agreements—Korean Armistice, Geneva Conventions re POWs

(h) The greatness of Chinese culture and the excellence of U.S.-Chinese relations in the past

(i) Conclusion on essential nature of United Nations—an organization with a moral purpose or a mere continuing diplomatic conference?

D. In addition to the campaign of speeches and of close political liaison with our allies, in order to get out the largest possible anti-communist vote, I would also insist that the subject come under the heading of "Important Question" for the purpose of requiring a  $\frac{2}{3}$  vote in the Assembly in the event we should lose in committee.

6. The above plan is originally designed for Ninth GA use, if necessary. On the other hand, should we find ourselves in a major campaign on the subject in the Economic and Social Council this summer, or in any of the other Councils, Commissions or Committees of the UN that may meet between now and next September, a selection of this material can be used by me or the regular United States Representative on such body. Above all, we must keep and be kept current with our Western European allies, the Commonwealth and all others who have heretofore indicated support for denying Red Chinese membership.

7. We would probably win with this program, but we would certainly retain the confidence of U.S. public opinion in ourselves if we lost. We must square our jaw and make a last ditch fight.

8. Recommended action:

(a) An agreement with the British to postpone the question should be obtained.

(b) The question of admitting Red China to the United Nations should not even be discussed in Geneva. We should try to get the British and the French lined up ahead of time to fight off any attempt to bring it up in Geneva. It is not a matter concerning which we can even talk at all.

(c) The possibility of changing policy on trade between the East and the West should be very carefully studied to see whether the view of the previous administration did not fail to take into account certain advantages which we can derive from East-West trade.<sup>2</sup> If we determine that a new type of East-West trade could be advantageous to us, it would be good tactics for us to propose it ourselves so as to show the neutralists in this world that we are not rigid.

(d) If we make concessions to the British viewpoint on East-West trade, we should receive, as a minimum, assurances of support on the issue of Chinese representation.

(e) If the Chinese communists abandon their aggressive tactics in Korea and Indochina, there will be a demand here in the United Nations to alter the United Nations embargo. Consideration should be given to the United States sponsoring a resolution to revise the United Nations embargo so that we could control the procedure ourselves and, as a quid pro quo, obtain support of our position on Chinese representation. Our own embargo is, of course, a different matter.

Subject: Geneva Conference; Communist Chinese Representation in the United Nations

In a conversation this noon at the UN Headquarters, Ambassador von Balluseck stated his opinion that it would be extremely difficult to achieve anything at the Geneva Conference; that his Government was not at all anxious to participate, but felt that they should.

Pursuing the subject in a friendly and understanding manner, he thought it a pity that the United States position on Red Chinese UN membership had to be so inflexible. He explained this by giving his opinion that Red China, together with other Communist countries at the Conference, might well come forward with a proposition whereby they would guarantee to cease aggression or any kind of intervention in Korea and Indo China as a price for admittance to the United Nations. In such a situation, he believed, the United States would be put in a position of a flat refusal in the face of an apparently bona fide offer to take a dramatic stride toward peace in the Far East.

He said he realized the force and quality of American public opinion, and that it would take a "politically untouchable" person to start the ball rolling toward a conditioning of public and Congressional opinion toward what he considers was an inevitable acceptance of the Peiping regime as the de facto government of China.

I pointed out that the American people would hesitate to place great faith in guaranties offered by the Peiping Government, and that neither the American people nor the Congress could be expected to soften their position toward the Chinese Communists merely on the ground that they had offered such guaranties. He admitted the validity of the "deeds not words" argument, but held to his original position that it was a pity that the United States had taken such a rigid stand. He intimated that in the face of apparently bona fide assurances on the part of the Chinese Communists and the Soviets, it would be extremely difficult for public opinion in Europe to understand our position.

Subject: Chinese Representation Question in the Security Council under Soviet Chairmanship.

The USSR (Vishinsky) has the chairmanship of the Security Council for the month of April and it is accordingly possible that the USSR may raise the Chinese representation issue at the Security Council meeting next Monday. There should be a safe voting margin to overcome any such Soviet tactics provided there is advance agreement on our side on the counter-measures to be used. UNP has discussed the various possibilities with USUN and has emphasized that consultations should be held today with key delegations, particularly with the British, to ensure an agreed position and to make possible representations here or in London in case of any divergency.

Background information on possible Soviet tactics follows:

In August 1950, during the Korean crisis, the USSR returned to the Security Council to assume the chairmanship. At that time the USSR circulated in advance of the Security Council meeting a provisional agenda which included Chinese representation as a separate item. When the Security Council meeting convened under Malik's chairmanship, he ruled that the Chinese representative was not entitled to sit. His ruling was successfully challenged.

Subsequently, the Security Council decided against including the Soviet proposed item on Chinese representation on the agenda. On the latter vote the United Kingdom abstained. This vote preceded agreement on the moratorium arrangement.

Possible Soviet tactics include the following:

(1) Ruling by the Chair that Tsiang is not entitled to his seat: This should be voted down and we should be able to count on wide support because of the clearly arbitrary nature of such a ruling.

(2) Proposal of an agenda item: This proposal also should be voted down. The United Kingdom might suggest that in accordance with the moratorium agreement an effort should be made to postpone discussion of the item rather than vote it down. Inasmuch as, however, the Security Council has no formal session but meets throughout the year upon call the moratorium formula would not be applicable and we would hope that the United Kingdom would agree with us in a straight negative vote.

(3) A formal statement for the record of the Soviet position with regard to Tsiang's status: This would be met by a formal statement by Ambassador Lodge and, we would hope, by others.

