dition was bad enough. They could also claim that the West had given to the Arab world Israel and the refugees. Mr. Blaustein said he understood from the Ambassador that the Syrians had turned down Point IV.3 Mr. Jones replied that that was indeed the case. There were several factors which had a bearing on the matter: (1) Israel slowness in complying with SC resolution of May 18 and (2) Syrian discouragement because we had allocated $23.5 million for Israel and only $23.5 million for all the Arab states. These facts, plus a weak Syrian government, had resulted in the rejection of Point IV. Mr. Blaustein said it was his view that the feudal landowners didn't want Point IV and the French business groups were also afraid of it. He had told the Egyptian Ambassador that nations were like individuals. There were times when you had to be realistic. Britain had made mistakes by moving too slowly in the area, and Egypt should profit by the example and do something to make peace. He told the Ambassador that if Israel were going to collapse, the Egyptian policy of watchful waiting was sufficient, but Israel was not going to collapse. The fact that certain American senators and representatives were getting behind a bill for grant-aid to Israel showed that Israel is supported by American public opinion-not only by American Jews. The Egyptian Ambassador said that Communism was a great menace, and inquired whether Israel would be willing to join an Arab bloc against Communism, Mr. Blaustein said he didn't know, but it was a good idea.

I said that I thought Israel would cooperate with the West, as well as with the Arabs. Mr. Blaustein inquired whether such cooperation would be within the framework of the Atlantic Pact. I said I didn't think so, but that we would be happy to encourage any regional grouping of this sort.

Mr. Blaustein said he had suggested that the Egyptian Ambassador meet Ambassador Eban at his (Blaustein's) home in Baltimore. The Egyptian Ambassador, however, had replied that he would have to get the approval of his government for such a meeting. Mr. Blaustein had also told the Egyptian Ambassador that there were basically no problems between Israel and Egypt. The Ambassador said that Egypt wanted peace, and Mr. Blaustein requested the Ambassador to talk to his government about the matter.

I said that if this would work it would be a good thing, but that we had had previous experience in this problem: In 1949, we had acted as intermediary between Egypt and Israel in connection with the Gaza Strip. We had thought it would be an extremely constructive step if Israel could have taken over the Gaza Strip and at the same time assume full responsibility for the inhabitants and refugees there. However, the Egyptians had refused to negotiate on the subject. While we are not trying to impose peace, we want it nonetheless.

However, we do not think any Egyptian government would make peace at this time. The Arabs feel that they would not get anything from Israel, so they do not understand why they should make peace and give up their policy of noncooperation and no trade. Mr. Blaustein said that Ben-Gurion had told him that arrangements could be worked out with the Egyptians to save face all around. I said that a small offer at this juncture, but one outside the context of a final settlement, to give up territory, take back refugees, or release blocked Arab accounts might be helpful in bringing about the final objective. Mr. Blaustein wondered whether it really would be helpful, and referred to the Israel offer to take back 100,000 refugees. I said that when the offer was made we had urged the Λrabs to consider it.

Mr. Blaustein said that the Egyptian Ambassador had told him to tell Eban to stop border incidents. I said that we didn't wish to say who was to blame, but the Israelis had refused to accept the rulings of the head UN man in Palestine and most of the incidents on the Syrian border had taken place after that. I said that Eban had taken the entire Huleh incident too hard and too personally, and had really made things more difficult by his insistence and subjectivity.

Mr. Blaustein said that he would ask the Egyptian Ambassador over to his house in a couple weeks, and suggested that I come along too. I told him that this would put the matter in an entirely different light so far as the Ambassador was concerned; that it would be better if Mr. Blaustein saw the Ambassador by himself.

Mr. Blaustein then mentioned the problem of the Iraqi Jews, particularly of Iraqi Jews who were abroad and who had property in Iraq. He felt that these men were treated unfairly if their assets were frozen or confiscated. I said I thought this was being cleared up. I mentioned, with regard to the immigration into Israel, that Mr. Kaplan, Minister of Finance, had mentioned the possibility of mass emigration from Iran. I said it was one thing to take Jews from all over the world who were in distress, but it was another matter entirely to attempt to create circumstances which would stimulate immigration of Jews from areas where they were living in peace. Mr. Blaustein agreed with me in this, and said that Ben-Gurion's reference to a 4,000,000 population in Israel was fantastically large.

Tel Aviv, June 12, 1951-6 p. m.

his knowledge of area and recent tour of whole ME. While here he had interviews with PriMin, FonMin and Shiloah. PriMin postponed trip to Tiberias in order see Hoskins Sunday morning.

Ben Gurion spoke with enthusiasm of his impressions US saying we are not making most of our opportunities acquaint world with achievements. Mentioned TVA and Ford plant as examples US accomplishments which made deep impression on him. As to policy objectives, he said maintenance of peace most important, and reiterated view expressed earlier to asst secy McGhee and Dir of NE Lewis Jones that Israel considers Egypt key to situation. He regards that country leader of Arab nations and one that wld dare change its policy toward Israel. Accordingly he declared it to be his intention to do everything possible persuade Egypt to lead way in making peace. Deplored reactionary nature Arab govts but recognized no time wait for change for better.

Mr. Hoskins stated frankly believed PriMin had exaggerated opinion of Egypt and might find he was leaning on broken reed; wld do better to look to Turkey for cooperation in improving relations with Arabs. Mentioned also Saudi Arabia. Made point Arab countries distrust intentions both Israel and US hence any idea that US in position persuade Arab countries change attitude is unrealistic. We must strive build confidence. PriMin while somewhat disappointed appeared accept the views as coming from a source he respects. He agreed Turkey best friend in ME. Said Abdullah means well but not in hands Pal Arabs and powerless. Although obviously displeased over SC action Huleh controversy, he avoided subject. His manner nevertheless was very cordial throughout interview.

FonMin Sharett expressed disappointment over SC res, but he also did not dwell on subject. Seemed interested some constructive means improve gen situation. Ref his last mtg with Amb Palmer when possibility move toward payment compensation was discussed, Sharett said there are two schools of thought: (1) that compensation powerful factor in inducing Arab countries to make peace and that Israel wld not therefore make any concessions this connection except as part of gen settlement; (2) other school of thought is that Israel shld take initiative in making some payment as evidence sincerity in recognizing obligations and in order create confidence its intentions. He intimated he is ready give latter point of view careful consideration. Seemed responsive to argument that former policy had not produced results and that something needs be done to counteract distrust (he expressed some misgivings lest concessions be interpreted as weakness and desperate move in effort make peace before collapse).

We urge view that such action wld be act of strength which wld improve Israel's moral position here and abroad, particularly in US and Europe. Hoskins suggested it wld be advisable ensure that initial payment is distributed to refugees themselves to have maximum psychological effect.

Justification wld be moral one, namely that Israel recognizes obligation and is discharging it because she regards it right thing to do. FonMin did not reject these ideas but on contrary seemed to be giving them very serious considerations. He did not dwell on difficulties of financing, but remarked that his govt wld have to have some assistance from the UN or other source in meeting such obligations.

likely cover essential need Israel. Inescapable conclusion is that only practicable solution to meet compensation claims lies in possibility internatl contributions to compensation and/or reintegration fund. It is not considered likely that USG or Congress wild ever provide grant funds to pay Arab compensation claims over and above US contribution to reintegration. Dept believes when PRA resettles individual Arab claimants it shid require Arabs waive claims for compensation to extent full value benefits recd.

For claims other Arabs i.e., those not on relief or not awaiting resettlement Dept believes procedures contained in PCC ref document satisfactory. Dept believes possible aid to eventual peace settlement may derive from special negots compensation payment to influential Arab claimants. 4. Possible Political Settlement

Arab States and Israel shid be urged to consider possible unilateral or multilateral non-aggression declarations vis-à-vis each other. Parties to Armistice Agreement might consider fol:

(a) According to MAC greater scope handle current ad hoc problems now hindering estab better day to day relations. Addition polit reps might assist; (b) elimination, partition, reduction, or redelimitation demilitarized zones in light experience which has revealed deficiency present zones as factors for peace; In connection proposals for changes demilitarized zones if Arabs found it politically difficult take initiative alone, PCC might endeavor bring Jordan and Syria simultaneously to negot with Israel on problems of mutual interest such as el-Hamma salient; (c) define armistice lines or segments thereof as de facto national boundaries pending final settlement.

Fol unilateral actions by Israel not connected with Arab quid pro quo might be urged as constituting valuable progress toward Israel Arab peace: (a) opening free zone for Arabs at Haifa; (b) opening corridor for Arab traffic between Jordan and Egypt subject security safeguards; (c) offering to subject output Haifa refinery to internatl control; (d) releasing blocked Arab balances in Israel; (e) offering sealed freight car transit facilities between Lebanon, Egypt and Haifa-Jordan subject security requirements.

Memorandum by the Adviser in the Office of United Nations Economic and Social Affairs (Tomlinson)<sup>1</sup>

CONFIDENTIAL

[Washington,] June 13, 1951.

MINUTES ON CONSULTATIONS WITH AMBASSADOR BLANDFORD CONCERNING THE PALESTINE REFUGEE PROBLEM

(Ambassador Blandford, Mr. Gardiner, Mr. Ludlow, Mr. Tomlinson)

Ambassador Blandford presented for discussion the following three papers:

(1) Reintegration Policy

- (2) Problems in the Turnover of Relief Administration to Local Governments
  - (3) Relationship of Compensation to Reintegration

Reintegration Policy

The group agreed substantially with Ambassador Blandford's views on reintegration policy which, as modified, are set forth below:

1. Reintegration is a process and a program whereby refugees permanently leave a temporary shelter and ration lines and move into houses and become self supporting.

- 2. Reintegration facilities may be occupied by refugees under permanent or temporary arrangements. PRA will receive documentary evidence of the obligations for the value of the facilities turned over to the refugee. Discharge of this obligation will be determined only after the refugee's claim for compensation has been determined.
- 3. Reintegration facilities financed through international assistance shall remain continuously available for refugee use for the duration of the program.

4. Compensation payments due individual refugees shall be used to liquidate their outstanding obligations.

5. Reintegration operations may include:

(a) Purging ration rolls

(b) Transportation to reintegration opportunities

(c) Placement in jobs

(d) Individual loans
(e) Loans to development or cooperative institutions (f) Provision of land, shelter and community facilities

(g) Construction of minor works including access roads, irrigation and drainage ditches, wells and pumping

- 6. Reintegration operations insofar as possible shall be performed by local governments with Agency assistance along the following lines:
  - (a) Suitable audit, inspection and reporting services

(b) Technical assistance (c) Contractual services

(d) Grant or loan of funds

7. Local governments shall be encouraged to establish central facilities for liaison with the Agency, and local reintegration authorities for field operations.

8. Reintegration facilities should not appear conspicuously superior to the prevailing or immediately prospective standard of living of nonrefugees in the area. Within such limitation and economical use of funds, modern methods and equipment should be used to obtain a maximum of health and convenience.

9. Similarly, in the use and development of land for reintegration there should be reasonable progress toward better standards of occupancy and cultivation.

10. The reintegration process and program is heavily dependent upon large scale economic development programs by local governments financed out of their own funds, loans and grants. From one-half to two-thirds of the refugees will be dependent for employment and reintegration opportunities upon such large projects for water control, transportation and industrial development.

Problems in Turnover of Relief Administration to Local Governments

The group recognized that one of the most difficult problems to be faced is the turnover of relief administration to local governments. This policy was strongly advocated by Mr. Clapp and has been a policy for which the Department, as well as certain United States missions, have pressed for for many months. The Agency has also been searching for a suitable method to implement this policy. The following questions prepared by Ambassador Blandford are illustrative of many which have to be faced:

1. Should the Agency undertake formal agreements to finance refugee relief administration by local governments?

2. Should the turnover take place at one time or in stages—for example, education, health, relief administration?

3. Should the terms of financing be on the basis of:

(a) A supplement to the local government's capacity to contribute?

(b) A percentage distribution of total contributions received?

(c) A flat payment based on negotiations?

(d) A fluctuating payment based on refugee relief loan?

4. Should there be a census operation? Conducted by whom?

5. Should the Agency exercise any control over the ration rolls or the distribution of its contribution whether in cash or kind?

6. Should the Agency finance on a declining schedule related to reintegration progress? How is this to be policed?

7. How is relief financing in one country to be related to reintegration progress in another?

8. Shall the Agency utilize the facilities of the Arab League for inter-government negotiations?

9. Should the Agency attempt overall programming and negotiation for the entire refugee population over a period of possibly three vears?

A basic question which is implied above is whether or not local governments can be persuaded to accept this responsibility without a commitment on the part of the Agency or by the major contributing governments to furnish continuing financial support until reintegration has been effected. The group recognized that even if the local governments were to accept administrative responsibility for relief operations, the Agency would still be subject to criticism, possibly even more than at present, because the refugees and the local governments would be in a position to concentrate their fire on the Agency to a greater degree than is the case at present. There is a further basic question of how the Agency can exercise control over reintegration, if it loses control of the official register of refugees.

The group did not come up with any concrete recommendations for handling this matter but recognized that the Agency would need to explore it further and come up with proposals for later consideration.

Relationship of Compensation to Reintegration

The group concerned itself primarily with Ambassador Blandford's suggestion that a study be made of the means by which contributions for the refugee program could be used for a multi-purpose political effect. Basically the contributions for the refugee program should be designed not only to assist in the reintegration of refugees but also in effectively contributing to a political settlement of lasting value. The refugees will not accept the proffer of reintegration facilities financed by the Agency as a liquidation of their claims for compensation from Israel. Israel itself cannot move forward in establishing normal relationships with its Arab neighbors unless it recognizes its obligation for compensation and takes steps toward meeting that obligation.

Would it not therefore be possible for the major contributors to the refugee program to earmark parts of their contributions as loans to Israel, but to be disbursed by the Agency as compensation payments which would be supplemented where necessary by a reintegration grant out of the remainder of the contributions to the Reintegration Fund.2

The group agreed that a proposal along these lines should be fully studied and elaborated with a view to making early recommendations thereon.

Immediate Action

- (a) Ambassador Blandford will seek the agreement of the Advisory Commission on the statement on Reintegration Policy. The statement will then be circulated to many areas for information.
- (b) Ambassador Blandford will further explore the problem of turnover of relief administration with the Advisory Commission and develop proposals for further consideration by the respective governments.
- (c) Intensive work should be done on the study of the relationship between reintegration and compensation with a view to coming up with definitive recommendations by June 22.3
- (d) A draft statement should be prepared for the Advisory Commission to issue in response to the Arab League note on the refugee problem representing the views of the Department. If agreed to by other members of the Advisory Commission, they would clear it with their respective governments so that it would constitute an authoritative reply on behalf of the governments represented on that body.4

UNRWA stated in part:

"Declaration could then be issued as response to Near East views and as opening gun later negotiations relief transfer and reintegration program." (320.2AA/7-1651)

(Mr. Blandford had become Director of the UNRWAPNE shortly after his resignation June 30 as American Member of the Advisory Commission to the UNRWAPNE.)

Department of State files do not reveal further discussion during 1951 of the proposed joint statement.

[Washington,] June 15, 1951.

Subject: Visit of the Israel Ambassador

Participants: Mr. Abba Eban, Ambassador of Israel

Mr. Moshe Keren, Counselor, Embassy of Israel

Mr. McGhee—NEA Mr. Waldo-NE

No such recommendations dating from around the time specified above have been found in Department of State files. For the Department's later position paper of October 12, see p. 903.

In telegram 41 from Beirut (Rapun 187), July 16, the U.S. Delegation to &quot;At request Blandford AdCom has agreed postpone issuance joint statement for three to four weeks. This will permit director hold exploratory conversations during forthcoming round courtesy visits Near East capitals to ascertain whether NE states would respond declaration.

The Ambassador called on me at his request to discuss briefly certain subjects and to pay his first visit after a rest of three weeks. The Ambassador was in the best of humor throughout and appeared well rested and far less intense and nervous than on previous occasions.

The Ambassador stated, first, that the papers on military assistance which General Marshall had suggested should be prepared were almost ready. He said he wanted to present them to me sometime in the following week. While on the subject of arms, he wished to mention a matter of some concern to him. As I knew, the US had been permitting Israel to purchase certain types of armament on the open market. Since the beginning of April, however, Israel had been unable to obtain State Department approval for any licenses for military equipment. He thought it might be as a result of the incidents of April 5, but hoped those incidents would have no permanent effect on the Department's attitude. The Ambassador said that Israel was particularly interested in obtaining 250 light machineguns and certain spare parts for military aircraft.

I said that I was not familiar with this matter, and asked Mr. Waldo, who said that he was aware that action on certain of the licenses had been postponed, although so far as he knew no licenses had been rejected during this period. I said that we had never expected the Huleh incident would develop into open war and that we had no intention of cutting off military supplies to Israel.

The Ambassador stated that Israel was disappointed in General Riley's decision on the Suez Canal matter, but fully understood his position. It now appeared that the problem would have to come before the SC, and Israel hoped that it would be possible for some member of the Council, possibly the British, to take the matter up, especially since much wider interests than those of Israel were involved.

I told the Ambassador that we had constantly reiterated our position to the Egyptian Government, protesting against interference with shipping through the Canal, and that when the matter came up in the Council we would make that position very clear. The Ambassador was informed that there might be some difficulty if the British took up the problem in the Council. In the first place, it would be difficult for anyone except the Israelis to claim that the Egyptian action in the Canal was a threat to the peace and that, therefore, it was probable that SC action based on a complaint of a member of the Council might only be in the nature of a recommendation. The Israelis, on the other hand, could claim that the blockade was a threat to the peace and the Council might then be in a position to take more effective action. An additional factor was that if the British raised the subject, the Egyptians might well insist on raising the entire Anglo-Egyptian question.

The Ambassador said that so far as Israel was concerned, he would prefer to have some member of the Council take the matter up, but he did not care who that might be. It was agreed, however, that it would not be desirable to raise the issue in the Council during the Presidency of the Soviet Union.

With regard to the Huleh dispute, the Ambassador said that it appeared to him improbable that General Riley could obtain the agreement of the Arab landowners in the Demilitarized Zone and that, therefore, other steps would have to be taken. The Ambassador said he hoped these would not consist in a revision of the Armistice Agreement or the holding of a conference for that purpose as suggested by the British. He thought that would set a dangerous precedent. He preferred that the dispute be referred directly to the SC for its determination. I said that we would certainly consider the matter carefully.

The Ambassador then told me he had just seen Secretary Brannan of Agriculture and had been informed that the Israel application to the International Wheat Council for an increase in its quota had been approved and that Israel would receive a 200,000-ton increase in quota. This would save Israel about a million dollars a year. His government was very grateful for the increase.

I thanked the Ambassador for calling and told him we would study the questions he had raised with us.

492. Re Legtels 723, 724, Jun 12 2 and London Embtel 6520 Jun 12,3 Dept believes Riley's position technically sound for fol reasons:

Wording SC Res May 18 followed closely basic Armistice documents and official memos Chief of Staff UNTSO and Chairman MAC

Neither printed. In the former, the Legation had stated in part: "We fully understand that Riley's position with Israelis shld not be undermined . . . but do not know how to deal with dilemma whereby if Riley's earlier position was based on misapprehension of facts . . . US may be maneuvered into safeguarding Riley-Israel relationship at expense US-Syrian relations. . . . We have often remarked Syrian fears extend beyond drainage problem to anxiety lest Israel is establishing its claim to whole demil zone. US position shid be designed to counteract this obsession." (683.84A/6-1251)

In telegram 724, the Legation had reported in part that the Foreign Office had protested ". . . vigorously against Riley's action in giving permission Israelis resume drainage operations on lands allegedly Jewish owned in demilitarized zone." (683.84A/6-1251)

3 In this telegram the Embassy had in part reported that the Foreign Office, in commenting on the Department's views expressed in telegram 5771 to London, June 9 (p. 706) had inquired as to precisely why the Department held that Riley's position (on the resumption of work on Jewish-owned lands in the Zone by the Palestine Land Development Co.) was technically sound. (683.84A/6-1251) order, to avoid criticism SC attempting alter meaning these documents which, Dept believes, already adequately define and interpret auth Chairman MAC deal with any situation in Demil Zone under Art Five Armistice Agreement. Para 3 of SC Res combines wording from Para C Riley memo Mar 7 and from request Mar 10 by Chairman MAC to Israel del MAC "to insure that instructions are issued in order that Israel works on Arab owned lands in Demil Zone be stopped until action has been taken by the Syrian-Israel MAC." In using language Riley memo, words "mutual" and "between Syria and Israel" were specifically omitted order not to tie hands of Chief of Staff or MAC Chairman.

Dept believes Syrians shld take into account this background re drafting of Res as well as Riley's memo of Mar 7 in its entirety. Para A subpara d that memo states that neither party to Armistice Agreement enjoys rights of sovereignty within the Demil Zone, and concludes that expropriation by Pal Land Development Company Arab land in the Demil Zone without the consent of the owners is a violation of the Armistice Agreement. Believe Paras B, and C, represent views of Chief of Staff on basis premises established in Para A.

In interpreting Paras 3, 4, and 5 of SC Res on behalf of sponsors, UK rep stated in SC on May 18 that "we are conscious of duties of TSO to safeguard legitimate rights and interests of Arab land owners. The first objective of draft res is therefore to bring about the suspension of the drainage opns in the Demil Zone to enable Chief of Staff of TSO to use his good offices in effort to bring about and negotiate settlement between the owners of the affected land and the Pal Land Development Co."

While agreeing that time between complete stoppage works in Zone and resumption work on Israel-owned land was extremely short, Dept believes on basis foregoing that Chairman Mac has auth authorize Pal Land Development Co. undertake opns on Israel-owned land within Demil Zone, provided he is satisfied land is in fact owned by Israelis and that such opns are resumed only with express permission Chairman of MAC.

You might point out to Syrian auths that principal purposes SC Res were to make clear Israel does not have unilateral right interpret Armistice Agreement and that Chairman and not Israel was responsible for supervision of administration of Demil Zone. Latter point considered of great importance by Syrians urdesp 457 Apr 23.4

Dept believes objectives of preceding para achieved and thus rights of UN have been upheld. Re other objectives of Res, Riley's Jun 5 report to UN states these in process being carried out.

Dept agrees that present developments emphasize fact Armistice Agreement does not give Syrians any rights in area previously occupied by Syrian troops. We believe only way alter this situation is through Armistice revision machinery established for that purpose.<sup>5</sup>

1. Dept concurs important element progress with Arabs towards peace is abandonment by Israel "orthodox view" re concessions thus giving PCC and friends both sides talking pts with Arabs. Israel has operated for three years on "orthodox view" without appreciable progress towards peace: alternative course has yet to be tried.

2. A policy of unilateral initiative towards settlement with Arabs is matter strictly for decision by Israel. Polit repercussions such a policy shift will be profound inside Israel and consequently its statesmen must themselves be convinced new policy in Israel's best interests. While agreeing unilateral concession by Israel wld be most helpful in facilitating final peace with Arabs, Dept believes it wld be unwise bribe or cajole Israel into so major a policy change which to be successful shld so command itself that Israel politicians wld be willing risk their reputations in its behalf.

3. Sharett's ref to Israel's reparations claims against Ger has some earmarks "deal". Secy made clear Ben Gurion May 8 (see memo conversation) such reparations cld only come from pockets US taxpayers and US opposed for many vital reasons reparations from current Ger production.

4. Re internatl assistance financing large scale fin obligations undertaken by Israel towards refugees on understanding its own econ future not jeopardized (paras numbered 6 and 7 reftel) this again boils down to US taxpayer who in last analysis wld be asked pay Israel so Israel can pay Arabs. While hard facts situation still under study, Dept is not reconciled advocating solution along these lines. (Re numbered para 3 Unpal 270)4 It wild be wrong for Sharett to entertain on basis ur interesting and helpful talks any misconceptions to contrary. In any case Israel must take initiative in developing proposals for internatl financing as a long-term obligation on Israel. Such proposals cld then be studied by UN members.

5. Sharett can obviously not be given answers to his questions by Dept because this wld imply advocacy if not some moral commitment by Dept. If Israel is seriously interested we presume PCC cld work out in conjunction with Israel for study by interested parties a comprehensive scheme covering these problems. Trends of thought in

785. For McGhee from Bruins. Your msg (Deptel 900)<sup>2</sup> given orally to Riley, whose reaction was that he has made every effort to be impartial and if he has spent more time with Israelis than with Syrians it is because Israelis needed more persuading.

His replies are as fols in accordance with lettered paras your msg:

(a) Held conferences in Damascus May 17 and 22, June 13. Major Jdid visited Riley in Beirut June 2 to discuss problem. Riley maintained hdqrs in Beirut to be in closer touch with Damascus by telephone. Held five conferences in Tel Aviv or Jerusalem. If he was in touch with Israelis and extra time spent it was to exert pressure for compliance.

(b) Riley regrets through error info was not passed to Defense Min as planned prior to press release. If Syrian reps had listened to BBC or Arab instead of Israeli radio, same msg cld have been heard.

(c) Problem difficult due to destruction of villages. Time is necessary to get accord on free interviews by observers with Arabs at Shaab.<sup>3</sup> Due to unsatisfactory results from these interviews, Riley attempting get Israelis to set date on which transport can be arranged to take back to demilit zone those who wish to return.

(d) This is matter of opinion. Chairman bases his info on certified land titles. In this regard believe titles in this area much better than elsewhere as Palestine Land Development Co. officials have been working on project for years. For info, Palestine Land Development Co. has about completed work on Jewish or concession lands on West Bank. Now want to move to East Bank but fear little Jewish land involved on that bank as to necessitate complete stoppage of work in zone unless it can be continued on Arab-owned lands. Report on failure of chairman to reach agreement with Arab landowners being submitted to SC this date.

(e) This is quite possible, and is difficult problem until we can get Israeli police out of zone. Arabs have entrenchments established on approach to El Hamma. Riley prefers these remain until normal relationships restored.

(f) This is matter of opinion. Since chairman had fairly accurate knowledge about these Jewish lands, the five-day stoppage certainly complied with resolutions and gave him sufficient time for his investigations. In Riley's view these lands were never the subject of discussion.

Riley further states MAC meeting is scheduled for Rosh Pinna June 20, at which much discussion is expected on interpretation explanatory note and powers of chairman.

906. For Dept only. Comment on Embtel 905 June 22: After consultation with Gen. Riley, Emb believes Huleh situation deteriorating and unless effective action taken promptly, serious consequences likely.

It is foregone conclusion no agreement with Arab landowners will be reached. They know they dare not expose themselves to Arab displeasure that wld result. This means also agreement cannot be reached with owners for continuation work Huleh Project on Arab-owned land. Development company is completing work on Jewish-owned land and within few days progress on project may have to be halted. It is believed govt here will appeal case to SC as first step but has no intention permitting Arabs halt work for long and may take direct action if decision delayed, in which case Arabs will no doubt repel hostilities in some form.

Significance exchange correspondence in reftel is that Arabs in Shaab also under pressure from two sides. Fon Min apparently encountered difficulty in form of political disagreement and lack of cooperation in making arrangements for interview of former residents demil zone, and after interviewing started number of Israeli police at Shaab was increased. While difficult to prove, UN reps concerned became convinced Arabs not reacting freely, fearing Israel pressure on one side and Arab displeasure on other.

Chief of Staff view that about 750 will desire return to former homes and request that Chairman MAC make necessary arrangements will precipitate practical problems involved in return to villages where homes of many have been destroyed. It is believed, moreover, Israel will resist by indirect means implementation SC Resolution May 18 in this and certain other respects to be discussed later.

As indicated last para Embtel 771 May 18,<sup>2</sup> it is believed prestige of UN requires that resolution be completely and effectively implemented. Issue may now be made by Israel over return of Arabs, but even more serious question is that UNTSO is now confronted with substantial failure to accept basic decision implicit in explanatory note of Ralph Bunche dated June 26, 1949, quoted in SC Resolution May 18 relating to civil admin in demil zone. Israel police are now in control of area and while Emb has not discussed this matter with any official of this govt, it doubts that Israel will carry out exact terms of resolution with regard to policing demil zone. Matter is regarded as so serious that Emb believes Chief of Staff shld be recalled for consultation and important decisions taken before parties to conflict have opportunity to exploit politically above points.

236. Palun 409. Re Unpal 270.¹ Our understanding as to PCC immediate and prospective course of action as agreed upon and as to actual and possible adverse factor is correct as outlined under sections 1 and 2. But agreement that "compensation and resettlement most important aspect refugee problem for which details should be worked out promptly" can hardly be effectively translated into action without more inspiring and fundamentally honest approach to compensation as repeatedly emphasized alternative to repatriation than is offered by Dept under section 3 para 3.

Accuracy of Dept belief as expressed under section 3 that opportunity now exists for new try by PCC backed by diplomatic support wld depend upon nature and weight of such support if opportunity really existed. But neither as regards impact of SC res May 18 on Israel or Arab states or public announcement of intention to ask congress for sizeable sum for Arab refugees and other indicated purposes, nor as regards resumption operations Syria-Israeli MAC, does Dept reasoning find responsive echo in US missions consulted by US del (Palun 408, June 20).<sup>2</sup> With Davis, Drew, Cannon and Bruins, I see no reason for optimism and question timeliness of new try by PCC in present atmosphere which Riley likewise at present finds far from promising.

As regards Israeli treatment of Arab residents, Davis and I agree that this wld be delicate matter for PCC unless restricted only to cases of repatriated refugees and carefully excluding consideration of Arab citizens of Israel who obviously do not come within scope of PCC direction or authority. I believe Tel Aviv Emb and Consul Waller at Haifa can most effectively and without risk of unfortunate repercussions provide Dept with helpful, objective and complete study of this question, but I will keep in touch with them and jointly with Davis inform Dept if at any time it appears that PCC might in any way assist in such a study. We do not overlook probability that conclusions that might tend to encourage refugees to choose compensation and/or resettlement instead of insisting on repatriation might simultaneously adversely and possibly seriously affect PCC relations Israel, and vice-versa.

As regards question of repatriation, USDel agrees that Israel might and shid be approached again and believes that refugee office shid as planned raise this question for possible reference to PCC for appropriate action at opportune moment. Endeavor will be made to provide Dept estimate requested.

Re section 3 para 4 "possible political settlement," neither USDel nor missions Tel Aviv Amman, Damascus, Beirut consider 4(b) or 4(c) cld now be taken up to any advantage or without danger or worsening present generally unsatisfactory situation. As regards 4(a) I assume Dept would expect due consideration to be given to Riley's views. USDel believes such consideration essential, particularly in view of Riley's lack of confidence in PCC and that any possibilities Dept might have in mind should be informally explored with Riley, possibly by USDel which now has excellent relations with him.

As regards possible unilateral actions by Israel suggested by Dept, which wld not involve any Arab quid pro quo, (a) and (b) are considered by USDel and missions consulted as out of question at present; (c) is not understood; (e) might be worked out if of sufficient interest to parties, which is doubtful. Releasing blocked Arab balances in Israel (d) has in my opinion long been question which shld be pursued in interest alike of Israel and individuals concerned; Amb Davis and I wld welcome strong Dept support at opportune moment which he and I both feel wld depend on outcome of further approach and exploration which I hope to be able to continue on informal personal basis.

I had a talk with Jack Blandford and Arthur Gardiner this afternoon on Jack's complaint that the PCC was jeopardizing the work of the PRA by its members commenting and writing papers on the reintegration program and by Holger Andersen's going about as head of the PCC "Refugee Office". Jack said that the PCC's every action in the field was confusing particularly to the Arabs. He specifically asks that Palmer be instructed to get the PCC to divorce itself completely from anything to do with reintegration. I suggested that Jack, now as UN Director of PRA, should take his complaints up with the PCC directly. He said that this would do no good unless Palmer received instructions. He went on to say that Andy Cordier and Hill in Lie's office are quite in accord with his, Jack's, views. I said that I thought that he and Jim Barco should talk the matter over on Monday if possible and dependent on what they agreed upon, instructions could be sent to Palmer. If it becomes necessary to send instructions to Palmer, I suggest that he be reminded of the instructions sent to Beirut in January on the respective jurisdictions of PCC and PRA. If Jack wishes to have his complaints enumerated for Palmer's comments and suggestion it might be done, but I would not be severe on Palmer for what is the fault of his colleagues and two General Assembly resolutions last fall which tended to obscure PRA's and PCC's jurisdiction. Furthermore, I think that Jack should be pressed further to take up his complaints directly with the PCC or the UN Secretariat."

[Washington,] June 25, 1951.

Subject: Visit of Jordan Minister, Dr. Yusuf Haikal Participants: Dr. Yusuf Haikal, Minister of Jordan

Mr. McGhee—NEA

Mr. Waldo—NE

Dr. Haikal called on me to discuss recent actions by the Israel Government to restrict the flow of the Jordan. He said that the Israelis had been shutting off the water at the southern end of Lake Tiberias, resulting in a great increase in salinity in the lower regions of the River and jeopardizing the economic life of the entire valley. His Government had cabled to the Secretary General of the UN requesting that the UN take action to halt Israel's interference with the flow of the River.

Dr. Haikal said that he had also discussed the question in New York with appropriate officials of the UN but had not received a very satisfactory reply to his questions. The UN Secretariat had told Dr. Haikal that it did not think the SC or UN could take any action on this question without a full investigation and that, therefore, the PCC or General Riley would be required to investigate. Dr. Haikal said that he had reported this to his government, suggesting that Riley might be asked to investigate and that his government had replied that the problem was outside the competence of General Riley.

I told the Minister that this situation pointed up the urgency of some form of agreement between Israel and Jordan, at least on this particular question. We had been faced with a somewhat similar problem in the use of the water of the Colorado River. California had wished to use the entire flow of that river before it entered Mexico. Without looking into the legal aspect involved, we had negotiated a treaty with Mexico which had satisfactorily settled the disposition of the Colorado River water. I suggested that the Jordan government might look into this treaty, and I gave the Minister a copy of it.

The Minister said that, while we had worked out the problem with Mexico, he wanted to point out that, after all, the US had friendly relations with Mexico, and Jordan did not have friendly relations with Israel. There was no point of contact between the two governments. Dr. Haikal said that the UN had brought Israel into being and was responsible for all the problems which stemmed from Israel's creation and, therefore, the UN should be called upon to settle the question of water rights.

I told the Jordan Minister that it seemed to me that there were several points of possible contact between Israel and Jordan which might be usefully employed in handling this problem. In the first place, there was a Special Committee under the General Armistice Agreement whose terms of reference might permit the consideration of this problem. In addition to that, there was of course the PCC, which was specifically charged with negotiating political arrangements between Israel and Jordan. The Minister said that as far as the PCC was concerned they had been unsuccessful in solving any political questions over the last three years and he was afraid they would have no greater success with this one. The water of the Jordan was vital to the life of his country, and he hoped that some immediate step could be taken to instruct the Israelis to desist from cutting off the flow of the River. I said that it seemed to me the matter could be taken up with the PCC on an urgent basis; that we would be glad to study the matter and inform the Minister in a few days as to a possible means of solving this question.

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Near Eastern Affairs (Jones) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (McGhee)

SECRET

[Washington,] June 26, 1951.

Subject: Visit of Ambassador Eban

The Ambassador of Israel will submit to you at 4 p. m. today a note, with three separate annexes, on the following subjects:

1. Israel's industrial capacity and potentialities;

2. Productive capacity of the Israel armament industry;

3. Israel's repair and rehabilitation capacity for arms and equipment.

Over the past year, the Israelis have indicated to the Department, to the Defense Department, and to other officials of the US Government that Israel wished to contribute as effectively as possible to the security of the Near East and that Israel was prepared to participate in possible US-UK defense plans for the area in return for certain considerations.

The most important discussion on this matter from Israel's point of view took place last September between the Foreign Minister of Israel, Moshe Sharett, and the Secretary of Defense, George C. Marshall. On December 23, 1950, the Foreign Minister submitted certain proposals to the Secretary of Defense in the form of a fairly comprehensive memorandum in two parts under covering letter: 1 Part One consisted of a description of Israel's supply position and the need for stockpiling in advance of a possible emergency, and Part Two concerned Israel's immediate military needs. The latter was broken down into a number of smaller items, each one of which was covered briefly by a paragraph of discussion. The proposals were not submitted to the Department, although a copy was subsequently made available to us by the Defense Department.

In accord with the Secretary of Defense's suggestion of January 11, 1951,<sup>2</sup> the Secretary of Defense informed Sharett that copies of the Israel memorandum had been sent to General Bradley, the Chairman of the Munitions Board, and three Service Secretaries for preliminary study and appropriate action where possible. The Secretary's letter was most cordial and suggested that the Israel government forward these proposals, broken down into individual papers on separate subjects, through appropriate State Department diplomatic channels to "insure that all interested agencies of the Government are fully apprised of and can take appropriate action on your suggestions."

In accord with the Secretary of Defense's suggestion of January 11, therefore, the Israel Ambassador is submitting the present note to you. On April 9, 1951, the first in this series 3 was delivered to the Department, requesting certain small arms and ammunition which, if granted, would result in standardizing the Israel Army with American small arms. No action on this latter request can be taken, of course, until Israel becomes eligible under MDAP. To the Department's knowledge, Defense has taken no positive action for similar reasons on any of Israel's other requests.

It is believed that the note, with annexes, should be transmitted formally to the Defense Department with a request that these papers be given the most careful study and that a report be submitted to the Department concerning the possibility and feasibility of fulfilling any part of Israel's requests in the light of US policy toward the Near East as set forth in the pertinent NSC papers.

Israel's relations with Defense have improved greatly over the past year and are now at the point where Israel officials in Washington have given the impression on a few occasions that the Defense establishment was more ready to grant Israel requests for arms and military assistance than the State Department. This view is based on the extreme cordiality of Secretary of Defense' letter of January 11 and what Israel officials consider to have been a very heartening discussion between the Secretary of Defense and Prime Minister Ben-Gurion. This optimism received a slight setback recently when the Army Department refused to invite Brigadier General Chaim Laskov, Director of Training, Israel Army, to visit military schools and installations in this country. Israel has expressed considerable concern about this, and we have informed that government that, while we are generally sympathetic to permitting Laskov to come, it is not feasible to invite him at the present time.

Recommendations:

That you speak to the Israel Ambassador along the following lines: We are sincerely grateful for this further evidence of Israel's willingness to cooperate with the West. We realize that these papers represent many hours of hard work by Israel government officials. The papers should be most useful to the Department, the officials of the Defense Department, and other interested agencies in making a study of Israel's needs and potential contribution toward the defense of the Near East. They will receive the most careful study and handling, noting carefully the need for guarding the security classifications of each one. There will probably be a number of questions which will come to us in the course of studying these documents, and we shall get in touch with the Israel officials at that time. We would be interested, however, to know whether Israel intends to make this information available to the British Government in view of the special responsibility which the British have in the defense of the Near East and the fact that the Israel Government has already had certain discussions with General Robertson.

The Ambassador of Israel, accompanied by the Counselor, called at 4 p. m. on June 26 to leave a note 2 amplifying earlier Israel proposals on the possibilities of Israel cooperation in Western defense plans for the Near East. The Ambassador said that the note contained three annexes: one on Israel's industrial potentialities; the second, on the armament industry; and, the third, a logistic estimate on repair facilities for arms and equipment in Israel. The Ambassador said he was presenting these on behalf of his government as a basis for discussion; they represented a genuine and sincere attempt to assess the possibility of cooperation at this stage. The Ambassador admitted that the absolute industrial capacity of Israel was small by American standards, but should be considered in relation to the capacity of the area. An element of strength in Israel's industrial position was the great volume of technical skill available. The weak spots arose out of supply problems and the need for technical advice. Another shortage in Israel which resulted in a certain disadvantage was a lack of fuel.

I told the Ambassador that we appreciated Israel's efforts in making this information available. We would give it most careful consideration and would request the appropriate military people in our government to study it from the military point of view. We are very much interested in the security of the Near East. An indication of this is the forty millions which we have recommended for military assistance in the area.

The Ambassador said there were elements of potential strength in the Near East but at present it was too much of a vacuum. I agreed, but expressed the view that in the event of war logistics problems in the area would be very great for both sides. The Russians would probably not be able to send more than a few divisions into the entire area. The Ambassador appeared to concur, remarking that the Korean war had punctured the theory of Communist invincibility.

I inquired whether the information on Israel military potentialities had been given to General Robertson. In view of the British position in the Middle East, I suggested that it might be helpful for Israel to make the information available to the British. The Ambassador said he had asked his Government whether it would be made available to the British. He personally thought it a desirable move. He would let me know what was decided. A factor influencing Israel's decision in the matter was that some members of the Israel military were still suspicious that the British connections with the Arab Legion might result in the Arabs learning Israel military secrets.

In reply to a query from me on the fuel shortage in Israel, Mr. Keren said that the Haifa refinery was presently operating at 25 percent capacity but production could probably be expanded if more crude oil were made available, possibly from the Near East. The Ambassador said that the Western Powers were the principal losers in this matter. If Haifa were brought into full production without Iraq's cooperation the Iraqi Government might realize the futility of continuing to blockade the pipeline. I said that in my view there was no reason the refinery could not operate at capacity on Venezuelan crude. A number of European refineries were presently so operating. In terms of the final product, there was not a great difference in price per barrel between Caribbean crude and that from the Near East. If we lost the Abadan refinery, however, it was probable the entire capacity of the Haifa refinery would be utilized.

241. Palun 411. PCC Polit Off Fisher yesterday visited Abdullah at Amman Palace in response to King's invitation. After discussing certain specific aspects of Jordan-Israel relations of minor importance but which seemed to offer possibility of mutually advantageous solution although not yet developed to point warranting report to Dept, King asked Fisher to stay and talk with him about what he termed "a most personal and confidential problem which is breaking my heart". (Karmi Bey was acting as interpreter.)

This problem, King said, was that of peace with Israel. "I am an old man", he continued. "I know that my power is limited; I know that I am hated by my own son," and he also referred to certain Arab leaders. "I also know that my own people distrust me because of my peace efforts. But despite all that, I know that I cld get peace settled if I only had some encouragement and cld get any reasonable concession from Israel".

At this point Fisher reminded King of unsuccessful efforts year and half ago to facilitate talks with Israel and suggested that it was unlikely that any Israel Govt on eve of general elections wild be prepared to make concessions which it had refused eighteen months ago. King agreed but queried whether it wild not be possible to raise matter again after elections if these shid result in establishment of "stable and sane Jewish Govt." Fisher replied that he had no doubt but what PCC if and when approached by Jordan Govt, wild most earnestly consider ways and means of improving relations between these two countries.

Fisher then asked what in King's opinion wld be reaction of AL and his own Govt to such a move. King declared that he and his Govt were prepared to defy AL, but added "we cannot defy my own people". He said his own people distrusted him because they suspected him of wanting to make peace without any concessions by Israel. He emphasized that this is an obstacle which he cannot overcome. He said "please understand that despite the AL I would have support of my own people and the tacit support at least of the British if I cld justify a peace by pointing to concessions made by the Jews. But without any concessions from them I am defeated before I even start". Elaborating on concessions that might be required by Jordan, King spoke of territorial adjustments in triangle "or elsewhere" and of a corridor to the Gaza Strip "which then wld become Jordan territory".

Concerning refugees, he said he realized that wholesale repatriation or even complete compensation was impossible. But he expressed his conviction that such bitterness cld be alleviated if propertied refugees were permitted to go to Israel for limited period to settle their affairs and if such refugees cld get the income at least from their property if not the property itself. This and reasonable settlement of blocked accounts, King insisted, wld make it possible for many to reestablish themselves elsewhere and to forget their bitterness.

King ended interview by saying, "Please help me. I can do it if I get some help and encouragement. But I am an old man. I have not much time left and I don't want to die of a broken heart".

Dept will recall that Fisher during past few years has met King Abdullah often on informal basis and has had frequent opportunities for friendly discussion of Jordan-Israel problem. Fisher had not seen King for some time prior to mtg yesterday and was impressed by fact that he had aged greatly and that his appeal to Fisher both at beginning and end of his discussion of this "personal and confidential problem" was almost an imploring one.

Recalling his conversation with Mr. Hoskins, however, Embtel 865 June 12,<sup>2</sup> he said he knew some officials of US Govt do not agree but he still believes Israel relations with its neighbors wld improve rapidly if Egypt cld be persuaded to take lead.

Comment: Emb understands from well-informed source that both Syria and Egypt have their price for making peace with Israel in form of territorial settlements. He believes that Syria wld make no further objection to Huleh project if Israel wld agree to divide demilit zone and establish frontier at Jordan River, and that Egypt likewise wld abandon blockade and make peace if Israel wld give up outlet on Akaba Gulf.

At present both proposals unthinkable from Israel point of view and no political leader wld dare make such concessions. In fact Emb sees little chance realistic approach to problems unless both sides come to feel it vitally important to their security and welfare to find early basis resumption normal relations. Memorandum by the Chief of the British Commonwealth and Middle East Division of the Office of International Finance (Polk) to George M. Bennsky, Jr. <sup>1</sup>

PROGRESS OF ISRAELI BOND SALES IN THE UNITED STATES

For your information, here is the gist of my remarks on the above subject at the N.E. staff meeting of June 27, 1951.

Restricted On June 21, Mr. Theodore Kollek, Israeli Minister to the United States, informed the Treasury in a telephone conversation that the Israeli Government still expected to realize a total of about $80 million in cash in 1951 from bond sales. As of that date, total commitments for purchases were $65 million, although information on this figure ran a day or so late. As for cash, however, they had about $21 million at the last report. It might take two or three weeks, or even two or three months, for the outstanding pledges to be liquidated.

End restricted—Begin of confidential On June 22, in a telephone conversation with Mr. Polk, Chief of the British Commonwealth and Middle East Division, Office of International Finance, U.S. Treasury, an officer of the Chase National Bank, New York City, which is the bank in which funds received from bond sales ultimately are deposited, stated that as of that date, about $19 million had been received in cash. He also stated that Israeli representatives had indicated that about $50 to $60 million in pledges had been received. (These figures are noticeably quite close to those given by Mr. Kollek.) The Chase officer indicated further that the bond sales had not been nearly as successful as the Israelis had hoped. Their hopes had been that $300 million in cash would be received in 1951 and $100 million in cash in each of the two succeeding years.

In a conversation between Mr. Delaney, of OIF, and Mr. Theodore Racoosin, a U.W. [U.S.?] Citizen active in New York City activities of the United Jewish Appeal, Mr. Racoosin indicated that he, among others, had opposed the bond issue from the beginning, thinking it was a mistake. Among the considerations had been that it might be difficult or impossible for Israel to repay the purchasers of the bonds in view of the country's outstanding $135 million debt to the Export—Import Bank. One of the factors apparently motivating the bond issue was said to be the steady decline in private contributions to Israel between 1948 and 1950. The Israelis hoped to reverse this declining trend in their exchange receipts through the mechanism of the bond issue. Mr. Racoosin thought that his original feeling that the bond issue was a mistake had been borne out by the disappointing results of the issue, which had produced much less than had been anticipated.

As far as private contributions through the United Jewish Appeal are concerned, Mr. Racoosin said that they are running at a higher level in 1951 than as of the same date in 1950. Mr. Racoosin, who is an accountant, is leaving for Israel this week to study accounting practices there. End confidential.

- 1. To put public pressure on Egyptians would tend to freeze their intransigence rather than increase possibility of getting alleviation of restrictions.

2. In turn our own interests and those of our close friends might be further damaged. In this connection Balluseck (Netherlands) indicated that because of Dutch shipping, aviation and other interests (he mentioned favorable balance of payments with Egypt) he thought his govt would be quite reluctant to press Egyptians unduly.

3. To air our dispute with Egyptians in SC would tend further to damage our general position with them as well as with their Arab neighbors. Arab states might well be expected to claim that once again

USG was endeavoring to pull Israeli chestnuts out of fire.

4. To air this dispute in SC would inevitably bring once more to the fore all of the bitterness between Arab states and Israel over Palestine already sharpened by Huleh dispute.

5. Egyptians would undoubtedly air publicly and probably bitterly their differences with UK concerning revision of UK-Egyptian treaty involving not only Suez but also Sudan.

6. At present touchy stage of Iranian question it would not seem wise to precipitate in SC debate on Suez restrictions.

For these reasons we are strongly inclined to recommend that Dept ascertain whether in fact UK seriously considers bringing up Suez question and if so attempt to dissuade them.

It would seem to us that in present circumstances most effective means of securing alleviation sought would be continued diplomatic effort in close concert, if not jointly, with govts most closely affected. Presumably diplomatic effort would be strengthened at least over a period of time and economic hardship suffered by Israel alleviated by extent to which operations of Haifa refinery could be stepped up by imports from sources not dependent on canal. Lourie informed us on Friday that while at one time Haifa refinery had ceased operation entirely, it was now operating at about 20 percent of capacity on basis of oil imported from Venezuela.

On other hand he wld not object to conference provided it is gen in scope and not confined to boundary question. He attacked attitude of Syrians with vigor saying their interest negative and purpose political not econ; they seek "stranglehold on Israel's water sources" and territory which was never part of Syria. He pointed out Israel evacuated greater area in Lebanon without demand for either territory or creation demilitarized zone. FonMin stated with great positiveness Israel will not agree to any "deal with Syria" which will sacrifice Israel's claim to demilitarized zone or compromise water sources. In this connection, if Dept feels there is no reasonable hope of favorable Egyptian reaction to US and other démarches on Suez, or prefers Suez matter be brought up now rather than possibly in future, we should appreciate Dept's instructions to that effect.

Fact that Israelis themselves contemplate bringing Suez matter into council strengthens our view that SC consideration this matter at this time would not be advisable (mytel 3, July 2), isince association with their initiative will thereby make US, UK, etc., doubly vulnerable to Arab suspicion.

and salt content river make Jordan unfit for irrigation (Deptel 145 June 28)<sup>2</sup> ConGen after consultation Fischer PCC puts forth following: Article 3 para 2 of both Egyptian and Jordan armistice agreements with Israel identical.

This paragraph prohibits land, sea or air mil or para mil forces of either side from taking any hostile or warlike act against other. It is understood that the banning of hostile acts only by mil or para mil forces was basis of reasoning of Gen Riley in agreeing that Egypt was not breaking letter of Israeli-Egyptian armistice agreement by blockading Israel-bound ships through Suez Canal. Riley added that the blockade was not in the spirit of the agreement as it was an aggressive act.

But Jordan-Israeli armistice agreement has third para under article 3 which is not in Egyptian-Israeli agreement. This para 3 article 3 Jordan-Israeli agreement reads: "No warlike act or act of hostility shall be conducted from territory controlled by one of the parties to this agreement against the other party" and there is no ref to any mil or para-mil forces.

If Riley reasoned Egyptian blockade was aggressive act, cutting of water supply to Jordan River vital to very existence Jordan is certainly "act of hostility—conducted from territory controlled by one of the parties"—in this case Israel.

Suggest therefore Riley empowered under art 3 para 3 to halt all drainage work in Israel effecting flow of Jordan until accurate survey of its effects on Jordan has been made and agreement between Jordan and Israel reached.

ConGen agrees problem involves international water rights but if situation presently serious and growing more so daily by time World Court could render a decision Israel could present fait accompli dangerous to peace ME. Little likelihood seen here Israel willingly ceasing work while discussing matter with Jordan, and some outside pressure must be exerted.

If SC unwilling consider Jordan complaint he proposes have recourse to Internatl Court of Justice and is already in consultation with legal experts in London. While PriMin was restrained in conv, he left no doubt of grave view he takes of sit.

Regarding alternative courses suggested by Dept to Jordan Min, while conceivable PCC might take cognizance of complaint at request of both parties, it is hardly likely that Israel wld take such action.

Neither can I understand how terms of arms agreement wld give competence over Jordan complaint to either special comite or TSO. Terms of reference of special comite are specified in agreement and to classify an alleged violation of internatl riparian rights as a "warlike act or act of hostility" under Art 3 wld appear to require a considerable broadening of the apparent intent of the Jordan-Israeli arms [armistice] agreement.

If the foregoing conclusions are correct and Dept further holds that UN SC could not act, I see no other recourse than the Internatl Court. While I agree with Dept that problems of this nature point up importance of settlement between Jordan and Israel, it wld in my opinion be lamentable denial of efficacy of machinery established by UN charter to hold that Jordan's only recourse against flagrant violation of its internatl rights wld be to undertake peace negots while Israel is holding knife at her throat. On contrary, I believe that acceptance of jurisdiction of Internatl Court, by both parties and compliance with its decision wld constitute the proper and logical foundation on which to build hopes of a peace settlement between them.

Memorandum of Conversation, Prepared in the United States Mission at the United Nations

CONFIDENTIAL

[New York,] July 5, 1951.

US/S/1787

Subject: Syrian-Israel Dispute

Jordan and the Huleh Project

Participants: Dr. Farid Zeineddine, Permanent Representative of

Syria to the UN

Ambassador Ernest A. Gross—US Mission

John C. Ross, US Mission (later) Edward P. Maffitt, US Mission

Ambassador Zeineddine called at his request on Ambassador Gross the afternoon of July 3rd. In addition to paying his respects on a colleague, he seemed to have in mind trying to convince the US Government that it should adopt a position which would show Tel Aviv that Israel was "no longer the enfant gâté" of the UN. In pursuing the latter purpose, Zeineddine revealed to us what may turn out to be Syria's strategy in the next phase of its conflict with Israel over the Demilitarized Zone between the two countries. This will be discussed below.

Ambassador Zeineddine urged the necessity of the US assuming a firm attitude against what it termed Israeli expansionism vis-à-vis its Arab neighbors. He said that past support of Israel by the US had brought not only the US but the West in general and the UN to a low point in Arab opinion. Things have got so bad in that respect, he said, that neutralism or even pro-Sovietism is gaining considerable strength among the peoples of the Arab world. As evidence of this he pointed out that Dawalibi, recently elected "Speaker of the House", the second-ranking official in Syria, last year publicly stated that if Syria had to choose between the West and the Soviet group, he would choose the latter since the Soviets are not pro-Zionist. In other words, the conflict with Israel was the basic factor in Arab thinking today, and anyone assisting Israel was in the Arabs' black book. Therefore the US should attempt to recover some lost prestige by ceasing to favor Israel. In addition to helping ourselves by such a position, Zeineddine said, we would strengthen the Arabs' hand in their dealings with the Israelis and create a more propitious condition for their reaching a lasting peace settlement with Israel. Up to now the Israelis had been aggressive and intransigent since they felt they could count on US support in the final analysis for any aspirations they wished to realize. For instance, he felt that a conference under Article VIII of the Syrian-Israeli Armistice Agreement would at the present time achieve nothing since the Israelis would not be reasonable.

At this juncture Zeineddine took occasion to make plain that Syria would not hesitate to take what action it felt necessary, including military, to protect its territorial sovereignty from Israeli expansionism, and, he continued, let any Arab government which failed to back Syria beware of retaliation from its people.

Ross deprecated such talk of war and stressed the extreme importance to all Near Eastern countries of their achieving a lasting peace settlement and removing causes of Near Eastern dissension which could only weaken the area at a very parlous time. He returned to the matter of an Article VIII conference and asked what the Syrian government might hope to achieve if one were called. Zeineddine was careful with his words, but gave the impression that what Syria would like to do at this point would be to propose an alteration of the Armistice Agreement which would do away with the Demilitarized Zone by negotiating a division of it between itself and Israel. Zeineddine complained that the Israelis were establishing a de facto predominance over the Huleh sector of the Zone by deporting all Arabs from it and setting up an armed military force in support of a greatly increased police force. If Israel should be allowed to get away with this, Syria would be in an unfavorable position with regard to dividing up the Zone and Zeineddine wondered whether it might not improve its position by endeavoring to work out an arrangement whereby perhaps the southern sector along the South-east corner of Lake Tiberias would be given to Syria in exchange for the central sector being incorporated in Israel. He seemed to think at least that this would give Syria a bargaining position that it does not at present have, in view of Riley's failure to have the deported Arabs returned and to clear the excess Israeli police force out of the central sector.

(This guarded speculation by Zeineddine throws light on the Israeli contention voiced several times recently to members of the Mission, that all the Syrians want from an Article VIII conference is to set forth "unacceptable" territorial claims. Apparently the Syrian thinking as indicated above has got to Israeli ears and is not pleasing to Tel Aviv, which holds that all territory formerly in the Mandate automatically became Israeli territory with the termination of the Mandate and the proclamation of Israel's independence.)

Ambassador Zeineddine also discussed at some length the implication of the Huleh drainage project, not only to Syria, but to Jordan as well. Repeating what the British had informed us he had said to Sir Gladwyn Jebb the previous day, he alleged that the drainage plan would render inoperative the Jordanian irrigation system depending on the Jordan. He alleged that already the saline content of the irrigation water used by Jordan had increased five times, and prophesized that on the southern end of Lake Huleh the salt content would go up so high that Jordon would be deprived of this irrigation. Zeineddine also complained of Riley's interpretation of Paragraph 3 of the May 18 resolution and, repeating his complaints at Riley's failure to get the deported Arabs back home and to make Israel withdraw its military forces and extra police from the Zone, reiterated his threat that Syria would not hesitate to initiate military operations it felt necessary to safeguard its security. He said that we had the impression that progress was being made on the two questions of the police and the Arab deportees and that we thought Riley was within his rights in authorizing resumption on drainage operation on lands the Israel owners of which had agreed to permit such operations.

The Secretary of State presents his compliments to His Excellency the Ambassador of Israel and has the honor to refer to the Embassy's note of March 12, 1951 requesting reparations from Germany.<sup>2</sup>

The Government of Israel must be aware of the revulsion which the monstrous crime against humanity perpetrated by the Nazis in their planned extermination and despoliation of the Jewish peoples of Europe aroused in the American people and their government. The Government of Israel must also be aware that from the inception of the occupation of Germany, it was the determined policy of the Government of the United States to bring before the bar of justice those persons responsible for the planning and execution of the crime and, to the greatest possible extent, to undo the wrongs inflicted on the victims of Nazi persecution. Special measures taken by the United States Government in implementation of that policy were elaborated in the Department's note of March 21, 1951 to the Embassy of Israel, and the Department again assures the Embassy of the continuing concern of the Government of the United States for mitigating the effects of Nazi cruelty.

The Government of Israel, in support of its request for reparation from Germany, alleges that it is the only state which can speak on behalf of the Jewish people and that the claims of the Jewish people were disregarded in the allocation of reparations from Germany. In connection with those allegations, the Government of the United States calls attention to the following considerations:

(a) Throughout the period of Nazi domination of Germany, the United States and other countries offered sanctuary to many thousands of persons of Jewish origin fleeing from their Nazi persecutors. At the end of the war it enacted special laws to open its doors to the flood of unfortunate people made homeless, destitute and infirm by the ravages of war and oppression. Furthermore, the Governments of the United States, the United Kingdom, and France have made the major contribution to the International Refugee Organization, which has facilitated the resettlement of Jews in Israel. These voluntary acts of assistance demonstrate the concern for and the large measure of responsibility which the Government of the United States has assumed for the welfare of the Jewish victims of Nazi oppression.

(b) Although they were not represented at the Paris Reparation Conference, the claims of the persecutees were given special consideration. The Paris Reparation Agreement allotted all non-monetary gold found in Germany, a fund of $25,000,000 from German external assets to be liquidated in the countries which remained neutral during the war, and all assets in neutral countries of victims of Nazi action who died without heirs for the relief and rehabilitation of non-repatriable victims of German action. It was recognized at the time that the overwhelming majority of these victims were Jewish, and immediately thereafter the Five Power Agreement of 1946 provided that ninety percent of the $25,000,000 fund and non-monetary gold and ninety-five percent of the heirless properties should be used for such victims. Furthermore, the Government of the United States notes that pursuant to the agreement between the Government of Israel and the Government of the United Kingdom of March 30, 1950, the latter turned over to the Government of Israel the proportion of reparation in respect of the mandate for Palestine which was received by the British Government under the Paris Reparation Agreement.

In bringing to the attention of the Government of Israel the reparations and indemnities thus far received by the Jewish refugees, the Government of the United States does not imply that it regards them as full compensation for their sufferings. It concurs in the view of the Israeli Government that no material compensation can be sufficient. It would point out, however, that many nations and peoples experienced tremendous losses and sufferings at the hands of the Nazis and that none can expect its reparation receipts to reflect compensation in any substantial measure.

The Government of the United States must also point out the bearing of certain agreements, to which it is a party, on further reparation demands on Germany. Immediately following the termination of hostilities, the Occupying Powers established the form of reparations to be exacted from Germany; in so doing they agreed that reparations must be of a character which would not impose a financial burden on the Allies, and that policy is unchanged. They then convoked a conference of those nations which made the greatest contribution to winning the war, for the purpose of distributing the share in German reparation allocated to the three Western Powers under the Potsdam Protocol. From that conference emerged the Paris Reparation Agreement, which not only determined the percentage share in reparation of the signatories but also provided that the reparation receipts shall be regarded as covering all their claims against Germany arising out of the war but without prejudice to the final settlement of German reparations. The effect of these decisions is to preclude the assertion by the Government of the United States, on its own behalf or on behalf of other states, of further reparation demands on Germany pending a definitive settlement in the nature of a peace treaty. It is impossible to predict when such a settlement will be possible.

The Government of the United States therefore regrets that it cannot impose on the Government of the German Federal Republic an obligation to pay reparation to Israel as a condition to implementation of the decision reached by the Foreign Ministers at their conference in Brussels to place Allied-German relations on a new basis. The Government of the United States wishes to emphasize, however, that the new relationship will not effect a definitive settlement of all problems arising out of the war and that it will not prejudice the consideration of further claims for reparation in the negotiation of a final settlement with Germany in the nature of a peace treaty.

Moshe Keren, Counselor, Embassy of Israel.

Mr. McGhee—NEA. Mr. Lewis—GER. Mr. Waldo—NE.

In the absence of the Ambassador, the Israel Minister Theodore Kollek was requested to call to receive the Department's reply 2 to the Israel note of March 12, requesting United States assistance in obtaining $1,500 million reparations from Germany. I told him that while we regretted the reply was negative, we had not asked for our share of reparations from Germany and were precluded by an agreement with France and Britain from asking for reparations on behalf of others, at least pending the negotiation of a final peace settlement. In order not to prejudice any negotiations which the Israelis might wish to undertake directly with the West German Government, however, we would not release the text of our reply and imagined that Israel likewise would not wish to do so. I hoped that the Israel Government understood that the fact of a negative reply had no bearing on the sympathy which the United States had had for the Jews who had suffered at the hands of the Nazis. As Israel well knew, the United States had given many concrete evidences of its sympathy in this regard. I said that Mr. Lewis of the Bureau of German Affairs was present to answer any detailed questions the Israel representatives might have on the note.

Mr. Kollek said that the Israel Government was prepared for a negative reply. He wished to point out, however, that the request had not been based on the actual damage done to the Jews but rather on the moral issue that Israel had absorbed many of the Jews who had suffered and lost property at the hands of the Germans. The Minister expressed his appreciation for all that had been done by the United States to alleviate the suffering of the Jews and to assist Israel. So far as compensation from Germany was concerned, Israel did not expect to let the matter rest and would probably approach the Department again on other aspects of this matter. A prominent American economist had been hired by the Israel Government to survey the German economy to determine that country's capacity to pay compensation to Israel.

Mr. Lewis told the Minister that the United States was sympathetic to Israel obtaining some form of compensation from Germany and we had authorized our High Commissioner to talk with other High Commissioners with a view to freeing the balances which had accrued to the Jewish Restitutions Successor Organization to be used in the purchase of German goods useful to Israel.

Mr. Kollek said that Bremen had already reached a settlement with the Jewish Restitutions Successor Organization to the extent of 20 million marks. Israel hoped a similar settlement could now be reached with Wurttemberg-Baden. Settlement with Bayaria was more distant.

Mr. Lewis said that the fact that the American note was negative did not indicate any diminution on our part of pressure on the Germans to fulfill their commitments on restitutions and balances. At this time notes almost identical to the United States reply were being delivered to Israel representatives in London and Paris. The United Kingdom had agreed not to publish the note unless there was considerable pressure to do so, and we had asked the French to withhold publicity also. If for some reason or other it should subsequently become necessary to release the reply, we would consult with the Israelis beforehand. The Israel representatives expressed appreciation for the Department's action on this latter point and said that they would prefer not to release the text of the Department's reply. (The following day Mr. Waldo informed Mr. Keren that the French had agreed to no publicity on this matter.)

understands background what appears here more pessimistic outlook than entirely justified. Dept had hoped and still believes at least parts program outlined Unpal 270 can be effectively adapted to PCC's frustrating situation. Dept realizes PCC's lack positive accomplishment during two and one-half years including failure UN consider its Jerusalem plan, failure its efforts bring parties into direct contact, and failure obtain support any parties for its suggestions on repatriation, territorial adjustments, compensation or release of blocked accounts made unavoidable present feeling stalemate and equally strong feeling need for effective new procedures.

- 2. Dept feels, although subject matter of Unpal 270 will not be new to PCC, Unpal 270 contains basis for attempting new procedures. Dept believes were PCC to pursue actively most promising points contained therein it cld best do so by assuming role of commission of mediation as Arab States have repeatedly requested. Continuing informal and individual discussions various points wld probably not produce more results than PCC's similar efforts during past 6 months. On other hand PCC action along lines Dept suggestions wld in our opinion require a more direct and formal approach of mediation within framework conference between Israel and PCC on one hand and reps Arab States and PCC on other. PCC wld decide place for such conference taking into account effective organization wishes parties; Dept preferences are (1) Isranbul; (2) Crete or Rhodes; (3) Cyprus.
- 3. We feel this conference shid be for purpose discussing and suggesting solutions for specific problems such as those raised in Unpal 270 and shid not be presented as a "Peace Conference." PCC wild not be expected suggest at outset direct negots between Israel and Arab States but in course of conference some questions might be advanced to point where direct contacts cld be established. Dept wild be prepared give all appropriate diplomatic support for PCC convening such conference and assuming mediation role and, where necessary and feasible, for successful solution specific problems.
- 4. For your guidance and within framework foregoing, Dept reviews below principal items Unpal 270.

A. Israeb treatment Arab residents and repatriation. After ascertaining facts either independently or through Fr, Turk and US diplomatic reps Tel Aviv this subject might be taken up in connection with negots with Israel for repatriation of appreciable number of refugees under para 4 part 2 of ConGen doc 17 Rev 1 as reported to Dept, a key possibly being to find those classes of refugees whose repatriation cld be considered by Israel as beneficial to its economy. In addition PCC might negot with Israel return of selected groups of property owners for residence and resumption of control of their property thus obviating some of the larger compensation claims.

B. Compensation. As indicated in para 3 part 2 of Unpal 270 an agreement between Israel and Arab States on principle of compensation and approx total amount, per PCC ref doc (ConGen Doc 17 Rev 1), wld greatly advance possibilities ultimate payment compensation and might create disposition among UN Members provide financial means by which Israel might pay compensation. Shid PCC as result negots be able obtain announcement by Israel its agreement to practical proposals and Arab States willingness accept such proposals, financial aspects of problem might prove less difficult. Likewise announcement Israel's agreement proposals for practical solution compensation problem might give PCC talking point for Arab States' relaxation trade and other restrictions, thus assisting Israel meet compensation obligations. Exploring such questions within framework conference on basis of mutual benefits might any case produce hitherto unexplored possibilities, particularly if Israel in fact more ready to adopt "unorthodox" solutions.

C. Possible Polit Settlement. Dept believes any opportunity shid be seized encourage and stimulate discussion matters arising under armistice agreement with view to revision or modification agreements by parties. In addition suggestions contained in para 4 Unpal 270 Dept feels there are other important subjects for negot such as unsolved problems Jerusalem area, use Jordan waters.

- 5. PCC efforts will have to be coordinated with extensive diplomatic preparation by Fr. Turk and US FonOffs and with such UK aid as wld be helpful. Likewise Dept wld concert with Fr and Turks in clarifying respective roles Chief of Staff TSO and PCC in negots relating settlement issues arising under armistice agreements. Dept feels agreement reached on any problem arising out of armistice agreements as result PCC efforts wld encourage possibilities undertaking at later stage larger revision armistice agreements either through PCC negots or negots by Chief of Staff.
- 6. Dept believes above provides basis for PCC's deciding assume more positive role. Barco has reported fully on PCC's activities and views. On his return he will be able discuss with you immediate steps contemplated necessary to accomplish these objectives. Your comments and suggestions requested. Dept believes you will wish defer discussion with your colleagues and secretariat until Barco's return. Maximum desired effect announcement new effort by PCC wld require careful coordination and preparation which might be jeopardized by premature publicity.
  - 7. Fol is suggested timetable:

A. You and Barco meet Geneva approx July 20.

B. PCC reconvenes about July 25 to agree on conference plan, discuss agenda, fix venue, opening and terminal dates.

C. PCC members report to respective FonOffs before Aug 5.

D. Aras will extend PCC's invitation to Arab States and Israel for conference at Istanbul. Target date Sept 1.

E. FonOff's will urge parties participate with highest possible representation.

F. Report fol conference for UNGA cld be written either in Istanbul or Paris.

1. Dept holds little hope that diplomatic representations to Egypt re lifting blockade restrictions will succeed;

2. Dept inclined neither to encourage nor discourage SC action but assumes Israeli initiative that problem will be brought before SC in

3. Dept firmly of opinion US shld not take lead in SC debate but shld support SC action which may effect lifting Suez restrictions. Dept assumes that UK and Fr will be inclined take lead in debate and we will want cooperate closely with them. US does not intend initiate or sponsor res on problem unless it appears likely res attempting to effect lifting of blockade wld fail of adoption without US co-sponsorship.

4. Dept believes two aspects problem will have to be considered during SC debate:

(a) Restrictions as they affect Egypt-Israel relations;

(b) Restrictions as they affect US interests without regard to Egypt-Israel situation, that is effect blockade on rights other UN Members.

Re (a) US position in SC debate wld in large measure be conditioned by theory of complaint Israel presented to Council. SC cld consider problem as facet Palestine problem which SC has been authorized to consider by GA, or alternatively as dispute continuation of which is likely to endanger maintenance of internatl peace and security, or on both theories.

Re (b) US position wild be, as expressed on numerous occasions to Egypt Govt, that restrictions, unreasonable, impracticable, and unjust, and adversely affect US interests. We wld emphasize restrictions detrimental legitimate world commerce and as such might well impair general internatl relations.

5. Objective of res shld be lifting restrictions on grounds that there is no basis for their continuance. He emphasized Israel has not refused to discuss demilitarized zone as one of several subjects, but he feels that to agree to discuss the demilitarized zone alone wld indicate to Syrians either that Israelis willing to compromise on territorial question, which it is not, or that it is capable of undertaking conversations which it knows in advance can only be barren of useful result.

FonMin stated frankly he was fearful lest Dept thinking be that Israel shld yield to Syrian pressure to divided demilitarized zone as easiest way of settling vexing problem. He reiterated Israel unwilling make such concession for reasons reported Embtel 2 July 3. He thought moreover it would be positively harmful to prestige and authority of MAC to have representatives of respective FonOffs hold discussions limited to matters already on MAC agenda. Subject: Remarks of John B. Blandford, Jr., Director, UNRWA, at Meeting with the Advisory Commission

On July 6, 1951, Mr. J. B. Blandford, Jr., Director, UNRWA, met for the first time with the members of the Advisory Commission.<sup>2</sup> By coincidence the meeting was also the 100th session between the Commission and the Director.

The meeting was opened with a few words of welcome to Mr. Blandford on the part of the Commissioners. Mr. Blandford, in expressing his appreciation, stated that even though he had moved to the Director's side of the table, the team which had worked so well together over the past year remained with the same membership.

Mr. Blandford then proceeded to give a composite picture of his talks with the three major contributing Governments, the United States, the United Kingdom, and France.

Mr. Blandford found substantial agreement in all three capitals as to the interpretation of reintegration. Reintegration means the providing of homes and jobs to refugees, principally the building of villages near employment opportunities. It is expected that the Agency's effort will be primarily in the field of agricultural resettlement. The Agency might also undertake minor engineering works necessary for the creation of long-term employment, such as the construction of access roads to villages and village irrigation facilities.

The Agency's program should fit into a large-scale economic development effort in the receiving countries to be financed by international bank loans, oil royalties, grants in aid, and local government budgets. This large-scale effort would undertake the big engineering jobs which must be done, such as building roads to open up new territories, large water and power projects, etc. The Agency can cooperate directly in the large-scale program by assisting in obtaining economic information and stimulating economic development.

The immediate problem before the Agency is essentially the political problem of getting local government cooperation. The Near East Governments must agree to accept refugees for reintegration—this cannot be by-passed. Detailed negotiations will be necessary, the end of which will be to obtain the maximum involvement by local governments in the Agency's program.

Therefore the Agency should be in a position of maximum strength during these negotiations, keeping in mind the Arab League condition that the international community undertake to see the entire reintegration job through. Mr. Blandford hopes to get as much of the negotiation task as possible completed before the next session of the UN General Assembly. For this reason Mr. Blandford hopes that the contributing governments will do their utmost to make the Agency as strong as possible during the forthcoming negotiations. This could be done either by large cash contributions or by commitments from contributing governments which would enable the Agency to formulate a program of reintegration investment. Mr. Blandford mentioned the target of 50 million per year for three years of reintegration.

Mr. Blandford found that all three of the major contributing governments had the impulse to tackle the economic problems of the Near East bilaterally. He succeeded in obtaining the agreement of the US Government that the needs of the Agency should first be met before the US would embark on a bilateral program. He pressed this same viewpoint in London and Paris and found no vigorous dissent. There was general agreement that the refugee problem had the first political priority and was the most important form of economic development—the transformation of nearly one million people who are presently an economic blight into a social and economic asset to the receiving countries. He requested the Advisory Commission's agreement with this viewpoint and hoped that the members would so advise their Governments. There was a danger of the western democracies' by-passing the difficult immediate need in favor of more pleasant bilateral economic development projects.

Mr. Blandford pressed each of the three Governments to reconsider its contribution with a goal of $75 million for the current fiscal year so that a first-year program of $50 million for reintegration could be negotiated with the Near East States. The President of the United States has requested the Congress for $50 million contribution to the Agency. The present Congress is economy-minded and may well cut deeply into the Mutual Security Bill of which the US contribution to the Agency forms a part. However, there are reasons for optimism based on the special appeal of the refugees. Last year a Congress which made many cuts in foreign aid appropriations passed the entire amount requested for assistance to Palestine refugees.

Mr. Blandford stressed the need of obtaining larger contributions in London and Paris. With adequate financing the Agency might be able to squeeze two years of reintegration work into one. The French and British Governments promised to consider his request; however, the matter needs extensive follow-up, and Mr. Blandford asked the French and British members of the Commission to make a special effort.

Mr. Blandford closed his remarks by again pointing out the necessity of his having at least commitments from contributing governments so that he could negotiate programs with the Near East states. He expressed the hope that the United States Government would explore the possibility of giving contract authority to the Agency.

New York, July 10, 1951—4 p. m. CONFIDENTIAL PRIORITY 61. Re Suez: Yesterday afternoon in meeting with Jebb (UK) and Lacoste (France) present, Gross gave US views on SC consideration of Suez Canal dispute in accordance with Deptel 17, July 9.2 Re our view of role we should play (para 3), group agreed res requesting Egypt to drop restrictions would probably pass even if US did not co-sponsor if, of course, USSR does not veto. We said Israelis had told us Malik had informed them USSR would as usual on Near Eastern matters abstain. Jebb and Lacoste thought this most important and insured res adoption. However Lacoste later privately expressed to us his personal deep disappointment at our reluctance to co-sponsor possible res. He said Egyptian attitude is indefensible, US, UK and France are signatories to tri-partite declaration on stability in Middle East, and they should take strong and open leadership in combating restrictions so widely prejudicial.

Jebb asked what would happen if res of above mentioned type adopted: Would Arabs leave UN? Would Egyptians defy res? Would we support sanctions in that case?

Re our view armistice agreement terminated belligerency, Jebb questioned this interpretation, pointing out armistice agreement did not end state of war. He said our theory would require UN lift all restrictions against No. Korea as soon as armistice agreement signed. Lacoste observed the French Govt had always refused to recognize state of war existed between Israel and Arab states, and felt in any case armistice agreement terminated whatever hostilities had been going on in Palestine. Both he and Jebb felt need for legal opinion whether state of belligerency ceased with armistice agreement.

Gross inquired whether UK would sponsor res on Suez. Fowler (UK) replied instructions just arrived, not yet seen by Jebb, indicated London prepared to take leading part in res even unto sponsoring.

At Jebb's instigation there was some discussion regarding whether he should step down during Suez debate. Lacoste pointed out Turkey had not stepped down when co-sponsoring May 18 res on Syria-Israel dispute and Gross thought decision depended on whether UK was directly and manifestly party to dispute.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs (Hickerson)<sup>1</sup>

CONFIDENTIAL

[Washington,] July 11, 1951.

Subject: Israel's Submission of the Suez Canal Case to the Security Council

Participants:

Ambassador Abba Eban—Israel

Mr. Hickerson—Assistant Secretary

Mr. Ludlow-UNP Mr. Waldo-NE

Ambassador Eban called upon me today at his request to inform me that the Israeli Government will present a complaint to the Security Council tomorrow against the Egyptian blockade restrictions affecting the Suez Canal.<sup>2</sup> In expressing the preliminary views of his Government on the presentation of this case to the Council he stressed three factors which he believed affected not only Israel but other members of the Council and the United Nations.

1. The restrictions placed on shipping by Egypt were having a seriously detrimental affect not only upon Israel's economic well being but also upon the shipping interests of all the maritime powers. The Suez Canal represented a point of strangulation to much of the shipping of the world and individuals sending ships through the canal were reluctant to take on cargo which might be subject to interference or controversy over their destination. The blockade, for example, was making the use of the Haifa refineries extremely difficult in that tankers from the Middle East could not pass through the canal to Haifa. As for Israel, it had hopes of trade with Commonwealth and sterling area countries, which trade was made impossible by the inability of ships from East African areas and Commonwealth countries to the east to traverse the canal.

2. The continuance of the blockade posed a problem to the security of the Middle East. He pointed out that the Commonwealth conference in London had evidenced a concern of countries like Australia and New Zealand over the security of the Near and Middle East and the relationship of the canal to the area's security. Mr. Eban felt that the United States as well as the British Commonwealth nations, in evidencing concern over the security of this area would undoubtedly wish to see the interference, which the Egyptian blockade represented,

3. The United Nations aspect of the case was, in Mr. Eban's opinion most important. In the opinion of his Government the problem of the Suez Canal was but part of the entire problem of the enforcement of the Arab-Israeli Armistice system. General Riley, in his decision of June 12, has indicated that the action of the Egyptian Government in maintaining the blockade was clearly an aggressive and hostile act, not consistent with the intention of the Armistice system, and he had recommended that, since the problem was in essence one too great to be decided by the Egyptian-Israeli Special Committee, Israel should resort to the Security Council for satisfaction. Israel, according to Mr. Eban, believes that the Armistice Agreements should be complied with by all signatories and not just by Israel. He said that there was no other instance where a Government had maintained for so long such an obvious violation of the Armistice system. In submitting its case to the Security Council, Israel was concerned that the allegation of a state of war should be allowed to persist. If such were to be the case, all of Israel's neighbors were at war with Israel and therefore, perhaps, Israel should undertake to devise hostile action against the surrounding countries as a matter of defense and retaliation. It was Israel's intention that the Suez Canal case should have as its objective the direction of the countries concerned toward the achievement of a final peace in the area. Mr. Eban felt that Council action against the Egyptian restrictions would have a salutary affect on Egypt's respect for the United Nations and for those governments which would be calling for the lifting of such restrictions. He felt sure that Egypt would comply with a directive from the Council. Certainly, Israel could hope that Egypt's compliance would be on the order of Israel's compliance with the May 18 resolution which, however distasteful to Israel, had been complied with.

I thanked him for the presentation of his views on the Suez case and informed him of our desire to see the restrictions lifted. I stated that I believed that Israel and the United Kingdom were the two countries most concerned with the problem and accordingly should assume the lead. I pointed out to him that we had made numerous representations to Egypt concerning this problem and said that, while I had been a little reluctant to see this case come before the Security Council because of various complicating factors and related problems, I did not now believe there was any basis for opposing Council consideration. I did wish to point out, however, what, I was sure, the Israeli Government had already taken into consideration, namely, that with the Suez case before the Council some of the Arab states might be led to demand a discussion of the extent and willingness of Israel's compliance with Security Council resolutions. I said that recent reports of General Riley, particularly the one of July 9 3 concerning the difficulties which he was having over the repatriation of Arab refugees to the demilitarized zone were causing us some concern and we felt that the Government of Israel should consider this matter of their own compliance. I asked him quite candidly, if he felt that Israel would be coming before the Council with clean hands.

In reply Mr. Eban stated that while he was not fully familiar with General Riley's reports he felt that Israel had complied with the requirements of the May 18 resolution. However, with regard to my suggestion and inquiry, he would look further into the matter. Concerning the repatriation of the Arab refugees to the demilitarized zone he said that it was his understanding that refugees had been presented with an opportunity to decide whether they wished to return to the demilitarized zone, where chaos still reigned, or whether they preferred, as the majority of them did, to remain in the security of Shaab where law and order prevailed. In any event, he thought it was quite clear that it was not in the best interests of the Arab refugees for all of them to return to the demilitarized zone.

The Ambassador closed by saying that in presenting the case to the Council there was much planning yet to do and he assumed that the Israeli and United States delegations would have further consultations. I did not comment on this assumption.

Subject: Suez

Yesterday afternoon Denis Laskey, Bob Fowler and Francis Vallat brought in a draft resolution on _e Suez matter and discussed the UK views thereon. We talked of the Israelis' intention to send a request today to the Security Council President for a meeting on Suez, and Fowler said that he understood that the Israelis were suggesting to the Norwegians and the Australians that they ask to be present at the Security Council debate.

The British said they did not yet have instructions whether to hold the Israelis off and thus bring the Suez problem up by calling a meeting to discuss General Riley's report. It appeared that John Coulson would rather have the Israelis take the step, in the belief that this would involve the UK less. On the other hand, most of the other members of the UK Delegation felt that it would involve the UK less simply to call a meeting as President to discuss a report provided for in the November 17, 1950 Security Council resolution.

When I asked what the British reasons were for wishing this matter brought up at this time Laskey listed the following in the order of their importance: a) there is much agitation in the House of Commons against a situation prejudicial to British commercial interests, i.e., the Haifa Refinery; b) the UK at all times worries over any obstacle to free and unrestricted use of international waterways; c) the situation shown by Riley's report of the special committee's decisions indicates that a situation exists which is likely to endanger peace and security in the Near East; d) the UK would welcome any development which might loosen up the relations between Israel and the Arab states, and it believes that this would come about to a certain extent if Egypt should drop the restrictions, especially on oil (Iraq) but also on general commercial and diplomatic relations (Jordan and possibly others).

We then discussed the form the debate in the Council might take. It was recognized that there were two elements involved, the Canal restrictions which Egypt was maintaining, and other obstacles to trade and communications with Israel. Laskey asked whether "it might help" the United States to have the draft resolution broadened in Paragraphs 9 and 10 to cover restrictions from which we were suffering commercial prejudice. This brought us to a discussion of the role we would play in the debate. I pointed out that the British had learned our instructions on this point, especially with regard to co-sponsorship, and that there had been no change therein. Laskey said that Jebb would be happy if we would report to the Department that the UK Delegation feels that our failure to co-sponsor would greatly weaken the resolution since it would make it appear that we were not wholeheartedly behind the attempt to make Egypt lift the restrictions. I said that our statement at the table would make our views clear enough, but this seemed to make little impression on our British friends. They made some mention of the Tri-Partite Declaration as a factor we should take into consideration, although they realized that this was not the occasion to invoke it. When I asked what co-sponsorship the UK had in mind they replied that the only other SC Member that might be interested in co-sponsoring in addition to the French and ourselves (sic) would be the Dutch, although they did not exclude the possibility that Turkey, for the sake of peace and security in the area, might consider co-sponsoring as it did in the May 18th resolution on the Syrian-Israeli conflict. Vallat cautioned against being led by the Egyptians into an argument based on purely legal issues, since the intricacies of the 1888 Convention might confuse the issues and since the argument might lead to the matter being referred to the ICJ, a move which he thought perhaps would weaken the pressure on Egypt. Laskey was not sure that this latter point was valid.

As for timing of presentation of the British draft resolution, the British felt that it should not be until we had heard what line the Egyptians would take.

[Annex]

DRAFT RESOLUTION ON THE EGYPTIAN RESTRICTIONS ON SHIPPING THROUGH THE SUEZ CANAL

The Security Council:-

- 1. Recalling that in its resolution of the 11th August 1949 relating to the conclusion of Armistice Agreements between Israel and the neighbouring Arab States it drew attention to the pledges in these agreements against further acts of hostility between the parties:
- 2. Recalling further that in its resolution of 17th November 1950 it reminded the states concerned that the armistice agreements to which they are parties contemplate the return of permanent peace in Palestine, and therefore urged them and other states in the area to take all such steps as will lead to the settlement of the issues between them:
- 3. Noting that the Chief of Staff of the Truce Supervision Organisation in his report to the Security Council of 12th June 1951 considered interference with the passage through the Suez Canal of goods destined for Israel to be a hostile and aggressive act, and contrary to the spirit of the Armistice Agreement, whose effective functioning is thereby jeopardised:

- 4. Further noting that the Chief of Staff of the Truce Supervision Organisation recalled the statement of the senior Egyptian delegate in Rhodes on 13th January 1949 to the effect that his delegation was inspired "with every spirit of cooperation, conciliation, and a sincere desire to restore peace in Palestine", and that the Egyptian Government has not complied with the earnest plea of the Chief of Staff that they desist from the present practice of interfering with goods destined for Israel through the "lez Canal:
- 5. Considering that the exercise of the power of search and seizure against international commercial shipping is a right generally recognised only to a power acting in the lawful exercise of belligerent rights:
- 6. Considering that since the permanent armistice regime has been in uninterrupted existence between Egypt and Israel for more than 2 years and 3 months, neither party can reasonably assert that it is actively a belligerent or require to exercise belligerent rights for any legitimate purpose of self-defence:
- 7. Finds that the maintenance of these blockade measures is inconsistent with the spirit of the Armistice Agreement and an abuse of the exercise of maritime belligerent rights:
- 8. Further finds that these measures cannot in the prevailing circumstances be justified on the grounds that they are necessary for self-defence:
- 9. And further considering that the restrictions on the passage of oil tankers through the Suez Canal to Israel ports are denying to nations at no time connected with the conflict in Palestine valuable supplies of refined oils required for their economic reconstruction:
- 10. And considering that such restrictions together with the sanctions applied by Egypt to certain ships which have visited Israel ports represent an intolerable restriction of the right of nations to navigate the seas and to trade freely with one another and with the Arab states and with Israel:

The Security Council:

11. Calls upon Egypt to terminate the restrictions on the passage of international commercial shipping and goods through the Suez Canal wherever bound and to cease all interference with such shipping beyond that essential to the safety of shipping in the Canal itself and to the observance of the international conventions in force.*

*The UK Delegation has recommended to London omitting Paragraph 5; omitting the bracketed words "since" and "neither . . . self-defense" in Paragraph 6 and inserting in place of the latter the words "and that in fact there is no present state of hostilities between Israel and Egypt"; omitting "and . . . rights" in Paragraph 7 and "of refined oil" in Paragraph 9; and replacing "oil tankers" by "goods" in Paragraph 9. Laskey and co. also agreed that "blockade" was possibly not the correct word in Paragraph 7. [Footnote in the source text.]

FonMin Sharett has expressed concern over impression that differences exist between UNTSO and Israel Govt when he (Sharett) thought substantial agreement had been reached in his prior conversations with General Riley. Emb believes FonMin sincere in expressing such opinion, but possibly too inclined to interpret the lack of any specific reply to his arguments as tacit agreement. He stated in general Israel position re compliance May 18 SC res wld be based on text armistice agreement itself, explanatory notes, minutes of negots, and series of rulings of chairman MAC. As to Arab land question he observed SC cld always authorize action on land, with or without expropriation but with due compensation, without prejudice or prejudging ultimate solution sovereignty question.

He states Israel had complied with paras 3 and 10, May 18 res re work suspensions and return of Arabs to demilitarized zone, and said he had drafted communication chief staff UNTSO inquiring whether provisions calling for further investigation of complaints, particularly that of Israel re Al Mutilla attack, had been carried out and if so with what result. In recent informal conversation FonMin stated that with regard to proposed US econ assistance in ME he had never advocated such aid shld be confined to Israel or Arabs shld not be aided, and direct aid shld be based on (1) actual needs (2) pace of development of recipient countries and (3) exertions of countries themselves.

As to relations with Arab states, he discussed at some length and with obvious interest possible means of influence Arab population to make it polit possible for leaders make peace with Israel. He made frank but not particularly helpful observation that "basic thing in current Israel history is immigration, not relations with Arabs". He evinced some interest, if not enthusiasm, for possible coordinated use of existing facilities to correct misapprehensions, create confidence and lessen ill will. He apparently does not regard improvement as vital to Israel's interests, and is inclined to be skeptical regarding efficacy any attempt change Arab thinking by either deeds or words.

On other hand he fears further deterioration in situation and says he anticipates that Egypt, encouraged by example of others, may soon take action against Jews and their property.

When I mentioned his Nazareth speech (Embtel 13, July 9)<sup>2</sup> in Arabic to local Arabs, and expressed view that treatment of Arab minority had great importance to Israel's internatl position, particularly in Russ and West Eur, he said that his reception at Nazareth had been courteous rather than warm, that the crowds had viewed him with curiosity and outward respect but there was complete lack of friendliness. He said a higher percentage of Arab children are in school than during days of mandate and it is Israel policy treat minority with consideration. He expressed conviction however that it is too much to expect Arabs will be happy as minority. He made further revealing remark re his thinking to effect his govt had refrained from giving too much publicity to things done for Arabs since it did not wish encourage illegal infiltration or further demands for repatriation.

26. We have been reviewing problems underlying Syro-Israeli dispute in light stimulating tels such as Depcirtel 2, July 2; <sup>2</sup> Deptel 8, July 6 <sup>3</sup> also Tel Aviv 895, June 23 [21] <sup>4</sup> re necessity for facing up to territorial question. We are convinced this last problem shld be dealt with speedily and courageously together with that of water rights. Fol paras continue our comment (see Legtel 6, July 5) <sup>5</sup> on points raised in Depcirtel July 2.

In seeking solution this vexing problem our aim shld be reduce irritations in gen so that we can proceed step by step to larger issues. We note Emb Tel Aviv report SC res May 18 had both beneficial and adverse aspects in Israel. As for Syrians they had made their case prestige-wise and we are sure that had initial good effect not been dissipated by Israel non-compliance and Riley's decision for resuming drainage work Syrians cld be brought to accept settlement along lines whereby Israel's legitimate objective wld have been gained. It does us little good to talk about this now except that we must take into account Syria's sense of outrage in considering future lines of action. Syria's June 20 proposal for ad hoc talks looked good to us and we deplored Israel's "all or nothing" attitude toward this proposal (Tel Aviv's 14 July 9).6 Reiteration of our stand for gen settlement can only be expected to evoke flat rejection and thereby stop us from moving toward precisely that objective. It seems to us that for Israel to refuse bona fide negots on individual components of peace leave it open to charge of hypocrisy. To Syrians goodwill is lacking when Israel flouts ad hoc talks while temporizing on SC res of May 18. Assertion that talks wild be designed serve Syrian territorial ambition (Tel Aviv's 2, July 3)7 is no more valid than Arab claim that full peace talks cld only serve Israel. Any step toward partial settlement is step toward full peace. Cannot point be made that reduction of friction along comparatively short frontier with Syria through ad hoc talks might pay dividends in lasting modus vivendi with perhaps most embittered Arab State?

Leg forwarding by despatch its analysis Syrian territorial and other claims and interests in zone. UK Leg here has also submitted report presumably available to Dept. We believe Syria cld be persuaded settle for moderate territorial gain for prestige purposes if interests in water rights protected. Possibility resettling zone Arabs now Israel in any territory given Syria on east side of Jordan shld make division of zone attractive to Israel.

Israel's insistence on claiming exclusive control of Jordan as its "lifeline" points up once more dangers to area peace inherent in water rights question. Judging from recent action Israeli doctrine seems to be that expansion its population and economy justifies and may necessitate diversion to Israel or otherwise manipulating of all water resources around its periphery. We trust this is not in fact Israel policy as Syrians believe it to be. In case of Jordan River such policy wld affect legitimate, vital rights of Syria and Jordan as well and we believe Riley fully justified in views expressed Beirut tel 1, July 3.8

There is also third party to dispute in state of Jordan which lays claim to Hammeh area (Amman tel 175, April 6)<sup>9</sup> and has made complaints re use of Jordan water. Moreover we do not forget that other water projects such as Syrian and Jordan Yarmuk projects will create additional complications. If ad hoc talks can be arranged some way shid be found to take into account Jordan claims. Consideration might then be given to creation of internat machinery to supervise use of water (which is key problem in this sensitive area) until final peace can be achieved.

In connection with ad hoc talks we believe PCC might provide a suitable frame for discussion. We also approve idea that polit reps might be added to MAC's. Well chosen reps under control of MAC chairman might discuss specific issues with profit, clarifying policies disputants and at same time accustoming all parties to idea of discussion face to face. We are not terrified by prospect that such discussion wld be useless and sometimes acrimonious. One of worst aspects of present situation is that both sides are uninformed on the real situation and state of mind in each others country. We have had to live with fact that both Israel and Syria have been using Arabs as pawns of national policy. Perhaps we can better cope with this problem if by broadening scope of discussions this can be brought into open.

We suggest consideration be given to fol lines of action:

(1) Communicate to Syria and Israel and publicly announce our concern over Israel's noncompliance with res re return of displaced

Arabs and withdrawal paramilitary forces. Statement by US and other sponsors on their attitude toward Israel's noncompliance cld recapture in Syrian and other Arab states some of good will with which they originally recd res.

(2) In coordination with other sponsors take Syrian, Jordan and Israel into our confidence to our thinking on desirability their settling territorial and water rights questions and necessity prompt completion drainage project. We cld also suggest possibility settling displaced zone Arabs on east bank of river shld they so desire. (This does not represent modification Leg belief all zone Arabs shld be returned to their villages even though they might reside in tents while destruction of villages being made good.)

(3) At same time announce our support of action to prevent resumption Huleh drainage operations on Arab-owned land until SC res May 18 in other respects fully complied with and zone Arabs given opportunity make free decision re their lands.

Unless some such plan involving settlement by agreement can be evolved only alternative would seem to be SC action to impose settlement. We need not labor point that "simple solution" such as expropriation of Arab land against Syrian opposition wld revive other griefs in Pal dispute.

93. Re Syrian Israeli dispute: At UK instance Gen Riley met this afternoon with Jebb and staff (UK), Lacoste and Ordonneau (France), Ross and Maffitt (USUN) to discuss Syrian-Israeli dispute. Following para contains statements re Israeli compliance with May 18 res which Riley made in confidence. He emphasized he could not speak so freely at SC table.

There is nothing more he can do at present to obtain fuller implementation by Israel of May 18 res. Only part of res Israel has fully carried out is cessation of drainage operations on Arab-owned land. Less than ½ (357) of interned Arabs have been returned to zone: Those returned are concentrated at what was Bagguara and are not allowed by Israeli police to go out of town even to water and graze cattle: Israelis insist these Arabs have contact (purchases, etc.) only with Israel, in no case with Syria; at least 15 owners of lands within the seven acres have not been returned and perhaps 20 more may be still in Israel: of 153 mentioned in his report as not interviewed, Israelis themselves interviewed and returned 95. Regarding policing. Israel is in complete control of zone with police everywhere, 30 of which are concentrated at El Khouri farm with machine guns "to protect drainage workers". Riley will submit his final report at end of this week. Key to Riley's decision authorizing resumption of drainage operations on Israel-owned land was armistice agreement Article V and explanatory note which he interpreted as giving him power in agreement with Arab and Israeli communities (he considers Palestine Land Development Company a community for this purpose) to exercise certain powers.

Riley's only suggestion for solution of problem now is that Syria and Israel must sit down together and negotiate it. It was generally felt by reps present that impasse over scope of negotiations was insurmountable at present.

Reducing problem to simplest terms, Riley gave opinion that Syria was using Arab lands involved in Huleh project as lever to force Israel to rectify border more in line with what Syria considers its security requires.

In his forthcoming report Riley can only state facts in connection with manner in which Israel complying or not complying with May 18 res. Key fact is that Israel fails to recognize it does not possess sovereignty over demilitarized zone.

In past week new element has arisen in form of "High Commissioner's land." This, he said, is land, ownership to which has not been established. Problem it presents now is that Palestine Land Development Company has just begun operations on bottom of Jordan River. Riley holds they have no right to work on this land without his permission and he is sending dispatch requesting work not be done on such land.

There was discussion of Jordan water problem. Riley said he needed experts to determine effect of project on Syrian and Jordanian irrigation. Jebb inquired whether SC might order investigation of effects by UN Commission of inquiry. Riley said Israel has fixed November 1951 as deadline for completion of project and investigation would take time. However, UNRWA is already in existence and might with assistance make investigation quickly. Blandford had told him such investigation would be great help to him, but he was not equipped to undertake it. Ross wondered whether project would affect rehabilitation of refugees. Riley replied affirmatively, and cited Yarmouk River which is part of resettlement plans and will be affected by project.

Summing up, Riley said answering Ross, that without question, if Israel continues its close grip on zone and its strict measures applied to returned Arabs, situation will be dangerously explosive. He may even have to send Arabs across line into Syria for their own protection and this might set off explosion.

Jebb outlined tentative council procedure if Huleh matter comes back to it (which all present agreed Syria would bring about when Riley's report was in ): That SC study Riley's report, confirm May 18 res, and perhaps adopt res directing that investigation of water matter be made.

On May 24, the President recommended to the Congress the adoption of a Mutual Security Program with recommendations for: $23.5 million in economic aid for Israel, $23.5 million in economic assistance for the Arab States, $50 million for the Arab Refugee Program, and authority for $41.5 million in direct grants of military assistance to supplement purchases on a cash reimbursable basis by the states of the area.

On May 27, one hundred and fifty-five members of the House of Representatives urged early study and favorable action on bills to authorize economic aid to Israel. It is significant that their statement made no specific reference to the Congressional bill of April 2 authorizing $150 million for Israel. Other than that, there have been no outstanding efforts to push the Congressional bills authorizing $150 million for Israel. It is believed that the Israel government is aware that the Department does not favor a grant of $150 million to Israel and considers that the Mutual Security Program incorporates the total aid for the Near Eastern countries which the United States is prepared to grant this fiscal year.

On July 5, Jacob Blaustein, President of the American Jewish Committee and a prominent oil man, told me he did not think that the Mutual Security Program provided sufficient economic assistance for Israel. He was aware of the need for an impartial and objective program for the Near East, and suggested that the allocations for Israel and the Arab states be raised from $23.5 million to $75 million apiece. He said that if this were possible, he was sure he could get Congressional leaders to withdraw their bills for $150 million. He did not wish the Department's aid bill, which he supported generally, to be embarrassed by Congressional debate on the $150 million grantaid bills. I explained to Mr. Blaustein why we could not raise the figures.

Recommendations:

- 1. If your discussion with Mr. Feinberg discloses that he is still interested in the passage of the $150 million aid bill to Israel, it is recommended that you inform him (a) that the Department believes that the plan for the Arab states and Israel outlined in the Mutual Security Program provides a fair, impartial and generous plan of assistance for the area; (b) that the sum proposed for Israel takes into account Israel's request for $150 million grant-aid; (c) that the $50 million for the Arab refugees could be considered as much an indirect aid to Israel as to the Arab states; (d) that United States budgetary limitations, as well as the needs of other areas of the world, preclude assistance to Israel in any greater amount.
- 2. You might wish to tell Mr. Feinberg that the United States has already provided considerable assistance to Israel, as follows: (a) $135 million from the Export-Import Bank; (b) $100,000 for technical assistance; (c) $87,580 under the Exchange of Persons Program; and (d) $23,101,867 worth of free assistance from the Department of Agriculture in the form of surplus agricultural commodities out of an approximate total of $47 million to all countries for the same period.<sup>3</sup>

58. Azzam Pasha tells me that he is very much concerned about the Suez restrictions at SC as he apprehends that it will cause another flare-up of Arab countries against the UK and US, which he does not believe to be in the gen interest at this time and he fears that it will cause Arabs to take a still more unrealistic attitude than they are now taking towards the Iron Curtain, and he is especially concerned about their position on other questions of world importance before the UN.

I asked him if he had any suggestions to offer, and while he talked a lot he came up with nothing constructive.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Director of the Office of Near Eastern Affairs (Jones)

CONFIDENTIAL

[Washington, ?] July 18, 1951.

US/S/1805

Subject: General Position of Israel.

Participants: Abba Eban, Ambassador of Israel

Mr. G. Lewis Jones, Director, NE, Department of State

I lunched today with Israel Ambassador Eban at his invitation. Eban was more friendly and relaxed than I have seen him for a long time. He did not appear to have any particular axe to grind and the conversation covered a broad area.

Suez Canal Dispute:

Eban did not seem to have a very easy mind regarding the Suez Canal dispute. He realizes that it may open a Pandora's Box, involving Anglo-Egyptian relations, Treaty of 1888, etc., etc. He hoped that the debate could be limited strictly to the area of the Israel complaint. Eban appeared to have no doubt that Israel could make a strong case against Egypt in debate. He said that he had been working up the Israeli case and had discovered that Egypt appears to have "secretly declared war" against Israel in early 1950: prior to this time Egypt had stated in writing that there was no need for a peace settlement with Israel since Egypt was not at war with Israel. Eban hoped that the US would help in the job of getting Egypt to lift the restrictions—the main object of the exercise.

I said that the US is still considering what its position will be in the SC but it is well known we object to the Egyptian restrictions as interference with commerce, impractical, etc. I said that I thought the Egyptian restrictions worked against the interests of Egypt since they prevented the British Government from moving towards the Egyptian position in the Anglo-Egyptian dispute. The parliamentary situation in the UK with regard to Suez is one of the simple facts of the situation. I said that it seemed to me that the simplest way to obviate the acrimonious debate sure to take place in the SC would be for Egypt quietly to suspend its restrictions before the debate began. I inquired whether, if Egypt did this, Israel would feel impelled to "crow over Egypt". Eban replied that he thought not: Israel is chiefly interested in having the restrictions lifted; moreover, Israel continues to think that Egypt is the key to a peace settlement with the Arabs and obviously the SC action would not facilitate such a settlement.

Israeli Elections: 1

Eban said that the news that he has received from Israel indicates that things are "going pretty well for our side"; i.e., Ben Gurion. He thought that once the elections were over, Israel would be in a better position to make political decisions. He, Rafael and Elath (from London) are returning to Tel Aviv during August to consult. He planned to do his best to remove the idea prevalent in some circles in Tel Aviv that the US has shifted to a pro-Arab policy. He has reported continually that the US is trying to follow the line of being neither pro-Arab nor pro-Israel. He thought that the May 18 Resolution was taken far too seriously in Tel Aviv as a pro-Arab move by the United States.

I assured Eban that he would be correct if he reported the US is "neither pro-Arab, nor pro-Israel". The May 18 Resolution, I said, is based upon firm support of the UN. We called the shots as we saw them. It seemed to me that the reasonable and consistent line would be for us to take the same attitude in connection with the Suez Canal dispute.

Prospects for Peace:

Eban gloomily volunteered, with regard to the prospects for peace with the Arabs, that he regretted that he could see "no light at the end of the tunnel". He did not feel that time is improving the prospects for peace, since the Arabs did not appear to be interested in peace.

This gave me an opportunity to describe our views on "tissue knitting" and Israel's "orthodox approach". With regard to the former, I mentioned the informal trade and other relations which appear to have been worked out between Israel and the Lebanon. I said that I was delighted that the Flight Information Center in Beirut, inaugurated July 5, had announced that it would work with aircraft of any nationality. This was "tissue knitting". I thought that something would be gained if only a few kilometers, a frontier between Israel and its Arab neighbors, could be settled as boundaries: this might be done through unilateral declarations.

I pointed out to Eban that the "orthodox approach" (i.e., save everything for the final peace bargaining) had been tried for  $2\frac{1}{2}$  years and had been unsuccessful. It seemed to me that the alternative, or "unorthodox" approach should now be attempted. In this connection I mentioned (a) Haifa free zone; (b) Arab blocked balances; (c) willingness Israel to sit down and talk with the Arabs (e.g., Syria) on any subject; and (d) Israel's opening, as a "unilateral act of strength", road across the Negeb for the free use of anybody wishing to use the road within certain security safeguards. With regard to (d) I hazarded the guess that there would be a good deal of traffic on this road within a very short time and that the Arabs using the road would help create the atmosphere necessary for more formal peace arrangements in the future.

Eban raised the point of the "cultural" lag which now exists between the Arab States and Israel. He said that Israel today has very little knowledge of Arab thoughts and feelings, although under the mandate there was a brisk traffic in ideas between the Arabs and the Jews. He said the tendency in blockaded Israel is to ignore the existence of the Arab World except as something menacing and encircling. He thought this was wrong because "the Arabs represent a powerful and worthwhile culture".

I commented that it was up to men like Eban, who previously had known the Arab World intimately, to bring home to the Israeli Government and people the importance of their geographic and ethnic surroundings. Eban remarked that Ben Gurion "hardly knows there is an Arab World—Sharett does know".

Commenting on "tissue knitting", Eban said that the difficulty with this course is the political one inside Israel where it is extremely hard to explain while Israel is the object of an economic blockade and daily menaces from the Arabs, why Israel should undertake courses of action favorable to the Arabs. He saw the reasoning behind "tissue knitting", but he was afraid that it called for a special breed of Israeli—a "Super Israeli" who would accept the principle of "unorthodox" acts, in the face of Arab League boasts of plots for his destruction.

108. Re Suez. Yesterday Fawzi (Egypt) at his request called on Gross and spent over an hour with Gross, Ross and Maffitt. He said he wished to do his personal best to help in present situation regarding Egyptian restrictions on trade and communications with Israel. He assured us Egypt did not fear SC meeting on Suez matter since it has done and is doing nothing which a govt in state of war with another could not do. To contrary, restrictions considerably short of maximum permissible and are being cut down. Egypt had to safeguard its sovereignty and security. Need to protect its security required Egypt to prevent Israel obtaining oil. At same time Egypt did not want to deny oil to nations of free world. Fawzi hoped some way might be found out of this paradox. He seemed concerned at possibilities presented by forthcoming SC debate and urged that nothing be done in council that would undermine Egyptian sovereignty since Egypt would be unable accept such action. He cautioned against (1) our entering SC debate without clear idea of what we wanted done and (2) "railroading through" res without giving parties chance to make their views known. He hoped there could be res agreed upon in free consultation outside of council before debate joined.

Fawzi went on to say that if anything could be done to "alleviate" burden caused us by present restrictions, he would be very happy. He suggested we explore possibilities and he asked whether SC meeting very imminent. He seemed to have in mind placating us by some gesture or other before council meeting to hear Israeli complaint. At same time he was confident we realized debate would not be confined to Suez Canal restrictions since it would be difficult to prevent whole range of UK-Egyptian problems such as 1936 treaty, Sudan, etc., from coming up.

Referring to views he expressed last autumn, Fawzi said US must attend to bolstering up of NE. He had heard our policy was to give only such military assistance to all Arab states together as we gave to Israel alone. He deprecated this. He felt we should seek to build up Arab world and regain its confidence. In this connection he made obscure recommendation that if we cannot give Arabs exactly what they want we offer them something else, to show them we are friendly. Fawzi put in disclaimer of any intention to bargain and said he was simply giving us his friendly personal advice.

110. Re Syrian-Israeli Dispute. Re Usun 93, July 16.1

We suggest for Dept's consideration following program of action re Syrian-Israeli dispute over Huleh drainage project:

1. An effort to persuade Riley, having consulted in NY, to return to Palestine and make one more strong try to iron out differences and bring parties together for solution this dispute. SC meanwhile would not be convened. Before returning to Palestine, Riley might file report he now has in mind reciting facts in situation as he now sees them but indicating that he is returning to Palestine after consultation here for purpose indicated. It may, of course, be very difficult to persuade Riley to follow this course since in his present mood it seems clear that he wants to leave the baby on the SC's doorstep. If Riley should, before returning to Palestine, file a report of the nature he apparently has in mind, it would be very difficult to avoid council mtg at this point; it might, therefore, be preferable if Riley refrained from issuing a further report at this time.

2. If Riley is unwilling to return to Palestine as indicated above or if he should return and his mission should result in failure, SC might take up matter with view to following action.

(a) Reaffirmation and clarification of essential parts of May 18 resolutions (in order strengthen Riley's hands) and SC request to him to renew his effort.

(b) In order assist SC in its consideration of problem since it appears to have ramifications concerning water supply for entire Jordan area, SC might request Blandford (with assistance, if needed, of technical experts provided by SYG) to study and report to SC as matter of urgency on economic and related implications, including problem of refugee resettlement. In view of previous studies which have been made and Blandford's knowledge of General situation, he should be able to produce such report in relatively brief time.

43. 1. In view nature Israel complaint Dept considers Suez question shld be brought up in SC as part of gen Pal question and SC action shld be based primarily on Egypt's violation of spirit and intent of Armistice Agreement. Altho second aspect Suez question para 4b Deptel 17 2 wld be treated incidentally, Dept quite concerned that too great emphasis on effect of blockade on other than Israel commerce and on belligerent rights might lead to suggestion UK, US, Fr and possibly Neth are also parties to dispute with Egypt in view of protest made by these powers, and under Chapter VI procedure shld abstain in voting on proposed or similar res. While such suggestion cld be handled by Jebb as Pres, Dept feels strength of SC position vis-à-vis Egypt might be considerably weakened. Furthermore, problem of exercise belligerent right is legal question which cld only be finally determined by ICJ and we believe SC shld not attempt assert its right to deal with this problem.

2. Dept has noted drafting modifications suggested by UKDel re paras 5, 6 and 7 and is in full agreement with those suggestions. We wld suggest that para 6 cld be strengthened by a quotation from Armistice Agreement, specifically para 4 Art 1 and/or para 2 Art XII. We believe that this wld indicate that factually speaking hostilities not only no longer exist, but are ruled out indefinitely. This is basically what Dept had in mind in para 5 Deptel 17. We consider effect all these changes wld be that SC action basically rests on Egypt violation of intent and spirit Armistice Agreement.

3. It is probable Egypt arguments in presenting case will be predominantly legalistic, based on Riley findings, alleged belligerent rights, and 1888 Convention. It is possible Egypt will request consideration these pts by ICJ and in this event US, in view its consistent policy re utilization ICJ, wld be inclined support. Shld Egypt make such request and it gained support, we wld envisage modification para 11 of UK draft res so that SC wld call upon Egypt to suspend restrictions pending ICJ advisory opinion. We share UK preference that this procedure be avoided but UKDel shld be left in no doubt re our attitude.

lieve it wld be appropriate for SC in its res to note wider implications restrictions. UK draft in gen recognizes proper relationship of this element thru placing para 9 and 10 after SC findings. Dept suggest this relationship cld be further clarified thru amending para 9 and 10 to read as fol:

- "... and further noting that the restrictions on the passage of goods thru the Suez Canal to Israeli ports are denying to nations, at no time connected with the conflict in Pal, invaluable supplies required for their econ reconstruction; and that these restrictions together with sanctions applied by Egypt to certain ships which have visited Israeli ports rep unjustified interference with the rights of nations to navigate the seas and to trade freely with one another."
- 5. US disposed to co-sponsor if suggested approach to SC debate and substance suggested revisions including UKDel's contained page 2 UK draft res (US/S/1794)<sup>3</sup> are acceptable to UK. In co-sponsoring we assume UK will continue to take lead particularly in securing other co-sponsors.
- 6. As UK res with suggested modifications wild appear to be satis, Dept wild see no necessity for considering Israeli draft res. In fact we can see considerable disadvantage in Israel pressing its views or circulating draft res.
- 7. Re timing dept assumes Jebb will wish to initiate SC consideration of this complaint during his presidency.

Comment on Embtel 59, July 20.3 Fon Min spoke with strong feeling of content ltr July 18 from Col Taxis saying it was "new surprise from Gen Riley". He pointed out it represented complete reversal Israel's understanding position taken heretofore and quoted Gen Riley's reply to Mr Von Balluseck, Neth rep, to effect that ISMAC wld have jurisdiction over Palestine Land Development Co concession only where it involves land within demil zone which is the property of Arab refugees. He quoted Gen Riley further as stating this "is the only part of that concession with which we have anything to do. It is not the concession itself but the expropriating of land to carry out the purpose of the Huleh concession." He explained care had been exercised avoid any trespass on Arab-owned lands and in excavations in river bed opposite Arab property soil removed had been conveyed some distance to non-Arab property. He complained further that such a "highly important, not to say explosive, communication, shld be addressed to a local rep" of the PLDC when it raised questions which cld be decided only on highest level of govt.

I did not undertake to discuss technical aspects Israel's relationship with UNTSO in Huleh dispute, but stated informally and on my own responsibility that much capital was being made of Israel's alleged non-compliance with UN dictates, and that Israel can ill afford any policy other than complete and whole-hearted coop with UN.

FonMin contrasted today forthright attitude US Govt in sponsoring resolution condemning Israel with what appeared to him to be its reluctance and hesitation to take clear-cut position on action Egypt in obstructing Suez Canal traffic. Believe his remarks were prompted by report from Eban on recent conversations New York and Washington which Sharett found far from encouraging. He expressed view that by failure to sponsor resolution, or by merely refraining from commenting, US may encourage and imply tacit acceptance of pernicious Egyptian doctrine that state of war still exists and that it has right to interfere with international traffic ways.

FonMin referred to press story yesterday from Cairo that Egypt prepared permit passage of tankers but only under certain conditions (that Israel give undertaking products wld not be used in aggressive war against Arab States and that some kind of international board on which Egypt wld be represented be set up to protect interests Arab countries). Sharett said it wld be easy for Israel to give such assurances since it contemplates no aggressive action, but idea of board unacceptable. He feels moreover principle involved shld not be compromised. He said once more it was difficult for him to reconcile our active line on Huleh with apparently negative one on present case, that he felt failure of powers to take stand on such important principle wld be a "smashing blow to whole edifice of armistice agreements". He concluded with comment that Egypt cld hardly say its interference with waterway to Akaba was other than military.

Emb reiterates opinion expressed Embtel 33, July 13 4 to effect US can ill afford fail take forthright stand on Suez question. After reading UK draft resolution Deptel 49, feel we have much to gain and little to lose in ME and world by co-sponsorship and clearcut support resolution and important principles involved.

As to relations with this country, I believe we shld not delay in making clear our views re effect its actions have on chances for making peace in ME. Sharett has expressed his views bluntly but fairly, this time it is Israel's surprise at our delay in taking definite stand on Suez question. Consider it important speak with equal candor on subject reftels. If Israel's conduct so [in?] Huleh dispute and other matters is regarded as so unsatisfactory as to represent danger to effectiveness of UN in maintaining peace in ME, and color our whole attitude toward Israel, the time has come for plain speaking. If Dept concurs, I recommend I be instructed to leave govt here in no doubt re nature of and reasons for US displeasure. In this connection wld appreciate having urgently a carefully documented statement of points in Huleh and other matters in which US and UN regard Israel's conduct unsatisfactory.

It is believed further that to tell Eban alone will not be sufficient. Such action wld probably lead to renewed habile self-justification and be only partially effective. Parallel action here is considered important if we are to achieve best results and protect standing of Emb. Believe my position here will be seriously prejudiced if I fail to give ample and clear forewarning before this govt again be confronted by adverse decisions re its actions in Huleh and other matters for which it has not prepared its public.

Wld appreciate Dept's comments soonest since above considered very urgent in view reaction to development in Huleh question reported Embtel 60, July 20.

The Acting United States Representative at the United Nations (Gross) to the Department of State <sup>1</sup>

SECRET PRIORITY NEW YORK, July 20, 1951—7:12 p. m.

127. Re Suez, Deptel 43 of July 19.2 We are concerned over several aspects of Suez matter which we bring to Dept's attention as meriting consideration.

It seems to us that canal and other restrictions practiced by Egyptians are so inextricably bound up with larger NE and ME problems that action on them must be considered in light of over-all issues. We understand desired result, but result toward which we are heading is not clear to us since Cairo's 62 of July 18,3 as well as opinions of Turks, French and other dels here indicate probability Egypt will not heed SC request for dropping of restrictions. Fawzi (Egypt) made very clear his govt had delicate problem with Egyptian people over question of country's sovereignty. Govt of Egypt could probably not accept any council action of coercive nature (our tel 108, July 18).4 This in addition to what fears Egypt may have of Israeli expansionism.

Further to this considerable factor there are at least 2 others we should note. One is that, as indicated mytel 122 of this morning, there is increasing uncertainty that UK draft res will obtain majority. In any case our maximum effort will be necessary to swing balance with members such as Turkey or China to obtain majority, assuming, as we possibly should not do, that Netherlands del instructions to support British draft, as amended by UKDel, hold. We question whether US should be thus forced into lead. Deptel 43 of July 19 in para 5 assumes UK will continue take lead. Jebb yesterday in his emphasis on importance of US co-sponsorship clearly implied UK unable swing it without our "strong cooperation", which is a euphemism for initiative:

We assume that if draft res does not have assured majority, SC debate on substance of res should be avoided if possible. Confirmation this assumption is requested.

The other factor is fanatical nationalism manifested in assassinations of Riad el-Sol and King Abdullah,<sup>6</sup> which we take to be manifestations of wide-spread Arab hostility to West stemming from past history and creation of Israel. We wonder whether strong US role in council action against Egypt will not further stimulate this nationalist reaction.

We should probably add our view that Egypt may have its problem with UK as much in mind as its situation vis-à-vis Israel. Fawzi has warned that this will inevitably come up if Suez restrictions are considered by SC and it may be that the latter will not be soluble without some attention to the former.

Assuming that our immediate objective is to get restrictions lifted and taking into account bearing of above circumstances on methods of so doing, we feel that early council action on a res is not best approach either to Suez matter or to over-all problem. Following launching of SC debate on Israel complaint and Egyptian reply, we should like to see further and intensified diplomatic efforts, including USUN talks with Fawzi (Egypt) pursuant to his offer of cooperation reported in ourtel 108, in effort to develop possibilities of action outside of SC. If results are not visible within two weeks or so council could meet again to consider appropriate action, whether adoption of a res, or making use of UN methods of peaceful settlement such as appointment of conciliation commission (possibly on UNCFI lines) or of rapporteur under rule 28 as conciliator or mediator. If necessary, following effort of one of these two, arbitration might be tried along lines of March 30 res on Kashmir. Door would thus be kept open and Egypt would not be forced into position of intransigence.

A logical selection for rapporteur if this move should be tried would be Muniz of Brazil. His personal qualifications, his country's neutral position, taken together with disqualification for one reason or other of most other SC members, practically narrows choice down to him.

With situation created by such council move, US would be free to exercise informal good offices behind the scenes, without constraint on Egypt imposed by public coercive aspects of precipitate SC action.

Dept comments foregoing urgently requested, since I have agreed to see Jebb and Lacoste Mon eve for definitive discussion.

Dept appreciates thoughtful analysis urtel 127 Jul 20.2 In reaching decisions contained in Deptel 43 Jul 19 3 Dept gave most careful thought to broader implications SC consideration Suez Canal problem in relation to stability and security in NE and recognized that unpleasant prospects and risks (Deptel 15 Jul 7) 4 were involved (which may have now increased to some degree as result of assassination Abdullah and Solh). We have always preferred that Suez restrictions be settled through normal dipl means and indeed we are still endeavoring through Emb Cairo to achieve that end. that it shares our preference, we cannot see how SC action can be postponed much longer, unless of course reported lack of support for UK res continues. We feel that in cases where violence is being done to Armistice Agreements, either in spirit or letter, and where SC action is unavoidable, failure on our part to face up to issues can only have most damaging effect on integrity Armistice Agreements and our policy of impartiality. In addition price of Arab friendship on these terms wld seem high.

It shid, therefore, be clear that while we are not anxious for early, or even any, SC action, we are not willing exert pressure postpone such action if no legitimate reason exists for so doing.

We shld know in next few days whether Egypt Govt has any intention to "settle out of Court," but in meantime we must continue assume likelihood SC debate some time in the next several weeks. Re this, reported lack of support for UK res poses most important problem. Deptels 17 <sup>5</sup> and 43 emphasize that we do not intend to take lead in SC debate and we see no reason to change that pt of view. We have, however, indicated disposition to co-sponsor UK res provided certain conditions are accepted, and once we have settled with UK, and presumably Fr, on these conditions, additional support for UK res, likely to be attracted (we assume that since we have not yet agreed with UK, Turkey, China and others not yet aware of our decision re co-sponsorship).

In essence we presume that calling of SC mtg now depends on (1) whether or not dipl approaches succeed and, (2) mustering by UK of support for its res. At this pt answers to these questions are unknown but if response to (1) is negative and (2) positive we wild not be inclined to discourage calling a mtg even under US presidency.

In our view best time for SC to discuss Suez question wld be when Riley submits his report on Huleh wherein he wld presumably discuss Israel non-compliance with May 18 res. It is understood report may be made about Aug. 15. These two items discussed at same time wld demonstrate effectively US impartiality and basic concern over enforcement of armistice system. This procedure might also lessen possibility accusation US-UK requiring Egypt comply with intent of Armistice Agreement while ignoring Israel noncompliance May 18 res.

We feel that once SC debate has commenced it shid be carried through to conclusion with only brief delay if settlement outside of SC appears likely. Resort to methods of settlement such as Conciliation Commission, rapporteur or mediator wild seem undesirable once SC action has begun but resort to some device might be necessary. Re expedient of UNCFI procedure Dept believes that US wild run risk of being Israel's nominee which wld compromise our position of impartiality. Resort to Kashmir arbitration procedure also risky as yet not tested re likelihood any pts between parties cld be settled prior to obligatory arbitration. Re rapporteur, if UK prepared to accept possibility delay and no concommitant guarantee of solution of problem, resort might be made to appointment such with short stipulated time wherein to report to SC.

Dept reiterates its view that US position in SC debate shld be based primarily on enforcement spirit and intent of Armistice Agreement with secondary attn being paid to adverse effect restrictions on our interests. Our attitude wld be governed by our understanding of the facts in the case and our desire to enforce Riley's and MAC's position and wld be consistent with our previous pronouncements in SC re Pal problem.

While we recognize there is chance Egypt might not comply with SC res calling for raising of restrictions we do not consider that our position shid be predicated on this assumption. Consequently, we are not prepared enter into discussions on sanctions question now.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Acting Officer in Charge of Lebanon-Syria-Iraq Affairs (Barrow)

SECRET

[Washington,] July 24, 1951.

Subject: Future of Jordan.

Participants: Abba Eban, Ambassador of Israel

Meir Shalit, First Secretary, Embassy of Israel

G. Lewis Jones—NE John A. Waldo—NE John R. Barrow—NE

Discussion

Mr. Eban opened the conversation by saying that apart from profound shock, the initial reaction of the Israeli Government to the assassination of King Abdullah was one of some concern for the future. Israel had entered into an Armistice Agreement with Jordan on the basis of its respect for the integrity of King Abdullah and on the understanding that there would be a certain balance between the military forces on either side of the border. This situation would be radiically changed if Jordan were to be incorporated into a "great sprawling Iraq" with which Israel had no Armistice Agreement and which had shown itself to be very hostile toward Israel. If any such merger were imminent, the pressure exerted by the Revisionists in Israel would be greatly intensified. Israel would be somewhat less fearful of incorporation of Jordan into Syria because it had armistice arrangements with Syria, but believed that for the present the status of Jordan should not be changed. It was conceivable that some day when the political climate in the Near East improved, Israel would be able to acquiesce to some form of an Arab Union taking place, but from Israel's point of view any step in that direction now would be premature.