(4) Refusal by the Chair to recognize Tsiang in his official capacity (Vishinsky will probably call on Tsiang by name and not as the representative of the Republic of China.): Tactics on this may be left to Ambassador Lodge. Our experience in challenging a similar form of address by a Committee Chairman at the last G.A. led to an involved and bitter wrangle which did not enhance the status of the Chinese representative. If Vishinsky overplays this tactic, however, it may become desirable to meet it in some way.

(5) A statement by the Chair after a vote has been taken that the Chinese vote cannot be counted because it is illegal: There have been some indications that the Soviet Union may be returning to its position, often expressed before, that proceedings of the Security Council are illegal if participated in by the Chinese representative. Tactics in meeting this situation will have to be left to Ambassador Lodge because it is difficult to predict beforehand the precise turn which Vishinsky may adopt.

A further tactical point involves the desirability of our relying on other members of the Council to take the initiative in some of these tactics.

581. Re Chinese Representation. We must assume that Vyshinsky, as president of the Security Council, will raise the question of Chinese representation at the first possible opportunity and in a way to cause us the maximum amount of embarrassment. The overwhelming magnitude of this question makes it essential that we be thoroughly prepared and that we anticipate all of the various ways in which Vyshinsky can raise the issue and what is the best way for us to meet it.

Two methods which he obviously can use are: (a) to make a ruling that T. F. Tsiang cannot sit and (b) to place an item on the provisional agenda to the same effect. (See Malik's attempts August 1950).

Common sense and regard for truth indicate that this is a substantive question of the most substantial kind. We must be prepared to deal with this issue too.

For all these reasons, it is urgent that I have all the best possible legal advice from Washington. I hope particularly that Stein, Gough and Meeker and anyone else whom you think should participate come to New York at the earliest possible opportunity so as to get this whole thing nailed down.

Subject: Chinese Representation in the Security Council

New York's 581, April 5, mentions some of the possibilities on Chinese representation which may develop in the Security Council under Vishinsky's chairmanship. It concludes with a plea that technical reinforcements be rushed to New York. Len Meeker (L/UNA) and Betty Gough (UNP) flew up this morning. Eric Stein (UNP) who works on the Security Council did not go.

As you know, this whole subject was discussed by phone with USUN by UNP last week (Memorandum to CA, April 2).

It is understood that the paragraph in the telegram beginning "common sense and regard for truth" refers to Ambassador Lodge's intention to use the veto on the Chinese representation question if necessary.

Our voting margin in the Security Council on the Chinese representation question is so large that there should be little cause for concern on that point. If Vishinsky should rule that Tsiang was not entitled to represent China, the ruling undoubtedly would be so phrased as to require our side to come up with seven votes to over-turn it. As the ruling would be so clearly out of order on the part of the chairman, we should be able to count upon support even from those Security Council members which recognize the Chinese Communists. Undoubtedly, however, Vishinsky, who is a connoisseur of tactics in the Security Council, can make the situation very difficult—if he chooses.

In this connection it is interesting to note that Ambassador Lodge, in New York's 571 of April 2,<sup>1</sup> after commenting on the recent affability of Soviet delegates remarked "it is also noteworthy that the Soviet gesture on behalf of the admission of Communist China could not possibly be more perfunctory. They content themselves with a routine statement, never make a motion, or really agitate the thing at all." It is accordingly possible that Vishinsky on Thursday may not in fact make a determined drive to displace Dr. Tsiang but may content himself with a sharp statement for the record and with addressing Dr. Tsiang not as "the representative of China" but as "Mr. Tsiang" or some less pleasant equivalent.

NEW YORK, April 6, 1954—9 p. m.

591. Re: Chinese representation. We met with Dixon, Crosthwaite, and Ramsbotham of UKDel this afternoon to review possible developments when SC meets on April 8 under Vishinsky chairmanship. Discussed two main forms in which Soviets might raise Chinese representation question: (1) ruling by chair that Tsiang not entitled to represent China and (2) motion by Vishinsky as Soviet representative to unseat Tsiang, seat Chinese Communist representative, or both. UK agreed that in event of (1) it would be desirable to challenge Vishinsky's ruling on ground that president lacked authority to make such a ruling to overturn an earlier Council decision approving Dr. Tsiang's credentials. Agreed that this approach should also be followed if Vishinsky gave ruling based on point of order raised by himself as Soviet representative.

UK apprehensive that Soviets instead will follow course (2) above, which would threaten possibility of open split with US on merits of representation question unless moratorium formula can be applied here. UKDel suggested possibility of countering course (2) by motion for simple postponement of discussion under rule 33(5) of SC provisional rules of procedure. Text of motion contemplated by UK would not fix any date for discussion of question, nor would it state that postponement was indefinite or being sine die. However, it would be made clear in statements to Council that postponement was for indefinite period, and motion was therefore within scope of rule 33(5).

It was suggested to Dixon that if postponement motion were put "to postpone . . . indefinitely" he could protect UK position by explaining this did not mean postponement to Greek calends, motion would be squarely within rule and not subject to mischief-making by Vishinsky and would reflect solidarity between US and UK which would be ten-strike for both of us in resisting intensified Soviet efforts to split free-world countries.

Dixon indicated he might make statement that postponement was not to Greek calends but simply for an indefinite period of time without setting a day on which discussion would be taken up. UKDel planned to report to Foreign Office. Dixon believed London would prefer simple postponement.

We raised point as to whether Soviet motion would be in order, since it would not relate to any item on council agenda. UK believed motion could be made without agenda item.

Pending Foreign Office reaction, we expect to continue discussions with UK on procedural points and tactical possibilities re Chinese representation issue in SC. In connection with possible motion by Vishinsky, will explore with UK idea of having motion declared out of order in absence of agenda item, with inclusion of item on agenda being voted down if proposed.

[WASHINGTON,] April 10, 1954.

DEAR CABOT: I have read with interest your memoranda on your recent conversations with Hammarskjold and on the Chinese representation issue generally.<sup>2</sup> We are, of course, in complete agreement on the over-riding importance of maintaining our position on the Chinese representation issue. The evidence now at hand indicates that a sufficient number of UN Members continue to agree with this government that it will not serve the interests of world order to bring into the UN a regime which is a convicted aggressor, which has not purged itself from that aggression, and which continues to promote the use of force in violation of the principles of the Charter. The recent statements of both Jebb and Pearson can be interpreted in substantially these terms. Since there is nothing to show that the Chinese Communists are likely to purge themselves of their aggressive policies, it would not appear that there is any immediate danger of the Chinese Communists getting the seat of China in the UN.

I have definitely in mind the necessity of seeking a further agreement with the UK on Chinese representation in advance of the next Assembly. I am not, however, now able to determine just when it would be most advantageous for me to make this approach. I would hope that agreement on this matter would follow naturally from the Geneva discussions.

We must, of course, be ready to deal with the substance of the Chinese representation problem whenever this is necessary. Specific tactics at the Assembly, such as the matter of committee referral, will, of course, have to depend upon the form in which the question is raised, the general tactical situation prevailing at the time and the degree of support for a particular procedure, as ascertained through advance consultations.

<sup>1</sup> Drafted by Gough of the Office of UN Political and Security Affairs and concurred in by the Director of that Office (Popper); cleared with the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs, the Bureau of European Affairs, and the Economic Defense Staff of the Office of Economic Defense and Trade Policy.

Whether we would invoke the two-thirds voting requirement would depend upon the substance of the action proposed. For example, two proposals might be before the Assembly, one providing for the seating of the representatives of the Government of the Republic of China and the other for the seating of representatives of the Chinese Communist regime. If the Assembly decided that a two-thirds vote were required on this matter, the result could be that no representative would be seated for China. All of these tactical points will need to be carefully studied so that we will be clear as to the precise course we should pursue in various eventualities with a view to keeping the China we recognize in the UN and the Chinese Communists out. Mr. Key will see that this is done.

With respect to the Geneva Conference, in my speech of March 29 before the Overseas Press Club, I made clear to our allies and to our enemies, beyond the possibility of any misunderstanding, that this Government will not trade commitments for promises in respect, in particular, of recognition of the Chinese Communist regime and Chinese representation.

As to the embargo against Communist China, as you indicate there can be no question of lifting the embargo so long as the Chinese Communists continue their aggressive policies. In the recent Stassen talks, the UK and France reaffirmed their agreement with us on this point. If the millennium arrives and the Chinese Communists change their ways, we will, of course, have to review our attitude on the embargo in the context of our general Far Eastern policy. However, I doubt that in these circumstances it would be productive to attempt to trade Chinese representation against the lifting of the embargo, since the position of a crucial number of UN Members on both questions presumably obtains only so long as the Chinese Communists continue to behave like international bandits.

At the direction of the President the National Security Council conducted last year an intensive review of the policy this Administration inherited on East-West trade. In a nutshell, the Council concluded that the basic policy and objectives of the security trade control program should be maintained, but that the strategic lists should be re-examined with a view to determining, on the basis of stricter criteria, those commodities and services which would not contribute significantly to the war potential of the Soviet bloc, and which, therefore, might be eliminated from control. This review does not include trade with Communist China. The UK also conducted a review of its policy and forwarded proposals to us this past February which revealed a basic difference between us on the criteria to be used in the review of the strategic lists. The recent discussions of Governor Stassen with the British and French have happily resulted in an agreed decision concerning the criteria for an orderly multilateral review of the strategic lists. This review will naturally take a considerable time. It will be conducted solely on the basis of the agreed criteria and purely technical considerations. I am sure that you will agree that in the circumstances it would not have been practicable to have injected any extraneous issue into the negotiations with the UK and the French on East-West trade. Quite apart from this, however, I am most dubious about using Chinese representation as a bargaining point. I have no doubt that if we did so others would quickly turn the tables and try to extract fundamental concessions from us on all kinds of issues, in return for their continued support of our position on Chinese representation.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN FOSTER DULLES

Subject: Netherlands Position on Chinese Representation

The Hague's 1106, April 22,<sup>1</sup> reports that the Dutch Government intends "to reprimand Von Balluseck, Dutch representative to the UN, for his public advocacy in New York of Chinese Communist admission to the UN." The telegram adds that the Balluseck statement was not only completely unauthorized but also contrary to the views of the Netherlands Government.

Comment: I have no recollection of any conspicuous statement recently by Von Balluseck on Chinese representation, nor has EUR. UNP has a vague recollection that he may have said something a month or so ago. The Netherlands normally goes along with the moratorium arrangement.

Although there are several possible explanations for the Netherlands approach to our Embassy, one consideration may be related to the Netherlands Government's interest in obtaining the GA presidency<sup>2</sup> and the seat on ECOSOC. The Netherlands may also have wished to remove any possible misapprehensions concerning their position on Chinese representation on the eve of the Geneva Conference.

This poll shows that United Kingdom opinion in favor of the admission of Communist China to the United Nations has declined from 52% in 1953 to 45% in 1954.

I think this trend is heartening news which should be helpful to us in getting a common front with the United Kingdom against the admission of Communist China.

Could you let me know what our present timetable is on discussions with the British for continuing the moratorium on this matter? If we have a resumed session or special session on Indochina, do you expect the question of Chinese Representation to come up and if so how do we plan to deal with it?

[WASHINGTON,] June 16, 1954.

DEAR CABOT: Your letter of May 26 on Chinese representation raises the question whether the matter will arise at a resumed or special session of the General Assembly and how to handle it; and concerning our timetable for discussions with the British on continuing the moratorium.