Mr. Jones asked Mr. Eban whether he was personally sold on the thesis that unification of Jordan with any other Arab state would necessarily impose a greater security threat to Israel. It was possible, he thought, that there would be so many internal problems in bringing about a true coalescence, that there would be no question for quite some time of such a state seeking to attack Israel. Mr. Eban said he feared that one of the prime motivations for a merger of the Arab States would be the hope of bringing stronger pressure to bear against Israel.

Mr. Barrow remarked that assuming, for the sake of argument, a peaceful union of Iraq and Jordan were brought about it would seem to be the normal procedure for Iraq to assume all of Jordan's international obligations, which would presumably include the Armistice Agreement.

The discussion then turned to speculation as to who was responsible for Abdullah's assassination. Mr. Eban said that he did not think the rumors that the ex-Mufti was involved could be discounted. It was an unfortunate fact that nearly every Arab leader who had dealt with Israel in the Armistice negotiations had been assassinated—Nokrashy in Egypt, Zaim in Syria, Riad Solh in Lebanon, and now Abdullah. He said these assassinations did not all spring from the same source and the motives no doubt went beyond the mere fact that all of these leaders had had dealings with Israel, but this striking coincidence, if it was a coincidence, would undoubtedly be a strong deterrent to any other Arab leader dealing with Israel.

Mr. Barrow said that he admitted that the assassination of Abdullah made the prospects for Palestine settlement bleaker than ever but wondered whether there might not be a bare possibility of some gambits being developed in the present situation that could be used to turn the present tragedy to advantage in bringing about a peaceful settlement.

Mr. Eban said he thought that the only way the Arabs could be brought to make peace was by the Great Powers bringing strong pressure to bear, e.g., by the withholding of economic and military aid. Mr. Jones noted that leaders in Syria were making political capital out of renouncing United States aid and he thought any pressure of the kind Mr. Eban suggested would result only in a feeling of martyrdom and produce the opposite effect desired. On the other hand, the United States was trying to sell the "peace" line in virtually every conversation it had with Arab representatives, and he thought it possible that some day the cumulative effect of these efforts would pay off.

Mr. Jones remarked that if Israel felt obliged to oppose incorporation of Jordan into another Arab state, it had a staunch ally in Egypt who was just as opposed to any other Arab state gaining power and influence which might threaten Egypt's hegemony in the Arab World. Perhaps now was the dramatic moment for Israel's making a unilateral "act of strength". The Arabs would all be expecting Israel to pounce on Arab Palestine or at least to play the dog-in-the-manger. If Israel would cross them up by taking a tack in the opposite direction with some "tissue-knitting" gestures, such as, for example, giving Egypt a free-way across Israel territory to the other Arab States, the wind might be taken out of the sails of those Arab leaders who claimed Israel could never be a "good citizen" of the Near East.

Mr. Eban remarked that the fallacy in Mr. Jones' reasoning was that it contained no element of reciprocity. He was sure a rather imposing list of practical "tissue-knitting" concessions could be drawn up and set off against concessions of parallel value to be made by the Arabs. However, Israel could not be expected to make unilateral gestures without some reciprocal benefit.

Mr. Jones said it was the unilateral nature of the act which was important if Israel was to gain goodwill from it. Although admitting that Mr. Eban's approach was the orthodox one, it was obvious that up to now it had not worked. So long as Israel gave the impression that it had an inferiority complex and had to trade off each little advantage for some reciprocal advantage, he felt the Arabs would continue to be intransigent. On the other hand, if Israel adopted the attitude that it was a strong state that was going to exist for a thousand years and that it could therefore afford to take "acts of strength", the Arab psychology might be significantly changed.

Mr. Eban said that he appreciated this argument, but it was nevertheless a fact that Israel was pressed in by its larger Arab neighbors and said he thought Mr. Jones should put himself in the position of an Israeli leader trying to defend a unilateral gesture before the Knesset. The members of the Knesset would inevitably want to know what benefit the Israelis had derived from their gesture since the desire for a quid pro quo was a normal attribute of human nature.

Mr. Jones said that he thought it possible that Mr. Eban had indeed put his finger on the fallacy of his argument, namely that it would take a "super-Israeli" to carry out the policy. Nevertheless, he thought the effect of allowing an Egyptian leader like Salaheddin to drive through Israel on a free-way to Amman or Damascus to attend an Arab League meeting (even though the purpose of the meeting should be to condemn the Israelis) should be considered in the light of what a strong talking point it would be in endeavoring to convince people of the Arab World that Israel's announced intentions of being a good neighbor were genuine.

Mr. Shalit remarked that he thought unilateral acts of strength on Israel's part would increase Israel's prestige in the rest of the world, but doubted that the Arabs would interpret it the same way. He believed the Arabs would think it a sign of weakness and an indication that the Arab economic boycott of Israel was having a telling effect. This in turn would only encourage the Arabs further to tighten the boycott. Mr. Jones agreed that this might be the snap reaction but thought the Arabs would start to wonder if the policy was continued. The concessions involved would not be very great; Israel could take full security precautions, and if the policy didn't work, the concessions could later be withdrawn.

The discussion ended with Mr. Eban's asking the estimate of those present as to how the death of Abdullah would affect the Vatican's attitude toward Jerusalem. Israel's opposition to internationalization of Jerusalem had been strategically less important than Jordan's, and if a new Jordan regime were to take a weaker stand on the question, he wondered what the outcome might be. In after thought he said that there were some concrete economic and financial reasons why any Jordan Government would tend to oppose internationalization, and he supposed that Abdullah's death would not affect the situation greatly. In this, those present concurred.

WASHINGTON, July 27, 1951.

My Dear Ambassador Palmer: The Department has given careful consideration to the problems confronting the Palestine Conciliation Commission in its task of carrying out the instructions it has received from the General Assembly of the United Nations. The Department has reviewed the Commission's activities since its creation by the General Assembly in 1948, in light of the present situation in the Near and Middle East and has been greatly assisted in its deliberations by the reports it has received from the United States Delegation to the Commission. We have been seriously concerned with the fact that up to the present the Palestine Conciliation Commission has not made a more significant contribution to the settlement of the problems dividing the countries of the Near East and we firmly believe that the Commission has an obligation imposed upon it to seek solution of the problems and difficulties involved in the Palestine situation. The Department has concluded that at an early meeting of the PCC you should advocate new and more vigorous efforts by the Commission, which, as a result of its wide experience, is in the best position to deal with the present situation. In this connection the Department has given careful consideration to the views and concern of the Governments of France, Turkey and United Kingdom.

I should like to outline for your guidance in your discussions with your colleagues on the Commission the steps which the Department feels the Commission might now undertake:

1. The Department of State believes that the mandate of the General Assembly to the Palestine Conciliation Commission is of such a nature as to require a more authoritative and direct role on the part of the PCC than it has heretofore assumed. The nature of the problems with which the Commission must deal necessitates in our opinion a procedure based upon the Commission's authority to mediate between the various governments concerned. The Department believes that the experience of the past two years should convince Israel and the Arab States that the United Nations body created for this purpose by the General Assembly is best fitted for this function.

2. The assumption of the role of mediator in the matters dividing the governments concerned presupposes the necessity for negotiations as envisaged in the various resolutions of the United Nations General Assembly, particularly the resolution of December 18, 1950. The Department is of the opinion that the PCC might decide that the time has come when a conference for this purpose should be called.

3. The Department believes that such a conference should be for the purpose of discussing and suggesting solutions for specific problems including the repatriation of refugees, territorial adjustments, compensation, the release of blocked accounts and other important subjects such as unsolved problems in the Jerusalem area and the use of the Jordan waters. Specifically, the Commission might put forward suggestions based on the following considerations:

a) A multilateral non-aggression declaration or pact to be entered into between Israel and the individual Arab states on the initiative of the Commission might greatly reduce tensions in the area and produce an atmosphere conducive to the solution of individual problems.

b) An approach to the problem of repatriation might start with the selection of those classes of refugees whose repatriation could be considered by Israel as beneficial to its economy. Likewise the return of selected groups of property owners for residence and resumption of control of their property might obviate some of the larger compensation claims.

c) The agreement of Israel and the Arab States on the principle of compensation and the approximate total amount might advance the possibility of ultimate payment. Similarly the announcement of Israel's agreement to proposals for a practical solution of the compensation problem might provide the PCC with a talking point for the Arab States' relaxation of trade and other restrictions.

- d) An agreement to accord the Mixed Armistice Commission greater scope in the handling of current ad hoc problems might greatly improve day to day relations. A PCC-fostered agreement between the parties for the elimination, partition, reduction or redelimitation of the demilitarized zones, or the definition of the armistice lines or segments thereof, as de facto national boundaries pending final settlement, might bring the parties appreciably closer to a final peace.
- 4. The Department hopes that if the PCC decides to undertake the more direct and formal approach of exercising its mediation functions within the framework of a conference between Israel and the Arab States, results may be achieved of mutual benefit to the parties concerned. In response to the Commission's request, the United States will be prepared to lend all appropriate diplomatic support for the convening of such a conference. The Department appreciates the fact that all of the specific problems which at present divide the parties may not be susceptible of immediate solution but believes that if one or more of these outstanding problems were settled satisfactorily this would be a much needed contribution to peace and security in the area.

5. It would be appreciated if you would inform the Department as soon as possible concerning the results of your consultations with your colleagues in order that adequate time may be permitted for consideration of such future dispositions as may be necessary by the next General Assembly.

Sincerely yours,

DEAN ACHESON

Such occasion will present itself Monday, July 30, when Gross lunches with him. In telecon which resulted in this date, Gross told Fawzi we had in mind trying to find out what specifics Fawzi could develop re recent rumors of Egyptian proposals or intentions. Fawzi indicated that he would be prepared to go into this at lunch.

We think operations in NY carried out by UK and French as well as ourselves can, unless Caffery is engaged in a delicate one in Cairo which might be prejudiced by talks here, be utilized to get across to Egyptian Govt beyond doubt and wishful thinking what and how firm our position is. We should like to tell Fawzi (a) we are in no doubt re merits of case and want restrictions entirely dropped; (b) question is how to get them lifted; (c) we are Egypt's friend and would hope it can spare itself the blow to its prestige of SC res of nature we are talking over with British and French (summary of which we would communicate to Fawzi); (d) has Fawzi any specific proposals to this end?

Jebb has engagement to see Fawzi Monday afternoon. French have instructions to press for intensive diplomatic explorations and can be counted on to add their bit with Fawzi. Both they and Brit prefer tripartite approach to Fawzi and although Jebb has indicated to him, without our authorization, UK desire for joint US-UK-Fr discussions, we have not committed ourselves to join and do not propose to do so unless our separate talk with Fawzi suggests a joint approach clearly desirable.

Re talk with Fawzi, we should be greatly helped by Dept's views on following subjects before lunch Monday:

(1) Is Dept prepared to state flatly there is not and has not been state of war between Israel and Egypt;

(2) Is it our minimum demand that Egypt fully suspend restrictions or lighten them "to point of invisibility";

(3) In light of Fawzi's assumption in his SC statement yesterday that Egypt is at war and has full right to practice canal restrictions and carry out blockade measures even on high seas, could SC sign off from giving opinion on this point of such basic importance to armistice agreement system in general;

(4) Does fact that Caffery still may have initiative in Cairo have any restrictive effect on conversations with Fawzi in NY?

Finally, to achieve maximum impact on Egyptian Govt, we recommend identical approaches as above (points a-d) also by Dept to Egyptian Emb and Caffery to FonOff.

New York, July 27, 1951—8:25 p.m. SECRET PRIORITY

157. Re Suez: Eban (Israel) accompanied by Lourie and Rafael, called at his request on Gross this morning. Ross and Maffitt were present. His stated desire was to exchange views in light of statements at SC table vesterday.

First and probably most important point Eban made was that Fawzi's statement expounded principle that state of war exists between Israel and Egypt and that Egypt therefore has right to take what measures it feels necessary in interest its own security including high-seas blockade operations. Eban's conclusions from this statement were two-fold:

(1) Regardless of what may be developed outside of SC looking toward solution this particular case, formal SC action is now unavoidable since Egypt has posed questions of principle. Matter is no longer just between Israel and Egypt, but between UN and Egypt. If UN acquiesces in Egypt's attitude, basis of armistice agreements system will be undermined. SC cannot "honorably and expediently" avoid facing this issue squarely.

(2) If Egyptian view is allowed to stand, Israel, which has based its policies on theory that hostilities are over and parties are working toward early permanent peaceful settlement, must revise these policies and be prepared take measures corresponding to those taken by Egypt.

Eban said that underlying significance of Suez issue is that there is no disposition in Arab world to work toward peace with Israel. Therefore armistice agreements system must for indefinite period be basis relations Israel with Arab states. Therefore Israel wishes to reinforce system, and Arabs to take advantage of it to wage economic warfare in safety against Israel. Unless UN takes measures, Israel will suffer injustice and must look to protection its own interests.

For our part, Gross said very little doubt our own mind re merits of question and we have no reason to think Dept has altered view that failing successful settlement outside of Council we will move toward res which we are prepared to co-sponsor if agreement reached on it, which would request lifting of restrictions. At moment too early to say whether we will table a res; we have not talked with Fawzi and did not know what, if anything, Egyptian Govt may have in mind to permit desired result be achieved without formal SC request. We did not necessarily envisage passing directly from private talks to Council res since Council could choose from variety of approaches. Gross wondered what ideas Eban might have in mind re next Council action.

Eban said that on past experience it was obvious Egypt would stall if pressure lifted. Tactically therefore res should be tabled Wednesday. At each stage of progress toward final action Egypt had full opportunity correct its position. However, as he had said, it was difficult to see how Council could avoid some formal action to deal with Egyptian claim of existence state of war.

Gross was puzzled how we get desired result. Did Eban assume Egypt would comply with res? Eban replied affirmatively, Rafael adding res would give Egyptian Govt justification before its people for dropping restrictions. Gross thought there might be significance in nature of Fawzi's speech which avoided controversial elements such as degree Israeli compliance May 18 Res on Huleh. Did Eban think Suez might be settled in connection with solution larger issues?

Eban replied Arabs have ruled out such settlement. Furthermore Israel would deprecate any attempt to take Suez out of its "specific and definite context" and link it up with extraneous matters. He emphasized Suez problem should be faced squarely and settled without giving Egypt chance to delay further.

Gross said we were far from suggesting dilatory program and were simply wondering what action would be most effective. Eban said appearance of res on table would be most effective action.

Gross summed up saying impossible now to foretell what situation will be Wednesday and what action might be indicated. Therefore we wanted to keep position flexible. At appropriate time position could be taken re res or other procedure if indicated. Fact Egypt would know of US disposition to support res would constitute maximum pressure and it was questioned whether public appearance of res would tend to freeze situation.

1. Egyptian public opinion.

2. Belief that Egypt has at least an arguable legal case (with which some legal experts concur).

3. Egyptians wld not worry particularly about "blow to prestige" nor defying SC resolution and are a little skeptical about our official protestations of friendship.

For these reasons maximum which we may expect is "alleviation". Furthermore Egyptians believe that they can detect signs of confusion in our camp.

Dept agrees that conversation with Fawzi along lines suggested urtel 153 Jul 27<sup>3</sup> wld be desirable and useful and suggests you be guided by Deptels 15,<sup>4</sup> 33,<sup>5</sup> 42,<sup>6</sup> and 52<sup>7</sup> (Deptel 53 Jul 25).<sup>8</sup> We feel that if Fawzi has something specific in mind regarding settlement this problem outside SC, now is the time for him to give details.

Re questions raised by urtel, fol are Dept's views:

1. Dept has not recognized that state of war has or does exist between Egypt and Israel and we presume Egyptians understand their allegation of state of war is completely contrary to their obligations under Charter, various SC resolutions on Palestine and Egyptian-Israeli armistice agreements. You are authorized to state this view to Fawzi, but it wld be better not to be drawn into argument over legal technicalities, re state of war and belligerent rights. Dept will forward brief enlarging on this point. While we wld prefer not to discuss this question in SC debate (Deptel 43 para one), it may be that point raised in ur question 3 wld require some statement on our part, but it might be limited to general considerations rather than debate re legal theories involved.

2. Our minimum demand is that restrictions be suspended in toto or alleviated to point of invisibility. Re this, para 4 Deptel 42, Jul 19, shld be useful.

3. As Fawzi has raised this point of principle in SC, we agree that SC probably cannot remain silent on this point. If, however, as we anticipate, UK draft res is tabled, SC's opinion on this point cld be expressed through suitable amendment to res.

4. Since SC is now dealing with issue, we agree with Caffery that his consultations (Cairo 122 Jul 29)<sup>10</sup> shld not in any way restrict your conversations with Fawzi. We presume Caffery will continue his conversations if he deems it desirable and it might be your approach to Fawzi wld assist him.

Re ur final recommendation, Egypt Amb is absent from Wash and we doubt that conversation with Counselor wld serve useful purpose. As indicated, Caffery is already fol suggested line with Egypt FonMin who instructs Fawzi.

Our feeling is that for time being and certainly until results of talks with Fawzi are known that US-UK-Fr approach shid be left in abeyance. Additional reason for this is that US, UK and Fr have not yet reached agreement on res or on procedure.

The Ambassador in Egypt (Caffery) to the Department of State 1

SECRET No. 205

Cairo, July 30, 1951.

Subject: Foreign Minister's Threat To Invoke Article VIII of the Suez Canal Convention of 1888

In a recent conversation with the Foreign Minister he made the off-hand remark that the Egyptian attitude towards restrictions on the Suez Canal traffic to Israel was so strong, that if necessary "Egypt would invoke the portion of the 1888 Convention which called for the convocation of consultative committee of the signatory powers when the security of the Canal was threatened, and thereby bring Russia into the question".

The Foreign Minister was undoubtedly referring to Article VIII of the convention which reads as follows:

"The Agents in Egypt of the Signatory Powers of the present Treaty shall be charged to watch over its execution. In case of any event threatening the security or the free passage of the Canal, they shall meet on the summons of three of their number under the presidency of their Doyen, in order to proceed to the necessary verifications. They shall inform the Khedivial Government of the danger which they may have perceived, in order that that Government may take proper steps to insure the protection and the free use of the Canal. Under any circumstances, they shall meet once a year to take note of the due execution of the Treaty.

"The last-mentioned meetings shall take place under the presidency of a Special Commissioner nominated for that purpose by the Imperial Ottoman Government. A Commissioner of the Khedive may also take part in the meeting, and may preside over it in case of the absence of the Ottoman Commissioner.

"They shall especially demand the suppression of any work or the dispersion of any assemblage on either bank of the Canal, the object or effect of which might be to interfere with the liberty and the entire security of the navigation."

Whether or not the Egyptian government could get three of the signatory powers to call for such a meeting would appear to revolve around the question of what countries are regarded as the legal heirs to Austria-Hungary.

The British Embassy was not particularly concerned at this development when the matter was discussed with it. The feeling is that Article VIII has by usage become obsolete. Furthermore, if by some manipulation Egypt were able to convene such a meeting, Britain as a signatory would be in a position to point out that she had consistently brought to the attention of the "Khedivial Government" the restriction which existed to free navigation of the Canal.

Furthermore, the British Embassy has pointed out that commentaries on the subject assume that in accordance with diplomatic practice in meetings of this type any decisions taken would have to be unanimous.

On the surface, therefore, aside from possible legal obstacles which would render the article obsolete, there are many practical barriers which would make it difficult for the Foreign Minister to carry out his threat.

The Embassy would appreciate the Department's comment on the legal points involved.<sup>2</sup>

The United States Representative at the United Nations (Austin) to the Department of State

NEW YORK, July 30, 1951—9:27 p. m. 164. Re Suez: Gross and Ross lunched with Fawzi (Egypt) and Counselor Egyptian Mission to UN today on Fawzi's invitation. Gross outlined Dept's views as set forth in Deptel 60, July 30 (timeliness of which was very helpful) and Deptels referred to therein. Noting that views expressed were similar to those expressed by Dept to Counselor Egyptian Embassy and Amb Caffery to Egyptian FonMin, Gross emphasized para 2 of Deptel 60, namely our view that restrictions should be suspended in toto or "alleviated to the point of invisibility". He gave equal emphasis to para 4 Deptel 41[42], July 19 (Dept's No. 87 to Cairo).

Fawzi said he thought he understood our position and he wanted to make sure that we understood the position of his govt. "Big stick" of an SC res or any other big stick would not accomplish purpose desired. We could not ask another govt to "commit suicide" nor would it do so if we were to make such an extreme demand. No Egyptian PriMin or FonMin would be able to face the Egyptian Parliament or the press or "go for a walk in the street" if he yielded to big stick tactics. Such tactics were reminiscent of Hitler and would be unbecoming to us. If effort made to apply such tactics, Egyptian people would be convinced that American "steam rollers" were once again being used. No one was more cooperative than the Egyptian FonMin and no one was more courageous than he in willingness to face Egyptian people with solution to problem such as Suez which might be far from perfect from Egyptian viewpoint. A coalition govt in Egypt necessarily composed

We said we thought we appreciated dilemma in which Egyptian Govt found itself. On the one hand were domestic difficulties to which Fawzi referred; on the other hand Egyptian Govt appeared to be on what might be described as a "bad wicket" so far as UN members were concerned, particularly members of the SC. Appreciating their dilemma and motivated by friendliest feelings we wanted to help Egypt out of their present difficult situation if possible. Members of SC were of peace stability, and therefore to process of strengthening the area.

Reverting to earlier remarks, Fawzi repeated the effect Egyptian conviction that restrictions on tankers passing through Suez and destined for Haifa could not be lifted without very substantially strengthening Israel economically, politically and militarily; that, apart from other considerations, for Egypt to lift restrictions unilaterally would upset thereby balance of power in Near East; and that Egypt could not take this action without "compensation".

Following Gross' departure, Ross endeavored to get Fawzi to be more explicit. It seems fairly clear, in the first place, that Fawzi was using the term "compensation" not so much in the sense of payment for something as in the sense of restoring equilibrium. Fawzi indicated that since Israel would be strengthened economically, politically and militarily by lifting the restriction on the passage of tankers, "compensation" should be sought in the same three fields. He refused to be drawn out further than this, adding that Egypt wanted to be "as wise as water", to quote an ancient Far Eastern proverb. By this he seemed to mean that we should find some point, however small, on which we could agree as a starting point in our endeavor to unravel the problem before us.

In the course of the discussion Gross indicated without overemphasizing that we did not feel Egyptians had much of a case on the matter of state of war or belligerent status. Fawzi was not at all inclined to argue these points; in fact, he rather brushed them aside in the interest of discussing the matter as a practical political problem.

167. Re Suez. Gross and Ross lunched with Jebb (on his invitation) and Lacoste, Laskey present. Fawzi in separate conversations with Jebb and Lacoste yesterday apparently took almost precisely same line as he took with us yesterday. Interesting variation as reported by Jebb was that Fawzi, in referring to possibility of lifting certificates required of shipmasters in transit through canal implied that shipmasters would not, of course, thereby be bound not to unload cargoes at Haifa. Jebb said this possibility had been mentioned to British Amb Cairo perhaps two years ago; British objection then as now on combination of legal and practical grounds. In mentioning this possibility to us yesterday Fawzi, saying that possibility had been brought to attention of AmEmb Cairo (he did not say when), indicated Egyptian Govt would naturally expect shipmasters would feel morally bound not to unload cargoes at Haifa.

As we had anticipated Jebb was inclined to take very skeptical and condemnatory line vis-à-vis Egyptian protestations desire to cooperate. Lacoste, on other hand, while professing skepticism was strongly inclined to take go slow line and manifested desire French Govt to play string out to end with Egyptians.

Referring to Fawzi's suggestions re alternative oil installations, Lacoste recalled that there had been alternative pipeline facilities running to Tripoli coast of Lebanon. He speculated, in context Iraqi interest Suez problem, whether Tripoli possibility should not more thoroughly be examined. We asked that he get more info on this aspect of matter which he promised to do.

We questioned in foregoing context whether in long-range interest of Atlantic community possibility of alternative oil installations (relative to Iranian and Haifa facilities) should not be explored. Both Jebb and Lacoste were noncommittal but Jebb, and Lacoste more so, seemed interested. Gross made clear that fundamentals our position remain unchanged, namely, that we felt maintenance of restrictions was wrong and that restrictions should be lifted at soonest possible time. Lacoste, and Jebb as well, of course agreed. Jebb was inclined to argue for tabling of res tomorrow; on other hand, Jebb, apparently impressed by weakness of voting situation in Council, was amenable to almost anything that would maintain some degree of momentum.

With regard to res we left no doubt we were inclined to co-sponsor and thought there should be no difficulty in working out agreement on text; only problem we foresaw was matter of timing. Lacoste, as yet without definitive instructions on text of res, felt it should not be tabled tomorrow. Jebb, remarking he probably should not say so, nevertheless said he would agree to "anything" in way of res we considered desirable, essential thing being, which might be accomplished in one short para, that we call upon Egypt to lift restrictions. Jebb expressed, without apparent conviction, however, that tabling of res would have effect on Egyptian Govt decision to lift restrictions. Lacoste was very strongly impressed, however, that Egyptians would not comply, at this time at least, with strong res. Jebb very readily agreed with idea that res, once agreed upon text, might be shown to Egyptians (and of course to Israelis) within next day or two primarily for purpose of indicating to Egyptians probable end result of SC action unless Egyptian Govt meanwhile came through with more assurances than had been forthcoming up to now.

Both Jebb and Lacoste readily agreed that tomorrow's (Wednesday's) mtg of SC should be essentially routine, opportunity being given to Fawzi and Eban to restate their cases. Jebb may receive instructions to make statement; if he makes statement tomorrow it will be in broad, general terms. We explained that us being in Presidency we would probably follow precedents and give other members of Council opportunity to make statements before we spoke. Lacoste indicated initial statement France might make would be in general terms.

Jebb was somewhat intrigued with idea of Riley appearing before Council but readily yielded to Lacoste's objections, Lacoste adding he understood Riley did not want to appear on this case.

Lacoste rather strongly and Jebb very readily agreed that after essentially routine mtg tomorrow and some days delay, next step might well be appointment of Muniz as rapporteur. See ourtel No 168, July 31, on present thinking of Muniz this subject.

Lacoste displayed some interest, and Jebb mildly so, in US, UK, French discussions with Fawzi. We pointed out disadvantages as we saw them: (a) Appearance of our being "suppliants", and (b) Fawzi being on short tether without negotiating flexibility. We therefore dropped idea "tripartite" discussions, at least at this point. Jebb and Lacoste agreed most effective approach ensuing days would probably be through Caffery to Egyptian FonMin.

TOP SECRET PRIORITY New York, July 31, 1951—6:32 p. m. 168. Re Suez: Muniz called Gross to ascertain our present position re appointment of rapporteur. Although he had not yet received instructions from his govt, he expressed personal view that rapporteur should not be appointed unless (a) he were authorized to "conciliate" on the basic issues dividing the Arabs and Israel and (b) there were some prospect of success in such efforts. He believed that we could not expect a solution of the Suez issue by taking it out of context of the whole problem of Israel-Arab relations and applying a "purgative".

Gross explained US viewpoint that Suez question is in reality an issue of compliance with armistice agreement and that purpose of rapporteurship was to present Egypt with an opportunity to find a method of voluntarily complying with their obligations under the armistice agreement without formal SC action. Gross agreed with Muniz that we should not now decide question of appointing rapporteur, but we should within the next few days have a full exploration with him and other colleagues on the council re next steps.

Gross also gave to Muniz full account of discussions with Fawzi, reported ourtel 164 dated July 30, 1951. Muniz gave impression of having second thoughts about putting his nose in a wringer, but agreed to full exploration of problem.

670. At conclusion my discussion on Iran with Morrison this morning, he took occasion to urge that US and UK stay in close step on problem Suez canal restrictions, reveal no hesitation or doubts to Egyptians about the case for abolishing restrictions and, in this connection, get on with SC action without further delay. He had felt obliged instruct Jebb make his statement in SC today and thought any delay in pushing SC action wld merely play further into Egypt hands. He did not mean we shld cease exploring possibilities of settlement short of SC action, but he did think US and UK efforts in this direction shld be closely coordinated and shld not deter decision by SC.

Brit are convinced that, in absence any practical proposals from Egypts and countless times they have already been approached on subject, they have no intention lift restrictions and are merely throwing sand in our eyes in pretending anything else. In Brit view, only thing likely budge Egypt at this point is knowledge that SC will act decisively. Brit inclination therefore is not to delay much longer in tabling UK res even the full agreement on sponsorship may not have been reached. 178. Re Suez: Sarper gave Ross today summary long conversation he had with Fawzi yesterday. Fawzi gave Sarper essentially same story he gave Gross and Ross Monday with following significant additions:

1. Fawzi very explicitly and categorically said Egypt would not comply with SC resolution. Sarper thinks this is no bluff and is himself convinced Egyptians will not comply. Fawzi argued this would be first time Egypt had not complied whereas Israelis had many times failed to comply with UN resolutions. Moreover, US, UK, Netherlands as parties to dispute would not be entitled to vote; therefore resolution would be illegal.

2. Fawzi, re alternative oil refining facilities, spoke of Turkey as well as Egypt and Lebanon as alternative locations. He said setting up of alternative facilities was matter of 3 to 6 months; meanwhile, restrictions would be alleviated. He went further, however, indicating if assurances were forthcoming that alternative facilities would be established Egypt would abolish restrictions forthwith.

Ross gave Sarper full, frank exposé US present attitude and course: (a) Restrictions contrary at least spirit of armistice agreement and obstacle to peace and stability NE; (b) we did not agree argument state war, belligerency; (c) Egypt wrong and objective should be voluntary lifting restrictions soonest. We prepared co-sponsor resolution and working out details with UK and French dels. On arriving at agreed text would of course give to Sarper (he urged to be given text in time to get instructions; otherwise, no choice but abstain). We also thought we might give text to Fawzi (and Israelis) as fair warning; Sarper thought this good idea.

On question of rapporteur, Sarper informed UK FonOff against, French del favored, US position still reserved. (Coulson personal view that rapporteur idea might well serve useful purpose if time limit one week set.)

Sarper convinced and strongly expressed view that if solution can be found at all it can only be found outside SC. Reserved re rapporteur idea. If function only to report back to SC, no useful purpose. If get matter settled outside council, might be worthwhile. In any case minimum of 2 weeks necessary, taking into account (a) slowness communications between Cairo and Egyptian del here and (b) necessity Egypt consult other Arab States.

SECRET

[Washington,] August 2, 1951.

Subject: Israel's Concern Re Peace With the Arabs and Other Matters.

Participants: Mr. Theodore Kollek, Embassy of Israel

Mr. G. Lewis Jones, NE

Discussion:

Mr. Kollek called on me today at his request and said that the occasion for his visit was the fact that he plans to depart for Israel August 4 and return to Washington about August 25. His visit was in lieu of that of Ambassador Eban who has been detained by the Suez case in the Security Council. Eban might visit Israel in September. Kollek said that he was anxious to have a first-hand picture of developments in Israel following the election.

Elections:

Regarding the Israel election, Kollek said that he believes that Mapai and the General Zionists should coalesce for a single purpose: i.e., to agree on holding direct elections and to set a date for new elections. He spoke of the disabilities which the present system of proportional representation subjected Israel.

Water Problems:

Kollek said that he had had lunch yesterday in New York with General Riley (whose impartiality he praises), who had spoken in very gloomy terms of the situation in the Demilitarized Zone. Riley saw as the only solution a Regional Water Scheme in which Syria, Lebanon, Israel and Jordan would participate; Riley saw no possibility of this happening in the foreseeable future, and according to Kollek, Mr. McGhee agreed with him.

Kollek said that he could not imagine anyone in Israel rejecting the idea of a Regional Water Scheme: he wanted to know whether I, too, was doubtful regarding the practicability of such a scheme.

I replied that such a scheme was the only one that made any sense, but that I doubted that it would have any hope of success while Israel continues to adhere to its "orthodox" approach. I said that the Arabs can see no evidence of Israeli goodwill; consequently they will hold back from such a scheme. Kollek seemed to accept this.

Continuing along the line of the "unorthodox" approach, I told Kollek that I was most interested to hear that he had mentioned the el Hamma Salient last evening to Mr. Jack Waldo as being something which Israel might be willing to yield to Syria. I said that this (and the right of Syrian fishermen to fish in the Sea of Galilee, which he had also mentioned) were very small things but to me their significance was the fact that Kollek had mentioned them at all; they were the first indications that I had had that Israel might be prepared to give up anything to Syria.

Kollek said that he was not talking as an Israeli official but it was his personal belief, which he thought others in the government would support, that a deal could be made with regard to el Hamma as part of an agreement involving the entire Demilitarized Zone. Kollek indicated that he thought Israel had "missed a bet" in refusing to sit down with the Syrians recently. He favored the Israel-Syrian MAC, "which is really a political instrument," being staffed with Foreign Office officials from both sides. On this basis he believes something might be worked out under the aegis of the MAC.

I expressed the view that it would be too much to expect the Syrians to buy a "final peace settlement" at this time even though agreement were reached regarding areas of jurisdiction in the Demilitarized Zone. The most that could be hoped for is that the parties might agree upon lines of a part of a temporary modus vivendi with the full knowledge that these lines would eventually become the frontiers under a final peace settlement.

Diplomats vs. Soldiers

Kollek then turned to the question of the internal struggle in Israel between the Foreign Office and the General Staff. He said Riley had mentioned this to him, and he had to admit that there was some foundation for the view that in Israel as well as elsewhere in the world soldiers and diplomats were not infrequently at odds. However, he thought these differences were much exaggerated and that time would show that the diplomats will come out on top. I said that as I understood the situation much depends upon the personal views of Ben Gurion who is the "giant" on the scene in Israel. Kollek agreed, but said that Ben Gurion is a Democrat and that he knew of many instances in which he might have circumvented a decision by the Cabinet which had gone against him. However, he had refused to follow any course except the democratic decision of the Cabinet.

The Arab State of Mind

Kollek asked me directly "Can you talk to the Arabs? Do they make sense? What are they thinking about? We, of course, cannot talk to them, and our information is very poor regarding the state of mind of the Arabs".

I told him that I would reply with the utmost candor and then proceeded to paint a picture of Israel as seen from the Arab side of the line. I ended up with the generalization that fundamental to Arab thinking is the belief that Israel possesses neither good faith nor goodwill towards its neighbors and said that when we were asked to cite specific instances supporting Israel's contention that they possess both, I was bound to say that, aside from the uniting of Arab families more than two years ago, I could think of no instance which would carry weight with the Arabs. I spoke of the dilatory and pettyfogging tactics of Israel in connection with compliance with the May 18 resolution and remarked that the overly-legalistic approach of Israel to this resolution was conclusive evidence to the Arabs that Israel intended to do what it wanted to do. I said it would be helpful in dealing with the Arabs to have a case in which Israel eschewed equivocation in its compliance. The Arabs felt they were intelligent enough to know the sense of a Security Council resolution—to understand it. By the time the Israel lawyers got through with a resolution it was something else.

It may have been Kollek's natural courtesy or that he was dissembling, but he gave me the impression of not only being grateful for my unvarnished sketch of Israel as seen by the Arabs, but to a degree concurred with regard to the poor manner in which Israel has complied with the May 18, 1951 resolution.

Ingathering of Exiles

At the close of the interview I asked Kollek to tell me frankly whether Israel planned to start the ingathering of 70,000 Jews from Iran along the lines of the ingathering from Iraq. I said that so far as I knew, the level of anti-semitism in Iran was not abnormally high and I thought the friends of Israel, including the United States, would not favor a deliberately generated exodus there.

Kollek replied that there was a school of thought in Israel which believes that when a nationalistic government of the Mossadegh type comes into power sooner or later they turn against their minorities and this has caused consideration to be given to the Iranian Jews. He did not believe, however, that efforts would be made to bring them to Israel unless the situation generally deteriorates. There could be no doubt that the need of the Roumanian Jews to come to Israel is far greater than the need of the Iranian Jews.

I opined that the Iraqi operation had been bad for Iraq. I said that I hoped the Iraqi Government would not disenfranchise the Jews who had elected to remain Iraqi citizens. Kollek argued that short range, Iraq may have lost some skills, but he thought that long range it is "better for a country to be homogeneous" as would be the case if all of the Jews left Iraq. I asserted that homogeneity of population is not always a good thing and pointed with pride to the fact that the United States is in no sense homogeneous. Kollek's only answer was "The United States is different."

The United States Representative on the Palestine Conciliation Commission (Palmer) to the Secretary of State

SECRET NIACT GENEVA, August 3, 1951—noon.

- 109. Palun 422. USDel has today, Aug 2, concluded discussions with Fr reps Marchal and Boisanger and principal secretary Azcarate of Dept's proposal for new efforts by PCC. We are happy report there is full measure agreement that Dept's proposals are timely and necessary if PCC is to make contribution to solving any Palestine problems or to contribute to stability in present uneasy situation ME. All are agreed present air of great expectation in area can be capitalized on by prompt effort of this kind and hope our three govts can coordinate promptly their dipl support for comm's action. Fr reps have raised two questions concerning mtg place and Brit attitude on which Dept's guidance wld be most helpful.
- (1) Fr feel it will be difficult persuade Arab govts to participate in mtgs held Istanbul. Boisanger has pointed out that in recent conversation with Atassi, Syrian Amb Paris, Atassi spoke out against Turk initiative in area. Boisanger also recalled that when PCC proposed mtgs last year, Abdul Monem Egypt rep, stated flatly Egyptians wld never meet in Turkey. Boisanger and Marchal regard Egypt as key to Arab acceptance. Fr reps, having talked with FonOff, have therefore proposed Paris as best mtg place. They feel that higher representation can be expected if Paris is chosen and that in even conference continued beyond Nov 6 no disruption of mtgs wld occur.1 They also feel it most important that in course of conference close contact shid be maintained with Brit Govt and favor Paris for this reason. They feel Dept's other suggested mtg places wld create communication difficulties for themselves as well as for Arab dels. Today Marchal reported that preliminary telephone conversations with Paris indicated FonOff was agreeable both to substance Dept's proposals and to Paris as mtg place. Boisanger has returned to Paris for further consultation and Marchal will follow him on Saturday. USDel will meet at Quai d'Orsay with Fr reps on Tuesday to learn FonOff final decision.
- (2) Prior to this time Fr reps hope for clarification of Brit attitude toward Dept's proposals. They believe Brit opinion will greatly influence FonOff decision, and expect Fr. Amb London to make immediate inquiries there. In order have full info for our conversations with Fr FonOff, we hope Dept can inform USDel both Geneva and Paris by Monday afternoon re Brit reaction.

Pending Fr FonOff decision, Fr and USDels have agreed on draft of invitation to be telegraphed govts concerned, which it is hoped, can be sent by Aug 10. Accordingly suggested date for convening conference has been set at Sept 10. We have suggested to Fr reps and will suggest to Aras on arrival that comm not reconvene in Jerusalem prior to receipt of parties' acceptance or rejection our invitation in order avoid comms being involved in discussions with local auths of its proposals. Marchal had hoped make immediate tour of area in order acquaint himself with area and personalities, but has agreed postpone trip until immed after receipt of parties' final answers. He will not engage at that time, however, in discussion of business of proposed conference. FrReps recognize necessity for FonOffs of three govts represented on PCC to undertake gain parties acceptance.

Emb Ankara has informed USDel Aras arrives Geneva tomorrow third. We have scheduled mtg for immed after his arrival and will report promptly his reaction.

Fol is text proposed invitation as agreed with FrReps subj Aras' approval:

"I have the honor to inform you that the UN PCC, mtg in special session in Geneva, has decided to invite the govts of Egypt, Jordan, Lebanon and Syria and the Govt of Israel to participate in mtgs with the comm to discuss solutions to the problems outstanding between Israel and the Arab states.

"During the period fol the adoption by the UNGA of its res of 14 Dec 1950, the PCC has continued to seek solutions for problems arising out of the Palestine situation. In accordance with the res, the comm created its refugee office for the purpose of making practical arrangements for the solution of the refugee problem. The comm is ready to make a new effort to lend assistance to the parties in seeking solution of this and other questions outstanding between them. In the course of the proposed discussions, the comm will be prepared to exercise its mediatory functions by suggesting specific solutions to specific problems for consideration by the parties.

"The comm invites the govt of (blank blank) to participate in these mtgs and to designate its reps. It is proposed that the conference be held in Paris beginning on 10 Sept 1951, and it is hoped that it will be possible for the comm to report the results of the conference to the next regular session of the UNGA, 6 Nov, 1951." 2

[PALMER]

111. Pursuant to Deptel 76, July 26 <sup>2</sup> I took occasion when calling on DirGen FonOff Eytan at his request to mention informally importance Israel's full compliance with SC May 18 res. Mention was made of unfavorable impression created by Israel delay in initial compliance with res and bad polit effect in Syria and elsewhere of statements at time over radio and in press to effect stoppage did not mean anything, was only a token and wld be for short period which was exactly specified. Such statements obviously prevented Israel from deriving any internatl polit advantage from work stoppages.

Eytan appeared to follow above line of reasoning but said his govt felt it had complied fully with May 18 res and other dictates UNTSO. (Incidentally FonOff advised that ltr of Col Taxis to Horowitz which was subject Embtels 59 and 60, July 20 3 was later withdrawn.) Eytan pointed out that Arabs removed from demil zone by Israel Govt had been given opportunity to say whether they wished to return and those so desiring had been returned. He added, however that former residents who had fled to Syria are not being permitted to return, thus indicating no change in policy of continuing control of demil zone.

In conclusion he reiterated that his govt intends to cooperate fully with UN and believes it has complied with May 18 res. I made no attempt discuss details of compliance, which is matter between Israel Govt and UN, but warned against placing too much confidence in unilateral interpretations with which UN auths might not concur as was done prior to passage May 18 res.

Comment: Emb agrees it was wise postpone report on or discussion of Israel non-compliance Huleh res until after elections as public blissfully unaware any deficiencies in Israel's compliance and govt apparently once more has fallen under spell of its own legalistic reasoning. It is believed accordingly that Israel Govt and public are in danger of repeating mistakes which led to May 18 res. If Dept and Gen Riley concur, it is recommended therefore that bill of particulars re respects in which Israel compliance with May 18 res is unsatisfactory shid be given to Israel FonMin before any report on subject is made public.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (McGhee)<sup>1</sup>

SECRET

[Washington,] August 6, 1951.

Subject: Visit of Ambassador Eban.

Participants: Abba Eban, Ambassador of Israel

Moshe Keren, Counselor, Embassy of Israel

Col. Chaim Herzog, Military, Naval, Air Attaché,

Embassy of Israel Mr. McGhee—NEA Mr. Waldo—NE

The Ambassador called, accompanied by the Counselor and the Military Attaché, to have his picture taken with me in my office by a photographer of the Saturday Evening Post for use in an article on Mr. Eban which will appear in a forthcoming issue of that magazine. After the photographs had been taken, the Ambassador discussed the following subjects:

1. Munitions Licenses for Israel:

The Ambassador launched into a discussion on a subject which he had mentioned to me on several previous occasions; namely, the delay in the Department's approval of certain license applications for military equipment for Israel. The Ambassador decribed Israel's military preparations as only a fraction of those of the neighboring countries. He said that Egypt had an armaments budget of $200,000,000 and that Syria's was proportionately as great; that no other country in the Near East was threatened to the extent Israel was. It appeared to him that there was conflict between the Department's policy of license restrictions and its policy of mutual aid as set forth in the US Government's program.

I told the Ambassador that when I had discussed the situation with him on previous occasions I was not fully informed of all aspects of the problem. The licensing of military equipment for foreign countries was undertaken by an interdepartmental mechanism, on which the Munitions Division is the State Department representative. Our policy on arms shipments to the Near East is based on the Tripartite Declaration, which states that the countries of the Near East should receive arms for purposes of internal security and to play their part in the defense of the Near East. The Huleh disturbances, however, had appeared sufficiently alarming to warrant the temporary suspension of certain Israel license applications. There was therefore a definite connection between the Huleh situation and the temporary halt in the licensing of arms shipments to Israel. Subsequent to that time, a number of licenses had been approved. While I had not been able to study the problem fully, I believed that over a period of time the rate of license approvals would return to normal.

The Ambassador said he was certain that there were no aspects of the Huleh situation which could warrant a belief that hostilities would be resumed. He said he hoped that Syria had received similar treatment. I told him that Syria's license applications were very few but that in so far as there were any, they had been suspended at the time of the incidents. I added that I did not understand what the Ambassador meant in his letter in referring to joint defense discussions with the United States.

The Ambassador replied that he had not intended this to be taken literally, but that Israel had been encouraged by General Marshall to put forward its ideas on its possible contribution to the defense of the Near East, although he knew there were no actual plans under consideration. I said that up until now we had no commitments in the area and no plans for forces there; that a mutual security program may be the basis for a new approach, but that there was no such approach at this moment. The British had primary responsibility there. The Ambassador said that with regard to Israel's arms request from the US, one aspect of the situation which should be borne in mind was that, while the US is not the only country from which Israel is able to buy arms, and quite apart from the availability of arms in the UK or France, Israel would like to establish a certain reciprocal dependence between itself and the US. The Ambassador said that Israel's proposals to the Department on Israel's possible contribution to the defense of the area and the suggestion that the Israel Director of Military Training should come to this country were made with this factor in mind. I said we appreciated this fact and we regretted that we do not vet have some more positive basis for assistance.

The Ambassador continued that the feeling in the Middle East was that, while guarantees by Britain and France were valuable, there would be a greater feeling of security if the US were associated in some way with these guarantees. I said our position was that we have so many commitments it was difficult to meet all the demands. Authorization to grant arms shipments to the Arab states and Israel would be a good basis for a new approach.

2. Huleh Situation: The Ambassador said that Israel objected to the continued holding up of Israel engineering plans for the Demilitarized Zone out of deference to the property rights of certain Arab landowners. He said that the May 18 Resolution was a two-way resolution and that the Mixed Armistice Commission should undertake to consider the Israel complaints of Syrian aggression. The Armistice Commission, however, had not met for several weeks. Another point of fact was that El Hamme had been absorbed completely into Syria's economy and the MAC should undertake to consider this question. The Ambassador pointed out that Riley had expressed a lack of satisfaction with Israel's compliance regarding the return of Arabs to the Demilitarized Zone and the policing regulations in the Zone. Israel desired to solve all the practical problems relating to the Demilitarized Zone. There were certain differences of juridical theory with regard to sovereignty in the area, but Israel would undertake to discuss this matter with Riley. The Ambassador had therefore written Riley a letter 2 on this subject on the instructions of the Israel Foreign Office. While Israel was perfectly willing to continue to deal with Riley here in the US, they would much prefer to negotiate with him in Israel. Without Riley's presence there it was very difficult to carry on negotiations. The Israel government had sent the Syrians a letter dated July 10 which it was understood only reached Syria last week. The Israelis considered, therefore, that only Riley had the necessary prestige to take up the issues on the spot.

I told the Ambassador that we were concerned with the slowness of Israel's compliance but were not in a position to judge the facts, and would therefore await General Riley's report. I expressed the hope that Israel would accept the advice of Riley and other UN authorities in the Commission and not try to rely on its own unilateral interpretations of the Armistice Agreement. Such attitude might prejudice Israel's chances on other issues on which Israel wants compliance, including the Suez question. The Ambassador said that Israel wished to comply, but did not wish to prejudice its legitimate interest in the Demilitarized Zone. I repeated that we would rely completely on General Riley in this matter, and told the Ambassador his problem was with the General, who, we hoped, would soon return to the field of operations.

3. Suez: The Ambassador then took up the question of the Suez and went over the points which he had reiterated on several previous occasions, concluding that it was clear to Israel that the SC should go forward immediately, since it was difficult to assume that Egypt would undertake any alleviation of Suez Canal restrictions without the adoption of an SC resolution. The Ambassador expressed reasonable certainty that Egypt would comply with a resolution. I mentioned the fact that compliance with the resolution was not always a positive matter, but sometimes negative as the Ambassador knew. The Ambassador merely replied that he hoped that if it were possible to straighten out this question with regard to the existence of a state of war, it might then be possible to negotiate with the Egyptians on other questions. The Ambassador was informed that the French, British and the US were finalizing a joint resolution on Suez today, and it was hoped it would be possible to show that resolution to Israel and other delegations today. We could not say, however, whether the resolution would be tabled on Thursday.

DEAR MONNETT: I want to express personally my appreciation for the outstanding telegrams which you have sent in recently. When we have a vexing problem to worry about it seems that you anticipate it and provide unusually timely and helpful comment.

As you know, we have been faced with the problem of being urged to send a message to the World Zionist Congress in Jerusalem. However, we believe, as you do, that for the President to send a message to this organization in Jerusalem would be politically disastrous. Our thought that you send a short note to Mr. Browdy was a suggestion which we believed might satisfy the American Zionists in lieu of a message from the President. We are, however, in full accord with your excellent message no. 198 of August 7,<sup>2</sup> a copy of which, you might be interested to know, the White House requested for use in countering the arguments for such a message.

Regarding the Huleh, we hope Riley will get back to his post as soon as possible. I know you have seen by now the Department's telegram no. 120 of August 8 ³ to this effect, and we agree fully with you regarding the desirability of a "bill of particulars" which you might use in discussions with the Israelis as suggested in your message no. 111.⁴ We have some additional information here, given us in confidence by the General, consisting of an exchange of letters between himself and Sharett, and we shall get them to you as soon as possible. It would also be helpful if you would telegraph to us Riley's "bill of particulars" as soon as you receive it from him. Unfortunately, I am afraid we are not out of the woods so far as the Huleh situation is concerned.

As for the Suez issue, I think the Israelis are wrong in claiming that we have been dragging our feet. We have agreed to cosponsor the resolution and to speak against the restrictions as inconsistent with the spirit and intent of the Armistice Agreement. The difficulty is that the Israelis set down a line of policy which they believe is the only right one to follow. If we differ with them, there are the usual complaints. At the moment the next SC meeting is scheduled for August 16, and it is probable that a resolution will be adopted at that time if Egypt has not voluntarily withdrawn the restrictions before them. It is impossible to guarantee what final action will be taken by the SC, however, since a number of the Council members have doubts about the case.

Regarding the Mutual Security Program, it is interesting to note that the Israelis and the American Jewish Community appear to have "bought" our policy of impartiality. The argument now is, of course, that, while there is no objection to giving the same amount of money to the Arabs as to Israel, it is necessary to increase the sum proposed for Israel in the MSP. We believe, however, that Title 2 of the Aid Bill will pass without any great modification. It is even possible at the moment that the funds for the Arab refugees will be increased to provide for reintegration expenditures in subsequent fiscal years. That is what we had hoped for initially, but the Bureau of the Budget ruled it out.

I hope you enjoyed your trip to Beirut. I am sure you found that city a pleasant change and relaxation after your arduous duties in Tel Aviv. We feel that the idea of exchanges of visits between the Arab countries and Israel is worth pursuing, not only because such visits give Chiefs of Mission and their subordinates an opportunity to consult, but at the same time they permit them to acquire impressions of life on the other side of the Armistice Lines.

I hope you will have an opportunity to have a long talk with Teddy Kollek while he is in Israel. He had a very interesting conversation with Lewis Jones before he left, a memorandum of which you will receive shortly.5

I congratulate you on an excellent job of reporting and representation. It makes our problems vastly more simple here to know that Tel Aviv is in such sound and able hands.

With warmest regards. Sincerely yours,

GEORGE C. McGHEE

Discussion:

The Minister came in on instructions from his Government to state that "the Syrian Government considers the attitude taken by the United States in being a co-sponsor of this (the Suez) resolution an attitude which means support and backing of the Jews against the Arabs and the Arabs' interests". The Minister went on to say that the Syrian Government considers any help, moral or material, to the Jews harms the Arabs.

Mr. Jones replied that the United States Government based its action primarily on its policy of support for the armistice systems of the Near East. It was the same, in fact, as our policy on the Huleh question. We were neither for or against the Arabs or the Jews, but we were for the armistice agreements and against any actions which we believed contravened those agreements, either in letter or in spirit. The Egypt Suez Canal restrictions, we thought, definitely violated the spirit of the Egypt-Israel armistice.

The Syrian Minister asked if the West's need for oil from the Haifa refinery was not a factor in our action. Mr. Jones replied that undoubtedly this was an element in our thinking, but his previous statement, in which the governing word was "primarily", was still valid. Our foremost concern was the armistice agreements which we regard as essential to the peace and stability of the Near East.

The Syrian Minister remarked that his Government did not consider Egypt's actions a violation of the Egypt-Israel armistice agreement, and alluded to General Riley's findings on that point which he regarded as very equivocal.

2. Grant Aid to Israel

The Syrian Minister said that he had heard that certain members of Congress were advocating an amendment to Title II of the administration's Mutual Security Program to provide additional grant aid to Israel. Mr. Jones said he had no information about it and recommended that the Minister "wait and see".

The Syrian Minister repeated the view that any aid to Israel would be considered by the Arabs as an unfriendly act. He paraphrased an Arab proverb which said, "It is better to prevent harm to myself, than to advance my interests." In other words, he said the Arabs would rather receive no aid, if Israel would also receive no aid. Mr. Barrow said that the Syrian Minister's remarks seemed to be in direct conflict with the United States' attitude of "positive" rather than "negative" impartiality toward the Arab States and Israel.

Mr. Jones then recalled the story of the man who was visited by an angel who had told him he could have anything he asked on the understanding that his neighbor would receive twice as much. The man had pondered this offer for a long time and finally said to the angel, "Please put out one of my eyes."

The Syrian Minister's reply was that Israel never was and never would be a neighbor of the Arabs.

Subject: Conversations of Director of UNRWA (PRA) with Egyptian and Jordanian Officials

On August 7, 1951, the Honorable John B. Blandford, Jr., Director of PRA, reported [in] detail to the Advisory Commission concerning his recent visits to Egypt and Jordan. A summary of his remarks follows:

1. Egypt

Mr. Blandford saw the Egyptian Foreign Minister in Cairo on July 23. Salaheddine Pasha opened the conversation by referring to the recent assassinations and disorders in Jordan and Lebanon. He stated that the Palestine problem was at the bottom of these troubles, a fact which emphasized the necessity of seeking a speedy solution. The Minister agreed that an over-all reintegration program involv-

The Minister agreed that an over-all reintegration program involving all the Arab States was essential, and stated that Egypt would be willing to join in negotiations looking toward a three-year program aimed at solving the refugee problem.

Egypt was already setting the example by her cooperation with the Agency in the Sinai project. Even though the preliminary reports of the water exploration team were disappointing, and large-scale projects there proved unfeasible, the symbolic value of Egypt's working together with PRA would be considerable.

Egypt was prepared to urge Syria to cooperate in the Agency's program. Egypt recognizes the necessity of moving large numbers of refugees from their present locations to sites where reintegration facilities could be provided. However, Arab cooperation in refugee movement and in the reintegration program must not be interpreted by anyone, particularly Israel, as a sign that the Arabs were forgetting the problem or ready to forgo support of refugee rights against Israel.

The Minister stated his belief that the Arab League should be the forum for negotiations for the over-all program and suggested that Mr. Blandford get in touch with Azzam Pasha.

Salaheddine Pasha volunteered the view that Egypt and the Arab States were opposed to the Agency's assisting refugees in emigrating to countries outside the Arab World. The Arabs did not want the refugees dispersed and wished to see them remain in Arab States. There was no objection to PRA's sending skilled refugees to Libya.

The Director next saw Ismail Cherine Bey, commander of the Egyptian frontiers, and Egyptian Government Liaison Officer with PRA (succeeding Ali Marei Bey, presently Egyptian Director of Protocol). Cherine said he had two additional areas available in the Sinai Peninsula if the present explorations continue to be disappointing. He would like a joint committee set up to advise a first-class project manager. Cherine would make every effort to find an eminently qualified Egyptian for project manager. However, if none were available, he would have no objection to a foreigner.

Cherine expressed his enthusiastic support of an over-all program and promised every assistance in persuading other Arab states, particularly Syria. He reported that his own private inquiries convince him that the ex-Mufti of Palestine is no longer opposing reintegration and would agree to large-scale projects in Syria.

Cherine stated that Egypt does not wish to assume the responsibility for administering refugee relief, preferring to concentrate her energies on reintegration.

The Director saw Azzam Pasha briefly who was most cordial and stated that it was up to PRA to take the next step and to present its program for Arab consideration. He declared that the facilities of the Arab League were available to the Agency for use in negotiations.

Mr. Blandford was able also, through the kindness of Ambassador Caffery, to discuss the situation informally with the American, British and French chiefs of mission in Egypt. The Turkish representative was not available.

2. Jordan

Mr. Blandford arrived in Amman in the afternoon of August 3. Through the kindness of Minister Drew, he was able to have discussions with the American, British and French Ministers (the Turk again being unavailable) in the presence of Sir Alexander Galloway, PRA's new country representative in Jordan.

After reviewing basic policy, Mr. Blandford reported to the group a conversation he had had with General Riley of the U.N.T.S.O. in which they agreed to the usefulness of an international study of the legal aspects of the waters of the Jordan River and its tributaries. Such a study, by sorting out the problems involved, would be an essential basis for any future agreement among riparian states as to the use of the waters. PRA's hopes to reintegrate large numbers of refugees in Jordan depended heavily on the availability of the Yarmuk River. The French Minister indicated strong agreement with

Mr. Blandford's thinking and stated he had some days before sent a similar proposal to his Government.

At the suggestion of Minister Drew, the representatives in Jordan of the countries represented on PRA's Advisory Commission plan to meet periodically with Sir Alexander Galloway for information purposes.

The following morning Mr. Blandford paid his respects at the tomb of King Abdullah and called on the Regent, Emir Naif. The Regent assured the Director that, in the tradition of his distinguished father, he would cooperate fully with the Agency, so long as he was Regent.

The Director then saw the Prime Minister, the Minister of Reconstruction, and the Minister of Health. The Prime Minister said his Government was prepared to discuss a three-year program and agreed concerning the necessity of cooperation among all the Arab States. The present Government wishes to discuss the question of Jordan's taking over relief administration at cabinet level before making any further proposals in this regard. Mr. Blandford detected a possible loss of enthusiasm on the part of Jordan for shouldering the unpopular responsibility of relief administration.

The Director had an opportunity of visiting the Musa Bey Alami resettlement project near Jericho. The present plans are to settle 25 families as individual farmers, 100 wage-carners on a 500-acre plantation, and to provide an agricultural school for 100 refugee boys. The Director and the Advisory Commission have agreed to PRA assistance being made available to Musa Bey for the execution and possible enlargement of the project.

Mr. Blandford talked with some of Musa Bey's assistants on the project, one of whom listed some interesting categories of refugees who could or would not be reintegrated on the project: (a) refugees who are so poor that they would need outside assistance to enable them to survive until a crop came in; (b) refugees who are so troublesome that the project managers don't want them; (c) refugee capitalists who want to take over and exploit several one-family tracts; (d) refugees who still stubbornly refuse anything but repatriation; and (e) refugees who worry about the quality of land available on the project.

3. General

Mr. Blandford concluded his report to the Advisory Commission by reiterating his earlier view that the major problem ahead is not Arab Government cooperation but cooperation from the refugees themselves.

There might also be later hesitation on the part of the Arab States at pulling large numbers of refugees away from Israel's present borders. The Arabs might reason that this would create a vacuum which Israel would be all too eager to fill.

There seems to be appearing a reluctance on the part of the Arab States to take over relief administration.

Mr. Blandford concluded by stating that he would be ready at an early meeting to discuss the steps towards framing a specific proposal to the Near East Governments for an over-all reintegration program.

Carro, August 11, 1951—10 a. m.

200. For McGhee. Azzam Pasha came to see me this morning with a message for McGhee. He said he is alarmed over the Suez Canal restrictions Security Council implications and is convinced that the only ones to gain in the long run will be the Commies in Egypt who will exploit the "persecution" of Egypt by the great powers and Egypt's impotence in the face thereof especially since Iraq has the pipeline which is the only logical supply source for the Haifa refinery, and yet it is Egypt not Iraq that is being "picked on".

He said that no matter what his personal inclinations are he will be forced in the case of an adverse decision of the SC to call a mtg of Arab League which will call upon Egypt not to comply with the decision and also will call upon all petroleum supplying countries including Kuwait and Bahrein to refuse to furnish oil to tankers proceeding to Haifa.

I transmit this to you just as he said it for what it is worth.

Subject: Azzam Pasha's Call re Suez Canal Restrictions

Azzam Pasha's call on me, and his direct intervention on the Suez Canal problem is only surprising in that it did not occur before.

Azzam and I have had a good relationship and he has in the past definitely soft-pedaled the Suez Canal issue. His call in that connection was obviously as the result of needling on the part of Salaheddin.

The intervention of the Arab League at the present juncture is to be deplored, as it will only produce greater misunderstanding and friction if the Security Council resolution is passed. The League's well-known ability to produce unpleasantness out of a least common denominator has been amply demonstrated in the past and there is no reason to believe that the results will be any different in the present case.

41. Palun 428. Prior my departure on Sat <sup>2</sup> from Geneva, Shiloah telephoned from Paris requesting I come here for conversations thought might be important. I therefore made last minute changes my schedule and met Shiloah in Paris Sun morn.<sup>3</sup> He told me he had dined with Boisanger Sat even and that Boisanger had informed him of comm's decision not to discuss conference agenda prior to convening of conf. He said that while he had not been in touch for several days with Tel Aviv, he was reasonably sure Israel Govt wld accept, but in order be prepared make useful contribution to conf discussions, it wld be necessary to know in advance questions we proposed to take up. At same time Israel Govt's decision wld be affected by SC action on Suez. If Suez res was not passed Egyptians wld interpret council's action as endorsement their position re state of war with Israel. If Egyptians were so bolstered, there cld be little hope of successful outcome proposed conf.

In this connection I pointed out that shld Suez not be satisfactorily dealt with by SC, there was even more reason for holding conf. Shiloah asked if this meant that PCC intended take up "clarification" of status armistice agreements. I told him, without referring to proposed nonaggression declaration, that such a question certainly wld come within scope of general questions with which we hoped to deal. He seemed pleased this idea. As for his other questions concerning agenda, I told him comm had decided before adjourning that it wld not enter into a discussion with parties of agenda items in order avoid any question of priorities. I said that while we expected Arabs to raise question of priority for repatriation, we hoped avoid this issue prior to conf by recalling that conf wld be based on mandate recd from successive GA's and that by acceding to Arab States request for mediation we wld be in position make suggestion re order of discussion. Told Shiloah that I wld be prepared to discuss in greater detail various subjects for consideration at later date but that I cld not, in view of comm's decision, undertake such discussions until after parties acceptances. Shiloah seemed personally to accept my arguments and to favor intended procedure. He was unusually outspoken in saying he expected Israel wld accept, although he reverted several times to ill effects of unsatisfactory SC decision on Suez.

August 11.
August 12.

This morn fol tel was forwarded to me from Geneva in Palmer's absence, who is expected arrive by ship in Haifa end of week:

"Palmer Chairman PCC—I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your cable of 10 Aug inviting the Govt of Israel to participate in mtgs convened by the Conciliation Comm beginning in Paris on 10 Sept 1951.

"The Govt of Israel has consistently pursued a policy of cooperation with the Conciliation Comm and seized every opportunity of discussing problems outstanding between Israel and the Arab States. It wild help the Govt of Israel in considering the invitation conveyed in your behalf of 10 Aug if the comm were to indicate to it whether the intention is to hold mtgs separately between the comm and reps of Israel on the one hand and between the comm and dels of the Arab States on the other, or whether, as suggested by the term "conference", it is planned to conduct direct mtg between the reps of Israel and of the Arab states. It wild also be helpful if an indication cld be given as to the proposed agenda for the conf or the method by which an agreed agenda might be worked out.

"I shid much appreciate an early reply to this enquiry for the guidance of my govt and meanwhile avail myself of this opportunity to renew to you the expression of my highest consideration and personal esteem. Signed Moshe Sharett, Min FonAff of Israel."

I propose reply to Sharett as follows:

"In reply to your tel of 13 Aug I have the honour to advise that in extending its invitations to meet in Paris on 10 Sept the CCP has been guided by the relevant resolutions of the GA which call upon the parties to seek a solution of all questions outstanding between them by negots conducted either with the Conciliation Comm or directly. The Govt of Israel may be assured that the proposed discussions in Paris will be conducted fully in accordance with the provisions of these resolutions."

At its last mtg before adjournment PCC agreed that substance above shld be comm's reply to question similar those raised by Sharett. Inasmuch as such a reply at best is indication comm does not wish discuss with parties questions raised by Sharett, I felt it desirable explain our position personally and to suggest Israel might wish now withdraw its query. I therefore called upon Biran at noon today and reviewed with him my discussion with Shiloah and the position comm had taken, explaining our desire avoid discussion of question of priorities with Arab Govts. I said that if Israel raised question concerning agenda and we entered into discussion these points with Israel, it wld be difficult not do so with Arabs shld they raise similar questions. We felt this wld seriously jeopardize successful outcome PCC's new efforts and wld lead us back to same situation we had been in for last 21/2 years. I said that I had recd impression from Shiloah that Israel was favorably inclined our invitation and that I wondered if Shiloah's report our conv had not perhaps crossed Sharett's telegram. In this case, Israel Govt might prefer withdraw tel since reply by comm, which might be regarded as unresponsive, might well make acceptance politically more difficult. I pointed out polit advantage to Israel in unequivocal and prompt acceptance, and that if Israel did ultimately intend accept why not capitalize on such advantages. Biran appeared appreciate latter point and agreed convey my suggestion to Sharett this afternoon. He thought Sharett might want to talk with me later in day. I will follow up with further talks with Shiloah on his arrival Thursday. Comm's decision not enter into discussion agenda however seems to me proper and expedient.

Re Unpal 281,4 I do not see how comm can consistently in view this decision under-take "major effort" obtain parties acceptance. It was at USDel suggestion comm did not reconvene Jerusalem, in order avoid possibility Aras and Marchal being involved in discussions with govts. Nor do I feel that in interest maximum freedom of action after convening of conf it is tactically desirable now for PCC engage in correspondence govts concerned beyond that indicated by proposed reply to Sharett. I had understood these tactics were approved by Dept prior my departure and had indicated in Palun's 422 5 and 423 ° such procedure wld be followed when referred to Fr and Turks being persuaded avoid return to area. In view timetable adopted on necessity extensive preparatory work prior comm's reconvening Paris 27, I do not feel time permits "major effort" by PCC, which in this case wld mean JCI USDel, and wld probably necessitate tour of area. "Major effort" is obviously necessary and wld be readily undertaken by USDel if circumstances permitted and made it desirable to do so. I believe in present circumstances however efforts by US, Fr, Turk, and UK missions in area will be decisive for convening conf. Signed Barco.7 [PALMER]

The Ambassador of Israel (Eban) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (McGhee)

CONFIDENTIAL

Washington, August 22, 1951.

DEAR SECRETARY McGHEE: I write with reference to the conversation held this morning between Ambassador Ernest Gross and Mr. Gideon Rafael, a member of our delegation to the United Nations.1 In the course of that conversation, Ambassador Gross enquired whether we had heard rumours of an intention in some quarters to suggest that the Suez item now before the Security Council be referred to the Palestine Conciliation Commission.

I have no doubt that the United States would take the same view as Israel on this somewhat ludicrous suggestion, if it were to arise. In view of the extreme gravity of the contingency, however, I take this opportunity of putting in writing some of the considerations which Mr. Rafael was instructed to express to Ambassador Gross.

There is no doubt that the procedure described in this unsubstantiated rumour would confer fatal and simultaneous harm both upon the existing armistice system, and on the forthcoming conciliation conference. With respect to the former it must surely be admitted that the Security Council has outdone itself in unprecedented deference to Egypt, giving that country an unexampled opportunity to bring its actions into conformity with international opinion. The majority of the members have expressed themselves in favor of a specific resolution. If the Council were now to evade formal action, after the many postponements already accorded, we should have the unedifying spectacle of the highest organ of international security on its knees before Egypt, confessing its impotence to give formal expression to its own majority opinion. I suggest, in all moderation, that the Security Council would be unable to act with any authority or respect on any Palestine question ever again. Moreover, the inescapable conclusion that the Security Council would refuse in any circumstance to give a ruling in favor of an Israel complaint which all agree to be fully justified, would have a disastrous effect on the Security Council's authority in respect of any problem in which Israel is involved. Moreover, the armistice machinery would remain paralysed if the Security Council were to prolong this refusal to give a ruling on the most important armistice question outstanding between the Parties.

Hardly less disastrous would be the effect of such a move on the Paris conference itself. There would be little prospect for that conference to succeed or even to exist at all, if the Security Council, after weeks of debate and consultation, were to acknowledge that Egypt has a veto over the formal expression of United Nations views. It is certainly inconceivable that Israel and Egypt could hold discussions on progress towards peace, at a time when the latter state maintained its theory of active belligerent rights, while the former was denied an authoritative Security Council judgment on that pernicious theory. Furthermore, the doubt which would justly arise in Israel whether the United Nations exists at all as a tribunal capable of expressing a verdict on an Israel complaint, would destroy the minimum confidence necessary for the conciliation procedure to function under United Nations auspices.

The maintenance of the armistice system is not something to be discussed in Paris. It is an unconditional obligation of the Parties and an indispensable prelude to any further effort to proceed beyond the armistice system.

In view of the deep interest that the United States has evinced both in the maintenance of the armistice system and in the attempt to make progress beyond the armistice during the Paris discussions, I feel sure that you will join in opposing any such tendency, should it be expressed, to debase the dignity of the Security Council and to doom the Paris talks to failure.<sup>2</sup>

With warm personal regards,

I remain, yours very sincerely,

Hope they now understand clearly Dept relation to USDel initiative and that USDel leadership in expeditious PCC consideration of proposals favored by Dept was in response to Dept desire that no time be lost. Although dates in schedule proposed by PCC were later than those suggested by Dept, USDel appreciated and PCC was encouraged by Dept approval with expression of gratification.

Unreserved collaboration of French and Turk reps was obviously due to their knowledge that USDel initiative was inspired by Dept and their feeling that we cld count on Dept guidance and support within US policy as understood by USDel from Secty's letter and in light of Barco's consultation with Dept. Doubt in this regard cld not but prejudice possibilities of success even in small way in what is at best exceedingly difficult and perhaps thankless task. You may imagine how disturbed I was that new French rep on PCC in his first contact with UNRWA under its new American leadership, from which so much is expected, shld have experienced such doubt because of Blandford's apparent unawareness of background of Dept thinking re PCC role, and that Marchal came away with impression that new UNRWA dir resented PCC activity at this time.

Although in response to Deptel June 12, Unpal 270,2 I expressed doubt as to timeliness of new course of action for PCC as envisaged by Dept, I have been ready to participate in new PCC effort because I felt Dept considered this important even though results might fall far short of those desired. When I suggested in mytel June 23, Palun 409,3 that consideration shld be given to Riley's views, I had in mind importance of understanding collaboration between all UN bodies concerned with Pal problem. I have always felt that any uncertainty in Dept as to the considered views of Americans in key positions such as that of TSO chief of staff or dir of UNRWA or US rep on PCC or any lack of understanding on our part as to US policy might seriously prejudice UN activities and US standing in this area. Barco's consultation with Dept and Secty's letter to me have proven invaluable to PCC and you may be sure that with my colleagues I shall do my best to carry out Dept's suggestions and to maintain relations with Riley and Blandford and his successor as US rep on UNRWA AdCom that will facilitate our effective collaboration.

Beirut, August 27, 1951—1 p. m.

190. Rapun 207. 1. Pursuant Unrap 181 AdCom director met Palmer Beirut 24 and 25. Two brief meetings taken up largely with background of Paris meeting and leading part of US in promoting. Arrangements made have director represented during drafting agenda Paris last week August.

- 2. Director and Adcota still have large reservations re effect Paris meeting will have PRA program. As Blandford put it, there have been two philosophies approach to solution Pal problem. One is direct method of trying get parties together negotiate overall agreements. Three-year effort this direction has not conspicuously succeeded. Other is indirect method of attacking individual problems arising from conflict in attempt successively remove obstacles to peace. Unfortunately both methods cannot be used simultaneously without jeopardizing each other.
- 3. It had been our understanding US Govt now preferred indirect approach. Statements of Pres, Secy and McGhee to Congress on PRA appropriation give firm impression US belief is that solution of refugee problem will be large step toward restoration peace and stability Near East. This view has evidently won support in House Representatives. Important thing is that because of or despite US public statements Arab politicians, even reactionary Mufti, have through own rationale decided cooperate PRA solution and enter negotiations 3-year program. Dept's encouragement MAC solutions specific problems also case in point.
- 4. First Arab reactions to PCC invitation have not been reassuring to PRA. Blandford has detected disposition on part Syria to delay awaiting Paris outcome. Lebanon and Egypt have expressed concern Paris meeting might postpone reintegration negotiations for indefinite period.
- 5. Certain suggestions in Secy's letter to Palmer of July 27 (copy of which indirectly reached USDel only on Aug 24) also cause concern. Putting entire subject of repatriation on agenda can only revive hopes on part Arab states and refugees for large-scale return to Israel where there have been strong indications Arab tacit acceptance impossibility this solution. Specifically proposal repatriate refugees who are "economically useful" to Israel strikes us as impracticable and possibly undemocratic (recalls Nazi categories of "economically useful" Jews whose extermination was postponed). Suggestion that Israel would be able select best refugees for repatriation leaving dregs to

Arab states can only arouse bitterest Arab resentment towards UN and US. Compensation discussions also of vital importance to PRA.

6. If Arabs accept Paris invitation will mean they see some propaganda or other advantage. In view present tense situation Near East following political assassinations Arabs probably will be able do little at Paris except repeat outworn shibboleths.

7. Therefore respectfully request Dept explore all possibilities guiding Paris discussions in such manner as to create minimum impingement PRA program.

8. Blandford will receive paraphrase this telegram and his comments will be transmitted to Dept.

SECRET PRIORITY NEW YORK, August 29, 1951—8:58 p. m.

278. Re Syria-Israel dispute. Gross and Ross met this morning with Eban on Huleh case. Jebb, (UK), Ordonneau (France) and Savut (Turkey) represented other co-sponsors of May 18 res.

Gross initiated discussion by indicating mtg was not adversarial, but called to permit informal joint exploration of points that seemed to be at issue. He then outlined these points as set forth in memorandum previously agreed to by the sponsors. (Copy transmitted in next following telegram.) Copy of these informal notes was given to Eban at end of meeting.

Eban's attitude throughout mtg was conciliatory but firm reflection his govt's views on points of issue. His comments on these points may be summarized as follows: (Fuller report of meeting will be sent by

1. General observations:

a. Stating Israel's objection to res prior to passage, Eban said that once res had passed Israel's policy was that of full compliance irrespective of their reservations and apprehensions. He pointed out in this connection that Israel has complied with all requests Riley has made concerning drainage operations.

b. Eban stressed Israeli view that intention of res was only the temporary suspension of drainage operations, that total compliance with the res involves benefits as well as duties and it was hoped that process of implementation would lead to full resumption of drainage project as soon as possible.

c. Israel understood emphasis of para 12A of res as concerning return of Arabs "removed by Govt of Israel" not those who had fled

d. Most important factor in Israeli view was that during first week of May aggression had been committed by Syria not only against the demilitarized zone but also against Israeli territory involving primarily Syrian regular forces and also local Arabs mobilized for purpose.

2. Return of Arabs:

Eban seemed assured that arrangements could be worked out with Riley for return of Arabs referring however to para 22 of Riley's report of August 26. Eban said he did not have instructions and pointed out that return of these Arabs involved question of Israeli security involving status of El Hamma which had become in effect de facto part of Syria through process of annexation.

3. Policing of demilitarized zone:

In this case also, Eban seemed assured, at least hoped, that "practical middle line" solution could be worked out with Riley. He stressed that armistice agreement provided for Israeli and Arab (not Syrian) police in demilitarized zone and predicted that it might be impossible to reach agreement with Riley on juridical status of Israel in zone. He indicated belief Riley seemed to desire change in administrative arrangements which had obtained during last two years based upon 26 June 1949 letter from Bunche to Sharett which was decisive in securing Israeli agreement to armistice agreement, and which, Eban emphasized as one of elements in determining what is right and what wrong, which should not be disregarded by Riley. In this connection Eban talked about the necessity for a new administrative statute for the zone. These considerations, however, should not foreclose reaching practical arrangement with Riley. Israel, Eban said, cannot persist in claiming the right to police the entire zone, but Riley could not deny to Israel the right of administrative linkage with Israeli villages. In summary, Eban indicated that Israel would probably recognize necessity of withdrawing police from Khoury farm permitting Khoury family to return and have access to water, of abolishing restrictions on movement of UN observers and abolishing restrictions on the movement of Arabs who have or who might return.

4. Tel-el-Mutilla:

Referring to para 11b of May 18 res, Eban urged that SC should take seriously Israeli complaint now three months old of what Israelis consider most serious violation of armistice agreement. He hopes sponsors would agree with Riley, in letter to Eban predating last report, that MAC should be convened and that highest priority should be given to an investigation and finding concerning this complaint.

5. MAC:

Eban emphasized that Israel was the party pressing for convening of MAC to consider pending complaints and that prior conditions insisted upon by Syrians were matters that should be brought to MAC if not settled otherwise.

6. Partition demilitarized zone:

Eban saw disturbing signs in paras 18, 19 and 20 of Riley's last report that Riley favored partition of demilitarized zone; Eban also observed he understood that Riley's view was shared by some govts among the co-sponsors. Saying that minimal objective of armistice negotiations from Israeli view was that Syria not be brought to water line, Eban observed that removal of all Syrian authority from proximity to water sources was only thing worthwhile in armistice agreement. He said a major Israel objective in any peace settlement would be to keep Syria away from water line. (End summary Eban's initial comments.)

In response to question by Gross concerning rehabilitation of Arabs dealt with in para 28 of Riley's last report, Eban said he had received cable from Sharett indicating that Israel would try to make Arabs "as comfortable as possible". Admitting this was rather vague, Eban observed that question of Israeli liability must be established. The extent to which Israel might or might not be liable involved the question of culpability of local Arabs mobilized by Syrians in aggressive action first week of May. MAC should investigate this question. It was not matter in regard to which Riley could make finding. Eban added he did not wish to indicate either a positive or a negative attitude, but simply that question was one for MAC to consider. With regard to trading rights of Arabs referred to in para 17 of Riley's report, Eban said in response to question by Gross that there was nothing in armistice agreement (Art 5 in particular) giving Syria economic or political rights in relation to Arab inhabitants of demilitarized zone.

UK, French and Turkish reps agreed with outline of points of issue set forth by Gross. Jebb added a number of comments along following lines with which other co-sponsors indicate agreement.

Emphasizing that members of SC would not support thesis that demilitarized zone belonged to Israel, Jebb observed that if this question were held in abeyance there would be no problem. If, on other hand. Israel behaved as though zone belonged to her we would be "right up against it". He thought it would be better therefore if Israel behaved on the assumption that the zone did not belong to her. If Israeli police were withdrawn from area where they had no business to be and if there were no further encroachments he thought that measures had to be taken to compensate the Arabs and he thought the matter of letting Arabs trade with Syria was a small one involving no important question of principle. Referring to question of Riley being given authority to expropriate Arab lands, Jebb emphasized that no commitment had been given in SC on May 18 and that action by the council depended upon Riley's certifying that the May 18 res was being carried out with few if any reservations. Upon receiving such certification from Riley, Jebb believed attitude of Council members would not be unsympathetic. There would be a presumption in favor of pushing ahead with drainage work provided the Council believed that a question of international peace and security were involved. An important question which would have to be determined was whether there would be any adverse effect on the water supply of Jordan and Syria. Gross added that in view of co-sponsors, before referring to SC, Israel should appeal to MAC under Art 7, para 8 of armistice agreement if it disagreed with Riley's position that chairman did not have authority expropriate lands.

Reps of co-sponsors emphasized purpose of informal discussion was not to cut Riley-Sharett conversations in any way. In our opinion this informal amicable discussion served useful purpose in letting Israelis know in frank and friendly way where co-sponsors stand on important points at issue.

279. Re Syria-Israel:

Following is text of informal notes handed to Ambassador Eban this morning at meeting with co-sponsors of May 18 res discussed in immediately previous tel.

"(1) Co-sponsors note with satisfaction Israeli action on drainage project in compliance with 5th para of res.

- "(2) Interim report of Aug 16 indicates Israelis have not complied with 10th para of May 18 res re Bunche's explanatory note on draft of Art 5 of armistice agreement. Co-sponsors consider Israeli attempt to police entire demilitarized zone inconsistent with that para since they understood para to mean that zone policing should be on local basis, Israeli police for Israeli settlements, Arab police for Arab villages, and size and operation of police forces to be determined by MAC chairman.
- "(3) Report also indicates non-compliance by Israelis with 12th para of res since procedures for returning Arabs to zone and treatment of Arabs already returned to zone are not satisfactory. In this connection following paras from General Riley's fourth interim report (document S/2300) were discussed.
  - "15. Return of Arabs removed to Shaab area.
  - "16. Right of Arabs to trade with Syria.
    "21. Return of Arabs who fled to Syria.
  - "22. Return of Arabs now in vicinity of El Hamma to Es Samra and Nuqueb.

"28. Compensation and rehabilitation of Arabs returned to demilitarized zone.

"(4) Report indicates non-compliance by Israelis with 14th para of res since restrictive measures on movement of UN observers within zone have been imposed by Israeli police.

"(5) Report indicates parties have not complied with paras 7, 8 and 9 of res in that they have not agreed to a MAC meeting since June despite a number of complaints pending.

"(6) Co-sponsors feel that both parties must make fullest use of machinery of Syrian-Israel general armistice agreement. This includes meeting in MAC to discuss outstanding complaints and other issues of concern to one or the other party."

Resolution Adopted by the United Nations Security Council on September 1, 1951 <sup>1</sup>

The Security Council

1. Recalling that in its resolution of 11 August 1949 (S/1376), relating to the conclusion of Armistice Agreements between Israel and the neighbouring Arab States it drew attention to the pledges in these Agreements "against any further acts of hostility between the Parties";

- 2. Recalling further that in its resolution of 17 November 1950 (S/1907) it reminded the States concerned that the Armistice Agreements to which they were parties contemplated "the return of permanent peace in Palestine", and therefore urged them and the other States in the area to take all such steps as would lead to the settlement of the issues between them;
- 3. Noting the report of the Chief of Staff of the Truce Supervision Organization to the Security Council of 12 June 1951 (S/2194);
- 4. Further noting that the Chief of Staff of the Truce Supervision Organization recalled the statement of the senior Egyptian delegate in Rhodes on 13 January 1949, to the effect that his delegation was "inspired with every spirit of co-operation, conciliation and a sincere desire to restore peace in Palestine", and that the Egyptian Government has not complied with the earnest plea of the Chief of Staff made to the Egyptian delegate on 12 June 1951, that it desist from the present practice of interfering with the passage through the Suez Canal of goods destined for Israel;
- 5. Considering that since the Armistice regime, which has been in existence for nearly two and a half years, is of a permanent character, neither party can reasonably assert that it is actively a belligerent or requires to exercise the right of visit, search, and seizure for any legitimate purpose of self-defence;
- 6. Finds that the maintenance of the practice mentioned in paragraph 4 above is inconsistent with the objectives of a peaceful settlement between the parties and the establishment of a permanent peace in Palestine set forth in the Armistice Agreement;
- 7. Finds further that such practice is an abuse of the exercise of the right of visit, search and seizure;
- 8. Further finds that that practice cannot in the prevailing circumstances be justified on the ground that it is necessary for self-defence;
- 9. And further noting that the restrictions on the passage of goods through the Suez Canal to Israel ports are denying to nations at no time connected with the conflict in Palestine valuable supplies required for their economic reconstruction, and that these restrictions together with sanctions applied by Egypt to certain ships which have visited Israel ports represent unjustified interference with the rights of nations to navigate the seas and to trade freely with one another, including the Arab States and Israel;
- 10. Calls upon Egypt to terminate the restrictions on the passage of international commercial shipping and goods through the Suez Canal wherever bound and to cease all interference with such shipping beyond that essential to the safety of shipping in the Canal itself and to the observance of the international conventions in force.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (McGhee) 1

CONFIDENTIAL

[Washington,] September 4, 1951.

Subject: Visit of Israel Ambassador Abba Eban. Participants:

Abba Eban, Ambassador of Israel

Moshe Keren, Counsel, Embassy of Israel

Mr. McGhee-NEA Mr. Waldo-NE

The Ambassador said that he was calling to take his leave before departing for a week's rest at Lake Placid. He then reviewed briefly several items:

- 1. Suez: The Ambassador expressed his gratitude for US support on the Suez Canal issue and his relief that the resolution had been adopted by the SC on Saturday, September 1. I said that, as the Ambassador knew, our position all along had been one of support for the resolution. The Ambassador then alluded to the surprise Russian move on Wednesday, August 29, requesting postponement.2 He said that the Russian representative 3 had told him that actually the Soviet position was against the restrictions, whether they were restrictions on the Suez Canal, the Panama Canal or other international waterway of this sort. The Ambassador said he had noted that the Arab States had received a temporary morale boost in the belief that the Russians were now prepared to support them. It was agreed that their disillusionment with the Soviet Union was the severer for the fact that the Soviet gesture requesting postponement had been made at all.
- 2. PCC: The Ambassador said that his Government fully intended to accept the PCC invitations but hoped the Arab States would not insist on refusing to discuss outstanding problems with Israel face to face as a precondition of their acceptance of the invitation. The Ambassador was informed that the Egyptians had accepted the invitation without making this a precondition. I said it was probable they would refuse to talk directly with the Israelis at first, however, but we hoped that in the course of the discussions they might be brought to acquiesce in direct talks. It would probably be easier to get them to agree to direct talks if no publicity were given to their initial refusal and no attempt was made to argue the point publicly. The Ambassador said he felt that unless direct talks were held it was highly improbable that any progress toward a settlement could be achieved. He pointed out that, after all, the Arabs negotiated directly with the Israelis on a continuing basis in the several Mixed Armistice Commissions and had even talked directly with them at the Lausanne Conference, but never in a formal meeting. He expressed the hope that the US would do its best to get the Arabs to agree to go along with the idea of direct negotiations, or at least to keep them from interjecting any preconditions into their acceptance of the invitation. I said that we would certainly look into it and do what we could in this regard.

Mr. Waldo mentioned that the PCC report in the autumn of 1950 had recommended that direct discussions were necessary to permit constructive progress toward a peace settlement. The US had supported the conclusions of the PCC report.

- 3. Plans for the General Assembly: The Ambassador said that he wanted to have a good talk with me some time in the future concerning US plans for the GA. I said that I would be happy to do so. The Ambassador asked if we knew whether the Jerusalem question would be raised in the Assembly. I said that I did not know about this. Mr. Waldo said that there were several countries, including Israel, opposed to General Assembly consideration of this question; we were not particularly anxious to bring it up. It was possible, however, that one of the Latin America delegations or delegation of a Catholic country might raise the question. In the event the question should be raised, our tentative view was that our position this year would be very similar to that of last year. We would probably support a resolution along the lines of the Swedish Draft Resolution 4 of last year. The Ambassador agreed that it would be desirable not to discuss this question at all but if it were determined that some country planned to raise the question he thought the interested delegations should be prepared to introduce and support promptly a plan along the lines of the Swedish Draft Resolution in order to forestall opposition and the likelihood of another Belgian plan. I told the Ambassador that Mr. Plitt, former US Minister in Tangier, would be NEA's representative at the GA this year and we would all get together for general discussion of the Assembly at a later date.
- 4. Requirements: The Ambassador said he also wished to mention the subject of requirements. Israel was having a great deal of difficulty in obtaining steel these days. Steel was necessary for pipe and pipe was necessary for irrigation purposes to increase crop acreage which would provide for the vast numbers of new immigrants. The Ambassador said that the various representatives of the American Government who dealt with requirements had been very cooperative with the Israel representatives and in most instances they had received the necessary requirements tickets. The difficulty began, however, when Israel representatives attempted to get their orders filled by the steel companies. The attitude of the latter was that Israel was

- a relatively new customer and that the old customers deserved priority. The Ambassador asked me if there was anything the Department could do to assist Israel to obtain the necessary steel from private concerns. I said that we would certainly look into it; that Mr. Hyman might usefully talk with Mr. Norman Burns in NE. We would see what we could do.
- 5. Visit of Foreign Minister Sharett: I inquired when the Foreign Minister was arriving in the US. The Ambassador replied that Mr. Sharett would arrive in the US on the 13th of September. He would be in Washington the 20th of September and would stay about three days. While here he would address a meeting of the National Economic Conference for Israel—the bond-raising organization. I said I should like to do something for him and hoped he would hold a little time open, either for lunch or dinner, or something of that sort. The Ambassador said that could certainly be arranged and he would let me know.
- 6. Huleh: The Ambassador then got up to depart, and I mentioned to him the fact that I understood the cosponsors of the SC Resolution of May 18 had held useful talks with him in New York; that I was glad to hear this. I thought that the talks Israel would have with General Riley in Tel Aviv would also be most important. The Ambassador said he understood the General had already talked to the Foreign Minister, but an account of the conversation had not been received.

When Meron brought up previous Israeli requests for PRA reintegration assistance Blandford replied Israel who is asking and getting large-scale aid from abroad to reintegrate newcomers should attack this "unfinished business" first and reintegrate own refugees without calling on UN. 222. Re Embtels 60, July 20 <sup>2</sup> and 111, August 3.<sup>3</sup> FonMin told me last night he felt encouraged over progress talks between Gen Riley and reps Israel Govt. He had had prelim conversation with Gen Riley which had been followed by long session yesterday morning between Gen Riley, Col Taxis and M. Vigier for TSO and Mr. Eytan, DirGen FonOff, Gen Yadin, Brig Makleff, Col Ramati, Mr. Dafne and Mr. Shiloah representing Israel Govt. Sharett remarked with obvious satis that he understood virtual agreement had been reached on all major points.

Later Eytan expressed similar views saying he believed satis basis had been worked out for settlement of outstanding questions with respect Huleh situation. He stated that most important question had of course been that relating to policing of demil zone, and that armistice agreement empowered MAC chairman to authorize employment of limited numbers locally recruited civilian police for internal security purposes. Since chairman was only to authorize employment it was clear that some other auth shld actually select and employ necessary local police. Since numbers were to be limited it was conceded that chairman's power to auth shld extend to determining numbers to be employed. He stated further that policing of Jewish and Arab villages wild extend to immed surroundings and that implementation of plan wild contemplate coop between police of various local districts in demil zone.

As to return of Arabs, Eytan said it had been agreed that those expelled from northern zone shld be allowed to return but other arrangements wild be made with respect those formerly in southern zone since latter had no lands to farm in that district. He stated that right of TSO officials and observers to have free access to all parts of demil zone was unquestioned. It was understood also that return of Arabs to Khoury farm wld be permitted.

Emb comment: Fact that Israel officials were silent re Gen Riley's interim report and degree to which they now show disposition to meet points raised indicate that they took serious view of report and wish to improve their position vis-à-vis TSO. On other hand concessions they have made do not include any relinquishment of actual control of demil zone, and problem of policing may still give rise to difficulties.

Expressed great interest in progress of negots and reiterated view expressed to FonMin as reported Embtel 60, July 20 that in view capital being made of Israel's alleged noncompliance it is important that this country place itself in correct and unassailable position this respect. 312. I feel impelled to say that I have been surprised by extent our relations in this part of world have suffered as result of our stand on Suez restrictions, and I apprehend we will be suffering from this for some time. It has caused, for instance, a recrudescence of the Pal question which in Egypt had become quiescent, and may have bearing on our ability to do things, particularly in connection Anglo-Egypt negots. It has caused Arab revival of talk for closer relations with Russia.

I report this only because it is better to face facts.

354. Dept has been giving careful attention ur desp 205 July 30 <sup>2</sup> on invocation Art VIII Suez Canal Convention, and fol comments are made in light situation resulting from SC passage Res Sep 1.

US wld wish avoid any mtg dip reps under Art VIII of 1888 convention, and any efforts by Egypt convoke such mtg. It is poss Egypt FonMin not now seriously considering such move in view recent Sov conduct in SC, although monitored news desp suggests some action might now be taken under Art VIII of convention. Emb can best determine whether any approach Egypt FonMin at this time wld be useful. Shld Emb decide discuss question with FonMin or shld FonMin himself raise matter, fol points might be used in effort dissuade Egypt from Art VIII action.

(1) In view circumstances surrounding negots 1888 convention and subsequent Anglo-Fr agreement 1904, doubtful whether Art VIII Canal Convention ever became operative and consequently whether it cld now be applied. Legal memo re this being air pouched.

(2) Canal restrictions have already been considered by SC and Egypt has been called upon remove them. Egypt's compliance with SC res constitutes its major obligation as UN member. Therefore, any further consideration these restrictions under Canal Convention cld not alter effect SC res or Egypt's obligations.

(3) Even if mtg convoked by Egypt shld take place we doubt whether Egypt wld find support from majority participants for its position.

(4) Involvement USSR in this question wld only serve as complicating factor and wld probably work to particular disadvantage Egypt. Recent abortive Sov action in SC is good example this assertion.

(5) Dept's tentative view is Austria and Hungary, by virtue of Art 234 Treaty St. Germain and Art 217 Treaty Trianon, are legal successors to Austria-Hungary. However, in any discussion with Egypt FonMin, Dept wld prefer any Emb comment on this point be limited to expression that problem of succession to Austria-Hungary wld raise additional doubts in connection with Art VIII.

The United States Representative on the Palestine Conciliation Commission (Palmer) to the Secretary of State

SECRET NIACT PARIS, September 12, 1951—8 p. m.

1610. Palun 440. 1. Fol receipt Unpal 286, Sept 6,1 USDel submitted to French and Turk reps a redraft of proposals to be submitted to parties conforming to Dept's suggestions. Final agreement was reached this morning after protracted daily meetings in which French del raised numerous objections both as to form and substance. These objections came as surprise inasmuch as Marchal had indicated his agreement to original USDel proposals at informal meeting in which they were discussed. It is clear he has had difficult time with FonOff where misgivings may be attributable to Brit lack of enthusiasm for conference and French preoccupation with (a) their interest in Israel-Syrian demilitarized zone question and possible French commitment to Syrians in this connection, and (b) their fear that if PCC makes "supreme effort" now and fails, continuance of PCC beyond this year will be unlikely. It is clear to us that French are prepared to seize whatever opportunity arises to inject PCC into Israel-Syrian border question and that they see in possible disappearance PCC, in event conference fails, blow to French influence in Mid East. In any case, they appeared desire continue procedure followed in Lausanne and Geneva and postpone time when PCC wld take initiative by presenting its own proposals as basis discussion.

2. Despite these difficulties, we have succeeded in reaching agreement on text opening statement, text PCC proposals, and following procedure: (1) Opening meetings with Arab and Israel dels morning and afternoon of Sept 13, at which time statement, text of which contained below, will be read by me as chairman; (2) Second meetings with Arab and Israel dels on Monday Sept 17 to give parties opportunity to reply to opening statement (Arabs requested no meetings before Mon in view three-day Moslem holiday); (3) Following these replies Comm to submit proposals, text of which given below, to parties at meeting to be scheduled as soon as practicable.

- 3. Dept will note from text PCC's proposals that nonaggression declaration has been incorporated as preamble, with understanding that Comm will emphasize importance of agreement to such declaration as preliminary to consideration of its comprehensive proposals, in accordance with Dept's views as contained para 1, Unpal 286.2 Refs in declaration to relevant articles armistice agreements were not included in view fact Egyptian-Israeli armistice agreement differs with respect to articles from other agreements. Hence only general reference to obligations of members UN and signatories armistice agreements was included.
- 4. Dept will also note that para 5 has been redrafted to avoid specific reference to future conference for revision armistice agreements in accordance Dept's views. USDel continues believe there are substantial reasons for PCC's advocating that questions under para 5 be considered in subsequent meetings for this purpose. We believe such a proposal contains greater hope for direct negotiations between Israel and Arab states than present conference and that it will be inducement Israel consider comprehensive proposals favorably. We also continue feel that PCC is equipped to deal with specific questions under armistice agreements only in general way, and that shld PCC formally take up any of specific questions under para 5, French wld endeavor bring Israeli-Syrian question to forefront. Later conference has merit permitting any UN organ or rep lead discussions and if endorsed by GA wld have greater chance success than at present. We have therefore suggested to our colleagues that at appropriate time PCC might, under para 5, advocate subsequent meetings for full scale consideration questions enumerated and that for present we wld limit our formal efforts to proposal that parties agree in principle to discussion these items. We have also indicated we wld agree have informal discussions of specific questions under para 5 during course present meetings.

- 5. Fabre, UNRWA liaison officer representing Blandford, was given by Barco full explanation USDel proposals on 6 Sept with request Fabre transmit to Blandford full account. USDel understands Fabre has not done so, on assumption Blandford wld receive indication US position from Dept, altho he has conveyed his belief to Blandford that US proposals are satisfactory from UNRWA standpoint. USDel suggests Dept repeat agreed text PCC proposals to Beirut for Blandford and to other US missions in area, as well as to London and Ankara. USDel still hopes Dept will be able obtain greater UK support our efforts and this connection that UK will be prepared appoint liaison officer for Paris meetings.
  - 6. Agreed text Chairman's opening statement follows:

"As the Chairman of the Palestine Conciliation Commission during the Comm's initial meetings here with you, it is my privilege, and it is a pleasure for me, to welcome you on behalf of the Commission as participants in this Paris conf.

"We find in the acceptance of our invitations to this conference, by the govts of the five neighbor states to which the invitations were addressed, encouragement for our belief that those who entered into the armistice agreements have an earnest desire to promote the return of permanent peace in Palestine.

"Those engagements, entered into almost three years ago, had a two-fold purpose: To put an end to bitter warfare and to pave the way for a transition to a lasting peace in a land sacred to three of the world's great religions.

"The first purpose has been achieved; the warfare between the neighbor states has been stopped. But there has been little progress toward the achievement of the second purpose—that is, the working out of a peaceful settlement of the problems dividing these neighbor states.

"The objective of this conference, in which we hope to continue to find encouragement from your participation, is to see, through mediation, solutions to these problems which, as we see them, can be broadly grouped into two categories: (a) problems mainly affecting the rights and status of individuals, and (b) problems mainly affecting the rights, obligations and relations of states.

"The first group includes such questions as the repatriation, compensation and resettlement of the refugees; claims for indemnification for damages resulting from hostilities; and disposition of blocked accounts.

"Among the specific problems in the second group are: Delineation of boundary and demarcation lines: demilitarized zone and no-man's lands; arrangements for free-port facilities; water, fishing and navigation rights; communications and telecommunications; and such problems as narcotics, contraband and health control.

"Many of these problems have been the subject of discussions between the Comm and the parties during the past three years. In a sense, these discussions have been useful. They have made abundantly clear the views, aspirations and ideas of the parties to the dispute.

But the time has now come to make constructive use of this clarification of views, aspirations and ideas. That is the task the Comm has undertaken by assuming its mediatory functions at this conference and by offering to submit concrete proposals for consideration by the parties.

"In drafting the proposals to be submitted to you, the Comm has been guided by two considerations: fairness and realism. We have tried to take into consideration all the views expressed during the past three years by the parties to the dispute, as well as the political, social and economic realities observed by us. We have come to the conclusion that the Palestine problem must be considered in its entirety, and that its solution must be sought in a fair and realistic spirit of give-and-take.

"In considering the Palestine problem in its entirety, we are following the guidance given to us by the GA. The Assembly res under which our Comm operates—and under which you are cooperating with us emphasizes the general character of the Palestine problem. In drafting our mediatory proposals for discussion in this conference, we have had to keep in mind that the GA has instructed us to assist the govts and authorities concerned to achieve a final settlement of all questions outstanding between them. We feel certain that in considering our proposals, you will keep in mind that the assembly, in the same resolution, has called upon the parties to the dispute, to seek agreement by negotiations with a view to the final settlement of all outstanding questions. It is impossible to miss the meaning of this call and the clear emphasis of the res on the interdependence of the various elements of the Palestine problem. Experience has shown that concentration on one or the other isolated paragraphs of the res out of context has not helped in the promotion of peace in Palestine. All the elements are necessary, but they are useful only if linked together according to an overall plan. For example, the res instructs us to facilitate the repatriation, resettlement and rehabilitation of refugees, and we did not forget that instruction when we drafted our proposals for this conference. Nor did we forget the instruction given us in the same res, to seek agreements between the govts which will facilitate the economic development of the area, including arrangements for free access to ports and airfields and the use of transportation and communication facilities. On the one hand, a sound economic development is impossible in an area with hundreds of thousands of homeless people uncertain of the future and their standing in society. On the other hand, refugees—and non-refugees for that matter—cannot be settled securely anywhere in an area badly lacking economic development.

obvious to be overlooked.

"The Conciliation Comm has not overlooked it in weighing the mediatory proposals to be placed before you at this conference. In drafting those proposals, we have considered that any solution of the refugee question will involve important commitments by Israel. But we have also considered that Israel cannot be expected to make such commitments unless, at the same time, she receives reasonable assurances from her neighbors as to her national and economic security.

"The solution of the refugee problem proposed by the comm envisages the repatriation and integration of some of the refugees in Israel and the resettlement of others in Arab countries.

"Such undertakings will necessitate the creation of additional land by means of development and irrigation and agreements between the parties on the use of water resources. These agreements will, in turn, involve revisions or extensions in scope of existing armistice agreements, as well as appropriate economic arrangements.

"No constructive progress towards a solution of your problems is possible unless all the parties to the dispute at the outset of our discussions here, express their determination to respect each other's right to security and freedom from attack, to refrain from warlike or hostile acts against one another, and to promote the return of permanent peace in Palestine.

"These are the considerations which have inspired the comprehensive proposals which the Comm will place before you as the pattern for this conference.

"At this time of our initial meeting here with you, my colleagues and I have endeavored to help you to understand the general pattern of proposals which we desire to submit to you for consideration after you have had an opportunity at our next meeting to respond to this statement. We believe that you will understand our feeling that the measure of the helpfulness of our proposals will be found not only in the extent to which they offer opportunities for progressive action but also in the extent to which we can all work together to make the most of these opportunities.

"It is now almost three years since the GA formulated a UN policy for the settlement of the problems arising out of the Palestine conflict. Notwithstanding successive efforts to find a way to such a settlement, we have as yet made no progress that to the casual observer is in any way apparent. Without attempting to determine where the primary responsibility for that failure may be, we all here must now recognize that we share the responsibility for coming to grips with these problems in a new spirit of determination, realism and honesty. No one of us can fail to hope that the problems with which we are dealing will be solved, or fail to wish to make his distinct contribution to their solution. It is easy enough to look at the record of the past three years and remain skeptical. What is needed now from all of us is extra determination, extra faith, extra goodwill. Too much depends on the outcome of our efforts here for any of us to indulge in second thoughts, flagging determination or lack of faith in our ability to arrive at a just solution. The conciliation Comm is ready and determined to do its part. In doing its part, it counts on your understanding and cooperation in fullest measures."

7. Agreed text PCC comprehensive proposals for submission to parties follows:

"On the basis of the considerations set forth by the Chairman in his opening statement, the Comm desires to submit to the parties for consideration a comprehensive pattern of proposals.

"As a part of this comprehensive pattern, the Comm wld emphasize the importance of a preliminary accord in reaffirmation of the undertakings of the parties as signatories to the armistice agreements and as UN members in the form of the fol preamble:

"Preamble:

"In accordance with the obligations of states members of the UN and of signatories to armistice agreements, the govts of Egypt, Jordan, Lebanon and Syria and the Govt of Israel solemnly affirm their intention and undertake to settle all differences, present or future, solely by resort to pacific procedures, refraining from any use of force or acts of hostility, with full respect for the right of each party to security and freedom from fear of attack, and by these means to promote the return of peace in Palestine.

"Proposals:

"With a view to the settlement of outstanding differences dividing the parties, the Comm submits the fol proposals for their consideration:

"1. That an agreement be reached concerning war damages arising out of the hostilities of 1948, such an agreement to include, in the Comm's opinion, mutual cancellation of such claims, by the Govts of Egypt, Jordan, Lebanon and Syria and the Govt of Israel:

"2. That the Govt of Israel agree to the repatriation of a specified number of Arab refugees in categories which can be integrated into the economy of the state of Israel and who wish to return and live in peace with their neighbors;

"3. That the Govt of Israel accept the obligation to pay, as compensation for property abandoned by those refugees not repatriated, a global sum based upon the evaluation arrived at by the Comm's refugee office; that a payment plan, taking into consideration the Govt of Israel's ability to pay, be set up by a special comite of economic and financial experts to be established by a UN trustee through whom payment of individual claims for compensation wld be made.

"4. That the Govts of Egypt, Jordan, Lebanon and Syria and the Govt of Israel agree upon the mutual release of all blocked bank accounts and to make them payable in pounds sterling.

"5. That the Govt of Israel and the Govts of Egypt, Jordan, Lebanon and Syria agree to consider, under UN auspices, and in the light of experience gained during the past three years, the revision or amendment of the armistice agreements between them, especially with regard to the fol questions:

"(a) Territorial adjustments, including demilitarized zones;

"(b) The creation of an international water authority to deal with the problems of the use of the Jordan and Yarmuk rivers and their tributaries, as well as the waters of Lake Tiberias:

"(c) The disposition of the Gaza strip;
"(d) The creation of a free port at Haifa;

"(e) Border regulations between Israel and her neighbors with special attention to the need for free access to the holy places in the Jerusalem area, including Bethlehem;

"(f) Health, narcotics and contraband control along the demarcation lines;

"(g) Arrangements which will facilitate the economic development of the areas: resumption of communications and economic relations between Israel and her neighbors." 3

CONFIDENTIAL PRIORITY PARIS, September 14, 1951—6 p. m. 1648. Palun 444. Fischer, Israel rep, called this afternoon to inform USDel of Sharett's reaction to chairman's opening statement. He said Sharett had expressed his surprise that statement went beyond question of compensation. He thought ref to repatriation wld prove to be red herring which wld make progress difficult. Chairman's statement wld have to be referred to cabinet, and reply to PCC wld not be possible for several days.

I told Fischer Arab reps expected receive proposals Monday <sup>3</sup> and that it wld be unfortunate if PCC cld not meet with Israel del on same day. I suggested that if he was not prepared Monday to reply to chairman's opening statement, he might say so at that time but indicate he was ready to receive PCC proposals for transmission to his govt. I said I thought it wld be undesirable for Israel Govt to formulate position on opening statement without first knowing content of proposals. Fischer felt he cld not ask PCC for proposals on Monday in view his govts attitude, but added that he wld be willing attend meeting and merely state he cld not yet make reply to opening statement; he wld leave it to PCC to submit proposals then and wld be prepared receive them for transmittal to his govt. He is so informing Israel Govt.

USDel feels this procedure is most desirable and hopes there will be no adverse reaction in Tel Aviv.

1. While it has been Departmental policy publicly to identify PCC with conciliation of past polit issues and UNRWA with coop on constructive econ measures, two efforts are interlinked and there shld be constant private consultation.

2. 3. Had completed entirely satis first-round visits Arab Govts re three-year program when Paris mtg announced. Subsequent four visits have each raised spectre of delay and of hazarding concrete commitments before assembly mtg. Paris conferences shid recognize this.

4. There is as yet no normal UN channel of consultation on Paris negots. Secretary General apparently uninformed. PCC chairman advises he reports to Dept. Departmental communication through US member AdCom inadequate because is incomplete and long delayed.

SECRET NIACT

Paris, September 18, 1951—1 p. m.

1698. Palun 445. On afternoon of 15th Fischer, Israel rep, called at his request to inform USDel he wld not be able fol procedure we had agreed upon for today's mtg as reported Palun 444, Sept 14.2 He had however submitted certain suggestions to his govt which he hoped wld be accepted and wld provide way out of difficulty. He agreed inform me of his govt's reply to his suggestions as soon as recd.

Yesterday evening Fischer called again to say Shiloah wld arrive l'aris 8:15 Monday morning and wished call upon USDel as soon as possible after his arrival. This morning, Monday, Fischer arrived at limb without Shiloah, who he said had not arrived as scheduled. Under circumstances he cld not receive PCC proposals and requested Comm withhold submission to Arab Dels. I explained Arab Dels had clearly expressed their wish receive PCC proposals at today's meeting after they had responded to chairman's opening statement and that in our opinion it wld be unfortunate for Comm to have to submit proposals to one of parties without communicating them to other. I wld, however, inform my colleagues of Israel Rep's request.

At immediately fol PCC meeting Comm decided if Arab Dels concluded their statements in today's meeting and continued indicate their desire receive proposals, Comm had no choice other than submit proposals this time. To withhold proposals at request of one govt when four govts had indicated wish receive them wld inevitably create impression PCC delaying its proposals in order make them compatible with Israel views. At this morning's meeting with Arabs after statement by Shukairy in name of all dels, I therefore read text of proposals to dels and provided them with copies. In reading text, I divided proposals into two parts, preamble and proposals proper indicating PCC view that consideration preamble was important preliminary to consideration remaining items. Shukairy's statement fols:

"The Arab League Dels desire at outset, to repeat their thanks to the warm welcome extended to them by the Honorable Commission. We wish also to place on record our appreciation of able explanation of term 'conf' frequently referred to in opening statement of the Comm. Apart from being praiseworthy, the interpretation of the chairman on this point tends to remove any misinterpretation. The Arab Dels wld like to seize this opportunity to reiterate their readiness to collaborate with the conciliation Comm in its efforts to arrive at a just and equitable settlement of the Palestine question. Ever since the Comm embarked upon its mission, the Arab League Dels have been responding to invitations to meet the Comm in Beirut, Lausanne, Geneva and New York. It is in this spirit that we have come to Paris to resume our meetings with the Comm.

"We have given a careful study to the opening statement delivered by the chairman of the Comm last meeting. The general pattern of the proposals the Comm intends to place before us is so wide that it is not appropriate at this stage to attempt a detailed analysis. It is only when we are presented with specific proposals that we deem it possible to define our final attitude.

"The Statement of the Comm, however, has introduced certain criteria and considerations foreign to the resolutions of the UN, and not within the context of the Palestine problem. To begin with, it is our respectful submission that the PCC as its name and terms of ref indicate, is confined to dealing with the Palestine problem. All the outstanding questions together with the refugees problems are part and parcel of the Palestine question. As such, the problem does not involve rights, duties and relations of states. Interstate relations are matters regulated in accordance with the established principles of international law, inasmuch as such relations are acts of sovereignty which are exercised at will and discretion. The creation, cessation or absence of relations between states are exclusively within the domestic jurisdiction of every state. These relations ranging between recognition and 'bon voisinage' agreements exclusively fall within the orbit of national sovereignty, and as such cannot be subjected to the cognizance of the UN or any of its organs.

"Confident that the Comm does not challenge this principle, the Arab Dels can rest sure that the proposals to be offered by the Comm will be restricted to the issues relevant to the Palestine problem. The Comm, we believe, will refrain from touching upon any matter incidental to the rights, duties and relations of states. Yet it is worthy in this connection to point out that the provisions of the armistice agreements have taken due care of the security situation in Palestine. Ample injunction has been made in the said agreements against resort to mil force or any aggressive action. As parties to these agreements we shall continue to respect obligations thereunder. This undertaking of no aggression, no resumption of hostilities and no resort to the force of arms is the sole obligation that the charter of the UN can dictate over states members.

"In second place, the Arab Dels wish to point out that proposals envisaged by the Comm shld be within the framework of the resolutions of the GA. With regard to the problem of the refugees, the Comm has a specific mandatory task in para II of the res of 11 December, 1948. It is well understood that the fairness and realism referred to in the statement of the Comm will be applied in the direction of implementing the resolutions of the GA. Any other interpretation wld lead to the frustration of the GA resolutions. It must be remembered, however, that the role of the Comm with regard to para II is implementation and not conciliation. The Assembly has already decided the issue by fairness, realism and any other criterion it has to apply. The matter of the refugees stands res judicata, passed to the Comm for effective implementation.

"Thirdly and without discussing the interdependence or otherwise of the various aspects of the Palestine question, the Arab Dels deem it necessary to emphasize the priority and urgency which shld be accorded to problem of the refugees. Recognized by the GA the rights of the refugees are not contingent or dependent upon the say of Israel. The only qualification placed upon the refugee in his option to return to his home is his readiness to live at peace with his neighbors. Peace here shid emanate from the refugee himself. It is obvious that the rights of the refugees do not constitute commitments by Israel. Israel's respect to these rights, apart from being fundamental and imperative, does not place upon the Arab States obligations not imposed under the charter of International Law. Under the GA res of 1947 the rights of the Arabs in Israel prevail over any constitution or enactment of law. To ask the Arab States to provide assurances for the economic security of Israel in return to the respect of the rights of the refugees is a novelty in international dealings. The economic security of Israel is Israel's concern and duty. Israel claims to be a sovereign state and it is for her to secure an economy which is her making and in which we have no say. The deplorable plight of the refugees shid not be used as lever to secure Israel in the very economy she has planned. The rights of the refugees are preexisting the existence of Israel, and the Arab Dels legitimately consider themselves under no obligation towards the economic development, stability or security of Israel.

"In conclusion, it is appropriate to recall that the Arab League Dels have discussed with the Comm the various aspects of the Palestine question. The refugees, the territorial aspects, blocked accounts, broken families and various other conservatory measures—all have been exhaustively examined. To each of these items due time and effort have been dedicated. Concentration of discussion was not a monopoly to one aspect or the other. The failure so far is not due to certain procedures. Likewise, it is not due to concentration on one item or its isolation from the general context. The reason is to be found primarily in the negative conduct of Israel and its persistence not to recede from the 'fait accompli'."

The incessant and sincere efforts of the Comm to achieve the acceptance by Israel of the res of the GA did not succeed. The protocol of May was ignored by Israel. The armistice lines, against the express provisions of the armistice agreement, are final in the eyes of Israel, to say nothing of expansionist intentions. The attitude of Israel as shown in the various documents of the Comm, has contributed in bringing about the failure of the conciliation efforts.

It has thus become clear that the process of conciliation lacks a party to conciliation. Before Israelis made to respond to the call of the UN for cooperation with the Comm within the perimeter of the resolutions of the GA the conciliation efforts will remain fruitless. For our part we shall continue to collaborate with the Comm in goodwill, faith and determination."

After my reading text PCC proposals, Arab Dels stated they wld not respond at this time but wld reserve their comments for more detailed exposition by Comm of its proposals at subsequent mtgs. USDel was encouraged by relative moderation Shukairy's statement, absence insistence prior settlement refugee question before discussion other subjects and apparent acceptance Comm's proposals as substitute for agenda.

During this mtg, Shiloah arrived in Paris and telephoned requesting USDel lunch with him. I informed him at luncheon of action taken at mtg with Arab Dels and urged him see way clear to receive PCC proposals at mtg scheduled with Israel Del this afternoon. In long discussion of pros and cons Comm's procedure, Shiloah indicated Israel preoccupation was with idea of PCC's putting forward own suggestions for solutions various problems during course of mtgs. For PCC to suggest any solutions was in fact, to take position on what Israel shid "give" and to prejudice whole issue by stiffening Arab attitude. PCC, he indicated, shld restrict itself to discussing with parties choice of agenda items and leave to parties negotiation solutions under such agenda items. In response to our question as to whether Israel did not expect "give" something in course of negotiations, Shiloah clearly implied Israel cld not consider giving anything, and referred to Israel's original offer re repatriation as withdrawn. He believed, however, it would be appropriate for Comm to call upon the parties to sign a nonaggression declaration, which Israel wld be prepared to do at once, and to refrain from submitting other suggestions. He felt Israel cld not even consider other matters until after signature such an agreement.

USDel explained, without apparently convincing Shiloah, that best chance in our opinion for successfully negotiating nonaggression declaration was to emphasize it as preliminary item for discussion and agreement before consideration items in pattern of proposals. But we further explained that to submit to Arab Dels nonaggression declaration as sole item for discussion wld be to invite their refusal consider such item until they were informed full extent Comm's other proposals.

On matters arising under armistice agreements Shiloah stated Israel wld never agree discuss with all Arab Dels items relating only to relations between Israel and one Arab Govt and that Comm shld propose parallel conf in which Arab Dels interested in over-all problems wld be invited only to such problems together, while series individual mtgs shld be arranged on problems involving Israel and single Arab country.

USDel again urged Shiloah find way receive proposals at this afternoon's mtg and pointed out discussion such as was then taking place between us wld be more profitable and less academic if Israel Del had before it very proposals under discussion. It was our impression at this point Shiloah agreed receive proposals at this afternoon's mtg.

At mtg, however, Israel Rep declined receive proposals in brief statement read by Fischer as follows:

"Before making any ref to the statement made by Mr. Palmer on Thurs last, my del wld like to submit to the Comm a few observations on the atmosphere surrounding the opening of the conf. The very word 'conf' invokes in the public mind the idea of the invited parties mtg round the same table. It is not surprising that the public and the press shld tend to interpret the calling of the parties to separate mtgs as the result of the refusal of certain of them to meet the other, which other can be none but Israel, whose attitude in principle is well-known. The adoption of an official attitude by the Comm wld serve to avoid any misunderstanding suggesting that the invitations separate mtgs were not the free choice of the Comm.

"My del deeply deplores the statements made on the occasion of the conf by certain Arab leaders. Statements which go so far as to proclaim that the Arab States refuse 'to the end of time' to make peace with Israel indicate a disposition as incompatible with the spirit of the UN as with that of the conciliation Comm's mission. In fact, these statements proving in advance the failure of the Comm's effort. The Arab Govts accepted the invitation, but their acceptance can be nothing more than a pure formality, devoid of any reality, unless the attitude of extreme hostility again so recently manifested is replaced by the expression of a sincere desire to live in peace with their Israel neighbors.

"My del thought it necessary to make these few gen remarks before referring to the text of the statement marking the official opening of the conf. The text of that exposition of the Comm's intentions was communicated to the Israel Govt in order that they might transmit to us their instructions as to a reply. The nature and importance of the text are such that my del will be unable to give the Comm the elements of a reply until it has recd its instructions. I can assure the Comm that the question is being studied with all the despatch appropriate to the importance of the subj.

"In the meantime, my del has recd instructions to answer the common, one specific and essential point, which it emphasizes as being the first requisite for any positive advance towards a peaceful solution of the problems before us.

"It is in the desire to live peaceably together, as good neighbors, with the Arab people, that my govt has sent us as its reps to this conf. It is therefore without any reserve that, at the beginning of the conf, my govt expresses its determination—and I quote the text of Mr. Palmer's statement—to respect each other's right to security and freedom from attack, to refrain from warlike or hostile acts against one another, and to promote the return of permanent peace in Palestine.

"As to the proposals, I wish to recall the chairman's statement to the effect that the Comm offered to submit proposals to the parties.

"This offer was communicated to my govt which has not as yet had time to take a stand on this matter. Therefore, I cannot on my own auth take the initiative of agreeing to receive the Comm's proposals.

"It was stated at the first mtg that the proposals wld not be tabled before the parties had had an opportunity of answering the chairman's opening statement.

"I wild like to recall that before this present mtg I had expressed the hope that the Comm wild find a way of not handing in its proposals before my govt had had an opportunity to answer the opening statement. Also, I believe that it wild have been more equitable not to give these proposals to one party when the other party had indicated that it was not ready to receive the same proposals. The reason why I am not in a position to receive the Comm's proposals at the present time is that a question of a principle is involved. Also, I want to repeat that the Comm had clearly stated that the proposals wild be tabled only after the parties had answered the chairman's statement. It is not for me to answer the question of whether the proposals shid have been tabled before the govts had decided on their answer, but under the present circumstances I must await a decision of my govt before being able to receive the Comm's proposals."

In view Fischer's statement, I stated Comm regretted Israel Rep was not in position receive proposals but that we hope he wld soon be in position to do so. Comm wld await further word from him.

If Israel continues object to principle of PCC's putting forward suggested solutions, USDel sees little hope for success present mtgs. Very raising of issue is bound have adverse effect upon Comm's position with Arab Dels which in our opinion is better at this point than at any time in past 2 and 1/2 years. Comm is, however, proceeding with plans for further mtgs with Arab Dels when nonaggression declaration will be presented as first order of business. Outcome these discussions unlikely be encouraging to further work if meanwhile it is known PCC is in jurisdictional impasse with Israel, implying Israel's unwillingness consider concessions.

my Brit, Fr and Turk colleagues expressed interest in outcome present PCC mtg in Paris, hoped progress cld be made toward area peace but saw little prospect of success. Adverse factors: Generally negative and irreconcilable attitude of Arabs on the one hand, and unconstructive, guarded, legalistic approach of Israel on the other.

As to Israel, it will be recalled FonMin had been apprehensive from outset over PCC mediatory role and undertook in his letter of acceptance to reserve Israel position re prospective PCC proposals. Prelim statement apparently confirmed suspicions, going beyond limits Israel hoped wld obtain, and running counter to this country's determination establish (1) that she will not accept any substantial number of refugees for repatriation, nor (2) consider territorial concessions, particularly those that might affect water sources.

Emb comment: Since primary need of region is peace between Arab States and Israel, Emb believes supreme effort shld be made at present PCC mtg to bring about gen settlement; but feels that without all-out backing by UK as well as govts represented on PCC and unless alternative to gen settlement is made distinctly unattractive to countries concerned, chances of success at present mtg more remote. Failing success present effort make progress toward peace, Emb believes there shid be well-planned coordinated effort to alter basic attitude of both Arabs and Israelis through direct appeal to populations by every available means. For psychological approach to be effective however, much wld depend upon Israel Govt since it wld play leading part. Given this country's able leadership and highly literate population, it shid be expected to show more statesmanlike and less pettifogging approach to problems vis-à-vis Arabs. Genuine, sustained and determined effort to lessen distrust and build confidence wld certainly increase Israel's stature in world opinion and have calming effect in ME. An impeding factor at present is Israel's self-righteousness and concentration on self-justification which obstructs any real understanding of Arab feelings and how they might be changed. Israel considers itself the injured party and finds it difficult understand, therefore, why it shid be expected placate Arabs. There is accordingly little interest manifested in making real effort to inspire in Arab peoples desire for peace, security and obvious advantages of return to normal relations.

It is believed further that policy of friendly helpfulness and impartiality on part of West Powers is good as far as it goes but unless supplemented by effective psychological approach it will not go very far; and that in absence of fundamental change in attitude of Arabs and Israelis toward each other, whether as result of present PCC mtg or otherwise, it wld be most unwise to build up armaments in this area.

145. Depintel Sept 12, 1 a. m.¹ Agreements reached by Riley with Israelis appear represent significant advance over situation described fourth interim report.² Syrians will, however, retain sense of injury and resentment toward UK and Western powers over Huleh unless complete compliance by Israelis is secured. In this connection we are puzzled by apparent absence any provisions for returning remainder of Arabs from Shaab or elsewhere in Israel to zone. Although Riley visited Damascus we have not seen him. Beirut can perhaps clarify last point.

Even 100 percent compliance will of course only bring basic problem to critical stage since ways and means expropriating Arab land will then be in order. We would recommend urging Syria and Israel call for revision armistice under Article VIII with object division of zone and suitable guarantees (International Commission) for water rights (Legdesp 32, July 20), but only if Israel attitude whole zone problem could be improved. Developments Paris not conducive optimism this respect (Paris 1698 to Dept Sept 18). To advise Syria request conference under Article VIII carries applied guarantee we will use our influence with Israel to assure bona fide negots on quid pro quo for Syria's acquiescence in drainage project. Only quid so far suggested remains division of zone. On other hand, to stand aside and let problem drift back to SC seems likely produce situation very similar recent Suez affair with further impairment US and general Western position in Arab world only certain consequence.