It seems by no means certain that the Soviets will formally raise the Chinese representation issue at a resumed or special session held in the immediate future, although they will undoubtedly state their position for the record. They might instead direct their efforts toward securing hearings for the Chinese communists, the Vietminh and the phantom Communist regimes of Laos and Cambodia. In any event, it seems obvious that the moratorium formula should be held ready for such a meeting and you may remember that a formula for a resumed session was agreed upon with the British last January. In pursuance of a general discussion between the Secretary and Sir Roger Makins in anticipation of a possible session on Korea, a text was agreed upon as follows:

"The General Assembly decides to postpone for the duration of the second part of the eighth regular session consideration of all proposals to exclude the representatives of the Government of the Republic of China and to seat representatives of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China."

Copies of the relevant memoranda were sent to USUN in January. If we decide upon a resumed session, it should merely be necessary as a formality to recheck this formula with the UK Delegation in New York.

If a special session is held this formula would be varied only slightly. It would read: "postpone for the duration of the third special session", etc. This form of words has not been discussed with the British but they should have no difficulty with it. As you know, the problem in reaching agreement with the UK concerning regular General Assembly sessions has been their reluctance to commit themselves for a long period of time. Since a special session would presumably not last more than a week or two the UK should accept postponement for the duration of such a session.

As soon as negotiations on the SC phase have been completed and firm agreement has been reached on the convening of the GA and the kind of a session to hold, we should discuss with the UK delegation the precise language of the formula and details of tactics on the Chinese representation issue.

The other problem you mention concerns the reaching of an agreement with the UK concerning the longer range handling of the Chinese representation problem. Obviously this must be done some time this summer. The Department is now considering whether this question should be brought up for discussion during the Churchill-Eden visit which has just been announced for the weekend of June 26-27. I shall let you know as soon as our thinking here on the matter of timing has progressed a little further.

I had not seen the recent poll of the British Institute of Public Opinion, and I am glad you drew it to my attention. It is indeed encouraging that the May poll shows a decline in the sentiment in favor of seating the Chinese Communists.

Sincerely yours,

DAVID MCK. KEY

Subject: Churchill-Eden Visit—"Seating of Communist China in the US."

Participants:	United States	United Kingdom
	Secretary	Mr. Eden
	General Smith	Amb. Makins
	Mr. Merchant	Sir H. Caccia
	Amb. Aldrich	Mr. Allen
	Mr. MacArthur	Mr. Scott
	Mr. Bowie	Mr. Joy
	Mr. Robertson
	Mr. Sturm
	Mr. Gilman

After coming to agreement on certain language changes in the minutes on Germany, Southeast Asia and Egypt, and the reply to the French Government on Indochina, the following discussion took place.

Mr. Eden said he realized that this subject was dynamite for the United States but at the same time it would be extremely difficult for the British Government to hold out against the popular opinion in that country. He said that he could not give an unequivocal pledge that the question would not come up but that he would do everything possible to keep it from becoming a problem for us.

Mr. Dulles replied that admission of Communist China into the United Nations at this time was an impossibility for us. Trade also was a bad problem but it did not have the same degree of gravity as

The subject-title of the memorandum was "Seating of Communist China in the UN". On the previous day, Saturday, June 26, at a meeting in the President's office, Eisenhower and Churchill had exchanged views about Communist China:

"They discussed Red China. Of admittance to the UN, Churchill said, "My line about recognition is that there has got to be peace first." The President said that if they would withdraw to their own borders, release our prisoners, and say they would observe propriety in international relationships, he would consider using his influence to obtain recognition." (Eisenhower Library, Eisenhower papers, Whitman file, "Whitman Diary, Saturday, June 26, 1954")

U.N. admission. If Communist China were admitted to the UN Mr. Dulles made it clear that it would probably be impossible to keep Congress from demanding U.S. withdrawal, including U.S. financial support. He said he did not think he could exaggerate the difficulties for us inherent in such a proposal. He noted that although it had been attributed to him, he had never said that this was our policy under all conditions at all times. However, the Security of the Pacific Ocean was of vital national importance. The Chinese Communists are constantly challenging that position. So long as the Chinese Communist regime continues its campaign of venom against the United States, we would have to oppose any policy that would add to its power. If and when the Chinese Communists became decent and respectable in deeds, not just in words, then it would be time for us to take another look at the situation.

Mr. Dulles said that he had often thought of the desirability of altering the structure of the United Nations so that permanent members of the Security Council could be changed from time to time. Although the US originated the idea of China becoming one of the permanent members, Mr. Dulles believed this concept was ill-advised. Certainly under present conditions a country like India would be a more suitable permanent member than China. Prime Minister Churchill had said to Mr. Dulles that he could well understand that the US was not prepared to abandon Nationalist China, which had long been their loyal ally. The Prime Minister had indicated that consideration might be given to the possibility of having two Chinas in the General Assembly. He did not feel that the Nationalist Government rated membership in the Security Council.

Mr. Eden stated that the U.K. and some of the Commonwealth and European countries felt that the longer Red China was kept out of the United Nations the more difficult the world situation would be.

The Secretary suggested that Mr. Eden let his imagination play upon the problem of how the United Nations Charter could be revised, changing conditions for membership in the Security [Council]. The Secretary felt that perhaps the organization should have no permanent members or at least not permanent in the sense of perpetuity. Both Mr. Eden and the Secretary thought Russia would be opposed to any change.

MEMORANDUM OF CONVERSATION WITH SENATOR KNOWLAND

Senator Knowland said he wanted to talk with me about the China situation and the possibility of having some testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee on the legal aspects of Chinese Communist admission, e.g., whether it took a two-thirds Assembly vote and whether it was veto-able in the Security Council. He asked whether Cabot Lodge was qualified to testify on this matter. I said that while undoubtedly he could be so qualified, the legal work and policy decisions were primarily taken in the State Department.