Subject: Preliminary Discussion of UNRWA's (PRA's) Three-Year Reintegration Program with Lebanese Minister of Foreign Affairs

On September 12, 1951, the Honorable John B. Blandford, Director of UNRWA (PRA), met with H. E. Mr. Charles Helou, Lebanese Minister of Foreign Affairs. A memorandum of that conversation, prepared by Mr. Blandford, is enclosed.<sup>2</sup>

During the conversation Mr. Blandford handed to Mr. Helou a copy of the outline of the Agency's proposal for a three-year reintegration program, which is attached as Enclosure No. 2.<sup>2</sup> This proposal, which has received the approbation of the Advisory Commission, will be discussed by the Director with the Near East Governments during his present second round of visits.

The salient points of Mr. Helou's remarks were:

1. Although Lebanon can undertake nothing more than symbolic reintegration on her own overcrowded territory, she is prepared to render strong political support to PRA. If necessary and desirable, Lebanon will take the initiative in obtaining Arab League approval for the program.

2. Mr. Helou suggested that in conversations with Arab Governments, particularly Syria, PRA should stress the financial side of its program, particularly the immediate large local expenditures which would result.

The role of the PCC in these negotiations was also discussed.

PARIS, September 21, 1951—8 p. m. 1800. Palun 448. PCC met this afternoon with Israel del. Fischer made following statement:

"I wish again to thank the Comm, in the name of my del, for its welcome to us. It has always been the earnest desire of my govt to see permanent peace established between Israel and her Arab neighbours for the sake not only of the ME but of the World as a whole. My govt is convinced that peace and ME ability in the ME is a vital necessity for the peace of the World. The Israel del has come to this conf for the purpose of negotiating a final peace settlement with the Arab States.

"We have already had an opportunity of making known to the Comm the view held strongly and consistently by the Govt of Israel, that only by direct negotiations between Israel and her neighbours can there be any real hope of achieving peace. This, indeed, is the conclusion which the Comm itself reached last year and which it duly reported to the GA. If the Arabs had any genuine desire for the settlement of the problems outstanding between us, they wld agree to talk these problems over and work out mutually acceptable procedures. They cannot in reason claim to want a settlement, and at the same time refuse to discuss it with the other party concerned. If direct and frank talk is made impossible by the Arab dels continue refusal to meet us and talk things over, I fear our presence here will be of no great profit.

"As a first step towards the achievement of peace my del, as already indicated, is willing to subscribe to a declaration such as that indicated by the Comm, concerning each country's right of security and freedom from attack, and binding each to refrain from warlike or hostile acts against another and promote the return of permanent peace. We agree entirely with the Comm, if I may use your words, that no constructive progress towards a solution of our problems is possible unless all the parties, at the outset of these discussions here, explicitly accept these obligations. We are prepared here and now to extend to each and every one of the Arab States the offer of a pact of non-aggression. We shld see in acceptance of this offer a real token of the Arab States willingness to work towards the essential goal of this conference—the restoration of peace in the ME.

"The plight of the Arab refugees was the direct result of the hostilities launched by the Arabs themselves against Israel to crush her out of existence at best, and the real claim of the refugees lies against the Arab Govts which sent their armies to invade Israel in cynical violation of their international obligations. I am, however, authorized to state that the Israel Govt is willing to make a contribution to the resettlement of the refugees, but it must naturally insist that such an arrangement be mutual. As the Comm well knows, Israel has taken in some 200,000 Jewish refugees from the Arab States in the past 2 or 3 years, a large number of whom were deprived of their property and assets by the Arab Govts concerned. My del is willing to embark upon a discussion of this question with the Arab States with a view to finding a constructive overall solution to the problem of the refugees.

"We are also willing to take up the question of blocked accounts, though here too it is understood that any discussion of the matter will include the blocked accounts in Iraq of the Jews who have left that country and found admission to Israel.

"The whole emphasis of our efforts rests on the achievement of peace. We suggest that three preliminary steps may well lead us all to this objective. First of all, acceptance by all the parties of a non-aggression agreement along the lines suggested. Secondly, direct negotiations between Israel and the Arab States, in conformity with the conclusion which the Comm itself reached last autumn. Thirdly, before any proposals are considered, an agreement on what are the outstanding problems which shld constitute the agenda of this conference, for it is impossible to envisage that a conference can succeed if the parties have not even agreed, or been given the opportunity to agree, on what are to be the subjects of discussion and on the procedures to be followed.

"If the Arab dels refuse to commit themselves to a policy of peace, if they are unable to say that it is peace they have come here to seek, then, Sir, if we are to be completely frank and realistic, I feel bound to say that this attitude of the Arabs condemns our efforts to failure in advance. If, on the other hand, they are as anxious as we are to pave the road towards peace, they wild find our del happy to meet them in a common effort to achieve this high aim, and I feel certain that success wld not elude our grasp."

After hearing above statement, and thanking Israel del for continued cooperation, I said that Comm assumed Israel del was now ready receive PCC proposals in accordance with procedure already announced that proposals wld be submitted after dels had had opportunity to reply to Chairman's opening statement. Fischer replied that Israel Govt had doubts as to advisibility of procedure which had been outlined in the opening statement, but that inasmuch as Chairman had indicated Comm felt now was appropriate time deliver proposals, he was prepared "receive them for transmittal to his govt." Proposals were therefore delivered to Fischer and following communiqué has been issued with Israel del concurrence: "A meeting between the CCP and the Israel del took place on Friday, 21 September. In the course of the meeting the Israel del reiterated its readiness to cooperate with the Comm.

"After the del of Israel had replied to the statement made by the Chairman of the conciliation Comm at the opening of the conference, the text of the Comm's proposals, which had been given to the Arab dels on Monday, 17 September, was handed to the del of Israel.

"These proposals will be published after all interested govts have had an opportunity to study them."

having first reached understanding with parties re agenda in this form and procedure.

- 2. Shortly before Israel del submitted September 21 Israel Govt response <sup>2</sup> to PCC opening statement Shiloah personally expressed to me hope that if response was disappointing or seemed somewhat unpleasant US Del wld not take it too seriously. I felt then he wished avoid appearance Israel responsibility for possible breakdown PCC discussions here and I had same feeling in last minute talk he sought Sept 22. In course of talk I told him US Del naturally disappointed Israel govt response had not evidenced better understanding present PCC effort and doubly disappointed in that some phrasing and particularly refs to Arab states had made next steps more difficult for PCC. I suggested it wld have been helpful to PCC and in Israel's interest if recent Arab pronouncements unfriendly to Israel had been ignored at this time by Israel Govt.
- 3. Shiloah said Israel Govt's general concern re new PCC effort strongly expressed last week's cabinet mtg which he attended. He explained concern as due to: (a) Feeling that proposals as submitted indicate a position taken by PCC and preclude bargaining between parties Israel Govt considers essential for settlement "outstanding differences" whether through direct negots or with PCC mediation or under other UN auspices; (b) conviction Arabs regard proposals as involving commitment by PCC and therefore establishing minimum concessions which they may expect from Israel; (c) doubt Arabs disposed sign non-aggression accord preliminary to consideration of proposals without knowing details of proposals and prospects for obtaining such minimum concessions at least; (d) certain misgivings as to possible unanticipated significance of present PCC effort, whether this conf with its new PCC procedure and program as submitted to parties might involve policy questions in NE which Israel Govt wld not recognize as within PCC competence but might better discuss with US govt and other interested govts.
- 4. In further ref to form of proposals and importance of bargaining possibilities Shiloah mentioned as examples questions of war damages and port facilities at Haifa. He emphasized that while Israel had large claims for war damages there cld be no Egyptian, Syrian or Lebanese claims against Israel for war damages and therefore no basis for mutual cancellation. Re question of port facilities at Haifa, he referred to his participation in Jordan-Israel negots concerning this and other questions and implied Israel might be disposed take up this question again on bargaining basis.
- 5. Shiloah expressed particular immed concern over possibility that PCC proposals handed to Arab dels Sept 17 and to Israel del Sept 21 might be released for publication at early date.

He said he feared that impact on public opinion both in Israel and in Arab States wild seriously prejudice chances of Israel Govt effectively participating in "conf" program as proposed by PCC.

- 6. I assured Shiloah no concealed Pol objective in present PCC effort; new approach natural outcome unsuccessful experience previous years; no "take it or leave it" intentions; in preparing program and proposals PCC endeavored provide for, hopes maintain, atmosphere conducive to "give and take" solutions. Am sure Shiloah does not doubt sincerity of my assurance. He went out of his way to avoid appearance Israel not interested in "give and take" solutions. But in Wash he or Eban will undoubtedly emphasize Israel govt doubts re purpose and usefulness present PCC effort and advisability and effectiveness program of proposals. US Del believes Dept and Amb Davis can be of great help now in encouraging Israel Govt participation in discussions here on basis PCC program as submitted to parties; also highly desirable that at same time Arab Govts be encouraged by US and other interested govts to subscribe to non-aggression accord, urging of which solely by PCC might prove embarrassing if not actually regrettable shld Arab states in view of outspoken Israel Govt insistence on a non-aggression accord as condition precedent, consider PCC emphasis on importance of such accord as primarily in interest of Israel.
- 7. PCC secretariat officers report growing conviction among Arab dels Comm is simply acceding to Israel demands. Press report contained NY Times Sept 21 dated Tel Aviv Sept 20 contains substance Israel Govt reply to be delivered to Comm fol day. Art V discusses Israel position regarding various items of PCC's proposals, whereas Israel rep requested Comm on 21st defer publication its proposals. Incidents of this nature increase PCC difficulties with Arab dels and tend provoke statements like that of Shukairy to Assoc Press in Paris Tribune today to effect Arabs wld not sign pact proposed by Israel. PCC is today therefore issuing to press text of proposals with fol press release: "On 17 Sept the PCC submitted to the dels of Egypt, Jordan, Lebanon and Syria proposals for solutions to the problems outstanding between Israel and the Arab states, as foreseen in its invitations to the parties on 10 Aug. These proposals were recd by the del of Israel on 21 Sept. At that time the Comm announced that it wld make public these proposals after all interested govts had had an opportunity to study them.

"In view of statements already having appeared in the press in various countries concerning certain parts of the Comm's proposals, including the preamble, the Comm feels it is now desirable to make public the full text of its proposals. The Comm emphasized that the above-mentioned preamble was submitted to the parties as part of an integrated comprehensive pattern of proposals. At its next mtg with the parties, the Comm will be ready to discuss this comprehensive pattern of proposals."

US Del feels this action necessary for retention initiative by PCC and continuing emphasis on essential equilibrium its proposals.

1901. Palun 451. At present stage PCC is concentrating efforts in both formal and informal meetings on persuading parties (a) to accept preamble and (b) to agree discuss remaining five points of PCC proposals. Prior to meeting with Arab dels 25th Barco and Azcarate had informal discussions with each Arab del urging them accept preamble as best means going forward with negotiations. Abdel Monem, Egyptian rep, seemed most receptive idea that Arab position wld be enhanced by prompt acceptance preamble, but stated he cld not accept on his own responsibility. He did have authority state in open meeting Egyptian Govt had no aggressive intentions whatever and wld settle any differences with other party strictly in accordance with armistice agreement. He indicated that after having made such a statement, if Comm wished to conclude that this amounted to acceptance of preamble, he might be agreeable Comm's issuing communiqué to effect PCC received statements of Arab States peaceful intentions which PCC considered an acceptance of principles of preamble.

At subsequent meeting with Arab dels I asked on behalf of PCC that Arab dels accept preamble in order to make it possible proceed to seek comprehensive solution to Palestine problem along lines set forth in PCC's pattern of proposals. In course of Abdel Monem's reply he stated Egypt wild respect armistice agreements as long as other party did same but that if Comm wished have a further affirmation of Egypt's pacific intentions, he was prepared give it.

Fawzi Mulki, Jordan rep, stated Arab dels had reaffirmed their pacific intentions in joint reply to chairman's opening statement. Jordan had always respected provisions of armistice agreement and continued consider them as binding. Any further declaration by Arab Govts wild only be repetition of what had already been said.

Shukairy, Syrian rep, stated it was too early either accept or reject preamble, which he said shld be regarded as conclusion or result of agreement. When agreement had been reached on substantive matters preamble cld serve as instrument for expressing intentions of the parties. He felt Arab Govts cld make no more satisfactory declaration than that contained in armistice agreements.

Fol these statements meeting was recessed while Secretariat submitted to Arab dels proposed communiqué stating Arab dels had made statements reaffirming their peaceful intentions, and had accepted principles of preamble. Arab dels however cld not agree to issuance of such communiqué. Alternative drafts were submitted but with same negative results. Meeting was therefore adjourned.

In considering present position, PCC has decided it must continue urge acceptance preamble by both sides and agreement by both sides consider PCC's five proposals. We feel minimum satisfactory reply to Israel's demand for non-aggression pact is acceptance by Arab States of statement already proposed by Comm in form of preamble. Likewise PCC feels Israel shld accept declaration in form proposed by PCC without making issue of something PCC itself had not asked Arab States to accept. Present plan is have next meeting with Israel del when PCC will request Israel accept preamble and agree discussion its further proposals. Acceptance by either side at this stage will undoubtedly give PCC stronger arguments for acceptance by other. Encouragement to both sides by Dept and US Missions wild be invaluable.

288. Avner, acting chief Amer division FonOff informed Emb officer last evening Paris conf now appears be one merely of polit maneuvering. Both sides expect it to fail and only question is which will be blamed by West powers for failure. If on other hand there shld be any real chance for genuine settlement, Israel wld be ready make real concessions including perhaps repatriation small number refugees (smaller however than "political" figure of 100,000 previously used).

When asked what single thing Arabs cld do to evoke reciprocal response from Israeli, Avner replied "all that the Arabs wld have to do wld be to come directly to us, say they realize Israel is now a fact, that they are limited by slowness of Arab public opinion in accepting that fact and will as consequence have to go slowly, but it is their genuine desire to talk realistically with view to reaching agreement".

Damascus, September 29, 1951—8 p. m.

157. In two-hour conversation with FonMin Sept 22 Atasi expressed to me desire to cooperate with US, saying only Israel question stood in way. He spoke earnestly of Syrian Govt and people's overriding fear of Israel, emphasizing steady inflow immigration and US funds. I replied along usual lines urging reliance on tripartite declaration, Israel pacific intentions and UN guarantees against aggression.

He asked me call again today appearing greatly distressed re PCC proposals in Paris. He said reports from Paris and Syrian diplomatic reps elsewhere indicate US is trying "force" Arabs make peace settlement with Israel. Re-emphasizing Syria has no aggressive intentions, he said PCC proposals seem directed toward enlisting Arab cooperation to provide Israel with means of economic support (Legtel 138, Sept 16).<sup>2</sup> He declared this was too much to ask of Arabs who had sovereign right take measures they regard essential their own safety.

He said some Arab leaders had recommended against accepting PCC invitation but he and others had prevailed on Arab League accept in order show Arabs continued hope for redress by UN of past grievances. He deplored Chairman's opening statement which he said implied Arabs had to make concessions Israel in order gain even its partial compliance with past resolutions. These were not proper subjects for negotiation but for enforcement by UN. In fact all that needs be done is for UN, and particularly US, require Israel comply with past GA and SC resolutions and objectives PCC will be realized.

He placed blame for noncompliance on US tolerance Israel illegal actions and continued US economic support. He and every other Arab are convinced all US has to do is to threaten cut off its aid and Israel will comply. He cited as example US attitude reports he had received that French had proposed division Syria–Israel demilitarized zone along waterline and UK concurred but US reaction was "negative" one to refer question to PCC, implying US support Israel's refusal this proposal. He urged change in US policy toward Israel bring about compliance UN resolutions, citing them one by one.

Not printed; it stated that the Legation in Syria had grave misgivings as to the inclusion of paragraph 5(g) in the PCC proposals (see Palun 440, September 12, p. 856). In the Legation's opinion, open reference to economic cooperation and the resumption of trade relations was premature in the present atmosphere and unnecessary in that if the other proposals were accepted, trade might follow. If the paragraph were included, the Legation feared it would be seized upon by all its opponents as a "trick clause" favoring Israel and represented as the real reason for which the Arabs were invited to Paris. (357.AC/9-1651)

I countered each point stressing urgent need for Arab delegations Paris abandon negative attitude and show constructive approach. I said whole world believed it wld be to best common interest for Arabs make peace with Israel but denied any attempt being made "force" general peace settlement on them. Surely each and every PCC proposal merited close consideration by Arabs and Israel and any progress achieved wld be a forward step. I suggested the acting Syrian delegate (Min Adnan Atasi is still vacationing in Syria) consult with Amb Palmer in order clear up misapprehension under which Syrians seem to be laboring.

Atasi said he will probably depart Sept 29 for Arab League mtg Alexandria and I obtained his assurance he wld try work against wholesale rejection PCC approach or withdrawal from Paris conference. I am convinced he has sincere desire improve relations with US but it is obvious he is very worried about Syrian popular and parliamentary reaction to PCC proposals. He declared there is basic conflict in US policy which tries enlist Arab cooperation in defense against USSR while ignoring threat Arabs see in an aggressive Israel harboring designs on controlling a domain "from the Nile to the Euphrates". For US to consider Israel as a partner with area countries in defense of Middle East is "like trying mix fire and water". He strongly emphasized Syria is part of free world and has nothing in common with USSR which it abhors. However, only by removing Arab fears of Israel through effective measures can US enlist support Arab Govts and peoples.

Believe Syrians shld bear these considerations in mind if they decide call for armistice conf. Re mechanics calling such conf, see third para Deptel 91 Aug 25, rptd Tel Aviv 167, Beirut 194.3

FYI, fol represents Dept's tentative speculation re possible seeds of solution this problem:

1. Believes settlement this question between Syria and Israel cld best be facilitated through long estab MAC mach thus preventing spotlight of internatl and particularly Arab League publicity from interfering with negots.

2. Wld prefer see elimination demil zone which because of indeterminate status represents potential source future difficulties between Syria and Israel.

3. We do not believe settlement on Jordan water line practicable in light situation estab by Armistice Agreement under art V and Bunche explanatory note, but we have never discussed this with Fr.

4. Believe Syrians wld do well consider accepting small terr concession in demil zone with neces guarantees re water rights (probably incl UN supervision) in return for elimination of Zone and problems represented thereby.

5. Israel might agree to Syrian annexation El Hamma and possibly northern bit of terr of demil zone if by such agreement it cld estab rights of full sovereignty over remainder of zone.

6. If any evidence that Syrians might be responsive to settlement on these lines, Dept might consider informally exploring further Israel attitude on this question.

Israel proposal dated 28 Sept (annex A below)<sup>3</sup> for formal peace pact. On 28th I had requested Fischer call on me and read to him paraphrase of Unpal 292 as friendly expression US view. Fischer stated he wld immed inform his govt of these views but made no ref to Israel's proposal. In subsequent informal meetings with Israel reps, US del and secretariat officers informed Israel del we did not believe formal pact as proposed by Israel was feasible at this time and continued urge desirability agreement upon declaration conforming to Comm's own preamble.

Meanwhile no formal meeting between Comm and Israel del has been held pending outcome further talks with Arab dels. These talks have shown that Arab dels are not willing subscribe to any declaration which in their opinion goes beyond undertakings of respective armistice agreements. It is apparent that dels of Jordan, Lebanon and Syria have adapted their attitude to that of Egypt, and that Egyptian rep is adamant in declining go beyond reaffirmation undertakings of Egyptian armistice agreement. Specifically he will not agree to include any ref to (a) settlement of all differences present or future solely by resort to pacific procedures or (b) refraining from acts of hostility. His position is obviously governed by Egyptian attitude toward Suez question.

As indicated Palun 451, PCC has continued feel minimum satisfactory reply to Israel's proposal for nonaggression pact is acceptance by Arab states of declaration in form and substance as submitted by Comm to parties and that similarly Israel shld accept declaration in form proposed by PCC without making issue of something PCC itself had not asked Arab states to accept. After thorough exploration with Arab dels of possibilities for agreement on declaration conforming in substance to PCC preamble it now seems clear PCC will risk complete breakdown of present conf unless it can find way accept from Arabs something less than substance proposed preamble. We are aware of course that this will not satisfy Israel's demands, but believe best procedure is to turn now to consideration PCC's five proposals by indicating PCC itself is satisfied parties statements have brought about conditions which PCC had regarded as desirable for creation atmosphere conducive to negots. While it of course favors formal nonaggression pacts in form proposed, it wld accept as reasonably satisfactory substitutes either: (1) Separate declarations using formula based on UN Charter and armistice agreement which wld make clear latter are not superseded but extended, or (2) Agreement by govts concerned on joint declaration to same effect. He stated however his govt cld not agree to further alternative that commission itself declare itself as satisfied all parties accept principles in question, since he feels there is no substitute for their expression in some form, and considers last alternative makes "pettifogging distinction".

He said while Israel of course believes direct negots are preferable if not indispensable and still hopes they will yet be possible, here again he gave assurance that his govt wld not be so insistent on direct negotiations as to close doors to progress by any other means. He stated further his govt wld also be realistic about its desire to reach final comprehensive agreements, saying Israelis want peace with neighbors but realize Arab commitments may make gen settlement impossible at present, and will accordingly content themselves with something less for present. A. Assembly Delegation during the period when the Palestine items are under consideration. We have no information as yet as to the time when the Palestine items may come up on the agenda. We assume that it probably would not be in the early stages of the session. We will advise you as soon as we have information as to the time when you may be needed.

In writing you this personal word now I should like to outline the developing views in the Department on the present activities and future role of the Conciliation Commission. We have been giving these matters very careful consideration. For the present, we believe that the conference is progressing as well as could be expected, if not better than we had reason to hope for. We detect, as you have, a healthy sign of moderation in the Arab statements thus far, appreciating, of course, that their statements, as usual, are more extreme than they need to be. As to the Israeli position, you have received our views regarding our concern over their attitude thus far and our hope that they may be inclined to appreciate the "unorthodox" way on negotiation which you and many of us have advocated to Israeli officials for a long time past. While we share your concern over the possibility of a press headline battle leading to a premature hardening of the positions of the Arab States and Israel, we believe that the conference is offering an excellent opportunity for the opposing views to be aired sufficiently to permit the parties themselves, the Commission, and the other Members of the United Nations fully to appreciate the differences and the potential areas of agreement, and to understand our view that the tissue-knitting progress between the parties, however slow, is the most productive toward a final peace settlement in the area.

Whether or not the parties agree upon a non-aggression declaration, or reach agreement on any of the other items, we see the conference as a necessary step towards the Commission's preparing for the next General Assembly a full and frank report of its efforts to carry out its mandates. Should the conference be unproductive, it would be of even greater importance that the Commission's report detail the reasons for the conference's failure, and that the report be as frank as necessary in declaring exactly what are the difficulties which have confronted the Commission from its very establishment and which have prevented the parties from seeking or reaching any agreement of a substantial nature. Should the conference be unproductive you and your colleagues should not be afraid to say so, and you on the spot can best determine when impasse or failure has developed. Should such a situation develop it would seem wise to terminate the conference quickly, after which the Commission should expeditiously set about its task of writing a report for submission to the General Assembly.

If on the other hand, as we have reason yet to hope, the conference takes a few steps forward, however slight, it will be in greatest measure attributable to you.

We will, of course, be in continual communication with you whichever course the conference may take, but I would like to reiterate that we stand ready to render such guidance and assistance as we can. We do feel, however, that the Department should not intervene here with the parties on behalf of the Commission, since it is our desire that such negotiations as they may be take place between the parties through the Commission in Paris and not here in Washington.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN D. HICKERSON

THE PALESTINE QUESTION

THE PROBLEM

To determine the position of the United States on the various aspects of the Palestine question which will be considered at the Sixth General Assembly, i.e., the report of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA) and the report of the Palestine Conciliation Commission (PCC).

RECOMMENDATIONS

A. With regard to the report of the PCC:

1. The United States should initiate or support General Assembly action leading to the abolition of the PCC if the Commission's report so recommends, or if the present conference at Paris indicates little or no chance of success.

2. The United States should initiate or support GA action commending the PCC and the parties at the Paris conference for their progress, if the PCC so reports, and urge the parties to continue (or renew) their efforts under the aegis of the PCC in order to achieve a settlement of the Palestine problem.

¹Prepared as a position paper for the U.S. Delegation at the Sixth Regular Session of the United Nations General Assembly. The Report of the Palestine Conciliation Commission (U.N. Doc. A/1985) was considered by the Assembly at the 33d to 41st meetings of the Ad Hoc Political Committee between January 7 and 15, 1952. The question of assistance to Palestine refugees was considered by the Ad Hoc Political Committee at its 42d to 47th meetings from January 16 to 22. The Report of the Committee (U.N. Doc. A/2070) was considered by the General Assembly at its 364th and 365th plenary meetings on January 26, 1952.

3. The United States should urge, if mutually agreeable to the PCC and the Director and Advisory Commission of UNRWA, that the General Assembly assign to UNRWA all aspects of the refugee problem including the reintegration program, renewing arrangements for the settlement of compensation claims, the protection of refugee rights, and the authority bestowed on the PCC under General Assembly resolution 194 (III) of 11 December 1948, relating to the facilitation of the economic development of the area.

4. In the event the abolition of the PCC is agreed upon, the United States should urge that the General Assembly:

(a) Assign the functions of the PCC relating to the final settlement of all questions outstanding between the Arab States on the one hand and Israel on the other to the Chief of Staff of the Truce Supervision Organization who for the purpose of carrying out such assignment would be designated UN Agent General for Palestine;

(b) Make him answerable to the Security Council for the purpose of reporting to that body and receiving such directives from it as it might give;

(c) Recommend to the Security Council that it continue to watch closely the Palestine question;

(d) Request the Security Council to submit a special report on the activities of the Agent General for Palestine.

- B. With regard to questions relating to the report of UNRWA, it is recommended that the United States Delegation:
- 1. Support the recommendations of UNRWA for relief and reintegration programs along the lines set forth in Section B of the attached draft resolution;

2. Indicate that the United States is prepared to pledge, subject to Congressional approval, up to $------ million.

C. With regard to General Assembly action on both reports, the United States Delegation should urge that the items be considered together in one of the Political Committees and that they be dealt with in a single consolidated resolution, co-sponsored, if possible, by the Member States represented on the PCC and the Advisory Committee of UNRWA (France, Turkey, and the UK).

DISCUSSION

A. The PCC Report:

1. The report of the PCC will probably be the source of controversy. While the exact nature of the report cannot as yet be indicated it would seem wise to assume that the PCC in its report will indicate failure in its efforts to reach some degree of settlement of the issues outstanding between the Arab States and Israel. In so indicating, it will quite possibly point out: (a) that its very terms of reference made negotiating virtually impossible since the Arab States have refused to sit down at the same table for the purpose of negotiating with the Israelis; (b) that the Israelis for their part have indicated a basic hostility to the mediating initiative of the Commission; (c) that for negotiating reasons the Arab States continue to use the settlement of the refugee question, particularly the issue of repatriation, as a pretext for their failure to reach a political settlement with Israel, while Israel for its part has little if any intention of repatriating any Arab refugees, although Israel might pay substantial compensation for the property of refugees who are not repatriated; (d) that even with the matter of refugees out of the way there is no present likelihood that the Arab States collectively wish to reach an ultimate peace settlement with Israel, and Israel, for its part, evidences no basic willingness to compromise in the interests of a possible peace settlement with any single one of its neighbors. The report would summarize the situation as it exists today as being one which can only be resolved through indication by the Arab States and Israel of good faith and of a willingness to make concessions and to face existing realities, such as the following:

a. Repatriation of Arab refugees to Israel is a dead issue.

b. Substantial territorial readjustments are entirely unlikely.

- c. Israel must give concrete indications to the neighboring Arab States of its willingness to pay substantial compensation to Arab refugees and make such substantial political and economic concessions as will indicate to the Arab States that Israel truly desires to live at peace with them and will not remain a threat to their individual and collective security. The report might conclude that the PCC feels that it is no longer qualified both by the terms of its reference and by its own prestige to continue to act as the United Nations body for carrying out these obligations. Whether or not, however, the PCC did recommend its own dissolution, the General Assembly would be confronted with a record of failure about which its Members would undoubtedly feel impelled to consider remedial steps.
- 2. Faced with a report of this kind, the Members of the General Assembly may be willing to accede to the suggestion that the PCC be dissolved but they will desire that some instrumentality should exist for carrying on the United Nation's obligation to achieve a settlement of the Palestine problem.
- 3. If the General Assembly abolishes the PCC it must decide what is to be done with the assigned functions of the commission. These functions are: (a) working out arrangements relating to repatriation or resettlement and compensation of Arab refugees; (b) negotiation of all political problems remaining in the way of a final peace settlement of the area.

It would seem feasible that with regard to (a) these functions of the PCC could be transferred to the UNRWA. The refugee office of the PCC, together with records and personnel required by the UNRWA, could be transferred to the UNRWA on the assumption that the budgetary allotment for this office could be made available to the UNRWA. Such a transfer would have the following advantages:

a. It would be the most effective step possible to remove the problem of refugees from future political negotiations and it would treat the problem in the context of an economic and social problem involving legal and economic rights of individuals;

b. It would remove the current confusion now apparent in the Palestine area over two United Nations agencies associated with the

c. Handling refugee reintegration and compensation might be more efficient and at the same time this administrative arrangement might enable the agency to use the negotiation and payment of compensation as a means of assisting reintegration. The functions relating to the protection of Arab refugees rights and property could also be transferred to UNRWA. There are no fundamental or budgetary problems connected with this transfer.

In view of the present inability to foretell the extent of the PCC's success or failure at its Paris conference; the administrative and political problems entailed in a transfer of these functions from PCC to UNRWA; and the fact that both the PCC and the UNRWA Director, Mr. Blandford, are expected to be in Paris for part of the General Assembly session it would seem logical for the Commission Members and Mr. Blandford to consult together and agree upon the nature and extent of the transfer of functions which ought to be made. For the reasons cited we would favor such transfer as might be agreeable to the PCC and the Director and Advisory Committee of UNRWA.

- 4. As for the remaining functions, i.e., those relating to the political negotiation of a final peace settlement for the area, it is believed that the General Assembly could assign these functions to an Agent General for Palestine. We believe that this position should be held by the present Chief of Staff of the UN Truce Supervision Organization, Lt. General William E. Riley. In our opinion the consolidation of functions would reduce the apparent proliferation of UN efforts in the Palestine area. General Riley's prestige, experience, and negotiating ability make him ideally suited for this function.
- 5. The terms of reference of the Agent General for Palestine would be indicated for him by the General Assembly resolution establishing the position. The General Assembly could also make him directly answerable to the Security Council for the purpose of reporting to that body and receiving directives from it. By making the Agent General for Palestine answerable to the Security Council, the General Assembly would be assuring itself that the parties would be under much greater continual political obligation to settle their difficulties than is the case today where the PCC, as an agency of the General Assembly, finds itself able to report to its parent body only on an annual basis.

It has been our experience that the Palestine question is one of the very few cases in which the Security Council has been able to function continually through a majority vote without Soviet objection. It is suggested that the Council should continue to demonstrate and exercise its authority through this procedure of answerability. Another attraction to this set-up is that changed circumstances during the course of the negotiations possibly leading to a settlement can produce situations where the Council could promptly clarify and expand the functions as the situation dictated. Under present conditions the PCC has had to labor under the difficulties of receiving instructions and terms of reference only annually, at best.

6. It is, of course, possible that the PCC may be able to submit a report, as a result of the present conference in Paris, which would indicate some degree of progress toward the final settlement of the Palestine problem. If this were the case there would be little likelihood that the Commission could or would be replaced by a new method of negotiation and settlement such as the suggested Agent General for Palestine. Accordingly the Delegation should be prepared to indicate its initiative or support for a resolution urging the Commission and the parties to continue or renew their efforts to reach a final settlement of the Palestine problem. (An alternative draft covering this possibility is included in Part A of the attached draft resolution.) Such resolution, however, could well contain the provisions set forth in paragraph 3 above concerning the PCC's present functions relating to refugees.

B. Report of UNRWA.

- 7. The report and recommendations of UNRWA have not yet been submitted. It may be anticipated, however, that the report will recommend a three-year reintegration and relief program in amounts approximating those set forth in the attached resolution.
- 8. During the spring and summer months the Director and Advisory Commission have taken advantage of the somewhat more cooperative attitude displayed by the Arab Governments with regard to the reintegration program which was authorized by the General Assembly in resolution 393(V) of December 2, 1950. In these conversations the Arab Governments have indicated that they would be prepared to proceed with reintegration projects provided that the refugees did not surrender their right to repatriation or their rights to compensation. They further indicated that in proceeding to cooperate in the program they must be assured by the major contributors that the latter were prepared to see the program through. During the past two months Mr. Blandford, who succeeded General Kennedy as Director, has been pressing ahead with discussions with the Arab Governments, and has virtually completed negotiations with the Jordan and Egyptian Governments for projects in those countries which will provide homes and continuing employment for a substantial number of refugees. The internal political situation in Syria has prevented conclusive negotiations on projects, but the Syrian Government, nevertheless, is inclining a receptive ear to several alternative types of programs. The Government of Iraq, which until recently has not been at all disposed to talk about reintegration of refugees other than those it is presently caring for (4000), has recently indicated a more cooperative attitude but insisted that reintegration possibilities in the other Arab countries first be exhausted. On the basis of these developments, combined with the provisions in the Mutual Security Act authorizing the United States to contribute up to $50 million for the Palestine refugee program, the time is now ripe to adopt a target date for the completion of this program and to estimate the total costs. The adoption of such a program at this time will be of value to contributing governments in making their future plans and to the Agency in concluding its negotiations with the Arab Governments.

9. Comment on Section B of Draft Resolution.

The following comments deal with the paragraphs of the draft resolution concerning the operation, budget, and organization of UNRWA.

Paragraphs 14, 15, and 16

The figures cited in these paragraphs are State Department estimates which may need to be revised after the Report of UNRWA is available.

The estimated cost of the three-year reintegration program is a rough calculation for the settlement of between 100,000 and 150,000 refugee families (5 to a family) at a cost of between $1,000 and $1,500 per family. This will not take care of all the 880,000 refugees who are now on the Agency's ration rolls. It is anticipated, however, that economic development programs of the countries concerned will be accelerated by United States grant aid in addition to bank loans, and that a substantial number of the urban refugees will find employment opportunities in this manner rather than by the direct assistance of the Agency. The Agency will give primary emphasis on agricultural projects. This estimated cost does not include the value of lands which the Arab Governments are expected to make available. We believe it important to make note of this point in the resolution in order that there may be no misunderstanding between the Agency and the Arab Governments regarding payment for lands.

A figure of about $60 million for continuation of the relief program for three years takes account of the fact that relief costs cannot be too sharply reduced until reintegration projects are actually completed. The direct aid and services contributed by the Arab Governments are of real value to the Agency and should be recognized. They are specifically mentioned in these paragraphs in order to show that the sums required for relief must be in currency or supplies. A revised budget for fiscal 1952 is necessary because of the probable availability of $50 million from the United States under the Mutual Security Act. This is equal to the total amount requested for UNRWA by the General Assembly in resolution 393(V).

We have been pressing the British and French to increase their contributions for fiscal 1952 in view of the opportunities for carrying out the program which are now offered. These efforts will be continued prior to the General Assembly. The Department has proposed that the British offer of last December to contribute $1 for every $3 contributed by the United States (assuming a U.S. maximum of $30 million and minimum of $25 million) be applied to a minimum possible $50 million United States contribution. The initial pledge made by the United States at the last Assembly was $25 million, but the announcement of a larger pledge awaits the completion of appropriation legislation. We are also urging the French to contribute onehalf of the amount contributed by the British. The ratio of 6-2-1 between the US, UK and France is approximately the ratio between their respective contributions to the regular budget of the United Nations. If the British and French contributions materialize at this ratio, a sum of $75 million would be available for the period July 1, 1951, to June 30, 1952. Pledges to date from other governments for this period come to approximately $1,800,000 exclusive of direct aid and services of the Arab Governments. It is anticipated that the Agency will request at least $25 million for relief, rather than $20 million because of higher costs. As provided in General Assembly resolution 393(V), the balance would be available for expenditure or commitment on reintegration.

Although we have no reports on what the Agency is contemplating for fiscal 1953, it is reasonable to expect it to recommend a larger figure for that year than any other. For this reason a tentative figure of $90 million is indicated, with $70 million available for expenditure or commitment on reintegration, and $20 million for relief. During this fiscal year the Agency will need to be in position to make its maximum commitments even though expenditures may lag behind.

mated totals for each year:

	Reintegration	Relief	Total
1951-2	$ 55	$25	$ 80
1952–3	70	20	90
	$150	$60	$210

Although it may not be possible fully to reach these targets, it is of great importance to indicate what they are and to show that a terminal date is definitely in view. UNRWA, like the IRO, may need an extension of life to complete its work. However, the approximate total costs should now be indicated and every effort made to raise the necessary funds. It should be understood that the contributing governments would not be expected to make payments on their contributions except as the Agency requires funds to carry out reintegration projects already agreed and to meet the necessary relief costs.

Paragraph 18

The Agency has been exploring with the Arab government the possibility of transferring to them the administration of the direct relief program. This is a responsibility which they will have to assume sooner or later, whenever international assistance is terminated. As long as the Agency is charged with direct administration it is subject to attacks by the refugees themselves and by the press. Both Jordan and Egypt are reluctant to undertake the administration of the relief program and wish to keep the Agency directly responsible for administration. A provision in the General Assembly resolution should be of assistance to the Agency in negotiating this transfer. There are certain advantages which the governments may derive from such a transfer, for their health, welfare and education programs will undoubtedly benefit from the assistance provided by the Agency.

Paragraph 19

No provision has been drafted on the method of financing. It is assumed, however, that contributions will be sought on a voluntary basis as in the past. The most important immediate task is that of establishing a firm commitment on the part of the UK and France for the current program as indicated above. It is to be hoped that the proposed ration of 6-2-1 or one approximating it, can be negotiated for the balance of the program. The additional sums required to meet the budget might be left to the Negotiating Committee if that body is re-established by the General Assembly.

Paragraph 20

This paragraph is similar to that in previous resolutions and needs to be maintained. The Agency has a good record of repayment of loans advanced from the Working Capital Fund. It has never requested more than $3 million and has sought loans only when they were absolutely necessary to carry on the program.

Paragraph 21

The terms of reference of the Advisory Commission, as set forth in resolution 302(IV) have given rise to a few difficulties between the Director and the Advisory Commission. Under paragraph 8 of that resolution the Advisory Commission was "to advise and assist the Director of UNRWA in the execution of the program; the Director and Advisory Commission shall consult with each Near Eastern government concerned in the selection, planning and execution of projects". During the first year of operations these functions were justifiable, particularly in view of the fact that the Members of the Advisory Commission were selected by their governments to spend full time on the work of the Agency. With the experience gained and with the selection of Mr. Blandford as Director, the role of the Advisory Commission in the execution as well as the selection and planning of projects is less important. There have been suggestions that the Advisory Commission be abolished. We do not concur in that suggestion, but consider that a re-definition of functions along the lines contained in paragraph 10 will clarify its role.

Draft Resolution on Palestine Question

The General Assembly

Recalling its resolution 194(III) of December 11, 1948; 302(IV) of December 8, 1949; 393(V) of December 2, 1950; and 394(V) of December 14, 1950,

Having examined the report of the United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine (A/_____) and the report of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA) (A/____),

(In the event the PCC is to be replaced)

Noting with concern that agreement has not been reached between the parties concerned on the final settlement of questions outstanding between the parties concerned

(In the event the PCC is to be continued)

Noting that the report of the United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine indicates that some (good) progress toward the final settlement of the Palestine problem has been made by the parties concerned

Recognizing that in the interests of the peace and stability of the Near East such a final settlement should be achieved,

A

1. Considers that the governments and authorities concerned have the primary responsibility to reach a settlement of their outstanding differences.

2. Urges the governments and authorities concerned to extend the scope of the Armistice Agreements and to seek agreement with the view to an early settlement of all questions outstanding between them.

3. Expresses its appreciation for the efforts of the Conciliation Commission to carry out its mandate, and particularly for the report of the United Nations Economic Survey Mission for the Middle East and for the work of the Commission in examining the problem of compensation;

4. Decides to heed the request of the United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine that it be discharged of its duties:

1. Considers that the governments and authorities concerned have the primary responsibility to reach a settlement of their outstanding differences.

2. Urges the governments and authorities concerned to extend the scope of the Armistice Agreements and to seek agreement with the view to an early settlement of all questions outstanding between them.

3. Commends the Conciliation Commission for Palestine and the governments concerned for the progress which they have made toward a final settlement of the Palestine problem,

4. Requests the conciliation Commission to report to the next General Assembly on the further efforts which it may undertake pursuant to this resolution.

5. Establishes an Agent General for Palestine who shall undertake the task of achieving a final settlement of the questions outstanding between the parties and toward this end authorizes him to initiate and pursue such negotiations as he believes necessary and to report to the Security Council concerning his activities;

6. Designates the Chief of Staff of the Truce Supervision Organization as the Agent General for Palestine;

7. Requests the Security Council to give such directives to the Agent General for Palestine as it may decide upon and further requests the Security Council to submit a special report to the next General Assembly on the exercise of the functions of the Agent General for Palestine under this resolution;

8. Requests the Secretary General to provide the Agent General for Palestine with such assistance as may be necessary and to make appropriate arrangements to provide the necessary funds required for the performance of the Agent General's functions under this resolution.

9. Commends UNRWA and the Near Eastern Governments concerned for the elaboration of constructive projects and the development of a forward looking program of lasting value to the refugees themselves and to the countries which receive them;

10. Considers that all phases of the refugee problem should now be dealt with by a single United Nations body and decides therefore that matters pertaining to the Palestine refugees and to economic development, hitherto entrusted to the Conciliation Commission, shall in the future be dealt with by UNRWA;

11. Considers that the three-year program of reintegration recommended by UNRWA should be implemented and that every effort should be made to conclude both the relief and reintegration programs not later than June 30, 1954;

12. Directs UNRWA to make the necessary arrangements for the settlement of refugee compensation claims due from Israel, and requests UNRWA and the Government of Israel to consult together with a view to the provision of payments by Israel to discharge compensation claims;

- 13. Requests the Secretary General to provide the Director of UNRWA with such staff and facilities as may be necessary to enable UNRWA to carry out the functions hitherto entrusted to the Refugee Office of the Conciliation Commission.
- 14. Considers that the equivalent of approximately $150 million will be required to carry out a three-year reintegration program for the period July 1, 1951, to June 30, 1954, exclusive of the value of lands to be contributed for this purpose, and that the equivalent of approximately $60 million in currency or supplies will be required for relief during the period July 1, 1951, to June 30, 1954, exclusive of contributions from local governments in direct aid and services;
- 15. Approves the revised budget recommended by UNRWA for the period July 1, 1951, to June 30, 1952, amounting to the equivalent of $80 million, of which $55 million shall be available for the reintegration program and not more than $25 million for relief, exclusive of direct aid and services;
- 16. Approves the budget recommended by UNRWA for the period July 1, 1952, to June 30, 1953, of the equivalent of $90 million of which $70 million shall be available for reintegration, and not more than $20 million for relief, exclusive of direct aid and services;
- 17. Authorizes UNRWA, as circumstances permit, to transfer funds available for relief to the reintegration program;
- 18. Calls upon the governments concerned to conclude agreements with UNRWA for the transfer of administration of the direct relief program to those governments with the understanding that UNRWA will continue to carry the cost of the supply program and to provide assistance for the health, welfare and education programs, subject to such inspection and verification of accounts as may be necessary for UNRWA to carry out;
  - 19. (Methods of Financing);
- 20. Authorizes: the Secretary General in consultation with the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, to advance funds, deemed to be available for this purpose and not exceeding $5 million, from the working Capital Fund to finance operations pursuant to the present resolution, such sum to be repaid not later than 31 December, 1952;
- 21. Decides that the Advisory Commission in lieu of the functions attributed to it in paragraph 8 of resolution 302(IV) of December 8, 1949, shall perform the following functions:
- (a) Adopt quarterly plans of expenditure after review of proposals submitted by the Director;
- (b) Collaborate with the Director in making recommendations concerning the program, budget and operations of the Agency for submission to the General Assembly;

(c) Advise the Director on the coordination of other programs of economic development in the area;

(d) Advise the Director on such policy matters as may be submitted to it by the Director or raised by any of its Members;

20. Requests the governments concerned to cooperate with the Agent General and UNRWA and to extend them every facility for the purpose of carrying out this resolution;

21. Commends the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund, the World Health Organization and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, for the cooperation and assistance which they have rendered to UNRWA and urges them and other specialized agencies concerned to render all possible services, taking into account the emphasis to be given to the reintegration program;

22. Expresses its thanks to the various religious and philanthropic organizations whose programs have brought much needed supplementary assistance to the Palestine refugees and requests the Director of UNRWA to explore with them the possibilities of increased assistance in connection with the reintegration program.

Department of State Position Paper 1

CONFIDENTIAL SD/A/C.1/372 [Washington,] October 12, 1951.

THE QUESTION OF JERUSALEM

THE PROBLEM

The problem is to determine the position which the Delegation should take on the question of an international regime for Jerusalem.

While the Assembly may not have the question of Jerusalem on its agenda at the outset of the sessions the facts: (1) that Jerusalem has been a topic of discussion at the last four Assemblies, particularly in connection with the general Palestine question; and (2) that there have been some indications from several delegations of their continued interest in an international regime for the protection of the Holy Places in Jerusalem, tend to indicate that it may become a matter for discussion.

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. The basic position of the Delegation should be to support such a solution of the Jerusalem question as will be acceptable to Israel and Jordan and meet with general concurrence by the world community.

- 2. If the question is raised in informal discussions the Delegation should indicate that it does not believe that the question can be profitably discussed in this Assembly, since the criteria in Recommendation 1 are not likely to be met, but the Delegation should not actively oppose consideration of this problem if other delegations indicate a sincere desire to bring the matter before the Assembly.
- 3. The Delegation may indicate that it is willing to participate in informal discussions on any reasonable plans which may be brought forward.
- 4. While attempting to discourage proposals which lack the elements of acceptability set forth in Recommendation 1 the Delegation should maintain a flexible position on proposals for Jerusalem which may be advanced by other delegations until such time as there appears to be a genuine likelihood of achieving the criteria set forth in Recommendation 1.
- 5. If any proposal is brought to a vote the Delegation should not support it if it lacks the elements of acceptability indicated in Recommendation 1.

COMMENT

The foregoing recommendations are based on the following factors:

1. The primary objectives in any consideration of the Jerusalem question are that a solution is acceptable to the main parties interested, i.e. Israel and Jordan and that this solution can obtain the necessary support from the other Members of the UN. On the basis of past history, the majority of the UN Members favor a far more extreme form of internationalization than either Israel or Jordan have thus far indicated that they could accept. We have not yet seen any good prospect of reconciling these positions and unless, for unforeseen political reasons, either Israel or Jordan decides to accept a more extreme form of international organization than they have now indicated, we can see no prospect of any reconciliation at this Assembly.

2. In view of the unlikelihood of reconciling the views of Israel and Jordan, on the one hand, and the views of a large number of other nations, on the other, concerning the extent of an international regime for Jerusalem; in view of the obviously yet unsettled situation in the Palestine area; and in view of the fact that there are many other more pressing problems before the General Assembly, we may indicate that we do not believe that the Jerusalem question can be profitably discussed in this Assembly since overall agreement is highly unlikely and any proposal not acceptable to Israel and Jordan could not be put into effect, nor would it contribute to the peace essential to the Palestine

3. In line with our desire to be constructive in all General Assembly consideration of this problem, we may indicate that we are willing to participate in informal discussions with other Delegations over any reasonable plans which may be put forward and that we welcome any proposals which may be conducive to a solution of this problem. It would be hoped that our participation in informal discussion carried on for the most part outside of meetings might reveal a solution which would satisfy our criteria for acceptance so that, should occasion demand, we could publicly support such a solution.

4. The closest to a practicable solution which might have met the criteria for acceptability was the Swedish plan submitted at the last General Assembly.2 This plan had backing from Israel and the indicated sympathy of a large number of influential delegations including the U.S. Delegations.

For the text of this plan and details regarding consideration given to it by the Fifth General Assembly see Jerusalem background book.3

5. On the basis of experience in past Assembly Sessions and barring an unexpected change in the position of Israel and Jordan we see no point in supporting any schemes for the internationalization advocated by such proposals as the special report of the Trusteeship Council presented at the last General Assembly, and the Jerusalem Statute prepared by the Palestine Commission for consideration at the Fourth General Assembly, since all of these proposals were unacceptable to Israel or Jordan, or both whether or not they had the necessary majority support from the other Members of the UN.4

caused by this upset of an already very tight fon exch budget. SecGen did not think govt's credit had as yet been seriously impaired nor has there been significant shutting down of short-term commercial credits (floating debt of such credits said to be in upper 7 figures' amt). Attitude bank and character inquiries recd indicate, however, widespread concern.

Prospects not encouraging for making up apparent deficit £5 million to Dec 31. Brit elections holding up Horowitz London negots and Petsch's death deprived Horowitz of his best Fr contact. SecGen said £3,000,000–3,500,000 on pledged sterling securities one possible outcome of Horowitz current London talks.

4. Short-term debt. Following disappointing receipts (point three above) there was excessive flotation short-term commercial bank credits maturing Oct-Dec without cash or alternative credit availability in sufficient magnitude to cover. Preliminary estimates these

Subject to appraisal technical data now being assembled, I believe it wld be in our interest to attempt meet Kaplan request on theory since we are committed to help this country anyway, it wld be advantageous to help them now when they need it most. It wld mean a great deal to them, and incidentally to us, to save them from eventual embarrassment which cld not help but affect adversely their internatl reputation and position in ME. This is on assumption matter is question of timing and will not represent major change in program.

SECRET PRIORITY

Tel Aviv, October 21, 1951—11 p. m.

371. While serious deterioration morale of population generally is not yet apparent, overtone of doubt and anxiety marked in official circles. Food situation still deteriorating while power and transportation facilities continue to be inadequate with no immed promise improvement in face growing population.

Continued reductions in rations and continued failure to distribute established rations has led to partial breakdown of commodity and wage controls. The consequent significant and growing volume of black-market transactions in controlled commodities and fon exchange, together with scarcity of goods generally has resulted in growing inflationary pressures marked by sharp open-market price rises and sharp declines in value of Israel pound in relation to gold sovereigns and dollars.

Because of acute fon exchange shortages and particularly because of lack working balances, govt has been unable to come to grips with these problems. While world-wide shortage critical materials for power irrigation and transportation has contributed to present situation, the most immed problem and the one in which assistance is most urgently needed is getting fon exchange for food and essential commodity imports in amts sufficient to reestab ration distributions and commodity controls.

Israel Treasury has provided fol detail of govt financial position (millions of dollars):

1. Fon exchange obligations maturing Oct-31 Dec 1951 for fol: Import credits 32.8; settlement of swings in bilateral trade agreements 2.0; defense imports credit settlement 9.0; POL 1.2; total 45.0.

2. Anticipated earnings: proceeds of exports and invisibles 11.0; remittances (UPA) and transfers (bond sales) 15.0; total 26.0; uncovered balance of obligations 10.0.

Discussion of amt of minimum requirements for maintaining import pipeline over next three months as well as estimates of Israel capacity to obtain renewal of credit facilities to finance such requirements were inconclusive. Estimated requirements figure cld be held to between $25 and 30 million which was assumed to be manageable thru credit renewals provided fall maturities are met. Govt also felt confident of ability to extend maturity of at least $4 million of obligations.

Cash balances of treas are nil in sterling and under $100,000 in dollars. It was categorically stated no additional balances now due

Treas from UJA, UPA or bond sales account.

This poses particular problem in that requirement is for immed funds to fill gap in settlement of due obligations, all of which cover shipments already recd. In effect Israel Govt has been operating without working dollar balances since March 1950 and from Jan 1951 without any exchange. It has been obliged to finance entire import on instable structure of short-term bankers credits and acceptances at considerable cost. Present situation, amounting to an overbought position, threatens so to jeopardize credit standing as to endanger imminent collapse of financing structure. This eventuality wld obviously greatly increase cost to US of sustaining economy.

While we were informed that above summary represents total of maturing short-term liabilities and prospective assets, Horowitz' conversations in London will, if successful, bring additional relief. Shld UK Treas advance pound 3 million requested for settling sterling POL position, approx. pound 1 million wld be additional margin. (We assume UK will not grant Israel Govt's request for 20 million pound development loan in near future.) This we consider, shld not be deducted from assistance contemplated by US, but shld serve either to give essential increase in flexibility to present position or to meet costs packing citrus crop.

Kaplan request (Embtel 370, Oct 19)<sup>2</sup> for immed assistance is given validity by above figures. Requirement thus becomes emergency finance to honor obligations maturing in last quarter calendar 1951 for whole range of imports. Gap US might fill now cld be programmed from essential "austerity" imports. This wld not only prevent collapse presently over-extended external credit structure but appears appropriate use Section 205 MSA funds by insuring supply of essentials for maintenance immigrant well being as well as stability whole economy. Israel Govt officials listed austerity program until Jan 1 as fols in million dollars (the not necessarily from dollar sources): foodstuffs and animal feed 19.9; seeds, fertilizer, agric shares 2.554; industrial raw materials 2.9; truck spares .7; non-sterling POL 3.3; chemicals, pharmaceuticals .3; rough diamonds 1.7; total 30.452. Detailed breakdowns of foregoing have been given.

Dept for Fryer TCA and Gardiner NEA from Bayne and Parker. In view practical absence working balances and assuming Washington agreement of gap-filling emergency proposal which we recommend, assistance will require time-saving procedure to be effective. In working level discussions we have agreed with Israel reps to suggest fol procedure to TCA/W for 15 million emergency allocation, reserving right to revise procedure for balance of funds available. We emphasized any disbursement by US wld be subject to bilateral agreement or letter of intent which wld provide for performance guaranties; we did not specify latter in our conversations with Israel Govt officials. Procedure discussed which Israel Govt also cabling, is in five steps:

1. Estab of joint US-IG acct in Bank Leumi for 15 million.

2. Acct at disposal of IG Treasury against counter-signature of appropriate TCA mission official.

3. Funds to be used only for refinance of existing short term credit facilities for programmed commodities or for new purchase under program.

4. IG will provide within 10 days bankers confirmation that ltr of credit was opened for programmed transaction as represented.

5. Joint account wid be reimbursed as first charge on free IG funds in any case of misrepresentation or short fall by supplier, etc.

Above procedure has advantage of not requiring provision of cash by IG which has none and of using normal business channels. It has, however, disadvantage of postponing maturities for essential items which may not be met ultimately from IG fon exchange receipts. This might prejudice flexibility whole program, and restrict it to a maintenance of essential supply. This we do not consider desirable. We have throughout discussions distinguished between section 205 funds and section 203 funds to allow program leeway for Mission's future operations. In any event, earliest arrival of Mission Chief and comptroller wld appear necessary.

We have had only limited discussions of counterpart except to point out that US wld require it. It appears likely from obvious inflationary conditions caused by heavy internal defense and capital expenditures that 95 percent counterpart wld be best used for debt retirement or other appropriate deflationary measure.

Govt presentation has so far failed to satisfy us that we are seeing complete picture. Particularly mil component of total annual fon exchange requirements has been withheld altho promises that this will be given, continue. We have reasonable grounds for assumption that present crisis arises from undeterminately high level mil expenditure over past few months which exhausted available resources for even food imports, and thereby disrupted both import scheduling and refinancing program. Furthermore, data furnished on total fon exchange payments and receipts fail to account fully for known receipts.

For example fin exchange receipts for Jan-Aug period this year show only $40.5 million transferred to Israel Treasury from combined UJA receipts and bond sale proceeds. Latter alone stated to be $60 million thru Sept. This discrepancy may be explained by direct procurement for refugees not scheduled thru Israel Govt accts, mil disbursements, or direct payment on long term obligations. However, we cannot now certify that we have complete picture or particularly, that their statement of exhaustion all balances is correct.

Our considered recommendation therefore is that at least $15 million be made immed available to Israel Treasury to meet matching obligations and thereby preserve credit structure. Additional reservations concerning longer range over-all fon exchange expenditures and earnings require more rigorous examination and analysis prior to finalization program for balance aid funds. We are increasingly convinced that mission must extend responsibility to review of entire import program including at least access to mil requirements schedules. In our discussions here we have met several high level officials who, informally, urged such outside control as essential.

Emb will continue lines of inquiry established this week. Cooperation of Israel reps while less than satisfactory, is improving and there is reason to expect will increase particularly as they become accustomed to closer work in relationship in Israel with US reps.

Subject: Visit of Israel Minister and Mr. George Newell

The Minister of Israel, Mr. Theodore Kollek, will call on you at 3 o'clock today, accompanied by Mr. George Newell, Vice President, Manufacturers Trust of New York City, to discuss briefly Israel's critical foreign exchange situation and the interest of the Manufacturers Trust and National City banks in the possibility of extending a loan to the Israel Government.

You will recall that in the course of Ambassador Eban's visit with you on Friday, October 12, the Ambassador mentioned the seriousness of Israel's present foreign exchange situation. Finance officials of the Israel Government have informed our Embassy at Tel Aviv that (1) Israel's current foreign exchange reserves are nil, (2) Israel is faced with an apparent exchange deficit between now and the end of calendar 1951 of I£ 5 million ($14 million) which they hope to make up through extension of current maturities, sterling and franc credits, and additional dollar credits, and (3) the situation is still deteriorating; the foreign exchange now required to clean up the present arrearages and to get control of the situation is said to be $15 million.<sup>2</sup> Although Israel's officials do not believe that their Government's credit has as yet been seriously impaired, the attitude of the banks and the character of the inquiries received by the Israel Government indicate widespread concern.

On October 15, Minister Kollek discussed Israel's exchange situation with officials of State and Treasury. In response to a question as to what Israel would like to see done to assist her in her present plight, Mr. Kollek said they would like very much to have the US Government pick up the check for between 10 and 12 million dollars' worth of the consumers goods which the Israelis have imported since the beginning of fiscal 1952. He had in mind the possibility of this sum being made available from MSP funds, once Congress has passed the appropriate legislation. Although no assurances were given Mr. Kollek that this sort of support could be expected from the US, he was informed that there was a distinct possibility that something along these lines could be worked out. It was emphasized, however, that it was impossible to foretell when Congress would complete its action, how much money would be available to Israel when the legislation is finally enacted, or the exact manner in which the funds may be utilized.

Subsequent to the above conversation, Mr. Kollek discussed the possibilities of obtaining a loan from Manufacturers Trust and National City with officials of these banks. Evidently the two banks have formed a consortium for this purpose, and are viewing favorably the possibility of extending a loan of upwards of $10 million to Israel. In his discussions with the bank officials Mr. Kollek mentioned that MSP funds might be forthcoming in the near future and that the Department was considering what steps might be taken, once the legislation is passed, to pick up 10 to 12 million dollars of Israel's bills covering consumers goods imports. Mr. Kollek previously received the Department's approval before mentioning that such a possibility was being considered.

Recommendations:

That you inform Mr. Newell that it is expected that the President will sign the MSP at any time and the Department hopes to make Israel's MSP allotment of funds ($60/62 million) available as quickly as possible thereafter.

After a short discussion with Mr. Newell, it is suggested that you tell him that Mr. Gardiner will be glad to continue the discussion in his office since he is familiar with all the details.<sup>3</sup>

Participants: The Honorable Theodore Kollek, Minister, Embassy of Israel

Mr. George Newell, Vice President, Manufacturers Trust, New York City

NEA—Mr. McGhee NEA—Mr. Gardiner NE—Mr. Waldo

Mr. Kollek introduced Mr. Newell and explained that he had brought him in order to discuss briefly with the Department problems arising out of Israel's acute shortage of foreign exchange and the resultant efforts of the Israel Government to obtain immediately sufficient dollars to tide them over until funds were available on a large scale from other sources, such as the grant-aid program of the US.

Mr. Newell said that the Manufacturers Trust frequently loaned money to the various Jewish institutions, such as the United Jewish Appeal, United Palestine Appeal, the Keren Kayemeth,<sup>2</sup> and the Jewish Agency; that these loans were short-term loans and that the security for them was generally collections already in progress. The Israel Government now wished to have a loan of approximately $10 million for the purpose of paying debts acquired since July 1, 1951. Mr. Newell said that he was interested in learning of the status of the Mutual Security Program and the possibilities that any money available thereunder would be used to pay commitments acquired by Israel before the passage of the Bill, between July 1, 1951 and the present.

I told Mr. Newell that the Mutual Security Program itself was now law and the Appropriations Bill would probably soon be signed by the President. So far as the administration of the money itself was concerned, it was about certain that the TCA under Mr. Bennett would administer the money for the Near East, including Israel. It would therefore be up to Mr. Bennett to make the policy decision whether the money could be used to pay past debts acquired by Israel. I pointed out, however, that the TCA would probably follow precedents already set by ECA and, as he was aware, the ECA had picked up the check for a number of countries on past purchases when it first had gone into business.

I was of course unable to give Mr. Newell any specific assurances that this would be the case, since it was the prerogative of Mr. Bennett to make the decision. Mr. Newell said that he was aware before coming to my office that he would be unable to obtain such a commitment but that he was interested in discussing generally the problem involved. After leaving my office Mr. Newell went to Mr. Gardiner's office where there was further discussion, and Mr. Gardiner explained that the administration of the bill would be guided by the debate which took place in the Congressional committees and a reading of those hearings would disclose that the ECA pattern would be followed. Mr. Gardiner gave Mr. Newell copies of Congressional hearings as well as of the Mutual Security Act.

On the following day Mr. Kollek called Mr. Waldo and requested him to convey his thanks and appreciation to Mr. Gardiner and to me for the very helpful general discussion which we had had with Mr. Newell. Mr. Kollek said the discussion had sufficed to convince Mr. Newell to begin the negotiations for the loan to Israel.

Subject: Visit of the Israel Ambassador

The Israel Ambassador is calling on you today at 3:30 to discuss developments in Paris at the Conference of the Palestine Conciliation Commission. It is understood that the Ambassador is rather concerned over a telegram which he received from the Israel Minister in Paris who is representing Israel at this conference. Apparently Mr. Fischer and Ambassador Palmer have held a conversation in which the latter allegedly used "strong language" to the effect that Israel would be responsible for breaking up the PCC negotiations if it refused to consider the five substantive proposals.

The Israelis have been unhappy about the compromise the PCC decided upon in connection with the non-aggression declarations. Agreement on the text of these declarations was originally intended to precede consideration of the five proposals. Since the Israelis and the Arabs could not get together on any wording, the PCC, in a letter of October 6 to both parties, quoted the text of the two drafts—the comprehensive Israel one, and the strict constructionist Arab one which was based solely on the military provisions of the Armistice Agreement. The PCC letter then stated that the two drafts represented a satisfactory preliminary basis for the parties to proceed to discuss points at issue. The Israelis take the position that the PCC letter is not satisfactory since by quoting the Arab declaration they consider the PCC is giving the stamp of approval to the Arab attitude, which of course fails to include any injunction against hostile acts, such as the Suez Canal blockade. The Israelis feel that what they consider tacit approval by the PCC of the Arab declaration definitely prejudices the SC interpretation of the Armistice Agreement incorporated in the Suez Canal Resolution of September 1.

On October 19, Israel stated its doubts that the Arab text of the non-aggression declaration could constitute a basis for the pursuit of further negotiations. Apparently Ambassador Palmer has now told the Israelis that PCC did not consider that the PCC note quoting the two separate texts of the non-aggression declaration in any way prejudiced the Armistice Agreements and that controversy over this point should not be permitted to hold up discussion of the substantive points at issue. In doing so the Ambassador may also have used "strong language" in telling the Israelis that they would be responsible for breaking up the PCC Conference if they refused to discuss the proposals, particularly in the light of the fact that the Arab states have already agreed to discuss them.

Recommendations:

That you inform the Ambassador that we appreciate and sympathize with his Government's views on the question of the non-aggression declarations. As the Ambassador is aware, however, the United States does not accept the Arab position on the Suez Canal blockade. We should point out that the absence of any injunction against hostile acts in the Arab text of the non-aggression declaration does not thereby justify the commission of such acts or legalize the Suez Canal blockade.

The Arab delegations have now agreed to discuss the substantive proposals. We would hope some progress could be made on this matter. We hope, therefore, that the Israel views in connection with the nonaggression declaration, which appear rather legalistic, will not hold up consideration of the points at issue. It would be our suggestion that Israel might wish to state its objections to the Arab non-aggression declaration and then at the same time agree to consider the substantive points. We do not believe that Israel can lose anything by discussing with the Commission the various items. It is unlikely that any final settlement can be reached at this time, but any informal or partial settlement should be welcomed by all concerned.

Subject: Visit of Israel Ambassador

Participants: Abba Eban, Ambassador of Israel

Mr. Shmuel Bendor, Officer in Charge, U.S. Affairs,

Israel Foreign Office Mr. McGhee—NEA Mr. Waldo—NE

The Israel Ambassador called, accompanied by Mr. Bendor. He complained that the PCC, in particular the US delegation, was pressing the Israel delegation to agree to consider the substantive proprosals of the PCC without further discussion of the non-aggression declaration. The Ambassador restated the Israel position; i.e., that the PCC letter of October 6 prejudiced the SC interpretation of the Armistice Agreements which was contained in the SC Resolution of September 1 concerning the Suez Canal blockade. The Ambassador contended that the PCC letter was not satisfactory, and urged the Department to instruct the US delegation to reopen the entire question of the non-aggression declaration in an effort to get the Arab delegations to agree to a wording which would signify their agreement to refrain from "hostile acts." The Ambassador insisted that the fact that the Arab delegations had refused to include any reference to hostile acts in the non-aggression declaration thereby legalized the position that they were entitled to commit them.

I told the Ambassador that I thought the Israelis were taking too legalistic a position on this question. (The pertinent sections of the PCC letter were then read aloud.) It did not seem to me that the letter in any way prejudiced the Armistice Agreements, the SC Resolution, or even indicated that the PCC considered the Arab delegation one hundred percent satisfactory. I said I thought the PCC passed lightly over the non-aggression declaration because they were convinced that no further useful purpose would be served in attempting to work out phraseology for the non-aggression declaration which would be satisfactory to both the Arabs and the Israelis. It did not appear necessary to waste any more time on this question since no agreement could be reached on it. It was desirable to proceed to considering other problems on which there might be some possibility of agreement. I said that at least both sides had indicated their willingness to refrain from acts of force against one another.

I told the Ambassador we would inform our delegation to the PCC of the representation made by the Israel Ambassador in Washington, but that we still hoped useful discussions could be held by both sides on the various proposals which the PCC had submitted. The Ambassador said he was not satisfied. If the PCC would not reopen the question of the non-aggression declaration the Israel Government would agree only to consider those problems on the PCC agenda which were of mutual interest to the UN and Israel but not those of concern to the Arab states. I again urged that the Israelis not be too fussy, and emphasized that no harm could come to the Israel position and no commitment would be involved in discussing with the PCC all of the points.

The Ambassador then turned to another question, and said that Israel was desperately short of steel and hoped that some special arrangement could be made which would permit Israel to get a 25,000-ton additional allocation for the first quarter. The Ambassador said he understood that Mr. Fleischman of the Defense Production Agency was willing to allocate some of the 500,000-ton reserve of International Trade for this purpose. I said I would be happy to take the matter up with Mr. Fleischman as soon as I got the necessary data, which I believed NE was preparing.

Fischer stated that as result of position taken by Arab States in their non-aggression declaration, it was impossible for Israel del to enter into discussion involving negotiation with Arab dels. There remained a possibility, however, that Israel del might go on with discussions with Comm itself. Before Arab declarations, the procedure that had been followed involved negotiations with Arab dels, although this was, of course, through the Comm in accordance with the GA Res of Dec 14. This was clearly no longer possible. Inasmuch as Sharett arrived from New York that afternoon, Fischer thought he would be

CONFIDENTIAL

Beirut, October 24, 1951.

No. 214

Subject: Approval of Arab League for Arab States to Cooperate with UNRWA (PRA)

There is enclosed a translation of the text <sup>2</sup> of a decision made by the Arab League on October 7, 1951, to cooperate with PRA in its proposed three-year program aimed at the creation of better living conditions and employment opportunities for Palestine refugees.

The decision is followed by ten clauses setting forth the conditions under which the Arab States will cooperate. These conditions reflect:

1) Arab desire to assist the refugees while not prejudicing their political rights;

2) Arab insistence that the major financial burden of the program be borne by the United Nations and concern lest the refugees become an economic burden to the host states;

3) Arab demand that in the execution of the program full respect be paid to the sovereignty and independence of the Arab States.

Comment: The decision represents an important step forward in PRA's effort to provide a solution to the Palestine refugee problem. The conditions of cooperation are not new or arbitrary—in fact, all of them except No. 6 were implied in the three-year plan proposals submitted by PRA to the Arab States and the League.

This decision provides a setting in which PRA can hopefully enter into negotiations for specific projects with the individual Arab states.

2477. Palun 461. PCC met with Israel del afternoon 26. Mtg opened with long statement by Fischer reviewing present situation with respect to conference. Inter alia Fischer stated that by PCC's "accepting Arab States refusal to affirm the validity of the principles of the charter and decisions of SC, an organ of UN had declared itself satisfied with Arab declaration which showed intention to pursue acts hostile to Israel in violation of armistice conventions, treaties and decisions." Arab refusal subscribe to declaration originally demanded by comm implied Arabs "refusal to negotiate, in as much as no one could participate in negots having as their objective finding of solutions for outstanding problems if in beginning they put in doubt those questions already settled."

Del of Israel hoped comm wild pursue its efforts obtain from Arab dels "explicit recognition of their obligations under armistice agreements and charter of UN...² conference called by comm was by nature negot between Israel and Arab States. Such negots directed through comm were conditional upon explicit recognition of Arab States of internatl engagements to which they had subscribed... these negots cld not be continued until Arab States substituted for their declaration of 3 October an affirmation of their intention to respect their obligations vis-à-vis Israel both as signatories of armistice agreements as interpreted by SC and as members of UN."

"Israel del reaffirmed its desire to collaborate with comm and was ready to examine with comm any question which cld be subj of discussion between Israel del and comm as an organ of UN, it being understood that any question implying negots direct or indirect with Arab States must be postponed until Arab States had unequivocally subscribed to armistice agreements, the decisions of SC and provisions of charter of UN."

As chairman I stated that observations of Israel del wld be studied carefully by comm but that comm believed at same time Israel del wld find it helpful receive same explanation of comms proposals as had been communicated to Arab dels on Wednesday. Fischer replied that he was prepared to hear comms statement and wld transmit it to his govt. I then read statement previously communicated to Arab dels (Palun 460). Mtg adjourned without further comment by Israel del or PCC.

US dels conversations during past few days with Fischer, Shiloah and Rafael indicate Israel del may be prepared take up with PCC unilaterally single question of compensation. They seem to assume this is question which can be considered by them with PCC alone without engaging in "negots" with Arab dels. It seems clear they are determined not to continue with conference as envisaged in PCC's original invitation or within framework of PCC's mediation between parties as outlined comms pattern of proposals.

Israel dels position seems to be based on firm Cabinet decision and explicit instructions. PCC is, therefore, faced with situation anticipated in Deptel 2103, Oct 11 [10]. PCC has made clear it cannot now reopen question of nonaggression declarations, which Israel has made conditions precedent to further negots through comm with Arab dels. On other hand, while Israel has indicated willingness consider unilaterally with comm individual questions, no official statement as to which questions Israel has in mind has been communicated to comm. Before PCC cld enter into unilateral discussions with Israel, it seems to US del that present conference wld have to be terminated. Questions arise as to procedure PCC shld follow in terminating conference and whether under these circumstances it is desirable continue unilaterally afterwards with matters chosen by Israel for discussion. 1. Agrees Agent-Gen should replace PCC which too unwieldy for negots. Strong, not too orthodox or legalistic Agent-Gen might get results. We unclear whether Dept intends combine TSO and Agent-Gen only in case Riley appointed, or intends this regardless who appointed. Blandford unenthusiastic, Riley doubting sufficiency his political acumen. Would prefer new face. Feels combination and Agent-Gen requires careful study since limitation TSO's powers by armistice agreements may present obstacles. Title "Agent-Gen" might arouse resentment as implying sovereignty. Something like "conciliator" preferable.

2. Would welcome formal transfer to PRA from PCC of broad mandate for economic development as already done by implication. Agent-Gen should be responsible old polit problems arising from hostilities. PRA shld be responsible solely for new economic approach to restore peace stability. Compensation remains old political problem. PRA shild not have to fight for compensation. By so doing wld enlarge PRA reintegration responsibilities because guess is that threequarters compensation will go to large property-owners not presently PRA's clients. Compensation due present clients insignificant, which reintegrated refugees cld keep as additional bonus, or cld be collected along with rent for reintegration facility. Once Agent-Gen attains polit agreements on compensation and repatriation, is willing PRA attempt implement them. Agrees PRA director and Agent-Gen consult together to this end.

3. Feels terminal date program and total budget inseparable as subj of discussion. Wld substitute "approx 3 years" for "June 30, 1954". While impossible forecast exact cost, feels reintegration will cost $200 million and relief $50. Has no firm opinion on question of tactics, i.e., whether resolution shld specify $150 million with Arabs bargaining us upward, or whether shild bowl them over with large offer of $200

4. Agrees generally with desirability early turnover relief admin. Somewhat concerned that once Arab states get control ration rolls they will find more reintegration clients.

5. Pleased that by implication negots now taken from AdCom and given solely to director. Sees two alternatives for future AdCom: (1) body to coordinate members own bilateral programs with PRA multilateral, or (2) board of visitors meeting quarterly or semi-annually with highly formalized procedure.

Doubts propriety AdCom "adopting" rather than "advising" on expenditure plans and prefers six months rather than quarterly plans as giving more financial leeway for director. Agrees on joint director-AdCom recommendations to UNGA. Feels this good opportunity clarify AdCom as UN body or group or reps of govts.

6. Hopes UNGA will direct UN specialized agencies negotiate agreements with PRA as to respective roles in PRA program.

7. Feels PRA and Agent-Gen shid be treated in separate UNGA resolutions, thus strengthening idea of separation old polit problems from new economic approach. End Summary.

Comment: By Macatee. Basis my brief experience AdCom agree generally Blandford's views and feel they wld be endorsed by other AdCom members. Somewhat surprised Blandford's attitude re Riley, of whom I have highest first impression. Blandford's private opinion does not affect his excellent personal relations Riley.

Beirut, November 8, 1951.

No. 243

Ref: Beirut's telegram No. 229 of September 7, 1951, to the Department (Rapun 214)<sup>2</sup>

Subject: Arab and Jewish Refugees in Israel

As reported in the telegram under reference, on September 5, 1951, Mr. John B. Blandford, Jr., Director of UNRWA (PRA), discussed with the Israeli Foreign Minister the question of the 20,000 Arabs and 3,000 Jews in Israel still drawing PRA rations. Mr. Blandford urged that Israel should take on full responsibility for these people who were, after all, bona fide residents of the country.

There is enclosed a copy of a letter sent to Mr. Blandford dated October 3, 1951, by Dr. G. Meron, Chairman of the Israel Delegation to PRA.<sup>3</sup> Dr. Meron makes the point that his Government had never denied responsibility for its residents. He then states that Israel will take no final decision in this matter pending the outcome of the Arab-Israeli discussions at the present Paris conference of the Palestine Conciliation Commission. There is also enclosed a copy of Mr. Blandford's reply, dated November 2, 1951.<sup>4</sup>

Comment: In June 1950, the Israeli Government admitted full responsibility for the refugees within Israel at a meeting with the Director and Advisory Commission of PRA. The Israelis stated that they would reintegrate these people with or without international aid. They did argue, however, that assistance from PRA could greatly speed up the process.

It would appear that Israel, now that she is to receive $50 million from the United States for the express purpose of settling refugees, is prepared to withdraw its request for PRA assistance. However, Israel will be very careful to insist, for the record that her shouldering full responsibility was originally her idea.

As regards Israel's postponement of the final decision in this matter until the outcome of the PCC conference, Mr. Blandford is fond of citing this as another instance where PCC's action has delayed PRA's program.

&quot;I must admit this decision is a bit disappointing for two reasons. First, I leave for Paris Wednesday, the seventh, for a meeting with my Advisory Commission to complete our joint report for the UN Assembly. I had hoped to omit from the report references to UN support of resident refugees in Israel, especially in the light of recent large appropriations from other sources for refugee settlement in Israel. Second, during the recent weeks I have made steady progress with other Governments of the area toward constructive measures for improving refugee living conditions upon the sound premise that such a program should proceed without reference to the discussions or conclusions of the Paris meeting of the Conciliation Commission and without delay." (320.2 AA/11-851)

Arab States. Israel has not specifically answered question put to it in PCC's letter of Oct 31 as to whether Israel was prepared discuss within framework of present conf all points in PCC's comprehensive proposals. USDel feels that Israel del shid be asked to make explicit their answer to this question and PCC has authorized chairman to make such inquiry on informal basis as soon as remaining Arab answers recd. It seems likely in view Sharett's statement Nov 4 to Knesset that Israel will reply to this further inquiry in vein similar to that contained their previous communication of 19 Oct. In these circumstances PCC remains faced with question whether, in conf based upon resolutions of GA calling upon parties to negot with each other thru Comm, and in view of firm position PCC has taken that all questions shid be considered by parties in context of comprehensive pattern and with Comm mediating between them, PCC shld now discuss with Israel items chosen by Israel for discussion with Comm alone and on condition such questions are not to be negotiated with Arab States.

USDel's opinion is that it wld be desirable to be able to include in PCC's report to GA Israel del and Arab dels specific comments on any or all of PCC's proposals, but that it will be difficult for PCC to receive Israel's comments during this conf under conditions Israel imposes. Israel's position as announced by Sharett Nov 4 1 that as long as Arab States refuse accept PCC preamble Israel must defer entering into discussion of "any problem between it and Arabs" and that Israel will negot re compensation only with UN agency, is in fact refusal to proceed with conf on terms that PCC has maintained from beginning are essential to success. Hence if Israel maintains this position, we believe conf shld terminate before entering into any consideration with Israel of counter-proposals on new terms. This view is shared by Args. Turk rep, and Secretariat, but is opposed by Marchal, French rep, who seems wish prolong conf as such as long as possible. Marchal seems motivated by desire avoid putting any blame on parties for conf's failure and hope of avoiding sitn which might lead to PCC's discharge by GA. French attitude in this respect foreshadows difficulties USDel will encounter in proposing discontinuance PCC and transfer PCC functions to other UN body.

In USDel opinion, however, PCC can best clarify sitn if, having recd final negative answer from Israel as anticipated, Comm shld inform parties conf in these circumstances has been terminated, but that in order complete full report to GA, comments already requested on all points of PCC's proposals shld be given to Comm in writing. Dept's views requested question of timing PCC's report to GA remains uncertain in view fact GA Secretariat pressing for its submission within few days to permit distribution before comite's debate, fact Ad Hoc Comite agenda may be exhausted by end of month necessitating early debate re Palestine questions, and fact UNRWA members indicate little likelihood that a delay in presenting their report wld result in anything more substantial as to its contents. Substance PCC's conclusions and recommendations, therefore, becomes matter some urgency. USDel is in general agreement Dept's position paper and has from beginning conference been working with these objectives constantly in mind. In particular USDel is in full agreement that PCC shld report frankly failure its mission. Specifically this failure shld be attributed to impossibility implementation its terms of reference as contained para 11, GA Res of 11 Dec 1948, and that PCC shld, therefore, be discharged of its responsibilities. USDel also believes UN interest in overall political questions shid be maintained and that PCC general responsibilities for assisting parties in arriving at final peaceful settlement shid be given to other UN body. We are convinced, however, that any UN body will be seriously handicapped if PCC's terms of reference as contained para 11, GA Res become part of such body's terms of reference. In particular we agree with Blandford and AdCom that UNRWA's resettlement responsibilities wld be seriously hampered shld UNRWA be given responsibility for negotiating repatriation and compensation (SD/A/C.1/373, P4, para 3).2 In somewhat lesser degree, Riley's present functions might likewise suffer were he given any responsibilities re repatriation and compensation. Greatest importance, therefore, in our opinion attaches to necessity overcoming handicap PCC's terms reference whatever body or bodies replace PCC. PCC can report its opinion that terms of reference cannot be implemented by itself or any other UN organ but question remains how these terms of reference can be eliminated in GA debate.

Re Dept's position paper, para B-10, draft resolution (SD/A/C.1/373, P16) might well perpetuate for UNRWA difficulties PCC has experienced and shld in our opinion be eliminated. Paras A-5, 6, 7, 8 draft res are in our opinion appropriate terms of reference for agent general provided language of para A-5 does not lend itself too readily to inclusion responsibility for repatriation and compensation.

Questions this nature will have to be considered by PCC within next few days and decision will have to be taken as whether PCC shld itself make any specific recommendations for eliminating undesirable terms of reference or for particular UN organ or machinery to replace PCC. We hope receive Dept's views earliest.

- 1. At AdCom mtg with Dir Nov 9, USDel stressed Dept's concern ref lack of detailed justifications and suggestion report be delayed in hope of strengthening report. Unanimous opinion was that there is insufficient basis to hope that delay wld accomplish desired result.
- 2. At risk repeating much already known to Dept, submit fol résumé of AdCom and Dir thinking;
- 3. Since Dir assumed duty, PRA has passed through polit phase now hoped reaching final stage. Slowness of progress is inherent in situation; leaders have tended to await outcome of PCC conf and lately to be distracted by MEC issue. Arab League's agreement to cooperate with PRA is milestone. Since then Dir has in ceaseless round of visits appreciably prepared way for specific program but always faced with reality that Arab govts will not be forced, and their extreme sensitivity to refugee and public opinion. Now clear that some govts, notably Syria, wld go further than have done were it not for fact that public opinion cannot be abruptly reversed. Ten days ago, Dir offered Syrian Govt 25 million dols for reintegration. Govt believed ready program that amount and start projects if it can be done quietly while public opinion is prepared. Egyptian govt is definitely cooperative, but proj details await final outcome Sinai water survey. Jordan can probably program 10 million current FY if PRA participation Yarmuk assumed. Lebanese Govt greatly intimidated by large and vociferous refugee population supports reintegration in League but cannot identify itself at least not with projs in Lebanon. Iraq supports three-year plan and currently will accept artisans. However, cannot politically announce its later prospects for receiving large number.

Against this is unyielding insistence refugees upon repatriation and refusal accept reintegration and their conviction it is device further to fortify Israel. They accept relief as right and reason west will continue it rather than have chaos in NE which wld ensue if it were discontinued.

¹ Identified also as telegram 412 to Beirut, November 5 (not printed); it stated in part that the Department had received the draft joint report of the Advisory Commission and Director of UNRWA and regretted that the Agency was unable at this time to describe reintegration operations in greater detail. The Department also stated its belief that a delay of 1 month or 6 weeks in the presentation of the report to the General Assembly might enable the Agency to develop a more persuasive presentation and detailed justification. (320.2–AA/11–551)

Blandford states that altho his dealings with Arabs have been materially affected by prolonged PCC negots, he believes Arab govts will accept conclusive and generous three or four-year plan and under it will cooperate with agency in quiet programming of current $50 million. Thinks, however, that attempt to allocate all refugees to specific projects in all Arab states and Israel at this time wld be prejudicial to progress already made and wld worsen an already tense atmosphere.

- 4. Pending receipt of such further instructions or suggestions as may be forthcoming from Dept, plan is meanwhile join with AdCom in completion of report along lines original draft.
- 5. Since arrival Paris, understand there is some question delaying debate on Palestine matters for reasons unconnected with PRA report. In such case, feel sure AdCom wld wish corresponding delay in completion its report in hope of some development which wld add substance to it.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Philip A. Mangano, Adviser to the United States Delegation at the United Nations General Assembly

CONFIDENTIAL

[Paris,] November 15, 1951.

Subject: Memorandum on Meeting on Palestine Matters

Participants: Ambassador Palmer, US Representative on the PCC

Mr. Barco, Deputy US Representative on the PCC Mr. Macatee, US Member of Advisory Commission, Palestine Refugee Relief Agency

Mr. Sandifer, US Delegation Mr. Stein, US Delegation

Mr. Joseph Palmer, US Delegation

Mr. Winslow, US Delegation Mr. Mangano, US Delegation

Mr. Lewis Jones, Director—Near East Affairs, Department of State

Mr. Crawford, House Foreign Affairs Committee Staff

I. The meeting was called this afternoon to permit a full exchange between the US representatives on the two UN Palestine agencies and members of the Palestine working group in the US Delegation to the General Assembly. The basic problems considered were: (a) the question of consultation between responsible members of the US Delegation and General Riley on the subject of the additional political functions with which he would be invested according to the US position on the Palestine case after the presumed dissolution of the PCC; (b) the present status and prospects for completion of the PCC and Advisory Commission reports to the General Assembly, which reports are presumably to be considered together by the Ad Hoc Committee; (c) other questions relating to the proposed new distribution of functions as between the office of General Riley and the UNRWA (UN Relief and Works Agency for Palestine).

II. Ambassador Palmer began by saying he had seen General Riley last evening, but did not feel free to go into details with him on the functions which the US would propose be entrusted to him by General Assembly action this year. Mr. Sandifer pointed out that it would be best if Ambassador Jessup would take these matters up directly with General Riley; alternatively, other representatives of the US Delegation could undertake these consultations. Ambassador Palmer and Mr. Barco then reviewed the course of PCC negotiations with the Arabs and the Israelis during the present PCC Conference, which is now about to close. They indicated a very wide divergence of approach between the Arabs and Israelis on almost all of the proposals which the PCC had made in its five-point program for progress toward a final possible settlement. They agreed that the PCC was clearly unable, with its terms of reference, to carry forward the work of negotiating and conciliation. Any new authority charged with such tasks would find it just as difficult unless given different terms of reference. Ambassador Palmer expected the PCC report could be completed sometime in the last week or ten days of November; he did not expect the PCC to adopt any recommendations, but felt that it might formulate conclusions based on its evaluation of the replies of the parties to the various PCC proposals. Ambassador Palmer and Mr. Barco felt that General Riley certainly should not be saddled with responsibility for the question of compensation or repatriation of Arab refugees, since this would only plague him as it had the PCC. They both felt that these functions should not, on the other hand, be turned over to the UNRWA, since Blandford was definitely opposed to that, and since responsibility for those questions would prejudice the UNRWA's chances of successful activity in the resettlement and reintegration field.

III. Mr. Macatee then reported briefly on the status of the Advisory Commission report which the Department had felt to be inadequate and lacking in sufficient concrete data to justify the necessary fundraising campaign among the interested governments. He said that the Advisory Commission report is well advanced and that the prevailing opinion in his agency is that they cannot present much more concrete data at this time because of the reluctance of Arab governments to negotiate firm commitments. He said that the Arab governments are afraid of refugee opinion, particularly in Lebanon, and that they are approaching the UNRWA proposals with great caution. He made a strong plea not to have the Blandford office saddled with any of the political problems which had been faced by PCC.

IV. After these presentations, the meeting held a general discussion of the major points raised. They arrived at the following thoughts and considerations which had been pointed up by this exchange of views: (a) it would be necessary in the next day or two to have high-level consultations between the US Delegation and General Riley; similar consultations would probably be necessary with Mr. Blandford; (b) the touchy issues of compensation and repatriation (which had been handled hitherto by a special branch of PCC) should, if possible, be pigeonholed somewhere without requiring any of the authorities dealing with Palestine problems to engage in much activity in those fields. It was generally felt that more might possibly be done in the field of compensation than in the field of repatriation, since the Israelis had so clearly indicated that repatriation was out of the question for a long time; (c) thought might be given to asking the Interim Committee to have a sub-committee keep generally in touch with the problems of compensation and repatriation, without unduly emphasizing them:

alternatively, some other means might be found of avoiding a complete passing over of these issues without, however, encouraging unduly active work on them under present conditions.

V. Mr. Lewis Jones (the State Department's Director of the Office of Near Eastern Affairs), who is at present in Paris on other business, said that he had been asked by the Department to sound out French views on the future of PCC. He said he had not felt it appropriate to discuss the US position on this case with the French, but he had asked them for their views. They had told him they felt the continuance of PCC to be generally desirable. Commenting on the other points under discussion at the meeting, Mr. Jones felt that the political negotiation function could well be played down for some time, and that major support should be given to the very real and immediate problem of finding means of relieving the plight of the some 800,000 refugees in the Arab countries who, if not rehabilitated, would be a dangerous influence in the Middle East and a breeding ground for Communist influence.1

In face Riley's attitude and his failure achieve implementation res, Syria unwilling participate further MAC mtgs.

Sec Gen said in Syrian mind there are three separate issues which shld not be mixed:

(1) First, May 18 res must be fully implemented before MAC cld meet. Shld Syria participate MAC in present circumstances it wld be acknowledging UN's inability achieve implementation res and wld be acquiescing in status quo in zone. Israel para mil forces wld still be in zone, Arabs forcibly removed from zone by Israel wld have been repatriated in token numbers only, and Israel wld be continuing engineering operations because of Riley's untenable interpretation of May 18 res. Effect wld be to force Syria to accept Israel faits accomplis. Syria's bargaining position in MAC wld be prejudiced by Israel's de facto control of zone.

(2) Syria recognizes necessity for definitive line instead of zone as suggested as early as last Feb by Qudsi (Legtel 400 [404] Feb 20).3 As Qudsi then pointed out, Syria cannot for polit reasons propose adjustment herself but willing study proposals made by others. Syria had hoped something wld come of French proposal to take dispute to PCC but had heard "informally" that US had killed this idea. (Leg Officer commented this untrue but that US had always urged such matters be kept in context MAC as provided under art 8 of armistice.) However, before adjustments cld be considered May 18 Res must be implemented. Otherwise, Syrian case lost from start and Syria wld be in fact negotiating under duress.

(3) Although any line agreed on wld be as definitive as other armistice frontiers of Israel, a "final" settlement of frontier lines and sovereignty, even in limits demil zone, unthinkable until all UN resolutions including repatriation, compensation, and partition (sic) executed. All adjustments made in demil zone wld be made as part of armistice and cld not be allowed prejudice final determinations. Thus, so far as Syria concerned, any proposal involving final settlement wld be ipso facto unacceptable as basis for discussion. How cld Syria expect unprejudice final settlement if Israel refused implement any of several UN resolutions? And if UN cld not enforce May 18 res, how cld it be expected enforce final settlement or zonal adjustments?

Comment: Re-airing of demil zone dispute cld have disastrous effects on Syrian consideration MEC and MSP. Although recent statements by "mil spokesman" have not yet provoked public interest on scale of last May and June, Syrian leaders nevertheless preoccupied failure Israel implement May 18 res. Sooner or later this preoccupation, some new incident in zone, or SC action to expropriate Arab lands will extremists and Syrian press.

Syrians are clearly unwilling present adjustment plan themselves, and it may be difficult persuade them consider proposal from any other party if Govt sticks to Secy Gen's line that there can be no MAC mtgs until May 18 res fully executed. In any case atmosphere heated by Israel's failure implement res will make talks bitter.

With success MSP and MEC at stake here it seems essential Israel Govt or Riley shld be persuaded put forward proposal suggesting adjustments in zone (Tel Aviv tel 58 July 20 4 to Dept). Assuming Syria cld be persuaded return to MAC to comment on such proposal, this seems only means determining Syrian price for adjustment. Unless we know Syrian price there seems little hope for adjustment either in or out of MAC.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Edwin A. Plitt of the United States Delegation at the United Nations General Assembly

CONFIDENTIAL

[Paris,] November 19, 1951.

Subject: General Matters of Interest to US and Israel

Participants: The Secretary

His Excellency M. Moshe Sharett, Israeli Minister of Foreign Affairs

Mr. Sharett called on the Secretary at his own request and was received by the Secretary in his office at 3:30 this afternoon. The conversation lasted for nearly an hour and a number of subjects were discussed, principally by Mr. Sharett. The noteworthy part of what he had to say is given in substance as follows:

Mr. Sharett referred first of all to the Secretary's speech this morning which he described as having been firm in substance and moderate in tone, yet, at the same time revealed an extraordinary concentration of thought on the subject of his address, many points of which the Secretary emphasized effectively by extemporaneous interpolations. Mr. Sharett expressed the hope that the call the Secretary issued would be heeded, which he felt sure could be counted on because of the enlightened exposition which he had made of this very high type of proposal.

Mr. Sharett then expressed some thoughts on where we (the US) and Israel stand in regard to the Middle East defense in which Israel wants to take its part because it would be impractical for it to live in isolation in that area where, as well as elsewhere, preparations have to be made to thwart another world war. If another war should come, Mr. Sharett said Israel would be prepared, not only in its own defense but well beyond its boundaries, to play its part. Israel, he said, was not quite certain as yet what powers will be able to throw their full weight to defend the Middle East effectively. He said he mentioned this because he wanted his talk with the Secretary to be absolutely frank and that the latter, he hoped, would gain thereby a clearer concept of what Mr. Sharett was trying to say.

He pointed out that from a practical point of view the fact must not be lost sight of that the job of the US has become so global that it should be realized that the US can't be expected to defend everyone and everything. He said it was not a question of the world going up in smoke, which we could not afford to let happen. But, if a conflagration did arise, he assumed that we both would defend ourselves together. He, nevertheless, wanted to apprise the Secretary of the precariousness of Israel's position should such a conflict englobe the Arab states as well. Israel can't be expected to disregard the Arabs completely. On the other hand, the United States must do everything possible to have them on the right side, particularly in regard to the facilities they would be in a position to contribute. He pointed out the fact that the Arabs still consider themselves at war with Israel and that Israel, therefore, could not impart vital defense information to the Arabs. Although Mr. Sharett expressed the hope that Egypt might still have a change of heart which would alleviate the entire situation in the Middle East, this could not be counted upon and that, therefore, the US-Israel association would have to assume a very special character. He concluded this theme by saying that this was one point on which he wished the Secretary to know his thinking.

Another subject which Mr. Sharett felt that he was obliged to mention was the Jewish population still in Soviet Russia in connection with which he wanted to emphasize the tragic situation of Soviet Jewry. He said there appeared to be absolutely no hope for improvement of their condition nor for their escape except for so few which he described as only a trickle which occasionally got through to Greece. Not only are there still 1,750,000 Jews in Soviet Russia, but there are also two and a half million in Rumania and possibly 50,000 elsewhere. All of these should in principle find their way to Israel but, even if it were possible for them to get away and immigrate into Israel, it would throw a terrific burden on an impoverished country. He said the problem of taking care of even the trickle that comes from those countries with high hope to re-establish itself in Israel is a major one and that the stopping of all immigration of this kind may even have to be considered. However, so long as it is not absolutely necessary to interfere, Israel does not want to stop these people from coming in. He mentioned that practically all of the Jews from Bulgaria, Poland and Czechoslovakia have been absorbed. Mr. Sharett said that the Secretary is well aware of how the Soviet regime writes off ethnic elements for which it no longer has any use. He explained that in the last world war this savage policy did not affect the Jews in Russia because Russia was fighting Germany, the arch enemy of Jewish people. Now, however, should a new world-war break out, it would not be likely for Russia to have much consideration for the Jews within its borders. Nevertheless, five million Jews will be ready to fight the Russians. What Mr. Sharett said he was trying to convey was that we must do all possible not to hasten the extermination of Jewery in the Soviet Union.

Veering off to another subject, he said that in addition to the problems facing Israel, there is another looming up very fast and that is the Arab world vis-à-vis the West. He said our combined interests naturally favor Israel's firm association with the West and specifically with the United States. But, because of Israel's geographic position, it would not be advisable for such association to be too formally established. He said that neither of us wants war and knowing this, he feels certain that the United States must be trying to come to an arrangement with the Arab world, of the value of whose potential help the United States could not be but fully aware. In view of this, Mr. Sharett thought that it would be of particular help to us if it were possible to say that Israel is not part or parcel of MEC. He added that the US would be helping itself best if Israel kept apart, and furthermore explained that if Israel joined, it would only be an additional provocation to the Soviets. He said that he viewed this particularly in the light of the tragic fact that, as he had previously mentioned, there are so many Jews in Russia who would become the victims of Russian ire and who must by every possible means be protected from extermination.

Having outlined the foregoing, Mr. Sharett made the suggestion that continued talks between the heads of states are in order. Mr. Sharett said that he had already suggested to Britain that serious exchange of views should take place with a view to heading off disaster.

Mr. Sharett then expressed his and his country's appreciation for the assistance it was receiving from the United States which is helping Israel to get stronger and stronger, and then said that even this is not enough; that more concrete help is needed by Israel in order to develop its road system, other public facilities, and more purposefully to expand Israel's industrial apparatus. He told the Secretary that Israel preferred to take the initiative in these matters and that he was perfectly willing to go to the Departments of State and Defense with a view to developing closer cooperation with the US should any emergency arise. He said that the Israeli Prime Minister had already outlined to Ambassador Davis much of the foregoing but that he felt this program so important that he wished to bring it to the Secretary's attention personally.

Continuing the conversation, Mr. Sharett once again referred to Israel's relationship with Soviet Russia. He asked the Secretary not to become concerned if at times Israel feels that it must and consequently takes Soviet Russia into consideration in the carrying out of its policies. He explained that it is all part of the problem of protecting the Jews in Russia, and pointed out that Israel's talks with Russia could actually prove of help and certainly of use to the United States. He said: "We, of course, intend keeping you informed."

The Secretary listened attentively to Mr. Sharett and thanked him for speaking so frankly his mind on the various subjects covered. He told him that with this knowledge of Israel's thinking, it naturally made it easier for us particularly with reference to the developing of our ideas in regard to the Middle East which, because of recent events, called for frequent changes of thought. The Secretary mentioned the Middle East Command with regard to which the planning is going forward with the idea of having a command nucleus available for use when needed and which in such an event would become a central point for Middle East cooperation. Such centralization in time of peace would provide an organization for emergencies to enable countries to take part if they wanted to do so, and that this was being emphasized in present talks between all countries concerned. At this stage the establishing of such a hub would have its advantages over the development of a vast military organization. Mr. Sharett agreed but maintained that Israel preferred to be in direct touch with the United States and British authorities concerned rather than through a combined command at this stage of developments.

Mr. Sharett then took up matters pertaining to the General Assembly agenda with specific reference to the Palestine item, saying that he felt that a certain chapter might now come logically to a close. He seemed to refer to the chapter on conciliation, saying that the PCC might be terminated. He praised highly Ambassadors Davis and Palmer and commended the French representative, Léon Marchal, for the contributions he had made, as well as the Turkish member which he referred to as an elder statesman. Mr. Sharett said that if the PCC had not achieved the results that it may have set out to obtain, it was no fault of its own. He said that nevertheless it had failed in its objective and that this now called for an examination. He said that at this juncture three complexities faced Israel and the United States, listing them as follows:

(a) security—which is covered by armistice agreements, General Riley being backed by the SC. This to be continued;

(b) the human problem of refugees in respect to which the United Nations has universally accepted that this work is to go on. He mentioned that the US had voted $15,000,000* for resettlement and then said that the refugee situation should be taken entirely out of the peace problem and that the resettlement of these people should get under way.

(c) the whole complexity of interstate relations between Israel and the Arab states. Somewhat bitterly, he alluded to the complete cessation of the exchange of goods between them. He mentioned that the United Nations had succeeded only partly in solving this problem; that Mr. Bunche had done everything he possibly could, but that a peace settlement still remained in abeyance.

Mr. Sharett made a point with reference to the foregoing that the mere existence of a UN organization serves to retard results rather than solve the problems. He said: "The Commission talks to Israel and the Commission talks to the Arabs, but nothing comes of it." He said that in his Government's opinion it is just a waste of talent and personnel as well as money, besides being harmful. The net result is that Israel holds on to one position and the Arabs hold on to another position and yet both are members of the United Nations. His suggestion is that so long as no war conflagration has to be coped with, both parties to the dispute should be left alone and given time to iron out their difficulties; that the United Nations should refrain from interceding in the existing controversy. He assured the Secretary that he was certain that a peace settlement could be worked out between the contending parties because where there is a will there is bound to be a way. Gen. Riley, he said, should be equipped with full powers.

In commenting toward the end of the conversation on what Mr. Sharett had said, the Secretary agreed that the American analysis of the situation in general did not differ very much from that of the Israelis. Mr. Sharett once again referred to the yearly grants which Israel had received and for which the Government, Parliament and people of Israel were so appreciative. He then reminded the Secretary that application for next year's grant was being prepared now, and said that at least $125,000,000 would be needed. In this connection he solicited the Secretary's assistance in having the US administration support the application for the grant. Mr. Acheson made a sympathetic but noncommittal reply.

Mr. Sharett once more referred to Israel as a very poor country ravished by two thousand years of exploitation, where no raw materials to speak of are available, and that consequently everything needed for the development of a nation would have to be poured into it. He referred to Israel's claims for help from Germany in recognition of the untold damage done to the Jews by the Hitler regime and in referring to Mr. Adenauer having accepted in principle to help, Mr. Sharett tried to solicit US sympathy and particularly action to support Germanian tried to solicit US sympathy and particularly action to support Germanian tried to solicit US sympathy and particularly action to support Germanian tried to solicit US sympathy and particularly action to support Germanian tried to solicit US sympathy and particularly action to support Germanian tried to solicit US sympathy and particularly action to support Germanian tried to solicit US sympathy and particularly action to support Germanian tried to solicit US sympathy and particularly action to support Germanian tried to solicit US sympathy and particularly action to support Germanian tried to solicit US sympathy and particularly action to support Germanian tried to solicit US sympathy and particularly action to support Germanian tried tried man payments in kind to Israel. He mentioned in this connection that negotiations between Israel and Germany were being undertaken and that he wanted American help in order to get help for Israel. The Secretary pointed out to Mr. Sharett that he had been listening with much sympathy to what he had had to say but that in respect to the latter subject the fact had to be taken into consideration that payments, whether in kind or otherwise, to be made by Germany would in a considerable measure and in the last analysis have to be borne by us. This would throw a further burden on our resources, with which the Secretary could not be in sympathy.

Mr. Sharett expressed his disappointment at this response and then took leave.

505. Dept's 345, Nov 10.2 In view certainty Israel will approach US for substantial increase over current figure for econ grant in aid fiscal 1953 Emb believes fol desirable course action:

- 1. To suggest in advance to Israel Govt and Israel advocates in US need to relate US aid to Israel to basic factors affecting foreign relations of Israel and of US in ME. Friends of Israel shld be made aware of dangers implicit in approach such as was made by Israel in March 1951 in disregard all attendant circumstances except Israel's need for funds, when harm was done to our policy objectives and to Israel-Arab relations.
- 2. Israel's requirements shid be stated in terms of Israel's international balance sheet to take into account indebtedness for compensation due to Palestine refugees. This indebtedness shid be liquidated as promptly as its amount can be assessed by UN, as matter of equal priority with Israel's current cash needs.
- 3. In putting forward its request Israel shid relate requirements Israel over-all development program and grant in aid role therein clearly defined; shid emphasize needs to settle Jewish refugees already arrived and unassimilated, Israel's intentions to make its way within limits of present frontiers (armistice lines), and intentions limit military actions to self defense and area defense.

*Telegram 345 to Tel Aviv, November 10, not printed, stated that a representative of the Israeli Embassy in Washington had on November 9 submitted a "preliminary draft" note requesting economic assistance for fiscal year 1953 totaling $126 million, without including reference to grant military assistance. (884A.00 TA/11-1051) On November 19, Ambassador Eban handed Assistant Secretary McGhee a note formally requesting a grant of this amount from the U.S. Government for fiscal year 1953.

4. Planning shid be precise enough to enable US aid mission to use as basis for daily pressure to assure proper handling of resources; it shid set priorities, i.e. farm development over urban housing, and timetables of production, import and export targets with terminal date of aid program in mind.

5. Plans of Israel to increase population through ingathering, shld be related in planning to absorptive capacity of country.

Delga 305. Subj: Palestine. Nov 21 Jessup and staff members consulted with Blandford. Jessup outlined Dept's position on possibility locating repatriation and compensation functions of PCC in UNWRA. Blandford strongly opposed this for following reasons going so far as to say it might threaten success of his program.

1. UNWRA has been able establish considerable good will with Arab govts as non-political agency working solely on refugee care and maintenance, resettlement and reintegration. Addition of political issues wld create serious obstacles. Obviously UNWRA work handicapped by political developments but now it is able maintain degree of detachment from political questions which wld be impossible if repatriation and compensation functions transferred to UNWRA.

2. There is relatively little relationship between compensation which might come from Israel and refugee care and reintegration program since small percentage (Blandford hazarded guess 20 percent) of refugees presently cared for by UNWRA wild be eligible for compensation.

gees presently cared for by UNWRA wld be eligible for compensation.

3. Political issues including repatriation and compensation can best be handled by separate individual working with Arab Govts, taking problems up piece by piece. Blandford gave blocked accounts and possible minor territorial adjustments as possible face-saving device as illustrations. In response to question re Israeli proposal for payments into UNWRA capital fund Blandford said such payments wld pollute the fund and make it difficult for Arabs to accept payment for assistance from this source.

Re position of Palestine item on agenda, Blandford indicated Arab states had expressed some interest in having discussion of PCC report and UNWRA report separated. He agreed and felt it desirable to get major political discussions out of way on PCC report and have discussion of UNWRA report restricted to technical and financial aspects of program.

Blandford agreed PCC shld be liquidated. Riley's views and functions not discussed with Blandford.

Delga 307. Re: Palestine. Evening Nov 20 Jessup and staff held preliminary discussion with Gen Riley (Gadel 182)<sup>1</sup> re GA action to place PCC function assisting political settlement in hand successor machinery, assuming abolition PCC. Jessup initially asked Riley how far he himself cld go in attempts bring parties together for negots under his authority as Chairman MACs, and asked his views re termination PCC. Riley replied he felt able, in his present capacity, to call for bilateral discussions between Israelis and particular Arab state, but such discussions or negots wld be limited to scope to possible revision armistice agrmts. He said he favored liquidation PCC but with some agency in reserve on whom parties cld call if they wished, or if situation developed favorable to initiating negots among parties. He added that Arabs, in particular, wld probably wish some UN rep assist in such negots.

He believes responsibility for moving toward further negots rests clearly with the parties and not with UN, though latter shid have a person or agency available to assist or recommend if suitable climate develops. Shid opportunity develop for negots, he feels better progress wild be made on bilateral rather than multilateral basis, since crucial problems are at issue between Israel and Egypt (Gaza) and Israel and Syria (Huleh), with Jordan and Lebanon indirectly affected. He feels Egypt is key to progress.

In response Jessup's suggestion GA cld grant Riley a broader political authority, he replied that wld be needed if, in addition his present functions in connection armistice agrmts, it were intended he shid deal with political problems beyond scope of armistice agrmts. Riley seemed quite receptive to Jessup's suggestion and thought GA cld adopt broad formula saying chief of staff is available for work in political field. Sense of mtg was that, while Riley's present powers stem from armistice agrmts, as confirmed by SC, GA cld properly authorize attribution additional political functions to chief of staff and request him assume them. Jessup asked Gen if he thought such GA action might "backfire" or cause parties to shun political negots. Riley replied parties need a little push, but initiative wld have to come from them and, under present conditions, primarily from Israelis. He did not feel that such GA action wld handicap his present work under armistice agrmt. He felt under above general formula he wld have authority discuss political problems with parties on bilateral basis which he considers indispensable. He said certain measure separate dealing with parties necessary in any case since armistice agrmts are strictly bilateral instruments. Jessup and staff suggested GA might invest chief of TSO with general authority of assist parties in field of polit settlement and Riley agreed.

Riley is convinced that French attempting perpetuate PCC in order assert their interests in Near East. He recalled that in 1949 they had wished keep him out of Palestine. USGADel staff indicated Turkish thinking leans direction continuance PCC, but without such strong feeling as French.

Jessup inquired Riley's reaction our thinking that problems refugee repatriation and compensation ought to be taken out of political sphere and placed in humanitarian sphere. Riley strongly agreed, but said there is almost no prospect of repatriation. Question who shid be vested with responsibility re repatriation and compensation was not further pursued.

CONFIDENTIAL

[Paris,] November 23, 1951.

Subject: Trygve Lie's Ideas Concerning the Future of the Palestine Conciliation Commission and Refugee Organization

Gross and I ran into Trygve Lie this afternoon and had tea with him. He was full of a discussion he had had last night with Eden, at which Lie put up to Eden his ideas concerning the future of the PCC and the Palestine refugee organization. In brief the essence of Lie's "plan" is to set up in New York a UN Middle East Committee consisting of Egypt, Syria, Israel, Turkey, Greece, U.S.A., United Kingdom, France, either Iran or Pakistan, either Argentina or Chile. This committee would advise Riley, who would be given the PCC conciliation functions, and Blandford, who would continue as refugee director. The PCC and the refugee advisory committee would be abolished. Lie said that Eden seemed impressed by this idea. He said he thought the Arabs would like it, also Israel. He said he thought it was a fine thing to get the Arabs and the Israelis to work together on a committee.

Lie said he also discussed this idea with Azzam Pasha who thought it was a good idea but wanted to consult some of the Arab experts.

Lie asked me to tell you that he would like very soon to spend an evening with you and Azzam Pasha.

I told Lie that we were thinking of a somewhat simpler approach, that we tended to agree with his ideas concerning the assignment of functions to Riley and Blandford and the abolition of the PCC and the refugee advisory committee. I said that we, however, were thinking of trying to develop as simple an approach as possible and I questioned him about what he expected this UN Middle East Committee to do. I said that I would, of course, pass his ideas along.

There is no question that Lie, who clearly has an idée fixe on this subject, will continue to press it in various quarters. My own instinctive reaction to it is quite strongly negative, but I have no doubt you will want to have it fully considered by the staff.

Editorial Note

On November 29, the Director of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, John B. Blandford, Jr., together with the Advisory Commission of the Agency, submitted a special report (U.N. Doc. A/1905/Add. 1) containing recommendations for the future conduct of the program of assistance to Palestine refugees. The report requested the General Assembly to endorse and urge contributions for a $250 million program of assistance to Near Eastern governments for the relief and reintegration of Palestine refugees, to be carried out over a period of approximately 3 years starting July 1, 1951. It was proposed that the program provide $50 million for relief and $200 million for reintegration, with local governments assuming the maximum possible administrative responsibility at the earliest date. The report stated further that every effort should be made by the Agency and the governments to arrange for the transfer of relief administration to the governments not later than July 1, 1952. It was recommended that expenditures for relief be reduced in suitable proportion to expenditures for reintegration, with both ceasing at the end of the period.

Paris, November 29, 1951—11 p. m.

Delga 424. Re Palestine: US GADel staff offers for Dept's consideration fol analysis of situation after discussion with Riley and Blandford (Delga's 305 and 307).

1. Re position paper proposal for transfer general political functions including mediation to Riley and repatriation and compensation to Blandford under resolution such as contained Dept's position paper (SD/A/C.1/373):<sup>2</sup>

Riley is agreeable to plan insofar as his functions affected, and we feel that such course is practicable. Lie, Bunche and Cordier also seem favorable. However, Blandford disagrees insofar as his functions wld be affected.

A. In favor transfer repatriation and compensation to Blandford are fol factors:

(1) Consolidation all refugee questions within one agency most effective course from administrative and budgetary standpoint;

(2) Control of UN activities with respect to repatriation and compensation more easily managed by agency with full range of responsibility on refugee problems. Past experience indicates UNRWA has regarded activities by parallel bodies harmful and obstructive. Overlapping wld thus be avoided.

(3) Favorable Congressional appropriations for refugee relief and resettlement might be facilitated if Israel's compensation obligation is related administratively or at least to UNRWA activity;

(4) Transfer these functions to UNRWA, a body already dealing with major share of refugee problems, might be expected produce less heated political discussion in GA than resort to more transparent shelving device;

(5) Transfer such responsibility to UN body or individual with no other activities to justify existence wld subject such body to opposition now attached to PCC and continue to focus attention on ineffectiveness UN in these problems.

B. Factors against such course:

(1) As pointed out in Delga 305, effectiveness UNRWA work cld be gravely impaired if it were saddled with what Arabs still consider basic political issue;

(2) British have informally indicated they do not favor;

(3) Blandford's vigorous opposition to transfer any new functions to UNRWA rests on belief;

(a) Compensation payments wld go largely to others than those now on agency relief rolls;

(b) Disputes over issues such as amount of total compensation due and division of available sums between claimants wld lead UNRWA into relationships disastrous to reintegration plans;

(c) Saddling UNRWA with repatriation wld also undermine its prospects success in more practical programs for which it responsible;

- (d) Retention within political agency of office for refugee claims wld not prevent administrative linking compensation and reintegration in individual cases when appropriate;
- (4) Arabs likely resist transfer of this important political function to a technical, economic agency.
- 2. Re transfer general political functions plus responsibility for repatriation and compensation to Riley.

A. Fol considerations favor this solution:

(1) Consolidation all political activities in one individual avoids overlapping and simplifies organization and administration;

(2) Maintaining principles of repatriation and compensation within agency having other functions to justify its existence might call less attention to ineffectualness of UN these matters;

(3) Maintenance of recognized political character repatriation and compensation questions wld reassure Arabs.

B. Fol factors against this solution:

(1) Riley's probable inability to accomplish anything re compensation might easily impair his usefulness in Arab eyes in discharging his TSO functions;

(2) Such course amounts to hand-over present unsatisfactory

PCC terms reference to single individual;

(3) Extension Riley's functions might not prove acceptable to parties;

- (4) Riley's feeling that attribution to him of repatriation and compensation functions wld impair his prospects of effective exercise conciliation function.
- 3. Fol factors with respect to each of solutions envisaged sections 1 and 2 above must also be considered:

A. Division of PCC functions between Riley and Blandford might lay US open to charges of attempted American domination;

- B. French desire remain represented on PCC or successor political body dealing with NE problems likely to lessen prospect their active support for resolution like that Dept proposes. Possibility somewhat similar Turkish attitude must also be born in mind.
- 4. Re transfer general political role as well as repatriation and compensation to Riley plus an advisory commission to Riley on his new functions only:

A. Fol considerations favor this course over 2 above:

(1) French opposition might be lessened with opportunity for representation on advisory commission;

(2) Objections based on alleged American attempts at domination might be reduced.

B. Fol considerations against this solution;

(1) Does not overcome basic objections to transfer repatriation and compensation to Riley as described under 2-B above;

(2) Creation new advisory commission perpetuates multiplicity UN bodies for Palestine and confusion of responsibility.

5. Further possibility might be creation of new office or commission with hdqtrs in New York whose membership might be slightly expanded beyond present composition PCC. Scope of activity such new body cld range from present over-all political role of PCC to more limited role of technical functions in fields of compensation and repatriation. If such body had over-all political responsibility, including repatriation and compensation Riley's present functions wld not be enlarged. Alternatively, if technical commission or special office under SYG were vested with sole responsibility in repatriation and compensation fields, Riley cld be given broad political functions not including those two questions.

A. Fol factors favor this solution:

(1) Such a body (particularly if given over-all political role) wld probably appeal to French and Turks;

(2) Such body wld be away from area and cld reduce its activities to a desirable minimum and avoid friction with Riley and Blandford, either of whom cld consult with such body if desired; such body cld be available if and when attitudes of parties warranted active consideration compensation and other questions.

B. Fol factors against such solution:

(1) Creation new body perpetuates multiplicity agencies dealing with problem;

2) With little likelihood such body cld accomplish anything UN wld remain butt of widespread criticism now directed at PCC.

- (3) Real difficulties in drafting terms of reference which parties wild not deem in violation principles established in earlier GA resolutions on question.
- 6. Re continuation PCC with hdgtrs in New York, but with authority to meet elsewhere as needed, to consider proposals from the parties and to take such action thereon as circumstances permit.

A. Fol factors favor this solution:

- (1) Such course can least of all be interpreted as designed to shelve compensation and repatriation issues or to cancel out rights and obligations of parties laid down in previous GA resolutions; hence might minimize debate in GA;
  - (2) British now seem favor this solution: (3) French and Turks probably favorable;

(4) Opportunity wld continue exist for any practical steps leading to negots for compensation agreement;

(5) With commission in New York focus of attention Arab states and refugees might shift to practical programs of UNRWA and TSO.

B. Fol factors against this solution:

(1) Cld still elicit Arab charge UN was avoiding coming to grips with repatriation and compensation issues;

(2) PCC's outmoded terms of reference wld continue be obstacle to any practical results.

7. Comment: On basis foregoing analysis, staff convinced essential to re-examine position in SD/A/C.1/373 since it seems impossible of realization without threatening effective future operations of Blandford and Riley. We are impressed with difficulty devising a separate agency to handle repatriation and compensation problems for which justification convincing to parties can be made. We are also keenly aware of delicate and uncertain status MEC, which may be fundamental to future of security and stability of ME. We feel that, if time is allowed for Arab adjustment to establishment MEC, pieces now causing area instability might fall gradually into place. With specific reference to Palestine question we believe US should be guided by idea of doing nothing at present re MEC which would further complicate the already delicate situation by further arousing Arab sensibilities, which have already been worked up by Moroccan and Egyptian issues.

With full recognition of the disadvantages of continuing PCC on less active basis, we are impressed with possibilities inherent in course outlined in section 6 above. On this basis we wild envisage concentration on improvement of PRA program and leaving Riley's operation untouched. PCC (based normally at New York) wild operate on standby basis and remain unobtrusively available to assist under more favorable political conditions.

If explorations here shid indicate willingness of parties, especially Arabs, to accept transfer of political functions to Riley without specific mention of repatriation and compensation functions, wild Dept see any objection to this course? This wild mean authority to deal with subject was implicit in Riley's terms of reference, but he wild not have mandate to take specific action. In evaluating this course it is essential to weigh possibility Arab disappointment over inaction on repatriation and compensation undermining confidence in Riley's TSO operations.

CONFIDENTIAL

[Washington,] November 30, 1951.

Subject: Visit of the Israel Ambassador.

Participants: Mr. Webb, Acting Secretary

H. E. Abba Eban, Israel Ambassador

Mr. Theodore Kollek, Minister, Embassy of Israel

GER—Mr. Lewis NE—Mr. Waldo

The Israel Ambassador called at his own request to discuss three matters: (1) Israel demand for reparations from Germany; (2) Israel's attitude toward the Middle East Command and Middle East defense; and (3) Israel's request for aid from the United States for the coming year.

1. The Ambassador outlined generally Israel's position on reparations from Germany and referred to previous discussions in the Department and the earlier Israel note 2 on this question and the Department's reply thereto.3 He deplored the fact that the Western Powers were apparently preparing to welcome Germany back into the Community of Nations, and said that this would be tantamount to rewarding the Germans' evil doing. In connection with Israel's request for reparations, Israel considered a step forward Chancellor Adenauer's statement concerning Germany's recognition of its guilt toward the Jews and its obligation to pay its just debts.4 The Ambassador felt that further and more concrete evidences of Germany's good intentions were necessary, however. He was aware of the US position in this matter: that Israel should negotiate directly with Germany on the question of reparations, but said that Israel could not take such a step at this time in view of public opinion in Israel, which was strongly against such a move. He referred to the fact that a group of American citizens representing certain American-Jewish organizations had recently discussed the overall problem with me. Nahum Goldmann, Chairman of the American Section of the Jewish Agency, who had participated in these discussions, would shortly take up the problem with Chancellor Adenauer. Although no Israel official would participate in these talks, the Israel claim was the principal one outstanding and would therefore be covered by Mr. Goldmann. The Ambassador said that he hoped Mr. McCloy would give his strongest support to the principal of these discussions and would urge the Germans to cooperate.

The Ambassador handed me a note <sup>5</sup> which he said was in reply to our note on reparations, with the request that the Israel position be supported vis-à-vis the Germans. I told the Ambassador that I would read the note most carefully and would refer it to the officers of the Bureau of German Affairs for study and comment. Mr. Lewis said that the Ambassador knew what our position was in this matter and that we still felt that Israel should make every effort to negotiate directly with Germany as soon as that were politically feasible.<sup>6</sup>

The Department's reply to the Israeli note of November 30 was contained in a note of January 24, 1952, which read in part as follows:

&quot;The United States Government has been and is of the opinion that a settlement of the Israel claim against Germany should be effected through direct negotiations between the Israel Government and the Government of the German Federal Republic. Thus it is gratified that the Israel Government requested and obtained parliamentary authorization to accept the German Federal Government's offer to negotiate such a settlement. The United States Government will await with sympathetic interest the outcome of the negotiations." (262.84A41/11–3051)

2. The Israel Ambassador reviewed generally Israel's attitude toward the MEC and Middle East defense, and again reiterated Israel's desire to cooperate with the West without any formal commitment for relationship to the incipient Middle East Command. The Ambassador summarized the Israel position, which was identical with Israel's views expressed to the American Embassy in Tel Aviv by the Prime Minister of Israel, and to Mr. McGhee by the Ambassador himself. He mentioned the following new development:

The Israel Government had informed the British Government that Israel was now prepared to continue with Britain the preliminary and tentative discussions which had been held in Israel last February between General Robertson and Prime Minister Ben Gurion. I told the Ambassador that, with regard to Israel's attitude toward the Middle East, we were appreciative of their views; that I thought it was very possible it might be determined that an informal relationship between Israel and the MEC might be in the best interests of everyone, but that this matter would have to be worked out in due course. So far as the discussions between the Israel Government and the British were concerned we were glad to be informed that they would take place and welcomed them, but, as the Ambassador well knew, we were not yet at the point where we were prepared to enter into similar discussions.

3. On grant-aid the Ambassador said that he had recently submitted to Mr. McGhee a note on behalf of his Government requesting $126 million. He said that this request embodied Israel's economic needs as represented by the estimated gap in its balance of payments for the coming year. He expressed the hope that the US would give strong consideration to the request. I told him that we would certainly take the Israel request into account in studying plans for economic assistance to Israel in the coming fiscal year.

Damascus, December 3, 1951—4 p. m.

319. ReLegtel 286, November 18.2 On three recent visits to all Syro-Israel demilitarized zones with Asst Army Attaché I obtained much clearer picture basic issues involved. My impressions reported in full by despatch 3 and illustrated by photographs are as follows:

1. Drainage project eminently worthwhile and one only wonders why it was not undertaken before.

2. Equally clear that zone question is by far most important single issue between Syrian mil auths and Israel, and difficult see why Israel has not in spirit of compromise seized this golden opportunity improve prospect of friendly relations with Syria.

3. Both upper zone and most of Al Hummeh salient 100% Arab and logically fall within Syrian sphere. Nevertheless, they represent smaller compensation than I had imagined for benefits Israel will undoubtedly gain when question of sovereignty is settled.

4. I am impressed by Syrian fears as to adverse effects on its defensive military position opposite Huleh Lake and Swamu which are now for most part unfortified, but argument for water line as defensive position on Jordan in central zone not impressive. Syrians have persuasive argument, however, that line along Jordan River south of Huleh and through part of Tiberias essential in order prevent incidents from cattle grazing, fishing, and similar activities engaged in by Syrians and formerly covered by bon voisinage agreement with Palestine. Conditions now are vastly different from when mandate line drawn after First World War. Syrians point out if old mandate line becomes final boundary Israel will possess strip of territory ten meters wide along entire Syrian shore on Tiberias north of Nugelb. It seems to us Syrians have valid point this wld entail explosive potentialities.

5. Major Jaddid, Syrian member MAC who accompanied us, believes settlement meeting all legitimate Israeli needs can be arranged. He says Syria willing enter into agreement perhaps along with Jordan and Lebanon guarantee Arabs will not use more Jordan River water than at present; this consists mainly of irrigation for Buteiha and it would be impracticable for Syrians siphon off Jordan water between Tiberias and Huleh. However, he was equally firm in declaring Syria and Lebanon could greatly diminish flow of Jordan to Israel by manipulating tributaries shld Israelis fail agree on reasonable settlement. Israel thus has vital stake in reaching agreement.

6. There are many evidences of Israeli fortifications on zone contrary armistice agreement since May 18 especially on hill above Ein Gev. We saw other evidences Israeli non-compliance May 18 resolution only shortly balanced by presence roadblocks below Al Hummeh probably erected with Syrian help.

7. We talked with 2 of 25 zone Arabs who reportedly escaped from Shaab via Lebanon. They described Israeli practices including physical abuse which if true are shocking revelation as to why Arab evacuees changed their minds about returning to zone (Legtel's 707, June 7 4 and 6, July 5).5

8. Further harm can be done to our RPC UN prestige, US relations with Syria, and prospects future Israeli peace agreement with Syrians if Security Council orders expropriation Arab-owned land for drainage project without Syrian agreement.

I was encouraged to find Jaddid sincerely anxious resolve zone questions, and to hear him say he joined in my wishes. He is highly regarded by De Page of UNRWA who says he is most objective and cooperative of Syrians officials. We concur. It is of interest it was he who first suggested water line to Mazim Qudsi (Legtel 404, February 20). He seems close to Shishikli.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Director of the Office of Near Eastern Affairs (Jones)

CONFIDENTIAL

[Washington,] December 5, 1951.

Subject: Discussion with the Ambassador of Israel re 1) Future of PCC; 2) Opportunity Missed; 3) Condemned Iraqi Jews; and 4) Shishikli and Syria.

Participants: H. E. Abba Eban, Ambassador of Israel G. Lewis Jones—NE

Israeli Ambassador Eban invited me to lunch with him today. The general discussion can be summarized as follows:

1. Future of PCC: Ambassador Eban said that Mr. Sharett had been disturbed by Mr. Lie's idea of an eleven-member committee to carry on the work of PCC. Israel believed PCC had outlived its usefulness. Heretofore Israel had thought and talked in terms of peace with the Arab States but it had now come around to the conclusion that a general peace settlement with all of the Arabs is a long way off; this is true also of peace settlements with individual Arab States. Ambassador Eban said that his Government is now convinced of the great importance of the Armistice Agreements to peace and stability in the Middle East. These agreements were signed documents. They could be altered by agreement of the parties and such alterations, including alterations in Armistice lines, need not receive wide publicity. He thought in the present circumstances it was easier for both the Arab States and Israel to operate within the framework of the armistices. For this reason, Israel hoped that whatever happened General Riley's relationship to the Armistice Agreements would remain unchanged. General Riley's title might be changed but he is fundamentally the guardian of the armistices and such he should remain.

Under his aegis, Israel might work out in the MACs settlements of outstanding problems with individual Arab States. If such settlements should continue to be called "armistice agreements" that was all right with Israel.

I said that there was the question of what should be done with "compensation" and "repatriation"; these were very important to the Arabs and must be taken care of if great discussion was to be avoided in Paris.

Ambassador Eban suggested that since these two points have to do with the Arab refugees, he thought that they should be assigned to Mr. Blandford.

I took strong exception to the idea of loading "repatriation" and "compensation" on Blandford. I said that the UNRWA in its resettlement activities had not yet kept up with the birthrate. Just as I agreed that General Riley should not be loaded down with jobs which would make his truce-keeping more difficult, so Mr. Blandford should not carry the extra weight of these political problems. I said that Blandford himself felt that his resettlement efforts would be jeopardized if he were given "compensation" and "resettlement".

Ambassador Eban said he was not aware that Blandford held this view and seemed impressed by the argument that nothing should impede refugee resettlement.

I told Ambassador Eban that we had taken no decision on this matter; that there were various schools of thought, one of which included an inactive residuary legatee of PCC at the New York head-quarters of UN.

2. Opportunity Missed: I could not resist telling Ambassador Eban, on a strictly personal basis, that I thought Israel may have muffed a chance during the recent PCC meetings. I said that there was no need for me to reiterate with him our idea that the "orthodox" approach of Israel towards peace with the Arabs had shown no results and was unlikely to do so. He knew that we favored the "unorthodox" approach. In the case of PCC, Israel had let itself get into the hands of "orthodox" lawyers. Instead of the Israeli side of the story as printed by PCC being a bold avowal of their willingness to make sacrifices to live at peace with its neighbors—a document which we could cite to Israel's detractors—instead the Israeli story was the closely reasoned, legalistic "orthodox" line. I said that we would never know whether Israel had taken the right or wrong decision, but there were those of us who had hoped that Israel would not stand upon technicalities and ceremonies but would make full use of the PCC forum. To my surprise, Eban did not take issue with me on this point; on the contrary, I had the feeling that his sympathy with the "unorthodox" approach might be growing.

- 3. Condemned Iraqi Jews: Ambassador Eban said that Mr. Kollek would be coming to see me shortly to discuss the case of the condemned Iraqi Jews. He said that irrespective of the facts of the case (Israeli information showed that the evidence and trial were not all they should have been) a far better approach to the Iraqis would be not to find fault with their legal procedures but to raise the question of the general desirability of showing clemency to the condemned Jews by committing their sentence to life imprisonment. Ambassador Eban said that Israel had had a number of cases involving Arabs, in some instances espionage by Arabs, in which the death sentence was fully justified. However, on political grounds Israel had decided not to execute the men. He hoped that Iraq would take a similar line. I gave no substantive reply.
- 4. Shishikli and Syria: Ambassador Eban asked for information regarding developments in Syria. I told him the facts of the Syrian coup and mentioned the fact that it was Colonel Zaim who signed the Armistice with Israel. I said that it was my understanding that the Syrian military is dissatisfied with the present situation along the Israel-Syrian Armistice line; they would like to see this liquidated.

Ambassador Eban remarked that he thought Shishikli might be a force for good in Syria. He said also that there were in the armies of the Arab States generally some good young captains and majors who know their business and were reasonable men.

The Acting Secretary of State to the Ambassador of Israel (Eban) 1

Washington, December 7, 1951.

EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to refer to current negotiations between representatives of the Government of Israel and representatives of the Government of the United States of America looking to the conclusion of an agreement for a program of economic assistance and technical cooperation and the relief and resettlement of refugees as authorized in the United States Mutual Security Act of 1951. Pending the conclusion of a comprehensive agreement concerning this program, which is now under study, and in order to provide emergency economic assistance to Israel as authorized in the Mutual Security Act of 1951, I am setting forth below certain principles and procedures on which our two governments have reached agreement.

1. In accordance with Section 511(b) of the Mutual Security Act, assurance is requested that the Israel Government has agreed to join with the United States Government in promoting international understanding and good-will and in maintaining world peace and to undertake such action as they may mutually agree upon to alleviate the causes for international tension.

2. The United States understands that the Israel Government has taken careful note of the provisions of the United States Mutual Security Act of 1951 and the laws mentioned therein under which assistance may be provided, and that it intends to conclude an agreement with the United States Government as required by those provisions.

3. Pending the conclusion of this comprehensive agreement, however, my Government understands that the Israel Government has an immediate requirement of $25,730,000 to pay for certain materials delivered by suppliers and shipped to Israel since July 1, 1951, materials now ready for shipment and delivery, and new purchases urgently required, all of which are for refugee and relief projects in Israel. In recognition of this need the United States Government will make available beginning immediately up to $25,730,000, out of funds authorized under Section 205 of the Mutual Security Act of 1951, to pay for these materials and such services as may be mutually agreed upon. Payments out of this sum will be made under appropriate procedures to be mutually agreed upon.

4. It is understood that such immediate requirements may include up to $14,230,000 of current unpaid dollar obligations for refugee relief and resettlement projects or for reimbursement for payments for deliveries effected since July 1, 1951 of materials comprising parts of such relief and resettlement projects.

5. As a further means of carrying out the purposes for which the assistance made available by the United States Government is being provided, the Israel Government will deposit in a special account in the name of the Israel Government not less than the Israel pound equivalent, according to the official rate of exchange, of the dollar sums which may be paid under this agreement. Such deposits will be made from time to time upon notification to the Israel Government by the United States Government that payment has been made pursuant to this understanding. The sums required to be deposited in this special account shall be adjusted to conform with any change in the basis of computation of the amounts to be deposited that may hereafter be agreed upon. The sums in this Israel Government account shall be held or used for such purposes as may be agreed to between our two governments in furtherance of economic and technical assistance and the relief and resettlement of refugees.

6. The Israel Government and the United States Government will establish procedures whereby the Israel Government will so deposit, segregate, or assure title to all funds allocated to or derived from any program of assistance undertaken by the United States Government so that such funds shall not be subject to garnishment, attachment, seizure, or other legal process by any person, firm, agency, corporation, organization, or government when in the opinion of the United States Government such legal process would interfere with the attainment of the objectives of the program of assistance.

If the Israel Government agrees that the foregoing represents an accurate statement of the understanding of our two governments on this matter, I should appreciate receiving from you a written acknowledgment of this fact so that this note and your reply thereto may constitute an interim agreement between our two governments on this subject.

Accept [etc.]

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note dated December 7, 1951 referring to current negotiations between representatives of the Government of the United States and representatives of the Government of Israel looking to the conclusion of an agreement for a program of economic assistance and technical cooperation, and the relief and resettlement of refugees, as authorized in the United States Mutual Security Act of 1951.

I have the honor to confirm that the principles and procedures which you enumerate in your note of December 7, 1951 are those on which our two governments have reached agreement, and that the aforementioned note contains an accurate understanding of our two governments in this matter.

The Government of Israel wishes to assure the Government of the United States of America that it agrees to join with the Government of the United States in promoting international understanding and good-will and in maintaining world peace and to undertake such action as they mutually agree upon to alleviate the causes for international tension.

I have the honor to confirm that your note and this reply may constitute an interim agreement between our two governments on this subject.

Delga 576. Re Gadel 361, Dec 6.2 Fol are Gen Riley's comments on points raised Damascus 319, Dec 3:3

- 1. Riley agrees drainage project eminently worthwhile. He understands that project not undertaken prior 1948 because of hydroelectric company's rights to waters to north and its opposition to carrying out project. Since 1948, of course, political conditions have not been favorable.
- 2. Riley agrees re importance issue. He points out Israel has expressed willingness discuss overall prob and in Aug submitted 4 point agenda to Syrian Govt thru MAC. Syria, however, turned suggested agenda down because unwillingness discuss resumption normal econ and trade relations, which was Israeli's fourth point. Also in Syrian reply, statement made all other points cld be discussed in MAC. Riley thinks if Israeli wld agree to River Jordan line, Syrians wld not raise objection to project. Riley emphasizes, however, that project might well affect flow of Jordan which in turn might affect use of Jordan River south of Lake Tiberius. Therefore considers Jordanian agreement to any change in flow of Jordan essential. Aside from Jordanian angle, however, crux of matter is that Israelis desire comprehensive agreements that wld be basis on which peaceful settlement cld be reached. Syrians not willing go this far.
- 3. Riley agrees and adds that if Israelis obtain Al-Hummeh salient, it wld give them control of mouth Yarmuk and provide them with means damming river to detriment Syria. Riley points out, however, source of Yarmuk is in Syria which cld, presumably, take retaliatory measures.

4. Riley says he has consistently advocated water line since Mar 1949 and had discussed matter with number of Israeli leaders before recent discussions took place between Syria and Israel. Difficulty now is that Syria desires only a change in boundary while Israel wants a wider settlement. Syrian dissatisfaction present line is that it derives from 1923 treaty between UK and French as mandatory powers, about which, Syria points out, they had nothing to say, sole intent of line was to give Brit mandate control of Jordan River and Lakes Tiberias and Huleh. Riley feels 1923 definition that boundary shall run 10 meters from waters edge vicinity of Tiberias is unrealistic and that Syrian opposition understandable on practical grounds.

5. Riley agrees with Clark's comments re Jaddid in this and antepenult paras. He confirms Jaddid close to Shishikli but does not always reflect govt views, due political complications. Riley particularly underlines importance Jaddid's observations re strategic position Syria and Leb occupy with respect Jordan River; as source of Jordan is in Leb and sources of tributaries in Syria.

6. Riley says he is not sure there is convincing evidence of Israeli fortifications in zone contrary armistice agreement. He concedes there may be ditches, etc but says Syrians equally have built such installations. He adds, most flagrant violation of armistice agreements is roadblock vicinity El-Hummeh in DZ which was erected after Israeli police approached El-Hummeh in Apr this year. When tension within zone removed chairman will request road block be removed.

7. Riley points out difficulty of proving or disproving statements such as those made by 2 Arabs with whom Clark talked. He says he has received similar statements, but also has statements from other Arabs to effect they have not been maltreated.

8. Riley prefers not comment.

CONFIDENTIAL PRIORITY PARIS, December 15, 1951—6 p. m. Delga 686. 1. Staff now considering draft UNRWA resolution embodying recommendations of Point REPT director and AdCom and applicable parts draft attached position paper (SD/A/C.1/373).¹ General outlines of program discussed informally by staff with Vorys and Mansfield. Both admit need for program but suggested that distribution program over four-year period rather than three-year period would be more acceptable US Congress and other parliaments light other financial requirements next year. They questioned particularly large increase for second FY as too ambitious. Would appreciate Dept's view these suggestions.

- 2. Delegation needs specific instructions on position we can take here as to amount entire program and yearly distribution total. In draft resolution we propose $250 million program, of which $50 million will be for relief. Program for next fiscal year $118, of which $18 million will be for relief.
- 3. Since $118 million for second year will be needed largely for commitments rather than expenditures we propose discuss with Blandford feasibility of planning match his commitments with corresponding commitments from contributing govts rather than outright cash appropriations. Wld Dept and Budget Bureau agree to request full amts scheduled program in contract authorization (three years) spreading cash requirements over four-year period? Blandford considers it essential have in hand full commitments from contributors prior discussions with Arab states. USGADel staff concurs this view.

Memorandum of Conversation, by James W. Barco of the United States Delegation to the United Nations General Assembly

CONFIDENTIAL

[Paris,] 18 December 1951.

US/A/AC.53/8

Subject: Palestine in the General Assembly

Participants: Mr. Moshe Sharett, Israeli Foreign Minister

Mr. Arthur Lourie, Israeli Delegation Mr. Gideon Rafael, Israeli Delegation

Mr. Philip Jessup, USGADel Mr. Joseph Palmer, USGADel Mr. James Barco, USGADel

Mr. Sharett opened the discussion by saying that he had called to see Mr. Jessup to compare notes on the coming debate on Palestine.

He would be returning to Israel at the end of this week and would not be coming back. Before he left, he wished to see whether the Israel and American Delegations stood together on the question of Palestine. While there had been contacts between the Israel Embassy and the State Department, this was the first "business meeting" that the Israel Delegation had had with any delegation in Paris.

Mr. Sharett referred to his previous conversation with Mr. Jessup <sup>1</sup> and reviewed what he had then said with respect to the Israel view of the problem, which he had divided into three parts: 1) Security in the area. In this connection Mr. Sharett felt that no change in the present armistice supervision arrangements were necessary. 2) The humanitarian problem. The problem of Arab refugees was one which was being handled satisfactorily by UNRWA. 3) Relations between Israel and the Arab States. International intervention was not necessary at this time.

Mr. Sharett said however that since this first talk with Mr. Jessup the Israel Delegation had been able to clarify their views. These clarifications had resulted partly from the Israel Delegation's talks with Mr. Blandford. His Delegation now understood more fully Mr. Blandford's approach to the question, and he wished to say that the Israel Delegation had no quarrel with it. They could understand that the UNRWA operation should be separated from political questions and that negotiations with Israel on the question of compensation should not be confused with the reintegration program at this stage. The question of determining the amount and the mode of payment could be left to negotiations between Israel and an organ of the United Nations. The question remained what organ should be designated for such negotiations. Mr. Sharett also recalled that he had stated that there was no need for United Nations machinery to deal with inter-state relations at the present time; that the parties themselves can advance from the armistice agreements under existing machinery; but whatever machinery there was, the essential thing was the will to come to agreement and as long as that was lacking, machinery was unimportant. However, the Israel Delegation had now concluded that the maintenance of some organ ready to help in widening the scope of the armistice agreements when and if the parties were ready was desirable, and the Israel Delegation had likewise concluded that whatever organ was set up should deal with both this question and the question of compensation. In this connection they were aware that a new organ might possibly be made up of states who were not familiar with the compensation question and had concluded that the Refugee Office of the PCC with its technical knowledge might be attached to any new organization to deal with this question. That left the question open as to what the new organ should be, where it should sit, of whom it should be composed, its name and terms of reference.

Mr. Sharett said that the Israel Government felt that there should be an entirely new arrangement which would make a clear break with the past. It should not be the PCC, the continuance of which would suggest a perpetuation of the PCC's methods. While these were not on the whole bad, the PCC had made one mistake in bringing all the Arab States together en bloc. This should be avoided in the future and the nature of the new organ should be such as to convey to the parties concerned that an entirely new approach was being made. Above all there should not be a continuation of the practice of making a semblance of negotiations when everyone knew that there were no true negotiations being carried on.

The Israel Delegation felt that the new organ should be called a "Good Offices Committee." This was not merely a question of title but reflected the substance of what the Israel Delegation believed desirable. It should be clearly indicated that the new organ was not to meet continuously or expected to report at the end of the year. It might do nothing at all for half a year or a year but should be ready to act when requested by the parties. The Israel Delegation saw the merit of maintaining the present membership of the PCC. It would have welcomed the addition of the United Kingdom, if membership could be increased to four; while if only three members were to be selected, it would prefer the United Kingdom to Turkey. Israel had had misgivings in 1948 about the Turks, although not all of these had been borne out. The fact was Turkey could not always take a detached view of the Middle East being, as she was, part and parcel of the area. Israel would, however, make no issue if there were good reasons for retaining Turkey as a member, and if to bring in the United Kingdom would complicate matters, Israel would make no issue on this. In any case, Israel had not spoken to the United Kingdom about it.

As to the seat of the organization, Mr. Sharett said that there seemed common agreement that New York was the best place. The terms of reference of the new body should be very simple. They should state 1) that the organ should be available to lend its good offices for any negotiations that might take place as a result of the application of any of the parties, and 2) that the Good Offices Committee should continue to deal with the question of compensation either directly or through an intermediary body such as the Andersen Refugee Office.

In reply to Mr. Sharett, Mr. Jessup said that the study and thinking in the American Delegation had proceeded along lines closely parallel to that of the Israel Delegation. He went over the points briefly to see if any differences of view existed. With respect to security, he felt that there was no difference of opinion; that the Truce Supervision Organization and the Security Council were sufficient. With respect to refugees, our thinking, like that of the Israel Delegation, was that the arrangements were generally satisfactory. One point which Mr. Sharett had not mentioned was the question of blocked accounts. We understood that the Israel Delegation had indicated to the PCC that there was no problem in principle concerning the release of blocked accounts. It would be most helpful at this time in consideration of the Palestine question if Israel could make some step in the direction of unblocking the Arab accounts.

Mr. Sharett replied in this connection that the Israel Delegation had signified its willingness to discuss the question of blocked accounts but had reached no final decision. The Israel Government for the present must reserve its position but further clarification might be forthcoming in a few weeks. The problem for Israel was that the payment of blocked accounts involved an immediate payment of hard currency to the benefit of Israel's neighbor states who still insisted that they were at war with Israel. The Israel Government's difficulty would be to explain to parliament how they could justify such a payment in these circumstances. Mr. Sharett indicated parenthetically that the accounts of Jews blocked in Iraq about equalled the Arab accounts blocked in Israel, that is, each amounted to about 5,000,000 pounds sterling.

Mr. Jessup reiterated that in this field where it was much easier to move than in other matters, action by Israel at this time would be very helpful, and he felt sure that the Israel Government had this in mind. Mr. Jessup then said that the thinking in the American Delegation had run over all of the alternatives on the Palestine question. With respect to the establishment of some new body, we thought it undesirable to give the parties the idea that a new movement was beginning to undertake something that the PCC had not been able to do. If a new body with a new name were to be established, we would run the risk of creating the idea that some new initiative was about to take place. Our thinking started from the same premise as that of the Israel Delegation, that it was desirable to avoid creating the impression that something new was brewing. To keep the PCC on a standby basis might most successfully carry out this idea.

We agreed with the Israel Delegation, Mr. Jessup said, that changing the membership of the body might create new problems and new frictions. On the whole, it seemed that the simplest thing to do was to avoid novelty, to keep the same name and to create the idea of a standby basis. This might accomplish what we all had in mind. While the question of compensation and repatriation can't be obliterated, Mr. Jessup observed, it seemed possible to move along with them; whereas to raise the question specifically of a new body's terms of reference might result in over-emphasizing the repatriation question.

Mr. Sharett replied that in his opinion a retention of the PCC suggested continuing the old procedures, while their idea was that a new body would definitely suggest new procedures. As to repatriation, it was one thing not to proclaim that repatriation was definitely off; it was quite a different thing to reaffirm that repatriation must be implemented. It was in the interest of an early solution of the refugee problem and the wider problems of the area, if there were no reaffirmation of repatriation.

Mr. Rafael added that the Israel Delegation had been impressed by the PCC's conclusions which, he said, corresponded to the realities of the situation. The Israel Delegation found that the PCC's conclusion, that the attitudes of the parties and changed conditions in Palestine made it impossible for the PCC to carry out its mandate, was a bold, correct and realistic statement of which the United Nations should take advantage. Mr. Sharett added that by following the Israel Delegation's suggestion, for a new body, the General Assembly would in fact be taking advantage of the PCC's conclusions. Mr. Jessup added at that point that the PCC's conclusions with respect to its mandate included the conclusion that it could not follow its present procedure. It was a most important point and the change to less active procedures that the United States had in mind could best be undertaken by the transfer of the PCC's headquarters to New York and representation on the Commission by the permanent representatives to the United Nations. Mr. Lourie remarked that under the kind of resolution the Israelis had in mind there would be no occasion for keeping the Palestine question on the General Assembly agenda. Mr. Sharett added that whatever resolution was adopted, it should not obligate the body to submit an annual report. Annual reports always insured debate on the question. A report also acted as an incentive to activity which might be artificial.

Mr. Jessup observed that it would be desirable in this year's debate not to approach the question on the basic issues but on the question of appropriate United Nations machinery. If the temper of the discussion could be lowered it would be most desirable and it would also be preferable to avoid discussion of the issues every year. Mr. Palmer added that he wondered if debate on the new body contemplated by the Israel Delegation might not provoke a detailed examination of the new body's terms of reference and result in stronger language on repatriation. Mr. Sharett agreed that this was a point to be considered.

Mr. Palmer also referred to Mr. Sharett's comment regarding the PCC procedure of dealing with all of the Arab countries en bloc and said that we did not feel that this would necessarily be the case if the PCC went on the standby basis we had in mind. Mr. Sharett replied that this was a most important point and had been one of the main reasons for their proposing a new body. If it could be assumed that the body in existence would be flexible as to procedure, this would be most desirable. At the conclusion of the discussion, Mr. Sharett asked when he might expect something from the US Delegation in a more crystallized form in reply to which Mr. Jessup said that we would keep in touch with his Delegation and hoped to have further discussions soon.

Mr. Sharett left with Mr. Jessup a draft resolution 2 embodying the Israel Delegation views, a copy of which is attached.

Israel's attitude this matter equally untenable in Dept's view. Art 5 Armistice Agreement assigns gen supervision Demil Zone to Chairman MAC, and not to MAC itself, but if Chairman wishes MAC discuss Zone problems neither side shld refuse participate, particularly in light May 18 Res.

Dept increasingly concerned that when either Syria or Israel disagrees with UN position Palestine it attempts force UN comply with its point of view by obstructionist or legalistic tactics. Unless Syria and Israel meet in MAC with sincere desire settle their problems Dept doubts wisdom of attempting progress toward settlement on any other level UN. Syria shld also be willing take responsibility for its own suggestions and agree consider Israel counter-suggestions. McDaniel emphasized desire that 5 percent of all pounds deposited by Israel Govt under exchange notes and contemplated bi-lateral agreement shid be credited USG for its use within Israel for such purposes as USG may elect. Kaplan and Avriel made no objection, merely observing that such funds shid be used within Israel.

ReDeptel 436, Dec 13,3 we consider it important that counterpart funds be available to both Emb and Econ Aid Mission for all purposes which USG may elect. If, as indicated in Deptel 436, such funds "not intended cover all Emb admin and operating costs, but only those broadly associated with implementation aid program", an impossible personnel situation as well as admin difficulties wild inevitably arise.

Issue must also be faced squarely that present exchange rate is unrealistic and operates, in effect, as heavy tax on US personnel and govt.

Secretary's Memoranda: Lot 53 D 444

Memorandum by the Secretary of State to the President 1

SECRET [WASHINGTON,] December 21, 1951.

Subject: Approval of a program of economic aid of the order of $80,000,000 to Israel for 1953

The grant program for Fiscal Year 1952 for economic assistance to Israel has been established by legislative history in the sum of $64,590,000. This balances mathematically funds available to the Arab states for technical and economic assistance added to our contribution to the United Nations for the relief and rehabilitation of the Arab refugees from Palestine.

In a Note to the Department dated November 19, 1951, the Israelis have requested assistance totalling $126 million for Fiscal Year 1953. This amount is part of a three-year program of investment looking to the ingathering of an additional 600,000 Jewish people. This program is considered excessive. Israel cannot hope to become viable economically with such numbers of new immigrants. Such a program would increase international tensions in the area.

Alternative programs of assistance have been submitted to the Bureau of the Budget by the Department, one approximating $27 million, and the other, $83 million.

The $27 million program represents an expanded concept of technical assistance, and is designed to balance mathematically bilateral programs of like amount proposed for the Arab states. This program is too small to achieve our objectives in Israel and to prevent collapse there; the requirements of Israel for foodstuffs alone are materially larger than anticipated when Israel's needs were calculated last March, because of serious drought in 1951.

The $83 million program has been prepared following an analysis of the present financial situation of Israel and the prospects of Israel's foreign exchange position in Fiscal Year 1953. This program is designed to absorb into the productive economy of Israel refugees already arrived and to permit a moderate rate of immigration.

Israel's future as a self-sustaining state depends on reconciliation with the Arab states, and integration into the economy of the Near and Middle East. Aid to Israel involves considerations affecting both the United States and Israel in their relations with Israel's Arab neighbors.

Israeli officials, citing the unabating hostility of the Arabs, feel they cannot adopt conciliatory policies towards them. On their part, the Arabs, taking into account the very substantial number of immigrants who have entered Israel since 1948 (approximately 600,000), and noting the frequently avowed policy of Israel to continue unrestricted immigration, are little disposed to come to terms with a neighbor who appears to be preparing for aggressive expansion. United States Government economic support of Israel, making possible the continuation of heavy immigration into Israel, causes grave doubts among the Arabs as to the sincerity of the Tripartite Declaration of May, 1950, which was intended to stabilize the present armistice frontiers. Arab doubts of the ability of Israel to maintain an expanded population within its present borders have a measure of validity.

United States assistance toward Israel can be squared with a policy looking toward improvement of United States relations with the Arabs, but only if the Arabs are convinced that Israel will be content with only moderate increases in its present population and will, therefore, have no reason to expand beyond the confines of the present armistice lines. The fact that the movement of refugees from displaced persons camps in Western Europe is now completed makes a policy of limited immigration into Israel reasonable. Israel's current financial difficulties are largely the result of immigration policies conducted without reference to economic considerations, and of the Arab trade boycott.

In the Department's view, a balanced judgment calls for a program of assistance approximately $80 million. Such a program should be conditional on understandings with Israeli authorities looking to slowing down in rates of immigration, and firm planning for a terminal date of United States aid, as well as policies of conciliation to the Arabs.

Recommendation:

I recommend that you approve inclusion in the budget of a program of economic assistance to Israel for Fiscal Year 1953 of the order of $80,000,000.

627. Emb finds Deptel 454 of Dec 19<sup>2</sup> re Huleh controversy very helpful, particularly on fol points:

1. Recommendation that Syrians not react unduly to Israel pronouncements making it appear special understandings have been worked out with Riley. In this connection Emb has lost no opportunity to impress Israel auths with harmful effect on relations with Arab countries of statements in Knesset debates, press and radio to above effect. Eban, Kollek and various influential visitors from US agree Israel Govt and public shld become more sensitive to Arab opinion, and avoid conduct that needlessly worsens relations.

2. Dept's point that Riley as rep UN auth, and not Israel or Syria, is judge of whether there has been compliance with SC res or other UN mandates. Unilateral interpretations and allegations of noncompliance have contributed to present unsatisfactory state of affairs.

Believe it necessary that UN auths call their own score re compliance, and insist that even acknowledged instances of noncompliance still do not justify refusal to participate in MAC mtgs.

3. Importance of encouraging parties to demonstrate sincere desire settle problems at MAC level or through other direct negots.

Advantage is being taken of Eban's presence to discuss desirability of review of policy toward Arab countries and questions in dispute. He admits that position taken heretofore has been sterile and that new approach is needed to inspire Arab confidence and cooperation. It was mentioned that repeatedly Israel has deprived itself of political advantages from actual or proposed concessions by the manner in which they were announced. Cited as example cessation of work on Huleh project after Knesset debate which rendered stoppage meaningless and served only to increase Syrian irritation.

Also mentioned Syrian reaction to detailed list of reservations which destroyed political effect of otherwise constructive announcement of willingness consider compensation apart from general peace settlement. He readily conceded undesirability of attempting to link compensation of Pal refugees for lands abandoned with any question of claims against Arab Govts.

Eban commented also on matter which has long concerned Emb, namely negative attitude of Israel Govt and public toward important objective of seeking improve Arab-Israel relations by direct negots. Altho he considers lack of interest due more to discouragement than failure to appreciate importance of such improvement, he agrees with Emb that sustained psychological approach by Israel, designed to influence Arab thinking shld be tried. It cld do no harm and might conceivably prepare way for real progress later. At least such effort wld involve avoidance of harmful actions and pronouncements and substitute constructive program. It is believed we shld encourage efforts to change present negative attitude of both sides but at same time avoid pressing for concessions especially during time when govts concerned will not dare enter into direct negots. We shld avoid also encouraging either party to expect unrealistic concessions (see Embtel 2, July 3).3

Seriousness of recent financial crisis has high-lighted for Israelis desirability of improving relations with neighbors, lessening defense burden and reestablishing normal trade. For this reason, and because number of Congressional and other Amer visitors have recently stressed to Israelis importance to Israel and US of improved Arab-Israel relations, direct negots at this time might find Israelis more receptive than heretofore to realistic Arab proposals. Emb does not underestimate depth of feeling behind Arab reluctance negotiate with

557. Financing Palestine refugee program requiring according present plans $250 million three-year period ending June 30, 1954, poses serious problems.

It is in best interests US and UN secure as broad participation as possible in contribs this fund.

Both Israel and Arab states have expressed interest in success of program.

Possible source financing is Israel. Statements have already been made by Israeli auths indicating Israel may contribute in settlement Arab claims compensation.

Fol suggestion has been made and we understand is now being studied in Israel circles re possibility using for refugees revenues which wld indirectly accrue Israel from operation Haifa refinery.

Israeli Govt officials calculate that if Haifa were operated 100% capacity, Israeli Govt wld benefit to extent $7 to $9 million annually, and Israel's petroleum imports, if made from Middle East sources and moved to Haifa either via pipeline or via Suez, rather than South American sources, wld cost annually $12-$15 million less.

Dept wld appreciate comments del and missions concerned re advisability encouraging this suggestion to run Haifa full capacity on Middle East oil with Israel agreeing devote full calculated savings $20-$25 million annually or very substantial fraction this saving to refugee fund for period continuing until compensation as finally determined by UN auths had been paid in full. Iraq wld benefit by receiving increased oil royalties and might find it difficult reject this plan with its obvious benefits directed to rehabilitation of Arab refugees. 110.15 McG/3-2951: Despatch

The Chargé in Jordan (Fritzlan) to the Department of State 1

SECRET

Amman, March 29, 1951.

No. 234

Subject: Conversations Between Mr. McGhee,<sup>2</sup> King Abdullah, Jordan Prime Minister and Other Members of the Government.

On March 26, 1951, Mr. McGhee, who had just arrived for a two day visit to Jordan, was received in audience by His Majesty King Abdullah. Also present at the meeting were the Jordan Prime Minister, the Foreign Minister and myself.

After some complimentary opening remarks in which he expressed pleasure at having the opportunity to visit Jordan again after an absence of two years, Mr. McGhee congratulated King Abdullah on the great progress in economic development which had taken place in the country since his last visit. He paid tribute to the King and his Government for the clear cut stand which had been taken in support of United States and United Nations action on the Korean question and for His Majesty's wish that Arab Legion soldiers participate in the fighting against Communist aggressors. Mr. McGhee added that the well organized Arab Legion and the courage of its soldiers were widely known and admired in the United States. The King was visibly touched by these remarks and said that while he regretted it had not been possible to send Arab Legionnaires to Korea, the United States could count on this force to do all within its power to repell aggressors or invaders in this part of the world.

Mr. McGhee then touched on the refugee problem,3 indicating the admiration of his Government for the welcome which King Abdullah had extended to Arab refugees and the helpful policy which his Government had adopted in regard to this very difficult problem. . . . Mr. McGhee indicated that it was his opinion that radical changes would be necessary and he hoped that such changes, together with the cooperative attitude of Jordan and other Middle Eastern countries, would in the near future enable the resettlement of large numbers of refugees. He stated that the United States would continue economic assistance and he was confident that the United States would meet the very large obligation it had undertaken to contribute to the relief and reintegration fund. He stated that he also felt confident that Jordan, apart from aid in connection with the refugee problem, could continue to count on economic assistance, possibly through an expanded Point IV program.

King Abdullah then reverted to the question of the defense of the area, giving a long exposé of his views regarding the necessity for building up further the defenses of Greece, Turkey and Iran, with particular emphasis on the exposed position of the latter country. He remarked that although adequate defenses might at the present or in the near future exist in these states, lack of unity, indecision and political instability in most of the Arab States had prevented them from building up anything like effective defenses for any eventual resistance to invasion.

Mr. McGhee said that the United States and other free Governments of the world recognized the great danger of Soviet aggression which existed in several corners of the world and particularly in the Middle East. However, the United States and its Western European allies were engaged in a large scale re-armament and mobilization program. If any possible Russian invasion could be delayed for a period of eighteen months, the overwhelming superiority of the Western Powers in war material and manpower would, in all likelihood, remove the fear of Russian attack on any of the countries bordering it. In substantiation of this view, Mr. McGhee quoted figures on the extent of plane, tank and gun manufacture in the United States as compared with Russian output, which clearly showed that after the elapse of a year and a half the Russians would be far outstripped in war-making potential.

These figures and facts greatly impressed the King, who agreed with Mr. McGhee's conclusions, but stated that lack of unity in the Arab world would constitute a serious weakness in developing the strategy of the defense of the Middle East and that, regardless of our strong position eighteen months hence, it should be our policy to encourage such unity. . . .

In reply Mr. McGhee stated that the United States Government was not against the union of like-minded people when such union was accomplished of their own free will and without the use of force. Nor was the United States opposed to disunion of such people after they had united if they wished to take such action. However, the United States could not sanction . . . unilateral action to bring about union. He and his colleagues felt very strongly that action of this character taken in an undemocratic and unilateral manner would diminish rather than build up the stability and security of the area and, were it ever attempted, the United States Government would be obliged to oppose it.

... [The King] fully understood the import of Mr. McGhee's words, and conversation on this subject ended with a promise from the King to the effect that . . . he would do all in his power to build up the defenses of the area and that in the event of invasion or attack the United States could count on him to fight at its side.

Mr. McGhee expressed keen appreciation for these remarks and stated that he felt a great deal more could be done to accomplish our mutual objectives in the area through cooperation and coordination between the Middle Eastern countries on defense matters. He felt that such cooperation and coordination could possibly be as effective as overall unity of governments and of fighting forces within one sovereign area.

The conversation got around to the question of Jordan-Israeli relations and in this connection Mr. McGhee reaffirmed the intention of the United States Government to implement the Tripartite Declaration 4 should a serious violation of frontiers take place. In reply to this the King said that he had no fear whatsoever as regards his frontiers with the Israelis. . . .

As regards the likelihood of a greater degree of agreement between Israel and Jordan in the near future the King stated that there had been discussions in recent weeks but that the Israelis had shown no willingness to make any concessions. He added that unless the Israelis found themselves able to reach agreement with the present Prime Minister, Samir Pasha Rifa'i, who was well known for his moderate and reasonable attitude, he was certain that there was no likelihood of such agreement being reached in the foreseeable future.

The audience was concluded with complimentary remarks on both sides and expressions from Mr. McGhee of his admiration of the King's grasp of world affairs, his practical outlook and of his frankness in laying before him his innermost ambitions regarding Arab union.

Following Mr. McGhee's audience with King Abdullah, he had extended conversations with Prime Minister Samir Pasha Rifa'i, Foreign Minister Ahmad Bey Tuqan and other members of the Jordan Government. . . . [The Prime Minister] felt that union of the Fertile Crescent was inevitable and it was the duty of Arabs to work for it. The method of achieving the union, the organization of the union or confederation, and the person who should be at the head of it, would be matters which would have to be worked out on the basis of common agreement. In this connection he referred to Dr. Qudsi's federation scheme and expressed the hope that it would be the basis for achieving a greater degree of cooperation and coordination and ultimate unity between the countries of the Fertile Crescent. (In this regard attention is invited to Legation's despatch 229 of March 22, 1951 be which recorded a conversation at length between the Prime Minister and myself.)

In subsequent conversation with the Prime Minister, Samir Pasha sought to impress upon Mr. McGhee two important points. First, he repeated and emphasized the fact that Jordan was in dire need of substantial economic assistance in order to develop its limited resources with a view of achieving some degree of self-sufficiency. This, of course, was a question quite apart from assistance which would be necessary in order to contribute to the resettlement of refugees. Mr. McGhee reaffirmed his intention to assist in every way possible in order that the United States Government might be able to expand substantially its economic assistance to Jordan through some sort of enlarged Point IV program. The Prime Minister expressed his gratitude for these remarks.

Second, Samir Pasha took up in some detail recent developments in connection with Jordan-Israeli negotiations under the Armistice Agreement.6 He stated that while previous Jordan Governments had done little to insure implementation of the Armistice Agreement, it had become his policy from the beginning of his assumption of power to accept the obligation to implement fully the Armistice, in particular Article VIII, assuming he could count on a cooperative and conciliatory attitude on the part of the Israelis. He regretted that so far he had not found the Israelis to be motivated by such feelings. (In this connection see the Legation's despatch 223 of March 19, 1951 7 which summarized Samir Pasha's proposals made on March 16 and the reaction of the Israelis.) Samir Pasha dwelt at great length on the question of Mount Scopus and of his offer to provide free access to the Jewish institutions there in order that they might resume their normal functioning, subject to the fact that United Nations control of the area would terminate and that Jordan control would be substituted. The institutions in the area would have the status of foreign institutions in Jordan territory and would be protected as such. He was surprised to learn that the Israelis considered the area as Israeli territory, a claim which had no foundation in any of the agreements made. He asserted that Jordan could implement its obligation under Article VIII to provide free access only if Jordan exercised control of the area. He produced a copy of the Armistice Agreement, official maps and a copy of the agreement made prior to the Armistice, under which the United Nations assumed "protection" of the institutions in the area, in order to convince Mr. McGhee of his argument. Mr. McGhee stated that while on the basis of evidence presented it appeared that Samir Pasha had a good case, he felt certain that during his visit to Israel he would be presented with evidence by the Israelis which would probably indicate that they also had a case. In any event, he hoped that by reducing legal quibbling to a minimum some form of agreement could be reached. Samir Pasha agreed that quibbling on technical points should be reduced wherever possible, but he felt that if Jordan, or for that matter Israel, had a good legal case on any particular subject it should be recognized. In this connection he had serious criticism of the Mixed Armistice Commission which, very often, sought to resolve disputes on the basis of compromise without special regard to legal right. He felt that since the Armistice Agreement was. like any other document of its nature, open to legal interpretation, it was advisable for the Jordan Government to procure qualified legal advice which did not exist in the country. He had asked for the services. for a brief period, of a competent international lawyer from England who was due to arrive soon.

For documentation on these negotiations, see Foreign Relations, 1949, vol. vi, pp. 594 ff. and ibid., 1950, vol. v, pp. 658 ff. The Agreement was signed at Rhodes on April 3, 1949. For text, see United Nations, Official Records of the Security Council, Fourth Year, Special Supplement No. 1.

The conversation ended with Samir Pasha expressing the hope that he could count on Mr. McGhee to continue to adopt a friendly attitude toward Jordan in matters affecting Jordan-Israel relations.

At reception July 5 of Diplomatic Corps at Palace on occasion of post-Ramadan Feast, King introduced Dr. Ford Robertson who was at his side, explaining that Tallal, on doctor's advice did not attend reception. King said to Corps Tallal leaving for Geneva in next few days to continue treatment interrupted by early departure from London. He mentioned to Corps our mtg on road on previous day. I infer this was subtly planned to bring Tallal's condition out into open and possibly as hint that King may look to young Prince Hussain as eventual successor to throne. His action in stopping me on road to present young Prince and reference to it at Diplomatic reception were obviously with some purpose in mind.

Suggest Consulate Geneva, through Dr. Robertson or otherwise, might be able follow developments there.

Memorandum by the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (McGhee) to the Secretary of State <sup>1</sup>

SECRET

[Washington,] July 20, 1951.

Subject: Assassination of King Abdullah of Jordan

Discussion: In continuation of my earlier memorandum of this date on this subject, our strictly tentative estimate of the immediate effects of this event in Jordan and neighboring countries is as follows:

Jordan: The Arab Legion under British tutelage will be able to maintain internal control. The Anglo-Jordan treaty will be a deterrent to military action by neighboring countries. The prospective new King Talal's reign is likely to be brief in view of his questionable sanity, and the question of securing the popular acceptance of a successor will be difficult particularly in view of the low reputation in the Arab world of all the eligible members of the Jordan royal family.

Syria: Syria may press for attachment of Jordan to Syria, but at present Syria has a great many internal difficulties, not to mention trouble with Israel in the Huleh area. Military action by Syria is considered unlikely unless Israel should make a move against Jordan.

Lebanon: We foresee no possibility of the Lebanese taking action except to ask for great power guarantees of Lebanon's independence. The Lebanese will be thoroughly frightened.

Saudi Arabia: King Ibn Saud will derive a certain satisfaction from the death of his old enemy, but Saudi Arabia is unlikely to take any positive action.

Iraq: The Iraqi Government will exert strong diplomatic pressure for its long standing plan for federating or unifying the two Hashemite kingdoms. Iraq would no doubt wish to include Syria in the unification plan. Military action by Iraq, especially if warned by the UK and US, is unlikely unless Israel should march.

Israel: It is unlikely Israel will take military action unless an Arab State marches or threatens to march into Jordan. In the latter case, Israel might use this as a pretext for rectifying its frontiers and realizing its ambition for full control of all of Palestine.<sup>2</sup>

Egypt: In view of its desire for hegemony in the Arab World, Egypt will try to prevent any other Arab State from acquiring dominance over Jordan. It is not in a favorable geographic position to take military action.

Arab League: There will undoubtedly be a meeting of the Arab League to discuss the situation but no concrete results are likely.

Mufti: The inconclusive information available causes us to believe the assassination may have been inspired by the ex-Mufti of Jerusalem, who claims to represent the Palestine Arabs, rather than the followers of the late Riad Solh. We believe the assassination is more likely to have been the result of a vendetta rather than a deliberate act of any Near Eastern state. Soviet involvement by financing the Mufti is possible but not proved. There is no evidence that Israel, which loses by Abdullah's death, is connected with the assassination.

Summary: In short, any immediate military conflict is considered unlikely, but in the long run there will be an increased Arab pressure for some form of larger Arab territorial unit with Iraq and Egypt, vying for hegemony in the Arab World. Saudi Arabia will oppose any increase in the power of the Hashemite rulers of either Iraq or Jordan, and Israel will bitterly oppose any larger Arab formation.

US Objectives: Our objectives are: (1) To stabilize the situation so that the future of Jordan can be worked out in a calm atmosphere. A circular telegram <sup>3</sup> has been dispatched to the Arab States and Israel instructing our Chiefs of Mission to counsel restraint and moderation.

(2) Our long range objective is to find a solution to the problem which will preserve the strategic position which the UK has enjoyed in Jordan, at the same time taking into account the fact that Abdullah's death may create an opportunity for peacefully incorporating Jordan into a more viable territorial unit. Discussions of the problem are being initiated with the UK.

Paper Prepared in the Office of Near Eastern Affairs for Discussion by the Policy Planning Staff

SECRET

[Washington,] July 24, 1951.

Subject: Future of Jordan; Possible Alternatives

ALTERNATIVE No. 1

Jordan to remain an independent monarchy under Tallal, Hussein or Naif

ADVANTAGES

1. The UK strategic position would presumably be unaffected (although Tallal is reportedly less well disposed toward UK than was Abdullah).

2. Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Lebanon and Syria under its present regime would probably favor maintenance of status quo since none of these is in a favorable position to annex Jordan and would oppose Iraq's or Israel's doing so. These states would seek to integrate Jordan more closely into the Arab League than heretofore.

3. The Armistice Agreement with Israel would be unaffected; Israel would like to rectify its frontiers, but would agree to the status quo if thwarted from doing so by the Great Powers.

4. France would favor the status quo since it fears a UK-dominated Arab Union.

5. Some leading Arab-Palestinians and Jordanians having vested interests in positions of influence will prefer the status quo. However, if Tallal and his followers are ousted they may join forces with Iraqis or others seeking annexation.

DISADVANTAGES

- 1. Jordan is not a viable territorial unit, and its existence as an independent state was intimately related to the personality of Abdullah. This may be a golden opportunity to correct an entirely illogical situation.
- 2. None of prospective successors has a high standing in the Arab World. Of all, Tallal as Crown Prince is best known in limited sense, but all now question his capacity to rule.
- 3. Iraq and the majority party in Syria (The Populists) will favor incorporation of Jordan into an Arab federation or union. Probably the majority of the people of the northern Arab States favor unification and will lay blame on the UK and US if Union does not come about, claiming latter opposing (a) to protect UK "imperialistic position" and (b) to appease Israel.
- 4. East and West Jordan will never be fully compatible under the present political arrangement.

ALTERNATIVE No. 2

Jordan to be federated or unified with Iraq

ADVANTAGES

- 1. Communications between the two states are not particularly good, but there are no insurmountable geopolitical obstacles.
  - 2. Merger of the Hashemite clan "a natural".
- 3. The Iraq financial situation will soon be good enough to take on the additional burden, although the UK subsidy and UN aid to the refugees will be needed initially. Continuing need for the subsidy may be an advantage in preventing any drastic change in the UK strategic position.
- 4. The UK position in Iraq is less certain than in Jordan, but UK interests in Jordan are less likely to be adversely affected under a merger with Iraq than if Jordan assimilated elsewhere.
- 5. UK treaty question would be thorny but not impossible to resolve so long as Nuri and Coterie in power.
- 6. US and UK encouragement of the merger would give the lie to the charges that the great powers are resisting Arab unity and might be an effective psychological move to cause the Arabs to shed their present nihilism.
- 7. The Arab Legion and Iraqi forces might in time be welded into a trim fighting unit capable of assisting Western forces substantially in holding the line at the Iranian frontier.
- 8. The great powers could possibly use support of unification as quid pro quo for a settlement with Israel, but chances of success of this maneuver would be very remote.

DISADVANTAGES

- 1. Iraq, with increased power and influence, will possibly develop muscle-flexing tendencies toward the UK and US. This would be even more true should Nuri be eliminated.
- 2. There is no armistice agreement between Iraq and Israel and the Iraqis are among the most hostile toward the Jews. There is a strong likelihood of Israel opposing the merger and using it as a pretext for gaining additional territory.
- 3. Pressure on Syria and on Lebanon for incorporation into Arab Union would be intensified.
- 4. Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Lebanon and the controlling clique in the Syrian Army would be bitterly opposed, and it is possible, though not inevitable, such a move would rip the Arab World asunder.
  - 5. Possible dynastic quarrels among the Hashemites.

ALTERNATIVE No. 3

Attachment of Jordan to Syria (or vice versa)

ADVANTAGES

- 1. Geopolitically sound—even more so than in the case of union with Iraq from a communications and ethnic standpoint,
- 2. It is possible, though remotely so, that this would result in an increase in UK influence in Syria since Syria definitely would need continuation of UK assistance to Jordan during the initial period of the merger.
  - 3. Syria has an Armistice Agreement with Israel, Iraq does not.
- 4. Egypt and Saudi Arabia would be less bitterly opposed to Syrian aggrandizement since the present Syrian Government is more closely oriented toward them than to Iraq and presently has no chance to threaten their hegemony in their respective domains.
- 5. Syria is the most independent of the Arab States and fundamentally its traditions are more progressive and democratic than those in the rest of the area. . . .
- 6. Merger with the Arab Legion would improve the rag-tag Syrian Army so long as the Legion's UK officers were retained.

DISADVANTAGES

- 1. Syria is internally divided, unstable, and Army controlled; it has troubles with Israel in the Huleh area.
- 2. The Syrians are rooted, to a degree, in republicanism and have a low opinion of all the Jordanian Royal family, whereas the latter would probably be unwilling to renounce the throne in Jordan in favor of a republican regime.
- 3. Syria could possibly eventually assume the financial burdens of Jordan but not so quickly as Iraq. Initially they could give no assistance to Jordan.
- 4. Syria is presently in a bitter mood toward US and UK and the "Dawalibi psychology" might be extended to Jordan.
  - 5. The UK Treaty question would be extremely difficult.
- 6. If UK influence remained, a clash between the UK and France might be expected, particularly in view latter's belief, that it has a special position in Syria.

OTHER ALTERNATIVES AND POSSIBILITIES

The alternatives previously mentioned are those which have a chance of being accomplished relatively peaceably. There are several other alternatives and possibilities which would probably involve military action of one sort or another, but which may nevertheless confront us:

1. The ex-Mufti's Gaza Government will emerge from shadow to substance in Arab-Palestine; Jordan to be confined to the eastern bank. The disadvantages of this are obvious and enormous, and the US should oppose this development by every possible means.

2. Arab-Palestine and/or Jordan to be partitioned among neighboring Arab States and possibly Israel; Ibn Saud's claim to the Aqaba-Ma'an region (as stated in the 1927 exchange of letters attached to the Treaty of Jidda with the UK) to be recognized. The Arab Legion would resist by force any attempt made in this direction.

3. Israel to annex old Palestine; Jordan to remain independent on the eastern bank or another Arab State, such as Iraq, to annex Jordan up to the eastern bank. From the point of view of easing Israel's immigration and territorial problems and making its frontiers more natural, this proposal has much merit. However, the Arab States would resist to the last ditch and the US and UK would be in for a bad time in the Arab World if it supported such territorial acquisition by Israel.

4. A military protectorate over British tutelage to be established in Jordan. The severity of reaction in the Arab World to this would be tremendous.

Conclusions

Of all the alternatives mentioned above, number 1, that is the maintenance of the status quo, is the least risky. The US and UK do not have much to lose under this alternative, and from the standpoint of the UK strategic position the status quo may well be the best arrangement. It would also save us the trouble of trying to reconcile Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Lebanon and Israel. In any event, the US and UK should not take the initiative in advancing proposals to bring about a change in the status of Jordan since this would give credence to the "grand imperialist design" idea.

However, it seems inevitable that pressures will increase in Iraq, in Jordan and among the majority political party in Syria for unification of Iraq and Jordan, of Iraq, Syria and Jordan, or more remotely, of Syria and Jordan alone. When and if such a movement develops, it will be equivocal as to whether it has popular support in the countries concerned and whether it can jell in the face of opposition from other Arab States. The determining factor, which will likely move the train of events in one way or another, is the US and UK attitude.

The Western Powers may well harbor some legitimate fears as to the effect of the Arab union movement on their own interests and how the Israel-Arab situation would be affected. However, considering the problem in a deeper psychological sense, it is possible that the US and the UK would be "missing the boat" if they took a negative or indifferent attitude toward a genuine unification movement. The Arab nihilism of today, which is resulting in a gradual disintegration of the US and UK position in the Near East, is undoubtedly a product of defeatism and frustration. Any step, even a partial one, towards realization of deep-seated Arab aspirations may do more than any sums of money that could be poured into that part of the world to create that psychological something called "the will to resist" aggression from outside. The US and UK will win no gratitude for supporting an Arab union, and, as pointed out previously, they may well be confronted with some "muscle-flexing". Nevertheless, it is possible we have something real to gain in giving the northern Arab States a sense of having achieved something positive. The new life thereby breathed into the nihilistic Near Eastern atmosphere may for the time being diminish Arab preoccupation with anti-Western ideas.

Moreover, the possibility should not be overlooked that the Arab Union movement will gain impetus and come upon us notwithstanding and that instead of controlling events, events will control us. It would only be prudent to try to control the movement so that we would be in a position to salvage our vital interests as a price for our support. Later the movement may be completely in the hands of extremist elements and beyond our control. If we support a merger, we should, in view of the relatively greater stability offered, lean in the direction of unification with Iraq.

There should be several important conditions attached to our support for any merger of Jordan with another Arab State namely: (1) All international obligations of Jordan will be continued in good faith, particularly the UK Treaty and the Armistice Agreement with Israel (unless the parties to these treaties and agreements should deem it mutually desirable that they be renegotiated or superseded by some other mutually satisfactory arrangement).

(2) The unified state should give appropriate guarantees of non-aggressive intent and respect for the independence and territorial integrity of all other neighboring states. We should require that Iraq, if it is to be the predominate power, endeavor to mend its fences with Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Lebanon. Some form of easement or territorial concession to Ibn-Saud in the Aqaba-Ma'an region may be a useful gambit in this.

A difficult problem would be posed in connection with relations with Israel and the status of Arab-Palestine which has not been recognized (even by the Arabs) as under Jordan sovereignty. Israel would oppose, possibly to the last ditch, its being taken over by Iraq. If a merger goes forward, it would take the utmost diplomatic pressure and probably invocation of the Tripartite Declaration to persuade Israel not to seize the territory by force. At the same time, we should make it clear that we would not recognize Iraq's or any other Arab State's claim to the territory unless the Iraqis are willing to negotiate a settlement with Israel or at the very least, abide by the terms of the Jordan-Israel Armistice Agreement.

CONFIDENTIAL PRIORITY

Amman, July 31, 1951—noon.

- 51. In meeting with new PriMin Tawfiq Pasha Abul Uda July 31 held at his request he summarized gen govt policy and situation as fol:
- 1. Assassination: Not over 100 persons mostly associates of murderer now in custody of which some 15 may be brought to trial by special court to be established at once. 50 additional persons detained for investigation have been released. Only persons killed in mosque were King and murderer plus 6 members Royal Guard wounded. PriMin assured me accuracy his facts which shld effectively refute greatly exaggerated rumors and reports abroad about reign of terror in Pal and mass arrests.
- 2. Econ situation: Govt fears alignment Mufti org with Commies may capitalize on drought induced econ distress to create disorders which in turn wld be utilized by neighbors to intervene in Jordan. When new Parliament convenes Sept he will submit for its approval urgent econ relief program for which he will seek our aid. He asked me to notify Dept of forthcoming request but did not specify further. He was not impressed by my outline of pending legis for continuing refugee aid and MSP assistance which he welcomes for long range benefits but fears of no help in immed crisis.

3. Israel relations: Govt will enforce strict observance armistice agreement but will not continue Abdullah's policy of seeking bilateral settlement with Israel. It will join any collective step by other Arab state or wld follow Egypt's lead in peace move. I reminded him our continuing interest in and support of restoration normal relations between Israel and Arab states. He hoped I cld help reassure Israel of his pacific intentions.

4. Greater Syria: PriMin said govt will not perpetuate Abdullah's Greater Syria policy for which he expressed personal distaste. When I recalled tripartite declaration he assured me Jordan wld never play aggressive role. He dismissed any idea of union with Iraq in near future but hinted at close relations with certain neighbors (probably Iraq, possibly Syria as well) and eventual union of Arab states by peaceful means.

5. Royal succession: PriMin said constitutional procedures wld be followed; expressed loyalty to both Naif and Tallal and indicated guarded optimism re latter's health which already benefited by removal of tensions arising from conflict with late father. He hopes in next three weeks Tallal's mental condition may be clarified.

I was favorably impressed by serene and statesmanlike attitude of PriMin towards problems of future. He is determined to maintain Jordan sovereignty and independence but not afraid to break with personal policies of late King such as his . . . hostility to Arab League and Egypt in particular, and Greater Syria scheme.

He sought earliest possible mtg with me as he regards UK and US as foremost allies. His frank invitation to maintain close personal contacts and offer him advice on matters common interest augurs well for continuation of close assoc enjoyed with predecessor Samir Rifai.

If hostile or ambitious neighbors can be deterred from fishing in Jordan waters US and UK wld be justified in reasonable optimism that Jordan will continue friend of West and element of polit, mil stability in area. Baghdad, August 8, 1951.

A-144. In the course of a conversation this morning with Shakr al Wadi, Acting Minister for Foreign Affairs, the subject of union with Jordan arose and Shakr Pasha discussed it at some length. Although he was circumspect in his approach and guarded in language he conveyed two basic thoughts, both of which are of interest and importance.

The first was that the Iraqi Government and the people as a whole, including the extremist elements, were in favor of such a union; that with the removal of King Abdullah from the scene Jordan would tend to fall apart and that the only thing which was holding it together was the Arab Legion, an instrument of British policy; that as time went on the pressure against British influence and control would grow, possibly to such proportions as to result in disorder and chaos; that the time was approaching in Jordan and Iraq when the Arabs would have to take control and assume responsibility for their own affairs; and that this could best be accomplished by a union of the two countries, possibly under one King.

The second was that the Regent and the Government of Iraq were fully aware of the sources of hostility to such a union and in deference to those there was no intention to move rashly or quickly; that nothing would be done without the greatest care and consideration of all the factors involved; that the purpose of the Iraq Government was to create conditions of stability and not instability and that this would take time and careful planning. He said they were awaiting with interest the outcome of the elections in Jordan and the decisions taken by the Jordan Parliament at its meeting the end of August. He mentioned among those elements which were against a union the Palestinians resident in Jordan, who were by no means assimilated, and he gave it as his opinion that any unconsidered or hasty action by the Iraq Government would result in immediate seizure by Israel of the parts of Palestine now incorporated into Jordan.

Comment: I am inclined to accept Shakr Pasha's intimations that the Iraq Government and Regent do not intend to make any ill-considered precipitate moves in the direction of union. This reflects the views expressed by the Prime Minister and other members of the Government, although it is of course in the Arab nature to state what the listener wants to hear and some weight must be given to that consideration. I have, however, been impressed by the strength of the convictions entertained here that union with Jordan must be effected at some time or other and I believe that every effort will be made by the Hashemite House of Iraq to create and establish, as circumstances may permit, conditions precedent and favorable of such a union.

The Department will not have overlooked the intimation expressed by Shakr Pasha that British control and influence is becoming unwelcome as time goes by, not only in Jordan but in Iraq.

53. It is time to call a halt to the intrigues of Jordan's neighbors over the disposal of her far from prostrate form.

In Amman the Iraqi Min is flagrantly continuing the campaign for union of Jordan and Iraq started by Nuri Said at the time of Abdullah's funeral. It is widely reported that Egypt Leg is agitating for independence of West Jordan (former Arab Pal) under mandate of the Arab League and the Saudi Arabian Leg for partition, northern Jordan going to Syria and southern part to Saudi. Reference to these intrigues is found in Damas tel 69 <sup>2</sup> to Dept Aug 6 and Jidda tel 68, Aug 5.<sup>2</sup>

While there is as yet no indication that Jordan will be willing pawn in these maneuvers they are having disturbing influence on internal polit sit and can hardly fail to comfort the ex-Mufti and his followers. Externally they are bound to disturb the precarious equilibrium which has prevailed in the NE since 1948. (For Israeli reactions see Depoirtel 81 July 26.)<sup>2</sup>

I hesitate to suggest that we, either alone or in concert with UK and Fr undertake démarches through our diplomatic reps for fear that anti-West forces in certain countries seize on such action to allege for intervention. I recall the adverse reaction in Syria to our approach to that govt when in March 1950 it was threatening to close the border with Jordan.

However, I do recommend that we consider the denunciation in Wash jointly with identical statements by UK and Fr in London and Paris of corollary to tripartite decision of May 25, 1950 to the gen effect that we oppose any alteration of status quo in NE unless people affected by proposed change of sovereignty are given opportunity freely to express their wishes respecting the change. I believe such statement wld clearly fall within the purview of tripartite decision. It wld probably be well recd Leb and remaining NE states cld hardly oppose it openly. It might lay to rest suspicions of Brit connivance at Iraq–Jordan union (Damas tel 42 July 23). At least it wld encourage Jordan Govt to require diplo reps recd by it to conform to accepted usage and cease their scandalous intrigue.

Dept will appreciate that I have only touched on highlights of sit which susceptible of extensive elaboration. Other possible lines of action may occur to Dept such as statement in sense suggested not tied to tripartite dec; confining action to UK and US or alternatively oral representations to missions concerned in Wash and London. My personal preference wild be for course proposed in preceding para.

785.00/9-2051: Despatch

The Minister in Jordan (Drew) to the Department of State 1

CONFIDENTIAL No. 69

Amman, September 20, 1951.

I have just returned from my first private audience with His Majesty King Talal I. I carefully refrained from discussing any official business with him having in mind the heavy load he has had to carry during the two weeks since his return from Switzerland. Aside from the physical and mental strain which he underwent in connection with his return and assumption of office, he has been obliged to receive countless deputations of Jordanians of all degrees, as well as official delegations from Iraq, Syria and Egypt, with delegations from Saudi-Arabia and Lebanon on the horizon.

While I never knew Talal intimately in the past, I found him seemingly completely normal and quite his old self. He is naturally a timid, soft-spoken and almost self-effacing person. In the course of our brief conversation this morning, he visibly opened up and became more expansive as we discussed trivial personal matters such as the forthcoming departure for England of Crown Prince Hussein to attend school at Harrow. In connection with some of the sensational reports published abroad regarding the anti-British sentiments of the young Crown Prince, it is not without interest that the King mentioned that Hussein was delighted to go to Harrow, where his cousin, King Feisal of Iraq is also a student.

If the King has retained any trace of abnormal mental condition, it was certainly not apparent to my untrained eye. Other visitors who have seen him have all gained the same impression. I have been reliably informed that people who have seen him together with Queen Zain and their children have found them a happily reunited and normal family displaying every indication of deep mutual affection.

Immediately after Talal returned an incident occurred which gave rise momentarily to fear that his mental recovery might not have been complete. The night of September 7, his brother, Prince Naif, appeared at the Italian Hospital to request asylum, alleging that Talal had threatened his life. This blew over in a day or so and apparently arose from some intrigue on the part of the two Turkish Princes, cousins of Prince Naif, who arrived in Amman shortly after Naif assumed the Regency. Evidently they persuaded Naif that Talal was gunning for him and that his life was in danger. It is quite understandable that Talal was not pleased with Naif when he learned that his younger brother was party to the plot to seize the throne as reported in Legtel 75 of Sept. 4, 2 p.m.2 Reportedly he had refused to speak to Naif. Subsequently, however, Naif's wife, Princess Sultana, through Queen Zain, was able to effect a reconciliation between the brothers and they are known to have gone to the Mosque to pray together on September 12. In addition, King Talal has appointed Naif a Major-General in the Arab Legion.

The assumption of the throne by Talal and his apparent restoration to good health continue to be well received by the Jordan public. The King himself seems to be doing very well indeed. He has carried off his royal functions with all the aplomb and dignity which he inherited from his late father. He is reliably reported to want to withdraw as much as possible from intervention in the internal political affairs of the country and to rule as a constitutional Monarch. This would fit in with the constitutional changes proposed by the Prime Minister in his address to Parliament on September 18. (See Legation's Despatch No. 68 of Sept. 20, 1951). Talal has also stated that he will not receive any journalists or newspapermen of any nationality. In view of the many false statements which have appeared about him in the foreign press, his attitude in that regard can be understood, even though it is quite possible that he will eventually recede from this stand.

The Department will doubtless have learned through the press of the issuance of a royal decree naming Hussein as Crown Prince and successor to the throne. While this act was not required under the constitution, it should have the result of clarifying the situation and making it more difficult for the royal succession to be placed in question in the event of Talal's death or incompetency.

On the international scene all is quiet. When the Prime Minister in his address to Parliament stated that neither he nor his colleagues were thinking of union with Iraq, in my opinion it closed the door to any further agitation as far as Jordan is concerned for union with Iraq or any other move to combine with or be divided among its neighbors.

To the gratified surprise of observers of the Jordan scene, the country now appears to have successfully survived the crisis caused by the assassination of King Abdullah and to have emerged into waters as calm as can be hoped for in this part of the world. There are only two clouds on the horizon; one is the severe economic crisis through which the country is passing and the other is the fear that irresponsible nationalist members of Parliament will agitate for abrogation of the treaty with Britain and ejection of British officers from the Arab Legion with the naturally serious political complications which would ensue. Other than those factors, there are reasonable grounds to hope that Jordan may carry on under Talal pretty much as in the past, remaining a friend of Great Britain and other western democracies and a useful area of resistance to Communist expansion in the Near East.

The British appear to think that all is quiet as Glubb Pasha is going off on leave for a month and Sir Alec Kirkbride plans to go fishing in Aqaba for several weeks.

ESTABLISHMENT OF A UNITED STATES CONSULATE IN KUWAIT

NEA Files: Lot 57 D 177: "Kuwait, 1950"

[Washington,] December 29, 1950.

Subject: Exequatur for United States Consul in Kuwait

Reference is made to your memorandum of December 13, 1950,<sup>2</sup> addressed to NE—Mr. G. Lewis Jones, which was referred to the Office of the Legal Adviser for an appraisal of the importance of the legal principle involved in the question of signature of the exequatur to be issued to an American Consul to be stationed in Kuwait. You state that the British Government insists that under its 1899 treaty with Kuwait the British King should sign such an exequatur, and that furthermore the British have formally rejected the United States' compromise suggestion that the exequatur might be signed by both the British King and the Sheikh of Kuwait.

The memorandum reported that the opening of an office in Kuwait had been the subject of discussion between the Department of State and the British for approximately three years. The British recognized the need for an American Consulate in Kuwait but had been reluctant to allow one because they feared similar demands from other countries, which might expose Kuwait to disturbing influences. The most troublesome matter, however, involved the issuance of an exequatur. The British Government insisted that since it was authorized by an 1899 agreement with Kuwait to control its foreign relations, the British King should sign the exequatur; and it had rejected the U.S. compromise solution that the exequatur be signed both by the British King and the Sultan of Kuwait. The Embassy in London reported that the Foreign Office was adamant, and if the United States wanted to open an office in Kuwait it would have to be on the basis of an exequatur signed by the King.

Awalt's December 13 memorandum concluded that the problem was purely legalistic and the U.S. decision would have to rest on whether the principle or the office was most important to us. Since the 150 U.S. nationals in Kuwait were expected to be joined by large additional numbers with the anticipated discovery of oil by Aminoil in the Neutral Zone, Awalt recommended opening a Consulate in Kuwait under the British terms. He suggested, however, that the matter first be referred to the Legal Adviser for an appraisal of the importance of the legal principle involved. (NEA Files: Lot 57 D 177: "Kuwait, 1950, Establishment of a Consulate")

Unless this Government were disposed to refuse to recognize that the British Government had any authority over the foreign relations of Kuwait, or unless the Sheikh of Kuwait was unwilling to receive our consul under such circumstances, it would appear that there are no legal objections to accepting the exequatur prepared in the form suggested by the British Government.

It is the practice of this Government and of many other Governments to issue to a foreign consul an exequatur signed by the head of the receiving government, as evidence of his recognition as consul. However, the exequatur is only evidence of recognition. Hackworth (IV: 666) states that recognition need not follow any prescribed form. It may be in the nature of a communication, written or oral, formal or informal, addressed by the foreign office to the local diplomatic representative of the consul's state or to the consul himself. Under the 1899 treaty between Great Britain and Kuwait, the Sheikh will not "receive the Agent or Representative of any Power or Government . . . without the consent of the British Government." If the British wish to signify their consent to the Sheikh's receiving our consul by issuing him an exequatur, signed by the King, and the Sheikh is satisfied to receive a foreign consul who has been issued such an exequatur, without insisting on co-signing the document, or issuing a formal document under his own signature, it would not appear that the United States was in a position to object.

It is true that in acquiescing in the exequatur issued by the British Government the United States will have recognized that the British do exercise a degree of control over the foreign relations of Kuwait. However, the United States is hardly in a position to insist further upon acceptance of its own interpretation of the 1899 treaty. The United States is not a party to that treaty, and the treaty does not affect any right of the United States. If the Sheikh is satisfied with the British interpretation, that would seem to end the matter. The acquiescence of the United States to this procedure does not, however, constitute recognition that the Sheikh possesses no sovereignty at all, as the Sheikh's action in receiving our consul, and perhaps issuing him a berat, may be considered as an exercise of his sovereignty. A determination of the measure of sovereignty he retains might well be allowed to wait until such time as the then existing circumstances require the United States to take some positive action on an important question.

Kuwait, July 8, 1951.

No. 2

Subject: Call on His Highness esh Sheikh Abdullah Salem es Sabah In accordance with arrangements made by H. G. Jakins, Political Agent in Kuwait, I called on His Highness the Ruler of Kuwait, Sheikh Abdullah Salem es Sabah at 8:00 a. m. on Sunday, July 1, 1951. At the request of Mr. Jakins, I arrived at the Agency at 7:50 and we proceeded to Dasman Palace in his automobile.

His Highness greeted us at the second floor stair landing just outside the room devoted to his morning maglis. He extended his hand and spoke a word of welcome in precise English. We then entered his chamber and were seated.

The interview lasted thirty minutes and was conducted with Mr. Jakins acting as interpreter. He speaks quite fluent Arabic but in general ignores the niceties of formula expression with which the speech of the Kuwaitis I have heard is very much concerned. I found Mr. Jakins' speech relatively easy to follow and his translations adequate although somewhat short. His Highness speaks in a low almost rumbling voice which I found in the initial interview difficult if not impossible to follow.

His Highness expressed the hope that I would find it possible to adjust myself to the heat and living conditions in Kuwait and enquired as to when my staff would arrive and where the consulate and residence would be established. I explained that I was engaged in looking at available buildings and that it had seemed better for me to come out alone to select accommodations and have the staff and furnishings follow in a month or so when there would be provision to receive them. I inquired if His Highness would care to make a suggestion about a suitable location, and he quoted in return an Arabic proverb to the effect that seeking would provide a suggestion.

His Highness then made a long statement to the effect that the American and the British people are friends, and that they are both his friends and that it would be this way in Kuwait; that all business and relations would be conducted in a spirit of cooperation. I thanked His Highness for the expression of this sentiment and assured him that it was in this spirit of friendly cooperation that the American government and people regarded Kuwait and the relationships that would arise from the establishment of a consulate in Kuwait.

His Highness then asked Mr. Jakins if he had any late news, and Mr. Jakins summarized briefly the status of plans for cease fire discussions in Korea and the developments in Abadan with regard to the so called anti-sabotage law.

His Highness apologized for being unable to offer coffee or other refreshment because of its being the month of Ramadhan. I replied that rather I must thank him for being kind enough to receive me. Mr. Jakins then asked if we might be excused. His Highness accompanied us to the door of the car where he said goodbye in English and shook hands holding my hand in the way of the Arab and applying a series of pressures, which act is difficult to interpret as to whether it means great pleasure at meeting, an effort to communicate more completely and express sincerity, or merely a reaction of custom.

During the drive back to the Agency, Mr. Jakins spoke of the contrast between the present Ruler and the previous one; he noted particularly that he felt the present ruler to be more understanding of problems and easier to deal with. He described the previous ruler as having an autocratic bearing with a stubborn element in his makeup.

The Ruler is certainly impressive in his quiet dignity, and although he appeared somewhat tired, probably as a result of the rigors of fasting, he managed to convey by his looks and smiles a feeling of sincere friendliness.

This news was bombshell since Busson was top exponent Fr influence this area. Up to now there have been no indications that Fr wld accede to any such move in direction of decreasing her own influence or that Leb auths wld dare bring pressure for such action. This wld not necessarily apply to action by Syrian auths.

Leg has been attempting to ascertain motivations, especially whether initiative came from Fr or from Syria-Leb. Authoritative sources are reticent, but best guess, based on background info and persons usually well informed, is that Busson's resignation was requested because bank's board in Paris (1) was displeased at his involvement in deals on side which netted him and friends large personal profits, and (2) that appointment his enemy, Philip Takla, as Leb FinMin June 7 presaged difficulties for bank. Leg desp 669 2 gives further background.

Busson's removal makes it possible that hitherto dominant Fr influence in Leb financial affairs may decline, at least for next year or two until successor can get his roots down. Possibility exists that hitherto poorly organized Leb MinFin under Takla may be modernized and may pursue policy less restricted by influence of Fr controlled, semi-monopolistic, unregulated bank.

Leg believes we cld take advantage this situation by offering Takla (1) Amer team of fiscal experts to modernize present muddled budgetary and accounting system of ministry of [apparent omission] (2) financial assistance under mutual security program when approved by Congress for implementing Point IV surveys already under way, or both. October. He saw no objections in principle but repeated opinion he expressed June 9 that he would have to pick an appropriate time.

In my opinion, Malik, while understanding, friendly and helpful, not above indulging in exaggeration where Arab interests are involved. However it is hard to exaggerate intensity of Leb anti-Israel feelings which are number one deterrent to our aims here since we are labelled as number one Israel friend (see Leg despatch number 20, July 10).6 It will be recalled that we signed Point Four agreement with Leb right after similar one with Israel. Pres told me at that time he wanted agreement word for word like that of Egypt and did not mention Israel angle. Lebs may slightly soften when we get to handing out economic and military grant aid if we are not too delicate to connect that with treaty matter. Leg suggests above be evaluated in connection with immediate advantages Dept expects will be gained from Israel treaty, and that Dept consider whether latter might be postponed to October–November, also taking into account highly touchy feelings in this area intensified by recent political assassinations.

When Malik discussed proposals for strengthening Leb-Amer relations with me in 1949 (memo of conv Mar 4, 1949)<sup>3</sup> we talked of FCN Treaty as logical first step toward bringing about closer US-Leb relations which Lebs at time seemed desire. The Chargé in Lebanon (Bruins) to the Department of State 1

Выкит, August 9, 1951—2 р. m.

132. Dept pass Cairo. After talks with Charles Malik and FonMin July 20 (Legtel 65, July 21)<sup>2</sup> on FCN treaty negotiations, I decided in view of FonMins desire to postpone talks until Chamber of Deputies adjourns (now planned for Aug 21) and in view some press items to effect Legation is trying to force assistance upon Lebanese, that a period of letting Lebs authorities alone would be best tactics for present. Consequently I have made no appointments at FonOff since July 20 and when social opportunities offered have remarked to appropriate officials that door is open for discussions on aid and FCN any time but since all this is primarily for benefit of Lebs, we are not urging matter and further initiative is up to them.

Deptel 108, July 30 <sup>3</sup> directing exactly same procedure as regards FCN was most timely. I conveyed message in it to Malik Aug 1, the very day before he had a long discussion with the Pres and entire cab covering various angles of Leb-US relations. No such conference had ever been held before. Malik's immediate reaction was one of seriousness and a desire to confer about it with high authorities. He said it put a big responsibility on him and he was very glad to have Dept's views before conference of Aug 2. Thereafter, he said he wanted to have another private talk with FonMin, and other officials before giving me full report.

Meanwhile on occasion US fleet visit Aug 6, I had long talk with PriMin (Legdesp 69, Aug 7)<sup>4</sup> mainly on Communist danger in which he concluded that with our help he wanted to make Leb a leader and a model among Arab states toward alignment with West without losing its own national characteristics. I said we certainly welcomed this statement and would be happy to have Leb be first Arab country to sign FCN treaty with US and did he think Leb wld have the courage to do it. He replied he personally wld favor it, but could not make further promises at present.

Aug 8 Malik said he could now convey definite reaction of his govt on FCN, namely that attitude toward US continues friendly and they agree in principle but regard present time politically most inopportune for concluding matter. He said postponement is not due to Soviet influences but almost entirely to situation in and among Arab states. Leb relations with Syria are in bad state not to mention chaos in Syrian Govt. Throne of Jordania swaying in air. Egypt is especially touchy due to canal situation and difficulties with British. In fact there could hardly be a worse moment politically for Leb to step out and sign treaty.

I reminded Malik of statement in Deptel 108 that signature has long been postponed for variety of reasons having no relation to treaty itself and thus Leb is merely continuing to recant as before. He said this is true but we could not expect Lebanon to deal with US independently of its relations with neighbors. He added there are no present impediments to continued smooth political and economic relations between US and Lebanon and as in past minor troubles can be dealt with through normal channels whether there is a treaty or not, also that US has similar relations with many European and other countries and has given them large amounts of aid without existence of comparable treaty relationship.

To my inquiry whether Lebanon is not reading more into this treaty than is really in it, since we regard it as logical first step toward closer relations rather than as fruition of friendship, Malik replied both Lebanon and neighbors wld regard treaty as political move having important implications in Arab world and that this govt simply will not take the step until general situation improves. They regard expected ratification this month of Point Four agreement by Chamber of Deputies as being as much of a forward step [as] they could take with US under existing circumstances.

For present Legation will continue tactics outlined in Deptel 108 unless otherwise instructed.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (McGhee) 1

SECRET

[Washington,] August 30, 1951.

Participants:

Dr. Charles Malik, Minister of Lebanon

Mr. George Hakim, Counselor, Legation of Lebanon

Mr. George C. McGhee, Asst. Secretary, NEA

Mr. G. Lewis Jones, Director, NE

Dr. Charles Malik returned very recently from a stay of approximately three months in the Lebanon and, as he told me in our first talk on August 28,<sup>2</sup> he brought back with him a wide range of instructions from the new Lebanese Government regarding U.S.-Lebanese relations. Those instructions cover the social, economic and defense fields. It was the latter category that Dr. Malik proposed that we discuss at lunch today.

Mr. Malik started off with the assertion that the most unkind thing the Western Powers could do for the Middle Eastern States is to be passive and neutral regarding developments there. He hoped that the Western Powers would reconcile their differences and henceforth pursue a more forthright policy in the area. He said that there was a difference between old fashioned imperialism and exploitation and firm but friendly guidance. The Near Eastern States clearly needed western tutelage. He admitted that a firmer line by the Western Powers would give rise to Soviet charges of imperialism and intervention. He believed, however, that "you cannot please everybody" and that the Western Powers should, in their own interest, as well as the interest of the Near East, be willing to give firm guidance when this is required. . . . He did not think that the Western Powers should be squeamish.

Mr. Malik, denying that he was in any sense a military man, advanced the thesis that the U.S.-UK-France must desire a defense structure in the general area of the Near East. The Lebanon and most of the NE States, with the exception of Iraq and Saudi Arabia, are Mediterranean countries. Consequently, he suggested that all of the states of the Mediterranean, "including Spain", should be bound into some form of Mediterranean Pact in which the U.S. and UK would participate. He thought that Egypt would be interested in such a pact. He knew that the Lebanon would be; he thought the Syrians would also be receptive and, by "special arrangement", Israel could be in such a pact. Mr. Malik said that there could be no objection to Iraq and Saudi Arabia, if they desired to do so, adhering to the Mediterranean Pact.

What did I think?

I replied that in our strategic thinking we looked first to the threat. The threat to the NE would take the form of a Soviet thrust from the north and east (via Iran, Iraq and Turkey). It was most unlikely that Lebanon would be threatened from the Mediterranean where Soviet activity would likely be confined to submarine action designed to cut the supply line. The defense of the Near East should take place in the mountains of Turkey and Iraq. It is for this reason that we conceived the Arab States and Israel as a strategic entity. Yugoslavia, Italy and Spain had almost nothing in common with Iraq, Syria and Saudi Arabia in defense matters.

I told Mr. Malik that he had undoubtedly seen press references to a Near East Command Structure. There was nothing firm I could tell him on this subject, but if such a command, supported by the U.S., UK, France, Turkey and Egypt came into being, would the Lebancn cooperate? Mr. Malik replied that he was sure that the Lebanon would cooperate in any scheme which (a) did not jeopardize Lebanon's membership in the Arab League, and (b) did not alter Lebanon's attachment to the Mediterranean. He said the Lebanon was full of ideas regarding defense. He had in his pocket lists of military matériel which the Lebanon proposed to seek from the United States. He looked forward to talking to me about these lists. He indicated that the Lebanon was resolved to stay in the camp of the West and that too much importance should not be attached to the minor "go-slow tactics" of the Lebanese Government with a view to displaying solidarity with the other Arab States. The decision had been made and the Lebanon would not go back on it.

Mr. Jones said that the area defense concept inevitably brought up the problem of Israel. In two wars the communication facilities of Israel and Haifa Harbor had been of the utmost importance. Israel, on geographic grounds, must be part of any area defense pattern. From the political point of view, Israel was solidly Western oriented.

Mr. Malik and Mr. Hakin did not take exception to this statement. I told Mr. Malik that I was very glad to have his assurance regarding the firm will of Lebanon to defend itself. It came as no surprise to me because the President of the Lebanon, when I talked with him last Spring 3 had given me similar assurances. The key element it seemed to me was "will". The will to resist is the element upon which the United States and the Western Powers can build. Clear examples of this are Greece and Turkey. Their will came first and the aid followed. Unfortunately, neutralist talk in the Arab States was not helpful in attracting aid for them. Demonstrations of will, on the other hand, are likely to produce results; and Arab State should say to the U.S.: "these are our plans to strengthen ourselves militarily. We would like your help but whether or not you give it, we are determined to carry these plans through."

I said that it seemed to me that the Arab States who refuse to stand up and be counted on the side of the West are doing themselves and the world at large a disservice. I appreciated that there was nothing in Arab "neutralism" comparable to the "neutralism" of Nehru. Just the same, Congress, if it is to be sympathetic, must have some positive signs of Arab will to go upon.

Mr. Malik said that he thought the Arabs would give us signs—witness what he had just told me about the attitude of Lebanon—but that we should not be discouraged if they are somewhat slow. The West, on its side, has done very little for the Arabs for a long time. The problem of Israel and the refugees is still upon the scene. The United States and the other Western Powers must have patience in their dealings with the Arabs, realizing that their heart is in the right place.

The conversation was inconclusive. Mr. Malik, on his side, produced the idea of complete Lebanese goodwill toward the West. For my part, I hope I left him with the impression that the West is not indifferent to the defense problems of the Near East but, on the contrary, is giving the matter the most careful study.

488. I took opportunity in convers with Pres last night to give summary my impressions Leb-Amer relations, speaking in French from extensive notes I had made earlier. I spoke along lines mytel 482, Nov 7,¹ beginning by statement my pleasure fine reception here,² evident goodwill which exists toward my country, and of high level of life and leadership in Lebanon. But, I added, in spite these favorable conditions I regretted to observe that attitude Leb Govt on many matters, which I enumerated and of which Dept is well aware, have been negative and uncooperative. This seemed to add up, I declared, to a rather unfriendly policy on part Leb Govt. Pres Khoury admitted there has been reserve on part Leb Govt but, as Abi Chahla had declared, this derives not from unfriendliness, but from atmosphere created by numerous conditions.

I said that it seems to me Lebanon and NE have arrived at important crossroad. A policy of neutrality or non-coop cld bring disaster, while one of coop with Western powers in MEC 3 and Point Four cld on contrary be salvation of NE. Pres agreed with this statement and said Leb leaders have every intention of following Western powers. Returning to question of Leb-Amer Relations I pointed out that long failure Leb Govt to ratify Point Four agreement or appropriate money did not show desire to have Point Four aid, nor did it reflect President's frequently stated strong desire to make Lebanon a shining example of development in NE. Time I said, is running out and fund wld have to be allocated where needed and wanted. I felt that my govt wld not desire to press any country to receive aid and therefore I doubted if it was prepared to take further action on Point Four until Lebanon showed more desire for aid and willingness to do its part. Pres replied that he is indeed keen on this aid but he gave usual excuses as to delay in ratification of agreement.

I referred to Pres's conv with Lenahan of MedReCo and indicated that in business field there seems to be great reserve as to investment of capital in Lebanon. Pres denied that Lebanon "has drunk of Iranian wine" and urged me to use influence with companies to be more considerate of Lebanon, which is small and short of dollar exchange, and not take legalistic and narrow attitude. I replied that I thought companies were genuinely concerned at drift of events and wld require assurances from Leb Govt.

Convers was carried out in frank and entirely friendly atmosphere. Pres is man of good will, but I am not sure he is able or willing to take advanced pro-American attitude at this time when feelings are running high. He stated, hopefully I thought, that whereas in Egypt and Iran govt has lost control to the mobs, this has not happened in Lebanon. Nothing in our convers altered my opinion that a policy of "friendly firmness" toward Lebanon is required at this time.

Editorial Note

On November 9, 1951, McGhee and Kopper had a final talk with Malik before his departure from Washington for Paris as a member of the Lebanese Delegation to the United Nations General Assembly. Most of the conversation reflected United States concern over abrogation of the 1936 Anglo-Egyptian Agreement and rejection by Egypt of the Middle East Command proposals. For a summary of this portion of the conversation, see the extracts of the memorandum of conversation by Gnade, November 9, page 419.

The only reference in the memorandum to United States-Lebanese relations appeared in the following paragraph:

"Turning to United States-Lebanese relations, Mr. McGhee asked that Dr. Malik tell Foreign Minister Helou of his deep concern at the many difficulties which had recently arisen in Lebanese-United States common problems. He cited ten points on which there are outstanding differences—points of no enormous importance and which could be easily worked out for the common benefit. Such an uncooperative attitude, he felt, was unbecoming to two countries with such close connections, and he himself was sharply distressed that relations between the two countries were apparently so poor. He did not understand how this could be when President Khouri, Dr. Malik himself, and other Lebanese leaders were always so cordial in their conversations, and the Lebanese ties to this country were so close. Despite this cordiality and these ties, the Lebanese Government actions—and lack of action contradicted the apparent good feeling. During Mr. McGhee's two and one-half years in office he had given earnest and sympathetic interest to Arab problems—refugees, Clapp mission, MSP, TCA, MEC, and so on—but all the United States gets is rebuffs. Although the Arabs have many friends in the United States, Arab-American relations are set back by these constant rebuffs." (McGhee Files: Lot 53 D 468: "Syria and Lebanon 1948—Memoranda")

Memorandum of Conversation, by the First Secretary of Embassy in the United Kingdom (Palmer)

[Paris,] November 19, 1951.

Participants: The Secretary

The Secretary

M. Charles Helou, Lebanese Foreign Secretary

M. Charles Malik, Lebanese Delegation

Mr. Joseph Palmer, United States Delegation <sup>1</sup>

At his request, the Lebanese Foreign Secretary saw the Secretary this afternoon. He began by saying that he wanted the United States to be assured that Lebanon's international position is fundamentally oriented towards the United States and the West. He was aware that lately there have been some points of friction between the US and Lebanon, but he wished to assure the Secretary that these were entirely unintentional, minor in nature, and that they would be removed in the future.

The Foreign Minister went on to say that even prior to the publication of the MEC proposals, the Lebanese Government had made it clear that it does not want the Lebanon's strategic position oriented in any other direction than towards the West. While recognizing the importance of strategic considerations, however, he wished to emphasize that the Lebanon was able to render a more positive service to the West in the moral and cultural fields. He hoped that the West would recognize these contributions of the Lebanon and would place as much importance on them as on the strategic concept. He went on to say that he hoped that the United States looks with favor on stability in the Near East, including the Lebanon, and is prepared to exert its influence towards this end since it is only with U.S. support that the Lebanon can play its role morally, culturally, and strategically. In particular, the Lebanon would like to see a more pointed and specific assurance regarding the U.S. desire to see its independence continued; he hoped very much that we appreciated the importance of maintaining the status quo in the Near East. Any fundamental territorial changes would be detrimental to the Lebanon and to the Near East as a whole. It is a matter of utmost importance to the West that the status quo be preserved, since, to the extent that it is changed, the position of Lebanon will be correspondingly altered with a consequent lessening of its ability to play its role in interpreting the eastern world to the western world and vice versa.

The Secretary stated that he wished to make it clear that we do not regard Lebanon merely as a strategic point on the map. He understood completely what the Foreign Minister meant and wished to assure him that we appreciated and valued Lebanon's role as a cultural and moral force with a great past, present and future. We are extremely anxious to cooperate with the Lebanon. He knew that our two countries have had differences at times; sometimes this is our fault, and we have perhaps occasionally bungled in our approach to problems. But fundamentally our intentions are the best, and we are most anxious to maintain close, friendly and cooperative relations with the Lebanon. We will continue to do our best to work closely with it in all fields.

With respect to the question of Lebanon's independence, the Secretary said the United States believes that stability in the Near East can best be achieved by opposing alterations in the status quo by force. We have made this clear publicly, and we still stand by it. To permit the alteration of the status quo in the Near East by force would only produce friction and instability. We have therefore made it clear that in our view, changes in the status quo could only be established by the free will of the people concerned and not by force. We have had a recent experience in Korea with an attempt to amalgamate two political entities by force, and, in these circumstances, the United Nations has taken a firm stand, and the United States has borne the largest share of the burden. He did not want to go into too many details regarding the action the U.S. would take in a given situation involving a threat to Lebanese sovereignty. He had always made it a practice since he had become Secretary of State, to say "less" rather than "more", since he did not want any misunderstandings in the event that we were called upon to deliver. He felt safe in saying, however, that any attempt to suppress the Lebanon by force would be regarded by the United States as a very serious matter.

The Lebanese Foreign Minister expressed satisfaction at this statement and said that there were three points which he wished to add to his previous remarks. He merely wished to leave these points in the Secretary's mind and would not ask for any comment. (1) He was glad to hear what the Secretary had to say about amalgamations by force, but he also felt that it is necessary to make distinctions in the case of free amalgamations. Some free amalgamations might be freer than others and others might be ipso facto undesirable in themselves. (2) He wished to reiterate his point that the continued existence of the Lebanon constitutes an advantage to the West. (3) He wished to refer to the Lebanon's fear that the continued unrestricted flow of immigrants into Israel might create an explosive situation which would force Israel to burst its borders. In such an event, the Lebanon would be squarely in the path of Israeli expansion.

The Secretary said that he quite understood these points. He agreed that it was necessary to make a distinction in the case of free amalgamations, which, of course, must be looked at in the broader framework of international stability. He wished furthermore to make it clear that we attach great importance to the conception of the Lebanon as a bridge between the East and West, constituting part of both worlds and understanding both worlds.

The Secretary then said he would like to speak more specifically on the defense question. He reviewed the genesis of the MEC proposals, emphasizing that we never considered them to be a solution to the Anglo-Egyptian problem, but that we did envisage them as constituting an avenue which would lead to a solution of that problem. He expressed concern that Egypt seemed bent, as a point of national pride, on persuading the other Arab states to reject the proposals as it had done. He regarded this as contrary to Egypt's own interests. So long as the proposals remain open, they constitute a multilateral approach to the whole area defense problem through which Egypt could, in the course of time, possibly find a solution to its current problems with the U.K. But, if Egypt and the other Arab states closed the door, he foresaw no other possible way out for Egypt.

The Foreign Minister replied that insofar as lies within his country's power, it will always exert its influence in the direction of amity and concord. It would continue to concert and consult with its sister Arab states. The Lebanon has not yet committed itself regarding the MEC proposals but will do its utmost to promote their careful consideration.

Editorial Note

Telegram 562, November 30, from Beirut reported that the Point Four general agreement had been ratified in parliamentary debate on November 27 and that the Lebanese President and Prime Minister were reported to be pleased by the action. The Legation added that although stress had been placed on the fact that the agreement was purely economic, many deputies and other Lebanese felt that its passage marked the end of Lebanese neutrality in the East-West struggle and the beginning of cooperation with the West and the United States in particular. At courtesy call on King following arrival he particularly stressed sovereignty problem in connection DAF agreement. He had be careful domestic reaction by uneducated and foreign reaction by certain Arab ill-wishers. He hoped we would be indulgent if Saudi negotiators dwelt on points bearing on this subject. Night session that day and three long sessions following day devoted detailed and searching discussion conditions under which military assistance would be accorded. Saudi negotiators were obviously displeased by strictures imposed by law and bore down hard in attempt have legal limitations attenuated or to obtain compensating advantages. Principal points covered were:

1. Costs: Exactly how were they determined? Were prices really advantageous? Could SA be assured no other country could purchase more favorably?

2. Military assistance agreement should run for specified period in order guarantee adequate equipment and training in future. Since

For the December negotiating sessions for the renewal of the Dhahran Airfield Agreement between the United States and Saudi Arabia, see telegram 400 from Jidda, December 24, 1950, and footnotes thereto in Foreign Relations, 1950, vol. v, p. 1197. Enclosed with despatch 202, December 23, from Jidda, not printed, was a chronology of the meetings at Riyadh, December 14–23, and a tentatively agreed draft of the first few articles of the Agreement. (786A.5/12-2350) The Ambassador returned to Jidda on December 23, after agreeing that the Americans would go back to Riyadh on December 30 to continue drafting the treaty.

military assistance connected with DAF agreement the periods should be same, i.e., 25 years.<sup>5</sup>

3. Training should include not only use of equipment but articles of war in general. Desire was that SAG military establishment should be given real American imprint.

4. SAG desired commitment that arms specified in JCS recommendations would in fact be furnished.6

5. Guarantee was desired that all equipment would be new. This was point on which King very insistent.

6. Assurance was desired that US would equip and train balanced Saudi Air Force. This a point on which both Prince Mansour and King felt strongly and intended have regardless of difficulty or cost.

7. All expenses of training should be borne by US.

8. Specific assurances should be given re sending Saudi military students to US and they should be given special facilities, particularly re expenses.

9. Provision re non-transfer was objectionable but this point not pressed.

10. Prescribed methods of payment were found very onerous and certain clarification required.

11. Reservation by US of right to divert items or not complete services if found necessary in national interest was found very disturbing since it regarded as placing whole agreement in jeopardy.

On these and other less important points we endeavored explain or give counter argument as case might be but, soften blow as much as we could, it was obvious Saudis were distinctly unhappy when faced with bleak and uncompromising provisions of law.

Discussion terminated on understanding American group would prepare new draft note and seek advice from Washington on certain points (following despatch will cover this matter in full 7).

New Years was a black day for the American group at Riyadh. Up to this time, although progress had been exasperatingly slow and tactics of Saudi negotiators had given new meaning to frustration, we had been forging gradually ahead and only needed complete redraft of remaining articles of DAF agreement in order complete this Despatch 220 from Jidda, January 13, not printed, requested Department of State instructions regarding the draft note on military assistance. It contained three enclosures: a first draft of the revised note to the Saudi Arabian Government on cash reimbursable assistance, a Saudi Arabian redraft of the original U.S. note, and a later U.S. redraft of the original note which took into

At morning session I opened by saying authorized proceed on "mission concept" basis. Shaikh Yusuf then said he also had message to deliver from King. American and Saudi DAF drafts had been presented King and advisors. Strong opposition had developed on part of latter with result that His Majesty had completely changed position. He desired maintain friendly relations with US and could be counted on help in emergency but his sovereignty must remain untouched. Proposed draft goes beyond existing DAF agreement and Azores agreement (Yusuf had 1948 press release on this). King had established kingdom and sovereignty over it by own efforts and did not desire at his advanced age do anything adversely affect that sovereignty. His people were ignorant and he did not want give them reason turn against either himself or Americans. Fact US ready give SA procurement military assistance does not mean SA prepared conclude agreement re DAF. Question whether military given was for decision of US.

By way of further explanation Shaikh Yusuf explained only way negotiations could proceed was begin again from beginning and eliminate anything touching sovereignty in order make clear SAG had full authority over DAF. In other words, situation would be similar that Jidda airport and any American participation would be on civilian technician basis. It was time talk frankly. There was difference between war and peace time. American group had said it was unable discuss security SA from external attack; SA therefore unable discuss except in terms times of peace. Those opposing proposed drafts were saying US getting war time rights in peace time without treaty to cover situation. Twenty-five year period was main difficulty and SAG not impressed by arguments re necessity in order get appropriations from Congress; in fact SAG was completely without interest in further construction. Military jurisdiction was also important point of contention. Re storage, we could continue but guards must be Saudi. Desired avoid any US military appearance at DAF.

I expressed great surprise this reversal in position taken by HM himself and pointed out it was to meet exactly this situation that "mission concept" had been adopted and redrafting done. How was it possible in light of realities of situation to avoid military appearance? Similar situations re military installations existed elsewhere and had been met by arrangements like those provided in drafts. Why should SA feel its sovereignty prejudiced when others did not, et cetera?

Shaikh Yusuf said he wished take back report to King including various statements of mine. I said only message I would authorize was that we had had due regard throughout discussions for sovereignty question and for that reason had supported "mission concept" on understanding approved by HM. My government had now approved that concept in principle as basis discussions.

Saudi group suggested suspending sessions pending our call and said would arrange audience with HM if I wished.

American group then went into deliberate seclusion with result that next move was "courtesy visit" January 2 by Yusuf and Khalid. Their attitude showed marked improvement over day before. I asked three questions:

- (1) Had report including my message been given HM and what was result?
- (2) What would be situation of American military organization at Dhahran if present agreement ran out before agreement reached? This situation must be clarified in order report promptly to Washington.
  - (3) Was it still thought desirable I see HM?

Yusuf said report had been made King and my message helpful. Twenty-five year period was big stumbling block. He suggested two-year agreement renewable automatically for two years unless one of parties gave notice to contrary. Re existing situation he saw no reason why present arrangement should not be extended six months or year. Ample time should be allowed to arrive at satisfactory arrangement. Re jurisdiction at DAF there were series circumstances under which question could arise and considerable study would be required. Khalid Bey then made plea for not attempting reduce too much to writing and said unwritten arrangements often more satisfactory here than written word.

Meeting ended with statement by Yusuf that he would arrange meeting with King but later in day he said unnecessary. He also said King had approved six-month extension existing agreement.

Re background this chain events we have gathered following from various sources:

(1) Leaders of opposition have been Prince Abdullah and Rashid Ali and highly emotional letter of latter to King was immediate cause King's reversal.

(2) Critical articles of negotiations in Egyptian papers Al-Ahmal (December) and Al-Misr (December 29) have been taken very much to heart here. Both articles indicated leak somewhere.

(3) Prince Saud returned from twenty-five day hunting trip on December 30 and at meeting of King and advisors January 2 took stand against reversal of position by King.

In response to a query from Jidda, telegram 241 from Washington, January 6, authorized Hare to request whatever extension of the Dhahran Air Field Agreement would be most helpful to his task (711.56386A/1-551). In despatch 245 from Jidda, January 29, Hare enclosed a copy of his note of January 12 requesting an extension of the existing agreement for 6 months, until August 1, and a reply from the Saudi Arabian Foreign Office, dated January 29, granting his request (711.56386A/1-2951).

(4) Prince Feisal (now in Jidda) on contrary is said to be among those opposing agreement.

(5) Situation in Iraq re demand for cancellation of British treaty makes Saudis hesitant seem be entangling selves in similar difficulty.

(6) Saudi thinking said to be influenced by news report that Iranian intransigeance resulted in Ambassador Grady going Washington and returning with $25 million additional aid. If such tactics worked in Iran, why not Saudi Arabia?

Foregoing is progress report. Will reserve comment until situation clarifies further. Present situation (night January 2) is that Shaikh Yusuf drawing up new proposals for our consideration. Signed Hare.

The Ambassador in Saudi Arabia (Hare) to the Department of State

SECRET

Jidda, January 12, 1951-4 p. m.

441. Shaikh Abdullah Sulaiman, FinMin, asked me call on him yesterday re DAF negotiations situation. Said when he was in Riyadh during first part of negotiations 1 he was told everything going well but he had recently heard difficulties encountered. Could I tell him what had happened?

I gave him résumé of developments in Riyadh which he frequently interrupted by interjections re short-sightedness of those who did not understand . . . desirability of US having military stake in SA and harmful advice being given King by foreign "boarders" at court who more interested promoting personal interests than those of SA. In particular FinMin poo-hooed idea of domestic reaction against agreement.

At conclusion of conversation FinMin said he felt so strongly on subject that considered imperative he go Riyadh to discuss personally with King in endeavor effect return more realistic approach. Said it should be frankly acknowledged that US military installation at DAF was in interest both countries and he felt should use his influence to counteract bad advice being given King. Specifically he asked to be given for his information copies of our proposal of YY's recent counterdraft <sup>2</sup> when translation completed, together with com-

Despite unorthodox nature this suggestion, I did not feel advisable rebuff FinMin, particularly bearing in mind his personal power second only that of King and that lines of authority here mean relatively little. I accordingly told FinMin would be glad furnish documents in question on understanding that it was at his request and that he would make this clear to King so I would not be placed in position of having acted improperly. FinMin smiled indulgently and said to leave matter entirely to him. He would so arrange that his visit Riyadh would appear to be for other purposes and next thing I could expect to hear on matter would be message from King extending invitation to return Riyadh for further discussion.

I cannot estimate to what extent FinMin's professions of willingness help may only reflect enthusiasm of moment and well known antipathy for YY but, if he carries through as says he intends, his intervention may facilitate getting back to more practical approach. Translation of YY's redraft (Dhahran telegram 155, January 5) not yet completed but from what I have seen it appears unacceptable document for use as basis for negotiations and obvious next move would have to be insistence on getting back to fundamentals. If FinMin can turn trick on his own initiative, it may spare us necessity of forcing issue ourselves. Present situation is that translation of YY's redraft being completed for transmission first available pouch. Will also wire summary and comments.

JIDDA, January 16, 1951—noon.

452. Following telegram deals with status DAF negotiations and should be read as companion piece to immediately preceding telegram on military assistance (Embtel 451, January 16).<sup>2</sup>

1. Aside from difficulty caused by behind-scenes influences at Palace negotiations were plagued throughout by lack background Saudi negotiators and their failure do necessary preparatory work. . . .

- 2. It was to get away from resultant coursing about in ever-widening circles that we insisted on Saudis putting ideas down in writing. Result was Yusuf Yassin's hastily thrown together draft which translated and forwarded Department.<sup>3</sup> Despite our request that Yusuf Yassin keep constant eye on our proposal during his drafting, paper which he produced is unacceptably one-sided and substantially along lines his presentation on January 3 including 2-year period, as reported in mytel 155 from Dhahran. Although this document completely unsatisfactory for negotiating purposes it at least has virtue of giving US something tangible to say "no" to and then try to get back on some more reasonable negotiating basis.
- 3. As to course of action we should now follow my thoughts run along much same lines as those expressed by Generals O'Keefe and Day in their telegram to General Kuter,<sup>4</sup> i. e., that some basic re-thinking must be stimulated in high places. I am not sure however that we will find it necessary to do stimulating job ourselves. I refer in this connection to talk with Abdullah Sulaiman as reported in Embtel 441, January 12.<sup>5</sup> Another new factor in situation is that Fuad Hamza has just arrived here en route to Riyadh and that Yusuf Yassin will be going to Cairo in next day or so to attend Arab League meetings so perhaps others may do our stimulation for us.

In any event, assuming that promised six months extension confirmed, we can now afford to allow stipulation here simmer for short time and use opportunity for review by Department of Documents submitted to it and preparation further instructions. If nothing then happens on this end of the line we can take initiative as normal procedural step since understanding when we left Riyadh was that we would submit our report and Yusuf Yassin's draft and request instructions.

4. In its consideration this matter it is suggested that Department and Defense give particular attention to period of agreement. This was point on which opposition seemed to have real substance even among those tending favor agreement in principle. Not only were Saudis not convinced by our arguments that 25-year period necessary for planning purposes and obtaining appropriations but they seemed genuinely fear long period commitment as tending put Saudi Arabia in position vis-à-vis US similar position of Egypt and Iraq vis-à-vis Britain.

At present Saudis are talking in terms of two years but believe they would go to five years without too much difficulty. If such a period could fit in with our military planning it would have advantage of being for same term as proposed military assistance program and would also relieve potential political measures which would almost certainly be generated by 25-year agreement regardless of spirit of friendship in which negotiated. It is difficult imagine "imperialism" of 5-year or even 10-year duration but somehow 25 years sounds different. Furthermore, world situation has changed so drastically since we originally began talking of 25-year period that review of this point now would seem reasonable.

Wish emphasize that we have held line firmly on 25-year period and may still be able to get it but respectfully submit we should give serious consideration to 5 or 10-year period on renewable basis as concession which might not only facilitate negotiations but at same time meet our actual needs.

5. Another point which came up repeatedly in negotiations was terms under which we hold airfields elsewhere. Saudi representatives were particularly interested in obtaining copies other agreements and made frequent reference press release on Azores as being more liberal than our proposals to SAG. We stated unable say what information available on subject but would inquire. Could Department supply us with appropriate information and comments on this subject which would serve convince Saudis they are getting good deal? If this possible, our negotiating position will be strengthened and at same time pressure on Saudi negotiators by Palace critics would be considerably diminished.

Information would also be particularly helpful on provisions in other agreements on legal jurisdiction re military dependents and American civilian employees and claims by foreign nationals since this is point on which Saudis particularly difficult and have shown disposition go into complicating detail. Policing of installations is another point on which information for purposes of argument would be helpful.

- 6. Although it would be our intention avoid using Yusuf Yassin's draft as basis further negotiations we would also appreciate comments even of an informal character on points included therein, but not mentioned above, since same subjects can be expected come up again even in more objective discussion.
- 7. Although negotiations thus far have been exasperating because of atmosphere with which we have to deal and character of Saudi negotiators, I still feel there is reasonable prospect for agreement although we may have to resort to stronger tactics to jolt Saudis into recognition of facts of life. For moment, however, it would seem advisable allow short time to see if more favorable reaction may not come about by itself due entry new figures on scene here.6 I may get some indication how wind is blowing when I go Riyadh on 19th to present Admiral Carney.7

469. Part 1 of 2.1 Wheel of fortune re DAF has spun again and stopped on new number.

Whereas originally had been idea FinMin go personally Riyadh discuss DAF with King, seems he took advantage passage Fuad Hamza through Jidda last week (he had been out of country some 8 months for health reasons) to take strong line re desirability reaching DAF agreement and turned over to Hamza basic documentation which we had furnished at his request (Embtel 441, January 122). His intervention seems to have been effective because on occasion presentation Admiral Carney to King January 19 3 latter remarked Fuad and Khaliq Gargoni would be available for any discussions and they called on me for final audience that night to discuss situation.

Fuad was friendly and businesslike. He asked me review status negotiations and inquired if there had been "difficulties". Gave objective account of talks and said present situation was that full report including YY draft had been sent Washington for review. Re "difficulties" negotiations had not been such as result in actual impasse on any one point but trend had been unsatisfactory for 2 principal reasons: first was that YY had insisted on negotiating not on basis of our carefully prepared draft but of hastily improvised suggestions which were subject constant change with result we found ourselves going in circles rather than on road to agreement. Second was that, whereas we had been prepared to do anything reasonable to meet Saudi problem re

Part 2 of this telegram, not printed, recommended that the negotiators be authorized to accept the proposal to use the existing agreement as a basis for negotiating and that the Department of State send specific instructions on proposals to differentiate between rights to be given in time of peace, emergency, and war (711.56386A/1-2351).

sovereignty, Saudi negotiators had taken sufficient cognizance of fact DAF was primarily of interest to US as military installation. This fact had to be faced squarely as basis for productive negotiations.

Fuad said was in entire agreement re necessity recognizing military character of DAF; in fact it was in interest of SAG that US should have military strength in SA. Re sovereignty SA apprehensions re unfavorable repercussions were very real, particularly re neighboring Arab states. In circumstances he expressed view we were in basic accord re substance and that agreement should be reached without undue difficulty.

Re procedure, approach which he would have suggested if he had been here at beginning negotiations would have been use existing agreement as basis and add, delete or modify as required. He felt strongly we should now proceed that manner.

He also recommended agreements should make specific stipulation re rights to be given in time of peace, emergency and war. In time war all SA would be available to US (Khalid Bey confirmed this as having been assured by King himself) but would be preferable avoid seeming become too deeply entrenched in time peace. It should also be made clear that rights given US would not be extended to forces of some other country (he mentioned Israel specifically in this connection).

I replied that, re procedure, our draft had in fact been based on existing agreement and felt should constitute good negotiating basis. Furthermore my instructions were prepared from that angle. However when Fuad (who of course had been Saudi negotiator in drafting existing agreement) insisted strongly on using existing document as basis I did not feel desirable become involved in wrangle and said would submit idea to my government. Furthermore, although I did not so admit to Fuad, there is a certain logic to his suggestion which is difficult refute.

Re distinguishing between peace, emergency and war I noted forseeable difficulty in making determination of state of emergency. This was type of situation which presented problem re definition and which also could present difficulties of political nature in varying situations. As matter of fact state of emergency actually existed at moment as indicated by President's proclamation. Fuad agreed such was in fact case and suggested that proclamation by President could be taken as factor in defining state of emergency.

Re rights in time war I observed difficult foresee developments with sufficient clarity to make specific provisions but possible some general reference in principle might be made paving way for extension additional rights in time war. Fuad indicated agreement. I felt advisable tread very carefully here since we could easily become involved in discussion leading to renewal of old demand for treaty of alliance or commitment of similar character.

Policy Statement Prepared in the Department of State 1

[Washington, February 5, 1951.]

SAUDI ARABIA

A. OBJECTIVES

The United States desires to maintain close and friendly relations with the Government of Saudi Arabia. It is to our interest that a strong government control Saudi Arabia and toward this end we look with favor upon Ibn Saud's regime, hope for a peaceful succession by the Crown Prince when the time comes, and support the independence and territorial integrity of Saudi Arabia. We favor the development of education and political consciousness among the people of Saudi Arabia and a greater feeling of social responsibility on the part of the ruling class. We want to see sound development of the oil industry in Saudi Arabia and on a competitive basis in so far as new concession areas are concerned. It is a major objective that Saudi Arabia's economic possibilities be developed to provide more services and diversify national income, since it is a primitive country which needs development in every kind of public enterprise to raise the standard of living, stabilize the economy, and promote trade and diversification of domestic industry. It is also our purpose to assure for ourselves and our friends and allies the strategic advantages of Saudi Arabia's geographical position, petroleum resources, and the continued general antipathy of the Saudi Arabs for communism.

B. POLICIES

While US policy has been the target of adverse criticism and bitterness in some countries of the Near East, Saudi Arabia has remained firm in its friendship for the United States. It has served as our spokesman and interpreter to less friendly Arab states, and has, through the prestige and conservative nature of its King, exerted a stabilizing influence on the Near East generally. In order that we might retain Saudi Arabia's friendship and support it is to our interest to: (a) continue our fight against Communist infiltration in the Near East and promote the stability of the area; (b) advance the security of Saudi Arabia by the sale of defense materials, training of Saudi

Department of State Policy (Information) Statements were concise documents summarizing the current United States policy toward, the relations of principal powers with, and the issues and trends in a particular country or region. The statements were intended to provide information and guidance for officers in missions abroad. They were generally prepared by ad hoc working groups in the responsible geographic offices of the Department of State and were referred to appropriate diplomatic missions abroad, under cover of formal instructions from the Secretary of State, for comment and criticism. The Policy Statements were periodically revised.

Arabian defense forces, and by assurances on appropriate occasions of American interest in Saudi Arabia's independence and territorial integrity; (c) demonstrate our support of and confidence in King Ibn Saud and Crown Prince Saud upon his succession; (d) assist in the orderly development of the economy and public welfare of Saudi Arabia; (e) give friendly counsel to all parties to a dispute involving Saudi Arabia and encourage prompt solution of the controversy; (f) observe the utmost respect for Saudi Arabia's sovereignty, sanctity of the Holy Places, and local customs; (g) encourage improved fiscal management and monetary stabilization; (h) assist sound American enterprise interested in engaging in desirable business or commercial development in the country; and (i) foster philanthropic, but non-religious, enterprise of public interest. In all our efforts to carry out our policies in Saudi Arabia we should take care to serve as guide or partner and avoid giving the impression of wishing to dominate the country.

1. Political

The Government of Saudi Arabia is essentially a personal one and our political relations with the country are perforce closely associated with only a few officials. These are King Ibn Saud, the Crown Prince, the Foreign Minister, Prince Feisal, the Defense Minister, Prince Mansour, and the Minister of Finance, Sheikh Abdullah Sulaiman, whose position is tantamount to Prime Minister. The Deputy Foreign Minister, Sheikh Yusuf Yassin, Fuad Bey Hamza, the King's Counselor, and Najib Salha, Deputy Assistant Finance Minister, are also important and influential officials of the Government. It is desirable to win and retain their friendship and support. A most effective way to do so is to bring many of them to the United States. The King should be invited to make a State visit to Washington. It is unlikely that His Majesty can accept because of his age, but the Crown Prince will undoubtedly be directed to come as his father's representative, as he did in 1947.2 The Crown Prince is very eager to return. He was most favorably impressed by the United States during his previous visit and he has repeatedly expressed to Americans in Saudi Arabia a wish to come again.

Prince Feisal was very embittered by our stand and by the General Assembly action on Palestine in 1947. Although his attitude has improved he is still critical and cynical upon occasion. He has, however, expressed the wish several times during the past year to visit the United States in a non-UN capacity. We should capitalize on his incipient change of heart and urge his return. He is one of the most intelligent of the Princes and his influence is strong in Saudi Arabia, especially in the Hedjaz. His good will could be very useful in US-Saudi Arabian relations on both government and business levels.

Prince Mansour has never been in the United States and, like many of his brothers, has expressed a desire to come. In his capacity as Minister of Defense it would be appropriate to arrange a visit as guest of the Secretary of Defense in connection with Saudi Arabian purchases of military equipment now possible under Public Law 621 recently enacted.<sup>3</sup> The influence of Fuad Bey Hamza on the King is very strong. He has been in the United States, but only as a member of the Crown Prince's entourage. If a visit could be arranged for him alone so that suitable attention could be given him, it might pay useful dividends. Likewise, an invitation to Sheikh Yusuf Yassin would flatter his ego and contribute to the cordiality of our relations with the Foreign Office.

Another essential element in cementing our friendship is to demonstrate convincingly the impartiality of our friendship toward Israel and Saudi Arabia. The King realizes the reasons for our friendship for Israel and that he cannot hope to change that situation. He does feel, however, that our interests in Saudi Arabia are greater than in Israel and that he, therefore, should expect at least equal treatment. Public statements by executive officials of the Government should avoid unfavorable references to Arab States, and the friendly sentiments so often expressed for Israel by such leaders should sometimes be matched by similar expressions about Saudi Arabia and other Arab countries.

It is also our policy whenever possible to meet requests of the Saudi Arabian Government. We recognize the inexperience of Saudi Arabia in dealing with complex problems and its inability to perform many services for itself owing to the paucity of trained technicians and its inefficient administration. We have accordingly rendered an impressive list of services including lend-lease aid, medical assistance, mapping, military training, agricultural development, water survey work, financial advice, and loans. We have also encouraged private American firms to render useful services to the Saudi Arabian Government.

Saudi Arabia, along with the other Arab states, was badly disillusioned with the United Nations because of the General Assembly action on Palestine. The United States should work towards re-creating Saudi Arabian respect for the United Nations and confidence in its fairness and high principles as well as to encourage its more active participation in United Nations affairs.

We have in principle favored Saudi Arabia's desire to secure its internal defense as a stabilizing factor in the Near East and as a protection to American interests in Saudi Arabia. It is in line with our desire to strengthen Saudi Arabia politically. It cannot be expected that the Saudis will be trained and equipped to a point that they could resist attack by a large power. They could be trained and equipped to deal with a limited outside attack taking the form of harassment, sabotage, and delaying tactics. A reasonable program for training and equipping Saudi Arabian forces, therefore, is in the interest of Saudi Arabia but also in our own strategic interest.

Although the continuance of US maintenance and operation of the Dhahran airport is primarily a military and aviation matter, the obtaining of more than a temporary extension for US operation of that base is essentially a political problem. The original US-Saudi Arabian agreement covering the Dhahran Air Base expired on March 15, 1949 and has been the subject of several temporary extensions since that date.

Saudi Arabia has several boundary disputes with British protected states along the Persian Gulf.<sup>4</sup> The necessity of settling them has been stimulated by oil discoveries in the area and the possibility of additional reserves in the disputed areas. The United States is impartial toward the settlements of these conflicting claims but it considers itself a party at interest because of the interest of US firms in the area; it encourages progress in the solution of the problem in order to promote the peace and orderly development of the area; it supports direct contact between Saudi Arabia and the Sheikhdoms with British advisory assistance as more conducive to an acceptable solution; and it would support any means to arrive at a solution and any settlement which is acceptable to both sides.

Early in 1948 the Saudi Arabian Government sought our advice on the question of its sub-soil rights in the Persian Gulf offshore areas and on May 28, 1949 it issued a decree claiming rights similar to those claimed by the United States in the Truman Proclamation of 1945. At the same time the Saudi Arabian Government issued a decree on territorial waters in the Persian Gulf which is contrary to our concept of international law on the subject. On December 22, 1949, we informed the Saudi Arabian Government that its definition of inland bays and waters and the six-nautical-mile concept of territorial coastal waters described in the decree were not in keeping with international practice and we wished to record our reservations on those points.

The United States has on many occasions given assurances to Saudi Arabia to allay the King's anxiety that the Hashemites, with or without British encouragement, might encroach upon his country. We have assured the King on numerous occasions that the political independence and territorial integrity of Saudi Arabia are of serious concern to the United States and that in case of any threat we would support the Saudi Arabian Government in the United Nations. We have also made clear to Arab states that it will be contrary to US policy, the principles of United Nations, and the stability of the area for any state to take aggressive measures against another. Following the Chiefs of Missions Conference at Istanbul in November 1949 the United States induced the United Kingdom to give similar assurances on its own part. Again on May 25, 1950, following the Foreign Ministers' Meetings in London, a tripartite declaration was made to all governments of the Near East reiterating the interest of the United States, United Kingdom and France in preserving peace and stability in the area.5 It should be our policy to continue giving such assurances to Saudi Arabia whenever the King's anxieties become aroused.

Saudi Arabian law does not permit the establishment of Christian churches in the country, nor are services lawful. The spiritual needs of the large number of Christians living in the Dhahran area have been taken care of by assembly in private on Aramco premises and on the air base under the auspices of the Air Force chaplain. The regularity of such assembly attracted the attention of local Arabs who entered and witnessed the proceedings. Saudi Arabian officials asked that such services be discontinued and that the chaplain be recalled. The Embassy and the Foreign Office, however, never allowed the subject to become a matter of official record because it was recognized that our Government could not agree to depriving American citizens of their spiritual requirements, nor could the Saudi Arabian Government approve what the Haditha forbids. It was accordingly agreed that Christian services hereafter should be conducted in the strictest privacy behind locked doors and the chaplain recalled would be replaced.6

2. Economic

It is our policy to encourage the Saudi Arabian Government to take sound measures to build up the economy of the country, lending our assistance where appropriate, and to foster the creation in Saudi Arabia of conditions conducive to expanding multilateral world trade. We should also encourage eventual Saudi Arabian adherence to the GATT.

In seeking to exercise our influence in Saudi Arabia in support of world trade expansion, we must recognize the limited experience of Saudi Arabs with the western world. We are confronted with a lack of understanding by all but a few leaders of the whole pattern of western economic, political, legal, and cultural life, which is infinitely more complex than their own. They do not yet understand the desirability and mutual advantages of a Treaty of Friendship, Commerce, and Navigation with the United States of the type which we are now proposing to more advanced countries. and which we hope ultimately to conclude with the Saudi Arabian Government. However, we believe it would be useful to explore with them the possibilities of enlarging the area of our economic and commercial relations which can be appropriately covered by treaty. Our Ambassador has accordingly been authorized to discuss with the Saudi Government an abridged draft of our standard Treaty of Friendship, Commerce, and Navigation. This action had been deferred until the conclusion of a Point IV agreement which was signed on January 17, 1951.

We should encourage Saudi Arabian participation in regional economic activities which are consistent with the provisions of the GATT, having in mind not only the possible economic advantages of Saudi Arabia's cooperation with other states of the Arab world, but also the desirability of accustoming the Saudi Arabs to a role in more developed types of economic activity which will lead them to fuller appreciation of interdependent world economic problems and the need for a cooperative approach to them.

The United States has strong commercial, political, and strategic interest in the progressive development of Saudi Arabian oil resources and the maintenance of Saudi Arabia's income at a high level.9 These objectives were threatened by the closure of sterling markets to oil produced in Saudi Arabia. All of Saudi Arabia's known oil resources are under concession to American companies. Aside from political considerations, these American companies were able to obtain the concession in Saudi Arabia primarily because the Government was convinced that its income and other benefits would be greater under development by American than by British or other interests. If these American corporations are to maintain their concessions in Saudi Arabia it is essential that royalty payments and other benefits be not less than the Government might expect to receive under development by other interests and oil development and benefits must be maintained at least on a parity with neighboring countries and sheikhdoms where concessions are held by British chartered companies. The American firms marketing Aramco oil in the sterling and continental areas were supported by the United States in their negotiations with the British to overcome the disabilities forced on them. As a consequence, Cal-Tex, Ltd. reached an agreement with the British Government in accordance with which an increasing proportion of Cal-Tex sales to the sterling area would be paid for in sterling with the goal being to reach 65% payment in sterling by 1952. In as much as this agreement requires the company to reduce the dollar cost of its operation, it required, among other things, coordinate agreement by the Saudi Arabian Government to accept up to 25% of royalty payments in sterling. There still remains the problem of working out with the Saudi Arabian Government the rate at which it will accept sterling royalties. A short term agreement has also been concluded by Cal-Tex with the French for payment in francs of 25% of their purchases of Aramco crude. These arrangements and the international situation generally have made Aramco cutbacks in production unnecessary and forestalled a reduction in income which would have been difficult for the Saudi Arabian Government to accept.

The influence of Aramco on the Saudi Arabian economy and on our political relations with that country is so great that Aramco's policies and actions must be carefully watched and, if need be, guided. It can do a great deal to preserve American prestige and interests in the area and to combat communism. For example, Aramco's labor policy toward its 14,500 Arab workers is not only of nation-wide importance in Saudi Arabia, but is a critical factor in the development of western orientation and democratic processes. The Department should, therefore, encourage Aramco to pursue progressive and enlightened policies in connection with wages, housing for Arab employees, training and education, and to shift responsibilities to Saudi Arabians as fully and rapidly as possible.

In as much as Saudi Arabia's oil wealth is an expendable resource and it possesses no other significant wealth, it is essential that the Saudi Arabian Government secure its future economy by utilizing as much of its oil revenue as possible to establish new and more lasting sources of income.

Recent experience in providing Saudi Arabia with financial counsel indicates that, whether because of lack of experience in complex financial matters, the influential position of members of the business community, or political considerations, the government is not yet ready to give mature consideration to intelligent long-term financial policies. Nevertheless, we should continue our efforts to counsel the Saudis in financial and monetary matters when appropriate opportunities are presented, although we must avoid putting ourselves in the position of assuming responsibility for monetary measures undertaken by the Saudi Government.