I discussed the probable British position and indicated that there was at least some hope that the British would go along with us in trying to postpone the issue at the next United Nations Assembly. I said that I thought that the recent despatches from London probably did not reflect the talks which Churchill and Eden had had with the President and me because Churchill and Eden were not yet back in London.

Senator Knowland referred to his recent proposals on China and said that they had received overwhelming support—over 90% favorable. I said that I saw no objection to Congressional action to make clear that the Senate took this matter very seriously. I did question, however, the desirability of a threat to cut off our payment of expenses to the United Nations as long as we were a member. I said this would itself be a violation of the Charter, and that our case against the Chinese Communists would be much better if we came into the United Nations with clean hands. Senator Knowland said he recognized that so long as we were a member we would have to pay a share of the expenses and that he would not try to prevent this. I said that it would, of course, be entirely possible to raise the question of continuing U.S. membership in the United Nations, and I discussed with him the Charter understanding with reference to withdrawals. I gave him a copy of a portion of a memorandum on this point, which I had dictated the day before.<sup>1</sup> It referred to the hearings before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in 1945.

[Here follows a brief discussion concerning United States representation at Geneva “for the further development of the Indochina phase of the Conference”.]

The Senator in leaving expressed the hope that he and I could keep closer together and have informal talks from time to time, perhaps in

6. Deptel 3, July 6. I found McIntosh greatly disturbed at Webb's statement which McIntosh said does not reflect government's policy and was not cleared in advance with Cabinet or Prime Min. Added Webb went entirely too far and that inconceivable New Zealand would vote against US on question admission Communist China to UN. However, he believes, as statement undoubtedly reflects Webb's sincere personal conviction, it very improbable Webb could be induced change his words publicly.

McIntosh said (asking not to be quoted on this point) New Zealand policy this question well expressed in editorial yesterday's Evening Post reading in part as follows :

"Mr. Webb spoke, in blunt rather than diplomatic terms, of driving a wedge between Russia and China. We must beware also that a sharp wedge is not driven into the accord of the Western nations. We do not suppose for a moment that Mr. Webb is insensible of this danger. His advocacy of admission of China to the United Nations was not a commitment to action, but—and it is important to note the difference—a statement that the time was coming for reconsideration of present policy. We are inclined to agree, but with the definite proviso that, in their consideration, we shall attach full weight to the maintenance of Western accord and not gamble heavily on the prospect of Communist division.”

McIntosh at loss to know what action government can or will take clear up this muddle, but feels this incident might well result in much closer control New Zealand foreign policy by Cabinet.

8. Embtel 6, July 8. Foreign Minister Webb, concluding foreign affairs debate in Parliament last night, noted his previous remarks on seating Chinese Communists UN had been subject considerable comment abroad, and said he proposed clarify his position. His subsequent remarks, however, left position still unclear. Without retracting previous statements, he did qualify them to some extent by saying that he felt this problem cannot be dismissed without serious consideration, and that it should be resolved by patient negotiation.

McIntosh, commenting to me on Webb's remarks, said he thought they had been to some extent helpful in making it clear that Webb does not necessarily favor immediate action to seat Chinese Communists but realizes that there are many problems to be considered and solved before such action taken. McIntosh said he was certain no clear statement of New Zealand Government's policy on this question would be issued. The situation would be left where it is, as any public statement by Prime Minister which would repudiate Webb would undoubtedly cause latter's resignation which Prime Minister definitely unwilling to risk view Webb's key position in government. McIntosh

McIntosh indicated he strongly hopes no efforts will be made at this time to force official clarification New Zealand Government's position this issue. This would be "calamitous" as it would put Prime Minister in impossible position.

*Memorandum by the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for

[WASHINGTON,] July 12, 1954.

Subject: Exposition of United States Position on Admitting Communist China to the United Nations

One of the most recent manifestations of increasing sentiment among certain governments for the seating of the Peiping Regime in the United Nations was the statement in the New Zealand Parliament by Foreign Minister T. Clifton Webb that the Chinese Communist delegation should be seated "in an endeavor to drive a diplomatic wedge between Russia and Red China." His position seems to be that the Government of so many people cannot indefinitely be kept out of the United Nations; that opposition to it in the United States is "emotional" and that the seating of the Peiping Government in the United Nations is necessary in order to "reduce international tension." Some of this argumentation was also used by Mr. Eden during his recent visit.

In thinking about the problems thus posed for us, Mr. Outerbridge Horsey of BNA developed a possible tactic which I think has great merit and which I submit for your consideration.

He suggests that a paper be prepared stating the substance of our position on this matter in forceful terms—not only on legal and moral grounds, but on the grounds of practical security as well. It would point out, among other things, the effect of such a move on other countries in the area, on the status of Formosa and on the overseas Chinese colonies. It would include a cogent rebuttal of the "reduce international tension" line and put the trade argument in practical and realistic perspective. Such a paper could be handed by some of our

Missions to certain Governments with a request for comments in detail on the substance of our position. The idea would be to force them to think through their own positions and put them more on the spot than we do by more informal (and generalized) oral appeals for support.

In discussing this, some fear was expressed that a request for comments might tend to "freeze" the position of the Governments thus addressed. This, together with the question of which Governments should be addressed, is a tactical matter which should be examined in due course. We have found general agreement thus far that the principle of such a paper so used is sound. We also believe that, properly handled, the operation could be very productive in terms of public affairs. This aspect, of course, would have to be handled most carefully after a thorough examination of all possible ramifications.

38. Re Chinese representation. Tsiang (China) raised with Ross today question of cooperation between two delegates in handling Chinese representation issue. He is not too much concerned re resumed session, but raised following points with reference to 9th GA:

1. Under the rules and past practice, outgoing president (in this case Madame Pandit) nominates credentials committee, although secretariat plays a substantial role in consultation with principal delegates in making up list of nominees. Tsiang stressed crucial importance of acceptable list of nominees at 9th session. He is mistrustful of Pandit and he is aware of disadvantages of any challenge of undesirable list of nominees she might propose.

2. Tsiang felt that postponement formula adopted at 8th session (only until end of calendar year 1953) was retrogressive compared with formula on previous occasions. He pressed quite strongly for idea of voting down any Soviet or India substantive proposal to unseat nationalist representatives or seat Communist representatives. He asked whether we could not persuade UK at least to abstain if such substantive proposal were pressed to vote. He said they could explain their abstention (or negative vote) on grounds stated by Churchill on Monday. Tsiang has made analysis of past voting in UN on Chinese representation issue and will provide us with copy thereof. He is aware that vote on substantive issue would probably not be as favorable as vote on postponement. He is also aware that public generally would be more conscious of size of vote than precise formulation on which vote was taken. He feels we are probably best judges of psychological and political effects of smaller vote on substantive issue. It is our impression that Tsiang is under instruction to press for vote on substantive issue but he at least does not seem strongly convinced this is best way of handling matter.

3. Tsiang is under instruction to lobby actively with all delegates. He asked our active help with following two lists:

- a. Ethiopia, Liberia, Luxembourg, Saudi Arabia, Yemen;
- b. Afghanistan, Denmark, Israel, Netherlands, Pakistan, Iceland, Norway, Sweden.

The first list (a) represents countries more or less favorably inclined but with whom he has no contact. The second list (b) represents countries which recognize Chinese Communists and with whom he does not feel he would have any influence. Tsiang also expressed a certain amount of confidence in support of Egypt and Iraq but he is worried concerning other Arabs. He thought that two or three of our Latin friends (e.g. Brazil) might be very helpful in enlisting support of these other Arabs.

Tsiang was assured that we wanted to work very closely and cooperatively with him. Any comments or instructions Department may have concerning foregoing would be appreciated.

WASHINGTON, July 16, 1954.

CA-142. Re Chinese representation (urtel 33).

1. Re UKUN giving definite answer on formula for resumed session, USUN will wish to bear in mind that last January UK Embassy official informed Department that this formula "entirely agreeable" to Foreign Office. In light this and recent Churchill statement that UK would not press for change in Chinese representation at this moment UKUN should have no objection formula.

2. We assume it will be necessary for Credentials Committee meet since some new representatives certain to be accredited, e.g., Guatemala.

3. We are puzzled by UK query whether Credentials Committee would again be seized with proposals made by India at first part eighth session and put on ice. We do not recall India made any formal proposals on this subject. Major developments in GA last fall were as follows:

(a) At opening plenary: (1) on point of order USSR submitted proposal under which GA would "consider it necessary" that representatives appointed by Chinese Communist regime should take "lawful" seat of China in General Assembly and other organs of UN; (2) US moved that GA postpone for duration eighth session in current year consideration of all proposals to exclude representatives of Government of Republic of China and to seat Chinese Communists; (3) US moved under rule 91 that US proposal be put vote first and this procedural motion adopted by GA; (4) US postponement proposal then adopted; and (5) GA adopted Thai motion under rule 91 that Soviet proposal should not be voted upon.

(b) In his general debate speech on September 28 Menon said in substance above procedure incorrect; matter should have been considered as credentials problem and in first instance by Credentials Committee; he would challenge Chinese credentials when report Credentials Committee considered.

(c) This report considered following day. As in Credentials Committee USSR moved Chinese credentials be declared invalid; President ruled this motion out of order in absence formal motion under rule 82 to reconsider September 15 decision; President's ruling not challenged. Menon reiterated view September 15 procedure incorrect and stated India would vote for Credentials Report except part on China since India did not accept that Chinese credentials had been issued by Head of State or Minister for Foreign Affairs of China as required by rule 27. First report Credentials Committee (covering Chinese and most other delegations) then put to vote as whole and approved.

3. [4] Following occur to us as principal ways in which Chinese representation issue might be raised at resumed session :

(a) Soviet motion in Credentials Committee that Chinese credentials be declared invalid. In this event we would immediately state that this raises substance Chinese representation issue and move that Committee recommend to GA that it postpone for duration second part of eighth regular session consideration of all proposals to exclude representatives of the Government of Republic of China and seat Chinese Communists. Unless Chair (Munro) prepared suggest or rule that our postponement motion be put vote first we would formally so move under rule 91. After adoption our motion we would move under same rule that Soviet proposal not be voted upon (unless Chair willing rule this sense). Same routine would be followed in plenary when Credentials Committee report considered. It would of course not be necessary in plenary secure priority in vote for postponement proposal since Committee resolution would automatically have priority.

If question status Chinese credentials raised we would take position that it is unnecessary for credentials be approved; credentials Chinese representatives attending resumed session were approved at first part eighth session.

(b) Alternatively Chinese representation issue may be raised on point of order, possibly at opening plenary meeting. Soviets might submit proposal along lines their proposal of last September. Menon might challenge seating of Chinese and request under rule 29 his challenge be referred Credentials Committee. President might put latter procedural question to GA or might rule that such proposals must in first instance be considered by Credentials Committee.

If this matter put to GA our present thinking is we should vote against referral to Credentials Committee on ground issue raised by Soviet [or Indian] <sup>1</sup> proposal constitutes important political question of first magnitude and not simple credentials question; this already recognized by GA in resolution 396 (V) in which GA stated inter alia that precisely this type of issue "should be considered in the light of the Purposes and Principles of the Charter"; such questions should be considered in plenary or in First Committee. We think best course at resumed session is direct plenary consideration.