Saudi Arabia should be encouraged to introduce modern budgeting and accounting practices in respect of government revenues and expenditures and to develop a comprehensive and long-range program for modernizing and adapting the Saudi Arabian monetary system to meet the requirements of the Saudi economy. Such a program can be undertaken only under the direction of competent foreign advisers. and the Saudi Arabian Government should be induced to recruit and place their reliance on such advisers. It is our objective to provide advisers on monetary and fiscal matters under the Point IV program. It is likely, however, that Saudi Arabia will not recognize the need for this kind of action until it has tried other monetary schemes and found them unsuccessful. It is to be expected that patience, friendly and detached advice, and the immutable force of circumstances will bring the Saudi Arabian Government around slowly to orthodox financial practices. The financial aspects of our diplomatic activities in Saudi Arabia are at present, and will probably be for some time to come, as important as the political aspects. Meanwhile the Saudi Arabian Government is casting about for every means of keeping its Treasury full, short of the obvious one of putting its financial house in order. It continues to meet its financial problems on an ad hoc basis relying upon Aramco to see it through when other means fail. Aramco is currently being pressed to provide greater financial benefits to the Saudi Arabian Government.

The Saudi Arabian Government notified Aramco that it wished to revise certain conditions of their concession agreement for the purpose of obtaining higher revenues. It cited as reasons for revision the more generous terms of the Pacific Western Agreement, other concession arrangements in other countries, and the unexpectedly large oil resources in Aramco's concession area. Negotiations were begun in early December, 1950 which resulted in the signing of a new agreement on December 30, which has satisfied Saudi demands for a complete revision of the 1933 Aramco concession and should minimize chances of major friction during the immediate future. The agreement brings into the Near East for the first time the "Venezuelan principle" of a 50–50 division of net profits gained from oil operations and is expected to have far-reaching effect on other oil-producing countries in the Near East.

Aramco, in adopting the 50-50 principle, has assumed liability for payment of Saudi Arabian income taxes which for 1950 will bring total estimated company payments to approximately 33 cents. These payments may be made in any currencies accruing from oil sales and will now be based on International Monetary Fund exchange rates in place of the free market rate of gold on which the former agreement was based. Aramco officials hope that income taxes paid to the Saudi Arabian Government will be credited against company taxes in the US and that this financial increase to the Saudi treasury will settle all outstanding problems with the Saudi Government. Problems involving Aramco's Trans-Arabian Pipeline subsidiary still exist, however, and the implementation of the new agreement can be expected to give rise to some measure of controversy such as Saudi Arab inquiry into Aramco prices to parent companies. However, the new agreement, together with the anticipated high level of production and sales should guarantee good relations between the company and the Government.

The conclusion of the agreement has been a source of great concern to the British who recognize that these liberalized terms may lead to a demand for a new round of royalty increases throughout the area. Iraq, which has recently been granted an increased royalty of approximately 33 cents per barrel in the Iraq Petroleum Agreement of August 1950, is now likely to demand further concessions that may lead to increased tension in Iraq Petroleum Company (IPC) relations with the Iraq Government. The Aramco settlement has also served to emphasize to the Iranian Government that its original demands for a "Venezuelatype" of profit-sharing formula for the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company (AIOC) were not unrealistic and are now in line with the new trend in the Near East. Iranian officials have expressed hope that American generosity in Saudi Arabia will have a favorable effect on Iranian negotiations with the British company, which looks with disfavor, however, on the Aramco terms. After two years of parliamentary debate which has delayed a settlement of the AIOC problem to the detriment of company-government relations and the economic and political stability of Iran, the Iranian parliament has put the matter in the hands of a parliamentary oil commission which is expected to insist on financial terms comparable to the Aramco agreement, in addition to a number of other concessions. Meanwhile, the Gulf Oil Corporation is approaching the US State and Treasury Departments, the British Government, and AlOC, which shares the Kuwait concession with Gulf, with a view to reorganizing their corporate structure in Kuwait in order that the company may be put in a position to offer and to profit from an Aramco type of agreement.

Although the US Government can publicize and capitalize to some extent on the American aspects of the Aramco deal, which will bring Saudi Arabia higher revenue than that received by Iran and Iraq, we cannot at this time criticize AIOC and IPC as companies whose policies are less liberal than that of Aramco. Since Aramco hopes for US tax credit for most or all of the taxes paid to the Saudi Government, in the end the US Government rather than Aramco may be the source of increased payments to Saudi Arabia. However, Aramco's introduction of the partnership principle is believed to have been a dramatic and timely answer to the Communist line regarding Near East oil company "imperialism". We believe in general that there is hope that the 50–50 principle will, despite other concession contract negotiations, result in increased basic stability in the Near East. We consider the Venezuelan profit-sharing formula an almost inevitable development and one which represents as firm and defensible a basis as can be reached for the stabilization of concessions. We believe that Near East oil companies can at this time afford to pay increased benefits in return for their concessions in these uniquely rich oil reserves and thereby promote Western economic, political and strategic interests.

In an effort to increase its revenue from taxes, the Saudi Arabian Government hired the services of a private American income tax expert, Mr. John F. Greaney, to come to Saudi Arabia in August 1950 to study the tax system and recommend means of reorganizing it. An income tax has now been enacted in Saudi Arabia; it will be our purpose to see that its application is non-discriminatory with respect to American enterprise. Saudi Arabia should also be urged to collect and publish basic statistics relating to such matters as foreign trade, monetary circulation and prices.

The United States should try to influence the Saudi Arabian Government to use its own and borrowed capital on projects or programs which will increase its food production, improve transportation, and distribute more widely the benefits of improved public health and educational facilities. Loans to cover essential import requirements of consumer goods should not be encouraged, because current income of the Kingdom is large enough to cover such current expenditures even after a considerable portion of future royalties are obligated for development projects.

To further the objectives of economic development policy, the United States should assist in the accomplishment of desirable projects and programs by making available, on a cooperative basis, US technicians and demonstration materials and by sending Saudi Arab nationals abroad for technical training. A survey of the resources of Saudi Arabia and the drawing up of a broad plan for their development appear desirable. We should also encourage private US investment and commercial activity in Saudi Arabia, endeavoring especially to diversify US commercial interests so that the US is not identified exclusively with oil development.

US policy on economic development assistance to Saudi Arabia, as well as to other Middle East countries, is aimed at raising living standards in order to foster political and economic stability. This is especially important in Saudi Arabia since the increasing volume of oil being taken out of the country by American companies leads the people to expect that they will derive direct economic benefits. Sharing of such benefits should be more extensive in order to avoid future possibilities of unrest. We should continue to urge and assist Saudi Arabia to carry out the reforms necessary to permit the effective utilization and distribution of the government's income from oil royalties. This income constitutes the bulk of the national income of Saudi Arabia, and the Saudi Arabian Government should be encouraged to view it as available for the improvement of the economic life of the whole population and to develop an attitude of responsibility and trusteeship toward its utilization.

Saudi Arabia will have available from time to time, for the granting of concessions, areas released from the Aramco concession as well as certain areas offshore. In order to insure maximum development of Saudi Arabian oil resources, we should encourage acceleration of Aramco relinquishments of all areas which the company cannot reasonably plan to develop in the near future. We should continue to favor the granting of concessions covering such relinquished areas, on a competitive and non-discriminatory basis, to firms of the US and other nations friendly to the United States, independent of firms now holding concessions in the Middle East.

We support TWA in its management of the Saudi Arabian Airline so long as the relations of this company with Saudi Arabia remain in conformity with US aviation and political policy.

We desire to press the negotiation of a civil air agreement and to ease the present restrictive regulations against air traffic in connection with Israel. We also want to negotiate a long term Dhahran Air Base agreement to replace the short term arrangement now existing. We are agreeable to the continuation of American technical and managerial assistance to the Saudi Arabian Airlines. We wish to encourage Saudi Arabia to develop its aviation facilities and to establish an adequate civil aviation department, possibly with some advisory American personnel. We also want to advance a training program for Saudi Arabs in aeronautics.

A draft civil air agreement in simplified form was submitted to the Saudi Arabian Government for its consideration in February 1950. In view of Saudi Arabian delay in discussing the proposed draft, we have asked for an extension of one year to September 30, 1951, of the existing arrangement.<sup>10</sup>

It is our hope that an adequate inland transportation system can be developed by Saudi Arabia. It is not our policy to propose United States financial assistance for the development of railroads. US assistance should be made available to Saudi Arabia for road, highway, airport and harbor construction, and an Export-Import Bank loan of $15,000,000 was extended August 5, 1950 for those and similar developmental projects.

The general policy of (a) giving diplomatic assistance to US communications companies in establishing or maintaining communications circuits with foreign countries on a non-exclusive basis and (b) favoring the development and conduct within foreign countries of communication services controlled by their own nationals is especially apropos in the case of Saudi Arabia. There is now a direct radio telegraph circuit to New York from Jidda. In November 1949 the US Government persuaded the Saudi Arabian Government against renewing the monopoly agreement they had with the British owned Cable and Wireless Company, Ltd., on international telegraphic service.

3. Cultural

The greatest handicap to Saudi Arabia's advancement is the lack of education among its population. We must encourage Saudi Arabia to broaden its educational system along non-parochial lines toward the end of providing a modern elementary education for all children of the country. More secondary schools should be established beyond the ten now reported. Scholarship encouragement should be given to those wishing to go to college abroad, in the Near East and in the United States. Vocational schools for boys and home economic centers for girls are needed. Above all, the ruling class should be persuaded to give their children western education through the college years in order to fit them for their later responsibilities.

C. RELATIONS WITH OTHER STATES

King Ibn Saud has had very close and friendly relations with the United Kingdom but as American influence has increased in Saudi Arabia, Britain's position has declined. Britain's relative inability to compete with American goods and services; limitations on the use of sterling; the imperialistic reputation of the United Kingdom; the Saudi Arabian fear of hostile encirclement owing to British treaty relations with Hashemite Iraq and Jordan and territorial disputes with neighboring British protected principalities; and the general decline of British power and prestige since the war, all have tended to relegate the United Kingdom to a secondary position in Saudi Arabian esteem.

The Saudi Arabian Government has shown strong preference for the United States in many ways. It granted us rights to the Dhahran Air Base. It rejected an alliance with the British in 1948 and sought a tripartite arrangement including this country, or a bilateral alliance with us alone. It has sought military assistance from the United States, and the King has on several occasions sought assurances for the security of Saudi Arabia in a way which indicated his distrust of the United Kingdom because of its special relationships with adjoining states and principalities. It has been difficult for some British official and business people to become reconciled to this changed situation, but the Foreign Office is pleased that United States interests are there to share British responsibilities in the area generally.

Because of the large number of pilgrims coming to Saudi Arabia from the East Indies, Saudi Arabia's relations with the Netherlands were formerly of some importance. In May 1950 the Netherlands turned over its Legation to the Government of Indonesia. Dutch interests are now largely confined to the Netherlands Trading Society, an old established banking institution in Jidda.

Turkish influence in Saudi Arabia, once predominant, is now confined to the Turkish Legation at Jidda, the sharing of certain social customs, and some family ties.

Saudi Arabian relations with other Arab Moslem states are mixed. Ibn Saud fears Iraq and Jordan which are ruled by the Hashemite family, former rulers of the Hedjaz. He suspects King Abdullah's plan for a "Greater Syria" as a threat to the territorial integrity of his own country. He is also suspicious of the cordial hospitality offered by Iraq and Jordan to the Rashidi princes who covet the northern Nejd. Saudi Arabia has a good working basis of friendship with Lebanon and in May 1950 Lebanon opened a new modern hospital in Jidda. Syria was on very friendly terms with Saudi Arabia but the political instability of its Government has disturbed the firmness of these relations. A loan agreement was concluded with Syria in January 1950 by which Saudi Arabia agreed to lend Syria $6,000,000 in three installments and to give technical assistance in the Latakia port development. Only the first installment of $2,000,000 was paid to Syria and it is unlikely that any more will be forthcoming. Saudi Arabia does not consider Syria sufficiently anti-Hashemite and there is influential opinion that Saudi Arabian security is better protected by the tripartite declaration of May 25, 1950 and by arms purchases. Ibn Saud's closest important contact in the Arab world is with Egypt. Ibn Saud has a paternal feeling toward King Farouk. They have exchanged official visits . . . . Ibn Saud has endeavored to exert a tempering influence on Farouk in Egypt's relations with the United States. Saudi Arabia has close relations with Pakistan, and its friendship with Afghanistan was notably advanced by the state visit of King Mohamed Zahir in March 1950. Ibn Saud expressed his hope to the King during his visit, and to the Government of Pakistan, that a peaceful, friendly, and satisfactory settlement could be reached in the boundary dispute between those two Moslem states, Relations with Iran are friendly but not cordial. Diplomatic relations broken off after the pilgrimage incident of 1943 have been re-established. Saudi Arabia's desire to be friendly was manifested in May 1950 when, contrary to local religious tenets, it allowed the body of Resa Shah Pahlevi to be brought to Medina for prayers by the tomb of the Prophet before being flown to Tehran for final interment.

Yemen leans heavily upon Saudi Arabia for guidance in important matters . . . . Relations with Kuwait and Bahrein are very close and friendly and members of their ruling families are welcome visitors to Saudi Arabia. . . .

Ibn Saud is suspicious of all Jews and he hates Zionists and their doctrine. He is strongly opposed to Israel . . . . He does not contemplate establishing diplomatic or economic relations with Israel. He fears the Jewish state as a bridgehead into the Near East of Communistic ideas and influence. Out of religious conviction this hatred of Communism is deep and strong. He has kept Saudi Arabia free of its influence and he can be counted upon to oppose Russia and Communistic policy and doctrine. His prompt approval of United States' action in Korea and subsequent endorsement of the UN Security Council resolutions illustrate his attitude. Saudi Arabia maintains no diplomatic relations with Russia.

The King does not hold Italy in high esteem and he is in favor of independence for the former Italian colonies. Neither does he have a high regard for France who holds Moslem North Africa in dependent status.

Saudi Arabia is a luke-warm supporter of the Arab League and has been a moderating influence in it. Ibn Saud's distrust of Hashemite motives has made it difficult for Saudi Arabia to have full confidence in the Arab League. Intra-League rivalries have broken it into two opposing blocs, Egypt-Saudi Arabia and Iraq-Jordan, which constantly compete for the support of Lebanon and Syria. Saudi Arabia has joined the security pact within the Arab League from which Iraq and Jordan have remained aloof.

Saudi Arabia's attitude toward the United Nations is one of disillusionment since November 29, 1947 when the General Assembly voted on partition of Palestine. The Saudi Arabian Chief Delegate, Emir Feisal, was bitter in the extreme and he has remained cynical toward it. Saudi Arabia considers the United Nations the tool of the big powers where their interests are concerned. The King was quick to endorse action in Korea against the Communists, but his support is prompted by friendship for the US rather than by confidence in UN. Saudi Arabian confidence in UN can only be restored if UN takes as firm a position against Israeli violations of UN resolutions as it did in Korea.

D. POLICY EVALUATION

From about 1931, when American interests in Saudi Arabia first began to take active form, until near the close of 1947 our relations with Saudi Arabia were unusually good. As a result of our policy toward Palestine, Saudi Arabian friendship for the United States cooled considerably, particularly because Prince Feisal, the Saudi Arabian Foreign Minister, took our policy as a personal rebuff. Even during this period, however, King Ibn Saud maintained a balanced viewpoint and constantly exerted a restraining influence upon Arab extremists. Now that the Palestine problem has entered a less acute phase, our relations with Saudi Arabia are improving. If we continue to take a firm position regarding the frontiers of Israel and the Arab refugees, if we stand firmly against Soviet expansion, if we give sympathetic study to all reasonable Saudi Arabian requests for assistance, and if we do not attempt to upset the basic religious pattern of life in Saudi Arabia by too rapid an introduction of western ways, our relations with Saudi Arabia will become increasingly cordial. To bring this about we should continue to help the Saudis to develop the petroleum and other resources of their country and to use the income to modernize Saudi Arabia.

Saudi Arabia has a long way to go to meet the social standards and responsibilities of other nations, but it is trying very hard to improve itself and it has done well, considering that its sustained efforts have been only a postwar development. It has also had the serious internal obstacle in the fanatical religious opposition to change and the growth of western influences. It behooves us, therefore, to applaud what Saudi Arabia has done and is doing, and not criticize it for what it has not yet been able to do.

We must prove our friendship for Saudi Arabia by exploring ways of assisting King Ibn Saud to strengthen his defense which will also be valuable in enabling the Crown Prince to hold the country together on the death of his father.

We enacted legislation in 1950 under which Saudi Arabia became eligible for arms purchases in the United States for defense purposes. We have also completed and approved a survey of what these purchases should be, although the problem of financing such purchases remains to be solved. Even with strict budgetary control it would be difficult to find the means to purchase the equipment recommended by the Joint Chiefs of Staff and to maintain the military establishment in Saudi Arabia that the program will require. We should, therefore, discourage Saudi Arabia from taking on a commitment it cannot meet. This would be in keeping with our policy toward many other countries and it would accord with the importance attached by the Joint Chiefs of Staff to the strategic and geographic position of Saudi Arabia vis-à-vis Russia.

It has become increasingly evident during the swift expansion of American political, economic, and strategic relations with Saudi Arabia that for our objectives to be adequately realized, both we and the Saudi Arabs must achieve genuine understanding of each other. To this end, it is our policy to give the greatest encouragement and aid to American public and private efforts which are being devoted to the leveling of linguistic and cultural barriers. It remains obvious, however, that the Saudi Arabs themselves have the greater obstacles to overcome, for they must reach an understanding of the whole pattern of Western economic, political, legal and cultural life, which is infinitely more complex than their own. Only when the Saudi Government officials with whom we deal are equipped intelligently to cope with such problems as modern finance and trade can our two countries work efficiently together.

There are two routes by which this understanding can be reached:
(a) by encouraging Saudi Arabia to develop closer contact with the parts of the Arab world which are rapidly reaching such an understanding; and (b) by drawing them into closer relations with other friendly and enlightened peoples. The first route will afford the most immediate results, but it is toward the second, which is the more difficult but the sounder, that we must direct our strongest efforts. For the present, our attention is devoted to the strengthening of a nuclear group of Saudi Arabs who will be equipped to comprehend our system. Only when comprehension has thus become really strong and they themselves have been able to raise the general educational level of their people can there be hope for full, mutual understanding. Meanwhile, we should encourage and promote wherever possible the development in Saudi Arabia of modern media for public instruction, such as radios, press and films.

We can be more effective by encouraging a broader knowledge of Arabic among Americans in both official and private capacity, in Saudi Arabia. The study and use of a foreigner's language is a compliment which he never fails to appreciate, and it is always the most effective means of overcoming the obstacles to sympathy and understanding.

In summary it may be said that apart from complications created by the Palestine problem, our policy toward Saudi Arabia has been markedly successful. It has caused King Ibn Saud to say that outside of certain Arab states the United States is the closest friend of Saudi Arabia. And at the same time our policy through its encouragement of American private investment has helped the Saudi Arabians to modernize their country at an unprecedented rate.

The Deputy Under Secretary of State (Matthews) to the Assistant to the Secretary of Defense for Foreign Military Affairs and Military Assistance (Burns)

SECRET

Washington, February 6, 1951.

My Dear General Burns: The negotiations between the United States and the Government of Saudi Arabia on Military Assistance and Dhahran Air Field were initiated by our Ambassador, Raymond A. Hare, on December 14, 1950. Early in the conversations it developed that King Ibn Saud and Prince Mansour, the Saudi Arabian Minister of Defense, are determined to have a combat air force and training "regardless of difficulty or cost". They noted particularly the absence of fighter or bomber aircraft in the recommendations of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and expressed keen desire to have combat aircraft, especially fighters, included.

Prior to the opening of negotiations, the Saudi Arabian Government entertained serious thoughts of obtaining these requirements from the United Kingdom. The latter was disposed to approve, in view of the strength of Saudi insistence, of the sale of a dozen or so obsolescent fighters. Following the initiation of our negotiations on military assistance, however, the Saudi Arabian Government indicated its preference for inclusion of combat planes in the United States program.

Ambassador Hare informed the Saudi Arabian Government that he would refer this question to Washington for consideration. It is recalled that Secretary of Defense Johnson stated in his letter of August 11, 1950,<sup>2</sup> transmitting the recommendations of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to this Department, that the recommendations could be modified upward if expedient to do so. Approval by the Joints Chiefs of Staff of a small number of fighters might be expected to improve the possibility of reaching a satisfactory agreement on Dhahran Air Field. This Department has no objection on a policy basis to a small fighter force for legitimate defense purposes, and refers the matter accordingly to you for consideration by the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Presumably approval of such a force would for some years be a matter of principle only since there are no Saudi pilots and their training would require some time.

Prince Mansour has also expressed his desire for inclusion in the Military Assistance Program of permanent base shop facilities for maintenance purposes in addition to the mobile shop facilities provided for in the Joint Chiefs of Staff recommendations.

A third request by His Royal Highness, which is referred to you without comment, is that the ammunition allowance be increased to provide a five-year reserve.

A final important factor for which the Saudi Arabian Government argues very strongly in the negotiations is the need for over-all military training, which is requested for a specified period of time. By over-all training the Saudi Arabs have made it clear that they want not only training in the use of new military equipment, but also complete reorganization of the Saudi Arabian defense forces with training in all phases of military activity. The Saudis stress training as a principal stipulation in discussing the terms of an agreement on military assistance, and they closely associate the period during which training should be given with the life of the proposed Dhahran Air Field Agreement. It would, therefore, be very helpful to Ambassador Hare in his conduct of the negotiations, if not essential to his success, if a commitment could be made regarding both the extent and duration of military training that might be offered.

It would be appreciated if you would request early consideration by the Joint Chiefs of Staff of the above points raised by the Saudi Arabian Minister of Defense.<sup>3</sup>

Sincerely yours,

H. FREEMAN MATTHEWS

786A.5 MAP/2-951

Memorandum by the Officer in Charge, Arabian Peninsula Affairs (Awalt), to the Deputy Director, Office of Near Eastern Affairs (Kopper)<sup>1</sup>

TOP SECRET

[Washington,] February 9, 1951.

Mr. Mitchell has recently replaced Mr. George A. Brownell as Special Adviser to the Secretary of the Air Force. He asked me to call on him yesterday at his office in order to brief him on the general background of the negotiations in Saudi Arabia. We discussed the events leading up to the opening of negotiations in Rivadh on December 14. Mr. Mitchell said that he had read through the material recently submitted by Ambassador Hare and that there were some questions which had arisen about which he would like to ask. In the first place he said that some of the modifications in the JCS recommendations which the SAG negotiators had asked for would be difficult to obtain from JCS. He made a particular reference in this connection to the combat air force and the base maintenance shop. In respect to the combat planes I remarked that I hoped that JCS could give approval because it would for many years be merely a matter of principle. I pointed out that the SAG had no pilots and would have to start from scratch in training of flying personnel which would require at least three and possibly five years before we would be called upon to sell any of the planes required. Mr. Mitchell asked if the State Department attached great importance to approval of the combat air force and I replied that that would depend entirely upon the importance the Department of Defense attached to the Dhahran Air Field. I recalled that the Ambassador had stressed that this was one of the matters about which there was unanimity of opinion in the Saudi Arabian Government and that recent efforts to obtain fighter planes and training through British channels were indicative of the seriousness with which the SAG viewed it. Mr. Mitchell then told me that getting an agreement for Dhahran Air Field was a matter of very great importance and had a very significant place in our strategic planning. He also added that defense plans for Dhahran were of a rather urgent nature which called for the completion of certain construction projects by July or August of this year. I told Mr. Mitchell that I was very glad to have this information because the last statement of policy on it by JCS was nearly three years old. I also added that this made it all the more important that JCS should not give a refusal to the Saudi Arabian request. In a subsequent conversation with Col. Malcolm on this subject he asked whether this opinion should also be applied to furnishing bombers and he pointed out that in one of the Jidda Embassy despatches mention was made that Emir Mansour wished bomber, training and reconnaissance planes. I told him that I believed the terms of the act under which Saudi Arabia became eligible for military assistance automatically precluded us from providing weapons of offense such as bombers. Col. Malcolm agreed and added that it would also be unnecessary to provide reconnaissance planes because their function could be just as well performed for their purposes by fighter planes and have the additional advantage of being considerably more economical.

The SAG request for overall training is also a matter which might offer some difficulty, Mr. Mitchell said. I agreed that it was a knotty problem and one which we had tried to pin down more closely last fall prior to Ambassador Hare's departure. We had endeavored at that time to obtain information regarding the phasing of training operations over a period of years which would be coordinated with the acquisition of military equipment. We were unable to get a statement other than that training would be offered. Now that the SAG request for training had passed beyond training in the use of the new equipment only, I said that I felt it was more important than ever that JCS indicate with some precision just what we could do over a given period of time.

In view of SAG reluctance to enter an agreement for twenty-five years, Mr. Mitchell said that USAF was considering what period would be the shortest beyond which we would not be interested. He said that general opinion now was in favor of a ten-year period but that was not necessarily definitive. Any further reduction, however, would probably have to be referred for a decision to the Joint Chiefs.

Mr. Mitchell said that he thought it would be difficult to provide a base maintenance shop because that could be a very elaborate and expensive establishment which might be generally unsuited for Saudi Arabian needs. He said that he believed JCS would go along with supplying mobile equipment through the third echelon and that an arrangement might be suggested whereby the major overhaul of engines and other equipment could be done outside the country while substitute parts would be supplied on loan. I told him that I thought the economy of an arrangement of that kind should appeal to the SAG but I stressed the importance of having some base shop of a non-mobile character which could be as modest as JCS might care to recommend. That would enable us to approve the SAG request and still meet the requirements of practicality.

Mr. Mitchell referred again to the importance that Dhahran had in defense thinking and stated that the Carney letter to Admiral Sherman had received the urgent attention of the Joint Chiefs who were in the process of considering a position paper <sup>2</sup> on the importance of DAF. I asked Mr. Mitchell if the importance now attached to DAF would continue if and when other base right arrangements were agreed to in Aden as a part of the NATO plans. He assured me that it would.

The original draft of the Dhahran Airfield Agreement, transmitted to Jidda as an enclosure to Instruction 19, November 17, 1950, proposed a 25-year agreement. Telegram 155 from Dhahran, January 5, reported that Yassin's draft proposed a 2-year period, with automatic renewal. Instruction No. 33 to Jidda, March 1, informed Hare there was "no inflexible attachment on our part to the 25-year period," and the Department of the Air Force would approve a retreat from 25 years to 10 years. It instructed the Ambassador, however, not to consider a period of less than 10 years without specific reference to Washington. Documentation is in Department of State file 711.56386A.

appeared fairly interested in army and naval equipment included in JCS program, it was clear that what really brought a glint to their eye was idea of Saudi Air Force. In situation where Saudis are strongly dissatisfied with cash reimbursable feature of proposed assistance, is it too much to hope that we cannot at least meet them part way in allowing them to purchase something they really want? I appreciate all the arguments re availability, Saudi incapacity in aviation, etc., but this is a case where cold logic on our side may be expected to meet correspondingly frigid reception by Saudis. It is submitted that this is a case where a gesture in deference to Saudis desires might pay important dividends. For instance, we might even wish to defer idea of naval program in favor of very modest air program.

3. In view of extent of re-thinking required in connection reconsideration DAF or military assistance matters by Department it would be immensely helpful if either Department or Defense could send out someone who has been following these matters closely and could act as consultant in renewal negotiations. During original negotiations I had advantage of having been in Washington shortly before and was consequently familiar with background but in meantime much water has flowed over dam and assistance of a qualified consultant would be invaluable.<sup>5</sup>

CONFIDENTIAL

[Washington,] March 28, 1951.

Subject: Discussion with Mr. William Mitchell about DAF Negotiations.

Participants: Mr. Mitchell—Special Advisor to the Secretary of the Air Force

Mr. Jones—NE

Mr. Awalt—NE

Telegram 310, March 13, from Washington, advised Hare that when negotiations resumed, "Dept will be prepared to assign Thayer, NE, for short temporary detail, and Def also considering sending officer acquainted JCS views, if you concur." In telegram 559 from Jidda, on March 14, Hare replied that he would be glad to have Thayer assist, "on understanding he will be fully briefed re military desiderata . . . also heartily welcome defense officer acquainted with JCS views." The Department of State replied, in telegram 332, on March 26, that only a group of consultants could meet the requirements Hare listed in telegram 559. For that reason the Department of Defense considered it more expedient to recall General Day to Washington for a quick full briefing with a group of specialists. Hare concurred, in telegram 576, March 27, from Jidda. Documentation is in Department of State file 711.56386A.

Problem: To afford an opportunity for Mr. Jones to inform Mr. Mitchell of his reactions to Saudi Arabian affairs in general and DAF in particular during his recent visits to Jidda and Dhahran.

Action Required: To prompt a greater sense of urgency in Defense to do whatever is necessary for completing the DAF negotiations.

Action Assigned to: NE

Summary:

Mr. Jones said that he was very glad to have had the opportunity recently of making a trip to Saudi Arabia where he was able to receive Ambassador Hare's first-hand observations about the negotiations this far, as well as to visit Dhahran to see what we actually had at the airfield. At Dhahran he also had the opportunity of meeting General Day of whom he carried away an extremely high opinion.

Mr. Jones said that he thought it was important to know at the outset what importance Defense attached to Dhahran, because in the first place Ambassador Hare and General Day were not sure of current thinking in Washington in this regard, and because time was running out on us . . . . Mr. Mitchell stated that the importance of Dhahran was increasing in USAF estimation every day. He added that even with Dhahran we do not have enough bases in the area for our purposes and that the plans for improvement and utilization of Dhahran were so essential that USAF was giving some thought to increasing the ante by some sort of a lump sum payment if necessary. . . . Mr. Jones suggested that a more practical approach might be to give some equipment rather than cash. Since the SAG attaches so much importance to a combat air force, he thought the gift of a few T-6 trainers, fitted out as showily as possible, might make a useful impression . . . . He emphasized the importance of speed, however, by pointing out that to give quickly is to give twice. Mr. Mitchell thought the suggestion an interesting one which might bear looking into. Mr. Jones also mentioned how distasteful to the SAG were the cash-in-advance aspects of reimbursable aid, which is reasonable to demand only of "crook nations", and the waiver of obligation we insist on which allows us to divert material in the national interest. Mr. Mitchell said that USAF realized how objectionable these qualifications were and that their legal office was in the course of investigating means of avoiding these two factors in the MDAP agreement if at all possible. He also stated that the JCS had taken a favorable position toward the SAG requests for an air combat force, ammunition stocks, base workshop, and a training program at both the staff level and in utilization of the equipment. He said some final work was being done on these recommendations which would be completed very shortly.

Mr. Jones again emphasized the need for concluding the negotiations as quickly as possible because of the consistently decreasing effectiveness of the King and because the longer negotiations were protracted the more demanding the SAG was likely to become. He added that it was important to conclude this agreement with Ibn Saud because he alone in Saudi Arabia had the strength of purpose and prestige to commit his country to an agreement of this kind which would undoubtedly brook great opposition for nationalistic reasons if attempted by his successor. He also said that we have no reason to doubt that Crown Prince Saud would not be equally desirous of making an agreement with the US of this kind if he were King, but that he lacks the influence over the people of Arabia that his father enjoys and would not therefore be in a position to make such a commitment.

Mr. Mitchell asked whether it would be advisable to have Ambassador Hare return with General Day. Mr. Jones said that we had given serious consideration to having the Ambassador return when Defense suggested that General Day be brought back. It was feared, however, that if the Ambassador returned it would tend to indicate to the SAG that we were attaching much more importance to the DAF than they had previously realized so that the ante for DAF would, therefore, be automatically jacked up. Mr. Jones added that we were in receipt of a reply from Ambassador Hare concurring in General Day's recall and he said that if the Ambassador had thought it advisable for him to return also, he would have been sure to have suggested it in his reply.

The Secretary of Defense (Marshall) to the Secretary of State

Washington, April 4, 1951.

DEAR Mr. SECRETARY: I refer to your letter of 6 February, regarding the desire of the Government of Saudi Arabia to have a combat air force. The questions of permanent base shop facilities in Saudi Arabia, an ammunition allowance to provide a five-year reserve, and the need for over-all military training were also associated with the issue of a Saudi Arabian combat air force.

The views of the Joint Chiefs of Staff with respect to the points raised by the Deputy Under Secretary of State, are as follows:

a. There is no objection to a small fighter force for legitimate defense purposes. The determination of actual types and quantities of aircraft and other material should be accomplished by a small United States joint military group which will visit Saudi Arabia to make detailed arrangements in implementation of the over-all agreement.

b. Approval should be given for inclusion in the Military Assistance Program of permanent base shop facilities to the extent desired by the Saudi Arabian Government.

c. Approval should be given to the request for a five-year reserve supply of ammunition.

d. The maximum training commitments in connection with the proposed Dhahran Air Base Agreement are:

(1) Establishment of a joint military advisory mission in Saudi Arabia composed of: Army, 25-50 officers and 60-100 enlisted men; Navy, 3 officers and 8 enlisted men; and Air Force, 13 officers and 19 enlisted men.

(2) Training of Saudi Arabians in United States Service schools, not to exceed the following totals during the first phase of the program: Army—244; Navy—25; and Air Force—160.

(3) First phase of training program to extend for five years, but program to be reviewed near the end of that period in the light of conditions then existing; some training assistance to continue throughout the life of the agreement.

(4) The training program should include tactical unit training as well as the training in equipment uses.

(5) The details of the program should be worked out by the U.S. Joint Military Group after negotiations for United States rights have been satisfactorily consummated.

I suggest that Ambassador Hare be authorized to negotiate within the framework of the foregoing comments.

Faithfully yours,

G. C. Marshall

1. History Palestine question is such that 150 million grant aid Israel, or even sizable portion that amount; cld only serve substantiate basic Arab apprehension re special position Israel in US policy and cast new doubt our profession of good will toward Arab States just when our long efforts at reassurance beginning have effect. Result wld be not only to cloud our relations with countries this area at time when their cooperation badly needed, but also to reduce prospect improving relations between Israel and Arab States which we have been endeavoring foster as essential element NE security.

¹Not printed; it asked Hare to comment on the possible effect on the Dhahran Airfield negotiations of a $150 million program of grant aid to Israel and a smaller program of grant aid to Saudi Arabia. It reported: "thought was that grant aid one year basis might jeopardize US efforts obtain long term DAF agreement by tending reduce period to that of grant and that grant only partially covering MDAP program might result in SAG insistence on all grant." (711.56386A/4-2751)

Re DAF negotiations, impact such action could be extremely harmful and difficult see what convincing words cld be found explain what Saudis wld surely regard as biased act belying our assurances impartiality between Arab States and Israel.

Fact is that, prejudiced as Arabs may be re Israel, their basic reaction is fear of having stand alone to face Israel backed by unlimited Western economic and political support. Feeding these fears will do harm not only ourselves but Israel and Arab States as well.

- 2. Re prospect grant military assistance SA, this type "action rather than words" which King has long sought, which shld give Saudis feeling of greater confidence and reassurance re their security . . . and which wld also be very substantial quid pro quo in negotiating for DAF. If we cld have made such offer in Dec we wld surely have had long term agreement concluded by now.
- 3. Re inclusion SA in proposed regional econ aid program, believe important points are that all countries in area shid be eligible and that publicity specific country allocations, from which invidious comparisons cld be drawn, shid be avoided if possible. However, misgivings Saudis might have in this regard wild doubtless be more than overcome by being made unique regional recipient of grant military aid. . . .

Saudi negotiating was conducted almost exclusively by Yusef Yassin assisted by Khalid Gargoni, with Prince Feisal, Minister of Foreign Affairs, and Prince Mishaal, new Min Defense, occasionally in attendance. At outset negotiations Yusef Yassin insisted that draft which he prepared at end of previous discussions (Embdes 221, Jan 134) should be used as basis negotiations. Unsatisfactory character of that document and usual intransigence of Yusef Yassin negotiations resulted in protracted and involved discussion but general attitude of Saudi negotiators was better than previous discussions and by slugging it out practically word by word reasonably satisfactory compromise was finally reached. It was clear throughout negotiations that main preoccupation of Saudis provide "window dressing" to meet sensitivity on sovereignty question and every para of agreement on DAF and to lesser extent on mil asst was scrutinized by Saudis from that angle.

The text is printed in 2 UST (pt. 2) 1460 and TIAS 2289. A chronology of the discussions on Dhahran Airfield and military assistance at Riyadh from May 17 to May 30 was transmitted as an enclosure to despatch 401 from Jidda, May 31 (711.56386A/5-3151).

Highlights of DAF agreement follow:

1. Period was fixed at 5 years renewable automatically for additional 5 years unless either party gives notice of intention to revise or terminate 6 months prior to termination of first 5 year period. Prince Feisal stated orally for record it was intention of SAG to continue for full 10 years and that that figure could be used for planning purposes but Saudis deemed preferable divide in 25-year [2-5 year] periods for publicity reasons.

2. Specific limitation on numbers of planes and mil personnel eliminated in new draft and this made subject agreement between Commander DAF and Min Defense on basis developments and requirements. General Day accordingly addressed letter to Min Defense requesting increase to 20 planes and 1,500 men and written reply by Min Defense so authorizing was promptly given.

3. Civilian personnel are exempted from customs, taxes and other govt charges.

4. Jurisdiction was thorny problem with Saudis insisting on jurisdiction over all civilians and also over mil personnel off base. We were eventually forced drop question civilian exemption but obtained agreement that in cases offenses by mil off base but in general environs (Dhahran, Dammam, Khobar Ras Tanura, et cetera) Saudis would arrest and conduct prompt preliminary investigation and then turn offenders over to US authorities for trial and punishment. Mil offenders outside this area would fall under Saudi law but this not believed important since such travel rarely occurs except for MATS flights which so far have given no difficulty.

5. On basis of general provisions in agreement, drafts prepared of exchanges letters between General Day and Min Defense 5 covering allocation of existing buildings and listing of technical services to be performed by US mil establishment. In both cases status quo essentially preserved with few changes agreed to by General Day.

Regarding mil asst, all Saudis, including even Prince Feisal, were obviously pleased by forthright character our proposals which went far in creating favorable atmosphere for DAF negots. Mention of possible grant assistance was also well received and foreseen complications entirely failed to develop either re effect on cash reimbursable negots or re assumed eligibility Israel, in both of which cases Saudis showed gratifying sense of perspective. Two most difficult problems in discussion asst concerned desire of SAG to receive only new equipment and question of diversion in US national interest. As result of discussion Saudi negotiators were brought to understand and accept our view on these subjects but convincing King was quite another matter since these were both subjects to which we personally attached great importance. In fact, seemed possible both DAF and mil asst agreements might be hanging in balance when King raised diversion matter on last day of negots but were fortunately able to reassure him this was an article of general application specified by law and was not a policy question affecting SAG-US relationship.

Main point which I wish stress and which I know Gen Day will support is that present draft agreements and related documents which have been hammered out in two weeks of discussion not only represent best we can expect to obtain from Saudis in existing situation but also, as far as DAF is specifically concerned, constitute agreement which gives American commander at Dhahran essential administrative powers required. It is not the tidiest of documents but it is one with which commander DAF can "live" on the understanding that practical adjustment rather than rigid application of the written word usually governs in such matters in this country.

I therefore strongly recommend that documents being submitted shild not be subject to any change whatsoever unless such is absolutely necessary. As far as Saudis are concerned they regard documents as in final form and they have been given approval as such by King. To suggest changes at this time on any points, however small, wild run the very real risk of reopening the whole field of discussion in circumstances which might be less favorable than those in which we recently negotiated. I believe that risk shild not be run except for compelling substantive reasons. Yingling agrees.

I also urge that these documents be cleared by Defense and State as matters of utmost urgency in order that signature may be effected while current is running in right direction.<sup>6</sup>

General Day is telegraphing his estimate and recommendations separately to Defense.

The Commanding General, Dhahran Airfield (Day), to the Special Assistant, Secretary of the Air Force (Shaw)<sup>1</sup>

[DHAHRAN, ?] 2 June 1951.

Dear Mr. Shaw: I enclose a draft copy of the new Dhahran Airfeld Agreement with comments. I have just returned from fifteen days in Riyadh and a most exasperating and difficult negotiation. We have achieved more than I thought we would be able to. The atmosphere in Riyadh was cordial, but extreme sensitivity on the part of the Saudis made every item of discussion a subject for prolonged argument. We were forced to work from Shaikh Yussuf Yassin's Saudi draft and the simple problem of getting this into acceptable English was a large one. This . . . plus lack of understanding made for a hard time.

I suggest that you pave the way for review of the draft, before signature, by our legal people. A broad viewpoint by them is essential for any requirement to go back for changes in the agreement will subject the entire document to renegotiation. There are forces at work within the Saudi Government not favorable to us and the Government itself at the present time is not too stable. Because of this, speed in reviewing is also essential and I hope we can get approval back here within a matter of a few days after receipt in Washington. Perhaps Colonel Malcolm and Maddux can monitor this through as they did my letter of instructions while I was in Washington.

By and large we have what we want in the way of major operating rights and we can live with those things in the agreement we do not particularly like.

The official documents will be forthcoming immediately through the State Department, but I thought this advance copy would help save time in review.

I would appreciate a line from you as to your reaction to the results.

Not printed; it concerned personnel changes at the Saudi Arabian Ministry of Finance (786A.13/6-451).

Aramco of May 1950 conclusion new agreement last Dec and TAA advances extended so far this year which now total ¾ whole amount due. In fact as income rises stringencies only appear become more pronounced and in capacity Shaikh Abdullah makes impossible putting together any coherent story of where expenditures have gone. We believe SAG financial situation by no means hopeless but that SAG wld have to pull in horns if attempt made get by on present income anticipated balance this year. Since MinFin rashly agreed increase payments to Royal Family when in Riyadh during budget discussions he in no position now go to King and ask for retrenchment . . . .

And if SAG request clever tactical move view Iran <sup>7</sup> situation we do not believe any lasting improvements in use income wld result should Aramco agree make advance. Claim that funds needed implement budget is specious since latter drawn up several months ago and based upon income anticipated at that time. Rather it appears SAG stubbornly persisting endeavor repair leaky water tank by pouring more in at top, a procedure which we believe will continue as long as more water available and that a halt should be called somewhere.

JIDDA, July 2, 1951—noon.

3. Re Embtel 758, June 28.2 In conversation with Owen June 28 pursuant request for advance from Aramco made previous day (see reftel) Salha pointed out SAG requirements $10 million monthly and thus wld need additional $45 million from Aramco (i.e., approx 50 percent tax due in 1952) to cover expenditures for next nine months (until end new Saudi fiscal year). Salha estimated net income from Aramco at about $3 million monthly (which Owen says approx correct) for period, which in no way sufficient meet needs.

Owen replied he "flabbergasted" by SAG request in view current high level income. Pointed out SAG wld receive fol in addition royalties during next nine months:

$12 million December tax installment, $9 million from customs (based on Salha's estimate), plus approx $25 million early next year as first quarter installment on income tax due 1952. In this context no apparent need $45 million and he very much doubted Aramco wld agree. (Owen did not mention pilgrimage and other receipts which, added to above, roughly equal $90 million Salha says SAG needs for next nine months.)

Salha then stated Min Fin wld accept letter from Aramco stating company wld agree pay $50 million during first half 1952.

Meanwhile other signs SAG stringencies are appearing. Dutch Bank reportedly has refused make further advances govt even pursuant an Aramco letter promising payment as result bank's extended credit position and uneasiness concerning recent financial developments here. On June 27, Dutch Bank unable honor SAG dollar and riyal drafts presented by Bechtel as result current negots liquidate past obligations due that company. Riyals were paid out of Salha's "private account" at Indochine.

SAG also has had default on installment payment due June 27 to French combine guilding arms factories near Al Kharj and has been unable pay Indochine anything on Saudi gold sovereign contract, even though first 100,000 coins already here.

In view Dutch Bank inability make further advances SAG and continued unwillingness Indochine do so we know of no local source able meet demands. Heat will therefore be on Aramco and mention has also been made in passing of possibility loan from USG although we have not been approached as yet. In view present trend events financial stringencies here during latter portion this year can be expected have important repercussions on Saudi Governmental structure and SAG-Aramco relations. Shaikh Abdullah's strong point with King has always been his ability produce funds when needed. If, however, he now unable perform we believe King may be expected react strongly particularly in view growing criticism of Shaikh Abdullah because of his personal habits.

Memorandum by the Officer in Charge, Arabian Peninsula Affairs (Awalt), to the Director of the Office of Near Eastern Affairs (Jones)

CONFIDENTIAL

[Washington,] July 9, 1951.

Subject: Briefing Session with the Joint U.S. Military Group for Saudi Arabia.

The joint U.S. military planning group are now slated to leave Washington July 12. The earlier date 1 is necessary in order that the group may avail themselves of a special MATS plane otherwise departing empty that morning for Europe. It is the only alternative to MATS bucket-seat freight flights or commercial. The group is coming to State for a briefing session on Tuesday, July 10, at 2:30.2 The meeting will be in the NEA conference room. The group is made up of the following thirteen officers:

OMA—Col. V. H. Connor
Army—Col. Jean D. Scott
Lt. Col. David Firesel
Lt. Col. Ira W. Grande
Lt. Col. Lewis C. Williams, Jr.
Lt. Col. Jack Neal
Lt. Col. William A. Eadie
Navy—Cmdr. Frank L. Fulloway
Cmdr. Edward P. Laughan
AF—Col. Robert R. Stewart
Lt. Col. Bunn Hearn, Jr.
Lt. Col. C. O. Hopson
Lt. Col. James W. Parsons

It is suggested that it may be instructive to the group to have some background on our interests in Saudi Arabia. The selection of the United States as a country without imperialistic ambitions has been a voluntary choice on the part of the SAG whenever it has sought foreign assistance. American enterprise, both private and government, has therefore been responsible for a large measure of the development that has taken place in Saudi Arabia. The discovery and exploitation of oil, of course, is the outstanding example of U.S. enterprise there. It has provided generous financial returns to the country and a multitude of other benefits such as sinking water wells, building roads, and providing employment, good housing, education, and medical care for thousands of workers and their families. Three modern harbors were American built; the railway to Riyadh, to be completed in October, is entirely US engineered; the Saudi Arabian Airlines was organized by TWA; the new wireless and broadcasting stations were established by American firms; several roads and all the airports were done by Americans; agricultural and irrigation assistance has been extended by us; and the financial, agricultural, and mining advisers to the SAG are American citizens. A much longer list of lesser activities could be cited in which US enterprise has been active. They have reflected much credit upon this country and have increased our interest and stake in Saudi Arabia.

Events leading to the mission of this joint military group began in June 1947 when the SAG sought a military alliance with us. This was before NATO and would have constituted a radical departure from traditional US policy. We could not do it and offered instead to conclude a formal treaty of friendship and commerce. Lacking the alliance, the SAG then expressed its need to build up its own defense forces and asked to purchase arms from the U.S. At the same time the SAG made it clear that we should have to extend military assistance, including training, if we expected to obtain a long term renewal of the DAF agreement expiring on March 15 of the following year (1949). The subsequent outbreak of the Palestine war and the UN arms embargo delayed action on the request. After the close of hostilities, renewed requests prompted us to recommend to the SAG that a survey should be made of Saudi Arabia's military requirements. This was not only for the purpose of ascertaining the needs of the country, but also to gain time in which to obtain Congressional approval of military sales to Saudi Arabia. This suggestion was accepted and Brig. Gen. Richard J. O'Keefe, CO, DAF, was appointed by the Joint Chiefs to make such a survey. He and his mission accomplished this in the fall of 1949 and his report was sent to the JCS in December.3 Meanwhile the military assistance bill as finally passed by Congress in 1949 excluded the Near Eastern countries. An amending bill was submitted again in 1950 and passed which enabled the President to designate any nation as eligible for cash reimbursable military assistance whose ability to defend itself or to participate in the defense of the area of which it is a part, is important to the security of the U.S.4 Saudi Arabia was so designated on October 26, 1950. The JCS had already completed their study of the O'Keefe report and made their recommendations in August calling for an Army of about 18,000 men, a small Navy and Air Force, and appropriate equipment.

On the basis of these recommendations and Saudi Arabian eligibility for military assistance, the US was able to initiate the negotiations in December 1950 for a new long term DAF agreement. These negotiations were successfully concluded with an exchange of signatures on June 18, 1951. Meanwhile certain additional requests of the SAG for a combat air force, broader training, repair facilities, and more generous ammunition stores were conceded by the JCS in April 1951.

From the first approach by the SAG on this project to the present, over four years have gone by. The Saudi Arabs have been impatient for results. All the prerequisites have now been met and there remains the US responsibility of transferring our commitments into fact. The speed with which Defense has prepared to move is most gratifying and will serve to impress the SAG very effectively with the sincerity of our intentions. No relaxation should be permitted in our efforts to fulfill our obligations as promptly as possible.

It is suggested that the group should be admonished against being discouraged or depressed by what they see in Saudi Arabia. The wealth of the country and the benefits of western contacts have failed as yet to touch the lives of most of the population in any fundamental way. Saudi Arabia is still a primitive country served by a very harsh Providence. Illiteracy is the rule rather than the exception. Malnutrition and disease sap the strength and ambition of many of the people. The job to be done will have to start almost from scratch, and it may be difficult to coordinate the Government's desire for rapid tangible results with our ability under the circumstances to produce. The phasing of deliveries of equipment and progress in training might best be conservatively scheduled in order to avoid possible criticism later for failing to achieve intended results on schedule.

The British have been training Saudi Arabian Army officers and NCOs at Taif since January 1947. A military cadet school has been established there for both basic and specialized training. British experience might be very useful as a guide in planning and in appraising Saudi capacity to absorb military instruction. Friendly coordination with the British training mission to avoid duplication of effort has been agreed upon by both State and Defense. The British Government has been so informed and it concurs. It is possible that the SAG may wish to terminate British training activities when the US mission becomes operative. The British are our principal allies, and the defense of the Near East generally is, in the first instance, their responsibility. Those relationships should not be disturbed. We accordingly prefer that the British mission should remain and possible Saudi Arabian suggestions to the contrary should be discouraged.

I believe the above represents the more substantive material which may be helpful in conducting the briefing session with the military group. Lesser points which may arise in open discussion can undoubtedly be handled on an ad hoc basis.

OSD—Major Ruth Briggs S/ISA—Mr. John Bingham Mr. George Emery Col. T. W. Swett

L/EUR—Mr. Raymond Yingling

NE—Mr. G. L. Jones Mr. R. A. Thayer Mr. F. H. Awalt

Summary:

Mr. Jones gave a comprehensive outline of American interests in Saudi Arabia and how they developed. He also reviewed events of Defense character which have lead to the formation of the mission upon which the group were departing. He advised them against being discouraged or depressed by the conditions which they would meet in Saudi Arabia. He also discussed the participation of Egyptian officers in the Saudi Arabian delegation. He pointed out that the pattern was well established in the Saudi Arabian Government of utilizing the services of foreign Arabs and that although we might prefer that outside elements should not participate in the discussions, it was a situation which would have to be accepted and they would have to talk with whatever representatives were designated. The group was also briefed on the position agreed upon between State and Defense regarding coordination of our training activities with the British training mission at Taif. The importance of speed in getting on with the job was emphasized.

Mr. Yingling discussed briefly his recent experience in negotiating the two agreements with the SAG. He emphasized how necessary was patience on our part in dealing with the Saudi Arabs. He also said that we should avoid giving the impression of colonialism. The Saudi Arabs, he said, were extremely sensitive regarding their national dignity and sovereignty and would resent any suggestion of an imperialistic attitude. He added that the King and Crown Prince Saud were very disposed toward the US but that some of the King's advisers were not. There is nothing we can do about that, he said, except to be careful that we acted in complete fairness towards Saudi Arabia.

The meeting was open for general discussion and the question was raised about what criterion should be applied to the Joint Chiefs recommendations; that is, are the dollar limitations definitive or is the list of equipment the determining factor of what should be delivered to the SAG? In reply it was observed that the valuations were of necessity indicative only since there was constant change in the cost of materials. Even the equipment, it was stated, may not necessarily be treated too strictly. It was believed that the equipment recommended by the JCS was quite generous and it was very possible that it would be found at the end of five years that the SAG would not have utilized fully its authority to purchase. On the other hand, it was suggested if it was found that the equipment was insufficient for Saudi Arabian purposes or that other equipment not recommended was more suitable, the JCS would undoubtedly wish to consider appropriate modifications.

The question of responsibility for the cost of training was raised. It was explained that this problem was not entirely settled but was under current discussion in both State and Defense and there was every reason to believe that it would be completely answered before the planning group were ready to begin substantive conversations in Saudi Arabia. It was pointed out in this connection also that the question of training costs and two other matters, US military jurisdiction over training personnel and custom exemptions, were matters which were still to be negotiated and were the responsibility of the Ambassador.

In conclusion Mr. Jones expressed his appreciation for the fine backstopping that our Embassy in Jidda as well as State Department in Washington had consistently received from all officers concerned in the Department of Defense during the recent negotiations. He said he was confident that this close cooperation would continue and he assured the planning group that they would have every assistance this Department could offer during their tour of duty in Saudi Arabia.

Editorial Note

The United States Mutual Defense Assistance Program Survey Team to Saudi Arabia arrived in Dhahran on July 17. Telegram 38 from Dhahran, July 19, reported that the size of the mission and its prompt arrival had greatly impressed Saudi Arabian officials (786A.5 MAP/7-1951). The day after their arrival the members went to Riyadh, where they had an audience with the King, and General Day met with the Minister of Defense. Negotiations were carried on at

Dhahran and Taif between the Survey Team and Saudi Arabian representatives under the direction of the Minister of Defense. ("Composition and Activities of the Survey Team," Enclosure A to Report by the Military Group, Joint United States Mutual Defense Assistance Program Survey Team to Saudi Arabia on Reimbursable Aid Agreement with the Government of Saudi Arabia, 786A.5 MAP/9–1051)

A copy of the basic agreements was submitted as a report by General Day to the Saudi Arabian Minister of Defense on August 15. Provision was made in the agreements for Saudi Arabian construction of a base installation at El Kharj, or another suitable location, with facilities necessary for the Headquarters of the Saudi Arabian Army, the United States Permanent Mission, and one class of Saudi Arabian trainees. The exact scope of construction was to be determined later by a joint group of United States and Saudi Arabian officers. Recommendations were included in the report for the selection, indoctrination, and support of the United States Mutual Defense Assistance Mission. (Enclosure F, ibid.) The report also contained a military assistance program (Enclosure G, ibid.) listing basic concepts for reorganizing and training the Saudi Arabian military forces and four annexes setting forth a proposed organization for and disposition of the Saudi Arabian Army; a training program to be accomplished over a five-year period; cost estimates for Army facilities and equipment; and plans for the creation of a Saudi Arabian Air Force, with training and major equipment to be provided over a threeyear period, and for supporting installations. In general, the program provided for a Saudi Arabian Army of three regimental combat teams and a general headquarters; an Air Force of one composite tactical squadron, one airbase squadron, and a headquarters; no naval forces; and a military training mission. The Minister of Defense approved the proposals in a letter to General Day dated August 20. (Enclosure H, ibid.)

A copy of the Survey Team Report, dated September 10, was received from the Department of Defense by the Department of State on September 12. A Department of State memorandum with comments on the report, drafted between October 2 and October 11, suggested some minor changes, but concluded by saying it considered the work of the Survey Group as depicted in the report "an impressive and outstanding accomplishment," and hoped the final report would be considered and approved by the Department of Defense at the earliest possible time (786A.58/10-1151).

A Department of State memorandum, dated December 11, reported that the first part of the advance group of officers who would advise the Saudi Arabian Government on construction facilities required for the United States Military Training Team were to leave for Saudi Arabia in early January 1952. The Department of State told members of the group that for political reasons it would be glad to see the earliest action possible in fulfilling the training commitment to Saudi Arabia. (786A.58/12-1151)

The Director, Office of Military Assistance, Office of the Secretary of Defense, on December 15, 1951, informed the Director for Mutual Security, and Special Assistant to the Secretary for Mutual Security Affairs, Department of State, that the Department of Defense had reviewed the Survey Team Report; found the recommendations with respect to selection, indoctrination, and support of the United States Mutual Defense Assistance Mission (Enclosure F) acceptable; and approved the military assistance program (in Enclosure G). He also informed him that, when the chief of the mission, expected to be a United States Air Force major general, had been designated, the Department of State would be advised.

SECRET

[Washington,] August 14, 1951.

I called at General Graham's office at the White House this morning at 9:00 at his request in order to assist him in briefing the other members of the mission who are departing in the near future to Taif to attend King Ibn Saud.¹ Before joining the other officers in the conference room, General Graham told me that the President had a great personal interest in this mission and had expressed his hope that it could depart at the earliest moment possible. As a consequence every effort is being made, General Graham said, to advance their projected departure from Thursday evening to some time Wednesday, August 15. The General also remarked as a matter of confidential information that the President had refused to allow him to respond to requests from the Shah of Iran and three heads of state in Latin America to attend them. But when the request came from King Ibn Saud, he approved promptly.

After entering the conference room where the other officers were awaiting the General, the President entered and was introduced to everyone present by General Graham. The President told the group that they were going on an important mission to a great man. He is our friend, he said. He regretted sending them out over the Arabian Desert this time of year but said it was necessary and that he knew their efforts would be deeply appreciated by the King. He wished them every success on their mission . . . .

I was very much impressed, as I am sure the other officers present were also, at this clear indication of the President's deep and sincere interest in the welfare of King Ibn Saud.

After the President left the room the group sat down around the conference table for a general discussion of Saudi Arabia and its customs and the personalities the group would meet there. The discussion was entirely informal with questions raised around the table and answered by the General and myself as the case warranted. The members of the Medical Mission are as follows:

Major General Wallace H. Graham, USAF Col. Edwin M. Coyette (MC) USA, O-20530 Capt. Charles L. Ferguson (MC) USN, 63682 Col. John W. Kemble (MC), 20398 Capt. Frances F. Prince Mansur, Saudi Arabian Minister of Defense, left Saudi Arabia on April 21 for Paris, the first stop on a trip to the United States for medical treatment at the Mayo Clinic. Telegram 6668 from Paris, May 2, reported that Mansur had died on May 1 at an American hospital in Paris (786A.11/5-251). Telegram 680 from Jidda, May 20, reported that Prince Misha'al, 11th son of King Saud, had been appointed new Minister of Defense and head of Civil Aviation (786A.13/5-2051).

A letter from Burton Berry to Major James H. Burns, dated August 24, recommended that the Department of Defense invite the new Minister of Defense to visit the United States as the guest of the Secretary of Defense. The Department of State considered the visit timely in view of the recently concluded agreements with Saudi Arabia for military assistance and Dhahran Airfield and suggested it might be desirable for the Minister of Defense to see in action some of the equipment recommended for Saudi Arabia by the Joint Chiefs of Staff. (786A.13/8-2451) A reply by Frank Nash, dated September 5, accepted the recommendation and requested the Department of State to invite Prince Misha'al on behalf of the Secretary of Defense (786A.13/9-551).

Telegram 177 from Jidda, October 1, advised the Department of State that the Minister of Defense accepted the invitation and would visit the United States in November (786A.13/10-131). A Department of the Air Force memorandum, dated November 6, contained a copy of the itinerary of the Saudi Arabian party and biographical information on its members. They were scheduled to arrive in the United States on November 12, and the official visit was scheduled to last until December 6. It included visits to numerous Air Force bases, the Tennessee Valley Authority, and tank and automobile factories in Detroit. (786A.11/11-651) Documentation on the visit is in Department of State files 786A.11, 786A.13, and 786A.58.

Subject: Visit of Prince Misha'al, Saudi Arabian Minister of Defense, with Mr. McGhee.

Participants: HRH Prince Misha'al, Minister of Defense of Saudi Arabia

Sheikh Asad Al-Faqih, Saudi Arabian Ambassador

NEA-Mr. McGhee

NE—Mr. Kopper

Mr. Stabler

Mr. Awalt

Summary:

Mr. McGhee welcomed Prince Misha'al warmly to the State Department and expressed his hope that the Prince was enjoying his visit to the United States. He also informed him that the Department would be glad to be of any service possible to him. The Prince thanked Mr. McGhee for his kindness and assured him that he was thoroughly enjoying his first visit to this country. He added that he was not interested in political affairs but in defense matters and he emphasized strongly his interest and that of his Government in seeing the United States move rapidly on fulfilling its commitment regarding military training of the Saudi Arbian defense forces. He observed in this connection that the services of one training mission (sic. British) have been concluded leaving a gap which he is most eager to have filled as soon as possible. Mr. McGhee assured him that we were equally eager to implement our commitment re training and some officers had already been designated for early departure to Saudi Arabia to offer advice on the construction and other facilities required by the training forces and observed that the construction was a necessary prerequisite which the SAG was to provide. HRH agreed that this work was a Saudi responsibility. He also added that the SAG had full confidence of the good intentions and friendship of the United States but reiterated that an early demonstration of it by the training operations was highly desirable. Mr. McGhee pointed out that American friendship for Saudi Arabia was unique in the Near East and had been repeatedly demonstrated through the benevolent operations of Aramco; the establishment of DAF, which was a tremendous source of strength and security to Saudi Arabia; extension of financial assistance through Lend-Lease and Ex-Im Bank loans; the tripartite declaration of May 1950, which was arranged at the request of the King for assurances on Saudi Arabian security; and more recently by the MEC plan. He emphasized that under this plan the United States had no wish to interfere with or embarrass Saudi Arabian-Egyptian relations, but he suggested that blind support of the Egyptian position would serve no useful purpose to the SAG. He said MEC would help build up the forces of Saudi Arabia which had fine fighting instincts and had the use of an exceptionally fine airbase and a uniquely defensible area which would be most useful to Middle East defense. HRH expressed his appreciation of Mr. McGhee's comments and said that Saudi Arabia was not against the British but observed that the Egyptian position represented the demands of over sixteen million people which could not be ignored. He hoped that some satisfactory agreement could be reached but he was afraid that in the meantime clashes would occur which would cause the situation to deteriorate. In that case, he said, the canal, surrounded in a hostile area, would be indefensible in the long run. Mr. McGhee suggested that Saudi Arabia, as a friend to both sides, was in a most advantageous position to counsel moderation. In this connection, he said, it was his understanding that Saudi Arabia, owing to the prestige of His Majesty, King Ibn Saud, enjoyed the privilege of speaking last in Arab League Councils. This offered Saudi Arabia the opportunity of influencing its brother Arab states toward paths of reason and moderation. Prince Misha'al agreed that that was true but pointed out that the Arab states expected Saudi Arabia to carry US support with it. Mr. McGhee replied that we have no desire to impose our will on anyone and said that Saudi Arabian acquaintance with such outstanding Americans as Mr. Davies, General Day, Ambassador Hare, General Bradley, Secretary Finletter, General Collins and others was firm evidence of our good will. HRH said the King appreciated this fully and cited as a recent example of the King's preference for this country an offer from the British, when he was in London enroute to the United States, of various planes for Saudi Arabia. He said he referred the offer to his father, the King, who replied that he should refuse the offer with thanks because only American planes and equipment were wanted in Saudi Arabia. The Prince remarked that he had been instructed to negotiate for the purchase of one Constellation and ten two-motor planes, possibly Convairs, while he was in this country. He said he had accepted General Day's recommendation that the Constellation was too large and expensive for their needs and that ten Convairs were more than were required at the time. Accordingly, he was interested in purchasing only four Convairs and hoped that the Department of State could assist him in obtaining earlier delivery than seemed likely and also in obtaining a reduction in the unit price per plane in accordance with the DAF Agreement. Mr. McGhee told HRH that the Department would be very glad to render any appropriate assistance but added that the commercial policy of this Government might forbid interference in commercial relations between his Government and a private American firm. In regard to price discounts, he remarked that it was his understanding that the DAF Agreement provided for assistance in obtaining repair parts including engines, but did not envisage such assistance in regard to whole planes. The Prince agreed that this was true with respect to planes for the Saudi Arabian Airline but he said it was also his understanding that we would assist his Government in obtaining planes for defense purposes. Mr. McGhee agreed that this was true in respect to ten Super DC-3s or their equivalent or twelve fighter planes intended for the Defense establishment in Saudi Arabia. The Prince assured Mr. McGhee that there was no difference between transport facilities of the Defense establishment and the Saudi Arabian Airline and added that the latter operation was a responsibility of his Ministry. Mr. McGhee assured HRH that the Department would be very glad to confer with our Defense authorities and assist in any way possible.

Memorandum of Conversation Prepared in the Department of Defense

RESTRICTED

Washington, 17 December 1951.

Subject: Call by His Royal Highness, Prince Misha'al, Minister of Defense, Saudi Arabia

Participants: Secretary Lovett

Prince Misha'al, Minister of Defense

Saudi Arabia Ambassador, Sheikh Asad Al-Fagih

Mr. Akram Ojjeh, Personal Aide

Brigadier General Day, USAF, Escort Officer

Major Des Voigne, USAF, Interpreter

Lt Colonel Erwin, USAF, Foreign Liaison, Air Force Captain G. Serpell Patrick, USN, Office of Foreign Military Affairs

At 3:30 p. m. Friday, 14 December 1951, His Royal Highness Prince Misha'al, Minister of Defense Saudi Arabia, called to take formal leave of Secretary of Defense prior to his departure for Saudi Arabia. As Prince Misha'al did not speak English, all conversation was conducted either through the interpreter or the Saudi Arabian Ambassador.

Prince Misha'al expressed his appreciation for the very many kindnesses extended to him during his visit here in the United States. Mr. Lovett inquired regarding the details that were observed on the tour of defense installations. General Day explained that they had seen a very good cross section of the armed forces training centers in which the Minister of Defense was especially interested. Mr. Lovett referred to the training films and training devices which had assisted immensely in reducing accidents, particularly, he recalled, in the operation of the B-26. He felt that the Saudi Arabian armed forces could profit immensely by the use of such aids prior to the arrival of actual equipment.

In regard to MDAP, it was pointed out that it was necessary that the United States military mission in Saudi Arabia should first assist in the reorganization of the army and secondly proceed with the replacement of equipment by those items which would be provided from the United States.

The Secretary asked Prince Misha'al if there was anything that he could do for him between now and his departure from the United States. Prince Misha'al thanked him and said that they were anxious to move ahead in equipping and training their army as rapidly as possible. The Secretary noted that the military mission would arrive in Saudi Arabia in January 1952. The Prince emphasized the fact that it was to both the U.S. and Saudi Arabia's mutual benefit that Saudi Arabia be better equipped to defend itself against Communist aggression.

General Day stated that on his recent visit with King Ibn Saud the King had told him that there were no Communists in Saudi Arabia. The King stated, "If you could find a Communist in Saudi Arabia, I will hand you his head."

Prince Misha'al, his party and Secretary Lovett, then went into the dining room where pictures were taken after which the visitors departed.

314. Prime Minister <sup>3</sup> yesterday informed me he is about to put forward application for major loan from Export Import Bank. In conversation which then ensued he told me of serious difficulties in Parliament and even within own party in determining fundamental attitude and program of action in present critical world situation. He said whole range of problems has been brought to head by message from UN delegation forewarning government that Syria may suddenly be required to take important policy position for vote on resolution declaring Chinese Communists aggressor.<sup>4</sup>

Qudsi said that in series of secret meetings with political leaders and with Parliament Foreign Affairs Committee to review international situation he and his supporters were hard put to it to defend a policy sympathetic to democracies and were obliged to admit Syria's exposed situation today, her relative weakness if relying on own efforts, and uncertain prospects of practical and effective support from the West if situation deteriorates. Government's present program and projects would be adequate in less critical times but he is now being reproached for not facing up to crisis of world affairs. All leaders are agreed that drastic steps must be taken to build up public confidence, to invigorate defense organs, and above all to strengthen the economy. He said government was thinking of something like 100 million dollars. Under programs practicable with such credits Syria could pull herself together and steadily move forward with real contribution to stability and prosperity in ME.

He did not develop his ideas, if indeed they have as yet been formulated, on what projects would be undertaken and over period of time and what might be relationship to IBRD loan or whether decision had been reached as to the firmness of Syria's alignment with policies of democracies parallel with loan application. This was clearly his preliminary statement, to be amplified in further conversation tomorrow when, along with Norman Burns who is returning to Damascus for that purpose, I had in any case expected to see him on Point IV.5

Before seeing Qudsi I had called on Minister Finance explaining cold realities of Export Import Bank operations and had left with him formidable outline of requirements for even 10 million dollar proposition we then knew to be contemplated. I told Qudsi of this and suggested that he study these practical requirements before presenting any formal proposal.6

As general observation I noted Qudsi has intelligent and perceptive understanding of policy underlying credits to Greece, Turkey and Iran and he did not unduly press parallels. He made only passing reference to loans to Israeli (see Legtel 306 January 4).7 He clearly wants Syrian application to appear to stand on own merits and not as counterbalance to aid to Israel. While giving him credit for this restraint we do not for a moment forget that Israeli question is close to surface in all this ferment and US policy must be shaped accordingly.

The reservations referred to here concerning Syria's interest in an Export-Import Bank loan were supported in telegram 266 to Damascus, February 2, which instructed Cannon to inform Qudsi that such a loan application at the present time would complicate the current consideration of Syria's application for a loan from the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (883.10/2-251).

or appear to help cause much at moment if invaders bring overwhelming forces but struggle would continue. Army is being strengthened in manpower and organization but must have correspondingly more and better equipment. "Nothing fancy and I do not care whether it comes from" a reference to fact that recent acquisitions are from France.

He does not worry about talk of neutralism for when time comes he is sure that Syria will fight for democracy. "But I cannot ask Syrian people to defend their misery. We must fulfill our promises for economic balance. Thus progress with problem of Palestine refugees, loans and Point IV (see separate telegram)<sup>2</sup> and military aid are all aspects of one question which is how fast we can move toward a clear-cut position. Syria will not fail cause of democracy in Middle East; she also will do utmost by own efforts."

Foregoing should be considered in context visit British General Robertson.3 Latter's talk with me was largely exchange of views since he had not yet seen Qudsi or talked seriously with military. British Minister tells me Robertson talks were generally satisfactory but no promises were made and no commitments requested. Syrians put forward request for armament for four divisions of which three armored but did not demur when Robertson suggested they make start with one infantry division for which he would go on record as favoring supply of equipment from West. He told them bluntly not to expect much if any help in aviation. To him Syrians stressed familiar Palestine arguments more than in recent talks with me. Neutralism attitude was also noted but Robertson and British Minister consider this to be reasonably explained by factor of timing; namely that it will take some time for Syria to pull her forces together and in present weakness any firm public stand with West would put Syria too far out in front of other states hereabouts equally exposed and better able to meet threat. Robertson told them before any military aid could be considered West must know what material Syrians now have and how they proposed to utilize it. Syrians are therefore getting to work preparing lists. This explains Qudsi's remark to me when touching on military aid (see first paragraph) that maybe next week he would let us know results of review of military requirements now being made.

Indication of new policy trends suggested by foregoing will require further observation and analysis since Qudsi's forthright state-

883.00 TA/5-2851: Despatch

The Chargé in Syria (Clark) to the Department of State 1

CONFIDENTIAL No. 533

Damascus, May 28, 1951.

The Legation has not abandoned effort nor hope that a Point IV agreement may be signed with Syria. We hope that this despatch may soon be supplemented by the news that the general agreement has been signed. If the Syrians do sign the agreement, the present despatch will serve as an indication of problems which will continue to exist. If they do not sign the agreement, it will be an explanation for their failure to do so.

1. The failure of the Syrians to conclude a Point IV agreement is naturally owed to a complex of reasons, but the pervasive one is the Syrian suspicion of the United States because of its attitudes toward Israel. Every argument, every explanation is perverted by this suspicion: "Point IV is for Israel." "Point IV is a sop thrown to the Arab countries while the U.S. goes about its purpose of strengthening Israel." "Point IV is an effort to turn the Arab countries over to

American firms and technicians so that they may pass information to the Jews." The Government officers concerned do not really believe these sayings entirely, but, exasperatingly enough, neither do they entirely reject them. The sophisticated Government servant assures you that the populace cherishes these beliefs and it is the populace whom he must face after signing such an agreement. Or, he may assure you that he is a rational man and believes in Point IV for the good it would do Syria in spite of the U.S. support of Israel, but this problem cannot be settled rationally in such times. Or, he may say, "You Americans are like the British who also sought to impose their will on the Arab world by making the countries dependent on their type of machines, their processes, their type of institution." Or he may say it is quite rational to refuse Point IV and suffer the consequences if thereby his purpose of enmity against Israel and its friends is servedand here he quotes the Old Testament story, well known in the Moslem world, of Samson who is willing to pull the temple down on his own head if he may thereby kill some Philistines.

2. Interwoven with this sentiment is the extreme economic nationalism made plausible for the time being by extraordinary agricultural prosperity. The Legation will be reporting more precisely some measures of the greater cotton boom in prospect for 1951. If cotton prices do not fall drastically and if the cotton crop is a good one, Syria may well earn LS 200 million more than last year on the cotton crop alone. Much of this will be in foreign exchange, since cotton is principally exported, and though the earnings accrue largely to the private sector, the Government may be able to share in the prosperity through an export tax. In relation to the usual level of economic activity, 1950 should be called nothing less than a boom and 1951 promises to be an expanded boom. This prosperity is Syrian managed, Syrian generated, Syrian achieved, without "Marshall Plan,<sup>2</sup> Point IV or any other foreign help." In volume, the prospective addition to national income is larger than the amount available under Point IV or even under the proposed Grant Aid Program. Under the impetus of nationalism and prosperity, the usually worthy spirit of national self-help has become a spirit of extreme economic isolationism, at least with regard to international economic aid programs. Technical assistance pokes its nose into problems of land ownership, financial institutions, customary ways of doing things. Established interest, economic and political, prefer an autonomous prosperity to the receipt of aid which requires changes in basic institutions.

- 3. The rapid turnover of Governments 3 has been another impediment to the conclusion of a Point IV agreement. A general agreement was about to be signed when the Qudsi Government fell. With the present Government, the work of explanation and persuasion had to begin anew, not with the director-generals but with the Ministers who must make and take responsibility for the decisions.
- 4. The multiplicity of institutions proferring technical assistance has been another deterrent to the signing of a Point IV agreement. Syria is not a populous country. As an independent nation it is only a few years old. The civil service is small. Into this setting have come Point IV, UNRWA, WHO, FAO, British Middle East Office, the French, IBRD, the Near East Foundation, and others with offers of technical assistance/economic aid. Those who proffer aid outnumber those who have to make the decisions to receive it and the Syrians come to believe that technical assistance is easily to be had in a beneficiaries' market. As a consequence, they have little of the sense of urgency of those who offer aid.
- 5. The list of these causes began with the zeal against Israel which infects all thinking on Point IV. The list ends with a dead weight of inertia which hangs on the consideration of Point IV. The Syrians find it easier and more congenial to complain of the Ex-Im Bank loan to Israel than to prepare an application for a bank loan. In a day of presenting again the desire of the United States Government that Syria sign the general Point IV agreement, Legation officers have been told by responsible Syrian Government officials that the U.S. has refused to give Point IV aid to Syria!

- 19. Deptel 7079 June 25 to Paris.2 As seen from here, fol factors seem important in determining US attitude on supply aircraft Syria.
- 1. We fully agree Syrians still have far to go in making best use of even conventional aircraft. Indeed their air force within period predominant in our mil thinking can hardly become serious element in defense of ME, however equipped.
- 2. It wld be great mistake, however, to ignore polit and psychological value of few planes. We must find way to counteract two pernicious beliefs: (a) That we hold Syrians incapable of using modern arms; and (b) That in case of war Western Powers have no serious intention of firm stand beyond shores of Mediterranean and Suez. Any talk of concept of security in Dept has thus far been taken with extreme skepticism.
- 3. Syrian Pri Min recently demanded with reference to General Robertson's visit in Feb, and Brit Min was authorized to give, assurances re defense of ME. These were built around concept Suez wld be "base not line of defense". Syrians expect this "guarantee" to be given concrete expression by early delivery mil equipment of kinds and quantities sufficient to demonstrate real intent to strengthen ME. Our hopes for favorable attitudes in Arab hinterland and possible bases here in event major conflict depend on concrete action which wld give grounds for confidence our intentions.
- 4. Syrians' favorite example of unreliability of Anglo-Saxons is Brit failure to deliver dozen Gloucester Meteor Jets ordered and paid for more than year ago and for which several pilots already given Jet training in UK.
- 5. As in everything else, Israel question and problem of maintaining balance in arms supply cannot be ignored. We must anticipate bitter reaction here to denial of event token sales Jet aircraft to Syria when Syrians learn of recent sale by France to Israel of 40 Mosquitos with reported 80 more to follow. They will, of course, assume this deal had prior US approval. Our Air Att thinks Israeli Air Force already has greater potential than North Arab States and shld soon be more than match for all Arab Forces combined.
- 6. We may well deplore trend toward policy under which questions of supply apportionment or withholding of Jet planes become yardstick of internatl affections. Rationally we probably shld continue to deny Jets to NE States not ready for them but US has itself done much to make other nations regard their security problems in terms of air power. Unless we are ready with substantial substitutes, we must expect this pressure to increase and can hope for little support from local mil for such programs as MSP if they get notion it contemplates supply only outmoded material.

7. Syrians know any major help from West means prior coordination but wld try to capitalize on special US-UK and French interest. Since French take advantage of every opportunity to build up their own special econ and polit position here, some partial fulfillment of prior Brit commitment shld be arranged if any Jets are to be made available to Syria.

8. Best of all wld be demonstration direct US interest. With improvement in our supply position and supposing easing of demand for combat use in Korea, US might venture few planes as primarily polit and morale proposition. Joint US-UK project might be easiest entry, MSP then to take over.

9. Amb Hare's reflections re SA (last para Jidda's 750 June 25)<sup>3</sup> highly pertinent with difference that in Syria material aid must be visible before training missions begin to arrive.<sup>4</sup>

It listed several reasons why the French supply of other combat aircraft to Israel should not be viewed with alarm by the Syrians. As regards U.S. supply, telegram 28 stated that the limited supply of U.S. jets, the present tension in the Near East, the high combat potential of jets, the lack of sufficiently experienced crews in either Israel or the Arab states, and the still inadequate mechanism for coordinating U.S., U.K., and French arms supply to the area, all argued for delay in considering Syrian requests for jet aircraft. Populist membership in Parliament) or possible military dictatorship. Reliable Leg source had reported that Shishikli 4 had considered these as only alternative to "dictatorship by Populists".

We thus consider new cabinet as compromise arrangement which rids country of Azm who had become source of embarrassment to army and was "bete noire" of Populists. Populists are in strong agreement with PriMin Hakim's ideas on "economy in govt" (Hakim is reputed to have army permission to economize even in military expenditures) but at same time most of new Ministers known to be well-disposed toward army. Since five Populist Mins are "army friends" and are members of "Republican" wing of People's Party, army has some assurance there will be no moves toward Syro-Iraqi or other Hashemite Union plans. In general, cooler heads compose new cabinet, and this should make it easier to patch up army-Populist differences and move ahead with essential legislation.

Probably most encouraging aspect new cabinet is definitely prowestern disposition of PriMin and greater part of his cabinet (Legtel 72 August 7). If Leg is correct in its analysis that it has been formed on sound basis, new cabinet [may be?] means of bettering US-Syrian relations and securing Syrian cooperation in matters of mutual interest. We anticipate that Hakim Govt will show more realistic attitude toward Point IV 6 and MSP. Re former I intend letting PriMin set pace because he will have much to undo; re latter we will be guided by Dept and Congressional action, though we can proceed at once with indoctrination of new personalities. At earliest opportunity I will reiterate invitation to Jap Peace Treaty Conference at San Francisco and ascertain PriMin's thinking re Syrian delegation.

present time. Record of last two years proves Syria will procure arms with whatever cost to constitutional ideals and development possibilities and that it will accord internal leadership to whoever can procure them and friendship to country which supplies them. It seems necessary for US to appropriate this necessity for whatever good can be gained for West and for whatever control can be exercised for good of Syria and ME.

We realize Syrian conception of purpose of arms is still primarily security against feared Israeli attack and only secondarily security against Communist aggression. But provision of arms will put US in position of influence which it does not now occupy and if we have the skill we may be able to use this position bring about an improvement in Syro-Israeli relations, not by frontal attack but by helping Syrians rescue themselves from inferiority feelings (Legtel 221 Oct 184) and thereby nihilism through the remedy of security as envisaged in milit component MSP and constructive activity as envisaged in economic aid component. We can exact quid pro quos in the administration of such assistance. We can regulate flow in accordance with response elicited. Important thing is to show evidence quickly in form of milit equipment. There is in our view a risk greater than any other here in allowing the present nihilism to drift towards a culmination which will be pro-Communist as well as anti-Israel. In the absence of an ideal solution we believe it better to attempt the method which may free Syrian constructive energies than it is to do nothing. This strikes us as the more worthy attempt since the marginal demand for a single aircraft or anti-aircraft gun is probably higher than for countries already integrated into mutual defense programs. An immed token offer by US wld enable experiment without jeopardizing ME peace. CLARK was unable to carry out the task, and the UP now reports that the neutralist populist Maruf Dawalibi is now trying the same job. This is bad news for the West, for Dawalibi is violently anti-Western. Many observers believe that the basic cause of the Hakim cabinet's fall was the Populist-Army struggle for control of the Government; Hakim's statements having afforded an excuse for an attempt at replacing him with a Populist prime minister.

Hakim's ouster is not necessarily final, and there is a possibility that his views may prevail. He informed the British Minister that Shishikli had nothing to do with his resignation and that he believed Shishikli desires to cooperate with MEC and could bring strong influence to bear on the politicians, provided he could show concrete evidence of arms aid and/or a "gesture" by the West in its Palestine policy.

Dawalibi and Qudsi, who has also been considered for the Premiership, marched at the head of an orderly procession demonstrating in behalf of Egypt last Wednesday.

A committee of Secretaries General of the various ministries is meeting to study the economic aid features of MSP. Definite projects were discussed but it is hard to determine what the chances of Syrian participation will be pending the formation of a new cabinet.<sup>2</sup>

Editorial Note

A military coup d'état was effected by Colonel Shishakli during the night of November 28–29. On November 30, telegram 310 from Damascus described this coup as the latest evidence of a long-standing feud between the Army and the People's Party over the exercise of political power in Syria (783.13/11–3051). The pretext for the coup was said to be the Army's fear that, under Dawalibi, government policy would favor civilian control of the military, neutrality between the Western and Soviet blocs, and unification with Iraq, and possibly Jordan, under a "Greater Syria" plan, rather than sympathetic consideration of the four-power proposals for a Middle East Command. For documentation on Syria's participation in regional defense planning, see pages 1 ff.

Subject: Weekly Summary

Syria

The immediate cause of Colonel Shishikli's seizure of power November 30 was apparently Dawalibi's plan to appoint a new chief of staff as the first act of his cabinet. Shishikli tried to preserve the appearance of constitutionality by securing Dawalibi's resignation but Dawalibi's obstinate refusal to back down forced Shishikli into the role of dictator, a position he has attempted to avoid.

Saturday President Al-Atassi announced that the Dawalibi Cabinet had resigned and that Hamid Al-Khudja, of the pro-army bloc in parliament, had been designated Premier. Evidently the Populists in Parliament refused to cooperate by giving a vote of confidence to any new cabinet; therefore no formation of a replacement government was possible. In order to solve the impasse, President Atassi resigned his office yesterday (December 2) and turned over authority to Colonel Shishikli to act as Chief of State. A French ticker from Damascus announced today that Colonel Selo, former Minister of Defense, would take executive and legislative charge, exercising the powers of Chief of State, President of the Council and Minister of Defense. Shishikli has dissolved Parliament and announced his intention of holding new elections.

Dr. Dawalibi, most of his cabinet and his supporters are still in jail following their arrest early Thursday morning.

The Legation is hopeful that Shishikli may be able to give Syria the decisive leadership lacking in the past and even in the long run to develop a climate in which political democracy can function. However, if he has to fall back upon Haurani for support, he may not be able to retain the reins of government and Western interests may suffer. (Haurani and his Arab Socialists advocate a radical land reform program, which has occasioned a strong reaction from the landlord class. Even though Haurani himself is not a Communist, there are reliable reports that Communists have penetrated the top echelons of his party and the party might easily fall into Communist hands were Haurani's influence removed. It is reported that Colonel Shishikli has been disturbed lest his close association with Haurani bring him harm).

Shishikli's coup was carried out quietly with no known disturbances, injuries or loss of life, by few junior officers under Shishikli's personal 334. Today French, Turk, Brit Mins and I exchanged view informally re new regime. We are agreed it appears in complete control of situation throughout Syria and barring danger of assassination which most ME rulers share in common there is little prospect of its being overthrown. Yesterday French MilAtt saw Shishikli who referred to Syrian grievances against West, especially Palestine, but expressed desire coop with west and hinted he might even go along with MEC without Egypt if assured adequate supply of modern arms. (We wld treat this with reserve and raise question as to whether Syrian MEC membership wld be a good thing until new regime had some accomplishments to show Syrian people in other fields. It is, nevertheless, a significant indication of Shishikli's attitude.) He also wld have elections within two or three months and French MilAtt recd impression no new Cabinet wld be formed in meantime. We agree adverse factors are continued imprisonment elected officials and position of influence Akram Hawrani still has. These are internal matters and we have found nonrecognition is not a useful instrument of policy. Moreover, efforts to influence Shishikli take internal steps he feels impracticable wld probably not serve useful purpose. We cld probably do more to influence him after recognition than before.

We concurred recognition by Western Powers shld probably not long be withheld after Arab States extend it. According present info only Iraq seems likely hold out and Brit Min suggested Iraq Govt might be advised futility of waging long fight if other Arab States ready recognize.

Leg attachés maintaining informal contact with lower echelons, including Shishikli's ADC and I have suggested asst army attaché hint to ADC army attaché he wld be glad have talk with Shishikli in private capacity learn his views.

If notwithstanding foregoing, Dept believes specific quid pro quos shld attach to recognition we wld appreciate guidance.

Editorial Note

The presentation to Syria of the note of acknowledgment referred to in telegrams 512 and 344, page 1088 and supra, was delayed by various complications. Legation talks in Damascus with Saudi Arabian and Egyptian diplomatic representatives seemed to indicate that the Arab countries would not be taking action on recognition for several days (telegram 349 from Damascus, December 10; 783.02/12-1051). Telegram 350 from Damascus, of the same date, stated that Clark and his French, British, and Turkish colleagues had decided to maintain only informal contacts with Syria for the time being while awaiting clarification of the Arab states attitude. The telegram further stated that the British and French representatives in Damascus were still awaiting instructions to proceed with recognition in concert with the United States and Turkish representatives (783.02/12-1051). Telegram 356 from Damascus, December 11, reported that, in the absence of an unforeseen development or instructions to the contrary, the four-power representatives would acknowledge receipt of the Syrian note on the morning of December 15 (783.02/12-1151). It was explained in telegram 360 from Damascus, December 13, that the decision to wait until December 15 was made in part because the British representative was still without instructions and it was thought preferable to deliver the note quietly on a Saturday rather than at the close of the day on the 13th or on the 14th which was a religious holiday (783.02/12–1351). On the 14th, the Legation received word from Washington that Lebanon had decided to recognize Syria (telegram 232 to Damascus, December 14; 783.02/12–1251).

The four powers presented their notes on December 15 (telegram 363 from Damascus, December 15; 783.02/12-1551). A copy of the United States note 421, dated December 15, was enclosed in despatch 335 from Damascus, December 17 (783.02/12-1751), and read as follows: "The Legation of the United States of America presents its compliments to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Syria and, pursuant to instructions from the Government of the United States, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the Ministry's note number S-90, dated December 3, 1951, informing the Legation of the formation of the Government headed by H. Memorandum by the Officer in Charge of Lebanon-Syria-Iraq Affairs (Gnade) to the Director of the Office of Near Eastern Affairs (Jones)<sup>1</sup>

[Washington,] December 17, 1951.

Subject: Weekly Summary

Syria

Representatives of the United States, Britain, France, Turkey, Italy, Belgium, and Saudi Arabia sent to the Under Secretary of Foreign Affairs notes acknowledging receipt of the Syrian Government's notice to them that Colonel Fawzi Silu had become Chief of State. According to a US Legation spokesman, this formal contact was tantamount to recognition of the new Syrian Government. A few days ago the Lebanese Government made a similar gesture. According to a New York Times report of December 16, Jordan's delegate made his country's act of recognition directly to Colonel Shishikli.

This act of recognition by three Arab States allays fears that Egypt might attempt to obtain Syrian endorsement of the Egyptian position vis-à-vis MEC and the British as a price for Egyptian-sponsored recognition by the Arab States. Syria might have been forced to pay such a price if the Saudis had backed up the Egyptians. Now Syria remains unrecognized by only three of her fellow Arab States: Egypt, Iraq and Yemen.

The Egyptians are said in some quarters to be holding off until new elections were held in Syria. The Iraqi Minister to Egypt claimed that Egypt was waiting on Saudi Arabia before taking definite steps to recognize Shishikli's Government. The Saudi Arabian attaché in . . ., on the other hand, suggested that Egypt was hesitating because of the alleged anti-Egyptian influence of the PPS in the new Government.* He also reported that King Ibn Saud, being against Syria-Iraq union and following his policy of support to the strongest man in Syria, had been quite pleased by the recent events in Syria.

The Secretary General of the Foreign Office has assured the US Legation that the Populists arrested on November 28 are well-treated and that all their rights will be respected.

[Washington,] December 17, 1951.

Participants: Faiz El-Khouri-Minister of Syria

Mr. G. Lewis Jones—NE Mr. R. E. Gnade—NE

Problem: Discussion of new elements in Syrian political situation. Discussion:

The Syrian Minister came to make his first formal call at the Department since the change of Government at Damascus. Mr. Jones showed him the New York Times article which quoted an American Legation spokesman at Damascus as saying that the Legation's acknowledgment of Syria's note regarding the new Syrian Government was "tantamount to recognition". The Minister was puzzled by the meaning of tantamount, and was relieved to learn that it meant "equivalent", and that it had been used because no formal act of recognition was required for the new Government as would have been required had there been a new regime in Syria.

The Minister stated: In his opinion the dissolution of Parliament and the other recent acts of the new Government in Syria meant that the Syrian Constitution was no longer operating and that therefore, in fact, the new Government was not bound to hold elections in four months as required by the Constitution. He cited a parallel occasion in 1939 when the 'Azm Government resigned and Parliament was dissolved by the French authorities. Government by the Secretaries General of the various Ministries should be good for Syria. These technicians will be able to work free of outside pressure and without political influences bearing down on them. It is high time that decrees of past governments be put into effect and the debris of years of instability be cleared up. The members of the Dawalibi Government are not anxious to be freed, because in the opinion of many Syrian politicians it is dangerous to work either with or against a Government such as the present one. The old slogan, "no change in policy", which each government espoused, is no good. The Parliament prevented the government from progressing. Now is the time for a new straight-forward policy in Syria. The Minister hopes that the new Government will tell the American Minister that it has taken a clear decision to cooperate with the West. Details of the cooperation can be worked out as they arise.

Mr. Jones interposed that he hoped that the new policy would not necessarily be limited to a pro-US policy but would be a wider, pro-Western policy. He asked whether the new Government would not set up a forward-looking program with such items as land reform, cotton cultivation improvement, swamp drainage, land tenure reform, etc. He suggested that the Government should show such a program to the Western chiefs of mission and then ask, "How can you help us"? He explained that the West has long had the feeling of being rebuffed by Syria. The Western powers came with clean hands to help, but were not welcomed. The new Government can now reevaluate Syrian policy and then come to the West to ask for aid. A strong man like Shishikli must first make the decision and then approach us.

The Minister commented that in any case the Syrians were not ready to be satellites of any power. The Syrians considered themselves the prime bearers of the torch of independence in the Arab World. Their land has been the heart of the movement for freedom among the Arabs.

Mr. Jones answered that the US wants cooperation, not satellites. Turkey, for example, is no satellite but works closely with the US and the West. The Arabs must get over their fear of being satellites. It is up to the Syrian Government to take the initiative of cooperating. The West cannot step forward and offer help; it must be asked. Western initiative in the matter might be fatal for Shishikli, a kiss of death. It is up to Shishikli to set up a program and then ask for aid—not for satellite status, which neither he nor we want.

Minister Khouri expressed his firm conviction that the future of Syria cannot be separate from that of all the Arab States. He always feels it wrong to come to the Department as the Syrian Chief of Mission in Washington, because basically he speaks as an Arab, not as a Syrian. The fundamental cause of Arab instability is Israel and the lack of security which because of the Israeli threat hangs like a shadow over the Arabs. Continued American aid to Israel makes US sincerity and cooperativeness questionable to the Arabs. With this the Minister launched into a long diatribe against Israel and against American support of the new Israeli State.

Mr. Jones concluded by pointing out to the Minister that one way in which the Israeli danger, as the Arabs saw it, could be countered was by the development of a strong stable Arab State as a counter balance to Israel in the Middle East. Now was the time when Syria might have the opportunity to develop itself into such a counter force.

- 1. FonOff has strong misgivings re creation comite of four chiefs mission in Damascus. It considers important that mins meet and discuss probs but that it wld be extremely unfortunate for Syrians to know that formal comite of four chiefs was mtg and making formal report. FonOff is of opinion that Syrians wld resent it and it wld be to detriment to interest of four powers.
- 2. FonOff agrees that speed is obviously of importance but considers that unobtrusiveness is even more important in connection with action taken.
- 3. FonOff is very favorable disposed to proposals in reftel but repeats its previous warning against advisability endeavoring obtain Syrian assurance re MEC too soon.
- 4. FonOff considers it regrettable that Turks are to be associated so closely in this program. It admits that association with Turks from time to time is desirable but points out that previous Turkish-Syrian tension shld never be forgotten and that it is unthinkable that Syrians wld be willing to receive Turkish assistance. FonOff recognizes that matter has gone too far to avoid Turkish association with action proposed but stresses undesirability creation of Four-Power Comite in Damascus.

387. General policy outlined in Deptel 213, Dec 6,² and Deptel 238, Dec 14,³ completely sound provided new Syrian regime continues to show disposition to cooperate with west. We suppose French hesitancy implied in their emphasis on necessity for unobtrusiveness (para 2 Paris tel 3619, Dec 17 to Dept),⁴ is due to fact policies new regime not fully apparent and perhaps not fully formulated. French FonOff's arguments do not show, however, that speed, cooperation between missions, and reporting of conclusions can not be carried out unobtrusively. Moreover, coordination as envisaged in suggested informal comite wld not necessarily have to be exclusively in Damascus.

From para 4 Paris tel 3619 it wld seem French doubts spring chiefly from association Turks in program. We think Turks shld participate, but other three powers cld confer, at other levels if necessary, without Turks if that wld satisfy French.

We shid have thought French wild welcome chance to have full exchange info. Their arguments para 1 Paris tel 3619 seem to hide other reasons. We agree that Syrians might be uneasy about our pooling classified info about their country, but surely any disadvantages resulting from their finding out about comite wild be more than offset by advantages we all wild have when Syrians realize they can not succeed in playing four powers off against each other.

Ref is being made in separate tels re Dept's comments in para 5b Deptel 238 not to mislead Shishikli about what can be done re Israel.

I interpret my talk with Shishikli (Legtel 385, Dec 31)<sup>5</sup> as having conveyed good idea substance our aid program, particularly in econ field and fair idea our sense urgency. He showed no anxiety for special speed. We can form rounder judgment on regime's program after talk with Selo (last para Legtel 385). We shall then have more substantial info for informal comite consultations, especially since other chief of missions are equally anxious for more first hand info from new leaders.

&lt;sup>5</sup> Not printed; it summarized Cannon's comprehensive talk of that date during which Shishakli indicated that he was generally prepared to cooperate in a discreet manner in accepting Western assistance, with the realization that he must have American aid to carry out his planned economic reconstruction program. On other matters, the conversation revealed that Shishakli wanted genuine elections as soon as public interest and intelligent judgment about Syria's problems had been awakened, desired to release the political prisoners as soon as possible, favored progressive and relatively rapid but not revolutionary reform, was amenable to early and realistic measures concerning the refugee problem, and was realistic on the problems involving Syrian relations with Israel. (Memorandum from Worcester (NE) to Jones, January 7, 1952; 783.00/1–752)

I wld add as general comment that merit of comite idea must not blind us to fact that unless there has been more progress in forming unified great power policy than we have any inkling here, local chiefs of mission will continue to be guided by special and not always parallel national interest. Put bluntly and perhaps unkindly this may mean since aid program will be largely at US expense others stand to profit by cooperation while quietly pursuing their own ends. Comite may be check and deterrent to British, French and perhaps Turkish schemes, but not cure. Thus even if French and British are gradually coming to align their long term objectives in Middle East with ours they can make no comparable contribution while profiting from ours. As for Turkey, we here consider her increased prestige in Middle East added to her intransit strength to be a most beneficient element. Turkey can be real help, too, in promoting UNRWA program. But if Syrians are still skittish about foreign aid in general they may ponder on how they are better off if beholden to four powers all of whom they still mistrust for one reason or another than if beholden to only one against whom their one grief is clearly definable. We know there are intangibles of great weight to justify comite method as manifestation coordinated program. We enter this caveat only to point up appreciable differences between procedures essential to MEC and those practicable for aid program.

PRINCIPAL POLICIES AND PROBLEMS IN RELATIONS WITH TURKEY 1

882.181/1-1551: Despatch

The First Secretary of the Embassy in Turkey (Baxter) to the Department of State

Ankara, January 15, 1951.

No. 377

Ref: Department's A-114, December 27, 1950 2

Subject: Turkish-Bulgarian Agreement on Resumption of Immigration

In the Grand National Assembly on January 5, 1951, Foreign Minister Köprülü, in reply to an interpellation, gave information which answers the questions in the Department's airgram No. A-114.

The Foreign Minister stated that, after the closing of the frontier on October 8, the Turkish Government informed the Bulgarian Government of its willingness to reopen the frontier and to accept all properly documented immigrants then waiting at the border on the following conditions:

(1) Bulgaria would issue exit visas only to those who were already provided with Turkish entry visas;

(2) Bulgaria would immediately accept those persons detained by Turkish frontier authorities because they had attempted to enter Turkey without Turkish entry visas.

After Sofia had accepted these conditions, the Turkish Chargé in Sofia informed the Bulgarian Foreign Office on November 29 that the Turkish Government was prepared to open the frontier to normal traffic on December 2. On the same day the terms of the agreement were made public.

"This agreement was not reached by an exchange of signed notes between the two countries," the Foreign Minister continued, "but following the delivery by our Chargé d'Affaires to the Bulgarian authorities, in response to the demand presented by Sofia for the opening of the frontier, of a text containing the terms previously published in the communiqué released to the press, and of the interview held the same day in the course of which the Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs of Bulgaria, Mr. Ivkof, orally and in his official capacity informed the Turkish Chargé in Sofia that the text had been accepted. This kind of verbal agreement, which in diplomatic language is called a 'gentlemen's agreement,' is as valid as a signed note."

Mr. Köprülü further stated that the agreement with the Bulgarian Government contained no stipulations with regard to the number of immigrants to be accepted by Turkey, the Turkish Government having reserved its right to limit the number of immigrants to the material resources of the country. Between the reopening of the frontier in early December and January 1, 1951, a total of 18,847 immigrants have arrived in Turkey from Bulgaria.

Pointing out that no machinery had ever been set up to implement the article in the 1925 Turkish-Bulgarian Convention providing for the transfer of property of Bulgarians of Turkish origin and Turks of Bulgarian origin who wished to emigrate, the Foreign Minister declared that the Turkish Government in all its recent communications to Sofia had repeated its desire to reach an agreement on this subject, and had, in addition, informed the Bulgarian Legation in Ankara of its readiness to enter into negotiations. The Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs of Bulgaria has now informed the Turkish Chargé d'Affaires in Sofia that technical preparations for the opening of such negotiations have been undertaken and that a definite reply to this question will shortly be given.

BACKGROUND

The control of the Straits is an old and persistent historical issue. The modern phase of the "Straits question" began in 1774 when, according to the provisions of the Treaty of Kutchuk Kainardji, Russia won passage rights through the Straits for its merchant vessels. From then until 1917 there were innumerable diplomatic interchanges, agreements, and treaties defining and re-defining the rights of foreign merchantmen and warships to pass through that waterway. Although it has been Russia's primary objective to secure full political control of the Straits, in general the Ottoman Empire controlled the region of the Straits from 1453 to its collapse at the end of World War I. From 1923 until 1936 the status of the Straits was defined by the Lausanne Convention which demilitarized those waters and placed them under the supervision of an international Commission.3

The present convention regulating the use of the Turkish Straits (the Dardanelles, the Sea of Marmara and the Bosphorus) was signed at Montreux on July 20, 1936, by Bulgaria, France, Great Britain, Greece, Japan, Rumania, Turkey, Yugoslavia and the USSR, and came into force on November 9 of that year. By that Convention the International "Straits Commission", which had been set up under the terms of the Lausanne Convention (1923), was abolished, and Turkey gained full control of the Straits with the right to fortify that waterway. At the final session of the Montreux Conference, the Soviet Foreign Minister 4 acknowledged the progress which had been made but pointed out that the conference had recognized "although in an insufficient way, the special rights of the riverain states of the Black Sea in the Black Sea in connection with the passage of the Straits, as well as the special geographical situation of the Black Sea in which the general conceptions of the absolute freedom of the seas could not be entirely applied."

In the years following the entry into force of the above Convention, the new regime of the Straits appeared to work well and in the interest of all parties concerned, but it was clear by 1989 and during the course of World War II that the Soviet Government was not satisfied with it. The USSR raised the problem of the Straits with the Germans both in August 1939 and in November 1940, indicating that "real" guarantees, in the form of air and naval bases in the Straits were vital to Soviet security in place of the mere "paper" guarantees of the Montreux Convention.

The question of a revision of the Montreux Straits Convention was discussed at Yalta in 1945 where it was agreed that at their next meeting the Foreign Ministers should consider proposals which the Soviet Government would put forward on this question and would report to their Governments as well as to Turkey.5

Shortly thereafter, on March 19, 1945—less than one month after Turkey's entry into the war—the USSR denounced the Soviet-Turkish Treaty of Friendship and Neutrality of 1925 and subsequently demanded that any substitute agreement must provide special privileges for the USSR in the Straits as well as territorial concessions in Northeastern Turkey (the Kars-Ardahan district)-conditions which Turkey was unwilling to accept.6

It was officially recognized at Potsdam in 1945 that the Montreux Convention required revision, but no agreement could be reached with respect to the principles on which the revision should be based. President Truman proposed a regime of freedom for the Straits, approved and guaranteed by the Three powers within the framework of the United Nations. Although the President was strongly supported by Churchill, Marshal Stalin again demanded bases on the Straits, declaring that they were essential for the security of the USSR and stating that passage rights for Black Sea Powers should be backed by force, just as the right for American and British ships to pass through the Panama and Suez Canals is backed by force. The English text of the agreed protocol of that conference, dated August 1, 1945, states:

"The three governments recognize that the Convention concluded at Montreux should be revised as failing to meet present day conditions. It was agreed that, as the next step, the matter should be the subject of direct conversations between each of the three governments and the Turkish Government."8

However, the Soviet version of the last sentence of that portion of the protocol, as set forth in a note to the Turkish Government on August 7, 1946, reads as follows (underscoring ours):

"The three governments agreed that as the proper course the said question would be the subject of direct negotiations between each of the three powers and the Turkish Government." 10

It is apparent from Soviet actions that the Soviet Government regards the phraseology "direct negotiations" as implying negotiations leading to a bilateral arrangement between the Soviet Union and the Turkish Government rather than merely an exchange of views prior to the calling of an international conference for revision of the Montreux Convention, as indicated by the English phraseology.

On the basis of the Potsdam Protocol the United States, on November 2, 1945, sent a note to the Turkish Government which suggested the following principles as a basis for negotiating a revision of the Straits Convention:

- a) the Straits should be open at all times to merchant vessels of all nations;
- b) the Straits should be open at all times to warships of Black Sea Powers;
- c) the Straits should be closed to warships of non-Black Sea Powers, within limitations to be agreed upon;
- d) other changes to modernize the Convention, such as the substitution of the UN system for that of the League of Nations and the elimination of Japan as a signatory.<sup>11</sup>

Both the British and Turkish Governments indicated their agreement to the above U.S. proposals, Turkey adding that it would participate in an international conference on the Dardanelles and accept any decisions reached there, provided "Turkey's independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity are not infringed." <sup>12</sup>

The substantial exchange of views concerning a new regime for the Straits began on August 7, 1946, when the Soviet Government presented a detailed note to the Turkish Government. The note asserted that the regime established at Montreux "does not meet the interests of the Black Sea Powers and does not ensure conditions under which the use of these Straits for purposes inimical to the Black Sea Powers would be prevented." The note contained a list of alleged wartime incidents "when the Axis Powers directed their warships and auxiliary craft through the Straits into the Black Sea and out of the Black Sea". The note then proposed a "new regime" for the Straits on the basis of five principles, the first three of which were in general agreement with the first three principles of the U.S. note of November 2. In addition, however, it advanced proposals for a regime of the Straits under the competence of Turkey and the other Black Sea Powers exclusively and for a joint Turco-Soviet defense system of the Straits.13 It is of interest to note that these proposals are almost identical to those made by the Soviet Government in the Hitler-Molotov talks of November 1940.

In its reply of August 22 the Turkish Government defended its wartime position in allowing passage of certain small and unarmed Axis vessels. Although expressing willingness to negotiate revision on an international basis of the Montreux Convention, the Turkish Government rejected the two new principles advanced in the Soviet note on the grounds that the first ignored the interests of other powers and that the latter was "not compatible with the inalienable rights of the sovereignty of Turkey." 14

The US and UK Governments on various occasions also expressed disagreement with the suggestion that the Straits regime should be established exclusively by the Black Sea Powers and defended Turkey's contention that that country should remain primarily responsible for defense of the Straits. The US stated that if the region of the Straits became subject to threat or attack, the situation should be dealt with by the United Nations Security Council and asserted that the Potsdam agreement, by its very nature, envisaged the participation of Great Britain and the US along with other Powers in the creation of a new regime for the Straits.

The exchange of views continued until late 1946. On October 9 of that year the British expressed its view that direct discussions contemplated at Potsdam had been completed and suggested that an international conference should take place. On October 26 the USSR stated that the conversations should not be regarded as completed and expressed its view that it was premature to consider the question of calling a conference to establish a new Straits regime. Since that time the question has been more or less dormant.

The US is not a signatory of the Montreux Convention, nor has it been a party to any of the earlier treaties dealing with the Straits. However, our political, military and economic interest in the area has steadily increased since World War II and today we have a vital interest in the regime of the Straits. The US should, therefore, play an active role in any conference which may be called with respect thereto. Recognition of our right to do so is implicit in the Potsdam Protocol.

DISCUSSION

According to the terms of the Montreux Straits Convention, any revision thereof must be negotiated among all High Contracting Parties, either through diplomatic channels or at a conference called for the specific purpose and must, in effect, receive the approval of Turkey, which is, of course, one of the signatories. The Big Four could not, therefore, go farther than to agree to the principles on which, in their view, a revision of the Convention should be based and to cause such views to be notified to the signatories in the manner stipulated in the Convention.

It is not considered desirable for the US to raise the question of a revision of the Montreux Straits Convention at this time, and there is no indication that the British or French will do so. It is possible, however, that the USSR may raise the question, particularly since, under the terms of the Convention, revision will be precluded until 1956 unless a request for revision, supported by the required number of signatories, is notified to all signatory Powers before August 9, 1951.

Any recommendations advanced by the USSR would, without doubt, embody renewed demands for a new Straits regime under the competence of the Black Sea Powers and for joint Turco-Soviet defense of the Straits. The US could not, of course, accept such proposals which would mean acceptance of the thesis that the regime of the Straits is the exclusive concern of Turkey, the USSR and other Black Sea Powers and which would, in effect, mean Soviet domination of Turkey. Such proposals were rejected by the US, UK, and Turkey in 1946 and would be rejected today. Moreover, the French Government gave oral assurances to Turkey in 1946 that it would take no action in connection with this question which would be contrary to Turkey's interests.

If the issue of the Straits is raised by the USSR and the abovementioned demands are not reiterated, the following alternative would be open to the US (unless some more acceptable recommendations should be advanced by one of the other Powers):

1) Oppose any suggestion that discussion of the question be resumed at this time and support a continuation, for the time being, of the present regime on the basis of the 1936 Convention, even though its references to the League, Japan, etc., are outmoded.

Comment: It is clear from the following comparison that the Convention now in force provides a somewhat better safeguard to the interests of the Western Powers and of Turkey than would any new Convention negotiated on the basis of the principles set forth by the US in 1945:17

Principles enunciated by U.S. in 1945

Straits to be open at all times to merchant vessels of all nations.

Straits to be open at all times to warships of Black Sea Powers

Rights prevailing under Montreux Convention

Freedom of passage in peace time unless Turkey under threat of war, in which case freedom of passage by day only and by route specified by Turks. If Turkey a belligerent freedom of passage for countries not at war with Turkey by day only and by route specified by Turks. Restricted passage for warships of both Black Sea and

Straits to be closed to warships of non-Black Sea Powers, within certain limitations non-littoral powers in time of peace and war. In latter case, Turkey being a belligerent, passage at discretion of Turkish Government. If Turkey under threat of war, passage at discretion of Turkish Government, subject to review of League of Nations.

In supporting a continuation of the present regime the US should explain that, although we consider the principles enunciated in 1945 as a sound and suitable basis for discussion if there is any genuine hope for a peaceful settlement with the USSR, it would now be necessary, in view of international tensions, to reconsider them in the light of progress which may be made on other outstanding issues between the USSR and the Western Powers. It is believed that British, French and Turkish support could be obtained.

2) Stand on the basis of the principles enunciated by us in 1945 which were accepted, in essence, by the UK and Turkey.

Comment: President Truman proposed at Potsdam that any new regime of the Straits be placed within the framework of the United Nations. If we at this time reiterate our willingness to negotiate on the basis of the principles which we set forth in 1945, we should insist, as we did in 1946 (Department's note of August 19, 1946 to Soviet Chargé at Washington), that "the regime of the Straits should be brought into appropriate relationship with the United Nations and should function in a manner entirely consistent with the principles and aims of the United Nations." Specifically, any new Convention should deny the right of transit to warships of any nation which may take action contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations charter. UK and French support would doubtless be forthcoming. Although there is no indication that the Turkish Government, which accepted the principles enunciated by the US in 1945, would now object to them, the US should not fail to make clear its recognition of Turkey's paramount interest in the question.

In either of the above cases, the US should inform the Turkish Government, on a Top Secret basis, of its position and keep it currently informed of developments.

RECOMMENDATIONS

That the US not initiate any discussion of the question of a revision of the Straits Convention and that it endeavor to secure British and French agreement not to raise the issue. However, if the Russians should raise the question the US should:

1. Point out that, under the terms of the present Convention, all High Contracting Parties have a voice in any revision thereof and that Turkey has, in effect, a controlling voice since any revision must be approved by that country. Any discussion of the question at a quadripartite meeting must, therefore, be limited to an exchange of views as to the principles on which each of the four countries believes a revision of the Convention should be based.

2. Reject any Soviet proposals relating to a new regime for the Straits under the sole competence of the Black Sea Powers and/or joint Soviet-Turkish defense of that waterway.

3. (a) Favor a continuation of the present regime of the Straits pending some reconciliation of the East-West conflict; or

(b) As a somewhat less desirable alternative, stand on the principles enunciated by the US in 1945 on the understanding that any new convention drafted on that basis would be placed within the framework of the Charter of the United Nations in such a way that passage of the Straits would, in fact, be denied to the warships of any nation which might take action contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter.

4. If there is substantial identity of views on 3(b), recommend that the Turkish Government, in recognition of its paramount interest in the question, be informed thereof.20

Mr. Henry Wiens-ECA Mission Ankara

Mr. George C. McGhee—Assistant Secretary, NEA

Mr. William M. Rountree—Director, GTI

Mr. C. Robert Moore—GTI

Problem: Turkey's need for additional economic assistance, not only to cover increased defense expenditures, but its investment program and other relatively essential needs.

Action Required: FMACC decision on financing the proposed increased defense expenditures and ECA and Department consideration of possible assistance to help meet other costs.

Action Assigned: GTI to work closely with ECA and S/ISA.

Mr. Wiens referred to recent telegrams from the ECA Mission in Ankara regarding a gap of TL 491 million ($175 million) between anticipated expenditures and resources in the public sector for the Turkish fiscal year 1951. Conversations in Ankara between ECA Mission and high Turkish officials with respect to increased efforts which the Turks might make to close this gap, such as decreased expenditures and increased taxes and other resources, have proved fruitless, and it is apparent that the Turks are hoping that ECA will solve the problem by extending additional aid of approximately $100 million. In view of the desirability of reaching some agreement with the Turks with respect to additional Turkish measures of self-help as a condition for additional ECA aid before their budget for the new fiscal year, which is to come into effect on March 1, 1951, is enacted by the National Assembly, Mr. Dorr, with whom Mr. Wiens spoke by telephone this morning, suggested a new, coordinated approach to the Turks. Mr. Dorr's thought was that if we could determine within the next few weeks the amount of additional assistance, military and economic, that we would be prepared to extend Turkey to build up its military potential, we would be in a strong position to negotiate an agreement with the Turks which would call for greatly increased measures of self-help.

I pointed out that, from a practical standpoint, the question of a substantial strengthening of Turkey's military capabilities and the economic support which this would require could not be worked out in time to make possible the negotiation, before the new budget is enacted, of an agreement of the scope Mr. Dorr proposed. In the meantime, we are faced with the problem of helping the Turks meet a proposed increase in the national defense budget of some TL 88 million (approximately $32 million) to provide for an increase in the Turkish armed forces from 260,000 to 300,000 and for other military purposes apparently strongly recommended by the Turkish General Staff and JAMMAT. I felt certain that, if, subsequently, further economic support was required to enable Turkey to achieve the military strength which U.S. policy dictates, funds would be found.

With respect to the present estimated gap of TL 491 million, which takes into consideration the additional defense expenditures of TL 88 million, as well as the investment program from which most of the fat has been extracted, refugee expenditures, etc., Mr. Wiens indicated that Mr. Dorr had himself been thinking in terms of additional aid of perhaps $75 million. Should such an amount be possible, he felt that the Turks should find the means to close the remaining gap. Mr. Porter questioned whether he would support at this time any more than an additional $30 million to finance the proposed increased defense expenditures. As a telegram has just been received from the Ankara Embassy giving requested details on these increased expenditures, it was hoped that the FMACC would be able to act quickly on the question of additional U.S. aid to meet them. There would still remain the problem of the additional aid requested by the Turks (approximately $70 million) to cover the remaining gap.

In sum, it was agreed that we should seek to obtain an early FMACC decision on the question of the TL 88 million and, if favorable, should negotiate with Turkey the most satisfactory agreement possible under the circumstances in return for such assistance. I felt that the Department would agree with ECA on the desirability of maximizing Turkey's own contribution in meeting its increased internal expenditures but that we must not lose sight of the fact that our objective will probably be to build up Turkey's military capabilities, and that in the final analysis we will probably be willing to pay the cost of such a build-up, if that is the only way to get it.

Subject: Turkish Proposal that the U.S. Adhere to the British-French-Turkish Treaty of Mutual Assistance of 1939.2

Turkish Ambassador proposes that US extend security commitment to Turkey through adherence to British-French-Turkish Treaty of Mutual Assistance of 1939.

Action Required: To consider the feasibility of this proposal Action Assigned: GTI

Ambassador Erkin stated that he had asked for this appointment in order to present to the Department a new proposal for extending a U.S. security commitment to Turkey. He briefly touched on the background of his proposal as follows:

1. In late 1948 and early 1949 he had made known to the Department the Turkish Government's desire to be included in the North Atlantic Pact which was then being formulated. However, Turkey was not included among the original participants in this Pact.<sup>3</sup>

2. Upon his return from Turkey in the summer of 1949 the Ambassador reached the conclusion that a broader regional grouping of Mediterranean countries such as Turkey, Greece, Spain and Italy with, of course, U.S. participation, was more logical than an extension of NATO, and he so informed his Government. However, he found that in Turkey the emphasis was on NATO and that the Foreign Minister preferred to concentrate on Turkey's inclusion in NATO, an organization already in existence, than to press for the creation of a new regional grouping in which Turkey would be included. This culminated in Turkey's formal request for inclusion in NATO in August

1950, which was subsequently turned down.4

3. The Ambassador, recovering from his great disappointment at this development, thereupon began to give thought again to a security arrangement in a form which would be acceptable to the U.S. and in November 1950 proposed to his Government in Ankara a Mediterranean formula on a new basis which he felt eliminated many of the difficulties of the earlier NATO proposal. He had just received the agreement of his Government to make this proposal to us and understood also that President Bayar had raised the question during the visit to Ankara of Admiral Carney several weeks ago <sup>5</sup> and that Foreign Minister Koprulu had likewise discussed it with Ambassador Wadsworth. While the President and Foreign Minister understood the Ambassador's basic idea, he was afraid they had not grasped the nuances.

The Ambassador then advanced his proposal—that the United States adhere to the British-French-Turkish Treaty of Mutual Assistance of 1939. He felt that this type of U.S. security commitment to Turkey had a number of advantages:

1. It would eliminate the protracted discussions which would be involved in extending full membership in NATO to Turkey or in setting up any new regional organization.

2. The arrangement would not be regional in the broad sense; therefore, no other country would feel entitled to ask for inclusion.

3. The scope and purpose of the arrangement would be limited; no new commitment would be involved except as regards the security of Turkey (and Greece).

4. While Greece would not be a party to the Treaty, Article 3 thereof would in effect guarantee the security of Greece. This Article provides that so long as guarantees given by France and the United Kingdom to Greece on April 13, 1939 remain in force, Turkey will lend them all aid and assistance in its power in the event they are engaged in hostilities in virtue of the said guarantees.

5. The framework would be created for a reciprocal agreement between Greece and Turkey.

The Ambassador recognized that the Treaty would have to be modified slightly—for example, protocol No. 2, which contains the reservation that Turkey is not called upon to take action which would involve armed conflict with the Soviet Union. This obviously had no meaning today. U.S. adherence to the Treaty could be accomplished by a protocol.

The Ambassador urged that earnest consideration be given to this proposal as soon as possible and he expressed the hope that I would be able to inform him, before my departure for Turkey in early February, that, in principle, it was acceptable to us. He emphasized that recent developments necessitated extraordinary measures and that the Turkish proposal was not a selfish one but one which would contribute to European security.

I informed Ambassador Erkin that, as I was sure he knew, Turkey's desire to be included in a security arrangement was very much in our minds. While his new proposal was a very interesting one I was afraid that many of the considerations which made it difficult for the North Atlantic Pact to be extended to Turkey would apply likewise to it. I felt that the United States had never shown a lack of interest in helping the Turks to develop their military strength and that a security commitment was, in effect, not of very practical importance. I informed him, however, that we would certainly give all appropriate consideration to his proposal. I questioned whether Greece would be well pleased with the Ambassador's formula but he expressed confidence that it would be satisfied. This led to some discussion as to the present status of the UK and French guarantees to Greece. With respect to the UK guarantee the Ambassador felt quite certain that it was still in effect.

As the Ambassador was leaving I asked him if, since our conversation of several weeks ago, he had changed his views as to the possibility of Turkey's entering into regional agreements in the absence of a U.S. commitment. The Ambassador very emphatically indicated that there was no change in his views and that he would strongly oppose Turkey's participation in such agreements.

Somewhat later in the day Ambassador Erkin telephoned Mr. Moore and asked him to tell me, with respect to my question on regional agreements, that he wanted to amplify his statement somewhat. It was his strong belief that, if Turkey and the United States were linked together in a security arrangement of the kind proposed by him, it would be easier and more feasible for Turkey, through its increased prestige, to align the other countries in that area in support of our common objectives. Turkey, strengthened by this concrete evidence of U.S. support, would constitute a center of attraction to the other neighboring countries.

Mr. Esenbel, at the request of the Ambassador, subsequently telephoned Mr. Moore regarding the UK guarantee to Greece. The Ambassador's view was that such a guarantee was in effect until repudiated and that there was no evidence that it had been repudiated. Mr. Esenbel himself had questioned one of his Greek colleagues on

The Deputy Under Secretary of State (Matthews) to the Assistant to the Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs (Burns)<sup>1</sup>

[Washington,] January 31, 1951.

My Dear General Burns: The Turkish Government has under consideration a proposed plan for controlled mining of the Turkish Straits as part of a Bosphorus Sea defense project. It is probable that as a prerequisite to Turkish approval of the plan, the United States Government may have to indicate its strong support and, in addition, urge the British Government to indicate to the Turkish Government its concurrence in principle thereto.

It is understood that the mining project is strongly endorsed by the Joint American Military Mission for Aid to Turkey, particularly by the Naval Group, and that it is of considerable interest to the United States Department of the Navy. While the competent Turkish military authorities agree on the desirability, from the military point of view, of this project, the Turkish Foreign Office is concerned over the very important political considerations which are involved. These considerations relate principally to Turkey's obligations under the Convention regarding the Regime of the Straits, signed at Montreux in 1936, to which the United States is not a party, and to the general question of Soviet reaction in the event the Straits are mined. The following background relates to these considerations:

In April 1950 the Turkish Government informally requested the views of the Department as to whether the proposed mining of the Straits would be in violation of the Montreux Convention.<sup>2</sup> On the basis of information given to it regarding the project, the Department concluded that it would not constitute an infraction of the Convention. According to this information, the project involved mines laid at a depth of 20 to 30 fathoms near the Black Sea entrance to the Straits and controlled from a harbor entrance post. They would allegedly constitute no deterrent or danger to navigation, since when not energized the field could be crossed at any point without pilotage and since moored mines which broke loose would be sterile.

The British Government, which was a signatory to the Convention and which is also bound to Turkey through the British-French-Turkish Treaty of Mutual Assistance of 1939, was likewise requested by the Turkish Government to indicate its views. On a strictly juridical basis, these views, expressed in an aide-mémoire dated June 19, 1950, corresponded to those of the Department, but the British discouraged implementation of the project on the ground that (1) it might involve the Turks in political and legal controversies since mere knowledge of the existence of the mines might be considered a deterrent to complete freedom of transit, and (2) mining of the Straits in advance of any imminent danger of war would appear impracticable because of constant maintenance requirements of underwater installations.

The Turkish Foreign Minister, on January 11, 1951, told our Ambassador that the Government's primary political interest in the matter was that such action as it might take be irrefutably correct and consistent with its obligations under the Montreaux Convention. He added that the British aide-mémoire was definitely, perhaps intentionally, equivocal and that this aspect should be forthrightly cleared up by the British. He indicated, however, that he would submit the matter to the Cabinet at its next meeting. At the same time he stated that if the project were implemented, the Soviets might be expected to charge a violation of the Convention with a view to reopening the question of its revision, so that there was strong reason for Turkey to be sure that it was clearly in the right. The Embassy advanced its own view that if the project were pushed by the United States the Turkish Government might well exploit any resulting Soviet hostility to urge the need for a United States security commitment.<sup>3</sup>

The American Embassy at Moscow in a telegram of December 22, 1950, expressed the view that the mining would be capitalized on to intensify the current war of nerves against Turkey and doubted that technical justification under the Montreux Convention on the basis of the harmlessness of the mines would be sufficient to counteract the public effect of Soviet protests against their presence. It strongly opposed implementation of the project unless it is considered a vital defense measure for which there is no feasible alternative.

It is the Department's understanding that while the mines would be relatively ineffective with respect to surface targets and would not, therefore, supplant other types of mines which would have to be laid in the event of hostilities, they would aid in the detection of submerged submarines which may endeavor to transit the Straits surreptitiously. However, since other detection systems are or will be installed in the Bosphorus area, the question arises whether the installation of the mines as an additional detection device or for the other purposes which they might serve will contribute sufficiently to United States security to justify the United States urging the Turkish Government to approve the project, despite the possible consequences.

Although the Turkish Government has not expressed an expectation of receiving a security commitment from the United States before proceeding with implementation of this project, pressure on our part might result in their asking for such a commitment. The minimum request which the Turkish Government is expected to make is that the United States Government actively support the Turkish Government in this project and also that the British give similar support (which the United States may have to take the initiative to obtain).

The Department would therefore appreciate receiving your views as to the importance of this project from the military standpoint, including an indication of the essentiality of the project to United States security.<sup>5</sup>

Sincerely yours,

H. FREEMAN MATTHEWS

Subject: U.S. Support of Proposed Increase in Budget of Turkish Ministry of National Defense.

A recent telegram received from Ambassador Wadsworth with respect to the Turkish state budget for the fiscal year beginning March 1, 1951 indicates that the Turkish Government is seeking an appropriation of TL 470 million for the Ministry of National Defense, as contrasted to TL 558 million which has been recommended by the Turkish General Staff and the U.S. Joint Military Mission. It is prepared to include this additional TL 88 million (approximately $31,500,000) in the budget only if the funds are provided by the U.S. The Ambassador has stated that he believes that the U.S. should meet this figure in toto "effectively to prepare Turkey to resist possible aggression within the year".<sup>2</sup>

The TL 88 million will make possible an increase in the Turkish Armed Forces from 260,000 men and 24,000 officers to 300,000 men and 24,000 officers, which is considered the minimum force for 1951. It will also provide slightly improved support for this force.

Turkey is faced with a serious budgetary problem for the coming fiscal year. At present, the uncovered deficit is estimated at TL 491 million, assuming that the national defense budget is increased by TL 88 million, and the Turks are looking to the U.S. not only to meet this latter amount; as indicated above, but to help meet a much larger portion of this deficit. Heavy defense expenditures, a hard core investment program, and extraordinary expenditures arising from the resettlement of the Turkish refugees from Bulgaria have been contributing factors in this deficit.

For over 10 years Turkey has been devoting between 30 and 50% of its budget expenditures to national defense, carrying a heavier burden than perhaps any other country to which we have been extending aid. It has proved itself to be one of our staunchest allies, on the battlefield as well as in the UN. If, by an expenditure of some $30 million, we can help Turkey build up still further its military strength, I strongly recommend that every effort be made to find the means to provide this additional assistance, as it seems clear that the Turkish Government, despite its realization that the national defense budget should be increased, considers that it is not in a position to authorize such an increase unless the U.S. is prepared to finance it. I am of the opinion that $30 million spent for this purpose in Turkey will buy more security for the U.S. than $30 million spent either in this country or elsewhere.

I therefore urge the FMACC to take early and favorable action on this problem. If this assistance is to be extended, it is desirable that the Turkish Government be informed as soon as possible so that the necessary adjustments can be made in its budget bill which must be acted on by the Turkish National Assembly before March 1, 1951, and so that the proposed increase in the Turkish Armed Forces can be carried out with a minimum of delay.

Memorandum by Henry S. Villard to the Director of the Policy Planning Staff (Nitze)<sup>1</sup>

[Washington,] February 5, 1951.

Subject: Security Commitment to Turkey

- 1. Consideration of the role Turkey might play in the event of war, and the ways and means by which we might strengthen the defense of the Mediterranean sector, raises the question of a U.S. security commitment to Turkey. For the last three years the Turks have indicated their desire for assurances in one form or another that the U.S. would come to their aid in the event of attack. At the present time the Turkish Ambassador is pressing the Department to give such assurances by accepting a proposal that the U.S. adhere to the British-French-Turkish Mutual Assistance Treaty of 1939.
- 2. The 1939 Treaty involves a commitment by France and Great Britain to go to the aid of Turkey in the event that country is subjected to aggression. Article 3 of the Treaty provides an indirect guarantee by all three powers to Greece if the latter were attacked. The Greeks, however, apparently do not consider this portion of the Treaty to be still valid and if the U.S. adhered to the British-French-Turkish Treaty they would be certain to insist upon a similar fresh guarantee from the U.S.<sup>2</sup>
- 3. Since we have found that the "Security of Turkey is vital to the security of the U.S." it would seem logical to give effect to this decision by some sort of formal commitment. Furthermore, we have staked so much on our program of military aid for Turkey and our prestige has been so much involved in the process that it would be unthinkable if we should fail to act in case of Soviet aggression against Turkey. If we should fail to help, not only would Turkish morale be shattered but the Turks would feel that they had been falsely encouraged by the U.S. to set up a front-line defense against the Soviet Union, without any intention on our part to afford them support in a final showdown. Deep-seated and lasting resentment against the U.S. would be the result.
- 4. Actually, to obtain the maximum cooperation from the Turks in bolstering the defense of the Mediterranean today, it seems essential to offer Turkey some form of written guarantee. A security commitment from the U.S. would act as an immediate spur to the Turks in further developing their defenses and raising their morale. A written undertaking of U.S. support would be an essential prerequisite if we wished to encourage Turkey to enter into mutual, or regional defense arrangements with Greece, Yugoslavia or any other country in the Mediterranean area. Such a commitment would confirm Turkey's faith in the United States and would assure the U.S. of a strong fighting ally on the vital Eastern Mediterranean flank.

- 5. The JCS attitude, of course, is adverse to any agreement that might even faintly imply the commitment of U.S. forces to the area in the event of hostilities. However, the Turks would be satisfied with a limited guarantee of U.S. or allied air and perhaps naval support. This would seem to be the minimum action we could take in any case and it stands to reason that we would have at least some such forces available in the Mediterranean at the time hostilities broke out.
- 6. From the negative side, Turkey fears that U.S. unwillingness to make any written security commitment indicates that we do not consider Turkey to be in a primary defense area. This naturally has its effect on Turkish morale as well as on its attitude toward our own planning. For example, the Navy desires to mine the Straits and the Air Force desires far-reaching Turkish commitments on airfields, which the Turks have been slow to agree to in the absence of assurance of any U.S. assistance in the event of attack.
- 7. Turkey would be fully satisfied if it were permitted to join the NATO. It accepted associated membership in that organization in the hope that this would be a half-way stop to full partnership. While the difficulties of including Turkey in NATO are obvious, the time may be approaching when we should take another look at the possibilities. If Turkey were admitted, it would, of course, be necessary also to include Greece. In fact, any commitment made to Turkey would have to apply to Greece as well. In the case of Iran, present indications are that it would not expect to join a European organization like NATO and would be willing to accept treatment in a separate category.
- 8. Turkey would consider it acceptable to be a member of a regional Mediterranean defense pact on the lines of the North Atlantic Treaty. Such a regional pact might include any or all of the countries bordering on the Mediterranean from Gibralter to Suez. It would have to include the U.S. as a member or at least have U.S. backing, and could be linked with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization through the common membership of some country like Italy.
- 9. There would seem to be four possibilities for a security commitment to Turkey:
  - (a) U.S. adherence to the British-French-Turkish Treaty of 1949;

(b) admitting Turkey (and Greece) to membership in NATO;

(c) developing a Mediterranean security pact, with U.S. backing, to include Turkey, and

(d) a direct mutual defense aid agreement between Turkey and the U.S. (negotiating a similar agreement simultaneously with Greece).

It is recommended that the Staff discuss the subject with a view to exploring the possibilities in appropriate quarters.<sup>3</sup>

National Intelligence Estimate 1

SECRET NIE-9 [Washington,] 26 February 1951.

Turkey's Position in the East-West Struggle

THE PROBLEM

To estimate the will and ability of Turkey to maintain its alignment with the West, and the courses of action Turkey might follow in the event of war.

CONCLUSIONS

1. Turkey is determined to resist Soviet expansion. It is solidly aligned with the West because this alignment offers Turkey its only

<sup>1</sup>The cover sheet attached to the source text indicated that the intelligence organizations of the Departments of State, the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, and the Joint Staff participated in the preparation of this estimate; that all members of the Intelligence Advisory Committee (IAC) had concurred with its conclusions; and that this paper was based on information available on February 23.

The National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) was one of a series of high-level interdepartmental reports first published in the fall of 1950 by the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA). Each Estimate was intended to be the most authoritative interpretation and appraisal of a situation available to policy makers and to present the coordinated expression of the best intelligence opinion from among several departments and agencies. The priorities and frames of reference for a proposed Estimate were set by the IAC. This Committee was composed of the Director of Central Intelligence, who served as Chairman; the Special Assistant for Intelligence to the Secretary of State; and the Chiefs of Intelligence of the Army, Navy, Air Force, Joint Chiefs of Staff, Atomic Energy Commission, and Federal Bureau of Investigation. The organizations represented on the IAC drafted sections of an Estimate in accordance with their respective fields of responsibility; the Department of State provided all political and some economic sections. An integrated draft paper was discussed and revised by interdepartmental working groups under the coordination of the CIA's Office of National Estimates, then submitted to the IAC for final revision and approval. Provision was made for the notation of dissent where unanimity did not exist. Immediately upon approval, a National Intelligence Estimate was published by the CIA and forwarded to the President, the appropriate officers of Cabinet level, and the National Security Council.

hope of effectively resisting Soviet pressures. At present one of the main objectives of Turkish foreign policy is to secure a clear-cut US commitment to come to Turkey's defense in the event of an attack.

2. New Soviet or Soviet-Satellite successes in expanding the Communist sphere of control outside the Near East (even in Yugoslavia) would not significantly affect Turkey's pro-US alignment as long as the US demonstrated that its fundamental aim was to continue the struggle against the USSR. A shift in US policy to one of hemispheric defense would oblige Turkey to abandon its pro-US alignment and fall back on a policy of neutrality.

3. We believe that Turkey is capable of halting at the Straits an invasion by Bulgarian forces. Against a Soviet attack, the Turks could probably maintain organized resistance for two or three months and—with substantial Western assistance—could hold for some time a redoubt area in southern Turkey against Soviet forces.

4. Short of general war, Turkey will continue to support concerted Western action under UN auspices in opposition to Soviet or Satellite aggression elsewhere. The commitment of Turkish troops or the provision of Turkish bases would, however, be contingent upon a firm assurance of US armed support in event of Soviet attack.

5. If the USSR were, without precipitating a general war, to secure control of Iran, Iraq, and Syria on one flank of Turkey and/or of Greece on the other, Turkey would probably react as follows:

a. Even if Turkey were partially cut off from the West by Soviet conquest or absorption of Iran, Iraq, and Syria, it would probably not alter its pro-US alignment, although in this event the Turks would probably be obliged to adopt a more cautious policy toward the USSR:

b. If the USSR or its Satellites were to attack Greece and if the US failed to oppose militarily Satellite occupation of Greece or refused to consider an attack on Greece by Soviet forces sufficient justification for military action against the USSR, Turkey's attitude would then depend on broader considerations. If the US left no doubt of its determination to support and supply Turkey to the utmost of its ability, Turkey would probably still maintain its pro-US alignment. If, on the other hand, Turkey were unable to obtain assurances of such support, Turkey would probably attempt to adopt a policy of neutrality;

c. In the event that Turkey's land communications with the West were completely cut off by Soviet control of Greece in the west, and of Iran, Iraq, and Syria in the east and south, the Turks, lacking firm assurances of US armed support in the event of Soviet attack on Turkey, would probably shift to a policy of neutrality and might eventually make substantial concessions to Soviet demands. If, on the other hand, Turkey were able to obtain firm assurances of US armed support in the event of a Soviet or Satellite attack on Turkey, it would probably still maintain its pro-US alignment.

6. We estimate that under any circumstances Turkey will resist aggression against itself.

7. In the event of general war, Turkey, if not itself attacked, probably would initially maintain its status of non-belligerency but would do everything compatible with that status to facilitate a Western victory.

DISCUSSION

The Solidity of Turkey's Pro-Western Alignment.

- 1. The Turks are determined to resist Soviet expansion and to preserve their independence. They consider that alignment with the US and its allies offers Turkey its only hope of effectively resisting Soviet pressures, which since the end of World War II have been unremitting. In 1946 the USSR demanded a share in control of the Straits and the right to station Soviet troops there. It has unofficially claimed the Kars plateau area in northeastern Turkey. Moreover, the USSR has permitted its propagandists to denounce the Turkish regime, vilify Turkish leaders, attack Turkey's close association with the US, and attempt to incite revolt against the Turkish Government.
- 2. The Turks have stood firm against Soviet and Satellite pressure. They have avoided hasty or provocative actions against the USSR, and have indicated a willingness to discuss points at issue with the USSR. At the same time, however, they have made it clear that they are strongly averse to a policy of appeasement and are determined to resist any Soviet attempts to encroach on Turkey's independence or territorial integrity. Moreover, they have sought to ally themselves with the power or combination of powers most capable of resisting the USSR.
- 3. One of the main objectives of Turkey's foreign policy is to obtain a US commitment to come to Turkev's defense in event of a Soviet or Soviet-Satellite attack. Pronouncements of US interest in Turkey's security and the extension of US military and economic assistance have given the Turks a large measure of assurance, but they are still deeply concerned by the lack of a formal guarantee of prompt and effective aid in the event of war. The Turks would almost certainly provide base facilities to the US in return for a definite US commitment to come to Turkey's defense. Having failed to obtain a firm US commitment to date, the Turks have sought to obtain indirect US guarantees by seeking membership in NATO or by advocating an Eastern Mediterranean security pact with direct US participation. To the Turks, limited association with the NATO for Mediterranean defense planning represents only a slight improvement over their previous situation. They consider that the formation of a Mediterranean bloc without US participation or the conclusion of mutual assistance agreements with their neighbors without a US guarantee might actually be disadvantageous and they have, therefore, firmly opposed them. While they have reaffirmed their adherence to the 1939 Tripartite Treaty of mutual assistance with France and the UK, they clearly value it less as a direct guarantee of British and French assistance than as potentially an indirect way of getting US assistance. Turkey's participation in the UN is animated to some extent by the same motives. Turkey is more willing than most members to make the UN effective but has little confidence in its present effectiveness to check Soviet aggression.

Possibilities of a Shift in Turkey's Alignment

- 4. The Turks expect that the West may suffer further diplomatic or military reverses but believe that the US and its allies will be able ultimately to contain Soviet imperialism or defeat the USSR in event of war. A reduction in the US power position as a result of further reverses in the cold war would not alter Turkey's basic alignment as long as the US offered firm assurance of US armed support in the event of Soviet attack on Turkey.
- 5. Even if Turkey were partially cut off from the West by Soviet-conquest or absorption of Iran, Iraq, and Syria, it would probably not alter its alignment with the West. In this event, however, Turkey would be obliged to adopt a more cautious policy toward the USSR. A number of individuals not unacceptable to the USSR might be brought into the government, and internal security measures would be tightened. It is unlikely, however, that Turkey would agree to territorial concessions, request the US military mission to leave Turkey, or otherwise appease the USSR.
- 6. If the USSR or its Satellites were to attack Greece and if the US failed to oppose militarily Satellite occupation of Greece or refused to consider a Soviet attack on Greece as sufficient justification for military action against the USSR, Turkey's attitude would depend on broader strategic considerations. These considerations would include: (a) the degree of military preparedness in Western Europe; (b) Western military strength in North Africa and the Eastern Mediterranean; (c) the attitude of the US toward Turkey and US strategic plans concerning Turkey; and (d) the attitude of the Western Powers in general and of the US in particular toward Soviet aggression. We believe, however, that Turkey would probably still maintain its pro-US alignment, provided the US left no doubt of its determination to support and supply Turkey to the utmost of its ability. If, on the other hand, Turkey were unable to obtain assurances of such support, it would probably attempt to adopt a policy of neutrality.
- 7. In the event that Turkey were outflanked completely by Soviet control both of Greece in the west, and of Iran, Iraq, and Syria in the east and south, the Turks, lacking firm assurances of US armed support in the event of Soviet attack on Turkey would probably shift to a policy of neutrality and might eventually make substantial concessions to Soviet demands. If, on the other hand, Turkey were able to obtain firm assurances of US armed support in event of a Soviet or Satellite attack upon Turkey, it would probably still maintain its pro-US alignment.

8. The adoption by the US of a policy of hemispheric isolation would cause Turkey automatically to abandon its pro-US alignment. However, even if Turkey were isolated from the West in this way, the Turks would continue to resist Soviet pressure and would attempt to maintain a policy of neutrality. In time, a body of opinion favoring appearsement and accommodation with the USSR would probably grow up and might eventually dominate Turkish policy, but at present it appears more likely that the Turks would—if necessary—fight for their independence, no matter how suicidal such a course might be.

The Strengths and Weaknesses of Turkey's Position.

- 9. Turkey is one of the strongest anti-Communist countries on the periphery of the USSR and the only one in the Near East capable of offering substantial resistance to Soviet aggression.
- a. Turkey's strength derives to a considerable extent from the national unity and homogeneity of its population. In spite of Turkey's low standard of living and occasional bitter controversy over internal issues, the great majority of the Turkish people are united in their opposition to the USSR and fully support the government's policy of aligning Turkey with the Western Powers. The basic and long-standing antagonism of the Turks toward the Russians remains strong. Elements of the Kurdish, Greek, and Armenian minorities and even some Turks might be susceptible to Communist subversion if internal security broke down, but such a development is likely to occur only as a result of a Soviet invasion. Turkey's political institutions and relatively free press constitute sufficient outlets for what little disaffection exists, and subversion is effectively controlled by the Turkish security services. At the same time the extension of democratic procedures is building a stronger base for Turkish national power.
- b. Another major source of Turkish strength is its army. With US aid the Turkish Army has recently developed into a compact, modern force of about 280,000 men. It has a theoretical mobilization potential of 1,500,000 men, although it could not equip or provide logistic support for this number. Although the full-scale reorganization of Turkey's defense establishment envisaged in the US military aid program is not yet completed, the combat effectiveness of the armed forces has already increased considerably despite the temporary dislocations inherent in converting from old to new methods, weapons, and equipment.

- 10. Turkey's position is weak in the following respects:
- a. Despite major improvements made possible by the US military and economic aid programs, the Turkish armed forces have inadequate supply services, are critically short of technically qualified NCO's, and still lack an effective air force.

- b. Turkey's economy is unable to support a heavy defense burden. Because the economy is largely agricultural, Turkey is heavily dependent on outside supplies both for consumer goods and military matériel. The necessity of maintaining large defense forces is a strain on Turkey's resources. Because of the lack of industrial development, the number of trained mechanics is limited.
- c. Turkey is particularly exposed to Soviet pressure because of its geographical position. It is located on the Soviet periphery, far from Western centers of strength, and flanked on the east and south by weak and unstable countries that are themselves highly vulnerable to Soviet aggression. Large Soviet and/or Satellite forces could be hurled against Turkey with little or no warning. Because the avenues of Soviet/Satellite land attack from the Balkans and the Caucasus are widely separated, Turkey would, in the event of war, be obliged to divide its limited forces and fight on two fronts without good interconnecting transportation facilities.
- 11. Despite the shortcomings of its armed forces, its economic weaknesses, and its geographical vulnerability, Turkey is capable of putting up considerable resistance to Satellite or Soviet aggression. We believe it is capable of halting at the Straits and possibly even at the prepared defenses in eastern Thrace an invasion by Bulgarian forces. Against a Soviet attack, Turkey is believed capable of delaying Soviet advances into the interior of the country by stubborn defensive fighting. The Turkish armed forces could probably maintain some form of organized resistance for two or three months. A redoubt area in southern Turkey could be held for some time if the Turks received substantial assistance from the Western Powers. In any event, with outside support the Turks could probably maintain guerrilla warfare against Soviet lines of communication in Turkey. Strategic Importance of Turkey.
- 12. The alignment of Turkey with the West is of primary strategic importance to the US because of Turkey's political and military strength and its geographical position. Turkey adjoins Soviet and Soviet Satellite territories and lies across one line of Soviet penetration into the weak and unstable countries of the Middle East. The Turkish Army would be a major obstacle to Soviet advances in the Middle East through Turkey. Furthermore, Turkey's pro-US alignment, in conjunction with its military strength, deters the USSR from attacking Turkey, because implicit in that alignment is the possibility that an assault on Turkey might lead the US to attack the USSR.
- 13. In the event of general war, Turkey might become a forward air base for US air forces, although construction of air facilities and their protection from Soviet air and ground attacks would be necessary before the US could use Turkey effectively as a base for air operations against the USSR and its Satellites. At present, Turkey is extremely vulnerable to air attack, and its air facilities are incapable of supporting medium bomber operations or sustaining fighter or light bomber operations. However, the US is currently engaged in reconstructing old and building new Turkish air facilities, a program which should result in considerable improvement within one year.

14. As long as Turkey controls the Straits, Turkey might be able to prevent the passage of Soviet submarines and surface ships from the Black Sea through the Straits to the Mediterranean.

15. In the unlikely event that Turkey should abandon its pro-US alignment, the effect on US interests in the Near East would be extremely serious. There is little doubt that pro-Western elements in most of the adjacent countries, who now hold a precarious balance of influence, would be seriously demoralized and their influence weakened if Turkey abandoned its present alignment.

Probable Turkish Courses of Action in the Event of War.

16. We believe Turkey will stubbornly resist any aggression upon its territory whether or not outside assistance is forthcoming. In case of attack, Turkey will almost certainly appeal to the US for military assistance, to the UK and France for aid under the Tripartite Treaty of 1939, and to the UN for such support as it can give.

17. In the event of a Satellite or Soviet attack against Yugoslavia, Iran, or even Greece, Turkey would not on its own intervene militarily. It would increase its frontier security and make every effort to avoid provoking a Soviet attack. If the UN or the US requested the use of Turkish bases from which to institute countermeasures, Turkey would probably comply if it received a definite US commitment of aid in the event of an attack on Turkey. In the event of further Soviet or Satellite attacks in other parts of Europe and Asia, Turkey would support UN collective security measures, short of commitment of Turkish troops, but would oppose large-scale expenditure of Western resources in "police" measures against the Soviet Satellites which would reduce Western potentialities against the USSR itself.

18. If the Korean conflict should lead to full-scale war between the US and Communist China, the Turkish reaction would be ambivalent. On the one hand, Turkey would be impelled to support action against the Chinese Communists by its conviction that all nations threatened by Soviet imperialism must stand together and by its desire to demonstrate fully to the US its reliability as an ally. On the other hand, the Turks would become increasingly concerned with their own situation vis-à-vis the USSR and would view unfavorably any greater commitment of US military strength in the Far East, unless such commitment were matched or even exceeded by expansion of US strength in the Eastern Mediterranean and accompanied by US guarantees to Turkey. The line of action actually adopted by Turkey would be determined largely by the Turkish Government's estimate of its security position at the moment. Turkey would, however, give diplomatic support to the US and might continue to provide the services of the Turkish Brigade.

19. In the event of a general war in which Turkey itself was not attacked, the Turks probably would initially adopt a non-belligerent status. Nevertheless, Turkish political leaders, both government and opposition, have frequently expressed the view that Turkish neutrality in the East-West struggle in war or peace is neither advisable nor possible. Consequently, even though Turkey were not attacked, the Turks would cooperate with the West and do everything compatible with a non-belligerent status to facilitate a Western victory.

Subject: British-French-Turkish Mutual Assistance Treaty of 1939

- 1. The Treaty of Mutual Assistance between Great Britain, France and Turkey, signed October 19, 1939 and re-affirmed by the British and French in 1949, is primarily a guarantee on the part of Britain and France to lend Turkey "all aid and assistance in their power" in case of aggression against the latter by a European power. In the event of aggression by a European power leading to a Mediterranean war involving any of the three countries, Britain, France and Turkey will "collaborate effectively" and will lend "all aid and assistance in their power". In a sense, therefore, this assistance would be "mutual". But in point of fact it may be seriously doubted that either France or Britain would provide more than token military support if Turkey were attacked, or that Turkey would do anything to help Britain or France, unless the commitment were part of a larger arrangement such as NATO.
- 2. A "European power" could be interpreted to include Soviet Russia, but a protocol attached to the treaty stipulates that the obligations undertaken by Turkey cannot compel Turkey to take action "having as its effect, or involving as its consequence, entry into armed conflict with the Soviet Union." This would appear to give the Turks a wide-open escape door. However, they have indicated that they would be willing to revise the treaty so as to eliminate this protocol if the U.S. adhered to the treaty.
- 3. Article 3 of the treaty provides that Turkey will give France and Britain "all aid and assistance in her power" should France and Britain, in fulfillment of their declarations of April 13, 1939 with respect to Rumania and Greece, be called upon to defend those countries against attack. The declarations by the British and French Governments were designed to offset the German occupation of Prague and the Italian occupation of Albania, and promised support if the independence of Greece or Rumania were threatened to such an extent that the Greek or Rumanian Governments considered it vital to resist with national forces. This guarantee to Greece cannot be considered valid today. The Greeks have been realistic enough not to place any reliance on the provisions of Article 3 and the British have just told us that they regard this portion of the treaty of 1939 as having lapsed. There seems no likelihood therefore that the Turks would ever be called upon to give effect to this part of the treaty.

4. The other provisions of the treaty refer to "consultations" and "such common action as might be considered effective" in certain circumstances and do not specify direct assistance. On the whole the Treaty of 1939 would appear to be a rather weak reed to lean upon, if not largely obsolete, for defense of the Eastern Mediterranean. Rather than adhere to this treaty the United States would probably find it preferable to enter into some other form of commitment to Turkey (and to Greece), once it were decided to provide the guarantee which the Turks are seeking.

The Assistant to the Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs (Burns) to the Deputy Under Secretary of State (Matthews)

Washington, March 2, 1951.

DEAR MR. MATTHEWS: Reference is made to your letter of 31 January 1951 on the Turkish Government's proposed plan for controlled mining of the Turkish Straits. The Department of State requested specifically the Department of Defense views as to the importance of this project from the military standpoint, including the essentiality of the project to United States security.

Positive control of the Turkish Straits is considered the key to the Mediterranean anti-submarine warfare problem and, from a strictly strategic standpoint, controlled mining of the Turkish Straits by Turkey, prior to D-Day, could insure the closure of the Black Sea during the initial stages of a war, and should be accomplished. It therefore follows that in event of war the denial to the USSR of an exit from the Black Sea via the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles is in the United States security interest.

The procurement of mines for this operation was authorized in February 1951 from MDAP funds. The details are being handled by the U.S. Navy. Since the procurement lead time for the type of mine required is approximately 18 months, resolution of the problem of obtaining agreement for installation of the mine field is unnecessary for the present.

With respect to the technical question on the subject of detection, the primary and essential purpose of the integrated detection system which is a part of the mine field is to insure that the operator makes a kill when he fires a mine. A separate detection installation in the approaches for warning is a necessary adjunct to the overall complex. Obviously, a warning system alone does not present the deterrent to clandestine exit that the mine field will provide.

Although it is recognized that there are a number of factors which would militate against a decision to implement the mine project under present conditions, the pertinency of certain of these should have disappeared by the time the mines become available. In the first place, if the mines were laid now it is evident that the impending meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers 2 would provide an excellent forum for the Soviets for heightened propaganda of "aggressive intent" with which threats of physical interference would probably be linked. Further, the Montreux Convention, by its terms, is subject to revision every five years and since 1951 is a revision year, the Soviets would have an excellent excuse to demand revision. In that connection the U.S. proposal of 1945 for modification of the Convention to provide that the Straits would be open at all times to warships of the Black Sea powers only, is highly undesirable now.

In view of the foregoing, it is considered that an acceptable current policy would be:

a. Exert no further pressure at this time on Turkey to persuade her to agree to implementation of the Bosphorus mining project.

b. Stockpile the mines and component equipment as they become available at an appropriate location in the Mediterranean area.

ing this conference, see vol. III, pt. 1, pp. 1086 ff.

c. When the necessary number of mines and the equipment are available, review the question of representations to the Turkish or British Governments in light of the then existing circumstances.<sup>3</sup>

Sincerely yours,

J. H. Burns

<sup>8</sup> In a letter dated April 3, Mr. Matthews acknowledged receipt of General Burns' letter and informed him that in view of the fact that the procurement lead time for the proper type of mine was approximately 18 months, the Department of State agreed (1) that it was unnecessary at that time to obtain the agreement of the Turkish Government to install the mine field and (2) that the question of making representations to the Turkish or British Governments could be reviewed when the necessary mines and equipment became available (782.5/3-251).

Memorandum of Conversation by the Acting Secretary of State 1

CONFIDENTIAL

[Washington,] March 5, 1951.

Subject: Turkey's Request for Additional U.S. Economic Assistance as well as Assistance in Obtaining Wheat Supplies.

Participants: Mr. Feridun C. Erkin-Ambassador of Turkey

Mr. James E. Webb-Acting Secretary

Mr. William Conrad—GTI Mr. C. Robert Moore—GTI

Ambassador Erkin discussed with me the following two problems, on the instructions of his Government:

1. Turkey's need for additional U.S. economic assistance to help cover the budgetary deficit for the new Turkish fiscal year beginning March 1, 1951.

The Ambassador commented that Turkey's military expenditures have been absorbing almost 45% of national revenues, thus causing a constant drain on the budget and exhausting all available domestic resources. Consequently, the Turkish Government is confronted with a serious problem in this present fiscal year in covering a budget deficit in the proportions of $300 million. $180 million of this deficit will be met through the expansion of the tax program, through internal and external loans, and through the use of EPU quotas and ECA counterpart funds. The Turkish Government has requested additional aid from ECA to cover the remaining $120 million. It is appreciative, the Ambassador continued, of the understanding and spirit of cooperation shown by the Embassy and the ECA Mission in Ankara in their continuing consideration of the problem. The Government, however, considers it very important that an early favorable decision be reached and, therefore, has asked him to request my support in ensuring that appropriate action is taken to bring about the favorable conclusion of this problem.

I informed the Ambassador that we were well aware of the heavy burdens which the Turkish people had been bearing to keep their country militarily strong. The Embassy and ECA Mission in Ankara, as he knows, have been in constant touch with appropriate agencies in the Turkish Government to explore the means by which the particularly heavy deficit for this year can be covered. I assured the Ambassador that I was confident they were doing their best to work out a solution to this problem with the Turkish Government, that they were keeping us informed of developments, and that every consideration would be given, both in Ankara and here, to this problem.

2. Turkey's need for immediate shipments of wheat.

The Ambassador explained that there is a serious shortage of food-grains in Turkey and that stocks presently at the disposal of the Soil Products Office are barely sufficient to meet the grain requirements of the country until the first of April. To provide for these requirements from then until the end of June, when the new harvest will become available, the Turkish Government urgently needs 100,000 tons of wheat and 25,000 tons of corn. The Ambassador, therefore, urged that the Department assist the Turks in obtaining grain in the U.S. for immediate shipment.

The Ambassador then adverted to the question of financing the purchase of the grain, suggesting one of several alternatives—1) that unused ECA allotments be made available and the funds thus spent be replaced later in the year when new ECA additional assistance is granted, 2) that an additional ECA allotment for this purpose be obtained now, or 3) that Turkey use its gold reserves and obtain reimbursement from ECA, if possible, when the amount of additional ECA aid to Turkey is determined.

I informed the Ambassador that the problem of meeting the wheat needs of the many countries which are calling on us for help is one of the most difficult that I have had to deal with during the past six months. We have rather suddenly found ourselves confronted with demands for very large quantities of wheat at a time when we are virtually without controls. There has been a progressive movement of controls, however, and we may soon be in a position to direct grain shipments to those countries which have the greatest need. Both ECA and the Department, as well as the Missions in Ankara, are keeping in very close touch with this problem and are trying to find ways to help the Turkish Government meet it. At the moment, no assurances can be given as to what it may be possible for us to do, although the Ambassador can be assured that the problem is receiving our sympathetic consideration.

The question of obtaining wheat supplies in the U.S., I continued, is quite a different one from that of ECA financing and, at the moment, the supply problem is the one that is most important to solve.

The Ambassador stated that he had been asked to cable his Government by tomorrow on developments. He asked if a meeting could not be arranged for this afternoon, between representatives of the various departments concerned with this problem and his Financial Counselor,<sup>2</sup> to explore again the possibilities of assistance. It was agreed that a meeting would be arranged, following which I would communicate with the Ambassador.

(Later in the afternoon, following a meeting on the subject attended by Department, ECA and Turkish Embassy representatives, I called the Ambassador to tell him of the discussions and to let him know that it would perhaps be the month of April before we could get as much as 9,000 tons of wheat through. The Ambassador thanked me but requested that a new effort be made to send at least two shipments between the 15th and the end of March. He said that Turkey was in a very difficult situation and he was afraid it would be too late if nothing arrived until April.

I made no commitment but referred to the meeting of the abovementioned representatives to be held on March 12, by which time I hoped that more definite information could be given him about shipment possibilities.)

JAMES E. WEBB

GTI will keep in touch with these two problems.

Subject: New Turkish Cabinet

The following analysis of the recent Turkish Cabinet change is furnished for your information:

The outgoing Cabinet had been formed hastily when the Democrat Party won its unexpected victory in May 1950 and was therefore somewhat of a patchwork of personalities. Its resignation on March 8, "to make possible the organization of a new Cabinet in keeping with present conditions . . . at the beginning of a new era", followed soon after the approval by the National Assembly of the Government budget for the fiscal year beginning March 1, 1951.

The new Cabinet, formed on March 9 by Mr. Menderes, who was also Prime Minister in the former Cabinet, is not conspicuously stronger than its predecessor and thus has produced general disappointment in Turkey. Only three new members entered the Government, the remaining fourteen posts being held by members of the previous Cabinet. The most significant change was the elimination of Mr. Karaosmanoglu, former Minister of State for Marshall Plan Affairs. While his relations with the ECA Mission had been cordial and constructive, there has been some suggestion that the Prime Minister was dissatisfied with his inability to obtain additional ECA aid for Turkey. His dismissal from the Cabinet is, however, probably more closely related to the rivalry between the two men, and leaves Mr. Menderes as the "strong man" of the present Government.

No change in foreign policy is expected as a result of the recent Cabinet reshuffle in Turkey, and no significant change in domestic policy is foreseen.<sup>2</sup>

Subject: Turkish Request for Additional ECA Aid

Mr. Burton Y. Berry-Acting Assistant Secretary, NEA

Mr. C. Robert Moore—GTI

Problem: Turkey's need for additional ECA assistance.

Action Required: Continued consultation with ECA on how this problem can be met.

Action Assigned: GTI

The Ambassador presented a detailed background of this problem referring to the counterpart release problem which had created so much difficulty at the time Turkey's FY 1950 budget was being considered, and the close collaboration which had taken place between Turkish officials, the ECA Mission and Ambassador Wadsworth with respect to the FY 1951 budget. He stated that the conclusion had been reached by all in early January that government expenditures, including those for the investment program which would provide a healthy basis for Turkey's military effort and strength, were at a minimum and that revenues could not be increased. With a projected budget deficit of over TL 400 million, it was expected that ECA would increase its aid to

Turkey in the form of consumer goods which would generate Turkish liras and thus prevent this deficit from exercising a harmful inflationary impact on the economy, and it was assumed that the Turkish Government would be informed of this additional aid before the beginning of the new fiscal year on March 1. The Turkish Government was therefore surprised when Mr. Dorr, upon his return to Turkey in mid-February, reopened the question of the proposed budget. It felt that it could not agree, from the standpoint of the country's economy, to cut ordinary and investment expenditures still further and to reduce, as Mr. Dorr proposed, its request for additional ECA aid to one-half of the amount previously requested.

The new Turkish fiscal year has now begun and the matter of additional aid is still unsolved. The Ambassador urged that this Government reach an early decision and added that the Prime Minister would welcome whatever additional aid can be given, although he believes that the full amount requested is the minimum required.

Mr. Berry told the Ambassador that the Department and ECA have been following this problem and have been kept informed of the discussions going on in Ankara. Translating dollar funds into goods which will generate Turkish liras to cover the budgetary gap presents many difficulties and we have not yet received word that such difficulties have been ironed out on the ECA allotment of $4 million which was made in January to help finance the NCO program. Mr. Berry expressed the hope that an early decision could be reached and stated that we would keep in touch with ECA on the problem and inform it of the Ambassador's call.

[Washington,] March 31, 1951.

Subject: Proposed Increase in Turkish Forces.

The Turkish Government has offered to increase its armed forces by 40,000 men if the U.S. will finance the cost and provide improved support by furnishing certain items of equipment. The amount involved is estimated to be 88,000,000 Turkish lira, or approximately $31,500,000.

At the ISAC meeting on March 9, 1951, the Department of Defense expressed the view that the proposed increase would be highly desirable in that it would make the Turkish armed forces combat effective. After discussion ISAC agreed that the technical problems relating to the financing of the proposed increase should be referred to the Foreign Aid Committee for study and that ISAC would give further consideration to the problem based on the FAC's findings.

An endeavor has been made to obtain from Ankara a detailed import program which could be financed by ECA so that the Turkish lira thereby generated could be used to meet the internal costs of the program. To date we have been unsuccessful. However, a report from our Ambassador in Ankara, concurred in by JAMMAT<sup>2</sup> and the ECA Mission, included information which may provide a basis for judgment as to whether ISAC can proceed without waiting for further details.<sup>3</sup>

This report indicates that the approved Turkish military budget for the current Turkish fiscal year provides for an expenditure of 470,000,000 Turkish lira including 62,100,000 TL ($22,200,000) of imported items which are not included in American aid programs. There is also a proposed larger budget totalling 558,000,000 TL which will be adopted if the U.S. agrees to finance the increase. This larger budget includes proposed additional imports totalling some 38,900,000 TL ($13,800,000) but financing of this amount will have to be undertaken by the U.S. Therefore, if the proposed increase in forces is approved the Turkish military budget will amount to 558,000,000 TL including imports totalling 101,000,000 TL or $36,000,000. In no sense is this a forced import program because the items involved are required to meet what we are told are serious deficiencies. It has been necessary to take certain liberties with the figures because of vagueness in parts of the report, but in terms of broad categories the imports are as follows:

(Column A includes the amounts in each category which will be imported with Turkish foreign exchange whether or not the increase in forces is approved, Column B indicates the increased amounts in the respective categories that will be imported if the increase in forces is approved and financing is provided by the U.S., and Column C indicates the totals in each category.)

	Col. A	Col. B	Col. C
	(Millions of Turkish Lira)

The above import program, if financed by the U.S., will enable the Turks to generate 101,000,000 TL, or enough to take care of the proposed army expansion and to meet a portion of the second year's increment of the NCO program. The Turkish foreign exchange position would be affected in that it would not decrease by the amount of imports listed under Column A above. However, it would not increase. On the other hand, if the U.S. financed the total imports, the use of the Turkish foreign exchange so released should be the subject of a question, the answer to which we do not have.

Proposals for American Economic aid in support of the Turkish military total some $51½ million including $31½ million for the proposed increase in forces, $13 million for the NCO program and $7 million for raw materials to increase production in Turkish arsenals. If all three measures are to be undertaken, imports totalling some $15½ million over and above those listed in Column C above will have to be found.

Memorandum by George H. Emery to the Director of International Security Affairs (Cabot)

[Washington,] April 3, 1951.

Subject: Proposed Increase in Turkish Forces.

Col. Ofsthun and I met with Mr. Halaby and his associates yester-day to discuss further the problems involved in the proposed increase of the Turkish armed forces. There seem to be two difficulties involved which caused some doubt in the minds of those in ECA as to the desirability of the suggested program. These are: (a) the use of ECA money to "hire" foreign soldiers, and (b) the possibility that ECA funds might be used indirectly to increase a foreign country's reserves.

As a result of the many discussions which have been held on this subject, I believe that perhaps our approach has been faulty. The emphasis has been placed too strongly on additional soldiers and not strongly enough on essential imports. Our missions in Ankara first proposed that the U.S. finance an increase in the Turkish armed forces by making imports available which would generate local currency to pay for those forces. On the other hand, our missions also have said that serious deficiencies exist in certain importable items that back up the Turkish military effort, such as uniform cloth, POL, medical supplies, etc.

I suggest, therefore, that the proposal might be more palatable to all concerned if we agree that semi-military import deficiencies, in fact, do exist and that ECA funds should be made available to meet those deficiencies. The local currency thereby generated could be used by the Turkish Government for any purpose, but in negotiating the additional aid we could "suggest" to the Turks that it might be desirable to use these funds for additional non commissioned officers or additional recruits for the armed forces. It seems to me that this puts the shoe on the proper foot if, as we are told, serious deficiencies in terms of imports to back up the military effort do exist. Furthermore, I believe that a very good case can be made for the use of ECA funds to supply items needed by the military forces of any country as distinct from the use of ECA funds to "hire" soldiers.

In my memorandum of March 31, it was pointed out that there are two categories of imports involved in the Turkish proposal. In the first, amounting to $22,200,000 and listed under Column A, are those items which the Turks propose to import with free Turkish foreign exchange regardless of any action taken by the U.S. with respect to increase aid. In the second category, amounting to $13,800,000 and listed under Column B, are those items which will be imported to meet major deficiencies if the U.S. will supply the financing.

It was agreed yesterday in ECA that financing by the U.S. of the $13,800,000 of imports under Column B will not affect the Turkish reserve position in any way because the foreign exchange to meet those imports is not available. Therefore, if it is found to be necessary to compromise with ECA's point of view, it might be possible to agree that the Turks should finance the imports listed under Column A as originally planned in their budget and that ECA finance the imports listed in Column B. Under this procedure some 40,000,000 TL would be generated through American aid. This, of course, is substantially less than the 88,000,000 TL requested by the Turks. However, it must be remembered that the total cost of keeping 40,000 additional men under arms for a year is estimated to be 23,200,000 TL. The balance of the 88,000,000 TL requested was designed for improved support of the army as a whole through services such as maintenance of air fields, local construction work, etc. If eventually it is determined that these services are of such importance that they deserve a higher priority than some of the projects now being carried out under MDA in Turkey, ways and means could be found to schedule them through a revision of present priorities.

Subject: ECA Assistance to Turkey for FY 1952

Attached hereto is a paper prepared in GTI which discusses the problems involved if ECA maintains its projection of $66 million of economic aid for Turkey during the next fiscal year.

As indicated in the conclusion, GTI hopes that ECA will meet the position formulated by its representative in Ankara. If ECA is agreeable, this formula would involve additional ECA aid of $42 million or a total for FY 1952 of $108 million.

[Attachment] 2

ECA Assistance to Turkey for FY 1952

1. ECA assistance to Turkey, as presently projected for FY 1952, amounts to $66 million. Assuming incremental Turkish military efforts to the extent of $40 million are met in full from this $66 million, only

$26 million of economic, as distinct from military, aid would result. Only two-thirds of this amount, or approximately $18 million, would be applicable to the non-military internal budget gap of approximately $120 million for the Turkish fiscal year 1951 (March 1, 1951 to February 28, 1952).

- 2. In the absence of additional ECA aid Turkey will not be able to cover in full the gap of $120 million, without inflationary financing or damaging cut-backs in expenditures. The U.S. would strongly oppose any cutback in military expenditures; therefore the cutback would have to be primarily in investment expenditures which, according to the ECA Mission in Turkey, are already at virtually a minimum level consistent with the maintenance of a sound economy. Even at present and contemplated levels, gross investment in Turkey as a percentage GNP (Gross National Product) is below that of virtually all participating countries.
- 3. Up to the present ECA aid to Turkey has been granted to finance a capital development program (which otherwise would not have been undertaken) rather than to finance a balance of payments deficit. In the present projection, ECA indicates that the import forecast has not been specifically developed to allow for the possible requirements of a relatively poor economy whose historic imports have often been shaped by foreign exchange limitations rather than need. Increased imports designed to increase internal resources in order to help cover the budgetary gap would have relatively little effect on per capita consumption which would still remain at a bare subsistence level. Additional ECA aid would not result in an increase in Turkey's monetary reserves and it would not be difficult to obtain the Turkish Government's concurrence to measures that would prevent such a development.
- 4. In order to retain Turkey's confidence in the sincerity of our interest in helping it become strong militarily, economically, and politically, it is essential for us to give support in the economic as well as military field. This is particularly important inasmuch as Turkey, for many years, has been willing to bear a heavy defense burden which has limited the funds available for financing its investment program—a program which aims at raising the very low standard of living of the Turkish people and which will enable them better to support their military establishment.

A drastic cutback in the investment program would affect the internal position of the new Government of the Democrat Party in Turkey, which was elected in the first free and fair elections held in that country. Local reaction would undoubtedly extend to the U.S. and make it more difficult for the Government to cooperate as fully with the U.S. as in the past. The Turks are very conscious of their military contribution to the free world forces and consider that they have received relatively limited amounts of economic assistance from the U.S. in relation to other countries whose standard of living is higher and whose devotion to the common cause has been less effectively demonstrated. While this can be countered with the explanation of what ECA was established to accomplish, the explanation is not one that is understood by the large mass of relatively uninformed Turks whose views must be taken into consideration in the new democratic Turkey.

5. We feel that ECA should endeavor to meet the position formulated by Russell Dorr who requested that ECA finance $60 million, or approximately one-half, of the $120 million gap (exclusive of the military support program). This formula would involve additional ECA aid of $42 million ($60 million minus $18 million already projected) or a total for FY 1952 of $108 million. As a minimum, we should seek an additional $20 million, or approximately half of that balance.

- (a) Increase Turk armed forces by 40,000 men and provide improved support for those forces along lines of JAMMAT "final report" Sec N.<sup>2</sup>

(b) Continue NCO program along lines of JAMMAT "final report"

- (c) Continue minimal investment program by completing projects already under way.
- 4. In order carry out programs in Para 3 above it has been agreed that ECA will make available $140 million for US FY 51 and 52 including EPU initial position for both years and including amts already allotted current US FY. Obviously US FY 52 portion depends on favorable BOB and Cong action.
- 5. Ceiling of $140 million in Para 4 above is absolute, but implied ceiling of $70 million each year is not inflexible. To date ECA has allotted for US FY 51 $42.6 million as fol: (a) $13.6 million grant aid, (b) $25 million EPU initial position and (c) $4 million for NCOs. Therefore remainder available for allotment current FY is $27.4 million on grant basis. Under agreement priority must be given programs in Para 3 (a) and (b) above in allotting this amt which must be paid by June 30, 1951. In this connection EPU initial position can be used for mil support. Also if deemed essential allotment of portion of recommended US FY 52 funds to extent of perhaps $5 million will be considered if such portion can be paid by June 30, 1951 and on understanding US FY 52 funds will be reduced by like amt.
- 6. Additional aid outlined Para 4 above being made available on understanding that Turks will:
- (a) Continue mil expenditures in line with current budget and that such budget will not be reduced in next Turk FY.

(b) Carry out program in Para 3 above.

- (c) Continue efforts to reduce non-mil expenditures (including administrative expenditures and public investment).
  - (d) Continue and extend efforts to increase revenues thru taxation.
- 7. Aid figure for US FY 52 cannot be discussed with Turks at this stage but US support for programs in Para 3 above can be disclosed.
- 8. Imports outlined Para 3 Toeca 299 rptd Torep 374, Apr 7 under study.3

662. Re Ecato 241 <sup>1</sup> and Deptel 528 April 12 <sup>2</sup> and Deptel 534 April 14.<sup>2</sup> (1) After consulting ECA and JAMMAT I have informed FonMin orally that decision has now been taken by US Govt on highest level which allocates necessary dollars from ECA/W funds for generation of sufficient Turk liras to defray cost of 40,000 additional men and related expenses envisaged by Turk supplementary military budget. I said this was in addition to $4 million already allocated from ECA funds to defray cost of NCO program for current Turk FY.

FonMin expressed high appreciation and, at my suggestion, agreed to communicate this info to Cabinet to end that Natl Defense Minister <sup>3</sup> might immediately commence program.

I avoided any mention of time when Turk Govt might expect lira funds to be made available; nor did I mention exact amounts; but it was clear from our brief discussion that he expected substantially full amount of TL 80 million, as specified in supplementary budget voted by GNA, would be made available within next few months. I venture urge this be assured before end of summer when budgeting for Turk FY beginning March 1952 must begin.

(2) It is General Arnold's and my understanding that these new dollar funds are to be made available during current US FY 1951 from ECA funds made available for MDAP requirements. We note however from Ecato 241 that only $27.4 million are available for allocation in FY 1951, whereas equivalent of TL 80 million is $28.57 million.

We are not concerned at this discrepancy, because six weeks of current Turk FY have already passed, and Gen Arnold is confident he will be able reach ready agreement with Turk general staff for paring program for balance of year to equivalent of $27.4 million figure. We request authority proceed on this latter basis.

SECRET PRIORITY

Ankara, April 19, 1951-7 p. m.

663. Fol is my preliminary comment in partial explanation of request made in Embtel 656 Apr 18. Dorsy [Dorr?] and Arnold are preparing fuller comment.

Situation created by ISAC decision which was basis Ecato 241 Apr 12 2 appears briefly to be as fols:

1. Turk Govt requested additional military aid to meet necessary expenses of 40,000 man increase and NCO programs. I read Ecato 241 to mean that sufficient funds for these two programs have been allocated from FY 51 ECA funds made available for MDAP requirements.

2. Turk Govt has been proceeding on uncontradicted assumption that, in line Snoy-Marjolin formula,<sup>3</sup> it wld receive at least $27,000,000 as reg FY 51 ECA econ aid; and ECA/T has been programming jointly with high Turk officials on that basis. Of this amount only $13.6 has been allocated. Ecato 241 appears in fact make no provision for allocation of remaining $13.4 million, because all of unallocated $27.4 million will be needed for 40,000 man military program.

3. Turk Govt for many months (i.e. during and since last winter budgeting for Turk FY 51-52) has requested additional econ aid to assist in meeting cost of investment development program which it has consistently insisted is approx minimum necessary effectively to support defense effort. Ecato 241 provides nothing on this score.

In short, decision in question as I understand it (a) provides sufficient new FY 51 funds to meet only supplementary military expenditures which, in absence such funds, Turks would not make; (b) in effect cuts expected FY 51 regular program econ aid by half; and (c) provides no military aid from FY 51 funds.

If foregoing exposition is correct, we shall be faced with very difficult public relations problem. I feel it may well have serious adverse effect on overall Turk-US relations.

In thought that shock to Turks might be softened, I have already (in conversation with FonMin reported in Embtel 662 Apr 19 4 and in a brief word had by chance immed thereafter with Pri Min) made

The Snoy-Marjolin formula was a plan for allocating economic aid through the Organization for European Economic Cooperation. It was created to silence complaints brought by various members of the Council of the Organization for European Cooperation in August 1949 that the distribution of Marshall Plan aid funds among the participating European nations was inequitable. See Foreign Relations, 1950, vol. v, p. 427.

point that in face increasingly threatening world situation we must all expect that not only primary, but overriding emphasis in US aid programs will henceforth be placed on military-defense rather than econ development.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Secretary of State

[Washington,] April 27, 1951.

Subject: Conversation with Turkish Ambassador

Participants: Mr. Feridun C. Erkin-Ambassador of Turkey

Mr. Dean Acheson—Secretary Mr. C. Robert Moore—GTI

Ambassador Erkin stated that he had been called back to Turkey for consultation and that he wanted to discuss with me two problems of considerable importance to Turkey on which he would be questioned.

1. The status of Turkey's request for a U.S. security commitment.

Ambassador Erkin pointed out that in view of developments in Iran <sup>1</sup> and elsewhere the Turkish people are becoming increasingly disturbed and confused over the fact that Turkey's proposals to the U.S. with respect to reciprocal security arrangements have received no definite reply. He stated that it would be most helpful, in clarifying the atmosphere, if such a reply could be given, even though it may be negative.

I assured the Ambassador that the Turkish position on this security problem has been ably and forcefully presented by him and by Ambassador Wadsworth and that we fully appreciate its importance to Turkey. We recognize that it is a problem to which we must find a solution and developments since 1947, when we initiated our program of military aid to Turkey,<sup>2</sup> are helpful to us in our efforts to find this solution. We in this country have a much greater awareness now than in 1947 of the Soviet menace and of the efforts that are required of the free world to meet it. Turkey itself enjoys a much different position in the U.S. than it did in 1947. The decision of the Turkish Government to send troops to Korea and their fine performance there have greatly increased the favorable atmosphere in this country towards Turkey. Developments such as these are very useful in preparing Congress and the American people for new policy measures that it may be considered desirable to take.

A decision to extend a security commitment to Turkey (and to Greece, as we assume that similar arrangements would be made for both countries) has many aspects, I continued. In addition to the Turkish aspect, there are the following:

1) The attitude of our European allies.

2) The problems that may be created with respect to Iran and Egypt who might desire similar arrangements.

3) The problems that might be created with respect to a possible

Conference of Foreign Ministers.

4) The general problem of obtaining acceptance at home of a new policy decision. In this connection, I commented that I believed the furor created by General MacArthur's return would die down and that we would soon be able to forge ahead in developing and carrying out our policies.

At this point the Ambassador asked if my reference to the Conference of Foreign Ministers meant that no decision on a security commitment to Turkey could be given until after such a Conference. My reply was that we want to think carefully before taking any action which might have some bearing on such a Conference, in the event that the USSR should really desire an "honest" conference. That does not mean, however, that our study of the security problem will not go forward or that a decision will not be reached until after the Conference has been held.

The Ambassador then asked if we have taken up the security commitment problem with any of the other members of the North Atlantic Council, I replied that I had not done so personally, although it was possible that some of my colleagues may have had informal conversations with representatives of other governments. I added, in reply to the Ambassador's question, that I did not know the present attitude of the other governments towards the problem. I did feel, however, that Foreign Offices generally were aware that conditions had changed considerably since September 1950, when the question of Turkey's inclusion in the North Atlantic Treaty was last discussed.3 At the present time, I continued, we are trying to clarify this problem in our own minds and to think through all of the various aspects. When this has been done we will undoubtedly consult with our allies before reaching any final decision. If the consultations reveal difficulties with respect to any one approach to the problem, we will have to consider the problem in the light of those difficulties and the alternatives that may be available.

To sum up, I said that we understand the problem and its importance to Turkey. We are sympathetic in our desire to find a solution to it and this is one of our major preoccupations at present. I stated that, while no definite decision can be given now, I did not consider the situation unencouraging.

2. Financial Assistance to Turkey.

The Ambassador referred briefly to his several representations to the Department and to ECA regarding the Turkish Government's request for additional financial aid. He stressed the serious financial problem facing Turkey because of its heavy defense expenditures and urged that an early and favorable reply be given.

I pointed out that informal discussions on the Foreign Assistance Bill for FY 1952 would soon be underway and that it was too early to indicate what aid Turkey might expect to receive in the coming fiscal year. I added that I did not know whether any decision had been reached on the question of additional aid for the present fiscal year but that I would be glad to inquire into the matter.

McGhee Files: Lot 53 D 468: "Turkey 1948-Memoranda"

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of Greek, Turkish, and Iranian Affairs (Rountree) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (McGhee)<sup>1</sup>

[Washington,] April 30, 1951.

Subject: Ambassador Erkin's Appointment on April 30.

Ambassador Erkin will probably bring up the following subjects:

1. Economic aid.

The Ambassador is particularly interested to learn what amounts of additional economic aid can be expected for the remaining part of FY 1951. He has an appointment with Mr. Bissell of ECA this afternoon at 4:00 o'clock, and it is contemplated that either Ed Dorsz or I will be present at that time. Mr. Bissell plans to hand the Ambassador an ECA memorandum along the lines of the attached draft.<sup>2</sup>

For your own information, Turkey will receive a total of $70 million in ECA aid in FY 1951, approximately $17.2 million more than was originally contemplated at the beginning of the fiscal year. According to present estimates, this entire increase will be absorbed by imports included in the two military programs approved by ISAC—the increase in forces program and the NCO program. Projected ECA aid for FY 1952 likewise amounts to $70 million out of which the balance of the two military programs must be financed as well as a minimal investment program. We cannot give the Turks any information on our plans for FY 1952 as the figures have not yet been submitted to Congress and Congressional action is, at present, quite uncertain.

I would strongly urge that you seek to avoid discussion of this problem, in view of the explanations the Ambassador will receive from Mr. Bissell. You can emphasize, however, that the matter has been discussed at some length between the interested agencies and that the amount of additional aid for FY 1951 is the maximum that can be made available. You should also emphasize to the Ambassador that under present circumstances we are obliged to place increasing emphasis on economic aid in support of military programs and that in the case of almost all countries, aid for purely economic development has had to be curtailed.

The Administrator for Economic Cooperation (Foster) to the ECA Mission in Turkey 1

Washington, May 2, 1951—7 p. m.

Ecato 292. 1. Bissell-Erkin conference held 30 April. Erkin disappointed at level of aid but Bissell emphasized increase above expected $52.2 million and urged that Erkin impress on his Gov importance of prompt action so that entire $70 million might be used prior to 30 June. Bissell also emphasized general policy statements set forth in memo. (Ref Ecato 263 rptd Paris Torep 2541)2 After conference Erkin telephoned to inquire whether special $4 million NCO allotment included in $70 million. Arithmetic set forth in para 1 of memo was further elaborated for him, indicating inclusion of $4 million.

2. Erkin handed to Bissell short memo urging that U.S. take favorable position on Turk request for additional EPU initial position for current year.2 Bissell replied that he was not in a position to give Erkin any encouragement on this item and emphasized that $70 million level was established as upper limit of assistance to Turkey from current U.S. FY funds. However, Bissell suggested that Turk Gov might be interested in shifting some direct dollar assistance to EPU assistance, without increasing total level of aid.

3. Bissell indicated to Erkin that ECA aid to Turkey from U.S. FY 52 funds would be projected as of same order of magnitude as current year's aid but that greater portion of aid through EPU and smaller portion in form of direct dollars. No figures mentioned by Bissell in this connection.

TOP SECRET [NSC 109]

TURKEY

1. Turkey is the strongest anti-Communist country on the periphery of the USSR and the only one in the Eastern Mediterranean and Middle East area capable of offering substantial resistance to Soviet aggression. It can and does contribute to the security interests of the

<sup>1</sup>The source text and the NSC Staff Study (infra), along with a cover sheet and a covering note dated May 11 from James S. Lay, Jr., the Executive Secretary of the National Security Council, were circulated to members of the NSC, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Director of Defense Mobilization for their consideration as NSC 109 of May 11, "The Position of the United States With Respect to Turkey."

Lay explained in the covering note that the enclosed draft statement of policy had been prepared pursuant to NSC Action No. 366-c of October 12, 1950, in which the Council had agreed that the NSC Staff should prepare a new report on U.S. policy toward Turkey (NSC-S/S (Miscellaneous) Files: Lot 66 D 95: Record of Actions by the National Security Council, 1950; for excerpts from NSC 42/1, see Foreign Relations, 1950, vol. v, pp. 410 and 1317.). Moreover, it was proposed in the covering note to revise the approved statement of policy in NSC 103/1, "The Position of the United States With Respect to Greece" (p. 463) to include a statement along the lines of paragraph 3 in the source text in order that, if approved, the recommendations advanced regarding security arrangements in both statements of policy would conform with one another.

The draft statement of policy on Turkey had been completed by the NSC Staff Assistants on May 8 for consideration by the Senior Staff on May 10. Prior to this meeting, general agreement had been reached regarding its contents, except for the recommendations advanced in the subparagraphs of paragraph 3. The Department of Defense and the Joint Chiefs of Staff representatives disliked these subparagraphs and were advancing substitutions. At the Senior Staff session on May 10, the Department of State withdrew its objections to the Defense–JCS versions of the subparagraphs; the JCS representative then countered with a redraft of the JCS wording of subparagraph 3b.; and the Senior Staff proceeded to adopt them, after further revision, with the recommendation that the revised draft statement of policy be submitted to the Council for approval as NSC 109. The differences between the subparagraphs in the draft of May 8 and the final version of them circulated as NSC 109 on May 11 are indicated in a subsequent footnote.

At its 92d meeting on May 23, the Council considered NSC 109. The members also noted a memorandum of concurrence from the Joint Chiefs of Staff to the Secretary of Defense dated May 22 in which the JCS had approved the source text and the proposed revisions to the statement of policy in NSC 103/1 as they had been circulated on May 11. Executive Secretary Lay had, at the request of the Secretary of Defense, sent this additional paper, along with a covering memorandum, to the members of the Council, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Director of Defense Mobilization on May 22. In it, the JCS expressed again their opinion:

"that United States security interests demand that Turkey and Greece be admitted as full members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). The Joint Chiefs of Staff attach such great importance to insuring that Turkey and Greece are on the side of the Western Powers at the outset of a general war that they are willing to agree to an alternative mutual security arrangement for Turkey and Greece if their inclusion in NATO would be delayed to such an extent that orientation with the West in the event of a general war would be jeopardized. The Joint Chiefs of Staff, from the military point of view, would not regard

United States, and therefore it continues to be in the interest of the United States that Turkey remain an ally of the free world in the struggle against international communism.

a. Turkey's military strength-in-being, and firm determination to maintain its political independence and territorial integrity, continue to be effective deterrents to Soviet or satellite aggression directed against Turkey.

b. Turkey's alignment with the free world furnishes a protective screen behind which the defensive strength of the countries in the Eastern Mediterranean and Middle East area can be developed.

c. Turkey controls the strategically important Turkish Straits, the denial of which the Soviet control is vital to the security interests of the United States.

d. Turkey is a bulwark on one flank of the area now embraced by the North Atlantic Treaty.

- e. Military and other resources of Turkey, including base areas, would be of great value to the United States in the event of war with the USSR.
- f. Soviet domination of Turkey would enhance the relative Soviet power position, seriously damage United States prestige which is heavily committed in Turkey, and weaken the will to resist in other countries threatened with Soviet domination.
- g. Soviet domination of Turkey or even a neutral Turkey would protect the Soviet right flank in a Soviet attack against Iran and the Arab States.
- h. Seizure of Turkey by force of arms could only be viewed as one phase of the Soviet plan of conquest, undertaken in full recognition of the risk of precipitating global war.
  - 2. Accordingly, the United States should:
- a. Continue to manifest publicly its active interest in the maintenance of the political independence and territorial integrity of Turkey and its continued support of the Truman doctrine.

b. Continue to provide appropriate international political support to Turkey.

c. Continue to exercise a constructive influence, without interference in Turkey's internal affairs, on Turkey's efforts to strengthen itself economically, militarily and politically.

either bilateral security arrangements between the United States and Turkey or Greece as an adequate solution."

The Council then adopted the statement of policy on Turkey and the proposed revisions to the statement of policy on Greece contained in NSC 103/1, which had been presented in the covering note of May 11, and, finally, the NSC formally submitted NSC 109 to the President for consideration. (NSC Action No. 480, May 23, 1951, NSC-S/S (Miscellaneous) Files: Lot 66 D 95: Record of Actions by the National Security Council, 1951)

The following day, May 24, Executive Secretary Lay informed the Council, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Director of Defense Mobilization that the President had that day approved the Statement of Policy on Turkey contained in NSC 109 and had directed its implementation by all appropriate executive departments and agencies of the U.S. Government under the coordination of the Secretary of State. For the revisions to NSC 103/1, see pp. 461 ff.

d. Encourage Turkey to develop closer relations with the other countries of the Middle East, particularly Iran.

e. Continue to provide economic and technical assistance which, when combined with the maximum Turkish efforts of self-help, will permit the development of Turkey's economy to the extent required to avoid social unrest, which will demonstrate United States interest in Turkey's economic as well as military well-being, and which will assist the United States in securing from Turkey resources needed for the defense of the free world.

f. Lend appropriate support to the Turkish military establishment to give it the capability of:

(1) Maintaining internal security.

(2) Repelling a satellite attack on Turkey.

(3) Resisting to the maximum practicable extent an attack on Turkey involving direct or indirect Soviet participation.

 $(4) \ldots$

- g. Within the limits of priorities and availabilities, provide Turkey military matériel, supplies, and guidance necessary to the accomplishment of the objectives in f. above.
- 3. In order to assure Turkey's full cooperation in international security measures and, in the event of war, its cobelligerency, the use of Turkish bases and other facilities, and the closure of the Straits to the USSR, the United States should:

a. Press now for the inclusion of Turkey as a full member of NATO, this being the most desirable form of reciprocal security arrangement.

b. If full membership of Turkey in NATO would be unacceptably delayed, conclude alternative security arrangements which would include Turkey and would not prejudice Turkish membership in NATO at the earliest practicable date.<sup>2</sup>

4. A Soviet or satellite attack against Turkey would so increase the danger of global war that the United States in common prudence, pending the conclusion of reciprocal security arrangements including the United States and Turkey, should assist in opposition to the attack in a manner and scope to be determined in the light of circumstances then existing, including the following general courses of action.

State

a. Enter into reciprocal security arrangements with Turkey in such form as may be most feasible.

b. Approve in principle, as the most feasible form of reciprocal security arrangements, the inclusion of Turkey as a full member in NATO.

c. If full inclusion of Turkey in NATO proves to be politically impossible determine what alternative form of a security commitment would be more feasible in the circumstances.

Defense, JCS

a. Press now for the inclusion of Turkey as a full member of NATO, this being the most desirable form of reciprocal security arrangement.

b. If full inclusion of Turkey in NATO proves to be politically impossible, enter into some alternative form of reciprocal security commitment of a form most feasible in the circumstances.

a. Place itself in the best possible position to meet the imminence of global war.

b. Seek, by political measures, to stop the aggression, localize the action, and restore the status quo.

c. Provide such military matériel and deploy such forces to the general area as can appropriately be made available in the light of recommendations by the Joint Chiefs of Staff at the time.

d. Urge other nations to take similar action, including appropriate measures in the United Nations and NATO and the implementation of the United Kingdom-France-Turkey Treaty of Mutual Assistance.

5. After the conclusion of reciprocal security arrangements including the United States and Turkey, the United States should respond to a Soviet or satellite attack against Turkey in a manner and scope to be determined in the light of the recommendations by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the circumstances then existing, and within the framework of the obligations of the United States under those arrangements.

THE Position of the United States With Respect to Turkey

PROBLEM

1. To determine the position of the United States with respect to Turkey.

ANALYSIS

- 2. Turkey is the strongest anti-communist country on the periphery of the USSR and the only one in the Eastern Mediterranean and Middle East area having the determination and capability of offering substantial resistance to Soviet aggression. Aligned with the free world, Turkey has stood firm against Soviet and satellite pressures, having as their ultimate objective Soviet domination of Turkey.
- 3. Turkey's geographic position makes its continued alignment with the free world of primary strategic importance to the United States. It not only controls important air, land and sea routes (including the Turkish Straits, which Russia has coveted for some two hundred years) from the USSR to the Cairo-Suez area and to the Middle East oil fields, but it offers bases from which the USSR could launch operations against the Islands of Crete, Rhodes and Cyprus and against communications in the Eastern Mediterranean and the Middle East.

The problems encountered with the subparagraphs of paragraph 3 in the Statement of Policy, as noted in footnote 1, supra, were reflected as well in the subparagraphs of paragraph 40 in the source text. However, when the difficulties with the subparagraphs outlined in footnote 1, supra, were resolved on May 10, the same changes were made with reference to the subparagraphs of paragraph 40 of this Staff study.

- 4. The Joint Chiefs of Staff stated in their comments on NSC 73/1,² that "denial of Soviet control of the Dardanelles is vital to the security interests of the United States. Therefore, direct USSR attack on Turkey would precipitate global War". Attainment by the USSR of its objectives in Turkey would thus have grave consequences on the security of the United States, not only through the loss of the Turkish Straits to the Soviets but through the elimination of Turkey as an effective barrier to Soviet penetration in the Middle East area. The United States, therefore, seeks the preservation of a stable, strong, independent and democratic Turkey, aligned with the free world, and, to this end, it has been extending political, military and economic assistance to that country.
- 5. There have been relatively few important international issues on which Turkey has required United States political support. The most serious of such issues arose in 1946 over the question of revising the Montreux Convention of 1936 governing the Turkish Straits. It had been agreed by the United States, British, and Soviet Governments at the Potsdam Conference of July 1945 that the Convention should be revised as failing to meet present day conditions, and it was further agreed that the matter should be taken up with the Turkish Government by each of the three Governments. The British and United States views on the basis for an equitable solution of the Straits question were subsequently communicated to the Turkish Government. They were followed, in August 1946, by Soviet proposals for a "new regime" for the Straits. These proposals included two which Turkey rejected as unacceptable—(1) only Turkey and other Black Sea powers should establish the regime of the Straits and (2) Turkey and the USSR should organize joint means of defense of the Straits. In the diplomatic exchanges that followed, Turkey was strongly supported in its position by the United States as well as the United Kingdom. While not accepting the Turkish position, the USSR has allowed the issue to remain relatively dormant. Unless it is raised again before August 9, 1951, or unless the Convention is denounced by one of the signatories, the present Convention will remain in force without revision until its expiration in 1956.
- 6. The United States has endeavored to strengthen Turkey's international position in various other ways, such as the following:
- a. It initiated a program of military aid to Turkey in 1947 under the Truman Doctrine to assist Turkey in maintaining its political independence and territorial integrity.

1950, vol. 1, p. 375.

b. It included Turkey as a participating country in the European Recovery Plan.

c. It strongly supported Turkey's candidacy for a seat on the Security Council in October 1950.3

- d. It sponsored the proposal through the North Atlantic Council, in the endeavor to meet constructively Turkey's demands for full membership in NATO, that Turkey associate itself with such appropriate phases of the military planning work of the NATO as are concerned with the defense of the Mediterranean.
- 9. The long-term military objectives of the United States in Turkey have been defined as follows: development of sufficient military power to prevent Turkey from capitulating to communism during the ideological conflict; in event of war, to retain for the United States and its allies base areas in Turkey, to delay materially any USSR advance, and with allied support, to assure control by the Western powers of the Eastern Mediterranean and the security of base areas in Egypt.
- 10. The United States military aid program which has been in effect since 1947 has been directed to the attainment of these objectives. Through the supply of up-to-date military equipment and training in its use, the Turkish armed forces are being modernized and thus strengthened. Without United States or other foreign assistance, this modernization program could not have been undertaken by Turkey on an adequate scale as its defense expenditures were already absorbing 40-50% of its budgetary revenues. In the absence of such assistance, the defensive capabilities of the Turkish armed forces would have steadily deteriorated in relation to the offensive capabilities of its Soviet and satellite neighbors.
- 11. By the end of FY 1950, United States military aid to Turkey amounted to about $271 million, of which $105 million was authorized during FY 1950. The FY 1951 program envisages an allotment for Turkey of $67.4 million from the regular MDAP appropriation plus $87 million from the supplemental appropriation.
- 12. Since the inauguration of the military aid program, the peacetime strength of the Turkish Armed Forces has been reduced in numbers by almost 50 percent. However, with the modern equipment provided under the Aid Program and the complementary training system sponsored and supervised by the American Military Mission, the combat potential and capabilities of the present Turkish Military Establishment are considerably greater than when the Armed Forces were double their present size. Further United States assistance is, nevertheless, necessary in order to arrive at the goal of a Turkish

Military Establishment that is considered adequate (for our intended purposes), effective, and self-supporting, as far as is practicable.

13. A measure of great importance in arriving at this goal is the enlistment and training of an adequate Non-Commissioned Officers Corps. The Turks are endeavoring, within the limits of their already strained budget, to implement the recommendations of the Military Mission to correct this major deficiency. An adequate NCO program in Turkey, however, can only be assured if the United States is prepared to extend dollar aid to support it. In recognition of this, ECA has recently allotted $4 million to Turkey for the purchase of common use items to provide the funds to help finance such a program.

14. While Turkey suffered no destruction during World War II, its economy was disrupted through the loss of normal markets and the burden of maintaining a large mobilized army. The unsettled international situation, particularly the continuing Soviet pressures to which Turkey was subjected, and Turkey's conviction that its most effective safeguard was a strong army, prevented a curtailment in military expenditures in the years following the end of World War II. As a consequence, foreign assistance has been required to help finance a program of economic development, which could no longer be delayed, designed to raise the country's very low standard of living.

15. Although the Export-Import Bank established a $25,000,000 credit for Turkey in 1946 for economic development projects, Turkey, as a participating country in the European Recovery Program, has received the bulk of its post-war external economic assistance from ECA. The principal projects which have been financed by ECA are long-term in nature, are strengthening Turkey's basic economy, and are increasing its ability to support its military burden. Ultimately they should provide Turkey with the means of assuring itself a gradually expanding economy without extraordinary financial assistance.

World War II has been primarily related to the foreign exchange or external costs of Turkey's economic development program. Henceforth economic assistance may also be required for other purposes, viz, to meet a portion of the internal costs of this development program and such additional internal defense expenditures as the United States may consider desirable. Turkey, which is already devoting over 30% of its budgetary expenditures to national defense (and has done so for more than 10 years), feels that it is unable to increase defense expenditures above present levels at the expense of its development program which it considers the minimum required to maintain a sound economy. Thus, as mentioned in paragraph 13 above, it has sought United States assistance to finance an adequate NCO program, one of the major deficiencies of its Military Establishment which otherwise would have been deferred indefinitely. It is understood that the financing of foreign budget deficits is not the general policy of this Government. Any exception in the case of the Turkish NCO program would not be a precedent for other cases.

17. A curtailment in Turkey's investment program would result in a corresponding reduction in Turkey's need for United States economic assistance. However, a steady, even if modest, improvement in the country's very low standard of living is needed to ensure internal stability, political as well as economic. Accordingly, United States economic aid should be continued (1) to assure the completion of the economic development projects already initiated with United States assistance; (2) to support, if warranted by Turkey's own self-help efforts, an investment program which will satisfy minimum internal economic and political requirements; and (3) to assist the United States in securing from Turkey resources, such as chromite and opium, needed for the defense of the free world.

18. The primary objective of Turkey's foreign policy, at present, is to obtain a United States security commitment. Its efforts to this end have been largely concentrated on seeking full membership in the NATO, although it has indicated its willingness to participate in some other form of security arrangement in which the United States is a party. Turkey is already linked with two members of NATO—the UK and France—in a Treaty of Mutual Assistance which was signed in 1939 and reaffirmed in 1949. In the view of the Turks, the principal value of this Treaty lies in its usefulness as a potential means of assuring United States intervention in the event of a Soviet or satellite aggression against Turkey. Turkey is also a signatory of the Saadabad Pact of 1937 with Iran, Iraq and Afghanistan. This Pact is merely a passive treaty of good relations without any provision for positive common defense.

19. In August 1950 the Turkish Government formally requested that it be invited to adhere to the North Atlantic Treaty. The United States position at that time was that inclusion of Turkey and Greece (it was recognized that any decision on this issue should also apply to Greece) as full members in the NATO might adversely affect the progress then evident in North Atlantic Treaty arrangements. In view of prior United States military commitments elsewhere, the JCS expressed doubt that the United States could, at any time in the near future, provide substantially more military aid to those countries than was then planned. However, it was felt that maximum benefit would be obtained and disadvantages minimized by according the two countries a special status in the NATO short of membership which would permit participation in coordinated planning against Soviet aggression. After discussion in the Foreign Ministers' meeting in September, the matter was taken up in the North Atlantic Council which thereupon proposed to Turkey (and subsequently to Greece) that it associate itself with such appropriate phases of the military planning work of the NATO as are concerned with the defense of the Mediterranean.

20. The Turkish Government accepted the proposal of the North Atlantic Council but the "association" relationship has not satisfied Turkey for several reasons:

a. Some progress has been made in preliminary preparation for Mediterranean planning but planning discussions have not yet begun.

b. Despite its steadfast support of United States efforts, within the UN and outside, to contain Soviet imperialism, support which has shown Turkey to be one of the most reliable allies of the free world, no assurances have been given to the Turkish Government that the planning association will lead to eventual full membership in the NATO.

c. Despite public statements as to United States interest in Turkey's security, the Turks fear that the unwillingness of the United States to extend a security commitment to Turkey indicates that the United States does not consider Turkey in its primary area of defense.

21. Public statements and programs of military and economic assistance are no longer considered by the Turkish Government or the Turkish people as a substitute for a specific security commitment. Turkey's demands for such a commitment on a reciprocal basis have been renewed and are again under study in the light of present day conditions. A favorable decision would play an important role in assuring Turkey's continued alignment with the free world, and its co-belligerency if thought desirable in the event of war, and in obtaining its cooperation in security measures of considerable value to the anti-Soviet coalition as a whole but of less direct benefit to Turkey's security.

22. In the absence of subversive elements within Turkey that could be expected to organize and carry out either a seizure of power in the provinces or a seizure of the central government, the principal threats to Turkey's security lie in a Soviet/satellite aggression or encirclement of Turkey as a result of Soviet and/or satellite advances through Iran or southeastern Europe.

23. The most likely satellite thrust would be directed against European Turkey (Thrace) by Bulgarian forces which are estimated to be the best trained, best equipped and most reliable among the satellite forces in Eastern Europe. A Bulgarian attack on Turkey, without overt Soviet participation, might accomplish the occupation of Turkish Thrace, with the exception of the Gallipoli peninsula which commands the Dardanelles area of the Straits, but a further advance into Asiatic Turkey would be unlikely. The occupation of Thrace would not appear to bring advantages to the Bulgarians or Soviets that would compensate for the risk of inviting a major war. Hence, such an attack does not appear likely unless it is one phase of the Soviet plan of conquest which is undertaken in full recognition of the risk of a general war.

- 24. It is believed that the USSR would attack Turkey only if it were prepared to face the likelihood of global war. In view of the United Kingdom-France-Turkey Treaty of Mutual Assistance and the deep interest and heavy moral commitment of the United States in Turkey, this likelihood would have to be faced, regardless of whether the United States and Turkey conclude reciprocal security arrangements. Turkey would not be able to repel a Soviet attack in strength without outside assistance nor would it be able to carry on organized resistance for very long without such assistance. Further, its determination to resist, while very strong, would undoubtedly be influenced by the outlook for allied assistance, and in the event the war were not localized, by Turkey's estimate of the ability of the allied powers to defeat the USSR.
- 25. Another threat to Turkey's security is the possibility of Soviet encirclement. This could be accomplished by Soviet occupation of Iran, Iraq, and Syria and/or Soviet/satellite occupation of Greece. It is unlikely that Turkey would oppose such occupation militarily unless its intervention were part of a defense plan formulated within the framework of security arrangements to which the United States were a party.
- 26. Turkey's reaction to the fact of encirclement would depend on a number of factors, including (1) the determination of the United States to oppose the USSR globally and to support and supply Turkey to the utmost of its ability, and (2) its ability to defend itself in the light of the new situation which might preclude the possibility of effective allied assistance. Although Turkey's sympathies would continue to lie with the anti-Soviet forces, its alignment with the free world, in the absence of a United States security commitment, might be weakened with the result that it would be unwilling to expose itself to the risks involved in overt cooperation with those forces.

ALTERNATIVE COURSES OF ACTION

27. Any visible lessening of United States interest in the political independence and territorial integrity of Turkey would have such far-reaching consequences on the security of the United States that continued United States assistance to Turkey, on an adequate scale, in the political, economic, and military fields is imperative. Within these fields certain basic alternative courses of action present themselves.

a. Political.

(1) Continue present policy. The present policy of United States friendship and political support in international councils has been reciprocated by Turkey. With respect to Turkey's internal policies and practices a wholesome development is already taking place. The indirect influence which the United States can exercise in assuring the continuance of such development will undoubtedly be more effective than direct intervention to this end by the United States. In its exposed position to direct Soviet attack, Turkey is not satisfied with the present United States policy because it does not provide an unequivocal United States commitment to come to Turkey's support in the event of attack. On the other hand the present policy does not insure any assistance from Turkey in case of Soviet attack in other portions of the world. Without a reciprocal security arrangement which includes the United States, the exposed position of Turkey may lead it toward a policy of neutralism, thus losing to the free world the assistance of a powerful ally.

(2) The conclusion of a reciprocal security arrangement with Turkey. The most significant step that the United States could take in the politico-military field would be the conclusion of a reciprocal security arrangement with Turkey. Turkey's international position would be enhanced thereby, through recognition that it had become a full partner with the United States in the common struggle to contain Soviet imperialism. More than any other political measure, a reciprocal security arrangement would assure Turkey's continued alignment with the free world and its full cooperation with the United States and the latter's allies in international security measures, and its co-belligerency in the event of war. Of the various alternative forms of reciprocal security arrangements, the most desirable would be Turkey's membership in NATO, and the least desirable would be a bilateral arrangement between the United States and Turkey. Regardless of what form the security arrangement takes, the USSR would probably react by exerting increased pressure, through measures short of war, upon the countries of the Middle East.

b. Economic.

(1) Discontinue economic assistance to Turkey. While the Turkish economy would not collapse if United States economic aid were entirely discontinued, adjustment to this circumstance would entail a very substantial curtailment in Turkey's investment and military expenditures, the latter already being at a level lower than consistent with its defense requirements. The political consequences, in the short run, would probably be of more significance than the economic. Such a decision by the United States on economic aid would be interpreted as indicating a lack of interest in Turkey's economic well-being and a lack of appreciation of the heavy burden which the Turkish people are bearing to maintain their military strength. It would tend to negate the favorable effect which the extension of a United States security commitment would otherwise have on Turkish-American relations.

(2) Continue economic assistance. In the light of the foregoing, continued economic assistance to Turkey appears desirable to the extent required to assure the completion of economic development projects already initiated with United States assistance and, if warranted by Turkish measures of self-help, to support a short-range economic development program which will at least satisfy minimum internal political and economic requirements. In the long run, unless Turkey is able to carry on its development program, which is directed towards a substantial increase in its national product, its internal economic stability will be jeopardized.

c. Military.

(1) Continue present program. Continuance of the United States program of military aid to Turkey is essential to indicate that there is no lessening of United States interest in Turkey and to permit steady progress to be made in developing the military capabilities of the Turkish armed forces. To the extent that such progress is dependent upon further increase in internal defense expenditures, consideration should be given to extending United States aid in the form of common use items or consumer goods to generate part or all of the internal resources required.

(2) Provide expanded military support. The closer military and political relationships between the United States and Turkey which would result from reciprocal security arrangements, either direct or indirect between the two countries, would provide a basis for an even more rapid development of Turkey's military strength, if this were desired and were supported by a substantial step-up in United States programs of military and economic assistance.

- 28. In the event of an attack against Turkey prior to the conclusion of reciprocal security arrangements including Turkey and the United States, failure of the United States to provide support to prevent Turkey from falling under Soviet domination would produce political and military consequences which would vitally affect the security interests of the United States. The USSR would acquire the strategic advantages to be derived from the control of Turkey and the Turkish Straits. In addition, the USSR might conclude that the United States would not respond to subsequent direct Soviet or satellite action against other countries in the Middle East and Eastern Mediterranean areas, and that the governments of those countries would in time be forced to seek accomodation with the USSR with inevitable repercussions in Western Europe. In the light of the vital interest of the United States in Turkey and the deep commitment of United States prestige in that country, the more valid alternative open to the United States in the event of an attack by Soviet and/or satellite forces would be to provide matériel and if so recommended by the Joint Chiefs of Staff at the time to deploy United States forces to the extent necessary and available without jeopardizing the security of the United States or of areas of the world of greater strategic importance to the United States, and to urge all other nations to take similar action.
- 29. It continues to be in the security interest of the United States that Turkey remain an ally of the free world in the struggle against communism.
- 30. Turkey is the strongest anti-communist country on the periphery of the USSR and the only one in the Eastern Mediterranean and Middle East area capable of offering substantial resistance to Soviet aggression.
- 31. The actions taken by the United States with respect to Turkey have increased Turkey's ability as well as determination to resist Soviet pressures and have thus made an important contribution in preventing Turkey from falling under Soviet domination, and in preventing Soviet expansion into the Middle East area.

- 32. Turkey continues to be a target of Soviet ambition. A Soviet or satellite attack on Turkey, however, is not likely unless the USSR is prepared to risk a general war. The USSR may, nevertheless, attempt to encircle Turkey in the expectation that it can thus weaken Turkey's alignment with the free world and make it less defensible.
- 33. Turkey would probably not oppose militarily Soviet or satellite efforts to occupy Iran, Iraq and Syria, or Greece or Yugoslavia or NATO countries unless its intervention were part of a defense plan formulated within the framework of security arrangements to which the United States were a party.
- 34. Turkey is not satisfied with its present "association" relationship with NATO and attaches the highest importance to entering into reciprocal security arrangements with the United States, either directly or indirectly.
- 35. Any change in United States policy with respect to political, military and economic assistance to Turkey which could be interpreted as a lessening of United States interest in the political independence and territorial integrity of Turkey might weaken Turkey's alignment with the free world and lead it to adopt a more neutral policy. It would also remove one of the important deterrents to Soviet or satellite aggression.
- 36. The United States should continue publicly to manifest deep interest in the independence and integrity of Turkey in order to deter the USSR and/or its satellites from initiating aggressive action against Turkey, and in any case, to prevent them from acting on the assumption that the United States would not provide determined support to Turkey in the event of an aggression.
- 37. The United States should continue to provide economic and technical assistance to Turkey which, when combined with maximum Turkish efforts, will make possible the carrying out of an economic development program designed to meet minimum internal political and economic requirements with minimum inflationary impact. It should also be prepared to consider providing economic assistance to help Turkey build up still further its military strength, as well as to assist Turkey in providing resources, such as chromite and opium, needed for the defense of the free world.
- 38. The United States should lend appropriate support to the Turkish military establishment to give it the capability of:
  - a. Maintaining internal security.

b. Repelling a satellite attack on Turkey.

c. Causing maximum practicable resistance to an attack on Turkey involving direct or indirect Soviet participation.

- d. Conducting guerrilla warfare in Turkey and contiguous areas in the event portions of Turkey are overrun by an enemy.
- 39. Within the limits of priorities and availabilities, the United States should provide Turkey with military matériel, supplies and guidance necessary to the accomplishment of the objectives outlined in paragraph 38 above.
- 40. In order to assure Turkey's full cooperation in international security measures and, in the event of war its co-belligerency, the use of Turkish bases and other facilities, and the closure of the Straits to the USSR, the United States should:

a. Press now for the inclusion of Turkey as a full member of NATO, this being the most desirable form of reciprocal security arrangement.

- b. If full membership of Turkey in NATO would be unacceptably delayed, conclude alternative security arrangements which would include Turkey and would not prejudice Turkish membership in NATO at the earliest practicable date.
- 41. Pending the conclusion of reciprocal security arrangements between the United States and Turkey:
- a. The United States should develop plans to assist Turkey in the event of an attack by Soviet or satellite forces. In this connection the United States should:
  - (1) Consult with the United Kingdom (and as appropriate with France) on action it would propose to take in this event, in carrying out its commitments under the United Kingdom-France-Turkey Treaty of Mutual Assistance and in recognition of its primary responsibility for the defense of this area.

(2) Urge at the appropriate time, military planning by the NATO to cover such a contingency.

- (3) Consider, at an appropriate time, the possibility and desirability for close military cooperation between Turkey and its neighbors.
- b. In the event of an attack against Turkey by Soviet or satellite forces, the United States should:
  - (1) Make every effort to stop the aggression, localize the action and restore the status quo by political measures, through the UN, jointly with the United Kingdom and France and unilaterally.

(2) Accelerate and increase military assistance to Turkey to the extent appropriate and feasible.

(3) If necessary, and to the extent consistent with other security requirements, mobilize available military support to Turkey through United Nations action, through implementation of North Atlantic Treaty plans, through joint United States-United Kingdom arrangements, and through unilateral United States support, as appropriate.

(4) In participating in any military support action for Turkey as envisaged in (3) above, deploy, to the extent necessary, such forces as can appropriately be made available in the light of the recommendations of the Joint Chiefs of Staff at the time.

(5) Take the action listed above in full knowledge that a general war may nevertheless be unavoidable.

42. After the conclusion of reciprocal security arrangements including the United States and Turkey, the United States should respond to a Soviet or satellite attack against Turkey in a manner and scope to be determined in the light of recommendation by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, circumstances then existing, and within the framework of the obligations of the United States under those arrangements.

SECRET PRIORITY

Ankara, May 15, 1951—noon.

733. Toisa. For Cabot from Emery. Amb, Arnold and Dorr concur in and recommend that the fol course of action be adhered to in implementing Turk military support programs for US FY '51 and US FY '52:

1. For US FY '51 counterpart generated by imports totaling $31.4 million (including $4 million for NCO's) will be made available to and will be used for military support programs covered in section H and section N of JAMMAT final report. Such counterpart will carry these programs thru Feb 29, 1952.

2. Assuming Turks prefer this, imports in para 1 above will consist of military "common use items" (such as POL, cloth for uniforms, and leather for shoes) and civilian type goods which will generate real counterpart. 202's should be ready by end of month.

3. For US FY '52 have taken into consideration priority position of military support programs (Ecato 241 <sup>2</sup>) and also necessity of continuation investment program. Believe formula in fol paras meets first criterion fully and second insofar as available resources permit.

4. In reality there are three military support programs as fols: (a) NCO's, (b) 40,000 troop increase and (c) provision of articles to Turk military to meet essential deficiencies not covered by enditem program.

5. For Turk FY ending Feb 28, 1953, funds required for imports to finance programs in para 4 above are as fols: (a) $12.1 million,

(b) $8.3 million and (c) $19 million (now estimated).

6. In view of fact that NCO and 40,000 troop programs involve men as distinct from "things" and that commitments must be given to feed clothe and train those men for a 12-month period, Amb and JAMMAT feel that full amount of required funds covered in para 5 (a) and (b) above shld be made available from US FY '52 funds. The counterpart equivalent of this $20.4 million will carry these two programs from March 1, 1952 to Feb 28, '53.

- 7. With respect to program covered in paras 4 and 5 (c) above, both Amb and Gen Arnold feel that it wld be desirable to allot full amt required to carry program forward from US FY '52 funds, but they recognize problem this wld create in carrying forward investment program. Therefore they agree that only one-third of required amt (i.e., $6.3 million) need be allotted from US FY '52 funds to carry program from March 1, 1952 to June 30, 1952. The balance of the required $19 million (i.e., $12.7 million) would come from US FY '53 funds assuming of course favorable appropriation action.
- 8. Therefore from the planned $70 million available for US FY '52 the military support programs would require $26.7 million as outlined in paras 6 and 7 above leaving $43.3 million for the investment program.
- 9. Under above formula out of $140 million available for US FY '51 and '52 approx $58 million would be applied to military support and approx $82 million to the investment program. JAMMAT can then proceed with essential elements their program with only qualification being changing world conditions.
- 10. Dorr greatly appreciates suggestion in Ecato 324 <sup>3</sup> apparently designed obviate difficulties arising from sudden curtailment econ program. However Amb and Gen Arnold feel strongly that it would be unwise to jeopardize prompt implementation supplemental military programs by requesting deferment any counterpart generating purchases. Dorr understands this point of view and feels it desirable defer to their convictions in this regard on understanding it will be possible anticipate US FY '52 allocation up to $5 million if desired.
- 11. Wld appreciate your favorable reaction these "ground rules" soonest so that planning on this basis can go forward without delay. [Emery.]

not be jeopardized thereby (see para 1b) we feel suggestion contained Ecato 324 Para 2 has merit.<sup>3</sup>

(a) Ecato 241, Apr 12,4 Para 5, stated that under ISAC agreement priority must be given programs in Ecato 241 Para 3a and b in allotting $27.4 million from 1951 funds. In our view this does not mean that entire $27.4 million must be devoted to mil support programs, which wld leave no additional FY 51 funds for investment program. A lesser amt can be allocated from FY 51 funds, with the balance to be met from FY 52 funds if such lesser amt will assure full and immed implementation of supplemental mil programs mentioned Ecato 241 Para 3a and b.

(b) We note from Embtel 634 Apr 10 <sup>5</sup> Para 5 that TGS promised Gen Arnold that supplementary mil programs wld be undertaken as soon as Turks notified of US agreement to provide eventual financing.

(c) We note that both Ankara and Washington are in agreement (subj to qualification in Para 8) that $58 and 82 million are to be applied to mil support and investment programs respectively from planned $140 million available for US FY 51 to FY 52. The only question is how much of the mil support program must be met from FY 51 funds (balance having first priority on FY 52 funds) to assure full and immed implementation these supplementary mil programs.

(d) We are impressed with arguments advanced by Amb in Embtel 663, Apr 19,6 and by Dorr in Toeca 345 Apr 225 that serious public relations problem may result if entire amt unallocated FY 51 aid is devoted to mil support programs at apparent expense minimum anticipated aid for investment program for balance FY 51.

(e) From viewpoint declining ECA Turk investment program as well as Cong reaction, we wld favor larger investment imports from FY 51 funds than from FY 52 funds.

2. We recognize and appreciate careful consideration reflected in Embtel 733. Suggestion contained Ecato 324 designed not only to further total Turk mil and econ contribution all within priority requirements of ISAC discussions but to permit phasing of both mil and econ programs for FY 51 and 52. However, if after consideration this telegram Amb in consultation with ECA and JAMMAT continues consider recommendations Embtel 733 shld not be changed you may consider that recommendations Embtel 733 have our approval, as we feel final decision this particular case shld rest with you. Request ur decision be implemented immed by submission 202's.

3. If additional $13.6 million used for investment program FY 51, mil program wld absorb $17.8. Now understand that wld leave for US FY 52 (a) balance Turk FY 51 mil program of $13.6, (b) about $26.7 for Turk FY 52 mil support programs, and (c) $40.3 for investment program. We note Turk FY 51 supplemental mil programs now $31.4 and not $34.1. We presume programs pared per Embtel 662 Apr 19.

- 4. In principle, for US internal planning purposes, concur in formula outlined Para 5, 6, 7 Embtel 733 for support Turk FY 52 supplementary mil programs. However, no commitment can or shld be made to Turks at this time and we expect them make real effort to increase support their mil programs next year.
- 5. Recent BOB discussions indicated extreme skepticism need for commitment even final $27.4 million FY 51 funds (now assured) for Turkey. This plus increased tightness ECA funds make it doubtful whether it is now possible to allot $5 million from FY 51 funds as outlined Para 5 Ecato 241. Request wld require strongest polit mil justification. Wld have to be fully paid by 30 June 51.

The Secretary of Defense (Marshall) to the Secretary of State

Washington, June 1, 1951.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Reference is made to the letter to Mr. Matthews from Major General J. H. Burns of this office, dated 23 March 1951, pertaining to the position paper entitled "Turkish Straits" (RPTS D-5/1a, dated 22 January 1951).

The letter of March 23 is not printed. For text of the position paper, see p.

Asked to comment on the paper, the Joint Chiefs of Staff on February 2, 1951, advised the Secretary of Defense that, from the military point of view, they perceived no objection to the recommendations contained in the position paper subject to (1) changing the recommendation in subparagraph 3(a) (see p. 1108) to read: "Favor a continuation of the present regime of the Straits"; (2) deleting subparagraph 3(b); and (3) deleting paragraph 4. Secretary of Defense Marshall concurred in these views and sent them to the Secretary of State on February 12, 1951 (782.022/3-1551).

Deputy Under Secretary of State Matthews, in a letter to Maj. Gen. James H. Burns, USA (retired), Assistant to the Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs, dated March 15, 1951, advised that the Department of State concurred in the deletion of paragraph 4 but did not concur in the deletion of subparagraph 3(b). To delete subparagraph 3(b), he explained, would require the United States to adhere firmly to its preferred position that the current Straits regime should be continued. He offered four reasons why the Department of State did not believe the United States should maintain an inflexible stand on the question: (1) the United States was not a signatory to the Convention, while the Soviet Union was; (2) a valid request for revision of the Convention could be advanced by any signatory power before August 9, 1951, and a revision could be negotiated without consent of the United States despite the fact that such action would not conform to the intent of the Potsdam Protocol; (3) the recommendation in subparagraph 3(b) envisaged little more than a modern

There is enclosed herewith a memorandum setting forth the views of the Joint Chiefs of Staff concerning this subject. In this memorandum, the Joint Chiefs of Staff state that they are willing to withdraw their objection to Recommendation 3(b) of the position paper on Turkish Straits, subject to the acceptance by the Department of State of certain qualifications and the inclusion of these qualifications in the position paper.2

In connection with the qualification considered necessary by the Joint Chiefs of Staff:

"6a. That the United States would participate in any conference convened for the purpose of revising the Montreux Convention;", the following amplifying statement is offered.

The position paper prepared by the Department of State on the Turkish Straits in part states:

version of the Convention and would not obligate the United States to anything more than respect for its provisions. Participation by the United States in negotia-States an incontestable right to participate in any revision of the new convention; (4) with respect to JCS objection to United Nations consideration of the question of revision of the Montreux Convention, the United Nations was not expected to participate in any way in the negotiations, which would be confined to the signatory powers and the United States, and the stipulation in subparagraph 3(b) that the new convention be placed within the framework of the United Nations did not envisage action by the United Nations for the specific purpose of enforcing provisions of the convention. It should be interpreted as meaning merely that "any revised convention should be so framed as to permit the Turkish Government to deny transit of the Straits to warships of any nation which may be charged by the UN with a violation of the purposes and principles of the Charter." Mr. Matthews asked the Department of Defense to reconsider its position (782.022/3-1551).

General Burns acknowledged Matthews' letter on March 23 and informed the Deputy Under Secretary of State that the Department of Defense would inform the Department of State in future if the Joint Chiefs of Staff presented any additional views on the subject of the Turkish Straits (782.5/3-2351).

Not printed. This memorandum was transmitted from General Bradley on behalf of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to Secretary of Defense Marshall on April 30. Two of the six major qualifications presented by the Joint Chiefs of Staff in this document appear in toto in the source text as numbered paragraphs 6a. and 6d. The other four conditions which the Joint Chiefs wished to have included in RPTS D-5/1a were as follows:

"[6]b. That the United States in concert with Turkey and other appropriate friendly powers, take action, in the contingency that such a conference must be convened, to limit the extent of any revision of the Convention to modernization of its terms and to prevent substantive changes thereof;

"[6]c. That the United States give maximum support to Turkey to insure that no part of the sovereignty of the latter is yielded to the USSR;

"[6]e. That any revision of the Montreux Convention be based on the Turkish Straits problem as such, and not be directly related to other problems, many of which are non-military, which are symptomatic of world tensions; and

"[6]f. That, in any event, the United States take action leading to early membership of Turkey and Greece in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization." (782.5/6–151)

"The U.S. is not a signatory of the Montreux Convention, nor has it been a party to any of the earlier treaties dealing with the Straits. However, our political, military and economic interest in the area has steadily increased since World War II and today we have a vital interest in the regime of the Straits. The U.S. should, therefore, play an active role in any conference which may be called with respect thereto. Recognition of our right to do so is implicit in the Potsdam Protocol."

and further states:

"Any recommendation [for revision of the Montreux Straits Convention] advanced by the USSR would, without doubt, embody renewed demands for a new Straits regime under the competence of the Black Sea Powers and for joint Turco-Soviet defense of the Straits. The U.S. could not, of course, accept such proposals which would mean acceptance of the thesis that the regime of the Straits is the exclusive concern of Turkey, the USSR and other Black Sea Powers and which would, in effect, mean Soviet domination of Turkey. Such proposals were rejected by the U.S., U.K., and Turkey in 1946 and would be rejected today. . . . ."

If the United States cannot obtain acceptance of its preferred position that the present regime of the Straits be continued, and if subsequently the United States is unable to arrange for its participation in a conference to revise the Montreux Convention, it is considered essential, from the military point of view, that the United States participate in any conference to draft a new Convention to replace the Montreux Convention.

Among other qualifications deemed necessary by the Joint Chiefs of Staff is their proposed:

"6d. That the United States, in concert with Turkey and other appropriate friendly powers, take action to prevent abrogation of the rights prevailing under the Montreux Convention. This should include full support to Turkey in the exercise of the veto power granted to it by the terms of the Convention;"

In further elaboration of this, we consider that the rights in question are: first, those which are accorded to Turkey and which, among other things, involve its sovereignty; and second, those which are accorded to the United States as a "non-Black Sea power" relative to navigation and transit of the Straits. Attempted abrogation of those rights by action of the USSR should be opposed by such measures as:

a. Action to obtain, with other friendly nations, political support for Turkey:

b. Appropriate support to Turkey so as to maintain the full sovereignty of that nation and to enforce the integrity of Turkish rights under the Montreux Convention regardless of the actions of the USSR; and

c. Appropriate action by the United States to exercise and maintain its existing rights under the Montreux Convention. In this connection, the Joint Chiefs of Staff have stated, and I concur, that they cannot accept any concept of the Black Sea as a closed area, regardless of the actions of the USSR.

In the event you find it possible, from a political viewpoint, to accept the qualifications set forth in paragraph 6 of the memorandum of the Joint Chiefs of Staff as amplified in the immediately preceding paragraphs, the Department of Defense will withdraw its objection to Recommendation 3(b) of the position paper on the Turkish Straits. If you agree to this proposal, I would like to suggest the desirability of amending the position paper appropriately in order that the foregoing military considerations will be brought to the attention of all officials concerned with this subject.

Faithfully yours,

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Officer in Charge, Turkish Affairs (Moore) <sup>1</sup>

[Washington,] June 4, 1951.

Subject: Conversation with Ambassador Erkin.

Participants: Mr. Feridun C. Erkin, Turkish Ambassador.

Mr. George C. McGhee, Assistant Secretary, NEA.

Mr. C. Robert Moore, GTI.

Problem: Report by Ambassador Erkin of his conversations in Ankara on security and other problems of mutual interest.

Action Required: None.

Ambassador Erkin, having returned several days ago from Turkey, called on Mr. McGhee to tell him of his conversations in Ankara with the Turkish President <sup>2</sup> and others on several subjects of mutual interest.

1. Security Commitment Question:

The Ambassador mentioned that his conferences in Ankara had been concluded and he had left for Istanbul before the Turkish Government had been informed that the US Government favored additional security arrangements for Turkey. He expressed pleasure at the development and at the timing inasmuch as he had been predicting such a development to his colleagues only a few days before.<sup>3</sup>

The Ambassador commented that on the day of his arrival in Ankara he had been received by President Bayar. The President had asked him to relate the international developments which had taken place since 1945 with particular emphasis on security arrangements. This the Ambassador had done in an expose which the President found very satisfactory but which led the latter to the principal point—despite all of these developments Turkey did not have any contractual assurances to protect its own security. The President had then shown the Ambassador a letter he had received from Zekeriva Sertel, who with his wife is very well known for his pro-Communist sympathies. In this letter, which advanced very strong arguments in favor of a policy of neutrality by Turkey, Sertel cleverly avoided an approach to the problem that could be clearly identified with the Communist line. His was the approach of a Turkish patriot, an approach that would inevitably appeal to many segments of public opinion, emphasis being placed on the inability of Turkey to count on its Western allies to protect its security. The President expressed the fear that, unless some definite action were taken soon to remove Turkish suspicions as to the support of the US and the other countries, Turkish public opinion would become more and more susceptible to the Sertel type of propaganda, particularly as it would be propounded on a nationalist basis and not on a pro-Communist basis. The Ambassador reiterated that official government circles would not be swaved by this type of propaganda but that less well informed elements might be impressed by it. The President had thus wanted him, upon his return to Washington, to inform us of this situation and to stress the importance of an early decision being reached on the security commitment question.

The Ambassador, adverting to this Government's favorable decision on further security arrangements, referred to the unfortunate impression that has been created in Turkey during the past several weeks by press reports from London and particularly by a BBC broadcast to Bulgaria which indicated that the British do not favor the further extension of the North Atlantic Pact. Mr. McGhee warned against drawing conclusions from such reports, stressing that the final governmental decision is the important factor. The Ambassador commented that even though the decision should be favorable, the Turkish people had lost a great deal of their earlier enthusiasm for inclusion in NATO and emphasized that the longer the uncertainty of inclusion continued the less satisfied they would be with the final outcome. He attributed this to several factors—one, the Turks have no confidence in the strength or determination of the European NATO countries, and, second, their national pride is being wounded by the indications that the other NATO countries are unwilling to admit the Turks to equal partnership in the NATO. He therefore expressed the hope that some decision would be forthcoming very soon and sought at some length to obtain an indication of the present views of the other NATO countries. Mr. McGhee commented that he was very hopeful of the outcome and that he knew the problem was being discussed in the Council of Deputies, although he did not know just where matters stood at the moment. He indicated in addition that it would not be appropriate for him to comment on the views of the other countries. The Ambassador could be assured. however, that we, too, were desirous of an early decision.

2. US Economic and Military Aid:

The Ambassador made clear that the ECA-Turkish Government relationship was not on a very satisfactory basis at the present time. He cited several examples, presumably quoting President Bayar, of ECA actions that had created a very bad impression: (a) a cut in ECA aid to Turkey because the Turkish Government had not imposed taxes on agricultural incomes, (b) ECA insistence that interest rates of Turkish banks not be lowered, a move which President Bayar had favored as a former banker and economist whose views should carry some weight, (c) a demand made by an ECA official that control of the Water Works Organization be transferred to the Eti Bank or ECA funds for irrigation projects would not be forthcoming. When asked by Mr. McGhee if the criticism had been directed at Mr. Dorr specifically or was directed primarily at ECA, the Ambassador said that no names had been mentioned. He had told the Prime Minister and the Foreign Minister that Mr. Dorr enjoyed the confidence of the State Department and ECA, and the Prime Minister indicated that the Turkish Government would of course work with him. The Ambassador implied, however, that the Government was very much concerned over the control which relatively minor ECA officials appeared to have over the economic life of Turkey and the fact that ECA had the final decision on matters where there was a difference in view between the Turkish Government and ECA.

Mr. McGhee said that he was of course disturbed to learn of this situation, that a program such as the ECA program should produce good relations between our two countries, rather than have the opposite effect. He would want to look into the matter further. He made quite clear, however, with respect to the volume of ECA aid, that there were many factors that led to the determination of the amount of ECA aid that could be made available to Turkey this year. There was no cut in aid because of the tax situation. There was, naturally, a real concern that all appropriate measures should be taken to avoid a harmful inflation in Turkey. This was a problem which ECA, consistent with its responsibilities under the ECA Act, would undoubtedly feel it should try to work out with the Turkish Government.

The Ambassador then commented on the inadequacy of our military aid to Turkey. Mr. McGhee expressed surprise, indicating he felt that we had been supplying a very substantial amount of equipment to Turkey and that the program had been a very satisfactory one. The Ambassador left with him a report by General Yamut, Turkish Chief of Staff, showing in chart form some of the major deficiencies which Mr. McGhee said he would study with interest. The Ambassador referred to a comment by Ambassador Wadsworth that a limiting factor in the volume of military aid to Turkey was Turkey's ability to absorb the equipment. Turkey, in the event of an aggression, would need to have available the maximum amount of equipment, not just equipment which it was able to put to effective use during the "cold war" period, and Ambassador Erkin urged that we increase and speed up our aid.

In taking his leave, the Ambassador stated that military aid matters had also come under the competence of the Foreign Minister and that he might therefore be discussing various aspects of this program with Mr. McGhee in the future.

TRADE BETWEEN TURKEY AND THE SOVIET BLOC IN THE LIGHT OF SECTION 1302 OF THE THIRD SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION ACT, 1951

nomic or financial assistance shall be provided to any foreign country which, after 15 days following the enactment of the Act, exports or knowingly permits the export of certain named categories of commodities to the Soviet Bloc during any period in which the Armed Forces of the United States are actively engaged in hostilities in carrying out a decision of the Security Council of the United Nations. In order to be eligible for economic or financial assistance each country must certify that after the prescribed period it has not exported or knowingly permitted the export of the prohibited items to the Soviet Bloc.

- 2. The Act requires that the Secretary of Defense certify to the Economic Cooperation Administrator a list of specified articles or commodities. The list in question was certified on June 5, 1951.*
- 3. The Act authorizes the National Security Council to make exceptions to the several provisions of Section 1302. Such exceptions are to be made only upon an official determination by the National Security Council that they are in the security interest of the United States.
- 4. Turkey received approximately $230 million under the ECA program through June, 1951. The foreign aid program for fiscal year 1952, currently before the Congress, contemplates the continuance of economic and financial aid to Turkey in support of its economic development and defense program.
- 5. Turkey's trade with the USSR and the satellite countries during the post-war years ranged between 8 and 12 percent of the total trade in each direction. In 1950 exports to the Bloc amounted to $18 million or approximately 7% of Turkey's total exports; imports from the Bloc were valued at $23 million or approximately 8% of the total imports. During 1950, trade with Czechoslovakia accounted for roughly half of these exports and imports, whereas trade with the USSR was negligible. Raw cotton, leaf tobacco, hides and skins, copper and valonia (tanning extract) were the principal exports. Smaller quantities of scrap iron, of manganese ore (of relatively low manganese content) and of chrome ore, both of which ores are in ample supply in the USSR, were also exported to the Bloc, chiefly to Czechoslovakia, Poland and Hungary. Some of these exports are among the items certified by the Secretary of Defense as falling within the categories set forth in Section 1302. In return for these commodities, Turkey received steel products, machinery, textiles and paper manufactures, all of which Turkey considers essential to its economy. Turkey does not permit the export of arms, ammunition, implements of war or atomic materials to the Bloc.

II. PROBLEM

6. In the circumstances, therefore, the National Security Council has been faced with the choice of deciding that all economic and financial assistance to Turkey should be discontinued or of deciding that aid to Turkey should be continued in the security interest of the United States by making an exception to the provisions of Section 1302.

III. DISCUSSION

- 7. It is the policy of Turkey to develop closer ties with the Western democracies. Turkey is already linked to the United Kingdom and France by a Treaty of Mutual Assistance concluded in 1939 and reaffirmed in 1949. Its relations with the United States have been traditionally friendly. Turkey is a strong supporter of the principles of the Charter of the United Nations, and has cooperated fully with the United Nations in its efforts to stop Communist aggression, sending a combat brigade to Korea which has been cited for heroism. Turkey's membership in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization is now under consideration.
- 8. The objective of Section 1302 was favorably received by the Turkish Government. For an extended period, Turkey has limited trade relations with the Soviet Bloc to a minimal basis.
- 9. Discontinuation of economic and financial aid to Turkey would diminish the resources with which Turkey could pay for goods bought from the West, might necessitate increased trade with the Soviet Bloc and might force Turkey to increase shipments of strategic materials to the Bloc. This would result in a decrease of the shipment of important minerals to the Western countries, which now receive over 95% of Turkey's mineral exports.
- 10. U.S. assistance to date has been primarily concerned with capital development, projects designed to strengthen Turkey's domestic economy, and to enable Turkey to participate more fully in collective security. Therefore, over and above the specific trade involvements are the contingent dangers of inducing dependence on the Soviet Bloc of a strategically located sovereign state with recognized defensive capabilities.
- 11. The security interest of the United States has been repeatedly recognized by the Congress, since its enactment of the Greece-Turkey Aid Program in early 1947, to require the maintenance of Turkish independence and territorial integrity.<sup>3</sup> Turkey has traditionally opposed Russian efforts to expand southward. Continued economic and financial assistance to Turkey is essential in order to further positively Turkey's ability both to resist Communist imperialism and to

IV. DETERMINATION

12. The National Security Council, in view of the considerations in Section III above, determines that it would be to the security interest of the United States to make an exception from the provisions of Section 1302 for Turkey.

v. INSTRUCTIONS

- 13. The National Security Council directs its Special Committee on East-West Trade to:
- a. Continue its examination of trade between Turkey and the Soviet Bloc.
- b. Seek additional cooperative measures, consistent with over-all U.S. national security interests, to prevent the movement of strategic commodities, particularly those in short supply in the free world, from Turkey to the Soviet Bloc with a view to making appropriate recommendations to the National Security Council.
- 14. The National Security Council directs its Executive Secretary to declassify this Council document. This declassified document will be submitted as a National Security Council report to the Committees in Congress named in Section 1302 together with the trade analysis called for by that Section. 5

According to telegram 84 to Ankara, August 3, 1951, the Department informed Ambassador Wadsworth that the NSC decision had been made public that day and that the Department had already informed the Turkish Embassy of this decision (461.829/8-351).

The Assistant Treasury Representative in Cairo (Ghiardi) to Judd Polk<sup>1</sup>

Cairo, September 15, 1951.

DEAR JUDD: The Ankara conference on military and ECA assistance, at which ECA/W, State, and OSR were represented, covered almost the entire range of problems encountered in administering the present ECA-Defense aid to Turkey and the contemplated step-up in the program of military support.<sup>2</sup> The agenda included everything from a discussion of U.S. defense and economic objectives in Turkey to procedural problems in creation and use of counterpart funds; in addition, the external financial and internal monetary and fiscal situation was very thoroughly discussed and some thought was given to the probable implication of Turkey's admittance to NATO.

At the close of the meeting, we attempted to put down on paper very briefly the main areas of agreement on the major topics discussed. When I left Ankara, this paper was still in the process of being cleared by Ambassador Wadsworth and Russ Dorr. I shall send you a copy as soon as I receive it.<sup>3</sup> In general, ECA's immediate objective has been, and will continue to be, the direct support of an expansion of the Turkish military program within the limitations of existing legislation. For some time, the Mission has already sought, wherever possible, to favor those economic projects which would also have useful byproducts in regard to the military program. The supplementary military program, which involves the training of career and specialist NCO's, the expansion of the Turkish army by 40,000 men, and provision of certain capital improvements to the Turkish military establishment, is estimated to require an expenditure of roughly TL 100 million annually, which should be supplied from the counterpart to be deposited against U.S. fiscal year 1951–52 grant aid. As you know, ECA undertook to finance these programs in April of this year. If a lower level of aid results from the bill now before Congress, then some reduction of the materials component will be possible.

The conference was held in Ankara, August 28–31, 1951.
Not printed; a preliminary draft of the paper, entitled "Conclusions Reached At Joint Conference, August 28–31, 1951," may be found in the Ankara Embassy Files: Lot 58 F 33: 501 Financial Matters General 1950.

In addition to the present military program, JAMMAT representatives outlined other possible areas where, with U.S. financial assistance, the Turkish military effort could be further increased. I am enclosing a memorandum from General Arnold which summarizes these points. Throughout the meetings, in the background and perhaps in the minds and sometimes implicitly in the discussions, there hovered the prospect that the U.S. Government would seek to secure additional military effort from the Turks, specifically possibly another brigade for use abroad and a step-up in manpower requirements under NATO. Inasmuch as the specifics as to number of men and equipment required are not yet known, it was practically impossible to assess the amount of aid which would be necessary to maintain stability in Turkey under such an expanded program.

One concrete result of these meetings was that the Mission was to make a genuine effort to get the Turkish Government to develop and implement a realistic total import program. As a matter of fact, the Turks have already been working on what they call an overall import program for the remainder of this U.S. fiscal year. Whether this new program represents any basic improvement over the "cooked up" program presented to the Mission last spring by Zorlu remains to be seen. The Turks, of course, maintain that their recent deficits under EPU are largely due to the trade liberalization provisions. I shall postpone discussion of EPU until my next letter, in which I will try to cover Turkish external and internal situation.

A large part of the Ankara discussions centered around the problem of counterpart, particularly as it affects the program in Turkey during the remainder of this US fiscal year. A complication in all discussions, of course, is the fact that present Turkish fiscal year ends February 29, 1952; hence, the lag in depositing counterpart is of extreme importance. The Mission stated that anticipated deposits and anticipated releases indicated that there might well be a deficit of roughly TL 40 million by the end of the Turkish fiscal year. Accordingly, the Mission explored with us the possible lines of action to overcome this deficit. Lines of action suggested were the following:

(1) The Turks should be urged to speed up procurement and speed up presentation of documents for reimbursement.

Not printed.

(2) To the extent that the Turks are on a reimbursable basis, they should be urged to switch to direct-payment procurement.

(3) Acceleration of counterpart deposits could be achieved by making retroactive allotments in the EPU during the surplus months to cover deficits incurred during the earlier months of the fiscal year. Allotments could be made during the surplus months and the Turkish account credited retroactively upon express instructions from ECA for any uncovered deficits during the earlier months of the fiscal year, these requiring the immediate deposit of counterpart. Since the approximate gap between anticipated deposits and suggested releases of counterpart is estimated at around TL 40 million, of which the release of TL 10 million could be somewhat postponed, the allotment of roughly 10-12 million in the EPU before the end of the Turkish fiscal year would appear sufficient to cover the shortfall in counterpart generation prior to February 29, 1952.

(4) Although the Turks have been willing in the past to proceed with various programs on the basis of a commitment that counterpart would eventually be released, both the Mission and the Embassy believe that they would be unwilling to have such obligations carry over the end of their fiscal year.

At the conclusion of the meetings it was agreed that ECA/W would look into the question of how counterpart deposit procedures could be improved in order to reduce the time lag in deposits; in addition, both ECA/W and the Mission will make a study of PA's to determine whether the problem was actually as serious as the Mission had anticipated.

The Mission estimated that roughly TL 440 million will be generated by the end of June 1952, of which only TL 363 million have been programmed for release. Furthermore, an additional TL 40 million is anticipated to be generated after June 1952 which have not yet been programmed. It is anticipated that the total program, including the balance of counterpart generated by U.S. aid but not yet programmed, would be developed for the entire Turkish fiscal year 1952-53, ending February 28, 1953.

Among the other interesting points which were discussed at the week-long meetings were general questions of strategy which might be followed to secure the maximum self-help by Turkey, a cursory examination of the Turkish dollar and EPU program, as well as some analysis of the investment program and methods for achieving maximum mobilization of Turkish resources consistent with the maintenance of internal financial stability. This last item was considerably mulled over after meetings by Ivor Olsen, Ted Hadraba and myself. Ambassador Wadsworth, in particular, is extremely concerned that U.S. aid be forthcoming to support the heavy Turkish military program to the utmost in order to avoid a disastrous inflation in Turkey. Inasmuch as the shortfall in the Turkish budgetary situation is now financed largely by Central Bank credit, any appreciable expansion in the Turkish military budget would have to be met largely from recourse to further deficit financing. The Turkish internal situation will have to be watched rather carefully in the ensuing months. In particular, it will be important to assess the inflationary impact of financing the deficit for Turkish fiscal year 1951–52, this deficit being estimated variously from TL 450 million up to TL 730 million. There is a large element of uncertainty in the Turkish budgetary estimates for TFY 1951–52, inasmuch as it appears improbable that the budget, as drawn up, includes expenditures for financing the government purchase of wheat and other items.

For your information, I append some information on the 95 per cent counterpart funds 5 and General Arnold's memorandum.

Sincerely,

JOHN F. L. GHIARDI

Subject: Your Appointment with Russell Dorr, ECA Mission Chief in Turkey.

I understand that Mr. Dorr is coming to see you at 4:30 this afternoon. He will probably touch upon a problem which has very considerably disturbed the Turks, but which appears to be resolved by virtue of action being taken today by ECA. Briefly, the factors are the following:

- 1. Turkey has been running very substantial deficits with the EPU during the first quarter of fiscal year 1952. ECA Ankara had been vigorously pressing for the Turks to draw up an import program for the year, which would include necessary military and other priority imports and which would give a clearer idea of the EPU deficit which was likely to result for the year as a whole. The Mission was also seeking to get the Turks to take vigorous measures to control this balance of payments problem.
- 2. ECA made available $12.5 million in July 1952 as an advance against the amount which Turkey would expect to get through EPU pp. 909 ff.

5 In telegram 512 from Ankara, December 7, not printed, Ambassador Wadsworth reported that the documents requesting the consent of the Turkish Grand National Assembly to terminate the trade agreement of 1939 had finally been approved by the Turkish Cabinet and were under committee discussion in the Grand National Assembly (394.31/12-751).

during fiscal year 1952. This advance was exhausted in July. In August the deficit was $9.8 million, which the Turks had to settle in gold (or dollars). In September the deficit was approximately $9.5 million. The Turkish Government made vigorous appeals to ECA for an advance of this amount so that it would not have to sell gold to balance the account.

- 3. The settlement date for the September deficit was October 22. As a result of somewhat encouraging evidences of Turkey's willingness to cooperate in drawing up a satisfactory import program and controlling payments, ECA Washington took an increasingly favorable view of the Turkish request. However, by the time all of the facts of the situation had been laid before OSR Paris, which had previously objected strenuously to the advance, the deadline had been reached and ECA was forced to tell the Turks that they could not make the advance.
- 4. Russell Dorr arrived in Washington yesterday. Further factors that have subsequently become known to OSR Paris and to Washington have resulted in ECA agreement to make an additional allotment of $9.5 million for EPU purposes. The Turkish Financial Counselor <sup>2</sup> is being informed this afternoon and Dorr may see Ambassador Erkin at three o'clock at some ceremony and may have the opportunity to inform him of the news. A letter is going to the Ambassador from Bissell, officially informing him of the allotment and, by implication, giving Dorr a great deal of the credit for the change in the ECA position.3 The letter comments on Dorr's report of the vigorous measures now being taken by the Turkish Government to adjust its expenditures to its resources and to the inclusion of military and other priority imports in their import program. ECA Washington is rather pleased at the outcome of this exercise as they feel it will give Dorr a great deal of credit with the Turks for accomplishing the change in its position and it will also indicate fairly clearly the importance of Mission recommendations in these problems which should be primarly fought out between the Missions and the local Government.
- 5. Ambassador Erkin is quite bitter against ECA at the moment as a result of the ECA turn-down several days ago and commented to Bob Moore yesterday that if he ever wanted to be sure of having something unfavorably considered, he had only to take it up with ECA. At that time he admitted that he had expressed his displeasure about ECA to Constantine Brown, which led to the latter's article in the Washington Star regarding "Turks Resent ECA Interference". Erkin expressed his regrets to Moore that Brown had written such an article.

Secretary's Letters: Lot 56 D 459: "Defense"

The Acting Secretary of Defense (Foster) to the Deputy Under Secretary of State (Matthews)

Washington, 10 November 1951.

My Dear Mr. Matthews: Reference is made to your letter of 28 August 1951, and to the inclosure thereto, requesting Department of Defense views regarding a proposed six-division increase in the size of the Turkish Army, contingent upon conclusion of a reciprocal security agreement with the United States and upon U.S. supply of the requisite equipment for the proposed increase in the size of the Turkish Army.<sup>1</sup>

The Department of Defense, after careful consideration of the Turkish proposal from a military standpoint, considers that it would be inadvisable for the United States to accept the Turkish proposal at the present time. Acceptance of the Turkish proposal at this time would necessitate placing Turkish grant military aid requirements in a position of higher priority than that accorded North Atlantic Treaty Organization members, an action which would be inconsistent with current U.S. strategic concepts. In addition, the admittance of Turkey to NATO membership is still subject to ratification by certain NATO governments, after which the establishment of Turkish force requirements can be accomplished under NATO procedures, and the scale of U.S. grant aid support of Turkish forces can be assessed accordingly. Hence it is deemed appropriate for Turkey to make the offer of the proposed increase in the Turkish Army as a contribution to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization forces, following Turkish admission to membership.

In summary, pending establishment of Turkish force requirements under NATO procedures, or the development of a more critical military situation in the Middle East area, the Department of Defense takes the position that U.S. assistance to the Turkish armed forces should be limited to the support of Turkish armed forces currently in being.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM C. FOSTER

NAC Document No. 1227

Subject: Proposed Additional Release of TL 81.5 Million in Turkish Counterpart Funds and Reprogramming of TL 71.4 Million from Previously Approved Programs.

Problem

It is proposed to release an additional TL 81.5 million for military production, construction, equipment, and material and to shift TL 71.4 million to this purpose within previously approved programs for the period ending 29 February 1952.

Discussion

Explanation of Proposal

The most recent NAC action with respect to Turkish counterpart was taken March 28, 1951, when a program was approved for the release of TL 165 million to finance Turkish investments through the close of Turkey's FY 1951–52. ECA has however considered it essential to cover out of counterpart during this Turkish fiscal year certain supplementary extra-budgetary military programs, totalling TL 72.9 million. Moreover, the Turkish Government has now requested the use of an additional TL 80.0 million in counterpart to finance military production, construction, equipment and matériel included in the current Turkish budget. It has proposed, however, that this latter amount be obtained in part by changing the composition of the previously approved counterpart program for the current Turkish fiscal year, of which a substantial portion has not yet been carried out.