If President rules matter should be referred Credentials Committee we could formally challenge ruling on above grounds. Alternatively, we could acquiesce in referral Credentials Committee but in order safeguard our position for future state for record our views along above lines, making clear we reserve right on some future occasion to propose this question be considered in First Committee or directly in plenary.

If question is not referred Credentials Committee and is dealt with directly in plenary, we would submit our postponement proposal and would take steps ensure it put vote first and upon its adoption that Soviet proposal not be voted upon, if necessary formally so moving under rule 91 on both points or arranging for another delegation to do so.

2. He then asked what was President Eisenhower's and Department's impression of probable British policy, now that talks completed? He asked to be informed on this point, in confidence, in as much detail as possible. Second, he asked whether we had any indications whether UK would propose Red China's admission to UN or whether it would support resolution this effect which his information indicates India will probably present to GA. He feels votes of members Commonwealth will be very important factors in the voting especially if decision whether or not matter is substantive has to be settled by majority vote. Third, Dr. Yeh emphasized China's desire to collaborate closely with us in this matter and asked that instructions be issued to Ambassador Lodge, as he was sending them to Dr. Tsiang, to coordinate their efforts, which he considered should be done well before GA meeting. He felt there were some areas where China could line up votes, e.g., Thailand, leaving us free to solicit support in areas where its influence most likely to attain success.

Foreign Minister's attitude naturally is that only his government can represent China in UN since only it is legitimate; and second regarding British policy statement confirming Morrison's 1951 declaration of policy, he holds that Red China still flouts every tenet international law, decent conduct and principles and purposes of charter(!) He would obviously like a GA resolution adopted which would settle matter favorably on more permanent basis rather than by postponement of issue as heretofore but appears to realize chances of this are less this year than in past.

46. Your conversation with Tsiang on handling of Chinese representation issue at Ninth GA your 38.

1. Credentials Committee. Slates nominated by previous Presidents were:

a) geographically representative (Since fifth session general pattern has been: Western Europe 1 or 2; Latin America 2; Arab-Asian bloc 2 or 3; Commonwealth 1 or 2; Soviet bloc 1; Great Powers 1, 2 or 3); and

b) have included since 1950 no more than three states which recognize Chinese Communist regime on basis that Nine Member Committee should reflect Assembly sentiment as whole on substance Chinese representation issue and less than one-third GA Members recognize Communist regime.

It is difficult see how Temporary President (Chairman Indian delegation and therefore not necessarily Madame Pandit) this year could advance any plausible justification for nominating slate which departs from these criteria. If criteria are applied it is difficult see how slate could fail include majority states which support us on Chinese representation issue assuming we dispose of matter on basis moratorium formula and assuming there is no unexpected change attitude significant number countries. If criteria not applied and unacceptable slate proposed we would move appropriate amendments or possibly even an alternative slate. Since President's action would have been flagrantly partisan we should have no difficulty obtaining adequate support in GA.

2. Department believes course suggested by Tsiang most unwise. Moratorium arrangement provides basis on which maximum number free world states can act together to keep representatives Government Republic of China seated and Chinese Communists excluded. Even if we could get UK merely abstain in vote on substance, essential in this critical period maintain free world unity whenever possible and particularly on Far Eastern issues. Moreover moratorium arrangement designed keep Chinese Nationalists seated and Chinese Communists excluded throughout whole UN system; certain smaller UN and specialized agency bodies are so composed that there is considerable doubt we could continue achieve our objective without affirmative support UK and certain other states on basis moratorium formula (e.g. ECAFFE) even if it were possible do so in larger bodies like GA.

3. Department requests you continue make representations other delegations on Chinese representation issue, in particular those delegations mentioned by Tsiang. We intend supplement your activities by making representations at Embassies here and at appropriate capitals.

In view great importance this subject, I strongly recommend that we urge French Government to withhold such recognition. 402. Your 359.<sup>1</sup> Notwithstanding your 397 Department concerned possibility French may be considering recognition Communist China. USUN shares this concern USUN 75. Department concurs USUN belief representations should be made French Government in strong terms to withhold recognition and continue oppose seating in UN.

You should seek early appropriate opportunity inform French Government United States earnestly hopes it will continue non-recognition Communist China and support Chinese Nationalist Government in UN and elsewhere. United States position stems from fact Communist China is aggressor and acts in violation all standards international conduct. Any increased diplomatic acceptance of Communist China would directly serve Communist purposes. Anti-Communist forces in Laos Cambodia Vietnam faced with difficult future in view communist penetration already present those areas would undoubtedly be weakened by French recognition Communist China. Important overseas Chinese communities Southeast Asia, already targets large-scale Communist propaganda, would be adversely affected. Thailand Philippines Republic of China among free world's best friends in Far East would be dealt severe blow and Communist elements Burma Indonesia strengthened and emboldened. Result would be important damage French and free nations Far East and gain for Communist orbit all over world.

Mention might be made adverse effect on United States public opinion as to France. You may wish remark United States Government has no reason believe French Government has any intention departing from firm position it has consistently and usefully maintained on this issue since 1950. However these views are set forth to insure that our understanding on this important matter remains complete.