The following plan has accordingly been developed.

a) The existing TL 165 million counterpart program will be scaled down to TL 93.6 million. The TL 71.4 million thus released would be applied to the TL 80.0 million program for military production, construction, etc. in the current Turkish budget.

b) The balance needed for the TL 80.0 million budgeted military program (TL 8.6 million) and the sum needed for completing the supplementary military program (TL 72.9 million) would be covered by an additional counterpart release of TL 81.5 million. This release would bring total releases for the present Turkish fiscal year to TL 246.5 million, and would substantially exhaust anticipated counterpart deposits.

Allotments of grant assistance requiring counterpart plus drawing rights requiring counterpart amounted to $155.9 million through 30 October 1951 (95% counterpart equivalent would be TL 414.7 million). If the presently planned minimum of $45 million ECA aid were provided this year entirely in the form of grant, total cumulative U.S. aid requiring counterpart would amount to $178.9 million (excluding Technical Assistance) of which the 95% counterpart would total about TL 476 million. The total of the first release approved by the National Advisory Council (TL 125.4 million) and the presently proposed amended release (TL 246.3 million) is TL 371.7 million. There will thus be accruals, additional to the total actual and proposed releases, from expected grant aid through June 1952, of TL 104.3 million. TL 100 million has been tentatively earmarked for supplementary military programs for the Turkish fiscal year 1952–53. NAC approval of this tentative release is not however being requested at this time.

The Turkish Government will give assurances that the most essential projects eliminated from the counterpart program previously approved for FY 1951-52, will be provided for from other funds. The

Turkish Government will also agree to include in its budget for Turkish FY 1952-53 an additional TL 30 million for military production.

Table 1 shows the changes which will be made by this proposal, Table 2 shows the cumulative total of proposed counterpart uses before and after this change, and Table 3 shows the cumulative total of expected specific releases through 29 February 1952.<sup>2</sup>

Financial Situation

Public financial operations during this Turk fiscal year will unquestionably involve a substantial excess of expenditure over tax revenue and other receipts from the public, though the precise amount is somewhat obscure. One approach to appraisal of public financial operations relates estimated consolidated General budget and Annexed budget expenditures plus counterpart releases not reflected in these budgets to known receipts from the public, including the surplus of the State pension funds and net borrowing from the public but excluding counterpart releases. This estimate indicates an uncovered deficit of about TL 470 million for the Turkish fiscal year ending February 29, 1952.* This balance is expected to be financed by use of loan and grant counterpart and central bank advances resulting in increased money circulation. It is clearly a major inflationary influence. The comparable figure for the previous year would be about TL 280 million.*

However, it appears that up to the present the inflationary influence of the public account deficit has been offset. Prices in Turkey have been astonishingly stable (see Table 4). Internal price indexes have risen very moderately over the last year and materially less than import and export price indexes.

It is not possible to determine precisely the relative importance of the factors making for this result, but it seems probable that the chief items are, first, the surplus of imports of current goods and services financed by foreign aid and by the use of foreign exchange reserves and, second, the increase in production and business activity in the country. There is no indication that there has been any private disinvestment, or reduction of the rate of private investment, though no comprehensive information as to this rate is available.

The Government of Turkey has furnished figures which would indicate that, during U.S. FY 1951, the import surplus as measured by the current payments deficit may have been about TL 165 million and estimates that in US fiscal 1952 it will be about TL 220 million. Turkish deficits with EPU this year from July to October totaled about TL 102 million compared to a cumulative surplus of almost TL 30 million for the same months last year, but this striking shift is certainly at least partly the result of the fact that seasonal exports moved very early last year and have tended to lag this year.

*Debt service for Turkey's fiscal year 1951/52 is given as TL 215 million as contrasted with TL 117 million in 1950/51. Under the assumption that the TL 98 million difference between these figures represents refinancing as opposed to interest payments, the TL 98 million has been added to the 1950/51 figure for comparability. [Footnote in the source text.]

The increase in production and business activity has been substantial. All-time Turkish records were established this year by grain and cotton production, and output of coal, chromite, copper and iron and steel will probably also reach new highs. The principal increase was in grain production which rose in value by about TL 350 million at present prices. Quite aside from this large increase in national production, there is probably a secular increase in the amount of money required in Turkey as the peasant subsistence farmers are more and more drawn into the market economy.

It seems likely that those two stabilizing factors have between them offset the inflationary pressure of the public financial deficit. It may be noted, however that no basis for complacency exists, for a recent joint study by the U.S. Embassy, ECA Mission and JAMMAT indicates that the prospect is that financial pressures are likely to increase somewhat in the next two years. Nevertheless, for the current Turk fiscal year it does not seem that the expenditures for which the additional counterpart releases are now proposed will produce important inflationary consequences.

Conclusion

Release of additional TL 81.5 million for military production, construction, equipment and matériel and a shift of TL 71.4 million to this purpose within the previously approved programs should be approved. This subject has been considered by a working group which concurs with this conclusion.<sup>3</sup>

*According to the NAC Files, in Action No. 506, December 4, the NAC had unanimously approved, via a telephone poll, the proposed release of LT81.5 million in Turkish counterpart funds and the reprogramming of LT71.4 million from previously approved programs. According to the records, the action occurred 2 days prior to the promulgation of Document No. 1227. The text of Action No. 506 was as follows:

&quot;The National Advisory Council advises the Administrator for Economic Cooperation that it perceives no objection to the release of an additional TL 81.5 million for military production, construction, equipment, and matériel and a shift of TL 71.4 million to this purpose within previously approved programs for the period ending February 29, 1952." CONFIDENTIAL PRIORITY ANKARA, December 21, 1951—6 p. m. 560. Re Deptel 527, Dec. 17. Necessity completing exchange MSA notes by Jan 8 stressed at FonOff Dec 21. FonOff feels strongly,

&lt;sup>1</sup> In telegram 494 to Ankara, December 10, not printed, Ambassador Wadsworth was instructed to report on the progress of the negotiations concerning the proposed exchange of notes between the United States and Turkey to amend the existing ECA and Mutual Security Defense Assistance Program agreements. (780.5 MSP/12–1051)

To enable Turkey to continue to receive aid from these programs, the existing accords had to be amended to bring them into line with the new requirements for aid eligibility drawn up by Congress and approved by the President on October 10, 1951, in the Mutual Security Act; 65 Stat. 373.

In an airgram of November 21, not printed, the Department had informed Wadsworth of these facts and had included a draft agreement for his use as the basis for an exchange of notes with the Turkish Government to obtain Turkey's compliance with the provisions of the Mutual Security Act (781.5 MSP/11-2151).

FonOff also takes exception draft note para four <sup>3</sup> it points out Turk currency not exportable under basic foreign exchange regulations and that utilizations 5 percent counterpart to purchase export commodities and international services wld be tantamount to maintaining counterpart fund in foreign exchange terms. Their attitude regarding assurance non-retroactivity as concerns 5 percent funds deposited prior July 1, 1951 is that prior July 1, 1950 substantial assistance to Turks has been in loan form and therefore more advantageous to certain other countries than to Turkey which only since July 1, 1950 has been on full grant dollar basis.

UNITED STATES POLICY TOWARD YEMEN<sup>1</sup>

611.86H/2-851

Policy Statement Prepared in the Department of State 2

SECRET

[Washington,] February 8, 1951.

YEMEN

A. OBJECTIVES

Yemen only recently began to emerge from its traditional isolation and to assume a normal place in the family of nations. It is an objective of the US Government to encourage this process and to establish a firm and lasting foundation for friendship between the two Governments. Since Yemen is a primitive country which needs development of all kinds, we desire to encourage its progressive and orderly advancement politically, economically and socially. The geographical position of Yemen, situated at the southern narrows of the Red Sea, gives it a certain strategic value which we wish to remain in friendly hands. It is in our interest that the independence of Yemen be preserved, but we should like to see rigid autocracy give way in time to a rising political consciousness among the people. We believe that: 1) education should be developed on a broader basis; 2) the standards of living should be improved; 3) Yemen's trade should be open to friendly western nations and its hard currency earnings should be available to Yemen rather than to Aden for use in dollar markets; 4) native industries should be improved; and 5) new industries should be started as Yemen's resources and potentialities become known. We should continue to encourage sound American enterprise to interest itself in Yemen and should seek to maintain equality of opportunity for such enterprise with firms of other friendly nations.

Department of State Policy (Information) Statements were concise documents summarizing the current U.S. policy toward, the relations of principal powers with, and the issues and trends in a particular country or region. The statements were intended to provide information and guidance for officers in missions abroad. They were generally prepared by ad hoc working groups in the responsible geographic offices of the Department of State and were referred to appropriate diplomatic missions abroad, under cover of formal instructions from the Secretary of State, for comment and criticism. The Policy Statements were periodically revised.

B. POLICIES

US policy has been criticized by some Arab countries during the past three years because of our attitude on the Palestine question. Yemen has never actively participated in these criticisms, but has remained reserved and generally friendly toward the United States. It is our policy to retain and cultivate this friendship by: 1) preventing where possible the spread of Communistic influences in Yemen and the Near East generally and promoting the stability of the area; 2) assisting in the orderly development of the economy and public welfare of Yemen; 3) giving friendly counsel as the occasion may warrant to all parties to any dispute involving Yemen and encouraging prompt solution of the controversy; 4) observing the utmost respect for Yemen's sovereignty, independence and local customs: 5) promoting the modernization of the country through Point IV assistance; 3 6) encouraging sound American enterprise to establish business and developmental interests in Yemen; 7) extending loan assistance on the basis of normal banking procedures; 8) disseminating American cultural media in Yemen and inviting Yemeni students and leaders to the United States; and 9) fostering philanthropic (but non-religious) enterprise of public interest. In all our efforts to carry out our policies in Yemen, we should be very careful to serve as a guide or partner and avoid injuring Yemeni sensibilities by appearing to dominate them.

1. Political

The assassination of the late Imam Yahya on February 17, 1948 and the brief usurpation of power by the rebel leader interrupted our recognition of Yemen accorded on March 4, 1946. The rebellion was suppressed, however, and the legitimate successor assumed the throne in March 1948 as Imam Ahmed. The United States offered recognition in return for his assurances that he would respect international obligations, including the US-Yemeni Agreement of Commerce and Friendship of May 1946. Oral assurances were given in Washington in January 1950 and recognition was accorded. A rapid improvement in our ties with Yemen has resulted. The Imam has asked for Point IV assistance and American medical aid.<sup>4</sup> A Chargé d'Affaires has just been accredited to the United States, and we intend to establish a resident Legation in Yemen when the location can be determined satisfactorily.

We have attempted to assist Yemen whenever possible, because of its lack of experience in international affairs and trained technicians, in much the same manner in which we have given our services to Saudi Arabia in this respect. We also wish to encourage Yemen's more active participation in UN affairs.

Yemen has been involved with the British over boundary disputes with the Aden Protectorate. The United States has remained impartial toward the settlement of these conflicting claims, but has encouraged their early solution in order to promote the peace and orderly development of the area.

2. Economic

Our economic policy towards Yemen is to encourage the general improvement of economic conditions in that country through development of its natural resources, improvement of the methods and means of agricultural and industrial production with a view to increasing production, and expansion of foreign trade. Hitherto Yemeni world trade has been small except for the export of coffee, hides and skins, some foodstuffs, and the importation of textiles and petroleum products. We should in general encourage Yemen to become an active member of the world community and in doing so to follow a liberal and non-discriminatory trade policy.

Although prospects of oil discoveries in Yemen appear to be remote, there has been much Yemen speculation, fed by persistent rumor, about the existence of significant oil fields in that country and in the adjacent Shabwa area of the Aden protectorate. While probably not of serious consequence, the conviction that Yemen, including the territory claimed by it, holds important petroleum resources serves to complicate Yemen's external relations, chiefly with Britain. Despite assurances to the contrary, the Yemeni are strongly suspicious that British interests in the disputed Shabwa area stem from prospects of exploiting oil resources there.

A survey of the area by an impartial (American) company would be likely to end speculation on the oil resources of both areas and contribute to the improvement of Anglo-Yemeni relations. Some thought might therefore be given to encouraging both the Yemen and British Governments to open these areas for exploration by any interested company as soon as this is possible. This would be consistent with both political and economic objectives of United States policy if it tended to encourage a rapid solution of border controversies and to the establishment of American business and developmental enterprise in Yemen.

The US policy on economic development assistance to Yemen is aimed at improvement of living standards as a means of providing political and economic stability. Yemen needs supplies and equipment for road building, harbor development, telecommunications, agricultural machinery such as pumps and tractors, and modern medical supplies and facilities. Yemen should be able to earn sufficient foreign exchange to make minimum purchases of these items by increasing its exports and by opening its mineral resources to possible exploitation.

Yemen's primitive culture and its elementary stage of economic development will allow only small amounts of investment capital to be absorbed initially. The United States should, therefore, encourage the Yemeni to undertake modest developments, such as improvement of agricultural techniques, highway construction, small irrigation projects, promotion of small industries, and expansion of public health and educational activities.

We are particularly interested in developing proper arrangements for facilitating Yemeni exports to hard-currency areas and thus enabling Yemen to increase its purchases of essentials from those areas. At present most exports go through Aden, and re-exports to the dollar area have resulted in dollar exchange for the sterling area rather than for Yemen itself which is allowed only 25% of its hard currency earnings through Aden.

If the country's exports can be further developed and if the Yemeni Government became willing to divulge the exact extent of their gold and silver holdings (sometimes estimated to be over 600,000,000 Maria Theresa thalers—about $300,000,000.00) and use it for loan security purposes, the United States may be in a position to support requests from Yemen for small development loans by the Export-Import Bank for projects or programs of economic merit, especially those which have been prepared by means of Point IV technical assistance. Yemen should be urged to put its holdings to work.

Under present circumstances it is hardly possible to negotiate with Yemen a more comprehensive commercial treaty than the very simple and limited Treaty of Friendship and Commerce which was signed at Sana'a on May 4, 1946.<sup>5</sup> However, if the hoped-for economic development in Yemen should occur and, in consequence, our trade relations with that country should develop, we should point out to the Yemeni officials, at the appropriate time, the advantage and desirability of negotiating a more comprehensive treaty.

United Kingdom

Since Yemen achieved its independence from Turkey in 1918, it has been dominated by British influence from nearby Aden which has controlled the bulk of Yemen's trade, a situation which has been distasteful to Yemen. Border conflicts have added to Yemen's distrust of the United Kingdom, The last serious incident occurred in September 1949 and resulted in a decision to confer in London in August 1950 to settle the boundary differences. The meeting was held August-October 1950 but was indecisive regarding boundary settlements since it provided only for setting up a fact-finding commission and did little to allay Yemeni cynicism toward British sincerity. An attempt was also made to end the diplomatic stalemate between the two countries. Yemen has refused to accept the credentials of the Governor of Aden as Minister to Yemen because it would exemplify to the latter the domination of its foreign trade by Aden, and the United Kingdom has thus far refused to accredit another minister. A Yemeni Chargé has now been named to establish a Legation in London and the UK is considering naming a new minister to Yemen.

Italy

In order to counter British influence Yemen sought close relations with Italy, its neighbor in Eritrea and Ethiopia across the Red Sea, before World War II. Italian political influence, trade, and cultural relations were strongly established. The defeat of Italy by the Allies, however, destroyed Italy's position and prestige in Yemen.

France

France has never enjoyed high esteem in Yemen, but its relations are satisfactory and are conducted by the French Minister to Saudi Arabia who is also accredited to Yemen. Saif Al Islam Abdulla, the titular Minister of Foreign Affairs, has spent considerable time in Paris and on the South coast and may personally be friendly disposed toward France. The French Banque de l'Indo-China at Hodeida is the only western banking institution in Yemen.

Israel

Yemen has had a substantial Jewish population for hundreds of years. They have lived as a segregated community in Yemen where they were allowed to follow a mode of life dictated by their religious beliefs and with a minimum of interference from the Yemen Government. Following the establishment of Israel as a sovereign state and as a result of the urging of Zionist organizations most of the Yemeni Jews elected to go to Israel. The Jews were allowed to emigrate from Yemen to Aden and thence to Israel, and the operation was virtually completed in September 1950 with the transfer of nearly forty-two thousand Yemeni Jews. Only about fifteen hundred Jews remain in Yemen.

USSR

Yemen maintains no relations with Russia.

Saudi Arabia

Yemen's relations with Saudi Arabia are very cordial. A firm basis for friendship was established by Ibn Saud in 1934 when he defeated the Imam but offered very generous terms for a peace settlement. The bonds then established were further strengthened in 1948 when King Ibn Saud supported Crown Prince Ahmed of Yemen when he was fighting to recover the throne from his father's assassin. Yemen accepts considerable guidance from Saudi Arabia regarding military affairs, the United Nations and in the Arab League.

Other Arab States

Yemen is an admirer of Lebanon, one of the most advanced Arab states, and has utilized the services of Lebanese in furthering its commercial relations with the outside world. It has similar sentiments toward Syria and enlisted the services of a Syrian to assist its delegation at the United Nations during the first session of Yemen's membership. It is reported that Yemen objects to Egypt's superior attitude in Arab circles.

Arab League

Although a full member of the Arab League, Yemen has taken little active part to date.

United Nations

Yemen became a member of the United Nations in September 1947. Its delegations have never participated in an outstanding manner in UN affairs, but have remained quietly in the background, largely due to inexperience, the language barrier and lack of instructions from home. Yemen usually votes with the other Arab states.

D. POLICY EVALUATION

Our position vis-à-vis Yemen has until the present time been almost consistently that of being "pursued" rather than "pursuing." Repeated overtures by Yemen from 1918 to 1945 for recognition were finally acknowledged and recognition extended in 1946. In deference to Yemen's isolation and general suspicion of the outside world, further development of our relations was left to Yemeni initiative. The resumption of US-Yemen relations in 1950 marked a notable development in closer ties. Yemen is now seeking development and medical assistance and better commercial relations, and has established resident diplomatic representation in Washington for the first time.

We desire to work as closely as possible with Yemen and to take every appropriate step to fulfill its requests. Care must be taken, however, to avoid too rapid advancement lest Yemen be frightened back into its traditional isolation.

Yemen, a primitive country without outstanding resources, has a long way to go to meet the economic and social standards and responsibilities of other nations, but it seems to have made its decision to do so. It also appears to look primarily to the United States for assistance in its efforts and we are anxious to give it every possible encouragement without urging it to overextend or overexpand itself.

Yemen lacks modern education facilities. Its educational system should be broadened to send students abroad for higher education in more advanced Arab countries and to invite teachers to Yemen from modern Arab institutions. Above all, the children of the Royal Family should be offered the benefits of western education to fit them for their later responsibilities.

Yemen is climatically the most favored part of Arabia. It has good rainfall, fertile valleys and plateaus, and a large and industrious population. It attained a high degree of culture and industry in ancient times and the same resources which supported that civilization are still available for modern development.

GENERAL POLICIES OF THE UNITED STATES TOWARD AFRICA 1

Paper Prepared in the Bureau of Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs<sup>2</sup>

SECRET

[Washington,] December 29, 1950.

REGIONAL POLICY STATEMENT ON AFRICA SOUTH OF THE SAHARA

1. ESTIMATE OF THE SITUATION

General

A. Today "Black" Africa is oriented toward the non-Communist world. Communism has made no real progress in the area, but continuation of this state of affairs cannot be taken for granted. French West Africa is the weakest spot. Conditions exist throughout "Black" Africa which would play into the hands of Communist agitators. The low standards of living of the natives, the attitude of white supremacy struck by some colonial officials and white settlers, and the disintegration of tribal authority are examples of these vulnerable areas. Nationalist Government policies have created serious tensions between natives, Asiatics, and whites in the Union of South Africa. These tensions could lead to passive resistance, violence or Communism and spread to other parts of the African continent.

B. The rise of nationalism, particularly in British West Africa, has made collaboration between metropolitan governments and their African colonies more difficult by undermining the confidence of the former in the security of their position. The metropolitan powers are making efforts to cope with this desire for autonomy. The United Kingdom is committed to a colonial policy designed to grant eventual self-government to its colonies, preferably within the British Commonwealth. France follows a policy of assimilation as Frenchmen and

pp. 1503 ff.

This is one of series of regional policy statements prepared in the Bureau of Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs during 1950. They were prepared by officers within the Bureau and were intended for the guidance of the Bureau and not for further distribution or use. A note attached to the source text indicates that this paper, marked "Fourth Draft," was given to Assistant Secretary of State McGhee, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State Berry, and African Affairs Director Bourgerie.

strives for development within the French Union. Belgium proceeds systematically with measures which eventually will raise the native standard of living to a level which in turn will generate a desire for successful self-government. Portugal maintains strict control from Lisbon over Mozambique and Angola, and apparently entertains no thought of anything but colonial status for these territories in the foreseeable future. Spain's colonies south of the Sahara are unimportant and this fact is reflected in a laissez-faire policy which concerns itself little with native welfare.

C. The Colonial powers are sensitive to any interest which the United States shows in their African territories. This sensitiveness stems from pronouncements made by American officials, especially, in recent times, and by our representatives in the United Nations, to the effect that we support the goal of self-determination and self-rule of all people. The metropolitan powers need reassurance from the United States that we are not purposefully working to bring about a premature according of political independence to the peoples of Africa. The position taken by the United States in recent UN debates on their African trusteeships has exacerbated the feelings of the colonial powers to the extent that this has become a source of irritation in their relations with us.

D. "Black" Africa is an important source of raw materials, particularly in time of war or even now when other sources in the Far East are diminishing. Manganese, cobalt, columbite, industrial diamonds, chrome ore, uranium, rubber, palm oil, asbestos, graphite, vanadium, mica, copper, tin, and many other materials of considerable importance to the United States are produced there.

E. For the masses in "Black" Africa agriculture consists of a low type of subsistence farming which precludes a decent standard of living and ruins the land. Improved methods are needed on this lowest level to increase production per man and to conserve the soil. The native needs more technical assistance from governmental and private sources before his standard of living can be improved through money crops. Notwithstanding the plight of the native, African farm products, such as sisal, wool, coffee, cocoa, palm oil and palm kernels, already play an important part in our everyday life. Those products are important not only to the United States, but also to the economy of Western Europe.

F. In many parts of the area inadequate transportation facilities and lack of skilled labor are factors which retard economic development.

G. American and other foreign capital is also required to develop Africa. While the climate for the investment of American capital is favorable in some areas there are other parts of Africa where investors find barriers raised, such as (1) rigid exchange controls which preclude repatriation of dividends or of the original investment; (2) suspicion of American motives; and (3) the feeling that American businessmen seek to supplant European business interests. A shortage of risk capital in the United States has also been a contributing factor in hampering further investment in Africa. At present total U.S. investments in Africa South of the Sahara are estimated to be at least $250,000,000, most of which is invested in South Africa and Liberia.

H. As has already been indicated, "Black" Africa is important for the supplies of strategic materials that may have to be obtained there in the event of war or where other sources of supply are denied to us. These strategic materials must not only be made available to the United States but must be denied the enemy. Thus the strategic value of Africa is increasing. In the event of war, an air route across Central Africa to the Middle and Far East would become very important as an alternate for the North African route. In addition our Navy would no doubt require bases and/or ship repair and supply facilities at such ports as Dakar, Monrovia, Freetown, Cape Town, Durban and Kilindini, most of which were of considerable strategic importance during the last war.

I. The gradual weakening of the economic ties of the European powers with their Far Eastern possessions and the need for rehabilitating their domestic economy has led these nations to look to the development of Africa as a means of strengthening their over-all economic and strategic position in the world. The United States supports this objective through ECA assistance and Point Four aid. However, in seeking to attain this objective there is a growing tendency for some European colonial powers to endeavor to monopolize colonial trade to the detriment of U.S. commercial interests.

U.S. Attitudes Affecting Implementation of Our Objectives

The American people interested in the future of Africa South of the Sahara have certain basic attitudes which influence United States policy:

(1) A realization of the contributions made by the administering powers in the development of Africa.

(2) A humanitarian interest on the part of religious and philanthropic groups in assisting in the religious and social advancement of the African people.

(3) Faith in the concept that the dependent peoples of the world can be assisted in progress towards ultimate self-government or independence by setting an example of the practical application of technology and American ideals of democracy.

(4) Belief that Africa has considerable resources, both existing and potential, which will be important to us in any future world conflict.

(5) A realization of the strategic importance of Africa in any future war, and consequently of the necessity for maintaining the friendship of the government and the peoples of Africa.

(6) Interest on the part of U.S. commercial enterprises in assisting in the development of Africa and in maintaining an "open door" for American trade and investment in the area.

(7) Sympathy on the part of the American Negroes for the aspirations of the native peoples of Africa.

(8) A strong desire to assume as few additional world responsibilities as possible.

2. AREA OBJECTIVES IN TERMS OF AMERICAN INTERESTS

It is in the national interest of the United States to achieve the following objectives in Africa:

(1) Social, political, and economic advancement of the people of Africa as rapidly as practicable to convince them that their individual and national aspirations can best be achieved through continued association with the free nations of the world.

(2) Political and economic stability sufficient to resist domination by unfriendly movements or powers through subversion or aggression.

(3) Development of mutual understanding and cooperation by the United States and the colonial powers on questions relating to colonial policy.

(4) Maintenance of our strategic interests, including access to strategic raw materials.

(5) Advancement of U.S. business interests, including the securing of nondiscriminatory treatment for U.S. nationals.

3. U.S. POLICIES

In the light of the foregoing objectives, U.S. policy towards Africa South of the Sahara should be:

(1) To cooperate with the responsible governments in the political, economic and social advancement of the people of Africa at the maximum practicable rate.

(2) To encourage, within the political context existing at the time, maximum tolerance and respect for the human rights and dignity of the African and Asiatic peoples in areas of white domination, and of white people in areas of black domination to the end that a harmonious pattern of coexistence between the races can be developed.

(3) To promote understanding on the part of the non-colonial powers of U.S. objectives and policies in the colonial field in Africa, as well as an understanding of the problems, responsibilities, and achievements of the colonial powers in Africa.

(4) To take all possible steps, in cooperation with the governing powers, to prevent militant Communism from gaining ascendance or control in any part of Africa.

(5) To lend our support, whenever appropriate, to the activities of the United Nations and its specialized agencies in Africa.

(6) To maintain and seek adherence to our rights under the Treaty of St. Germain-en-Laye and the Trusteeship Agreements.

(7) To seek the removal of import, exchange, and other controls not specifically approved by the United States, which act in restraint of normal trade; and to secure nondiscriminatory treatment for U.S. business interests in Africa.

4. GENERAL LINES OF ACTION

A. Political

(1) The conversations held in Washington in July 1950 with representatives of the United Kingdom, France and Belgium <sup>3</sup> demonstrated the benefits to be derived from an informal exchange of views on dependent area problems at the working level. The American Embassies at London, Paris and Brussels should indicate to the respective Governments that we regard favorably the calling of similar informal meetings in the future whenever there is a need to discuss dependent area problems of common interest.

(2) Procedures should be established with the United Kingdom, France, and Belgium for consultation between the delegations of the respective Governments before each session of the Trusteeship Council, the Special Committee, and the General Assembly.

(3) Informal efforts should be made to induce the anti-colonial powers outside the Soviet bloc to adopt a more temperate attitude in discussing dependent area problems, since continued misinformed criticism endangers the orderly development of these dependent areas.

- (4) As conditions warrant discussions should be held with the appropriate colonial authorities to ensure that security measures in the dependent area are adequate to prevent interruptions in the procurement by the United States and its allies of supplies of strategic materials in time of war or other emergency. The Consulates in these areas should be instructed to follow closely the situation and to keep the Department promptly and fully informed of conditions which may directly or indirectly affect the production and shipment of strategic materials from the dependent areas.
- (5) Make clear to officials of the Metropolitan Governments that as a corollary to our efforts in strengthening the countries of Western Europe we wish to cooperate with them in the orderly and progressive development of their African dependent territories and in maintaining the present political stability in those areas.

Consular officers stationed in the dependent areas should also be instructed to take similar action with respect to the local colonial officials.

- (6) Make every effort to dispel whatever suspicion the Metropolitan Governments might have that our actions are designed to bring about indiscriminate self-government in the African dependent areas.
- (7) Encourage the Metropolitan Governments to collaborate with each other in solving problems of mutual concern in Africa.
- (8) Continue to encourage and support the administering authorities in their efforts to curb Communist and subversive activities.

(9) Endeavor to bring about in the Department and other agencies of the Government a greater realization of the strategic and economic importance of the dependent areas of Africa to the United States.

B. Economic

(1) Instruct our offices in the area to be on the alert for violations of our treaty rights (St. Germain-en-Laye and the Trusteeship Agreements) and to make every effort locally to remove or minimize such violations. Unsuccessful efforts should be fully reported to the Department with a view to determining whether representations should be made to the appropriate metropolitan government.

(2) Continue to seek the removal or liberalization of such policies and practices of the colonial governments which discriminate against American trade and investment, and to make representations in instances where they tend to seriously hamper our trade and investment in the African dependent areas.

(3) Inform the appropriate authorities in both the Metropolitan countries and in the D.O.T.'s that restrictive economic and financial policies may give rise to unfavorable public reaction in the U.S., and that a more liberal policy would seem advisable if U.S. financial aid is to be continued.

(4) A realistic appraisal should be made by the Department of Commerce of the possibilities for and obstacles to American investment in the dependent Africa.

ment in the dependent African territories.

(5) Urge the colonial powers to liberalize their investment and exchange control policies in the African territories with a view to encouraging the flow of American investment capital to these areas to aid in their development.

(6) The Department of Commerce should continue its efforts to expand the U.S. market for commodities in which the African dependent areas are actual or potential producers.

(7) Continue to take all necessary steps, with the assistance of the ECA, to assure the continuance of the flow of strategic materials from the dependent areas to the U.S.

- (8) Cooperate with the ECA, within the limits of the Point IV-ECA Joint Agreement of September 20, 1950 concerning bilateral technical assistance during fiscal 1951, in developing technical assistance programs for the dependent areas so as to avoid overlapping or duplication of effort, and so as to coordinate such programs with the development plans of the areas in order that they may contribute to the attainment of the broad economic and social objectives of the Metropolitan Governments.
- (9) To do everything possible to insure the cordial reception of Point IV assistance in Africa South of the Sahara.
- (10) The Department should explore the possibility of having private American philanthropic institutions (e.g., the Rockefeller, Carnegie and Ford Foundations) assume responsibility for supplying technical assistance to supplement U.S. Government development projects in Africa under the Point IV and ECA programs.

D. Military

None

E. Informational and Cultural

- (1) Our information program should endeavor to reach the following groups (listed according to priority):
  - a. The local administering authorities.

b. The educated African elite.

- c. The illiterate and semi-literate Africans.
- (2) Endeavor to create in the minds of the officials and literate Africans a better understanding of American culture, techniques, viewpoints and policies. We should also provide both the administrative officials and the Africans with access to informational, educational, and technological facilities which can assist in the task of developing African countries.
- (3) Explain more fully our policies with regard to ECA and Point IV as they affect the development of dependent areas, as well as the relations of United States technical assistance to UN programs and objectives in non-self-governing areas.
- (4) Allay any suspicions the local authorities may have concerning the informational programs and convince them that our concern for the orderly social, political and economic progress of the peoples of Africa is consistent with our desire for the increased strength and stability of the metropolitan governments, and that any United States Government information program will be carried out only with the prior consultation of the responsible authorities.
- (5) Expose, wherever possible, the methods, practices and deceptive propaganda of Communism and describe both clearly and simply the truth about the Soviet-dominated areas of the world, and convince non-Communist fence-sitting elements that they should belong to and actively participate in the true democratic world community.
- (6) Correct misconceptions and misrepresentations regarding the United States, planted by Communists in their cold war of vilification of the United States and its so-called "imperialistic motives" regarding Africa.
- (7) Work in close cooperation with the local information services. We must, however, maintain our identity and freedom of action.
- (8) Explain the nature of United States economic and strategic interests, activities and policies in Africa and indicate ways and means by which these activities can operate to the mutual advantage of the United States, the various Metropolitan Governments, and the people of these African areas.

- (9) Whenever possible we should develop an educational and informational exchange program with Africa—by arranging for visits to the United States of officials, educators, businessmen, and technicians and by assisting American educators, technicians and specialists to go to Africa.
- (10) The information program should continue to utilize all the usual informational and cultural media, such as radio, press features, books, magazines, exchange of students and leaders, films and filmstrips, the emphasis varying in each area depending on the political climate. In general, however, films and radio are the best suited for reaching the mass of illiterate Africans while published material is most successful in influencing the two primary groups.
- (11) An effort should be made to institute an exchange of students program in the French, Belgian and Portuguese areas and to expand this program in British areas.

F. Administrative

- (1) A more careful selection of consular officers to serve in Africa should be exercised than in the past.
- (2) Whenever possible a Principal Officer assigned to one of the dependent areas should spend a short period of time at the capital of the Metropolitan country, before proceeding to his post, to enable him to become acquainted with officials in the Colonial Office and with officers in our Embassy who are working on colonial problems.
- (3) A Principal Officer assigned to the French and Belgian areas should have a fluent knowledge of French.
- (4) Whenever practicable, a junior officer, after having served a tour of duty in a dependent area, should be assigned to the American Embassy located in the capital of the Metropolitan Government administering that dependent area. In similar manner, a junior officer having served in the Embassy at the capital of the Metropolitan Government should be assigned to a consular establishment in one of the dependent areas of that country.
- (5) Officers stationed in dependent areas in Africa should be encouraged to travel as much as possible within the territory under their jurisdiction.
- (6) Consular staffs in the dependent areas in Africa should be augmented in order to meet the increasing demands for information on political, economic and social developments by the Department and other Government agencies and by the US representatives in UN bodies considering problems relating to the dependent areas.

5. COUNTRY LINES OF ACTION—LIBERIA 4

A. Political

- (1) Continue to render advice to the Liberian Government, upon request and voluntarily when deemed necessary, to assist it in building a sound democratic government.
- (2) Continue to offer guidance to the Liberian Government in its political relations with other states. In this connection, we should continue to make known to other powers, when necessary, our intention to intercede in Liberia's behalf to protect her independence.
- (3) Endeavor to bring about in the Department and other agencies of the Government a greater realization of Liberia's political, economic and strategic importance to the United States.

B. Economic

- (1) Continue to offer our help to further Liberia's economic development in a balanced and orderly manner.
- (2) Continue to work for the expansion of the activities of our Economic Mission in order that it can achieve the maximum results in the development of Liberia's natural resources.
- (3) While we favor increased private investment and commercial activity in Liberia by Americans, we should strongly impress upon those connected with new ventures the desirability of concentrating on a relatively small number of projects which directly relate to the economic development of Liberia, and are within their capacity to finance and to carry forward to a successful conclusion.
- (4) Assist the Liberian Government, in whatever way possible, to build and maintain a sound fiscal structure. The assignment of American financial experts to counsel the Liberians from time to time should be regularly pursued. The training of Liberian fiscal officials in our financial institutions, such as the Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve System, should also be encouraged.
- (5) Further the development of an effective national health service in Liberia by expanding our Public Health Mission to Liberia, and by making greater efforts to bring Liberian students to the United States for technical training in the field of Public Health.
- (6) Assist the Liberian Government in its efforts to improve the present poor state of education throughout Liberia. Increased numbers of American teachers at all levels of instruction should, if possible, be made available to Liberia.
- (7) Encourage and assist where possible additional numbers of Liberian students to come to the United States for training.
- (8) Emphasize to private American business operating in Liberia the importance of providing larger and better educational facilities for the children of their employees. Strong emphasis should be placed on the need for vocational schools at the sites of industrial operations.

D. Military

- (1) Assist the Liberian Government in its efforts to correct the shocking condition of its present military force. Our interests in Roberts Field, the newly-constructed Monrovia Port, Liberia's raw rubber and high-grade iron ore are ample justifications for assisting Liberia to build an efficient military force for internal security.
- (2) In addition to providing Liberia with a small military training mission we should endeavor to secure for Liberia small quantities of military equipment on a grant basis; continue to maintain Roberts Field, presently financed by the Department of the Air Force; prevent any type of activity or construction within the Port of Monrovia which would hinder in any way the use of the Port for Naval purposes; and continue to work with Pan American Airways and the Department of the Air Force to reconstruct (macadamize) the road connecting Roberts Field with the Port of Monrovia.

E. Informational and Cultural

- (1) Explain fully and clearly to the Liberians the nature of American cultural activities, and devise ways and means by which these activities can operate within the framework of Liberia's independence to the mutual advantage of the Liberians and us.
- (2) Encourage and assist American private interests engaged in educational and scientific activities in coordinating and strengthening their programs for development of progressive leadership in Liberia.
- (3) Assist the Liberian Government in the screening and selection of Liberians for study and training in the United States.
- (4) Render assistance in selecting responsible and competent American professional personnel for general educational work in Liberia.
- (5) Investigate the feasibility of establishing a comparatively strong radio station in Monrovia, for the purpose of expanding our broadcasting activities in West, Central and East Africa.

F. Administrative

- (1) Continue the new policy of making our staff in Monrovia truly representative of the American people, i.e., both Colored and White personnel.

The Consul General at Dakar (Plakias) to the Department of State

CONFIDENTIAL

DAKAR, January 19, 1951.

No. 156

Subject: Notes of the Consul General on ECA Inspection Trip to French West Africa, December 6-19, 1950

As the Department is aware, at the invitation of the ECA Mission to France, the Consul General accompanied a four-man ECA inspection party* from December 6 to 19, 1950 over some 5,000 kilometers of their trip through French West Africa. The principal points of interest visited included the capital and principal port of French Guinea, Conakry, its environs and a trip inland by rail to Kindia and return by road; the new port of Abidjan, the capital of the Ivory Coast, with side trips to Dabou, the ports of Bouet and Grande Bassam; Bobo-Dioulasso in Upper Volta from where we motored through Koutiala to Segou for a visit to the Office of the Niger. We returned to Dakar through Bamako, the capital of the Soudan. In effect, the trip described a circle which took us from Dakar southwest to French Guinea and the Ivory Coast, North to Upper Volta and the Soudan, and Westward to Dakar.

*The ECA party was composed of Messrs Gordon, Head of Mission, and Saxe of ECA/F, and Messrs Clemens and Hendricks of OSR. There were attached to the group Mr. Combier, of the Ministère d'Outre Mer in Paris, Mr. Bolle, Diplomatic Counselor to the High Commissioner of French West Africa, and the Consul General. [Footnote in the source text.]

Commercial air transport was used between distant points such as Conakry, Abidjan, Bobo-Dioulasso, and from Bamako to Dakar; while the shorter distances, side trips and local visits were often effected by American pick-up trucks.

The ECA aspects of the trip were interesting and instructive but as the ECA group will submit a report on these phases, this occasion was taken by the Consul General to pay particular attention, during the brief and cursory visits, to the following points:

1) Gain a general impression of the area visited,

2) Establish contact with the governors and ranking officials in the territories, and

3) The political scene.

I General Impressions

The newcomer on a short visit cannot fail to be impressed by the vastness of French West Africa; the distances between population centers; the primitiveness of the bulk of the native population; the variety of areas, ranging from the desert brush to tropical forests and vegetation; and the amount of effort, time and investment which it will take to develop this area in a material sense. FWA is, and for some time to come will continue to be, an area dependent upon agriculture. Mineral resources discovered to date are limited. Water power is generally at a distance from points of use and requires development; and the distances and terrain make transport an ever-present problem.

Despite these handicaps, developmental projects are in evidence, plans are being implemented and FWA is on the march. The present emphasis is, for the most part, on agricultural development and improvement of cultivation methods; the enlarging of certain ports such as Dakar, Conakry and Abidjan; road building; and the development of some mineral resources such as iron and bauxite in French Guinea. Progress is being made, though at times slowly, but then the financial and material resources and skilled manpower are also limited, and the physical and climatic difficulties are great. It will also be recalled that the beginning of the development of French West Africa dates from only the turn of the century, and that in 1946 the status of French West Africa changed from a colony to that of a member of the French Union with the rights of French citizenship conferred on the native African. Political consciousness is therefore scarely five years old, and the rights, privileges and responsibilities which citizenship entail are new to the African people.

Building was in evidence in all the capitals visited and the number of schools and public buildings under construction was impressive.

II Contacts Established

This trip gave the Consul General an opportunity to meet the governors of three territories, the ranking members of their cabinets and services, and to meet the directors and other officials of governmental and private organizations which are responsible for much of the important administrative and developmental work which is taking place in the territories visited. These personal contacts can but lead to better understanding and valuable sources of information with which to follow the development, progress and events in French West Africa.

III Political Scene

In each capital occasion was taken to have private visits with the respective governors and/or their chief subordinates for discussions of the political situation in their territories. Specific questions were raised on the importance, activity and danger of Communism which in French West Africa is carried on primarily through the RDA Party. In general it can be stated that all officials with whom these questions were discussed reported that the political scene was quiet. The RDA is said to have been losing members and strength for some time. The governors of Guinea, Ivory Coast and the Soudan indicated that in their territories the situation was under control; but that they were maintaining a careful watch over developments. They were unprepared to express opinions as to the manner in which the publicly announced disassociation of the RDA with the Communist Party in France would affect the local political scene, or whether this break was real or a political manoeuver. The situation as to the rapprochement between the RDA and the IOM was too fluid and uncertain to be judged, with no definite results having as yet become evident.

The distinct impression was gained that the governors are alive to the danger of Communism and are prepared to deal with the situation. Their efforts and manipulations appear to have been effective in reducing the predominance of the RDA in their territories in the last two years. While their methods have varied somewhat they have, in the main, encouraged opposition parties to the RDA which have shown membership gains and grown in importance and activity.

In summary, the political scene is quiet, with the authorities watchful and prepared to institute counter-measures to combat Communist activities.

The net influence of Communism in the territories visited appears to have decreased in the last year and Communist activity is quiescent.

The travel and other arrangements made by the French West African and the Territorial Governments for the group to inspect points of interest were on the whole well done and permitted the group to see the maximum in the limited time at their disposal at each place. The receptions accorded us everywhere were cordial and every effort was made for the comfort and convenience of the party, within the means available to the local authorities.

From the standpoint of this Consulate General, it was most useful for the Consul General to have the opportunity to visit and obtain first-hand knowledge of a part of the vast territory which is included in this Consular district. It was of great benefit to have the occasion to meet personally the governors and ranking officials in the areas which were visited. There is no question that more frequent and personal contacts should be effected between officers of this Consulate General and the governors and officials in the territories within its jurisdiction.

Mary McLeod Bethune of the National Council of Negro Women to the Acting Officer in Charge of West, Central, and East African Affairs (Sims)<sup>1</sup>

Washington, February 14, 1951.

My Dear Mr. Sims: I would like to suggest to you that a small commission be established to study the participation of Liberia and Nigeria in the Point Four program—to look into the condition of the women and children of these areas.

I would like to see, in that commission, a person of some vision—who could readily visualize what is needed; a person of humane experience who would know what to look for in order to point up situations needing adjustment—expansion, correction or elimination—in the program now being administered.

With the view of stimulating the participation of women and children, and the development of their possibilities, commission personnel would need, of course, to work very diplomatically and with insight and understanding, with the native governments, themselves, evaluating their policies and concepts for our own information, and offering helpful but unobtrusive suggestion where the time and place seemed propitious. Such friendly and informal contacts should enable us to discover how our own government may help to strengthen the efforts of these native governments.

There would need to be a real spirit of inspiration given out through the commission—a spirit of real friendship and real kinship. With the kind of discovery and interpretation that should result from the work of such a commission, we feel that we can greatly strengthen our own government in its vigorous program among the African people, by returning to this country and dramatizing significant findings, with due regard for the restraints of security and diplomacy.

In order to do this, a group of possibly three people would be needed; one who has had experience and has vision and the confidence of the mass of the American people, and spiritual understanding and undergirding that will find its way through to the bottom levels of the peoples in the countries visited; a second member of the commission should be a good writer and research person who knows the important from the unimportant and who could set up the commission's findings fully and clearly, and with the accurate interpretation and documentation that is needed; there should also be, attached to the commission, a good photographer to provide skillful pictorial documentation that would give life and vigor to the findings.

Now, Mr. Sims, I may be dreaming, but I have always been a great dreamer, whose dreams have, fortunately, materialized in constructive ways. It may be that they develop into useful action because they have, as their goal, the opportunities through which all mankind may live a fuller life.

If my country, because of my record, could use me, some time, in such a capacity, I should be very happy to serve.<sup>2</sup>

Sincerely yours,

&quot;Mr. Sims of my office has brought your letter addressed to him on February 14 to my attention. I have purposely delayed replying to your letter until such time as I could consult with the various Officers here in the Department concerning your proposal to send a commission to Africa to appraise the assistance which we are rendering to certain African territories under the Point Four Program.

&quot;It is the consensus here in the Department that it would not be wise to send such a commission to Africa at this time, due to the fact that the Point Four Program is not sufficiently advanced to determine its benefits to the African peoples. I believe you will agree that it would be better to wait until such time as the Program has had an opportunity to achieve some concrete results before consideration is given to a commission of the type which you suggest.

&quot;However, please be assured that we appreciate the ideas which you have advanced and we will be glad to consider them at a later date." (870.00 TA/2-1451)

The Attaché at the Embassy in the United Kingdom (Tibbetts) to the Department of State <sup>1</sup>

CONFIDENTIAL

London, March 20, 1951.

No. 4456

Subject: Recommendations of the Recent Session of the CCTA (Commission for Technical Co-operation in Africa South of the Sahara).

An officer of the Embassy has been given a summary of the recommendations adopted at the recent session of the CCTA which was held in Lisbon during the end of January.<sup>2</sup> The recommendations have not yet been approved by any of the member Governments of the Commission nor by the Colonial Office. It is necessary, therefore, that the fact that the Embassy has been informed of the nature of these recommendations be held in strict confidence.

Of particular interest were the recommendations on the following points:

- 1. Scientific Council for Africa South of the Sahara. The Commission recommended that a meeting should be convened in London of representatives of the Governments who sponsored the establishment of the Scientific Council for Africa to discuss the form and content of the instrument establishing the Council and to clarify the relationship between the Council and the Commission. It was suggested that this meeting should also consider the question of correspondence by the Scientific Council with other organizations and agencies and with the United States Scientific Attaché in South Africa, when appointed.
- 2. Inter-African Labor Bureau. It was noted that the member Governments agreed in principle to the establishment under the auspices of the CCTA of an Inter-African Labor Bureau. A working party of representatives of member Governments is to meet in London next week to draw up proposals for terms of reference, budget and location of the bureau.
- 3. African region of the World Health Organization. The Commission recommended that the South African Government be invited to instruct its representatives at the World Health Assembly to be guided in discussion concerning the establishment of an African Regional Office by a memorandum, the text of which is enclosed.<sup>3</sup>
- 4. Inter-African Malaria Bureau. Note was taken of a proposal by the French Delegation for the establishment of a Malaria Bureau. The appointment of a working party to draw up detailed proposals is to be considered by the member Governments. In this connection a suggestion of the Portuguese delegation for the establishment of an African Health Bureau under which would be grouped the present and future activities of the Commission relating to trypanosomiasis, malaria and other endemic diseases was also noted by the Commission and the Portuguese delegation was invited to elaborate its suggestions in a memorandum for future consideration.

5. The adoption of a unified procedure in connection with the submission and examination of the budgets of the technical bureaus was recommended. (The Foreign Office states that throughout the entire meeting the United Kingdom pressed consistently for economy in each technical bureau.)

6. The draft budget of the permanent Inter-African Bureau for tsetse and the trypanosomiasis was considered and suggestions made for a reduction. The need for economy was stressed by all delegations except the Belgian and French delegations who expressed doubts as to whether the Bureau would be able to function usefully if further reductions were made in its establishment. The next session of the Commission is to consider a statement showing the effects on the functions and operations of the Bureau of possible further reductions in the present budget of 1,650,000 francs (Belgian).

There is also enclosed a copy of the report by the Transport Committee to the CCTA on the question of continuing collaboration among the Governments concerned in the field of inland transport in Central and Southern Africa.<sup>4</sup> It will be noted that the Transport Committee recommends a further transport conference in about two years time and the establishment of a Secretariat charged with preparing the work of the next conference. It will be further noted that Mr. Marshall Clarke, the Secretary General of the existing interim organization, is to be invited to be Secretary General of the new Secretariat. The Foreign Office doubts, however, whether Mr. Clarke will be willing to accept this post since the new Secretariat has very limited powers.

The discussion on the question of Italian-Ethiopian-Liberian membership was not incorporated in the records of the conference since if any of these Governments ever does become a member it would be highly embarrassing for their representatives to read the minutes of the discussion which preceded their joining the Commission. As the Department has already been informed, no progress was made towards inviting any of these Governments to become members of the Commission.<sup>5</sup>

MARGARET JOY TIBBETTS

The Director of the Office of African Affairs (Bourgerie) to William D. Moreland, Consul in the Consulate General at Dakar 1

SECRET OFFICIAL

Washington, April 23, 1951.

My Dear Mr. Moreland: In pursuance of our responsibility for maintaining and building sound relations with Africa, we have been engaged in a study to determine what additional assistance might be rendered by your office to help keep us currently informed on general conditions in French West Africa, which, in the event of war, will help to guide us in creating or altering our policy toward FWA. In embarking upon this approach we would like to pass on to you our concept of Africa's position in the present world picture, and submit some suggestions for reporting on local conditions which govern the economic progress and political stability of your district.

Africa today is fundamentally identified economically and politically with the Free World Democracies—countries aligned against Communism. As a member country of this bloc, our immediate and long-range policy is how may we perpetuate this fundamental relationship and prevent any deterioration thereof which would lead to a conflict between the African peoples and the Free World, be it ideological or physical. It is imperative that the individual and collective efforts of the anti-Communist countries be so organized as to insure that Africa will remain firmly fixed in the political orbit of the Free World.

Today, the American people, particularly responsible officials of Government and industry, have a greater appreciation of Africa than at any time in our history. The American public is becoming increasingly aware that Africa provides a sizable proportion of the critical commodities now required by the Free World, including such products as uranium, copper, chrome, cobalt, manganese, iron ore, tin, industrial diamonds, bauxite, asbestos, rubber, fats and oils, sisal, hides, and hardwoods. As a result of the last war, more Americans than ever before now realize the strategic military importance of Africa to the Free World. Africa's geographic position in relation to Europe and the Near East and in relation to the Americas and Southern Asia places it in the category of one of the most important strategic areas in the world. Because of its geographic relation to European and Near Eastern defense, the North Africa region is militarily the most important of the African areas. The Red Sea and Gulf of Aden area, the

East Africa Zone, the southern tip of the continent and the West Africa bulge above the Gulf of Guinea each bear an important relationship to vital transportation and supply routes and systems of defense. Each of these regions also serves as a shield for the protection of the inland area where the bulk of the strategic commodities are produced.

The European Colonial Governments, as you so well know, regard their African territories as essential to their military security, economic well-being and political position in the world community. Since these Governments have lost most of their Asiatic possessions, Africa is more important to them than ever before. Three-fourths of Africa's inhabitants are under their control, while the sovereign countries of Africa are largely dependent upon Western Europe and the United States for their security and advancement.

No one should doubt for a moment that the Soviet directorate is unaware of the importance of Africa to the Free World. Since an aggressor usually gains advantages by initiative, we must constantly be on the lookout for the Soviets to accelerate their efforts to weaken Free World prestige and control in Africa, with the objective of ultimately including African territories and countries in the Soviet bloc. We must never forget that the anti-colonial feeling in certain African territories constitutes a formidable problem for the Free World because all of the Colonial Governments are aligned on the side of the Free World. Such a condition facilitates rather than militates against Soviet encroachment. It is absolutely necessary, therefore, that the Colonial Governments exert efforts greater than heretofore to weld a loyal link between the African peoples and themselves. Our own position in this vitally important matter, stemming from our leadership role in the Free World, must be one of encouragement. This encouragement must not be in the sense of weak or strong support of African Nationalist aspirations, but encouragement in the sense of convincing both colonial and native that the road to survival is one of well-balanced economic and political development with emphasis on the rights and privileges due the dignity of man. It is the defects in the last condition governing rights and privileges which the Soviets have exploited so successfully in other world areas. In our opinion the challenge that faces the Free World in Africa is what can be done to insure the unwavering loyalty of the African to the cause of Freedom as we perceive it.

Proceeding on the premise that it may not be possible to avert a general war with Russia, we would like for you to submit a report which would serve as a synthesis of the current economic, social and political conditions in your district. Such a report should not be voluminous, but should contain pertinent data sufficient in detail to enable the Department to have ready access to reliable information on the most salient economic, social and political features of the FWA.

This report should in no way supplant the schedule of required reports established for your office. The following outline is offered as guidance for points of focus in preparing a current synopsis on the economic, social and political conditions in your district, with emphasis on measures which would help to create African loyalty toward the Free World. We know that you have already submitted reports on some of the topics listed below, and in preparing your synthesis you may refer to such reports or preferably give a brief summary of the report.

Economic

An assessment of the French West Africa's economic war potential such as:

- a) best estimates of mineral resources
- b) best estimates of timber resources
- c) best estimates of industrial capacity
  d) agricultural development, both for food and industrial use
- e) hydro-electric development
- f) transport facilities—lines of communication

Basic reporting on individual products should be continued, and if at all possible should be accelerated. But what we have in mind when we speak of assessment is a concise report or series of reports showing the best estimates of FWA's resources, with the Consulate General's own description of specific difficulties and problems now prevalent against expanding present mineral, agricultural and industrial production. For example, what conditions facilitate or hinder the supply and training of labor? Are the food requirements adequate for native consumers? Are consumer goods an important factor in increasing native production? What is the attitude of the local government and private companies toward FWA's economic war potentials? Both official and private industry opinions are highly important. Does the major portion of local official opinion follow the Home Government's present attitude toward economic development? If not, what are the principal differences?

Social

What is the French Government's present policy toward improving social conditions of the natives?

a) Trends toward urbanization, detribalization and the assimilation by Africans of Western living standards.

b) To what degree is social unrest accentuated by adoption of Western living standards?

c) Describe efforts, if any, being made by both the French West African Government and private enterprises to improve housing in urban and industrial centers.

d) What is being done to meet the health, recreation and welfare needs of enlarged urban and industrial populations? What could be done?

e) How can the social unrest normally attendant upon the dislocation and mobility of native populations be offset or contained?

f) Are local government and private enterprise leaders alert to the possibility of riots and disturbances arising out of labor difficulties, such as detribalization and increased contacts and competition among ethnic and racial groups?

g) Based on the best local advice, both official and private, what measures and procedures would be best to cope with ill-adjusted social conditions?

Political

An analysis of present political conditions with emphasis on issues likely to be created by a war situation.

- a) Description of present political policies as practiced by the French Government in FWA.
- b) What is the present political mood of the urban and rural African in FWA?
- c) Description of local parties and movements, with biographic sketch and your best appraisal of leaders.
- d) What would be the impact on the local government and the native population if France were overrun by an enemy?
- e) Description of subversive activities or potentially subversive individuals, organizations, or movements.
  - f) What is Soviet influence, if any on native or European groups?

As stated at the outset of this letter, the foregoing are only suggestive subjects. If you so desire you may revise the outline to conform more appropriately with conditions peculiar to your district. If, in your opinion, a subject warrants extensive treatment, you may find it desirable to handle it as a separate report.

The formulation of a sensible policy toward your district can be done only in conjunction with your assessments and appraisals. With or without a general war, our main objective in FWA is to secure the maximum use of its resources and keep the territory firmly within the political orbit of the Free World.

With kindest personal regards,

Sincerely yours,

E. H. Bourgerie

Memorandum by the Acting Labor Adviser, Bureau of Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (Handley), to the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (McGhee)<sup>1</sup>

CONFIDENTIAL

[Washington,] April 30, 1951.

The following is a summary of a memorandum (attached) I prepared on a meeting held with Mr. Harold Snell, Assistant to the President, United Transportation Service Employees, CIO, about his observations as a member of the ICFTU West African Mission:<sup>2</sup>

- 1. The trade unions in West Africa are in general weak and immature. With assistance from the ICFTU, however, they can become very important factors in West African affairs.
- 2. The British have done the best job in encouraging trade union development. This was particularly true in Nigeria where the trade unions were the most promising of all in West Africa. British labor officers, taken from the British trade union movement and working through the various labor departments, were actively assisting the infant trade union movement.
- 3. In the Belgian Congo, only Europeans were at present permitted to establish trade unions. Despite this, the Belgian Socialist trade unions were planning to carry out an organizational drive among native workers. The Belgian Government, while strongly opposed to native trade union organization, was at the same time carrying out and fostering commendable social schemes, particularly in the way of workers' housing.
- 4. Trade union development in the French territories were along ideological and religious lines, similar to those followed in metro-

"A meeting was held on Friday, April 13, 1951, in the NEA Conference Room to hear from Harold D. Snell, Assistant to the President, United Transport Service Employees, CIO, about his experiences and observations on his trip to West Africa as an American member on the ICTFU Mission. Representatives from NEA, NEA/P, AF, E, P, UND, DRN, ECA, and the Labor Department were present. Mr. Snell first of all traced the itinerary of the ICFTU Mission through West Africa. The Mission, which was divided into two groups, traveled through French West Africa, Sierra Leone, Liberia, the Gold Coast, Nigeria, French Equatorial Africa, and the Belgian Congo. The two groups rejoined each other, and together with representatives from the countries visited, held a regional trade union conference in Douala, French Cameroons, from March 5 to March 7. This conference, the first of its kind ever held in Africa, was considered by Mr. Snell to have been a success. Based on it he had every hope that the ICFTU Executive Committee would approve the idea of establishing a regional center for West Africa. The locus of this center was undetermined at the moment, however, and would be left to the judgment of the Executive Committee."

Regarding the ICFTU mission to West Africa, see also the circular telegram of January 16, p. 1210.

politan France. The communist-controlled CGT was the strongest and was probably doing the best job.

- 5. There were no trade unions in Liberia. Wages paid by Firestone were, with the exception of the French Cameroons, the lowest paid in Africa, beginning at 25 cents a day. Firestone was, however, carrying out very elaborate social programs. There was no device whereby Firestone workers could discuss their grievances or working conditions with management. In view of the belief in West Africa that Liberia was an American colony, he recommended that the United States Government exert its influence on Firestone and the Liberian Government to raise wages and permit trade union organization.
- 6. He had high hopes that the influence of the WFTU in West Africa, although strong, could be dissipated by the ICFTU. He thought that West Africa offered a unique opportunity for the ICFTU to take the initiative.
- 7. The USIS program has been good but could be made more effective if greater contact were made with African intellectuals and trade union leaders.
- 8. Our diplomatic and consular people were not circulating sufficiently among Africans.
- 9. He was strongly critical of the invitation that had been extended to Mr. Couzens, the Commissioner of Labor in Nigeria and a British civil servant, to visit the United States on a leader specialist grant.
- 10. He recommended that a small, carefully designed program to bring prominent West African trade unionists to the United States be developed.
- 11. He recommended that, as a minimum, the United States station a labor attaché in Lagos, with regional coverage, and preferably assign labor reporting officers at Dakar and Accra as well.

Editorial Note

In an address delivered on June 27 before the Institute on Contemporary Africa at Northwestern University, Evanston, Illinois, George C. McGhee, Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs, discussed Africa's role in the "free world." McGhee spoke of the Communist threat to Africa, the preparations for self-government by African peoples, recent political developments in British West Africa, economic development programs sponsored by the European powers, Economic Cooperation Administration aid to the African dependencies, and American assistance through the Point Four program. McGhee said in part:

"Immediate independence is, however, not the cure for all colonial problems. The United States Government has always maintained that premature independence for primitive, uneducated peoples can do them more harm than good and subject them to an exploitation by indigenous leaders, unrestrained by the civil standards that come with widespread education, that can be just as ruthless as that of aliens. Also, giving full independence to peoples unprepared to meet aggression or subversion can endanger not only the peoples themselves but the security of the free world.

"It is, however, the traditional policy of the United States to support orderly movements toward self-government. We have followed with interest, therefore, the efforts of the various European governments over the years to promote the political, economic, social, and educational advancement of the peoples in African territories and the spread of genuine African nationalism. African nationalism derives in part from the acute nationalism prevalent in other parts of the world and, in part, is a reaction to foreign propaganda against colonialism. It is also derived, however, from an emerging belief that Africans as such must stand together."

The Ambassador of the Union of South Africa (Jooste) to the Secretary of State <sup>1</sup>

Washington, 11th July, 1951.

The Ambassador of the Union of South Africa presents his compliments to the Honourable the Secretary of State and has the honour, by direction, to inform him of the following.

In the event that the security of the African Continent is threatened by aggression from the North, it will be necessary to move troops and military supplies on the lines of communication between the Middle East and the south of Africa. During the late war certain difficulties arose over such movement and it is therefore most desirable to ensure

In a note dated July 17, the Secretary of State informed the South African Ambassador that the United States accepted the invitation to attend the conference scheduled to be held at Nairobi (770.5/7-1151).

Regarding the conference, see the editorial note, p. 1227; and telegram 14, August 25, from Nairobi, p. 1228.

¹This note was delivered at the Department of State on July 11 by South African Embassy Counselor Basil Jarvie. Jarvie, accompanied by British Embassy First Secretary R. H. Belcher, called upon Messrs. Raynor and Shullaw of the Office of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs to extend an invitation on behalf of their governments for the United States to be represented in an observer capacity at the forthcoming African Defence Facilities Conference at Nairobi. Jarvie, who confined himself to a discussion of arrangements for the conference, indicated that the United States was the only country invited to send an observer to the conference. (Memorandum of conversation by Raynor, July 11, 1951: 770.5/7–1151) The text of the invitation to governments participating in the conference was sent to the Embassy in the United Kingdom under cover of a brief explanatory aide-mémoire from the South African High Commissioner in London on July 10; copies of those documents were transmitted to the Department of State as enclosures to despatch 190, July 11, from London (770.5/7–1151) that in any future emergency the facilities for the movement of troops and military supplies throughout that area are kept at the highest level of efficiency and that any unnecessary obstacles are eliminated. With this object in view, the Government of the Union of South Africa and the Government of the United Kingdom believe that it would be of value to take steps now to facilitate communications in time of war between the following states and territories situated in or near the east and central parts of the continent:—

South Africa

Egypt

Ethiopia

Southern Rhodesia

The Sudan

French Somaliland French Equatorial Africa

Madagascar Angola

Mozambique

 ${\bf Belgian\ Congo}$

Somalia

Northern Rhodesia

Nyasaland Tanganyika Kenya

Uganda Zanzibar

Somaliland Protectorate

The Governments of the Union of South Africa and the United Kingdom have therefore decided jointly to convene a conference of African Powers, which, they believe, will share the view that the closest understanding should exist between them regarding the practical problems involved in the movement of military forces and supplies in the circumstances visualised. They propose that the conference should be known as the "African Defence Facilities Conference" and that through the hospitality of the Government of Kenya it should be held in Nairobi, beginning on the 20th August, 1951.

The Governments of the Union of South Africa and the United Kingdom have considered in detail the problems which might arise in the event of war and they have prepared the attached list of subjects which they propose should form the agenda of the conference. As will be seen, most of the subjects listed are predominantly technical and such as to give rise to problems largely of a practical nature, and will be of equal interest to the civil and military authorities of the Governments and Administrations concerned. The purpose of the conference will be to secure agreement in principle on the matters under discussion, leaving the detailed implementation of its recommendations to be worked out later by the authorities of the various countries concerned.

The Governments of the Union of South Africa and the United Kingdom have pleasure in extending an invitation to the United States Government to send an observer, or observers, to the proposed conference, to which they are jointly inviting the Governments concerned.

The two Governments feel that the conference, if successful, will make an important contribution to the security of the African continent.

If the United States Government wish to send an observer, or observers, to the conference, the Governments of the Union of South Africa and the United Kingdom would be glad to be informed as soon as possible in order to enable accommodation arrangements to be made in good time. Owing to the restricted nature of the accommodation available at Nairobi, the participants are being requested that the number of delegates and advisers be kept as small as possible.

Editorial Note

Representatives of the Governments and African administrations of Belgium, Ethiopia, France, Italy, Portugal, Southern Rhodesia, the Union of South Africa, and the United Kingdom met in Nairobi, Kenya, August 21-31, for the African Defence Facilities Conference. The Conference, convened by the Union of South Africa and the United Kingdom, sought to reach agreement in principle on the facilities required for the movement of troops and supplies on the lines of communications between the south of Africa and the Middle East in time of war or emergency. The United States accepted an invitation to send observers to the Conference (see note of July 11 from Ambassador Jooste to the Secretary of State, page 1224). The United States observers were Angus Ward, Consul General at Nairobi; Colonel John J. Davis, Army Attaché at the Embassy in South Africa; and Colonel Edwin A. Bland, Air Attaché at the Embassy in South Africa. Egypt declined an invitation to participate in the Conference, presumably because Egypt was not prepared to participate in any conference with the United Kingdom unless British troops were withdrawn from Egyptian soil. For Consul General Ward's report on the opening session of the Conference on August 21, see telegram 14, August 25, from Nairobi, infra. Ward's 12-page despatch 69, September 5, from Nairobi constituted a summary account of the work of the Conference and its Land Transport, Steering, and Sea Transport Committees which Ward observed. (770.5/9-551) Ward assumed that Colonels Davis and Bland would report to the Department of Defense on the work of the other Committees (Air Transport, Telecommunications and Mail Facilities, and Movement of Personnel and Supplies). Copies of the official Report of the African Defence Facilities Conference, document ADF (51) 13, August 30, 1951, and the attached recommendations of the six Conference Committees, comprising 26 pages in the source text, were transmitted to the Department of State as an enclosure to despatch 68, September 3, from Nairobi. (770.5/9-351) A copy of the official report was formally delivered to the Department of State under cover of a note of November 19 from South African Ambassador Jooste to the Acting Secretary of State. (770.5/11-1951)

Joint Weeka No. 10, September 7 from Pretoria, reported that the Nairobi Conference ended with all the participating countries in unanimous agreement on the points discussed. The Conference's recommendations were to be put before the various participating governments for approval and implementation. The facilities for implementation were to be discussed at a subsequent conference. South African Defense Minister Erasmus expressed high hopes for the future of Africa through the conference, and he informed the American attachés who served as observers at the conference that he was most pleased with progress and results reached. acts limited to making recommendations to respective govts. Scope limited to need for interchange info on existing and projected transportation and telecommunication facilities and to principles governing reciprocal use these facilities for northward movement supplies and personnel in time of war. Adjournment on or before September 1 possible.

Belgians realistic regarding possibility military need these facilities, but passive except in air transport and telecommunications.

Ethiopians completely passive and mute.

French realistic like Belgians and constantly advocate suppression all other considerations in time war to that of furthering war effort. Are somewhat active in sea transport affecting Madagascar, and more active in land and air transport, and telecommunications on African continent. They indicate anticipation that any unrealistic Nairobi recommendations on use African facilities may and probably will be set aside in time war by major power decisions at high level.

Italians passive other than in movement of supplies and personnel, and occasionally infer NATO and other high level bodies will in end establish principles governing use African facilities.

Portuguese strongly indicate anticipation their belligerency or benevolent neutrality in case war. They anticipate slight wartime use by selves of their African facilities but extensive use these facilities by other powers. They are exerting every effort to avoid escapable financial obligations and to obviate economic disturbance by others. They evidently want no foreign troops or avoidable foreign installations in their African dependencies and repeatedly indicate expectation full compensation for use their facilities, etc., by others.

Southern Rhodesians not subservient to either South Africa [or] UK.

They indicate aversion having their civil administration or internal economy domineered by military in time war. Beyond any wartime manpower obligation, they anticipate their primary wartime role being that of supplier raw materials and of transit channels of troops and military supplies.

East Africans and Northern Rhodesians are integral part of UK delegation in thinking and actions. UK actively interested in having all seaports, anchorages and airports being made reciprocally available on most favorable basis. UK constantly endeavors take safeguards looking toward minimum disturbance trade and internal economy by wartime activities. There has been almost complete reciprocal support between UK and SA.

South Africans are prime mover in conference and use every opportunity to influence it toward facilitating northward movement their troops and supplies with maximum cooperation by others. They vigorously oppose any attempt by others to bring mention of NATO agreements into discussions. [Ward, Bland, and Davis.]

870.00R/9-1051: Despatch

The Consul at Salisbury (Roberts) to the Department of State

RESTRICTED

Salisbury, September 10, 1951.

No. 43

Subject: Local Attitudes and Reactions to ECA Aid Programs in Central Africa.

ECA aid to Central Africa has been limited to the following principal projects: £5,000,000 loan to the United Kingdom and Government of Southern Rhodesia from counterpart funds for purchase of additional rolling stock and equipment for the Rhodesia Railways; £3,000,000 loan to the Chibuluma Mines Ltd. to develop high grade copper-cobalt ore deposit near Kitwe; £500,000 grant to the Northern Rhodesia Government to improve the Great North Road from Broken Hill to Tunduma. Aid in smaller amounts has been granted for technical assistance programs in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland and to Rhodesian Copper Ventures Ltd. for exploratory work in the newly discovered Southern Rhodesia copper fields.

The communiqués announcing the three major projects were published in the two leading Southern Rhodesian newspapers, "The Rhodesia Herald" and "The Bulawayo Chronicle", which reach the greater part of the European population in the three Central African territories, and also reach the greater part of the native population which has sufficient education and understanding to appreciate what ECA aid is. Publicity to these projects was also given in smaller newspapers and journals and over Radio Salisbury.

In general the announcement that these funds were being made available for development purposes was well received; however, there has been some criticism of the use of funds from the United States for development purposes. Despatch No. 271, May 23, 1951 enclosed an editorial from the Rhodesia Herald, May 22, 1951, which commented on the announcement that OEEC was preparing a ten-year development program for British, French, Belgian and Portuguese territories in Africa. It frankly states that with the lack of understanding of the situation in Africa by those living outside Africa and the strings that will more than likely be attached to any dollar loan, a country such as Southern Rhodesia might be compelled to think twice before accepting it.

Sir Godfrey Huggins, Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia, and the Hon. G. A. Davenport, Southern Rhodesia Minister for Mines and Transport, have both commented on the strings or conditions attached to American loans, especially for Railway development. Because of these strings a proposed ECA Railway survey in Southern Rhodesia and Portuguese East Africa was cancelled and the two Governments have employed an independent United States engineering firm to make the required survey.

There is enclosed <sup>2</sup> an editorial published in the Rhodesia Herald of July 21, 1951 with respect to obtaining the necessary money to proceed with the Kariba Gorge hydro-electric project. The editorial quotes Mr. Whitehead, Minister of Finance, as saying: "It would be sad to see the financing of development in the Commonwealth pass across the Atlantic to any considerable degree." The editorial also comments on the article which appeared in the English journal "Truth" which describes the ECA loan of £5,000,000 as the start of "taking over the Empire" because of provisions attached to the loan which it felt implied a detailed supervision of the Central African economy by ECA.

While this criticism is not generally held, there is a small school of thought which believes all money for development of Central Africa should come from British sources and that ECA loans or even the investment of private American capital in Central Africa is a means of American penetration into this part of the world, and eventually Central Africa will be lost as an integral part of the Empire.

There is another and more general school which believes that Central Africa must be developed, regardless of where the funds come from. They would prefer it if the funds did come from United Kingdom sources but if they are not forthcoming they welcome American capital, whether from Government or private sources.

There is also transmitted as enclosure No. 2 <sup>2</sup> an editorial which appeared in the Rhodesia Herald on July 7, 1951 which demonstrates the point just made. It underlines the fact that American investment in Central Africa is not being supplied on a strictly charitable basis, but that the United States will benefit from such investments by obtaining increased raw materials which are in short supply in the United States.

In summary, press, radio and unofficial sources approve of ECA Aid for the development of Central Africa. As indicated above, Southern Rhodesia official opinion is somewhat reserved in its desire to have large-scale American investments in Central Africa. For reasons set out in this despatch it is not believed that a general publicity campaign with respect to ECA aims and projects would be of any value; in fact it might have just the reverse effect and would possibly increase the number of people who look on American investments in this part of the world as being made for ulterior purposes.

Memorandum Prepared in the Department of State 1

[Washington, undated.]

U.S. Assistance to Agricultural Development in Africa

As is the case in other areas of the free world, the United States is interested in and has been helping to facilitate the economic development of Africa. The United States believes that the sound development of Africa is in the interest of all other areas of the free world in as much as the strengthening of the African economy will necessarily contribute to the welfare of the entire community of free nations. The United States is cooperating in the economic development of dependent overseas territories of European countries in Africa through the Technical Assistance Program and the Overseas Development Program administered by the Economic Cooperation Administration.

A number of the Overseas Development projects in Africa are for road building and land reclamation. The first objective of these projects is to raise the standard of living of the local populations, and only

&quot;In accordance with our conversations, I have the honor of transmitting to you herewith a memorandum with regard to United States programs of technical and economic cooperation in Africa and other areas of the world outside of the Western Hemisphere, with particular regard to the possible effect of such programs on Brazil.

&quot;The enclosed memorandum has been approved by the appropriate officials of the Department of State, including the Technical Cooperation Administration, and of the Economic Cooperation Administration so that the Memorandum may be taken by you as representing the policy of the United States Government."

Miller's letter indicates the memorandum printed here was cleared with TCA, NEA, and ECA.

Brazilian criticism of United States aid to colonial African territories had been the subject of a conversation between Assistant Secretary of State Willard L. Thorp and Brazilian Ambassador Mauricio Nabuco on April 20, 1950. During that conversation, Nabuco "implied that the United States was being both short-sighted and unfair in neglecting Latin America while giving aid to African dependent territories which are competitors of Brazil in the export of raw materials." Thorp's reply to Nabuco was that Brazil seemed to have "an exaggerated and mistaken idea of our aid to Africa and pointed out that the metropolitan countries do not welcome any direct participation of the United States in their territories. Direct aid can go only to Liberia, the Union of South Africa and Ethiopia." (Memorandum of conversation by Randolph A. Kidder, Officer in Charge of Brazilian Affairs, April 20, 1950: 870.00.4–2050) at a later stage of development will products move into export in competition with products from established sources. Specific mention is made in the projects of the Overseas Development Program of plans for increasing the production of meat, rice and sugar, but no mention is made of coffee or cocoa. Officials of ECA with whom the matter has been discussed state that assistance to agricultural projects is being limited, increasingly, to those which contribute directly to the defense program by developing local food supplies for workers engaged in strategic materials production in isolated areas.

The United States has given no financial assistance, either through the Technical Assistance Program or the Overseas Development Program, to any project designed primarily to increase the production of coffee in areas outside the Western Hemisphere. Should projects looking to such assistance be proposed by non-Western Hemisphere countries they will, of course, be considered on their merits. It is the intention of the Government of the United States, however, in the administration of its programs of economic and technical cooperation in the different areas of the world to coordinate the administration of these programs with the objective, among others, of giving full consideration to the interests of established producers of specific commodities and avoiding excessive production of such commodities.

OFFICIAL INFORMAL [WASHINGTON,] November 8, 1951.
PERSONAL CONFIDENTIAL

DEAR ED: I am sure that by the time you receive this letter your buoyant spirit will have rebounded from the rather low point it had reached when you wrote to me on September 26.2

[Here follows a paragraph dealing with personnel matters at the Embassy in Liberia.]

While I feel that we should constantly strive to do a better and better job in all parts of the world, I cannot agree with the sentiment expressed in your letter that Africa is being neglected, and especially Liberia. Few countries in the NEA area, regardless of size and importance, have received more of our attention than has Liberia. I am sure that when you stop to think about it further, you will realize the great amount of personal attention which the problems of Liberia have received from the level of the Secretary right on down through the Department.3

It is true, as you say, that it has often been difficult to interest good people in assignment to Africa, but any generalization overlooks the fact that we have succeeded in getting many first-rate people to accept assignments in this area. We consider it quite a feather in our cap that we have you as one of our representatives in Africa. Sam Sims, fortunately, is not lost to us but goes to Salisbury to strengthen our field force. In Nicholas Feld, we feel we have a most capable replacement for Sam on the regional desk here in Washington. On the Liberian desk, I would certainly not hesitate to measure Garland Farmer against any of the capable young political desk officers in the Department. Al Bourgerie, in spite of the difficult problems of North Africa, has still found time to give a great deal of his attention to the affairs of Africa South of the Sahara.

For a long time NEA has realized the need for strengthening our posts in Africa South of the Sahara. Unfortunately, the Budget Bureau and Congress, faced with demands for decreasing Government expenditures, have not seen fit to meet our requests for additional personnel. As a matter of fact, we have taken a heavy cut this year. During the past year Al Bourgerie has made strenuous efforts to improve the quality of the personnel assigned to African posts, but many difficulties were encountered. Our North African posts are now well staffed, but we are still not completely satisfied with the situation in your part of the world. You must appreciate, however, that there simply are not a sufficient number of top-notch FSO's, FSR's and Staff Corps to meet all the demands of the Service.

I agree that our experience with Consul Generals in Dakar has been unfortunate, but I believe we now have a capable and experienced officer at this post. Bloom is on his way home and the Department is assigning William E. Cole, Jr., a senior FSO-4 with a very good record, to Accra as Consul.

The TCA program, like any new operation, has had its growing pains, but you can rest assured that whenever the Liberian program was involved, Oscar Meier and his people have been on the job to see that Liberia got her share of attention. As a result of this effort, the Liberian TCA program is at this time the most advanced of any in the NEA area.

As you probably know, NEA was given a comparatively small sum of money in 1951 for Point IV assistance to Africa. Since certain ECA funds were available to the DOT's (See attached statement of ECA Contributions to African Development 4), we felt that it was desirable to allocate the major portion of available funds to the countries of Africa which received no ECA aid, namely, Liberia, Ethiopia, Libya and Eritrea. Small allocations were made to the DOT's, but only the British evinced any real interest in this program. Belgium, Portugal and France have never concluded a Point IV agreement with this country. In the absence of an agreement no Point IV funds can be made available. As you can appreciate, we cannot force a country to accept Point IV assistance. Under the new arrangement for 1952 all technical assistance to the DOT's will be handled by ECA.

We have just sent you a cable (Deptel 139, Nov. 2 5) asking for your recommendations on the 1953 foreign aid program. I am particularly interested in having your views on the last paragraph of this cable. As you know, we tried unsuccessfully last year to get Congress to allow us to use the balance of the harbor funds for replacing the inadequate bridges on the Monrovia-Ganta road. Oscar Meier has suggested that we include the high-type road between the harbor at Monrovia and Roberts Field but I am skeptical of our ability to justify it against other more pressing needs. However, I would be interested in having your suggestions on this or any other projects of this nature.

You speak of the need for a Truslow in Africa. As you know, we have recently enlisted the help of the Budget Bureau in supplying or securing an expert to come to Liberia to set up appropriate budget controls in accordance with the plan communicated to you.

Information selected for inclusion in the "Current Foreign Relations" is selected by the Executive Secretariat on the basis of timeliness and current interest. Several articles on North Africa have appeared in this publication, but the volume of "hot news" from Africa South of the Sahara is somewhat limited.

Here in the States we are endeavoring to stimulate more interest in African affairs. This summer a very successful course on Africa was held at Northwestern University. I delivered the opening address 'which has been given wide publicity, and Departmental officers participated in the program. Recently Al Bourgerie and Oscar Meier assisted the School of Advanced International Studies of Johns Hopkins University to set up a two-day Executive Conference on Africa South of the Sahara. About thirty businessmen and some twenty Government officers took part in the meeting which was very successful. A summary of the Conference is enclosed.<sup>8</sup> In addition, AF officers have been participating in round table discussions on Africa in Washington and in other parts of the country.

These examples, I am sure you will agree, prove that we are not neglecting Africa South of the Sahara and the A in NEA remains a capital A in our efforts here.

We are still trying to persuade the Air Force to agree to permit Aero Services to send their Shoran equipment to Liberia. I will write you again on this subject when I have more definite information on the views of the Air Force.

With best personal regards, I remain

Sincerely yours,

George C. McGhee

Memorandum by the Acting Deputy Director, International Security Affairs (Ohly) to the Director, Office of Military Assistance, Department of Defense (Scott)

TOP SECRET

Washington, January 11, 1951.

Subject: Ethiopia and Military Assistance.

Our Embassy in Addis Ababa has been approached repeatedly in recent months by the Emperor of Ethiopia and his representatives concerning the possibility of military assistance.<sup>2</sup> Little encouragement has been given to such requests because of the question regarding eligibility of Ethiopia under Section 408(e) and the doubtful value of that country's contribution to the over-all effort even though arrangements could be made for a modest program. However, it is important that we retain the good will of the Emperor who always has been a good friend of the United States.

As a means to that end, the Office of African Affairs of the Department of State has concurred in a recommendation from the Embassy that a high ranking American General arrange to visit Addis Ababa in the near future. In addition to displaying American interest in Ethiopia it is felt he could explain to the Emperor our conception of Ethiopia's role in the defense of the non-Communist world and particularly to dissuade him from military expenditures beyond the capacity of his country. It is hoped that such a visit might ward off a repetition of pleas for military assistance which would be embarrassing to both countries.

I should appreciate the views of the Department of Defense concerning the desirability of the proposed visit and what might be involved in making necessary arrangements.

JOHN H. OHLY

Policy Statement Prepared in the Department of State 1

SECRET

Washington, March 1, 1951.

ETHIOPIA

A. OBJECTIVES

The objectives of United States policy toward Ethiopia are: (1) the maintenance and improvement of friendly, cooperative relations between the United States and Ethiopia; (2) the prevention of Soviet or Communist influence over Ethiopia, and the maintenance of Ethiopia's orientation toward the United States and western Europe; (3) the effective establishment of stable administration in the areas under Ethiopian sovereignty; (4) continued support by Ethiopia of the principles of collective security and international cooperation with respect to the United Nations; (5) the settlement of differences and the establishment of cooperative working relations between Ethiopia and adjacent territories, especially with respect to tribal migrations, undemarcated boundaries and the development of natural resources; (6) the balanced and orderly development of the economy of Ethiopia; and (7) the progressive development on an entirely cooperative and voluntary basis of United States and other foreign economic enterprises and cultural, missionary and political influences of benefit to the long-term interests of the people of Ethiopia.

B. POLICIES

The friendly relations which existed between the United States and Ethiopia prior to the Italian occupation were greatly strengthened as a result of our policy of nonrecognition of the Fascist conquest and have continued since the restoration of the Emperor in 1941. Relations between the United States and Ethiopia were improved also when, by mutual agreement in 1949, the two governments raised the status of their respective missions in Addis Ababa and Washington from Legation to Embassy.

Since the end of the war there has been a tendency on the part of certain Ethiopian officials to base much of their thinking on international questions on their claims to two former Italian colonies, Eritrea and Italian Somaliland. Since Ethiopia will have access to the sea as a result of the decision by the General Assembly of the United Nations to federate Eritrea with Ethiopia, it may be considerably easier in the future to reach amicable understandings with Ethiopia in regard to other matters.

¹Department of State Policy (Information) Statements were concise documents summarizing the current U.S. policy toward, the relations of the principal powers with, and the issues and trends in a particular country or region. The statements were intended to provide information and guidance for officers in missions abroad. They were generally prepared by ad hoc working groups in the responsible geographic offices of the Department of State and were referred to appropriate diplomatic missions abroad, under cover of formal instructions from the Secretary of State, for comment and criticism. The Policy Statements were periodically revised.

In Ethiopia today, the foremost political and economic problems include governmental inefficiency and corruption, an undercurrent of opposition to certain key members of the government, the practical implementation of the UN decision to federate Eritrea with Ethiopia,2 strong opposition to and fear of Italian trusteeship over Italian Somaliland,3 irredentist demands, and French control of the Djibouti-Addis Ababa Railroad.

Political. The most immediate problems confronting Ethiopia in the field of foreign relations concern the resumption of diplomatic relations and the settlement of outstanding problems with Italy, the resolution of certain frontier questions, and the improvement of Ethiopia's production for international trade, which may involve some foreign assistance. Ethiopia's claim to both Eritrea and Italian Somaliland was considered by the Deputies of the Council of Foreign Ministers and on September 15, 1948, the question, as part of the Italian Colonies problem, was referred to the UN General Assembly in accordance with the Treaty of Peace with Italy. When the General Assembly was unable to reach a decision in May 1949, the matter was postponed until the next session which, on November 21, 1949, decided to place Italian Somaliland under Italian trusteeship for ten years after which it is to become independent. At the same time the General Assembly postponed the final decision on Eritrea by establishing a UN Commission to investigate the territory and report to its 1950 session. On December 2, 1950, the UN General Assembly approved a resolution providing that "Eritrea shall constitute an autonomous unit federated with Ethiopia under the sovereignty of the Ethiopian Crown."

The UN Trusteeship Council unanimously approved a draft trusteeship agreement for former Italian Somaliland at its Geneva session in January 1950, and the Italians assumed provisional administration of the territory on April 1, 1950. The UN General Assembly finally approved the trusteeship agreement on December 2, 1950.

Ethiopia's border and jurisdictional difficulties with British and French Somalilands are under negotiation among those governments. An important interest of the United States in these negotiations is to see that the rights of the Sinclair Petroleum Company to develop petroleum in Ethiopia are not infringed by territorial adjustments among those powers.4 The British have assured us that if agreement is reached on a proposal to cede to Ethiopia a corridor to Zeila in British Somaliland in exchange for a considerable section of southeastern Ogaden, to be annexed to British Somaliland, the rights of Ethiopia and the Sinclair Company to the sub-soil resources in that part of the Ogaden transferred to British Somaliland will remain in effect. It is understood that the French have withdrawn their objection to this proposed exchange on condition that any proposal to build a railroad in the area ceded by the British will require the consent of the French. The three governments will probably reach no immediate decisions on the matter, which may await the conclusion of new treaties between the governments concerned. The most serious boundary problem is Ethiopia's undemarcated frontier with Italian Somaliland. The Ethiopians had refused to recognize Italian trusteeship of Somaliland and to participate in the settlement of that boundary until their claims to Eritrea had been satisfied. However, both Ethiopia and Italy accepted a resolution adopted on December 15, 1950, by the UN General Assembly calling for the delimitation of this boundary by direct negotiations between Ethiopia and Italy or, at the request of either party, by mediation with a UN Mediator to be appointed by the Secretary-General of the UN.

When the British Army began the reconquest of Ethiopia in 1941 a modified form of military government, set up in agreement with the Emperor, was introduced in each Province as it was retaken. In 1942 this administration was brought to an end but a number of British troops remained in the country. Under a treaty arrangement of 1944 the British continued to occupy part of the Ogaden Province in southeastern Ethiopia. In September 1948, by agreement with the British, the Ethiopians reoccupied part of the Ogaden Province. This agreement was followed in October by a resumption of operations in the vicinity of Wardere by the Sinclair Petroleum Company, but to date their drillings have not struck oil and the company is not sure what the prospects for finding oil may be in that area. The reentry of Ethiopian troops into the Ogaden Province was successful. There have been no acts of hostility on the part of the Somalis against either the company or the Ethiopians. The United States will continue to take the position that the Emperor should make and carry out satisfactory arrangements for an adequate division with the Somali leaders and people of any royalties on petroleum which may be obtained from the Ogaden. Coupled with an increased supply of water provided from wells drilled by Sinclair, such an income is needed by the Somalis as well as the Ethiopians if that area is to make any appreciable progress.

Military. For the past few years Ethiopia has been desirous of obtaining from United States military or surplus stocks a considerable quantity of arms and ammunition. This material is desired to strengthen internal order and to standardize the equipment of its armed forces. Also, the Ethiopians are apprehensive because an Italian administration has been reinstalled in Somaliland and because the Italian armed forces there are using considerable quantities of American equipment and have even paraded tanks and jet fighters along the border of Ethiopia. Thus far Ethiopian efforts to obtain United States equipment have not met with success.

One result of Ethiopia's disappointment in this regard was that it turned to European sources to satisfy its military needs. In 1948 the Ethiopian Government contracted with Czechoslovakia for the purchase of a small arms factory and certain other equipment. Recent reports indicate that the factory is now under construction and that a number of Czechoslovak technicians are in Ethiopia supervising its construction and operation. Early in 1949 the Ethiopians also made an arrangement with the UK whereby the British supplied 10,000 rifles and 1,000,000 rounds of ammunition from their Middle East stocks. Munition supplies were also sought from Sweden, Canada and Belgium.

Early in 1950 the Ethiopian Government requested the Department's assistance in procuring military aircraft for the use of its Air Force.<sup>5</sup> Despite repeated efforts made to meet this request, it did not prove possible to do so. The Ethiopians are still interested in obtaining aircraft and we are continuing to keep them informed whenever planes of the type or types in which they are primarily interested become available through the Department of Defense.

The Ethiopian Government has strongly supported the United Nations in the war in Korea. In July it contributed 100,000 Ethiopian dollars (approximately US $40,000) to the United Nations for medical supplies and in November offered a contingent of 1,069 officers and men for use in Korea. This offer has been accepted by the Unified Command and discussions are being held regarding the supplies and equipment for these troops. The Department feels that the use of Ethiopian troops in Korea is highly desirable politically because: (1) this would help the Ethiopians obtain United States arms and military equipment which, by mitigating their previous disappointments, should assist the United States in negotiations with Ethiopia for the continued use of certain military facilities in Eritrea; (2) of the great propaganda value of including among the UN armed forces a contingent of troops from an independent, colored nation in Africa, which would help to offset the Soviet claim that the Korean war is white imperialist aggression against the colored races of the world; as well as (3) for the contribution to international collective security which the use of troops of another Member of the UN would provide.

At the time the Ethiopians expressed the desire to send troops to Korea, they also requested the United States to furnish the necessary supplies to arm and equip two or three divisions. This equipment, they maintained, would enable them to participate actively in the defense of their area and in collective security measures. Since Ethiopia is eligible to obtain this equipment only under Section 408(e) of Public Law 329, as amended, the Department is endeavoring to ascertain whether Ethiopia can meet the political and strategic prerequisites.

Economic. United States economic policy toward Ethiopia is to encourage and assist Ethiopia to achieve a sound, balanced and orderly development of its economic potentialities through development of its natural resources, improvement of the methods and means of agricultural and industrial production, and expansion of multilateral trade.

The Fellows Mission (FEA) of 1944 drew up a ten-year economic development plan on the basis of which Ethiopia in 1948 requested financial assistance from the US Government, which referred the request to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. The Fellows development plan, totaling $153 million, is conceived from an engineering viewpoint without regard to what is economically possible in Ethiopia, and appears to be too ambitious for the Ethiopians to undertake in its entirety, even over a ten-year period. Selected projects in the plan, however, are worthy of consideration by this Government and international agencies for such financing and technical assistance as may be needed and available.

Recently the Ethiopian Government submitted a request for a loan to the IBRD. In the spring of 1950, the Bank sent a mission to Ethiopia to investigate the suitability of such a loan. On its return the mission indicated that lending to Ethiopia would be limited more by Ethiopia's ability to absorb and use capital effectively than by its ability to service a loan. As a result of the mission's findings, the IBRD in September made two loans to Ethiopia: one loan for five million dollars will be used for the rehabilitation and maintenance of the country's road system; the other for two million dollars will provide foreign exchange for projects to be financed by a new Ethiopian development bank. A third loan of one million dollars for the improvement of communication facilities has been recommended and an agreement for it is expected to be concluded in the near future.

One of the basic obstacles to the industrial development of Ethiopia is its lack of educated and trained technicians. A similar lack is apparent in the Government, although before the war the country had a good start in developing industrial technicians. Until Ethiopia can develop its own managerial skills we should support its efforts to secure competent American advisers and technicians. The Ethiopian Government has been informed that certain funds have been allocated to it under the Point IV Program, and discussions are proceeding toward the establishment of a technical assistance agreement between the two countries and the development of projects to be included in the program.

One important objective of encouraging and assisting Ethiopia in developing its natural resources and otherwise increasing its agricultural and industrial production is to increase the volume of its foreign trade, as a means of satisfying its foreign exchange requirements. In line with that objective we should encourage Ethiopia to follow liberal and non-discriminatory trade policies.

Specific policies to promote Ethiopia's economic development within the framework of our traditional economic foreign policy include: (1) encouragement of private foreign investments and commercial enterprises and the expansion of trade without encroachment on the sovereignty of Ethiopia; (2) support of efforts on the part of the UN specialized agencies to decrease illiteracy and improve educational facilities, improve agricultural and industrial productivity, to improve public health, and to develop aviation facilities; (3) support for the extension of additional loans by the IBRD for development projects.

We should continue to encourage the Ethiopian Government to utilize whatever technical assistance may be available from the United Nations and related international organizations that will be instrumental in contributing to the development of the country's economy. We should emphasize the necessity of extending fullest cooperation to such organizations, and indicate our interest in seeing the successful conclusion of projects undertaken. Thus far, the projects conducted by the World Health Organization and the Food and Agricultural Organization have been helpful to the over-all economy. For example, the FAO has been inoculating cattle against rinderpest at the rate of 10,000 cattle per month. Thus for a cost of a few cents per head of cattle, it is possible to save Ethiopian farmers thousands of dollars and greatly improve the diet of the people.

We should continue to encourage exploration for petroleum and the development of such petroleum resources as may be discovered both as an alternative source of supply for the US and for the benefit of the local population. We will assist in any appropriate way the development of such resources by American concerns. The Sinclair Petroleum Company holds a concession to explore for and produce petroleum throughout all Ethiopia, and has begun drilling operations. There is some indication that other independent American companies may desire to participate with the Sinclair Company in Ethiopian concessions, and, as far as possible, they should be encouraged and assisted in so doing.

Foreign private interests have thus far been extremely wary about investing capital in Ethiopia. With a view to creating a more favorable investment climate the Ethiopian Government in August 1950 embarked on a new policy designed to encourage the flow of foreign private capital into the country. The new policy containing the following inducements should serve as a stimulus to investment by foreign enterprises: (1) exemption from certain types of taxes; (2) exemption from customs duties on machinery imported for installation in factories; (3) relaxation of the requirement for the participation of Ethiopian capital investment in new enterprises; (4) permission to repatriate invested capital and a fixed percentage of profits earned.

The development of adequate transportation is a prime factor in the economic development of the country. Road, rail and air transport are all essential elements in the total transport system. In extending assistance and advice to Ethiopia the importance of the role which each mode of transport can best fulfill must be borne in mind.

The Franco-Ethiopian Railway has been the chief means of transporting Ethiopia's foreign trade: sixty percent of the country's exports and seventy-five percent of its imports are transported by the railway to and from the port of Djibouti in French Somaliland. The policy and operations of the company have long been a source of friction between France and Ethiopia which culminated in the Diredawa affair in August of 1949 and the subsequent strike of railway workers. The strike plus successful Ethiopan use of an alternative truck route to the port of Assab in Eritrea has forced the French to lower freight rates on the railway and grant other concessions in continuing negotiations with the Ethiopians. The US views with sympathy Ethiopia's desire to have greater control over its only rail outlet to the sea.

The operation of Ethiopian Air Lines (EAL), under management contract with Trans-World Airlines, provides Ethiopia with a means of transport for commercial and government passengers, mail, and freight to points which are either inaccessible, or which cannot be speedily served by surface transport. These services are essential to the economy of the country, to the efficient administration of government, and to the east African air transport network. The success of EAL is an example of what can be accomplished in bringing the benefits of American managerial and technical ability to an underdeveloped area through a cooperative arrangement. The Export-Import Bank in June 1950 authorized an extension of credit to the Ethiopian Government of $1,000,000 to assist in financing the purchase of two modern aircraft (Convair) which have been obtained by the Ethiopian Air Lines.

The 1914 commercial treaty between the United States and Ethiopia is inadequate. It lacks modern provisions covering rights to do business, import and export restrictions, exchange control, monopolies, and Government contracts. It also lacks the exactness and comprehensiveness of a present-day treaty. A draft of a modern treaty of amity and economic relations has been submitted to the Ethiopian Government which is shorter and more succinct than the standard Friendship, Commerce and Navigation treaties negotiated by the United States since the war. Realizing that special assurances are needed in Ethiopia regarding the administration of justice which it is not appropriate to include in a modern treaty, it is planned to retain the 1914 treaty in force with its provisions of most-favored-nation treatment on jurisdiction, and to reach further understandings in an exchange of notes at the time the treaty is signed.

C. RELATIONS WITH OTHER STATES

Diplomatic relations between the Soviet Union and Ethiopia were reestablished in 1944, after a lapse of some 27 years. There has been active Soviet interest in the cultural and informational fields, which has taken the form of Soviet exhibitions in Addis Ababa, public showings of Soviet propaganda films, the exertion of pressure on the Ethiopian Government for the inclusion of favorable articles in government-controlled newspapers, and the establishment in Addis Ababa of a fully equipped hospital, staffed by Soviet nurses and doctors who have distributed pamphlets and newspapers in Armenian and English extolling Soviet medical progress. There has been evidence of Soviet pressure on the Armenian commercial community to adopt Soviet nationality, and some Armenians have emigrated to the Armenian SSR.

Soviet prestige in Ethiopia suffered a set-back when the USSR announced prior to the 1948 elections in Italy that it favored Italian trusteeship for the former Italian colonies. On September 14, 1948, in the Council of Foreign Ministers meeting in Paris, the Soviet representative reversed his position and advocated placing under direct United Nations administration all of the territories except for an outlet to the sea for Ethiopia through Eritrea. In the third and fourth sessions of the General Assembly the USSR and its satellites advocated the same proposal coupled with support for independence in the near future. These same states, however, in the fifth session of the General Assembly voted against the proposal sponsored by the United States and thirteen other nations that all of Eritrea be federated with Ethiopia.

The primary interest of the UK in Ethiopia is to assure peace and security in the Red Sea area and on the borders of the territories which it occupies or possesses. The British and Ethiopian Governments are now negotiating a new treaty of establishment and a consular convention. Negotiations relating to the proposed cession to Ethiopia of the Zeila corridor in British Somaliland in return for part of the Ogaden Province have been pending since Ethiopia was primarily concerned with obtaining a favorable decision on Eritrea before proceeding on other territorial questions. The UK has been extremely active in the information and cultural field. The British Legation in Addis Ababa was the first diplomatic mission to be raised to an Embassy. The British exercise predominant influence in Ethiopia, a position to which we have no objection.

Although the Ethiopian Government continues to be interested in the possibility of developing the Lake Tana project as part of the overall development program for the Nile River, the discussions proposed for early 1950 with Great Britain and Egypt were not held due to the intervention of various political considerations which were linked to the Tana dam project. Recent reports indicate that Ethiopia and Egypt have reached an understanding on the Lake Tana project but the results are not yet evident.

France's policy toward Ethiopia is part and parcel of its desire to reassert its position as a great power and to maintain intact its colonial empire throughout Africa and the world. Ethiopia's attitude toward France, in the main, has been determined by French control of the Addis Ababa-Djibouti Railway. Although France is disliked and distrusted in Ethiopia, the French language and culture continue to have considerable influence in the country. France's policy toward Ethiopia at the present time may be said to include: (1) pursuit of those actions that will tend to secure France's position on the Red Sea, along her lifeline to the Indo-China area; (2) strengthening, where possible, the position of the Compagnie de Chemin de Fer Franco-Ethiopien; (3) concluding a satisfactory treaty of friendship, commerce and navigation with Ethiopia; (4) continuation of the highly successful cultural program, namely, the French Lyceum, the Cercle Français, and the Alliance Française; (5) cooperation with Ethiopian officials with regard to the settlement of the French Somaliland-Ethiopian border delineation problem; (6) containment of the importance and growth of German influence in Ethiopia. In the summer of 1950 the respective missions in Addis Ababa and Paris were raised to the rank of Embassy.

Since the war Sweden has taken an active interest in Ethiopia, primarily on Ethiopian initiative. Sweden extended loans to Ethiopia totaling 7,000,000 kronor and assisted in obtaining several hundred doctors, nurses, engineers, geologists, teachers, police administrators, military advisers, and other personnel for the Ethiopian Government. Swedish prestige has been high. It is reported that the Adviser on Civil Air Matters in Ethiopia, a Swedish national, may become the head of the Ethiopian Air Lines when the present management contract with TWA expires.

The interests of Italy and Ethiopia clash on the issues of the former Italian colonies of Eritrea and Italian Somaliland. Although Italy has professed a desire for the resumption of friendly relations, the Ethiopians cannot forget the repeated Italian attacks against them and the recent Fascist occupation of their country. Consequently, although individual Italians are not particularly disliked, Italy has no prestige in Ethiopia and the future pattern of relations between the two countries will be determined largely by the way the Italians administer their trusteeship of Italian Somaliland and whether the Ethiopians obtain a measure of satisfaction through having Eritrea politically connected with Ethiopia.

The Netherlands has shown renewed interest in Ethiopia. A good-will mission was sent to Ethiopia in 1948, and a Legation was opened in Addis Ababa in October 1950. As a result of the goodwill mission, the Ethiopian Government engaged the services of several Dutch advisers. The Dutch apparently are not only interested in increasing trade between the two countries but also in making capital investments in Ethiopia.

With the possible exception of Czechoslovakia, no other states have shown an active interest in Ethiopia, apart from trade prospects. The interest shown by Czechoslovakia stems largely from its sale of a small arms factory to Ethiopia in 1948 and the resulting presence of a number of Czechoslovak technicians in Ethiopia.

D. POLICY EVALUATION

US policy with respect to Ethiopia must reflect the problem which Ethiopia itself presents. The progressive development of stable government and economy in Ethiopia, including Eritrea, would strengthen another weak area exposed to Communist penetration and subversion and thus contribute to the stability of the Near East and Red Sea area.

Our general policy of helping the Ethiopian Government whenever circumstances permit has been successful in many directions. The day-to-day relations between the United States and Ethiopia are amicable; the Ethiopian Government has shown a preference for American advisers as compared with those of other countries; and United States trade with Ethiopia has increased many fold. The active support which the United States gave to Ethiopia's claim to Eritrea in the General Assembly is deeply appreciated by the Emperor and has gone a long way in assuring the Ethiopians of the sincerity of our intentions toward that country. The activities in Ethiopia of two American concerns, Trans-World Airlines and the Sinclair Petroleum Company, are viewed with considerable satisfaction by the Ethiopian Government. The Point IV Program, if adequately administered, should increase the cordiality of US-Ethiopian friendship.

Our policy has not been completely successful, however, in breaking down the suspicions with which the Ethiopians tend to view most western countries. Having been subjected to "spheres of influence" and even to invasion from certain European countries, this suspicion is deep-seated and will take a long time to erase. It is hoped that this can be overcome by greatly expanded educational and informational programs, by assistance programs, and by increased contacts with the western world for a much greater proportion of the people.

The Secretary of the Army (Pace) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (McGhee)

TOP SECRET

Washington, March 16, 1951.

DEAR MR. McGHEE: In accordance with a request from the Department of State <sup>1</sup> the Department of Defense has instructed the Department of the Army to designate a general officer to visit Addis Ababa, Ethiopia. In addition to displaying American interest in Ethiopia, the purpose of this visit is to explain to the Emperor the United States' concept of Ethiopia's role in defense of the non-Communist countries and, particularly, to dissuade him from military expenditures beyond the capacity of his country.

As you may know, the Department of the Army has a further interest in Ethiopia inasmuch as we desire to retain the Army radio station in Eritrea which will be federated with Ethiopia by September 1952. Since this will require base rights negotiations with Ethiopia, we propose to have this visit coincide with the opening of negotiations by our Ambassador in order that he may have the necessary technical advice. With this in mind, Brigadier General Rex V. D. Corput, Chief Signal Officer, European Command, has been selected for the purpose of advising the Ambassador as well as for the principal mission as outlined in the opening paragraph.

Mr. J. Rives Childs of your Department, who I understand has been nominated for Ambassador to Ethiopia,<sup>2</sup> informally indicated that Brigadier General Richard J. O'Keefe of the Air Force might be of additional assistance in negotiations. Mr. Childs pointed out that General O'Keefe was of great assistance to him in negotiations with King Ibn Saud when he was Ambassador to Saudi Arabia.<sup>3</sup> In this connection, I am requesting the advice of the Secretary of the Air Force as to the availability of General O'Keefe for this mission.

I would appreciate your comments and recommendations on this proposed arrangement.

Sincerely yours,

FRANK PACE, JR.

<sup>3</sup> In 1949 General O'Keefe was the head of the Joint United States Survey Group to Saudi Arabia, which studied that country's security requirements. For the group's report, better known as the O'Keefe Report, see Foreign Relations, 1950, vol. v, p. 1112.

The Acting Secretary of the Army (Alexander) to the Acting Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (Berry)

TOP SECRET

Washington, April 11, 1951.

DEAR MR. BERRY: I am pleased to reply to your letter of 30 March 1951 in which you requested that consideration be given to the visit of a well-known and high-ranking general officer to Ethiopia.

In keeping with your feelings on the importance of the matter, I have selected an officer who in my opinion is eminently qualified for this mission. I propose to send Lieutenant General Charles L. Bolte, Deputy Chief of Staff for Plans, United States Army.

General Bolte has had a long and distinguished record in the Army. He is a graduate of the Command and General Staff School and the Army War College. He has held such important positions as Chief of Staff of Army Ground Forces, Director of the Special Joint Planning Group, and Assistant Chief of Staff for Operations. He was recently appointed Deputy Chief of Staff for Plans. In addition to this, General Bolte is the Army Member of the Operations Deputies of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and Chairman of the Inter-American Defense Board.

General Bolte participated in World War I as a company grade officer and was wounded in action. He commanded the 34th Infantry Division in the Italian Theater in World War II. For gallantry in action and for meritorious service to his country, General Bolte has been awarded the following decorations: Distinguished Service Medal, the Silver Star, the Legion of Merit and the Purple Heart as well as many foreign decorations.

¹ On March 30 Berry replied to Pace's letter of March 16 to McGhee. He informed Pace the Department of State believed American objectives required a well-known U.S. general with imposing credentials, who could explain to the Emperor the U.S. conception of Ethiopia's role in the defense of the non-Communist world, and dissuade the Emperor from military expenditures beyond Ethiopia's needs and capacity to pay. (711.5875/3–1651)

I am sure you will agree that General Bolte will be recognized by the Emperor as a distinguished soldier and highly important member of the General Staff. Because of General Bolte's closeness to General Collins, the Emperor will undoubtedly regard him as the logical representative of the Chief of Staff.

General Bolte will leave for Europe in May and will be in Frankfurt about 10 June from which point he can depart for Ethiopia by air. I would appreciate your comments on the selection of General Bolte and whether or not the time of his visit will be suitable.

Sincerely yours,

ARCHIBALD S. ALEXANDER

Memorandum by the Under Secretary of State (Webb) to the Executive Secretary of the National Security Council (Lay) 1

TOP SECRET

Washington, April 30, 1951.

Subject: Final Progress Report on NSC 19/5, "Disposition of the Former Italian Colonies" 2

NSC 19/5 was approved as Governmental policy on August 5, 1949. It is requested that this Progress Report, as of March 20, 1951, be circulated to the members of the Council for their information.

Important Action and Developments

The situation with respect to the disposition of the former Italian colonies has progressed materially from that described in the First Progress Report on this subject dated May 11, 1950.3 The resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations on Novem-

A copy of this progress report in the McGhee Files was attached to a memorandum by McGhee to Webb, dated April 23, drafted by Wellons. The McGhee memorandum recommended that Webb sign the report indicating that United States policy on the disposition of the former Italian colonies had been substantially carried out. He added that the remaining problems of reaching agreement with the Governments of Libya and Ethiopia regarding the right of the United States to use certain strategic facilities in Tripolitania and Eritrea were being resolved by the Department of State in conjunction with the Department of Defense, although the agreements could not become effective until 1952. (McGhee Files: Lot 53 D 468: "Italian Colonies")

<sup>3</sup> The May 11, 1950, progress report, not printed, noted that while the United States still believed its proposed solution for the disposition of Eritrea (i.e., cession of the central plateau with Asmara and Massawa to Ethiopia and the annexation of the Western province to the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan) was the best solution, U.S. policy might have to be reconsidered in the light of the report of the Committee of Investigation and for extent to which Ethiopia and Italy agreed the Committee of Investigation, and/or extent to which Ethiopia and Italy agreed on a common policy for the disposition of Eritrea before the Fifth Session of the General Assembly. (S/P-NSC Files: Lot 61 D 167: "Italian Colonies") ber 21, 1949, is being implemented successfully with regard to independence for Libya and Italian trusteeship for former Italian Somaliland. A decision on the future of Eritrea, which was postponed last year by the General Assembly pending the report and recommendations of a UN Commission which investigated Eritrea, was made in a resolution adopted by the fifth session of the General Assembly on December 2, 1950, under which Eritrea is to be federated with Ethiopia. United States policy with respect to all three of the former Italian colonies has been met in most respects.

General Implementation

I. Libya

II. Italian Somaliland

The draft trusteeship agreement for Italian Somaliland negotiated with Italy and approved unanimously by the Trusteeship Council in January 1950 was finally approved by the UN General Assembly on December 2, 1950, without change. No particular problems have arisen with respect to Italian Somaliland, which is apparently being administered satisfactorily by the Italian Administration which was installed provisionally on April 1, 1950. Italy, as an administering authority, was granted the right to participate, without vote, in the UN Trusteeship Council in February 1951.

III. Eritrea

The report of the UN Commission established by the fourth session of the General Assembly of its investigation of Eritrea did not submit any agreed recommendation but, rather, presented three different proposals espoused by different members of the Commission. One member (Norway) favored the annexation of all of Eritrea by Ethiopia. Two members (South Africa and Burma) favored the federation of all of Eritrea with Ethiopia. Two other members (Guatemala and Pakistan) favored UN trusteeship for 10 years leading to independence. Under the circumstances . . . , the Department of State decided to give strong support to the proposal for the federation of Eritrea with Ethiopia. It was felt that this was in line with our basic policy and our security interests in Eritrea, and that it stood the best chance of meeting the views of the various interested parties and of obtaining the approval of two-thirds of the members of the UN.

A federation formula was developed by our delegation to the Interim Committee of the General Assembly when the report of the UN Commission for Eritrea was considered during July, August and September of 1950. The formula obtained the support of the British, Ethiopian and several leading Latin American delegations. It was further elaborated in private negotiations during the General Assembly and was accepted by both the Italian and Ethiopian delegations. Then fourteen sponsors, including the United States, introduced the resolution in the Ad Hoc Political Committee where it was eventually approved without change and was adopted by the General Assembly on December 2, 1950. The chief provisions of the resolution are that:

1. Eritrea shall be an autonomous unit federated with Ethiopia under the sovereignty of the Ethiopian Crown.

2. The Eritrean Government shall possess legislative, executive and judicial powers in the field of domestic affairs.

3. The jurisdiction of the federal government shall extend to the following matters: defense, foreign affairs, currency and finance, foreign and interstate commerce and external and interstate communications, including ports.

4. The area of the federation shall constitute a single area for customs purposes and there shall be free movement of goods and persons.

5. A single nationality shall prevail throughout the federation.

6. The federal government, as well as Eritrea, shall ensure to residents of Eritrea without distinction of nationality, race, sex, language or religion, the enjoyment of human rights and fundamental liberties.

7. There shall be a transition period which shall not extend beyond September 15, 1952, during which the Eritrean Government will be organized and the Eritrean Constitution prepared and put into effect. There will be a United Nations Commissioner in Eritrea appointed by the General Assembly to assist on these matters.

8. During the transition period, the present British Administering Authority shall continue to conduct the affairs of Eritrea and shall, in consultation with the United Nations Commissioner, implement certain specified provisions of the resolution.

9. The Federal Act, which consists of the first seven paragraphs of the resolution, and the Constitution of Eritrea shall enter into effect after the Constitution has been approved by the Commissioner and adopted by the Eritrean Assembly and after both documents have been ratified by the Emperor of Ethiopia. Then the transfer of power from the British Administration shall take place by September 15, 1952.

The resolution recognizes that the disposal of Eritrea should be based on its close political and economic association with Ethiopia and assures the inhabitants of Eritrea of the fullest respect and safeguards for their institutions, traditions, religions and languages, as well as the widest possible measure of self-government. At the same time the resolution respects the constitution, institutions, traditions and the international status and identity of the Empire of Ethiopia.

The principal strategic interest of the United States in Eritrea is in having the right to use certain military facilities in that territory. As stated in NSC 19/3, United States strategic requirements call for the operational availability of the following bases as essential: "Asmara, Eritrea, as a telecommunications base facility"; and "In the event of an emergency, Massawa, Eritrea, as an air and naval base facility." In view of the decision taken by the United Nations on Eritrea it will be necessary for this Government to negotiate with Ethiopia for the desired rights. In preparation for the negotiation of such an agreement preliminary steps have been taken as follows: (1) the Ethiopian Foreign Minister has been informed orally and in general terms of United States interest in concluding an agreement regarding such military facilities; (2) the British and the United Nations Commissioner for Eritrea (a Bolivian diplomat, Eduardo Anze Matienzo, who is pro-American and anti-Communist) have also been informed that the United States might want to use such facilities in the future; and (3) the Department of State in conjunction with the Department of Defense is drafting an agreement covering the use of the facilities we desire in Eritrea to be used as a basis for negotiation with the Ethiopian Government. These negotiations may be involved and protracted but it should be possible to come to an adequate understanding with the Ethiopians in view of the excellent relations we now have with them and the support we rendered in the solution of the Eritrean problem.

Evaluation of Policy

- 1. United States policy objectives have been accomplished with respect to the disposition of the former Italian colonies.
- 2. Future United States strategic military requirements in Libya and Eritrea will have to be provided for in agreements with the governments of Libya and Ethiopia respectively. Preliminary planning for the negotiation of these agreements is progressing satisfactorily. The agreement with Libya should be officially concluded after that country becomes independent (scheduled for January 1, 1952). The agreement with Ethiopia can not become effective until after Eritrea is officially federated with Ethiopia (scheduled for September 15, 1952).
- 3. Unless unforeseen difficulties arise, no further question regarding the disposition of the former Italian colonies is anticipated. Accordingly, no further progress report on this subject is contemplated.

Memorandum of Conversations, by Alfred Wellons of the Office of African Affairs

TOP SECRET

[Washington,] May 4, 1951.

Subject: Lieutenant General Bolte's Mission to Ethiopia

Participants: Lt. Gen. Charles L. Bolte, Deputy Chief of Staff for Plans, U.S.A.

Lt. Col. William J. Gallagher, Executive to Lt. Gen. Bolte

Lt. Col. Thomas R. Davis, Mediterranean & Middle East Branch, Op. Div. G-3

Mr. George C. McGhee, Assist. Sec. State, Near Eastern, South Asian & Af. Aff.

Ambassador George Merrell, Former Ambassador to Ethiopia

Mr. Elmer H. Bourgerie, Director, Office of African Affairs

Mr. Leo G. Cyr, Officer in Charge, Northern African Affairs

Mr. Alfred E. Wellons, AF

General Bolte visited Mr. McGhee by appointment this afternoon to discuss the subjects to be covered in his conversation with the Emperor during his forthcoming visit to Ethiopia. Mr. McGhee gave the General a copy of the draft instructions, prepared by the Department in consultation with the Department of the Army, which he read. The chief matters discussed are summarized below.

The General commented that in view of the fact that Ethiopian troops will soon arrive in Korea, the Emperor will have a good case for requesting military assistance from the United States. Since Ethiopia has suffered greatly from aggression and is now contributing a significant proportion of the national army for the cause of collective security, the general felt that the Ethiopian government would be justified in expecting some further assistance. He thought this assistance should probably be limited to the training of replacements for the casualties suffered by the Ethiopian forces in Korea. General Bolte expected that this would involve providing certain types of equipment for training purposes and perhaps several officers and men from the United States Army to assist in training the Ethiopian replacements in the handling of certain modern weapons.

General Bolte wondered whether it would be wise to give a completely negative answer if the Ethiopians should request a military mission. Mr. McGhee mentioned that the British military mission had just been withdrawn after some unfortunate experiences when their advice had not been taken or acted upon and he thought that in such circumstances an American military mission would be confronted with serious difficulties. Mr. Bourgerie concurred and expressed the view that it would be best not to send a mission but to assign any men that would be needed for training the Ethiopian replacements to the office of the Military Attaché in Addis Ababa. General Bolte thought this would be a good way to handle the immediate problem. However, he foresaw the possibility that the Ethiopians might need some equipment to maintain internal security, particularly in Eritrea where important American military facilities are located. Mr. McGhee agreed and added that the Emperor required armed forces for maintaining law and order within Ethiopia itself since some of the tribal chiefs in some of the remote areas were inclined to be rebellious. Therefore, Mr. McGhee suggested that after the completion of his mission, General Bolte might wish to make further recommendations on what, if any, further military assistance should be granted to that country by the United States. The General said that in other low priority cases such items as armored cars and tear gas grenades had been made available and he thought similar arrangements might be made for Ethiopia.

With regard to military equipment for training replacements for Korea, General Bolte was confident that authority existed for providing equipment for such purposes. Mr. McGhee agreed that General Bolte should give the Ethiopians assurances in regard to whatever he thought could be provided within the framework of present legislation and regulations. General Bolte said that his staff would draft an additional paragraph for the instructions on this matter and would inform the Department within two or three days. The instructions otherwise are acceptable to the General, who hoped he would not have to give a definite no to the Emperor's request to visit the United States.

May 7, 1951

Colonel Davis telephoned Mr. Cyr this morning that they had decided not to draft an additional paragraph, but to leave the instructions unchanged. Colonel Davis explained that on further consideration in the Department of the Army it was thought best to obtain the advice of the Joint Chiefs of Staff on the question of providing any training equipment or other assistance to Ethiopia. He said that they would present this problem to the JCS immediately with the hope of getting a decision prior to the General's visit to Ethiopia. Mr. Cyr stated that this would be agreeable to the Department and that we would proceed with some minor modifications on other points before sending the official instructions to General Bolte.

TOP SECRET

Washington, May 16, 1951.

Subject: Mission to Ethiopia Concerning Military Assistance

Emperor Haile Selassie of Ethiopia has sought military assistance from the United States sufficient to equip two or three divisions. He has also sought a limited number of combat planes.

The Department has considered the possibility of assisting Ethiopia, but under the terms of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act, as amended, Ethiopia is not eligible for grant assistance. Moreover, even if a Presidential determination indicated the advisability of extending reimbursable aid to Ethiopia, which existing circumstances would hardly justify, our present requirements and prior commitments might preclude delivery within the foreseeable future. With respect to combat planes, other requirements have also precluded their sale to Ethiopia.

An American adviser to the Ethiopian Foreign Office has indicated that the Emperor intends to renew his plea for military assistance. The Emperor feels keenly the criticism by the younger elements of his country regarding Ethiopia's military deficiencies. Despite the limited and underdeveloped resources of his country, the Emperor has carried out his strong belief in collective security by sending to Korea an Ethiopian expeditionary force of 1,158 officers and men, which departed on April 15, 1951.

In order to forestall this renewed plea by the Emperor in a manner which will not embarass him vis-à-vis his domestic critics, I recommend that Lieutenant General Charles Lawrence Bolte, Deputy Chief of Staff for Operations, United States Army, be sent to Addis Ababa, as your personal representative, to: (1) explain to the Emperor why the United States cannot provide Ethiopia with military equipment; (2) encourage the Emperor to avoid large disbursements for military purposes of funds needed for economic development; (3) assure the Emperor, if the question is raised, that the United States takes seriously its obligations under the UN Charter to support the United Nations in effective collective measures for the suppression of acts of aggression; and (4) explain, if the question is raised, why the United States would be unable to send a military mission to Ethiopia. The Secretary of Defense concurs in this recommendation. Attached is a draft of a personal letter from you to the Emperor which General Bolte could deliver.

¹This memorandum was drafted by Cyr and Hemba between April 10 and May 9. It was attached to a memorandum from McGhee to the Secretary, dated May 2, drafted by Cyr and Hemba. McGhee recommended that the Secretary sign the memorandum to the President, and noted that S/S-PR, S/ISA, UNA/UNP, A/PER, and the Department of Defense concurred. (775.56/5-1651)

ETHIOPIA 1257

If you approve the foregoing recommendation, a carbine equipped with a telescopic sight will be provided General Bolte to be given to the Emperor as a gift from the President of the United States.

TOP SECRET

Washington, May 17, 1951.3

Great and Good Friend: Recently I received with considerable satisfaction and appreciation reports of the departure for Korea of nearly 1,200 officers and men of the Ethiopian Expeditionary Force in accordance with the pledge of Your Imperial Majesty to support by acts, as well as words, the principle of collective security through the United Nations. As stated by Your Imperial Majesty in the address to the troops departing for Korea, we are engaged in a "crusade in defense of that very principle for which we have so long fought—freedom and respect for the freedom of others."

This message of friendship is being carried by my personal representative, Lieutenant General Charles L. Bolte, who has had a long and distinguished career and who now holds the important position of Deputy Chief of Staff for Plans, United States Army. General Bolte participated in World War I as a company grade officer and was wounded in action. He commanded an infantry division in World War II and has been awarded several decorations for gallantry in action and for meritorious service to his country.

General Bolte is authorized to discuss with Your Imperial Majesty general matters involving the defense of the free world of concern to your Government and to the Government of the United States, as well as related problems of military assistance. General Bolte carries the best wishes of the Government of the United States on this mission and, on my behalf, a small token of regard for Your Imperial Majesty.

With the most sincere desire for the continuation of the excellent relations existing between our countries, I remain with great respect,

Your Good Friend,

HARRY S. TRUMAN

Instructions to Head of Mission to Ethiopia (Lieutenant General Bolte)

1. Purpose of Mission

During recent years, Emperor Haile Selassie has been desirous of obtaining military equipment from the United States, but has been unsuccessful. According to Ambassador Merrell, the Emperor is greatly concerned over this lack of military assistance from the United States. Despite the limited and underdeveloped resources of his country, the Emperor has carried out his strong belief in collective security by sending to Korea an Ethiopian expeditionary force of 1,158 officers and men, which arrived in Pusan on May 6, 1951. The supplies and equipment which the Ethiopian troops in Korea receive from American sources are provided on a reimbursable basis.

It is understood that the Emperor intends to renew his plea for military assistance. The purpose of your mission, as stated in the memorandum for the President from the Secretary of State is:

"In order to forestall this renewed plea by the Emperor in a manner which will not embarrass him vis-à-vis his domestic critics, I recommend that Lieutenant General Charles Lawrence Bolte, Deputy Chief of Staff for Operations, United States Army, be sent to Addis Ababa, as your personal representative, to: (1) explain to the Emperor why the United States cannot provide Ethiopia with military equipment: (2) encourage the Emperor to avoid large disbursements for military purposes of funds needed for economic development; (3) assure the Emperor, if the question is raised, that the United States takes seriously its obligations under the UN Charter to support the United Nations in effective collective measures for the suppression of acts of aggression; and (4) explain, if the question is raised, why the United States would be unable to send a military mission to Ethiopia. The Secretary of Defense concurs in this recommendation. Attached is a draft of a personal letter from you to the Emperor which General Bolte could deliver."

2. Presentation of President's Letter, Gift and Decorations

On your arrival in Addis Ababa you will be met by the Ambassador and members of his staff. As soon as possible after your arrival it is suggested that you consult with Ambassador Childs regarding your mission and your instructions, and seek his advice as to the manner in which the following should be presented to the Emperor:

ETHIOPIA 1259

(a) The letter from the President to His Imperial Majesty.<sup>2</sup>

(b) The President's gift of a carbine with a telescopic sight.
(c) The decoration of the Legion of Merit, Degree of Chief Commander.

(d) The set of large scale maps of Korea.

3. Conversations With Emperor

It is suggested that in your conversations with the Emperor of Ethiopia you may find it desirable to comment along the following lines on the matters which are likely to be discussed. Should Ambassador Childs suggest any change, however, you should feel free to accept his counsel and modify the following accordingly.

(a) By referring to the letter from the President, you could speak of the fine example of the Ethiopian contribution to the cause of collective security and the UN effort in the war of Korea. (By the time you see the Emperor, the Embassy in Addis Ababa should have received reports of the duties to which the Ethiopian troops in Korea have been assigned. It would be helpful to explain to the Emperor as graphically as possible the specific tasks which they are undertaking.)