<sup>1</sup> In Paris telegram 359, July 26, the Embassy reiterated the fears of the Chinese Chargé in France (Tuan), already set forth in Paris telegram 283, July 21, that French recognition of the Peking régime was imminent and that "U.S. persuasion only hope forestalling such action." (751G.00/7-2654)

<sup>2</sup> In Paris telegram 397, July 28, the Embassy reported that French Foreign Ministry official Roux "again confirmed today that although possible recognition of Communist China has been advanced by Geneva no action is in prospect at present. He agreed with Embassy that perhaps West is apt to exaggerate importance Chinese attach to diplomatic recognition pointing out that subject was never broached by them at Geneva. Roux expressed further opinion that Peking attention was concentrated on participating in international meetings and acquiring membership in international organizations, particularly U.N. itself, rather than to obtaining diplomatic recognition from those powers who have failed to grant it to date." CONFIDENTIAL      PRIORITY      NEW YORK, July 30, 1954—5 p. m.

100. Re Chinese representation. In preliminary review of ninth GA agenda items with UKDel yesterday, we emphasized Churchill's statement in Parliament on this subject, our assumption that UK is wholly with us on continuation of moratorium in ninth GA and our assumption that overwhelming majority of GA would support us.

Crosthwaite said this was "leaping a stage". The moratorium understanding now in existence between us, he said, applied only to a resumed eighth or special GA session and not necessarily to the ninth. Selwyn Lloyd, he said, had also made a statement in Parliament to the effect that the UK would not force the issue. His statement had not been as fully publicized as Churchill's but should also be considered.

UKDel, Crosthwaite went on, had not yet received instructions as to the handling of this issue in ninth GA, he promised to let us know soon as they did. It is essential in my view that we take initiative and get this question settled with UK right away. In doing so I think we should insist that moratorium agreement apply for full length of ninth session and not be limited to end of calendar year as it was last session.

I am urging this on Dixon today and Department may also wish to take action in London or Washington.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Deputy Under Secretary of State (Murphy)

CONFIDENTIAL

[WASHINGTON,] July 31, 1954.

Participants: Sir Pierson Dixon, UK Representative at the United Nations

Robert Murphy, Deputy Under Secretary of State

At dinner July 31 at the British Embassy, I had opportunity for a long conversation with Sir Pierson Dixon. I inquired what the British position is regarding the question of Red China's admission to the United Nations, remembering that the British moratorium agreement expired December 31, 1953. Dixon said he had not yet received firm instructions but that he felt this question would be a most embarrassing one during the Ninth Session of the General Assembly. He said his personal opinion is that Red China should be admitted. He referred to his participation at San Francisco in 1945, recalling that the British position then was in favor of minimizing Chinese participation, for example, as a permanent member of the Security Council, whereas the United States then seemed to be very eager to build up Chinese participation on a Great Power basis. He referred to the development of events since that time intimating that British prescience in Far Eastern matters has proven more acute than ours. His thinking seems to be along the lines that Red China qualifies for membership under the Charter, but he gagged a little on my question whether Red China could so promptly after Korea qualify under Article 4 as a peace-loving state, able and willing to carry out the obligations of the Charter. He asserted that unless the United Nations is to be universal, as it was originally intended, it may defeat its own purposes.

Dixon also expressed concern at our alleged tendency to use the United Nations as a vehicle in our campaign against communism. I thought at first that he was referring to Cabot Lodge's desire to have the subject of "Communism, the new Colonialism" included in the agenda for the Ninth Session of the General Assembly, but Dixon indicated that that was not specifically in his mind; rather our conduct in the United Nations during the past year when we sought out every occasion to use the machinery of the United Nations in an anti-communist campaign. I told him that I hesitated to use the word naive, but that under all the circumstances which he knew as well as all of us, that sort of attitude at least seemed innocent. Dixon referred to the heavy pressure that HMG would be under in connection with this issue and also to considerable sentiment on the part of other delegations in favor of the admission of Red China. He said that he was aware of the strong and emotional sentiment prevailing in this country on this question and I said that he should be under no illusions regarding the especially strong opposition to it which prevailed in the United States Congress. He said that while he had not been in this country for long, he began to realize how determined this opposition seems to be.

[Here follows discussion of other matters.]

NEW YORK, August 3, 1954—5 p. m.

107. Re Chinese representation: Our telegram 38, July 14; Deptel 46, July 20, mytel 102, July 30. At meeting on ChiRep question yesterday Tsiang (China) told us Chinese Government had open mind on question of substantive vote at Ninth GA versus continuing moratorium formula and that if after our further consideration we believed it desirable continue moratorium agreement and avoid substantive vote for reasons indicated reftels, China would accept this procedure.

We indicated desire continuing close cooperation and informed Tsiang we were moving ahead with consultations other members UN and particularly those on whom he had asked our help. We told him these representations being made in New York, Washington and at foreign capitals.

Tsiang expressed concern over attitude of French who, he felt, may have made bargain with Communists at Geneva. Although he doubted Mendès-France had agreed change French position before coming Ninth GA, he feared bargain may have been entered into for post-General Assembly period.

I suggest this possibility be taken fully into account in preparation our continuing talks with French on Southeast Asian situation.

We indicated confidentially US views being communicated to French Government.

CONFIDENTIAL

NEW YORK, August 6, 1954—7 p. m.

121. Re Chinese representation—slates. In general preliminary discussion of ninth GA items with French and Dutch representatives yesterday and today, we bore down heavily on Chinese representation issue. We indicated very strong opposition on part not only of American Government but also entire American people to admission Chinese Communists, indicating this opposition much stronger now than in previous years. We mentioned Churchill comments to Lodge that admission Chinese Communists "unthinkable" while they are at war with UN.

In conversation with French (Lucet in Hoppenot's absence) we took line any adverse attitude on part our friends would undoubtedly have had effect on American public opinion in regard to items, e.g., North Africa, which would come up on agenda. Lucet said he had no doubt whatever that French would support moratorium arrangement. We emphasized importance establishing this arrangement for duration ninth session and not merely for calendar year. Lucet saw no difficulty in this.

Dutch seem to be strong for continuance moratorium arrangement, so far as delegation here is concerned, for duration of session.