(b) By referring to Korea, you could assure the Emperor that the United States takes seriously its obligations under the UN charter to support the UN in effective collective measures for the suppression of acts of aggression. In other words the United States, through the UN, will do what it can to resist Communist aggression wherever it may occur. If further evidence is necessary you could point to the areas most directly affected by the Soviet menace where the United States has made tremendous efforts to strengthen and protect those members of the free world: such as, Western Europe, Greece, Turkey and the countries of South Asia.

(c) You may wish to emphasize the world-wide extent of the obligations assumed by the United States in its efforts to contain the spread of Soviet imperialism. As an example of the huge effort being made by this country you might wish to point out the cost of the current defense program in the United States. On the basis of the last request of the President to Congress for $60,000,000,000 for the fiscal year 1952 for the defense effort, the annual cost per each American taxpayer is $1,138.00. When our total effort is so great, you could emphasize to the Emperor, it is extremely important that this government not undertake additional commitments unless they are absolutely vital to the common defense of the free world.

(d) Ethiopia, fortunately, is not exposed to aggression. Certainly the United States government foresees no aggression against Ethiopia by any of its immediate neighbors. Also, and you might ask the Emperor if he agrees, the possibility of Communist inspired uprisings by minority groups within Ethiopia is considered most unlikely. The geographical position of Ethiopia makes direct Soviet aggression a remote possibility. Even in the event of a general war Ethiopia has good natural defenses in the vast expanse of desert on the Arabian peninsula and most of the Red Sea and Gulf of Aden, not to mention the formidable mountain barriers within Ethiopia itself. For these reasons and also because priorities in military assistance are accorded to the nations who are considered to be the most likely victims of Soviet aggression, the United States is unable at present to provide further military assistance to Ethiopia.

(e) The facts of present international relations and of Ethiopia's position which make it impracticable for the United States to equip Ethiopia's armed forces in Ethiopia also work to Ethiopia's advantage. Thus you will wish to emphasize to the Emperor that because of the relatively secure position of his country he should find it unnecessary to undertake large disbursements by the Ethiopian government for military forces. Furthermore, this situation places Ethiopia in the enviable position of being able to use its resources for the development of its economy rather than for the unproductive machines of war. Since the cost of a modern military machine is so great Ethiopia could contribute most to the common cause of defense of the free world by maintaining a balanced economy and by developing for export those resources, such as food, hides and skins, which would be essential in the Near and Middle East in the event of a general conflagration.

(f) While emphasizing the point of view in the preceding paragraph you may wish to say that of course Ethiopia should have whatever armed forces are necessary to maintain internal security and which can be supported by the Ethiopian economy. In addition, and as mentioned previously, this government considers Ethiopia's contribution to the UN armies in Korea as indicative of her part in the common defense of the non-Communist world.

(g) The Ethiopians may ask what military plans we have for Eritrea, in view of the important army radio station located in Asmara. Even if this question is not raised by them, it would be desirable for you to make at least passing reference to our interest in the military facilities in Eritrea, particularly the radio station at Asmara. In this connection you could refer to the conversation in December, 1950 between the Ethiopian Minister for Foreign Affairs, Ato Aklilou, and Assistant Secretary of State, George McGhee, when this matter was discussed. As Mr. McGhee indicated, the United States desires to negotiate an agreement with Ethiopia on the continued use of certain military facilities in Eritrea. Ambassador Childs and the Military Attaché will conduct these negotiations during the coming months.

4. Matters To Be Discussed Only if Raised by the Emperor

Our Embassy in Addis Ababa has suggested several questions which may be raised by the Emperor or members of his government, and the Departments of State and Defense have considered several other points which might arise. These questions, and replies you may wish to give, are outlined as follows:

(a) The Ethiopians may wish to be assured specifically that there is absolutely no threat, actual or potential, from the Italian forces in the Trust Territory of Somaliland. Our general view is that there is no danger of aggression from any of the territories contiguous to Ethiopia. Specifically the United States government believes fully the statements made by leaders of the Italian government that they would never again embark on a course of colonialism and empire-building in Africa. Such statements have been made repeatedly before the General Assembly of the UN. In addition this government has been assured privately many times by representatives of the Italian government that they have no such intentions.

(b) The Ethiopians may ask about the desirability of their reestablishing diplomatic relations with Italy. As the Ethiopian Foreign Minister knows very well, the Department of State has urged for some time that diplomatic relations be established between the Italians and Ethiopians and has provided its good offices to facilitate the reestablishment of such relations. We are prepared to take whatever steps we consider appropriate to see harmonious, friendly and confident relations between the two countries. In addition, we view the great desire of the Italians to conclude such an arrangement as soon as possible as further evidence of their good faith and friendly intentions, vis-à-vis the danger of aggression from Italian Somaliland mentioned above. If appropriate in the conversation, you might add that the necessary next step is up to the Ethiopian government in the renewal of relations with Italy.

(c) The Ethiopians may seek a commitment that the United States is interested in assuring that the Ethiopians will not be treated unfairly in the settlement of the boundary between Somaliland and Ethiopia. (They might try to involve American interest in this matter on the grounds that the Sinclair Oil Company is prospecting for oil in the area of the Ogaden where the boundary has long been disputed.) The position of the United States is that the solution of this boundary problem was provided in the resolution adopted by the General Assembly in December, 1950. This resolution provides that settlement should be reached by direct negotiation between the parties involved (Ethiopia and Italy), or, if this is unsuccessful, by specified procedures of mediation or arbitration.

(d) The Ethiopians may ask if an American military mission could be sent to replace the British military mission which was recently withdrawn. Our Embassy in Addis Ababa has recommended strongly, and the Departments of State and Defense concur, that no mention of a military mission be made unless and until the Ethiopians propose it. If raised, our general position is that it is not practicable for the United States to send such a military mission, for the reasons given in the previous section regarding our inability to supply military assistance. If pressed, you could add that if the Ethiopians desire a military mission, one from Western Europe might be better suited, by tradition and training methods, to meet Ethiopian requirements than would an American mission. Furthermore, if our Embassy considers it advisable, you might mention that we understand the Ethiopian government is planning to train its army by engaging Belgian officers under private contract on the same basis that Swedish officers are now training the Imperial Guards.

(e) A high ranking member of the Ethiopian government may inquire about the possibility of the Emperor visiting the United States during the coming year. If raised, you may wish to appear surprised as though the question presented a new idea. You might add, as vaguely and tactfully as possible, that the President, due to a very full calendar of events, might not be able to receive the Emperor during 1952, in view of the fact that it is an election year in the United States. However, you could state that when you return to Washington you will ask the State Department to take this matter up with the President at the appropriate time.

(f) The Ethiopians may mention the new Treaty of Amity and Economic Relations which is about to be concluded between the United States and Ethiopia. Negotiations have been proceeding satisfactorily and the Treaty may be signed or ready for signature by the time of your arrival.<sup>3</sup>

(g) If the Ethiopians raise the question of the Point Four agreement between the United States and Ethiopia you can simply say that this matter, like the foregoing problem of the Treaty, is being handled by Ambassador Childs.4

*Telegram 347 from Addis Ababa, June 16, advised the Department of State that The General Agreement on Point IV Technical Assistance with Ethiopia had been signed that day (775.00-TA/6-1651). The text of the treaty is in 2 UST (pt. 2) 1227, TIAS No. 2271.

Subject: Report of Activities on Visit to Ethiopia

1. On 11 June, I departed from Paris for Addis Ababa in accordance with the wishes of the President of the United States (Tab A). As his personal representative, I had the following mission as outlined in the Letter of Instructions: <sup>2</sup>

"In order to forestall this renewed plea (for military equipment) by the Emperor in a manner which will not embarrass him vis-à-vis his domestic critics, I recommend that Lieutenant General Charles Lawrence Bolte, Deputy Chief of Staff for Plans, United States Army, be sent to Addis Ababa, as your personal representative, to: (1) explain to the Emperor why the United States cannot provide Ethiopia with military equipment; (2) encourage the Emperor to avoid large disbursements for military purposes of funds needed for economic development; (3) assure the Emperor, if the question is raised, that the United States takes seriously its obligations under the UN Charter to support the United Nations in effective collective measures for the suppression of acts of aggression; and (4) explain, if the question is raised, why the United States would be unable to send a military mission to Ethiopia. The Secretary of Defense concurs in this recommendation. Attached is a draft of a personal letter from you to the Emperor which General Bolte could deliver."

2. I arrived in Addis Ababa at noon 12 June together with my party. We were met at the Airport by the American Ambassador and Ethiopian dignitaries. The Guard of Honor, a Company from the Ethiopian 1st Division, presented a well-drilled and well-turned out appearance. On the afternoon of the 12th, I conferred with the Ambassador for orientation and on questions of protocol.

3. On the morning of 13 June, the Emperor received me and members of my party. I presented him with a letter from the President (Tab A) and the Legion of Merit, Degree of Chief Commander (Tab B).3 I also presented him with a sporting rifle from the President, with a suitably inscribed plate, and a pair of binoculars from the U.S. Government, similarly inscribed, an album containing photographs of the Ethiopian troops in Korea, and a set of Korean maps. The Emperor expressed himself as highly pleased and grateful for these expressions of the United States' regard for him. Following this, the Emperor and I had a private conversation in which he outlined Ethiopia's present status and need for military aid (Tab C).3 The Emperor realized that the question of aid was largely one of priorities and urged a practical solution to this problem. On the afternoon of the 13th, I met with the Minister of War and other Cabinet Members. The Minister of War outlined Ethiopia's status, paralleling his Majesty's conversation, and asked for equipment for two Motorized Divisions (Tab D),3 and for about two groups of aircraft (Tab E).4 I replied to the effect that I would submit such requests to the appropriate U.S. authorities, and assured the Minister of War of a sympathetic understanding of their problems. I pointed out, however, that the Korean situation has produced a tremendous drain on our resources which, contrary to popular belief, were not unlimited. At this time, I stressed the fact that the effort in Korea or anywhere else was a joint one and not a U.S. venture.

4. On the morning of 14 June, I visited the Ethiopian Air Force Station at Bishoftu. A demonstration there included landings and take-off by primary students, and dive-bombing and formation flying by advanced students. I was taken on a tour of the field by officers of the Swedish Mission and visited cadet classes in engineering and communications. I was also shown supply and maintenance installations. On the whole, I thought the entire program was extremely progressive, sensible and modest, and within the economy of the country.

5. On the morning of 15 June, I again met with the Minister of War. I again stressed the question of priorities and outlined the order in which I thought Ethiopia should meet this problem, i.e., first, the equipping and maintaining of their troops in Korea; secondly, development of forces to maintain internal security; thirdly, the development of communications; and finally, purely military forces. I further outlined world-wide priorities, pointing out that the United States considered Korea a first priority with Western Europe, Far East and Southeast Asia, Middle East and Western Hemisphere following in that order. I commented on the air force training and suggested that the approach to that problem was on a practical basis. I assured the Ethiopian representatives that their problem would receive thorough consideration in Washignton. I also assured them that any aggression against Ethiopia would be considered gravely by the United States.

6. On the afternoon of the 15th, I had a final audience with the Emperor. At this time, he gave me a letter to the President from him (Tab F).5 I received a decoration in the form of a Grand Cordon of the Order of the Most Blessed Trinity with Plaque. The three military members of my party received the Order of the Star of Ethiopia, Degree of Commander, and the State Department representative, a commemorative medallion. At a luncheon at the British Embassy, I explained my visit to the British Ambassador and assured him the United States has no desire to establish a military mission or, in any other way, "move in" to Ethiopia. On the evening of the 15th, I was a guest of the American Ambassador at a dinner at the Embassy. At this time, he expressed extreme satisfaction with the results of my visit. It was my impression that the mission was successful. From a somewhat reserved attitude, the Ethiopians appeared to thaw steadily and, on our departure, gave us a very warm send-off. In a cable, dated 22 June, the Ambassador noted that an Ethiopian communiqué had been issued after my departure which ended with the statement that the discussions demonstrated solidarity and community of views shared by both Governments and that I had taken with me the best wishes of the Ethiopian people for success of the great undertaking of the United Nations in which the United States had such an important role. The Ambassador commented that this alone signified the success of the mission (Tab G).6

7. Prior to departure, Mr. Spencer, the American Advisor to the Emperor, assured me informally that the Government of Ethiopia would welcome a continuance of the US Army Radio Station at Asmara, Eritrea, when the two countries were federated.

Not found attached to copy in Department of State files, but in telegram 346 from Addis Ababa, June 16, Ambassador Childs advised the Department that the visit of the Bolté party had measured up to his fullest expectations. He reported also that the Bolté party had left Addis Ababa on June 16 and, after a short stop at Asmara, was expected to arrive in Cairo that night, and leave Cairo on June 18 to return to Washington. (711.551/6-1651)

- 8. As a result of my visit, I recommend the following in relative order of priority:
- a. A training program in Ethiopia for the training of replacements for the Ethiopian contingent in Korea. This program would necessarily include the use of American equipment.

b. An assurance to Ethiopia of US protection of our Radio Station at Asmara.

c. US Assistance for the development of the Ports of Massawa and Assab.

d. Modest assistance for Ethiopia's Armed Forces in the form of reimbursable aid.

Editorial Note

A United Nations Commissioner in Eritrea, Eduardo Anze Matienzo of Bolivia, was elected by the United Nations General Assembly in December 1950 and given the task of drafting a Constitution for Eritrea in consultation with the groups concerned—the Government of Ethiopia, the inhabitants of Eritrea, and local officials of the Administering Authority, the United Kingdom. The Commissioner spent most of the year in Eritrea and submitted a progress report, dated November 16, 1951, to the sixth session of the General Assembly. Documentation on United Nations actions on Eritrea during the sixth session of the General Assembly is in Yearbook of the United Nations, 1951.

GOLD COAST

INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES IN DEVELOPMENTS IN THE GOLD COAST

125.115H/1-2351

Memorandum by the Director of the Office of African Affairs (Bourgerie) to the Executive Director of the Bureau of Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (Jago)<sup>1</sup>

CONFIDENTIAL

[Washington,] January 23, 1951.

Subject: Proposal to raise the status of the Consulate at Accra, Gold Coast, to that of Consulate General.

Referring to NEA's memorandum of November 29, 1950,<sup>2</sup> on the above subject, it is strongly urged that reconsideration be given the matter in the light of the information contained in despatch No. 130 of November 16 from Lagos <sup>3</sup> and despatch No. 142 of November 25 from Accra.<sup>3</sup> There is additional evidence which supports a reconsideration of AF's proposal, and this will be made available upon request. It will be noted that these despatches, which were received in the Department subsequent to the date of your memorandum, present several reasons in support of AF's proposal to raise the status of the Consulate at Accra to that of a Consulate General. Among the reasons given are enhancement of the prestige of the United States, strengthened relations with Gold Coast officials, and strategic importance of the territory to the United States. It will be noted also that France considers the territory of sufficient importance to maintain a Consulate General at Accra.

In reconsideration of the proposal to raise the rank of our Office at Accra, we should like to make the following comments on the enclosure to NEA's memorandum:

The conclusion reached that the present is not a propitious time for raising the status of the Consulate is apparently based on the premise that the Gold Coast is less advanced economically and politically than Nigeria. This, of course, is not the case.

It is difficult to make a comparison of the natural wealth or the potentialities of the two territories. No complete survey of the resources of either area has ever been made, and development schemes which are underway will quite likely change the entire economy of the two territories in the course of the next few years. We do know, however, that the Gold Coast presently enjoys a per capita income far in excess of that of Nigeria, despite its smaller area and population.

Strategically, the Gold Coast is very important to the United States, both as a potential military base and as a source of supply for strategic materials. During the last war, the United States Army Forces maintained a base in the Gold Coast which served as a key link in the only air-route connecting the West with the Middle East. Headquarters were also maintained at Accra by The Central West African Office of the Foreign Economic Administration and the West African Office of Strategic Services. The Gold Coast may play an equally, if not more important, part, should there be another outbreak of war in Europe.

We should like to emphasize again that since the last war, Accra has come to be regarded by the British as the administrative center of the four British West African colonies. It now serves as the head-quarters of the British Commander-in-Chief (with rank of Major General) of West Africa, the Chief Secretary of the British West African Council, the British West African Court of Appeals, British Intelligence, and the British West African Currency Board. The Gold Coast is also becoming more and more important as the meeting place for various national and international bodies. In recent months, for example, Accra has witnessed a Conference of Directors of Medical Services and an International Conference on West African Education (the latter attended by delegates from British and French territories and from Liberia). Next month, the Eucharistic Congress, at which it is estimated 30,000 Catholics from all parts of the world will attend, will meet at Kumasi.

The most important single reason why we should alter the rank of our representative at Accra is political. The Gold Coast is, and always has been, more advanced constitutionally than Nigeria. Its present constitutional status in British Africa, is, in fact, second only to that of Southern Rhodesia, a territory which enjoys a political status midway between a self-governing colony and a dominion. The new Gold Coast constitution of January 1, 1951, advances the territory to the last rung of the ladder of self-government by establishing a ministerial system in which all but three of eleven ministers comprising the Executive Council will be Africans. The constitutional progress made in the Gold Coast in the recent years has been phenomenal, and is, in fact, a cause of envy and dissatisfaction among many of the leading Nationalists of Nigeria. It is incorrect to say that Nigeria enjoys by tradition and precedence a preferred position for eventual self-government. No one can predict, of course, when full self-government will materialize in either the Gold Coast or Nigeria. There seems little reason to doubt, however, that the Gold Coast will achieve self-government before Nigeria, and that it will be in the not-too-distant future.

The increasing awareness by the Gold Coast peoples of the difference between their social, economic and political status as compared with that of the rest of the world is one of our major problems and one which challenges our very best talent, provided we intend to keep these peoples on our side. Today, the free nations are working to imbue the world with democratic ideals, and so long as the United States supports this policy we cannot help but encourage the desire of peoples under political domination or control to fashion their own destiny. Because the United States, as a member of the modern democratic world, does welcome stable independent governments for all peoples, it is committed to help in reducing the political dependence of other peoples and raising their social and economic standards to a level commensurate with their own efforts and resources. This calls for a great effort in assisting, in any way we can, the people of the Gold Coast along the road to solid social and economic development in order that we can be assured that they will be aligned with the Western world. To do this, abundant understanding and sympathy on the part of our official representative abroad are required. AF does not believe that United States objectives as aforementioned can be accomplished in the Gold Coast by inadequate representation. At this juncture in the development of the Gold Coast, we should maintain, as a minimum, a Consul General of proven ability to carry out the important task of building United States confidence with the new political leaders who are emerging daily in this territory. Also, our representative must win the respect of the local British leaders, and induce them to discuss problems of mutual interest and make available to our government political and economic information on this important region.

Until we elevate our Office in Accra to the rank commensurate with the political advancement being made in that territory and compatible with the level of high caliber British officialdom now administering the territory, the Department will not obtain the cooperation necessary to build and secure the economic and political position it needs in this important area of the world.<sup>4</sup>

Washington, February 20, 1951.

A-30. Reference Consulate's despatch No. 206, February 5, 1951.2 ECA London has evaluated a preliminary list of projects submitted by the Colonial Office as illustrative of the types for which assistance is desired. The list included the following two Gold Coast projects: (1) A request for $7,000,000 ECA assistance for the building of roads and a new port and (2) an application for $3,000,000 for building a railroad extension from Awaso in the direction of Berekum.

ECA London has given top priority to the first project but indicated that support would be contingent very largely on whether the proposed new aluminum industry is established on the Volta River. ECA considers that the second project falls into a lower priority group for which information will have to be developed in greater detail by the Colonial Office before a final determination can be made.<sup>3</sup>

In order to allocate funds remaining in the Overseas Development Pool, ECA would be receptive to projects falling within the limits of the criteria established for the Overseas Territories. The Colonial Office is the required channel for the submission of such projects, which must be fully documented to qualify for favorable consideration.

Kwame Nkrumah, Leader of Government Business of the Gold Coast Legislative Assembly (Prime Minister), visited Washington

&lt;sup>3</sup> Airgram A-34, March 5, to Accra, reported that the British Colonial Office had decided not to include the $7 million item for roads and a new harbor in the list of projects for priority consideration in view of the unsettled political situation in the Gold Coast. The latest listing of ECA projects on which the Colonial Office agreed included $3 million for enlargement of the Takoradi harbor and $1.1 million for improvement of the Achiasi-Newasan railroad. unofficially on June 7 and 8 at the invitation of Assistant Secretary of State McGhee. The proposal to invite Nkrumah to Washington was set forth in a memorandum of April 18 from Bourgerie to McGhee:

"Nkrumah (see attached biography 1), who occupies a position similar to Prime Minister in the newly-constituted Government of the Gold Coast, plans to visit the United States to deliver the Commencement Address at Lincoln University on June 5, 1951.

"Nkrumah is the leader of the Nationalist Movement in the Gold Coast, and to the complete surprise of the British, his political party, the Convention Peoples Party (CPP), won the recent general election. The British regard this election as the 'most daring political experiment yet carried out in Africa . . .' Immediately after the elections the Secretary of State of the Colonies released the following statement, 'It lies with Africans themselves to prove their capacity for self-government, and it is by their performance above everything else that the future course of advancement towards full self-government will be determined, not only in the Gold Coast but elsewhere in Africa'.

"In view of Nkrumah's position as the new national political leader in the Gold Coast, AF believes it would be desirable to accord him some form of recognition during his unofficial visit to the United States and suggests that you act as host at an official luncheon in his honor at Prospect House on Friday, June 8, 1951." (McGhee Files: Lot 53 D 468: File—"Africa")

A formal invitation was subsequently extended to Nkrumah who accepted and arrived in Washington on June 7. Arrangements for Nkrumah's visit are documented in files 611.45K, 110.15 McG, 945K.52, and McGhee Files: Lot 53 D 468: File—"Africa". Nkrumah and Gold Coast Minister of Education and Social Welfare Kojo Botsio arrived in Washington on the afternoon of June 7. That afternoon they made a courtesy visit to Assistant Secretary McGhee and met with officers of the Department of State and other government departments. The following morning, Nkrumah visited Mount Vernon and the Lincoln Memorial and then attended a luncheon hosted by Assistant Secretary McGhee. Nkrumah was also scheduled to meet with members of the Senate and House of Representatives. No record has been found of any of the substantive discussions between American officials and Nkrumah during this informal visit. For the text of McGhee's remarks at the luncheon of June 8, see infra. On June 11 Nkrumah sent the following telegram to Assistant Secretary McGhee from New York:

"On the eve of my departure for the Gold Coast via London I wish to express to you on behalf of myself and Mr. Botsio our grateful thanks for your kind reception and hospitality and for the sympathetic hearing you gave to my appeal for technical assistance in the development of our country. Please extend our thanks also to all the officers of your Department for their cordial cooperation." (110.15 McG/6-1151)

Following his return to the Gold Coast, Nkrumah sent the following letter to McGhee on August 8:

"Words of adequate terms are not within my reach to express my heartfelt thanks for the cordial reception accorded me during my short visit to the United States.

"I also want to thank you for the courtesy and attention shown to myself and the Honourable Kojo Botsio, Gold Coast Minister of Education and Social Welfare.

"The exceptional air of gesture coupled with everything that is worthy of appreciation was characteristic of your making my visit to the United States most comfortable." (745K.13/8-851)

McGhee replied to Nkrumah's letter on August 31 as follows:

"It was a great pleasure for me to have seen you during your stay in the United States. We here are most interested in the important developments now taking place in the Gold Coast. We are always ready to cooperate with you and your Government in every appropriate manner." (745K.13/8-851)

Assistant Secretary McGhee commented on his luncheon meeting with Nkrumah during his conversation on September 25 with French Embassy Minister Counselor Daridan; see Bourgerie's memorandum of conversation, page 1414.

Remarks Made by the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (McGhee) at an Official Luncheon in Honor of the Gold Coast Leader of Government Business (Nkrumah), Washington, June 8, 1951 <sup>1</sup>

On behalf of my Government I should like to extend a most cordial welcome to the United States to our distinguished visitors from the Gold Coast, Mr. Nkrumah the Leader of Government Business and Mr. Botsio, the Minister of Education and Social Welfare. Mr. Nkrumah is, of course, no stranger to these shores, having done graduate and post-graduate work in American educational institutions, one of which so signally honored him a few days ago. During this formative period of his life in the United States he came to know us well. He came to know that faith in freedom and progress is a dominant trait in the American character.

Freedom and progress are as indissolubly bound to each other as air is to life. The only limitation we have put on freedom is that it be exercised in such a way as not to interfere with the freedom of others.

This concept of freedom has underlain the development of the United States since its very foundation. It is because of this freedom that we have never been primarily concerned with keeping things as they are. Our main interest is making things better by peaceful means and by the exercise of free choice.

It is the traditional policy of the United States to support orderly movements towards self government. We have followed with keen interest, therefore, the efforts of the British Government over the years to promote the political, economic, social and educational advancement of the peoples in British African territories. January 1, 1951 marks a historical day in the Gold Coast. It may well mark a historical day in Africa. It was on this day that a new Constitution became effective in the Gold Coast, establishing popular elections and granting the African himself broad competence over his own affairs for the first time in African colonial history.

This far-reaching development in British colonial policy has produced misgivings in certain quarters. We, ourselves, have no such misgivings. We have observed the competent and efficient manner with which the preliminary stages of this bold experiment have been worked out cooperatively by British officials and Africans, and the moderation and sense of responsibility shown by the African leaders since the Constitution became operative. We are confident that this experiment in African administration will succeed. It must succeed. The eyes of the world will be focused on the Gold Coast. They will watch with the hope that this first British experiment in African administration will prove beyond doubt that the African is capable of governing himself. They will watch with some degree of anxiety knowing that their many serious obstacles must be overcome. Foremost among these is the difficulty of unifying a diverse people, a people differing in language and customs and varying markedly in degree of political consciousness and economic development. The boldness of the British experiment should be measured in the light of these difficulties. Excuses could have been offered with some reason for instituting less liberal political concessions to the people of the Gold Coast in the management of their own affairs. The decision to go forward in the face of these obstacles can be attributed only to a sincerity of purpose in carrying out the long avowed objectives of British colonial policy of advancing the dependent peoples to self-government as rapidly as conditions permit. It represents an incontestable denial of the oft repeated charges of the Kremlin that the British and other Western Nations are intent on keeping dependent peoples in permanent subjection. It is a fitting answer to the Kremlin which falsely sets itself up as the champion of dependent peoples—the same Kremlin which since 1945 has taken over more than 7-1/2 million square miles of new territory, an area approximately equivalent to the combined area of the colonial territories in Southern Africa, and it is even now intent on further expansion in Asia.

The deepening division between the Soviet Government and the Free World is not, as is sometimes incorrectly thought, a conflict between capitalism and communism. Among the nations of the Free World, in fact, there are some that have chosen a Socialist system. Rather the conflict is between a power-hungry government that is bent on imposing its system on others by force, terror, and every other means, and the community of Free Nations which refuses to be conquered or dominated, or to stand by and see its members swallowed up.

In so far as Africa is concerned it is a major objective of United States policy to assist the African peoples in any way we can in their political, social and economic advancement in accordance with the United Nations Charter. We know, and I feel sure they know, that the Soviets do not offer them the goal to which they aspire, but utter and complete subordination, many times more onerous than any restriction they have known in the past.

Your Government, Mr. Nkrumah, is embarking on a new, untried course. Its success or failure will measure the rapidity with which constitutional advancement is made in other colonial territories in Africa. We appreciate the numerous and formidable obstacles which must be overcome but are supremely confident that your Government will successfully solve them. We wish you success and trust that you will carry back with you the knowledge that the United States Government and its people wish always to remain the friend of the Gold Coast Government and its people.

As a memento of this very happy occasion I should like to present to you, Mr. Nkrumah, a copy of the United States Government Organization Manual, and to you, Mr. Botsio, a copy of a book on the American Educational System.

LIBERIA

PRINCIPAL POLICIES AND PROBLEMS IN RELATIONS WITH LIBERIA 1

Editorial Note

A Liberian Commission, composed of Liberian Secretary of State Gabriel L. Dennis, Liberian Attorney General C. Abayomi Cassell, and Liberian Treasury Economist Charles B. Sherman (later joined by Liberian Secretary of Public Works and Utilities Henry B. Duncan) visited Washington from October 1950 to February 1951. The Commission carried on negotiations during this period with United States officials in seeking American assistance for a Liberian long-range development program. The Liberian Commission also sought to obtain some form of military assistance from the United States.

The negotiations between the Liberian Commission and officials of the United States Government resulted in the conclusion in Washington on December 22, 1950, of a general agreement with Liberia for technical cooperation under the Point Four Program and a memorandum of understanding providing for the establishment of a Joint Commission on Economic Development to survey the resources of Liberia and plan and advise on the Point Four Program for Liberia. In announcing the agreements, the Department of State explained that the Liberian Government would contribute 20 percent of its national revenue toward the cost of the program. It was estimated that the contribution would average about $1 million per year. The annual rate of spending by the United States for the program of technical assistance was expected to reach $850,000 by June 1951. For the lengthy statement issued by the Department of State at the time of the signing of the agreements, see Department of State Bulletin, January 1, 1951, page 27. The Joint Commission met for the first time on March 1, 1951 in Monrovia and frequently thereafter. It was chaired by Liberian Secretary of the Treasury William E. Dennis and included the following Liberian Government officials: Attorney General, Secretary of Public Instruction, Secretary of Public Works and Utilities, Secretary of Agriculture and Commerce, Economic Adviser (Charles Sherman), and the Director of Public Health and Sanitation. The United States representation on the Joint Commission was headed by the Officer in Charge of the United States Embassy and also included C. Reed Hill, the Technical Cooperation Officer in Liberia, James H. Rives, Public Works Adviser, Frank E. Pinder, Agricultural Adviser, and Colonel Hildrus A. Poindexter, Adviser to the Bureau of Public Health and Sanitation. Documentation on the technical cooperation program in Liberia, including records of the meetings of the Joint Commission, is included in file 876.00–TA.

An agreement to provide a United States Military Training Mission to serve in Liberia was signed by Secretary of State Acheson and Liberian Secretary of State Dennis on January 11, 1951. The purpose of the mission was to assist the military authorities of Liberia in the training and organization of the Liberian armed forces in order to increase the internal security of Liberia. For a statement issued to the press in connection with the signing of the agreement, see Department of State Bulletin, January 22, 1951, page 151. For the text of the agreement, see 2 UST (pt. 1) 1. The United States Military Training Mission for Liberia reached Monrovia on August 27, 1951. It was composed of Lieutenant Colonel Raymond E. Contee, Major Leo W. Gibbons, and Major Henry T. Morgan and a staff of noncommissioned officers. Documentation on the Military Mission is included in file 776.58.

For documentation on the negotiations leading to the conclusion of the December 21, 1950 and January 11, 1951 agreements, see Foreign Relations, 1950, volume V, pages 1706 ff.

Department of State Policy Statement 1

[Washington, January 10, 1951.]

LIBERIA

A. OBJECTIVES

The long-range objectives of US policy toward Liberia encompass three principal aims: (1) to assist Liberia to achieve orderly progress in political, economic and social development; (2) resolutely to support Liberia's political independence and territorial integrity; and (3) to maintain our strategic and commercial positions in Liberia.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Department of State Policy Statements were concise summaries of current U.S. policy toward a country or region prepared by ad hoc working groups in the responsible geographic offices of the Department. These policy statements, which were intended to provide information and guidance for officers in missions abroad, were referred to appropriate diplomatic missions for comment and criticism. The statements were periodically revised.

B. POLICIES

While our Liberia policy is in some respects similar to our policy toward other underdeveloped territories, our relationship with Liberia requires special treatment and consideration. In 1822 Congress aided in the establishment of Liberia, and since that date we have continued to give an unusual amount of attention to the welfare and progress of this Negro republic, the only one in Africa. Today, in the battle of ideologies between the West and the East, this attention becomes increasingly important as Liberia is the only independent Negro democracy in Africa.

Political. The achievement of our political objectives in Liberia is being advanced by (1) stimulating, through our resident economic and public health missions, much-needed economic and social reforms; (2) encouraging the development by private US enterprise of Liberia's natural resources; and (3) continuing to render upon request appropriate advice to the Liberian Government to assist it in building a sounder government, thereby reducing the possibility of foreign intervention. We will always make it clear that unprovoked interference or intervention in the internal affairs of Liberia would be firmly resisted by the US.

The kind of public utility, economic and public health assistance which we have furnished and are continuing to furnish Liberia is designed to raise the living standards of its people, and to enable the country to reach as rapidly as possible a stage of development at least comparable to neighboring British and French colonial territories. To this extent we regard Liberia as a proving ground for President Truman's Point IV program <sup>2</sup> to show that underdeveloped areas are capable of rapid economic progress.

The location of Liberia, on the coast of Africa nearest to South America and adjacent to the South Atlantic narrows, is of strategic importance in time of war to US lines of communication, both surface and air, to South Africa and South America. The fact that it is the only territory in West Africa not dependent upon a European nation increases Liberia's strategic significance for us.

Our present military, air and naval rights in Liberia are defined in two agreements. One agreement grants to the US certain military air rights until six months after the official termination of World War II.<sup>3</sup> Under this agreement, we are currently subsidizing the maintenance and operation of Roberts Field, which is being operated

The reference here is to the U.S.-Liberian agreement of March 31, 1942, covering the use of airports and defense areas in Liberia. For the text of the agreement, see Department of State Executive Agreement Series No. 275 or 56 Stat. (pt. 2) 1621. For documentation on the negotiations leading to the agreement, see Foreign Relations, 1942, vol. IV, pp. 355 ff.

by an American company under contract to the Department of the Air Force. In view of the temporary nature of our present military air rights, it would be desirable to conclude a new and more permanent agreement with Liberia. It is expected that this will be done shortly.

The other existing agreement provides for the construction (now completed) and operation of a port and port works at Monrovia. Under this agreement, the US upon its own request can exercise certain military and naval rights inside the port or in the vicinity thereof. By virtue of our extraordinarily close relationship with Liberia, we can be confident of obtaining, if necessary, additional military, air and naval rights.

Upon the request of the Liberian Government, President Truman approved on October 19, 1950 a small US military training mission for Liberia. This mission, details of which are now being worked out by the Department of Defense, will undertake to reorganize and train the present poorly organized and ill-equipped Liberian militia for internal security. Apart from the desire of the Liberian Government for national prestige reasons, to build up some semblance of a military force at least comparable to those of her British and French colonial neighbors, we believe our own expanding interests in Liberia justify the formation of an efficient internal security force for general police duty.

Economic. It is US policy to encourage and assist Liberia, within the framework of its independence, to further its economic development in a balanced and orderly manner. To assure the best possible development of Liberia's natural resources, US as well as other foreign investment and commercial activity in the Liberian economy should be encouraged on a freely competitive basis. Such a policy will also provide a basis for obtaining "equal treatment" for US commercial interests in other African areas.

Economic development in Liberia should in general be undertaken only by those enterprises which are prepared to operate in accordance with business practices that do not restrain competition, limit access to markets or otherwise foster monopolistic control. We maintain an impartial position towards US companies, avoiding becoming identified with any one group. While we do not favor cancellation of existing concessions, we are urging progressive modification of those privileges not in conformity with declared US policy.

Our policy is implemented through public statements of US approval of progressive measures undertaken by Liberia to improve its economy and strengthen its government; advice to the Liberian Government on financial and political matters; agricultural, economic and public health surveys and development programs now being undertaken by US economic and public health missions; and suggestions, both formal and informal, about reforms which should be made in the Liberian political, economic and social structures.

The port of Monrovia, which was constructed through the expenditure of over $20,000,000 of lend-lease funds, is now operating as a free port facility, the only one of its kind in West Africa, under the Monrovia Port Management Company. This company was organized at the instance of the Department of State by a group of American business interests operating in Liberia. Its functions are set forth in a detailed contract with the Liberian Government, as contemplated in the original Lend-Lease Agreement between the US and Liberia.

So long as the Management Company is composed of primary users of the port, it is our policy to have the firms participating in the Management Company represent a cross-section of commercial activity in Liberia. To that end, we would not oppose participation of other American interests not presently included in the management of the port or participation by foreign interest provided that majority control of the Management Company remains American. The port should be operated at all times in accordance with the criteria of the best interest of Liberia, non-discriminatory practices, and maximum repayment of the funds expended by the US for the construction of the port, consistent with our other general objectives in Liberia. The Management group should grant port concessions only on the basis of a sound utilization survey; leases and concessions granted during the initial period of operation should either be limited to short periods or should be made renewable periodically with rates subject to renegotiation in the light of port traffic and revenues. Because of US interest in obtaining the quickest return on its investment, the Department and other agencies of the Government such as the Treasury Department and the General Accounting Office will have to examine the effectiveness of the operations by means of periodic audits or other examinations of the Management Company's over-all performance of its duties and responsibilities.

While we favor increased private investment and commercial activity, experience with The Liberia Company, organized by Mr. Edward R. Stettinius, Jr., indicates that when the views of the Department are sought we should strongly impress upon those connected with new ventures the desirability of concentrating on projects which directly relate to the economic development of Liberia, and which are within their capacity to finance and to carry forward to a successful conclusion.

In view of increasing private investment and commercial activity in Liberia and because of the large US commitments in other areas, the Liberian Government should not be encouraged to expect large-scale financial assistance from the US. However, in cases where Liberia is unable to finance appropriate development projects from its own or private resources, we will consider, as we are doing at the present time, the advisability of US financial assistance. These considerations apply to Liberia's request for a $10,000,000 Export-Import Bank loan to finance a hydro-electric plant and transmission system, water and sewage disposal systems, and a highway improvement and construction project. The Export-Import Bank is in the process of studying these projects.

The US Economic and Public Health Missions to Liberia have been of great assistance to the Liberian Government in helping to promote the economic development of the country and to improve living standards. Plans are now being worked out to expand the activities of these two missions under the Point IV Technical Cooperation program. Tentatively, $850,000 has been allotted to finance these activities, and the two missions as presently constituted will be merged into the operating facility for Point IV Technical Assistance to Liberia.

It is US policy to encourage the development of the Liberian mineral and other resources in ways that will ensure American consumers free and equal access to any newly-discovered sources and permit acquisition of any available supplies for US Government stockpiles. We oppose any arrangement which would allow production or distribution of Liberian products to be controlled by an enterprise participating in a cartel.

On the labor front we are fully aware of the importance of good relations between US-owned firms and Liberian workers in promoting the development of that country and maintaining friendly relations between the two governments. While we do not instruct US firms as to their labor policies, we believe it important that these firms should follow a labor relations policy which would make for a progressively higher standard of living.

We should continue to make available to Liberia technical counsel to facilitate the development of sound financial institutions and fiscal policies.

The importance that Liberia attaches to its participation in an expanding multilateral world trading system is attested by the fact that Liberia was the only country to accept unconditionally the Charter for an ITO. Liberia participated in the Annecy tariff negotiations and acceded to the GATT. Liberia also belongs to the Rubber Study Group. Although we recognize the fact that Liberia is handicapped by the lack of personnel, we should encourage Liberia to attend sessions of the Contracting Parties and Rubber Study Group.

The Department is of the opinion that a direct American-controlled air service between the US and Liberia is highly desirable. We do not, however, consider it advisable to require an uneconomic service to be operated by Pan American Airways so long as a connecting service to Monrovia is available which will permit passengers to obtain through passage without delays between New York and Liberia. A connecting service with Pan American's trunk route at Dakar would have certain advantages over a connecting service at Accra, although it is of course desirable to have connecting services into Roberts Field from both Dakar and Accra.

C. RELATIONS WITH OTHER STATES

The proximity of British and French colonial territories and the general political weakness of Liberia have in the past created problems between Liberia and her more powerful neighbors. The resulting differences have from time to time required US intercession with the British and French to support Liberia's independence and territorial integrity. Today, with the United Nations and the various mutual assistance programs now in operation, the danger of political intervention in Liberia by either of those countries is considerably reduced. However, there are at present active Communist elements in French Guinea and the Ivory Coast, which if permitted to develop and expand, might emerge as a dangerous threat to the Liberian democratic process of government. Any drastic change in the Metropolitan Government of France which might bring the Communists into control of that government would, of course, affect conditions in the French territories surrounding Liberia. Under such circumstances it is almost certain that these colonial territories would change over to communist control.

We approve increased friendly foreign commercial activity in Liberia providing it carries no undesirable political implications. Both Great Britain and France are endeavoring to expand their political influence in Liberia through increased economic activity. Any sign of disinclination on our part to continue any US-sponsored activities, such as the operation of American-built Roberts Field, has been followed immediately by an offer to do so from the British or the French.

Liberia and the USSR do not maintain diplomatic relations and there is no Soviet influence in Liberia.

D. POLICY EVALUATION

The success of our present policy toward Liberia is publicly attested to by President Tubman's frequent re-affirmation of Liberia's whole-hearted acceptance of the US as its "next friend". Accelerated American-sponsored economic development in Liberia, with the full support of the Liberian Government, is another example of successful US influence. Success of our policy in the field of positive assistance is reflected in the construction of a port and port works with American funds and personnel, in partial financing by the Export-Import Bank of the Bomi Hills iron ore project, and in financial support by the Department of the Air Force of American-built Roberts Field. Then there are the important benefits to Liberia's economic and social development brought about by the US economic and Public Health missions, financed by the US Government and staffed with American technical personnel. The regular support given the United States in the UN is further evidence of the success of our policy toward Liberia.

While there are no unresolved current policy problems of any consequence between the US and Liberia, there remains much to be done in the improvement of Liberia's economic and political structure, which can be achieved only through the continuation of our present assistance.

There are few obstacles within Liberia which could prevent or seriously hamper the attainment of our objectives. On the contrary, our efforts are made easier by the traditional willingness of Liberia to accept US advice. Failures in the attainment of our objectives in Liberia have in the past resulted from our own lack of perseverance, rather than from any Liberian opposition. These failures have comprised inconsistencies in financial assistance to Liberia in its periods of need, and, from time to time, failure effectively to resist foreign encroachment on the territorial integrity of Liberia. Since 1942, however, we have displayed greater initiative in our policy toward Liberia, and our programs of direct aid and assistance have concretely demonstrated our awareness of our unique role as Liberia's "next friend". Additional assistance-type measures now under active consideration will further strengthen our position in Liberia. These include tentative allocation of $850,000 for a Point IV Technical Assistance program, furnishing Liberia a military training mission, and a possible Export-Import loan for public utility-type projects.

Memorandum by the National Advisory Council Staff Committee to the National Advisory Council

CONFIDENTIAL

[Washington,] January 15, 1951.

NAC Document No. 1090

Subject: Proposed Export-Import Bank Credits to Liberia 1

Problem

The Export-Import Bank has requested the National Advisory Council to approve consideration by it of credits not in excess of $5 million to the Republic of Liberia for financing the cost of approved highway improvement and construction projects directly related thereto (NAC Document No. 1084 2), including expenditures for technical personnel other than those to be furnished by the Liberian Government or the Technical Assistance Program.

Background

The Republic of Liberia has applied to the Export-Import Bank for credits totalling $10,046,000 to assist in financing:

(a) a hydro-electric plant (including transmission and distribution systems);

(b) a water supply and distribution system and a sewage disposal system for the capital city of Monrovia; and

(c) a highway development program and related construction projects.

This application is an outgrowth of discussions initiated by Liberia as far back as 1944, of subsequent studies by the United States Economic Mission to Liberia, and of State Department discussions with the Export-Import Bank over a year ago. The Bank is of the opinion that the hydro-electric, water, and sewage projects require more detailed engineering and economic investigation by Liberia before they can be properly appraised.

At this time the Export-Import Bank is prepared to consider financing up to $5 million of projects selected from the over-all road expansion program, as well as services required for study of the other projects. This program has been prepared in close cooperation with the United States Economic Mission. Liberian plans for use of the proposed loan are being coordinated with the program for providing surveying, planning, and supervisory services being projected for Liberia under the Technical Assistance Program. Also, it is understood that the Export-Import Bank would be prepared to permit utilization of a portion of the loan funds to defray the cost of providing additional technical personnel if this should be necessary for the successful execution of the highway projects. The proposed loan is to be used to cover local as well as foreign costs of the proposed projects. It should be noted, however, that these road projects are part of a total development program to be undertaken in Liberia, which will involve substantial expenditures on the part of the Liberian Government for maintenance and feeder roads.

The only possible source of private financing for the Liberian Government would be under the terms of a loan contract which was negotiated with the Firestone Rubber Company in 1936. Under this contract Liberia was entitled to borrow a further $2.5 million from the company, but the conditions of this contract included a provision that Liberia would not borrow from any other source without Firestone's consent. For a variety of reasons, which appear to be valid, Liberia does not desire to borrow under this contract. Instead, an agreement has been made to liquidate the outstanding balance of something less than $600,000 before the end of 1953, and Firestone is understood to have waived its control over borrowing from other sources.

Discussion

It is believed that the financing of highway construction represents perhaps the best possible utilization of loan funds for development of the Liberian economy. It is expected that such highways will contribute both to expanded production and exports of such important commodities as rubber, timber, cocoa and oil kernels and to the supply of consumption goods needed by workers employed in these industries, as well as contributing in a more general way to accelerated development of the Liberian economy from the longer-run point of view.

It is roughly estimated that at least $1 million but not more than $2 million out of the $5 million total cost of the projects will represent direct purchases of equipment or materials, such as highway construction equipment, steel and cement, in the United States or Europe. It is hoped that a substantial but unknown portion of the needs for road building equipment can in fact be supplied out of such equipment available from other completed construction projects either in Liberia or French Africa.

Ability to Repay

The ability of Liberia to repay a dollar loan is determined by the balance of payments of Liberia and by the budgetary position of the Liberian Government. Given the fact that the U.S. dollar is the circulating currency in Liberia, and the complete absence of a capital market in the country, this becomes a question of the revenues and expenditures of the Liberian Government.

The total revenues of the Liberian Government for calendar 1950 are estimated at $3.8 million, of which $2 million was from duties on imports. These receipts are expected to be increased, perhaps by as much as $3 million during the next two years, as a result of new arrangements for the payment of an income tax by the Firestone Company and increases already experienced in the price of rubber on world markets. Even over the longer-run, it is probable that Liberia's public revenue annually will be at least $1.5 to $2 million more than at present. On the expenditure side, it should be noted that the Technical Assistance Program which the United States Technical Cooperation Administration is currently working out with the Liberian Government involves the annual allocation of 20 percent of its revenues for the duration of the program beginning with fiscal 1950-51 to finance other development programs out of its own resources. This will involve an allocation of $1.0-$1.3 million of the 1950-51 revenues to the Technical Assistance Program, and the agreed loan repayments to the Firestone Company will amount to approximately $200,000 during each of the next three years.

Since a substantial budgetary surplus has been realized in recent years, it seems reasonable to anticipate that the Liberian Government can carry the debt service burden of this loan.

Proposed Terms

The terms envisaged for this loan by the Export-Import Bank are 18 years maturity and 3-1/2 percent interest. Although interest will accrue from the date of disbursement, it is anticipated that there will be a six to twelve months grace period before payments covering interest and amortization of principal begin.

Conclusion

Consideration by the Export-Import Bank of the proposed loan to the Republic of Liberia would appear to be desirable. It would, of course, be understood that extending the loan would carry no commitment concerning the granting of licenses for equipment and materials from United States sources.<sup>3</sup>

&quot;The National Advisory Council advises the Export-Import Bank that it approves consideration by the Bank of credits not in excess of $5 million to the Republic of Liberia for financing the cost of approved highway improvement and construction projects. It is understood that these credits will bear interest of about 3-½ percent, with maturities in the neighborhood of 18 years." National Advisory Council Action No. 449, January 16, indicates that the quoted recommendation was unanimously adopted by the Council through a telephone poll completed on January 16. (NAC Files: Lot 60 D 137: NAC Actions)

Editorial Note

On January 22, the Board of Directors of the Export-Import Bank of Washington authorized a credit of $5 million to Liberia for road construction and improvement. The credit was to bear interest at the rate of 31/2 percent per annum and to be amortized over a period of 18 vears. The Board of Directors also decided the proposed Liberian electric power, water, and sewerage projects required further study before consideration for financing was justified. The views of the National Advisory Council are set forth in NAC Document 1090, supra.

A draft text of a credit agreement was soon negotiated between the Bank and the Liberian Commission and forwarded to Liberia for approval. Regarding Liberian President Tubman's concern over the action of the Export-Import Bank and some specific aspects of the draft agreement, see the immediately following pages. The formal agreement between the Export-Import Bank and Liberia for the $5 million highway improvement and construction credit was signed in Washington on February 21. Liberian Secretary of State Dennis, the head of the Liberian Commission in Washington, signed on behalf of Liberia. The Liberian legislature, convened in special session, approved the agreement on August 16.

Basic documentation on the negotiation of the agreement of February 21, including the text of the agreement itself, is included in Department of State file 876.10. Other important documentation on the credit is included in file 103 XMB.

The Chargé in Liberia (Richardson) to the Department of State 1

CONFIDENTIAL

Monrovia, January 25, 1951.

No. 249

Subject: Point IV Program in Liberia 2

The statement by President Tubman yesterday morning that he has instructed the Liberian Mission now in Washington to defer any action on the Export-Import Bank loan application 3 seems to jeopardize a large part of the projected Point IV program for Liberia. This decision of the President's is admittedly not economic but political, as was pointed out in the Embassy's despatch No. 193 of December 8, 1950; but it is nevertheless a firm decision, based on the realities of local Liberian politics, as seen by Tubman. Yesterday morning he reiterated strongly that it would be political suicide for him to borrow money for road construction before making definite provisions for a water supply for Monrovia. He considers the water supply even more important than the hydroelectric plant, which is another pet of the politicians. The opening of the Free Port has exacerbated the situation, for the Port sells water to ships calling at Monrovia and also to local residents who are able to haul it away. These residents are principally foreigners, which increases the dissatisfaction of the Liberians and raises further political problems for the President.

<sup>3</sup>Regarding the January 22 Export-Import Bank decision on a credit to Liberia, see the editorial note, supra. Presumably the statement by President Tubman referred to here was that reported upon in telegram 156, January 24, from Monrovia, which is summarized in footnote 2, p. 1287.

With reference to the last paragraph of the Department's instruction No. 19 of January 13, 1951,<sup>4</sup> I have already conferred with President Tubman as to the steps being taken to appropriate twenty percent of Liberian Government revenues for the economic development program, and he stated that this will be provided in the budget.

The final sentence of the Department's instruction, however, shows what I believe to be a miscomprehension on the part of the Department. President Tubman agrees to apply these funds not exclusively toward the implementation of projects and programs recommended by the Joint Commission, but toward the economic development plan in general as outlined in the application for assistance. In other words, development projects which he considers essential but for which he cannot obtain funds elsewhere, will be financed from the twenty percent. This is apt to be the case with the water-works project for Monrovia, which will of course result in there being less money available for Liberia's contribution to other projects.

A somewhat similar miscomprehension is shown in the final paragraph of the Department's instruction No. 17 of January 10.4 The Liberian Government has not agreed, and in all probability will not agree, to establishing the agricultural laboratory in the immediate vicinity of Booker Washington Institute at Kakata. Although the Liberian Government contributes to the support of the Institute, the Institute is considered a private school, not a Government school. It is true that there is a long-range plan for taking over the Institute and integrating it into the Liberian national school system, but so long as the control of the school remains outside the Government, even though the Government might be represented on the governing board, the Government will not consent to having a governmental institution such as an agricultural laboratory attached to the Institute.

If any cooperation is to be obtained from the Liberian Government, the agricultural laboratory will probably have to be established in the vicinity of Suakoko, where the Government is showing great interest in the Central Agricultural Station. Mr. Frank Pinder of the Economic Mission concurs in the view that the agricultural laboratory should be planned for Suakoko rather than Kakata.

Finally, I consider it highly advisable that personnel under Point IV not be sent in advance of the conclusion of specific project agreements setting forth in detail the duties and responsibilities of the American personnel sent out. Colonel Poindexter of the United States Public Health Mission and Mr. Pinder and Mr. Rives of the United States Economic Mission concur in this view. All feel strongly, a feeling which I share, that any attempt to force our views on the Liberians will be met either by a blank refusal or by covert sabotage of any plans which they may feel themselves to have been compelled to accept.

Tubman's apparent effort pressure decision by proposed withdrawal road projects and enter negots with Fr interests creating unfavorable impression here.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Telegram 156 reported that President Tubman had informed Chargé Richardson that the Liberian Commission in Washington had been instructed to defer the application for an Export-Import Bank credit in part because Tubman felt that the Monrovia water and sewerage project was politically essential and more important than the road construction project. (876.10/1–2451) Telegram 159 reported that Tubman indicated to Chargé Richardson that the Liberian Government was inclining towards approval to a French banking syndicate for opening a bank in Monrovia. The French group appeared prepared to advance money for the construction of the Monrovia water and sewerage system. (876.10/1–2751) Regarding Liberia's applications to the Export-Import Bank for credits for a number of economic development projects and the negotiations by the Liberian Commission in Washington on behalf of those applications, see the editorial note, p. 1285.

Implied tying acceptance road project loans to contingency that water project must be accepted same time creates impression here LibGovt more concerned with benefits to small group in Monrovia than country-wide development.

Assumption road construction not immed profitable, not valid. On contrary, US Govt believes road projects are ones from which quickest returns may be expected. Each mile new or improved road begins at once yield returns whereas hydro or water system must be wholly completed before returns begin. Advances on road loan, except for revolving fund, will be made as expenditures incurred. These will be small at first increasing in size as work accelerates with largest advances toward end construction period. Since each note is separate obligation, interest and amortization during first three years will be small and no serious burden LibGovt's revenues.

Cancellation clause (art VIII of draft loan agreement <sup>3</sup>) makes clear no cancellation contemplated except for cause. Such clause in all Eximbank loan contracts. If wording unsatis Bank advises suggested changes may be offered for consideration.

While Dept doubts benefits will accrue Liberia from establishment Fr Bank, this matter for Lib to decide. Dept also doubts Fr will finance water system on more favorable terms than now under consideration. Pres Tubman shld, if Fr financing accepted, make sure commitments will not interfere with other loans or assistance for projects not included in Fr financing.

In ur discussion with Tubman you may use any or all foregoing pts as you deem necessary. You shid again remind him Liberia's request for tech assistance is one of largest, and US Govt has endeavored provide assistance most desired by Liberia. Likewise Lib's loan application has recd most sympathetic consideration by Eximbank.

Dept understands Lib Comm has forwarded loan agreement to Pres with recommendation agreement be approved.

&lt;sup>1</sup>This letter was drafted by Sims (NEA/AF) and was cleared by Gorlitz (ED). Telegram 106, February 7, to Monrovia, explained that the letter was to be delivered the following day to President Tubman by Liberian Treasury official Charles Sherman, a member of the Liberian Commission in Washington, who was scheduled to fly to Monrovia to confer with Tubman. (876.10/2–351) In telegram 169, February 13, from Monrovia, Chargé Richardson reported as follows on Tubman's reaction to the McGhee letter:

&quot;President Tubman very appreciative of letter of Secretary McGhee and of his personal interest. Tubman agrees with everything McGhee says and is answering letter immediately, but he feels US Government approaches matter solely from economic viewpoint while Liberian Government must consider both economic and political viewpoints. He has authorized Liberian Mission sign loan agreement subject to amendments. . . ."

Richardson concluded his report as follows: "Tubman strongly emphasized he does not want nor expect loan difficulties to affect good relations between US and Liberia." (876.10/2-1351)

You are, of course, conversant with the fact that the Export-Import Bank has approved a $5,000,000 line of credit for road development in Liberia. The Bank has also indicated that it will give careful consideration to your Government's request for additional loans to finance a water and sewage project for Monrovia, and a hydro-electric project at such time as more detailed technical data is presented to determine more definitely the nature and type of such projects, and their economic feasibility.<sup>2</sup>

I believe you will agree that this action, together with the results we have achieved with the Technical Assistance Program and Military Training Mission, reflects a spirit of good will on our part, and an honest desire to be of all possible aid to your country consistent with the laws which govern our Executive Departments. As an individual, I can readily appreciate your concern over Monrovia's need for a water and sewage system. However, when these projects are reviewed by the United States Government, represented in this instance by the Export–Import Bank, the provisions of law laid down by Congress in the granting of financial assistance to another country must be applied. The Export–Import Bank must, therefore, adhere to proper banking principles and must judge each loan application on the basis of adequate technical and economic data to prove the soundness of each project.

In order to do this a wealth of information is required, particularly in cases where highly technical construction is involved. It is solely because of the absence of complete technical and economic data that the Bank is not able, at this time, to render a definite answer on whether or not it will grant loans for the water and sewage and hydro-electric projects.

Finally, let me say that in this matter the United States has only one purpose, namely, to render all possible assistance to help advance the economic welfare of your country. Liberia has a host of good and faithful friends throughout the United States, both official and private, and during my tenure as Assistant Secretary of State, I have not found another example to match the unanimity which your friends display in working for the good of Liberia. For me, as I said in my recent letter to you, it is a source of genuine satisfaction to be able to participate in developments designed to bring about greater progress in Liberia, and I want to reassure you that I will continue to pursue this course.

With kindest personal regards.

Sincerely yours,

George C. McGhee

The President of Liberia (Tubman) to the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern, South Asian, and African Affairs (McGhee)<sup>1</sup>

[Monrovia,] 14 February 1951.

My Dear Secretary McGhee: Your very interesting letter of 7th instant 2 has been received; and I am exceedingly happy to have been the recipient of it.

The Five Million Dollars line of credit which the Export/Import Bank has approved for road development in Liberia, the granting of which you and several other sincere and genuine friends of this country have lent aid and assistance in obtaining, is well known to me, and I wish here to express the appreciation of the Government and myself to Export/Import Bank and the State Department and other officials of your Government who have been instrumental in affording us this opportunity of development which is so essentially necessary and desirable at this time.

That the Bank has given indications that it will give careful consideration to the Government's request for additional loans to finance a water and sewage project for Monrovia, and a hydro-electric project at such time as more detailed technical data is presented to determine more definitely the nature and type of such projects, and their economic feasibility, I consider a sympathetic and kindly attitude and I am profoundly grateful for this.

I am sure that you can readily appreciate, as you have stated in your letter, my concern over Monrovia's need for a water and sewage system and I can understand and appreciate the fact that the provisions of law laid down by Congress in the granting of financial assistance to other countries must be applied by the Export/Import Bank, and that they must adhere to proper banking principles and must judge each application from the basis of adequate, technical and economic data to prove the soundness of each project, etc., as mentioned in the third paragraph of the letter which you were very graciously thoughtful enough to have written to me.

I am satisfied with the assurance given to me by you that it is solely because of the absence of complete technical and economic data that the Bank is not able, at this time, to render a definite answer on whether or not it will grant loans for the water and sewage and hydroelectric projects, and since Malcolm Pirnie engineers are expected to soon be here, I am hopeful that the complete data required will be available within the next few weeks.

The Bankers, as financiers, are primarily and almost generally concerned with only the economic phase of any proposition presented to them, but I am sure as a statesman you can appreciate the political aspect of this development program, particularly so when in the Five Year Plan there is hardly anything provided for the improvement and development of our principal cities and towns, and I assure you that if my contention were referred to a plebiscite or referendum in Liberia more than ninety-five per cent of the entire populations of the country, from the remotest interior to the seacoast, would support the position that I have taken.

If I did not believe, in very truth, that the United States were desirous of giving all possible assistance to help advance the economic welfare of this country, I never would have made the approach.

Besides this, the contributions that have and are being made by the United States Government and a number of her citizens and private enterprizes toward the development of Liberia, economically, religiously and socially verify what I have written.

I have striven to the best of my ability, with my whole heart, mind and strength, to develop the closest possible friendly relationship between our two countries because Liberia is the outgrowth of American philanthropy and benevolence, and I assure you that there is nothing that can estrange that relationship so far as the Government and people of Liberia are concerned, not even if the loans for road, water and sewage and hydro-electric fail.

I presume by now the Liberian Mission has informed you that the Legislature will adjourn on the 15th instant and that should the data required by Export/Import Bank be ready against the end of March or April they will be called in Extraordinary Session to consider all loan projects.

Thank you again, dear Secretary McGhee, for the interest manifested in the development of my country, and I most earnestly appeal to you for your continued interest and assistance, for which I assure you of the unswerving gratitude of me personally and of the Liberian Government and people.

With every good wish for your personal welfare and that of your Great Country, I remain now and always,

Very sincerely yours,

WM. V. S. TUBMAN

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Acting Officer in Charge of West, Central, and East African Affairs (Sims)

RESTRICTED

[Washington,] March 1, 1951.

Subject: Transfer of Edward R. Dudley, American Ambassador to Liberia.

Participants: Ambassador Edward R. Dudley

Mr. Berry—NEA Mr. Sims—AF

In a meeting this afternoon Ambassador Dudley referred to the conversations he has had with Mr. McGhee, Mr. Peurifoy, Mr. Humelsine, and Mr. Butrick concerning a possible transfer for him. He explained that when Mr. Peurifoy first mentioned such a proposal last June he was, of course, highly pleased, but stated at that time that he preferred to remain in Liberia and complete some of the work in which he was currently engaged. The Ambassador discussed this matter with Mr. McGhee at that time, who agreed that it would be desirable for him to remain in Liberia for a few more months.

The question of Ambassador Dudley's transfer again arose in December 1950, at which time the Ambassador told Mr. Humelsine he would like to review the matter during his period of home leave, and discuss it with him prior to his scheduled return to Monrovia in March. The Ambassador told Mr. Berry that since such good success has recently been achieved in developing: 1) an Embassy building program; 2) a Point Four Program for Liberia; 3) the assignment of a Military Training Mission to the country; and 4) the granting of an Export-Import loan to Liberia, he believes he has made his most important contributions to United States-Liberian relations. Ambassador Dudley offered the opinion that henceforth the work of the American Ambassador to Liberia will be principally confined to supervision of the aforementioned developments. Therefore, he said, after very careful thought he has decided that if the Department wishes to use him in some other area, he is willing and anxious to serve. He made it quite clear, however, that he was not seeking a transfer. But he personally believes that in view of the great problems facing our country in winning the Colored peoples of the world to our side, particularly in Asia, now is the time for our government to demonstrate that it does more than assign only one of its Negro citizens to another Negro country. The Ambassador referred to his conversation with Mr. Butrick earlier in the day, and said Mr. Butrick had discussed the matter in detail and mentioned Burma as a possible assignment.

Mr. Butrick had explained to him that an opening might develop there soon.

Mr. Berry said that the transfer of a Chief of Mission was decided at a level above where he worked but that he would bring Ambassador Dudley's thoughts immediately to the attention of Mr. Humelsine, and to Mr. McGhee's attention upon his return from abroad. He went on to say that on several occasions he had discussed with Mr. McGhee the eventual transfer of Ambassador Dudley. When the subject first arose, he and Mr. McGhee thought of Burma as a possibility, but shortly thereafter Burma was transferred to the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs, and NEA no longer exercises jurisdictional responsibility for that country. At the time Burma was transferred to FE, Mr. Berry said Mr. McGhee suggested that they keep attention focused on some other post in the NEA area where Ambassador Dudley might serve, but thus far no suitable openings have developed in NEA. Mr. Berry said that Burma would certainly offer great opportunities for the Ambassador's talents. Mr. Berry spoke highly of the Ambassador's ability and his outstanding record in Liberia, and said that all of the Officers in the Department who have dealt with the Ambassador had only praise for the very effective manner in which he conducts our affairs with the Liberians. He said that Liberia is a "show-case" for us, and thus stands as a notable example of what can be achieved in building good friendly relations with other countries. On the subject of opening a second post in the Foreign Service for Negro Ambassadors, which Ambassador Dudley also raised, Mr. Berry said that he and Mr. McGhee had discussed this subject in general terms many times. There would be obvious political merit in such a move but if action along such lines were decided by the higher authorities, it would be Mr. Humelsine's, or Mr. Butrick's office which would initiate action.

The Ambassador in Liberia (Dudley) to the Department of State 1

CONFIDENTIAL

Monrovia, May 15, 1951.

No. 380

Subject: Political Parties and the General Election of 1951

The election of May 1, 1951, continues the control of the Liberian government by the True Whig Party. The party was organized in 1869, won its first election in 1877. It has not lost an election since that time. Heretofore the perpetual domination of the political scene by the True Whig Party has been accounted for by several factors, the most significant of which are:

1. The organization of a close-knit group of literate Americo-Liberians who have controlled the illiterate 95 per cent aboriginal element.

2. Election laws and methods of administration have effectively precluded full participation of all citizens in government.

3. Low level of economic development of the Republic over a period of years; thus the traditional dependence of the literate group on government jobs as a source of employment which has prevented the organization of effective opposition drawn from the ranks of the literate elements. This factor has forestalled the social and educational progress of the aboriginal population and has generally accounted for their passive disposition toward government.

Though some of these factors have been mitigated by the Tubman administration, the elections on May 1, 1951, marked a new phenomenon in Liberian politics; namely the lack of participation of a contesting candidate in a presidential election. From 1923 to 1943 three minority parties appeared. Between them they contested each of the presidential elections held during that epoch. In 1923 Thomas J. R. Faulkner sought nomination with the True Whig Party as Vice Presidential candidate but was ruled out by traditional methods. Mr. Faulkner then organized the Peoples Party and opposed C. D. B. King, the True Whig presidential candidate, in the presidential elections of 1923 and 1927. Mr. King resigned in 1930 as a result of a trade-labor scandal. Edwin Barclay became Acting President following King's resignation and in 1931 was elected President of the Republic for a four year term over Thomas J. R. Faulkner. C. D. B. King organized the Unit Whig Party and in 1935 attempted to stage a comeback but was defeated at the polls by Barclay, the True Whig candidate. Barclay secured an amendment to the constitution extending the life of his office from four to eight years and in 1943 "virtually selected Tubman to succeed him." Mr. Tubman was opposed by James F. Cooper of the Democratic Party.

At least four significant factors emerge from even a cursory perusal of the history of political parties and elections in Liberia. In the first instance all organized opposition to the True Whig Party has been instituted by men who were financially independent of the government. Yet their financial resources have been inadequate to compete with the True Whig Party which employs such devices as enforced contributions which simply means that at least once a year all government employees endorse their monthly checks payable to the True Whig Party. (Excludes foreign personnel employed by the Government). Secondly, only one basic split has occurred within the ranks of the True Whig Party since 1923. Thirdly, there has been no effective organization of the aboriginal population into effective political opposition parties. Finally, previous election returns have shown evidence of corruption and unfairness.

In recent years opposition parties have appeared which have been effectively controlled. In the spring of 1949 Richard Nathaniel Holder, former Secretary of the Interior under the Barclay administration, organized the Reformation Party and became its eccentric Presidential candidate. At that time Mr. Holder had the support of several high government officials who remained behind the scene. It is also evident that Holder and his better qualified supporters were depending on and worked through the Porro society which has a considerable number of members in Liberia's Hinterland. Through public doles, Tubman succeeded to a degree in reconciling the differences which existed among the malcontents of the True Whig Party or former True Whig partisans. This left Holder and the smaller fry to carry the "war ax" and at infrequent intervals Holder published articles attacking the Tubman administration.

Early in February of 1951 Holder announced that the Reformation Party would hold its national convention on February 27. On February 24, 1951, Holder met President Tubman at Marshall and informed him that he had "grounded arms" which meant that he would not oppose him at the presidential election. Holder's withdrawal from the political campaign was no doubt due to a merger between the United Peoples Party and the Reformation Party which was later to occur.

The second source of opposition to the True Whig Party is of some significance since its organization was based on aboriginal support and found expression through Didwo Twe who organized the United People's Party. The party submitted its application for certification as a political party in July of 1950 to the Elections Commission, which was not accepted on the grounds that Twe did not have the required number of members to register the party. Twe was arrested by police authorities in August of 1950 for alleged seditious activities. He was subsequently released from the force of Ne Exeat proceedings by the Government for the purpose of going to the United States for a prostatectomy. He departed on October 22, 1950, had a successful operation and, as stated by True Whig partisans, disseminated critical propaganda concerning the Liberian Government in the United States. Twe returned to Liberia about April 7, 1951, and was instrumental in effecting a merger between the United Peoples Party and the Reformation Party under the name of the latter. This party held its national convention on April 10, 1951, and nominated Twe as its presidential candidate to oppose William V. S. Tubman of the True Whig Party. Twe was estopped from participation in the presidential elections of

May 1, 1951, on the legal ground that the Reformation Party did not register Twe as presidential candidate more than 60 days prior to the election. Thus the True Whig Party carried the name of William V. S. Tubman to the polls on May 1, 1951, unchallenged.

Despite the tendency of the present administration to treat all opposition as inimical to the best interest of the Government, it became increasingly apparent during the recent political campaign that President Tubman and other significant True Whig partisans are desirous of a multi-party or bi-party system of politics. C. D. B. King, Liberian Ambassador to the United States, stated to partisans on April 25 that "loyal, sincere, constructive and patriotic opposition must be encouraged." President Tubman has stated unofficially that he will have two political parties in Liberia before he relinquishes control of the Government.

True Whig Partisans, through implication and direct statements during the political campaign, indicated that the superior culture of the Americo-Liberian has gradually assimilated the tribal groups within the Republic. More important, they intimated in substance that the socio-political metamorphosis of the aboriginal population will occur simultaneously with economic development. Throughout the campaign there were expressions of ethnocentrism: Unity, loyalty, patriotism were emphasized. True Whig partisans contended that the type of political opposition which found expression through Twe was not constructive and with this view most foreigners in Liberia concur. It must be remembered that qualified men in Liberia are few and a change in presidency would only result in a reshuffle of present leaders. It is also significant that when aborigines become civilized through social contacts and interactions with the civilized elements, their political concepts are conditioned by that group of which they become a part. Thus, such aborigines have become loyal True Whig Partisans due to their dependence on the Government as a source of employment. The precise course this type of social and political cohesion will follow in the future will depend on the tempo of economic development and will be conditioned by the personality of the "Standard Bearer" of the True Whig Party. As mentioned previously President Tubman has expressed interest in a bi-party system of politics. As President of the Republic for the past eight years he has been distinctly more progressive than his predecessors. This is somewhat manifested in a review of the election laws of the Republic.

Prior to 1945 the organic law governing elections and qualification of voters provided that "all elections shall be by ballot, and every male citizen of twenty-one years of age possessing real estate shall have the right of suffrage." This provision and similar provisions under revised statutes perpetuated the ruling oligarchy of True Whigs. It provided a legal basis to exclude the aboriginal population from the exercise of the right of suffrage because of the existing system of land tenure.

Despite the limitations imposed on the aboriginal population prior to 1945 previous election returns have shown evidence of unfairness. Aggregate votes cast at the general elections on May 4, 1943, as evidenced by official returns was 248,471 of which 245, 364 were cast for William V. S. Tubman, the True Whig presidential candidate, and 3,107 for James F. Cooper, presidential candidate of the Democratic Party. The pertinent provisions of the election laws in effect at that time provided that every male citizen of the age of twenty-one years and upwards residing and owning land in the voting precinct in which he offers to register, shall be entitled to be registered as a voter. (Chapter LXVI, Section 1312 of Revised Statutes.) "Every aboriginal inhabitant, who shall receive a deed in fee simple as provided by law, shall be entitled to vote under the provisions of law relating to registration of voters and elections." (Section 12 of Revised Statutes.) These provisions represent an improvement over the basic law, and appear to broaden the foundation of rule. Their effectiveness in extension of franchise is rather insignificant considered in relation to the communal possessions of land and the fact that few if any aborigines who had not integrated themselves with the Americo-Liberians held land in fee simple. Considering the Communal possession of land and the fact that Americo-Liberians were estimated at 20,000 and assimilated aborigines were even less, it appears highly improbable therefore that 248,471 votes were cast in the general election of 1943.

In President Tubman's annual message of November 1, 1944, he recommended a constitutional amendment providing for tribesmen of the provinces to be represented in the legislature, which during the 1950–51 session of the legislature was extended to the counties and territories. In December of 1945, an act to regulate elections in the Republic was promulgated. The Liberian constitution and this enactment grant the right of suffrage to all citizens of 21 years of age and over who own real estate in fee simple or own a hut in case of hinterland or tribal areas. This enactment prescribes methods for registration of voters, maintenance of rolls, voting, nomination of candidates, and sets up other machinery which theoretically insure fair elections.

A significant aspect of the elections on May 1, 1951, was the fact that it marked the first time in the history of the Republic that women exercised their franchise in accordance with the new law. It was also the first time that aborigines participated in the election of a President.

The unofficial tabulations of the election returns indicated that 155,792 votes were cast in the general elections on May 1, 1951, for William V. S. Tubman and his running mate William Tolbert. On May 10, 1951, the True Whig party had its victory celebration. Approximately 4,000 representatives from all sections of the country participated in a rather impressive parade through the streets of Monrovia displaying a pageantry of bright colors and banners upon which were recorded the election returns. These returns indicated that between 75 and 80 percent of the potential voters in the various political subdivisions actually voted for Tubman. It is significant in this connection that a number of persons voted who did not comply with the voting prerequisites with respect to age or property.

The lack of an opposing candidate precludes an accurate appraisal of the returns as compared with previous elections. The returns tend, however, to indicate one characteristic which was not common to previous elections; namely, they bore some reasonable relationship to estimated population in the political sub-divisions and were somewhat consistent with the probable qualified voters in the area concerned.

Subject: Liberian Request for an Ex-Im Bank Loan for a Water and Sewerage System for Monrovia.

Participants: Mr. Henry B. Duncan, Secretary for Public Works and Utilities Liberian Government.

Mr. Charles Sherman, Liberian Government Economist.

Mr. George C. McGhee—NEA Mr. E. H. Bourgerie—AF

Mr. Oscar Meier—AF

Mr. Duncan and Mr. Sherman called on Mr. McGhee, at the request of President Tubman, to ask his assistance in expediting the request of the Liberian Government for an Export-Import Bank loan for a water and sewerage system for the City of Monrovia.<sup>1</sup>

Mr. McGhee stated that he understood that Mr. Oscar Meier had talked to officials of the Ex-Im Bank and they had assured him that the request of the Liberian Government for a loan was scheduled to be discussed at the Ex-Im Bank Directors' meeting on June 5. There-¹During April 1951 a revised Liberian application for a credit for a water and sewerage system for Monrovia was presented to the Export-Import Bank. Duncan and Sherman were in the United States on behalf of the Liberian application. On March 19 President Tubman had written to Assistant Secretary McGhee requesting McGhee's "sympathetic assistance" to Sherman in his mission. (876.2615/3–1951) McGhee's reply of April 13 promised careful study by the U.S. Government of the Liberian request. fore, he thought that no intervention on his part would be necessary at this time.

Mr. Duncan said that President Tubman had also requested that he ask Mr. McGhee whether the Liberian Government could proceed to sign a contract with a French company for the construction of a water and sewerage system for Monrovia prior to approval of the loan by the Ex-Im Bank. Mr. McGhee said that he thought it would not be advisable to do this especially since action on the loan application would no doubt be completed in the very near future. Mr. Sherman pointed out that prices on materials had increased substantially since the Liberian Government first started negotiations with the Export-Import Bank for this loan and that the Liberian Government was becoming very concerned about the increased cost of materials as well as their availability.

Mr. McGhee told Mr. Sherman and Mr. Duncan that he was always glad to see them and that they could assure President Tubman that the Department had the best interests of Liberia in mind, and that we would continue to assist Liberia in its development plans.

Memorandum by the National Advisory Council Staff Committee to the National Advisory Council

CONFIDENTIAL

[Washington,] June 22, 1951.

NAC Document No. 1160

Subject: Request by Republic of Liberia for Additional Export-Import Bank Credits

Problem

The Export-Import Bank has requested the advice of the National Advisory Council as to whether the Council perceives any objections to consideration by the Bank of further credits, not in excess of $1,350,000, to the Republic of Liberia for financing a water supply and distribution and sewerage disposal system for Monrovia (NAC Document No. 1152).

¹NAC Document 1152, June 8, was a letter from the Secretary of the Export-Import Bank to the Secretary of the National Advisory Council. The letter is summarized here. (NAC Files: Lot 60 D 137: NAC Documents) The Liberian application called for a credit of $2.348 million to finance the construction of a water system and a sewerage system in Monrovia. The Staff Committee of the Export-Import Bank recommended approval of a credit of $1.35 million covering a sewerage system and the first stage of a water system and suspension of action on the remaining portion of the proposed credit pending the accumulation of further information about the project. Responsible officers in the Department of State hoped that the Bank could make more of a commitment to the second stage of the project. Documentation on the position of the Bank and the Department is included in file 103 XMB for May and June 1951.

Discussion

The National Advisory Council in January 1951 approved consideration by the Export-Import Bank of a loan not in excess of $5 million to the Republic of Liberia for financing the cost of approved highway improvement and construction projects. (See NAC Action No. 449 <sup>2</sup>). NAC Document No. 1090,<sup>3</sup> which was prepared in support of this Action, contains the background information pertinent to consideration of additional credits at this time.

Originally the Republic of Liberia had applied to the Export-Import Bank for credits totaling $10,046,000 to assist in financing (a) a hydro-electric plant (including transmission and distribution system), (b) a water supply and distribution system for the capital city of Monrovia and (c) a highway development program and related construction projects. The Bank, however, was of the opinion then that the hydro-electric, water and sewerage projects required more detailed engineering and economic investigation by Liberia before they could be properly appraised. The Bank has now received additional information on the proposed water supply and distribution system and the proposed sewerage disposal system for Monrovia, and is prepared to act on credits for these projects.

Immediate action with regard to this request for additional credits has been urged by the State Department in view of the desirability of having the matter settled before the departure of the Liberian Delegation.

Liberia is one of the countries for which the National Security Council has made a general interim exception from the provisions of Section 1302 of Public Law No. 45 (82nd Congress).<sup>4</sup>

Proposed Terms

The terms envisaged for this loan by the Export-Import Bank (as in the case of the previous loan) are interest of about 3-1/2% with maturity in the neighborhood of 18 years.

Conclusion

There would appear to be no objection to consideration by the Export-Import Bank of the proposed additional credits to the

Editorial Note

In June the Board of Directors of the Export-Import Bank authorized a credit of $1,350,000 in favor of the Republic of Liberia for the construction of a water supply distribution and sewerage system for the city of Monrovia. The credit bore interest at the rate of 31/2 percent per annum and was repayable in 36 semiannual installments, the first of which fell due one year after the date of the note. Allocations under the credit were conditioned on Liberia's entering into a contract with a United States engineering firm to provide for the engineering and supervision needed for the construction of the projects. Both the engineering firm and its contract of employment were to be satisfactory to the Bank. Liberia would also employ a contractor on the advice of the engineering firm selected and subject to the approval of the Bank, to perform all construction work necessary for the completion of the projects. A formal agreement covering the credit was concluded between the Export-Import Bank and Liberian Government in Washington on July 11, and was approved by the Liberian legislature, convened in special session, on August 16; for documentation, see Department of State files 876.10 and 103 XMB. For the decision of the National Advisory Council with respect to the credit, see NAC Document 1160, June 22, supra.

My Dear Mrs. Roosevelt: With reference to your note of July 23,

1951, and the attachments thereto,<sup>2</sup> I hope the following information may be of some use to you.

Mr. Didwo Twe announced his candidacy for the Liberian Presidency in July 1950 on the United Peoples Party ticket. He then left Liberia in October 1950 for the United States. On returning to Liberia in April 1951, he engineered the merger of the United Peoples Party with the Reformation Party. Then, under the Reformation Party name, he filed his candidacy a second time on April 5, 1951. This application for a place on the ballot was filed only three weeks before election day, May 1, and not sixty days before as required by Liberian law. Consequently, Mr. Twe was refused a place on the ballot. This aspect of the case was apparently handled in conformance with Liberian electoral laws.

Following the denial of a place on the ballot to Mr. Twe, he apparently called upon friends and organizations outside of Liberia to help him obtain redress from what he considered an act of injustice. These actions led him and other members of his party to be charged with sedition, under the rather inclusive Liberian sedition laws. He and the leaders of the Reformation Party were indicted by a grand jury and warrants for their arrest were issued. Mr. Twe went into hiding and has not as yet been found. Some reports indicate he may have left Liberia.

In any case, the Department has received no indication from Liberia that the lives of Mr. Twe and his followers are in any way endangered. However, resentment against Mr. Twe and his party has grown in Liberia as a result of the unfavorable publicity that Liberia has received in the American press during the past few weeks. Responsible Liberian Government officials have been particularly outspoken against what they consider "outside interference" in Liberian domestic affairs. Because of this resentment, Mr. Twe is certainly not in good standing among the members of the Liberian administration, but there is no reason at present to fear that this resentment could take the form of a danger to his life.

With respect to the charges that the present Liberian administration is "anti-native," the history of Liberia in the past ten years is quite to the contrary. The recent Presidential election was, for example, the first in which the native was allowed to vote, suffrage having been granted the native in 1947 by the same President who is now in office.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Mrs. Roosevelt's one-sentence letter simply asked Hickerson for information about the situation in Liberia. Attached to her letter were (1) a letter of July 5 by a Liberian citizen to John Collier, President of the Institute of Ethnic Affairs in Washington, D.C., complaining of the oppression of oppositionist forces within Liberia, and (2) Collier's letter of July 13 to Mrs. Roosevelt (an honorary Vice President of the Institute of Ethnic Affairs) asking if the United Nations Human Rights Commission, the Department of State, or the President could do anything to protect Liberian oppositionist forces.

Furthermore, many of the high Liberian Government officials are of tribal descent. Among these are the Attorney General, the Secretary of War, and the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court.

Finally, the present administration has bent its every effort to the betterment of the economic conditions of the tribal peoples. It has worked closely with a health mission and economic mission sent by the United States to Liberia. The main benefits of both these missions accrue principally to the tribal peoples.<sup>3</sup>

Sincerely yours,

JOHN D. HICKERSON

121. Emb believes Dept's proposal budgetary advice Lib Govt¹ very sound. Agrees authoritative advice needed this stage development. Lib willingness accept such advice hinges on personality of individual and Tubman's learning by extended experience to understand wisdom of accepting expert opinion on fiscal matters. One present source of fiscal mismanagement lies in the supplemental budget provided for under the loan agreement. Under this system annual revenues have been consistently underestimated. The basic budget is based on estimated revenues. This leaves a substantial sum of money each year which is expended unwisely and approved by the legis as a supplemental budget after expenditure.

Therefore part of Dept's recommendation shid include the abolishing of the present system of budgeting funds. This method was all right twenty years ago <sup>2</sup> to protect the loan and allow govt some discretion. It is useless now and leads to abuse by Tubman and others concerned, particularly since the legis is a rubber stamp.

<sup>5</sup> In his telegram 158, October 12, from Monrovia, Ambassador Dudley reported that President Tubman expressed appreciation at the Department's offer of a fiscal expert to study Liberia's needs followed by the recommendation of a highly qualified person attached to the Liberian Government. Tubman indicated he looked with favor on the suggestion but desired to discuss it with his cabinet and key legislators before giving a positive answer. Tubman also expressed the wish for the cancellation of the 1926 Loan Agreement clause requiring the appointment of a financial adviser to the Liberian Government. (876110/10-1251)

[Washington,] October 18, 1951.

A-90. The Department believes that recent developments regarding the trial of certain Liberians for sedition 2 necessitate steps to inform the Liberian Government of the United States Government's concern over this matter. Realizing President Tubman's sensitiveness on this subject and the harm done the Embassy's previous actions by independent approaches to the President, the Department leaves to the Embassy's discretion the time and manner in which the following information is given to the President. However, it is believed that fairly quick action should be taken to put this information before the President before considerable harm is done to Liberia's reputation as a democracy.

As the Embassy is aware, the recent Liberian elections 3 have aroused considerable criticism in the United States, particularly in the press. The Department has received protests from various groups and individuals. Some of these protests sprang from self-interest and old grudges against the Tubman Administration. Others were obviously rooted in sincere concern at apparent signs of undemocratic election practices in Liberia.

The Department has defended the legality of the Liberian Government's action in not placing Didhwo Twe's name on the ballot. On the strength of information received from the Embassy, the Department has also denied recurring rumors that Mr. Twe's life has been in danger.

L/NEA, and Bourgerie (NEA/AF) signed for the Secretary of State.

2 In August, approximately 20 members of the Liberian Reformation Party, which had opposed President Tubman during the May general election, were arrested by Liberian authorities and charged with alleged sedition. Reformation Party leader Didwo Twe, one of those indicted for sedition, fled to Freetown, Sierra Leone. The trial of the other Reformation Party leaders was eventually released and those showed were gradually released. It was reported that at postponed and those charged were gradually released. It was reported that at least one of the prisoners was slain in jail by a fellow prisoner. Documentation on the detention and indictment of the Reformation Party members is included in file 776.00.

The Department is, furthermore, convinced of President Tubman's sincere intention to further Liberia's economic, social and political progress. It has repeatedly pointed to the progress made under his Administration as evidence refuting many of the arguments used against the President by his critics in the United States.

However, the President's reported insistence on pursuing the sedition trial of Reformation Party officials and members is arousing a new round of protests. Letters and inquiries are already arriving from persons who had formerly been unaroused by protests concerning the elections or who had been satisfied with the Department's explanation of the legalities involved. Among these persons is Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt,<sup>4</sup> whose position on the United Nations Commission for Human Rights makes her particularly important. The Department finds it difficult to justify either to these persons or to itself the present exhibition of what amounts to vengeance for political opposition.

The Department is now trying to form an impressive delegation of prominent Americans to represent the United States at President Tubman's inauguration.<sup>5</sup> Steps have been taken to have United States Air Force and Navy units participate in the ceremonies. Liberia is one of the nations receiving most Point 4 aid, and is beng pointed to as a model of the type of progress achieved under Point 4 type programs.

In view of these facts, it is most difficult to maintain that such actions as the proposed trials should be considered as a strictly internal Liberian affair. The trial of political opponents is an act repugnant to most Americans and to most of the peoples associated with the United States in the present fight to protect the free world. The trial of President Tubman's opponents would reflect upon the United States, which has evidenced and is evidencing in many ways its friendship for Liberia and the present Liberian Government. Rightly or wrongly, a political trial of the sort proposed would be considered prima facie evidence of the lack of real democracy in Liberia. This could endanger the entire American program in Liberia because of the obvious possible reaction on the part of the American public and the Congress.

For these reasons, the Department earnestly hopes that the Liberian Government can be persuaded to reconsider or modify its course of

During the remainder of the year arrangements were worked out by the Department for an American delegation to the inauguration. Initially the Department considered a delegation consisting of Nelson Rockefeller, Mrs. Mary Bethune, Col. Harry McBride, and Garland Farmer. Eventually a delegation headed by Ambassador Dudley and including Mrs. Bethune, Gen. James Stowell, and Carl Murphy was approved by President Truman and announced on January 1, 1952. In telegram 234, May 5, from Monrovia, Ambassador Dudley reported that President Tubman had instructed the Liberian Embassy in Washington to approach the Department of State for assistance in purchasing small arms for the Liberian Frontier Force. The arms were needed for security and in order to have troops fully armed in time for the Liberian Presidential inauguration in January 1952. Dudley observed that a major portion of the Liberian frontier force currently used wooden guns on parade. (776.5614/5-551) Telegram 204, June 15, to Monrovia, replied that Liberia was not eligible to receive military assistance under the Mutual Defense Assistance Act and the Department was reluctant to take any steps until the United States Military Training Mission for Liberia had reported. (776.5614/5-1551) In October 1951, Lt. Col. Raymond Contee, senior member of the Military Training Mission, was asked by President Tubman to go to the United States to purchase certain small arms and equipment for the Liberian Frontier Force in advance of the Presidential inauguration. (Letter from Ambassador King to Secretary of State Acheson, November 1, 1951: 776.56/11-151) In an exchange of notes on November 16 and 19 in Washington, the Liberian Government agreed to the assurances and undertakings required under the provisions of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act, as Amended. Secretary's Letters: Lot 56 D 459

The Secretary of Defense (Marshall) to the Secretary of State

Washington, January 9, 1951.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Reference is made to your letter of 5 December 1950 <sup>2</sup> which raises the question of the manner in which this Government should proceed to obtain base rights from the Libyan Government.

In his letter of 4 April 1950,<sup>3</sup> the Secretary of Defense pointed out that he concurred in the suggestion of the Joint Chiefs of Staff that a multilateral approach to the problem of base rights in Libya might be made by the Governments of the United States, France, and United Kingdom. He further stated that he considered that it would be in our military interest, if political conditions permit, for this Government to approach the Governments of France and the United Kingdom concerning this matter.

It remains the viewpoint of this Department that it would be desirable to adopt a multilateral approach to the problem of base rights

&lt;sup>2</sup> Secretary Acheson, in his letter of December 5 to the Secretary of Defense, noted that the U.S. Air Force was using Wheelus Field in Tripolitania under permission from the British Government, which would stay in force so long as the British remained responsible for the administration of the territory. Since the Department of State understood that the Joint Chiefs of Staff considered Wheelus Field a long-term strategic requirement of the United States, a policy recommended by the National Security Council in NSC 19/5 (printed ibid., 1949, vol. IV, p. 571) and approved by the President on August 5, 1949, it was considered necessary to determine how to proceed to obtain base rights from the Government of Libya when it became independent.

Acheson asked the Secretary of Defense whether, from the military point of view, the U.S. Government should seek rights from the Libyan Government directly or by way of a sublease from the British. He also requested a current indication of the locations in Libya for which rights were desired and a precise statement of such rights for use in negotiations.

in Libya. I feel that the answer to your question of whether this Government should seek base rights from the Libyan Government directly or by way of a sub-lease from the British can better be made after a tripartite discussion of this subject. This Department is prepared to assist you in any appropriate manner in such discussions.

Your letter expresses the thought that the Libyan Government would undoubtedly require, in return for base rights granted at Wheelus Field, a payment comparable to the deficit in the Tripolitanian balance of payments, estimated at $1,500,000 per annum. It is my understanding that at the time of the London Foreign Ministers Meeting of last May there was general agreement between the two Departments that, as a matter of principle the U.S. officials in any negotiations would maintain a distinction between arrangements for military facilities and the supplying of financial assistance to Libya. Such a procedure is considered particularly desirable from the military point of view because it is consistent with current world-wide practice and because the U.S. might want to use base facilities in Libya over a longer period than it might be necessary to provide financial assistance to the Libyan Government.

With regard to the suggestion that this department would have the primary burden of justifying before the Congress the funds required for the base rights over a long-term period, the Department of Defense cannot agree that the subvention of the Tripolitanian balance of payments should be justified primarily in terms of our strategic base requirements in the area. It might well be preferable for this government to recognize its obligation to participate with like-minded members of the U.N. in supporting financially the future Libyan government until such time as it is self-sustaining. The funds which this department must expend in the improvements and operation of these bases will contribute to reduction of deficit in the Tripolitanian balance of payments. The total amount of this U.S. expenditure is not known at this time, but will be provided the Department of State as soon as it can be estimated.

The locations in Libya for which negotiations are required at this time are for military operating air bases at Wheelus and Castel Benito, details for which have already been presented to the Department of State. The Joint Chiefs of Staff have very recently informed me in general terms of rights required for a military base at Tripoli and communication facilities in the vicinity of Tripoli and Tobruk. Information on these bases and facilities will be covered in a later letter.<sup>4</sup>

Faithfully yours,

G. C. Marshall

<sup>4</sup>On January 27, 1951, Secretary of Defense Marshall, in a letter to the Secretary of State, furnished the information that planned expenditures for further development of bases in Libya, based on the assumption that major construction would commence in fiscal year 1952, were estimated to be $1,882,900 in fiscal year 1952; $1,896,900 in fiscal year 1953; and $846,900 in fiscal year 1954. A maintenance expenditure, after completion of construction, was estimated as netting

$150,000 annually for the Libyan economy.

The Secretary of Defense stated that it appeared that sufficient benefit to the Tripolitanian economy would result from the planned U.S. expenditures to obviate the necessity of renting the land on which the bases were to be operated, but that, if the Department of State considered that the U.S. Government was obliged to rent the land, an equitable annual rental was estimated at from $20 per acre to as high as $50 per acre where a populated area had been cleared. Subject to onthe-site surveys and selection of base areas, it was estimated that the land requirements would total approximately 2,600 acres. In negotiation for these military rights it was to be understood that when they were no longer required, all permanent improvements were to be relinquished to the Libyan Government without giving rise to cost, compensation, or continuation of any maintenance or rents. The Secretary emphasized that the figures were indicative only and in advance of actual surveys for the purpose of assisting in the necessary negotiations.

On April 3, 1951, Maj. Gen. James H. Burns, USA (retired), Assistant to the Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs, informed Deputy Under Secretary of State Matthews that a firmer set of figures for planned expenditures of funds in Libya for base rights, exclusive of military pay and allowances, that could be expected to benefit the Libyan economy were estimated to be, by calendar year: $2,530,000 in 1951; $4.261,000 in 1952; $4,043,000 in 1953; and $1,012,000 in 1954. Land requirements had been reestimated and amounted to 2.800 acres for the U.S. Air Force and 250 acres for the U.S. Navy, a total of 3,050 acres. Burns noted that the new figures remained planning estimates for the purpose of negotiations for base rights.

On July 2, 1951, Burns furnished Matthews with new estimates for planned expenditures and land requirements in Libya by calendar year: $2,530,000 for 1951; $4,200,000 for 1952; $4,200,000 for 1953; and $1,020,000 for 1954. Land requirements amounted to 2,500 acres for the U.S. Air Force and 600 acres for the U.S. Navy, a total of 3,100 acres for early use. At a future undetermined date land requirements would be increased by 5,000 acres plus three large areas, one of 100 square miles with beach frontage for an amphibious training area, and two circular areas with 3-mile radius for live bombing training.

265. Re Deptel 3824 to London dated February 15  $^2$  and mytel 253, February 9 [10] to Department. I have these observations re negotiation of base rights agreement:

(1) As I have repeatedly stated, I believe that economic and technical assistance should not be confused with base rights. Therefore, while I wholly concur with principle enunciated paragraph 3, Deptel under reference I find that principle contradicted by paragraph 5. I perceive no objection to talking in general terms along lines mentioned paragraph 5 in order create atmosphere favorable to satisfactory negotiations. Even here, however, I believe we should avoid linking enlarged technical assistance program contemplated for fiscal year 1952 with base agreement. I think Libyans who have been told so often of high moral principles underlying Point IV assistance to underdeveloped countries might find this approach somewhat surprising.

(2) With respect Point IV I believe US should divest itself of real estate problems in Libya at earliest possible moment. As Department is aware we are now paying rent on land through British to Arab landowners. We should in my opinion suggest to the new Libyan Government that it immediately take over all obligations re land we now use or may need in future. This would go long way toward eliminating source of constant friction in future between US authorities on one hand and Arab population and Libyan Government on other. After voluntary increase in rent payments some months ago actual landowners are probably now receiving equitable compensation for use of their land but to talk of $20 or $50 or any other sum per acre seems to me to miss the point and confuse the issue. What Libyan Government will undoubtedly demand is annual payment in return for which it will allow foreign government to operate military bases with ancillary facilities and rights in this country. . . .

I concur generally with rest Department telegram. After conversation February 17 with Secretary Air Force Finletter I believe he is personally interested this problem and I would appreciate if this telegram could be brought to his attention.

Memorandum by the Under Secretary of State (Webb) to the Executive Secretary of the National Security Council (Lay)<sup>1</sup>

TOP SECRET

Washington, April 30, 1951.

Subject: Final Progress Report on NSC 19/5, "Disposition of the Former Italian Colonies" 2

NSC 19/5 was approved as Governmental policy on August 5, 1949. It is requested that this Progress Report, as of March 20, 1951, be circulated to the members of the Council for their information.

Important Action and Developments

The situation with respect to the disposition of the former Italian colonies has progressed materially from that described in the First Progress Report on this subject dated May 11, 1950.<sup>3</sup> The resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations on November 21, 1949,<sup>4</sup> is being implemented successfully with regard to independence for Libya and Italian trusteeship for former Italian Somaliland. A decision on the future of Eritrea, which was postponed last year by the General Assembly pending the report and recommendations of a UN Commission which investigated Eritrea, was made in a resolution adopted by the fifth session of the General Assembly on December 2, 1950,<sup>5</sup> under which Eritrea is to be federated with Ethiopia. United States policy with respect to all three of the former Italian colonies has been met in most respects.

A copy of this progress report in the McGhee Files was attached to a memorandum by McGhee to Webb, dated April 23, drafted by Wellons. The McGhee memorandum recommended that Webb sign the report indicating that U.S. policy on the disposition of the former Italian colonies had been substantially carried out. He added that the remaining problems of reaching agreement with the Governments of Libya and Ethiopia regarding the right of the United States to use certain strategic facilities in Tripolitania and Eritrea were being resolved by the Department of State in conjunction with the Department of Defense, although the agreements could not become effective until 1952. LIBYA 1319

$General\ Implementation$

I. Libya

A. The UN Commissioner for Libya reported to the fifth session of the General Assembly that he is convinced that the goal of an independent State of Libya will be realized by January 1, 1952, the date set by the General Assembly resolution of November 21, 1949. He has warned, however, that, while the political forms of government may be set up within the prescribed time, Libya will require a large measure of assistance, both technical and financial, to enable it to survive economically and to stand by itself as an independent country. The Department of State concurs with these views.

B. The policy set forth in NSC 19/5 called for the establishment of a united Libya which would "in effect be so tied to the United Kingdom as to assure enjoyment of adequate strategic rights to the United Kingdom and, therefore, also to the United States." This objective is being realized by the following developments:

1. The Arab leaders of Libya agreed on the composition of a National Constituent Assembly which is formulating the constitution for the government of an independent Libya. The membership of the National Assembly (with equal representation of 20 members each from Tripolitania, Cyrenaica and the Fezzan) should assure that the Emir of Cyrenaica will wield a preponderant influence in the formation of the new government. The first acts of the National Assembly were to declare that Libya should have a federal form of government and to invite the Emir Sayed Idriss of Cyrenaica to become the "constitutional king of United Libya". The Emir said he would accept the kingship at the appropriate time, presumably after the establishment of a provisional government of Libya in which he would be able to exercise certain powers.

2. The British, who will continue to administer both Tripolitania and Cyrenaica until Libya becomes independent, have retained their influence with the Emir and, we understand, are planning to negotiate a treaty with his government as soon as practicable during 1951. It is likely that this British treaty will be applicable to Tripolitania as well as to Cyrenaica and, perhaps, to all of Libya. The Emir, and his leading supporters, have indicated that they are ready and willing to reach suitable agreements with the United Kingdom and the United States regarding the continued use of military facilities by our respective armed forces. The Department of State, in consultation with the Department of Defense, is now working out the kind of an agreement we would want to have regarding our military facilities in Libya and will commence negotiations as soon as warranted.

3. The linking of Libya with the United Kingdom should be facilitated if, as is expected, the new currency of Libya is tied to the pound sterling. Some economic assistance is being provided to the British Administration through the UN Technical Assistance Program and the United States Point IV Program, both of which are now getting started. In addition, significant financial assistance will probably have to be made available by the United States, presumably through funds provided for the right to use Wheelus Field and through the money actually spent by our armed forces in Libya.

- C. The General Assembly passed a resolution on November 17, 1950, directing that further steps be taken to implement the basic resolution adopted in 1949. This resolution notes in particular the confidence expressed by the UN Commissioner that the aim of the General Assembly that Libya should become an independent and sovereign state will be attained within the time limit. The resolution also:
- 1. Recommends (a) that a national assembly, duly representative of the inhabitants of Libya, be convened before January 1, 1951; (b) that this national assembly establish a provisional government by April 1, 1951, if possible; (c) that powers be progressively transferred to the provisional government by the administering powers so that by January 1, 1952, all powers will have been transferred to the duly constituted Libyan Government; (d) that the UN Commissioner, aided and guided by the Council for Libya, shall draw up immediately a program in cooperation with the administering powers for the transfer of power as provided in (c) above; and

2. Urges UN organs to extend technical and financial assistance to Libya; and

3. Reaffirms its recommendation that, upon its establishment as an independent state, Libya be admitted to the United Nations.

D. The UN General Assembly in December 1950 also adopted other resolutions affecting Libya, which are not of immediate concern to the United States, as follows: (1) setting forth the economic and financial provisions relating to Libya, which had not been settled in the Treaty of Peace with Italy, and establishing a three-member tribunal to be appointed by the UN Secretary General which will administer the provisions and settle disputes; (2) providing for Libya to receive technical assistance from the UN after it becomes independent; (3) providing for undelimited boundaries to be delimited by direct negotiation between the states concerned or by arbitration; and (4) deferring discussion of the adjustment of the frontier between Egypt and Libya until the sixth session of the General Assembly.

5234. Re Question nr 1 London's tel 5764 May 4:2 In light experience past GA's, of recent Sov attempts place bases question on CFM agenda and known attitude Egypt and other Arab states, Dept believes question US and UK bases in Libya almost certain be raised next GA. In our view subj will be raised irrespective whether permanent agreements with Libya are in effect by that time. If Libyan independence proclaimed Oct-Nov and Libya makes prompt application for admission UN, question cld also arise in SC.

In Dept's view we must be prepared meet issue squarely, without apology or defensive tactics, stressing increased threat to peace and security free nations and necessity that latter leave no stone unturned to strengthen system of collective security. Base agreements have proved necessary part of that system.

We feel agreement with Libya shld contain language making clear parties will exercise rights obtained in full conformity with principles and obligations of Charter. Furthermore we are giving consideration to including language in our agreement stating that facilities in question cld be used in support UN collective measures for maintenance or restoration peace and security (perhaps with reference to Uniting For Peace Res). Believe this wld put US and Libyans on strongest possible ground since challenge to base agreements from whatever source wld then involve opposition to UN collective security program which, we assume, will be at center of GA deliberations. Finally, we think Libyan reps, who shld participate in comite discussion Commissioner's report if Libya independence has been proclaimed, will wish point out they convinced such agreements in Libya's interests and are contribution Libya can make toward maintenance internatl security.

Re Question 2 reftel: Dept does not envisage necessity submitting text agreement or showing any other paper covering negots to GA. Conduct Libya's fon relations will be normal and exclusive function Libyan Govt. Conclusion of base rights agreement wld be legitimate act of govt. Early timing negots does not alter this fact. Pelt will have no responsibility for or control over acts of established govt. His mission is confined to assisting Libvan people formulate constitution and establish machinery of govt. His legitimate interest in assisting Libyans devise ways and means for support of Libyan Govt gives neither Pelt nor GA any jurisdiction over base rights agreement which may become a source of such financial support. Of course we wld in due course register agreement with UN Secretariat as UN Charter requires. Experience has shown registration procedure itself, once initiated, consumes several months. By then permanent Libyan Govt wld be estabd and existence of agreement cld be announced much as Den-US agreement re Green has been.

Re Question 3 reftel: Dept believes postponement negots wld not avert GA discussion. By next Nov we sincerely hope considerable mil construction work will have been done in Libya. This work cannot be delayed even though it may provoke GA discussion. Conclusion of agreement shld not lag behind construction any more than necessary. Present indications are that we will try negotiate interim agreement to be signed on behalf US and Provisional Libyan Govt and to remain in force until superseded by subsequent agreement, which wld be negotiated with permanent govt soon as possible. Re para one Tripoli's 378 May 11: Brit and Fr Administrators have powers now it is true, but Dept hopes obtain their assurance power necessary to sign agreement will be transferred Provisional Libyan Govt in time for early signing of agreement. Embs London and Paris are requested approach Brit and Fr FonOffs immed to ascertain whether early trans this power practicable. If not practicable, Libyans cld still negotiate agreement but its signing wld have to await trans of powers. Re para 2 reftel we wld probably have to fall back on exchange of notes procedure if full agreement cannot be reached prior independence, but Dept wishes make every effort reach full agreement prior independence.

Progress has been made drafting Libva agreement but now apparent from Tripoli's 378 negots cannot commence before July 9. Plans will be revised accordingly. Meanwhile mil services working on complete and expanded restatement mil requirements Libya. Next step is approach to Cong to obtain assurance US negotiator can offer direct payment for base rights. FYI only, this approach considered necessary because USAF and Dept convinced correctness of Tripoli's view that US will not be able obtain base rights as consequence of US technical assistance or because Libyan trade balance wld be aided by dols from mil construction in Libya but will have to make direct payment. Course of action outlined in Deptel 3824 Feb 15 4 to London, 148 to Tripoli still contempated, with realization that in last analysis direct payment probably will be necessary as additional and final step. Probable need for direct payments on part of US, UK and Fr may be discussed generally with UK and Fr but, to protect US bargaining position, no indication shld be given whether US ready make such payment.

Prelim discussion with mil indicates mil believes three and probably four necessary on negotiating team. Mil lawyer and one requirements officer each from Air Force, Navy and Army. Dept appreciates views you have expressed and will take them into consideration in making final decision.

6030. Points contained Deptel 5234 May 15 2 discussed at some length with Allen, African Dept, yesterday. Fol is synthesis his tentative views:

1. He agreed question US-UK bases Libya almost certain be raised next GA. While acknowledging neither GA nor Pelt shld legitimately concern themselves this question, he thought fact of matter was that considerable number of members wld insist on seeing drafts or texts any agrmts on pretext GA had insure they presented no impediment effective Libyan independence. It might well be impossible or undesirable refuse submit agrmts. If this done while agrmts still in draft stage, "sixty academic lawyers" wld tear them to pieces, which UK anxious avoid. If, on other hand, agrmts were negotiated and signed with independent Libyan Govt before GA had chance look at them, then GA's only recourse, if it did not like agrmts, wld be nullify Libyan independence and demand extension preparatory period. Doubtful this wld command two-thirds majority.

2. Re earlier independence, Allen doubted it wld be mechanically possible for Libya to proclaim independence before mid Nov, citing slowness constituent assembly, delays involved in organizing elections and difficulties getting together integrated govt team. Allen said he frankly did not think much of earlier independence as a GA tactic. It might backfire on us and arouse much criticism that we had presented GA with fait accompli. He indicated that nevertheless it might have advantages outweighing this danger and said UK has not closed its mind on subj.

3. He thought it shid be possible, however, delay consideration Libyan matter sufficiently long by placing it low on agenda and said Pelt had undertaken cooperate in this. Allen felt that with other crucial issues due to come up in forthcoming mtg, there wld be little interest in Libya.

4. Allen did not feel it wld be practicable negotiate interim agrmt with provisional Libyan Govt since he did not see how UK and Fr cld possibly turn over treaty making power. In first place, it wld be difficult relinquish this power in isolation and secondly it is by no means apparent that provisional Libyan Govt in its present embryonic stage cld prudently exercise it. In short, he thought there were far-reaching legal and practical objections to this course.

5. He said present FonOff thinking is merely to show text of proposed UK agrmt to few Libyans (he mentioned Emir, Jerbi and Mahmud Mumtassir) before Libyan independence, leaving negots as well as signing until after independence. No hard and fast decision reached however and it is possible sufficient progress might be made thru these informal conversations before independence that agrmt cld be reached within matter of days thereafter. If any considerable delay in signing entailed, UK wld probably regularize presence Brit troops by exchange ltrs or notes.

6. Work continuing on UK draft agrmt. Present thinking is that it shld be as short and simple as possible, covering alliance, bases in gen terms, and payment therefore along similar lines to Jordan and Iraqi treaties. More complicated mil aspects, including schedules of required facilities, wld be contained in supplementary agrmt which might be negotiated after signature of treaty, but it wld also be registered with UN.

7. Allen felt it wld be highly desirable if US, UK and Fr exchanged draft agrmts for mutual comments before discussions with Libyans.

8. In response our question, Allen doubted UK wld ask for precedence for UK dipl rep.

Comment: Emb is furnishing Allen with informal written summary Dept's views as contained Dept reftel with exception last two paras and plans discuss matter further with FonOff at early date. Re negot treaties, we are somewhat disturbed by indications UK may not undertake any negots in more formal sense of word until after independence, whereas Dept wishes make every effort reach full agrmt before independence. Emb feels it essential all three powers concerned shld so coordinate their plans that activities of one do not prejudice objectives of others. Emb feels it wld be highly desirably for same reason that three powers exchange texts before discussion with Libyans, as we assume Dept for its part still intends to do.

407. In audience with King designate May 29 both he and FonMin expressed conviction that complete accord on strategic facilities agreement cld be reached prior to independence and agrmt signed immed upon independence being established. Neither sees any objection opening informal conversations after July 8 (end of ramadan). Blackley, Brit Resident, in conversation previous to my audience voiced certain reservations to holding of conversations early date. He fears (and with considerable justification) that secrecy wld be non-existent once full scale negots entered into and resultant loose talk locally which wld be encouraged and exploited by local opposition. Also, he fears internal repercussions. There is little doubt Egypt and Soviet press and radio wld play matter up in worst possible light.

Both King designate and FonMin shy away from idea of any Amer group of experts (see mytel 378, May 19)<sup>1</sup> and cannot understand why one man shid not be able to protect all Amer interests. As Ali Bey Jerbi put it, Libya has no apparatus which wild permit it to set up corresponding group. While I did not specifically refer to "team" or "group" mere idea of more than 2 or 3 persons at most is upsetting to them. It might be advisable keep certain number technical experts in background at Wheelus Field in advisory capacity during conversations.

King designate and FonMin emphasized Libya's lack of experience in matters of this kind and FonMin suggested that we might give them advance draft and adequate time to study it before opening conversations. I do not know whether this procedure practicable. In last analysis provincial govt (which will almost certainly mean FonMin Ali Bey Jerbi, PriMin Mahmoud Muntasser, FinMin Mansour Gerdara and Defense Min Amar Shennaib) will probably be advised by Brit experts.

Throughout conversation it was apparent that King designate and FonMin fully expect receive money payments for strategic facilities. I talked of benefit to economy of base expansion, housing projects, runway extension, money spent by Amer personnel and Departmental studies of possible econ aid et cetera other than Point Four and my remarks were recd with complete and obvious lack of interest. I suggest time now ripe to abandon make-believe of obtaining facilities in return for anything but annual cash payments.

[Washington,] June 8, 1951.

[Subject:] Questions Affecting Libya Which Pelt is Likely to Raise During His Visit to the Department

As you know, we have acceded to Pelt's insistent desire to come to Washington in the near future for direct talks with the Department on various aspects of the Libyan question. It is expected that Pelt, accompanied by Tom Power, will reach Washington by the first of next week and that talks between the Commissioner and Department officers will take place between June 12 and 14. It is quite likely that Pelt will seek an opportunity to meet with each of you personally. We believe that, for purposes of maintaining a united front in handling the Pelt visit, it is advisable that you meet jointly with the Commissioner. We have arranged that Ambassador Clark extend his stay a few days extra, so that he can take part in the discussions during the Pelt visit. We cannot encourage Pelt to believe that he can persuade the Department to accept proposals or ideas over Clark's head.

The topics which Pelt is likely to raise, together with a brief summary of the Department's position on such topics, are given below.

(1) Pelt's desire to participate in base rights negotiations with

Libya:

Since Pelt first went to Libya he has taken an understanding attitude toward our contemplated base rights agreements with the new state, but has spoken perhaps too freely on the subject with Libyan leaders; he has also nourished the idea that sizeable payments for such rights would be made by the U.S. (and possibly by the UK and France), and that the United Nations would or should have a voice in supervising the expenditure in Libya of such funds. Of late he has been maintaining that he should be brought into the picture during our forthcoming negotiations with the Libyans on the ground that he will be called upon to defend the base arrangements at the next General Assembly. He will advance the view (in talks here) that unless he is given a suitable role in these negotiations he will not be able to give us strong support on this question at the General Assembly in the face of probable Soviet, Middle-Eastern and Arab State charges that the proposed base agreements will compromise Libyan independence.

Department's Position

The Department's position is that base rights matters are not the direct concern of the United Nations Commissioner nor of the United Nations itself, though we recognize that the subject is likely to be raised in one form or another at the next General Assembly. We see no possible way in which Pelt could participate in our negotiations with Libya, and assume that the British and French (with whom we intend to coordinate our negotiations) feel the same. We have already indicated to the British that we think our agreement with the Libyans should contain language showing full consistency with the United Nations Charter and even suggesting that the base rights obtained could, under appropriate circumstances be used in support of collective measures which may be taken by the United Nations. We do not wish to antagonize Pelt, but we will have to reassert firmly to him the position described above. Of course, we can assure him that it is our intention to register the Libyan base rights agreement with the United Nations at the proper time.

We urge avoidance of discussion with Pelt and Power of possible payments by the U.S. to Libya for base rights. If he presses the subject, no indication should be given that the U.S. intends to make such payments. As you know, although the Department expects that a lump sum annual payment to Libya will be required, the expenditure (by the Defense Department) of funds for that purpose has not yet been approved by Congress. When our direct negotiations begin, it is intended that our representatives will initially point out the substantial benefits to Libya of improvements and expenditures to be made in connection with Wheelus Air Field as well as the contribution being made through technical assistance. We are not yet committed to offering payments for the right to use military facilities in Libya and the Department wishes to retain a free hand on this for bargaining purposes. Therefore, if Pelt raises the question, a direct answer might be avoided by simply saying that U.S. plans are still under consideration. (For your information only, the question whether or not we should publicly admit that the U.S. will have agreed to pay Libya for base rights is about to be given high-level review in the State Department).

(2) Future United Nations Machinery in Libya: While there is no evidence that Pelt himself wishes to find a new job for himself in Libya, he has indicated the belief that continuing United Nations machinery for that country would be advisable after independence. He apparently intends, in his report to the General Assembly, to suggest a United Nations technical and financial commission which would supervise technical assistance and exercise a controlling or supervisory role over financial contributions made in support of the Libyan economy by foreign countries. He argues that only by "inter-nationalizing" such programs can they escape the curse of being branded as a "new colonialism". If Pelt pursues this idea in his report, the members of the Council for Libya can express their views on the matter in footnotes to the report, but Pelt has the means of getting the proposal before the Assembly if he chooses.

Department's Position

The Department has made it known, through Clark and others, that we do not favor any additional United Nations supervisory machinery for Libya after independence, which is to take place at the latest by January 1, 1952. Our position is that once Libva is independent outside supervision of any kind, whether by the United Nations or otherwise, is no longer appropriate unless Libya specifically requests such supervision, which does not seem likely. We also feel that establishment of any new United Nations commission would inevitably have the effect of bringing a wide range of Libyan affairs annually to the General Assembly agenda, and we think that most undesirable. On the other hand we see no reason why Libva cannot, at its request, be provided with technical advisers (United Nations and otherwise) who could provide their skills in the necessary fields under the authority of the Libyan government. We would hope to persuade Pelt not to suggest further United Nations machinery in his report to the General Assembly.

(3) Libyan Currency and Financial Arrangements: Pelt will come here fresh from the most recent meetings on Libvan currency and budget in which representatives of the U.S., U.K., France, Italy and Egypt have participated and in which Libya has been represented by an observer. He will doubtless give us his ideas on the effectiveness of the arrangements which may have been concluded at the Geneva meetings, and may seek to tie into such discussion his ideas on United Nations supervision of Libya's budget, mentioned in (2) above. While the Geneva meetings have not yet ended, it appears that the French and the Italians (though not the Egyptians) are moving toward acceptance of the more conciliatory British proposals which we have been instrumental in eliciting. If accepted, these proposals would bring Libya into the sterling bloc, but would insure Libyan access to other foreign currencies (including dollars) as needed, and would preserve adequate opportunity for the maintenance of French and Italian commercial and cultural ties with Tripolitania and the Fezzan.

Department's Position

The present trend of discussions at the Geneva meetings is entirely acceptable to the Department and our representatives at Geneva have helped to bring the British on the one hand and the French and Italians on the other hand closer together. We maintain that on this, as on other matters, the final decision and choice must rest with the Libyans.

(4) Technical Assistance: Sometime ago Pelt indicated that he hoped to discuss technical assistance in Libya with the Department. We do not have recent details as to particular aspects of the program which he wishes to raise. However, we assume that his main object will be to secure our support for continuing momentum both of the United Nations program and our Point Four projects, and for some method of tying in our program with an internationally-backed Libyan economic development board.

Department's Position

There should be no extraordinary element of controversy in dealing with Pelt on this question except insofar as he may seek to relate it to his idea on some continuing, formal United Nations machinery of a supervisory nature in Libya. Our Point Four agreement with the British (as administering power) for Libya has not yet been signed owing, apparently, to lethargy at some level in the British Government. In a recent meeting with our Point Four people Mr. Clark stressed the urgency of getting this thing going as a matter of keeping faith with the Libyans. Mr. Bourgerie of AF pointed out that the agreement must be concluded before the end of June so that the $150,000 available for this fiscal year can be committed. A cable to London has been sent urging that the British cut through any further delay so that the agreement can be signed in the next two or three weeks. We are, of course, prepared to listen with interest to any progress report which Pelt may wish to give us on United Nations technical assistance in Libya to date. You might advise Pelt that we fully intend that our Point Four program complement, and be coordinated with, the United Nations program, and that conflict or duplication between the two be avoided. However, it will be necessary that the control of our Point Four projects remain in the hands of our own Technical Assistance officials.

(5) Date of Libyan Independence: Pelt is understood to feel that Libyan independence (after complete transfer of power by the U.K. and France) probably cannot be proclaimed until very shortly before the January 1 deadline. He cites "technical difficulties". He also believes the Libyan question should be placed far down on the General Assembly agenda, so that it would not be considered until well into January or later.

Department's Position

We feel that Libya will be as ready for independence in late October or November as in December. Egypt (and possibly other states such as Pakistan) may challenge the legality of Libya's constitutional development, since they want a unitary rather than federal state. Our position is that the whole course of development has been entirely legal and correct. Therefore, if the Libyans desire it, we have no objection to Libyan independence by the time the Assembly convenes.

N.B. Ambassador Clark has seen and concurs in the above statement.

Expressed hope for constitution by mid-Aug and parliamentary elections in Nov followed by estab duly constituted Fed Govt. He expects transfer of powers will coincide with estab of Govt. Unable predict what elections may bring in way of change, if any. Pelt estimates Fed Govt budget at 100,000 pounds. In this connection, uncertainty re sources and coordination of financial support is Pelt's reason for Washington trip.

Re Geneva mtg, Pelt disappointed over Libya's intention adhere sterling area. He described decision as virtually eliminating possibility multi-national participation in budget deficit. Said UK control over Libyan currency plus probable preponderance Brit advisers wld lead to criticism in UNGA that UN res re Libya not being properly implemented. He is not certain Egypts will attack implementation in UNGA. While in Cairo he found evidence that Egypt policy is principally that of Salaheddin and Assam [Azzam] Pasha and disliked in some influential quarters. (On Clark's recommendation, Dept planning circulate soon in certain LA and Arab FonOffs plus Rome and possibly others, statement of US views on implementation of UN res re Libya to lay groundwork for later enlisting support if Egypts create issue in UNGA.)

In reply McGhee referred to US support of UN res and to our interest in stable Libya which wld not become cause of internatl friction. He pointed out, however, that it was for Libyans to decide whether join sterling area and to select own advisers. He said we are pleased see UK willing stabilize currency, assume deficits and provide advisers. Pelt agreed test will be how UK uses her influence in Libya. If other nations discriminated against, Libya will become source of friction. Pelt said Libyan use of advisers of various nations wld greatly relieve situation.

After expressing appreciation of Pelt's understanding of our base requirements in Libya, McGhee told Pelt that $1,500,000 has been included in mutual security program for FY 1952 (Pres's msg on this program being forwarded) now before Cong and expressed view that, in light of this though not as quid pro quo, Libyans shld see way clear conclude base agreement without additional compensation. amt contemplated under mil security program if such proves necessary to obtaining base rights). He also mentioned benefits Libyan economy will derive from increased mil expenditures. Power attempted point out that Point Four program supposed be altruistic and therefore unsuitable as quid pro quo for base rights in Libya when gratuitous elsewhere. McGhee stated old Point Four concept must be forgotten in connection with mutual security program. He said its greater flexibility shld make it possible to present at least part of $1,500,000 as available for relieving Libyan budget deficit by being earmarked for projects which might fall within scope of Libyan budget. Pelt and Power agreed that such an arrangement wld probably be palatable to Libyans and preferable to describing $1,500,000 as available generally for technical assistance under Point Four, which to Libyans has come to mean available for payment of US experts' salaries. McGhee emphasized that only small part of mutual security program funds will be used to pay US technicians. Pelt agreeably surprised this new info and felt Libyan budget problem will be considerably eased if Cong takes favorable action on mutual security program. It was made clear to Pelt that projects contained in Pres's budget presentation to Cong are illustrative and that, in final analysis, Libyan-approved projects will be ones supported by mutual security program within terms of enabling Legis. McGhee emphasized mutual security program is not, in its application to Libya, to be considered price for bases. Two matters need not necessarily be tied together, but Libyans shld be able see that if they denied US bases, application of mutual security program to Libya might be affected. From foregoing, it will be clear suggested change in tactics in base negots in last para of Tripoli's 407 of June 2 2 is disapproved by Dept.

Throughout conversation McGhee made it clear US opposed to contd UN control Libya after independence. Said UN res does not contemplate continuation control, vehicle for which wld have been UN trusteeship. Majority in UN by its vote declared Libya capable of sovereignty and now estopped from contending that UN must continue control on grounds Libya incapable. Pelt mentioned need for taking wind out of Arab criticism that new type of colonialism or imperialism is developing in Libya. McGhee defended Brit subvention of Libya, comparing case to Jordan, which is not criticized. He said attacks on our bases and charges of imperialism are straight Commie line which must not be permitted to deter us from our objective.

In summary Dept sanguine that conversation has helped Pelt considerably and that prospects of avoiding his opposition in any UN debate greatly enhanced.

Tripoli, July 20, 1951—2 p. m.

21. I am informed by CO Wheelus Field that negotiating team representing three services will arrive here Aug first. Libyan Govt has not been informed of these impending arrivals, and I wish to emphasize: (1) Libyan Govt shld be given ample notice of such a group and (2) number of negotiators shld be held to absolute minimum. In my view draft agreement shld now be presented Libyan Govt for study. After two or three weeks informal discussions cld be entered into with FonMin and whoever else Emir designates.

Both Emir and FonMin expressed considerable apprehension to me when I mentioned possible "team of experts" in my audience with Emir last month. Both emphasized that they had no corresponding experts to meet with such a group and took the line that two or three Americans might sit down with FonMin in a friendly way to work situation out.

Emir and FonMin also urged that we give them a draft of proposed agreement and time to study it. While I have grave doubts about security aspect of giving them advance draft, I see no way out of it and feel that accurate Arabic translation shid be prepared in Washington as neither Libyan Govt nor this office has translators competent to perform a technical job of this sort. At present time, translators attached to UN Comm for Libya are understood to be doing some of this work for Provisional Libyan Govt. I think it wild be most undesirable to have any draft agreement exposed to UN employees of various nationalities and sympathies.

I think we must be extremely careful not give impression of coming into Libya in high-powered manner. These negots are going to be delicate operation and more informal they can be kept more success I think we shall have. It must be remembered that even the FonMin has no great experience in the conduct of fon relations or in international negotiation. While it is probable that he will be advised by the Brit, he is approaching the problem with some timidity in the full knowledge that no matter what arrangement is reached it will one day be the subject of attack by polit opponents in Libya. It is therefore greatest importance that we do not frighten the skittish Libyans by an imposing array of special talent. Hope, therefore, it will be possible keep military team in background at Wheelus Field in advisory capacity.

CO Wheelus also informs me that Prof. A. James Casner, Harvard Law School arriving late July as Secy Finletter's special rep for

SD/A/C.1/374

United States Position on the Report to the General Assembly of the United Nations Commissioner for Libya

THE PROBLEM

The problem is to (a) secure formal General Assembly approval of the way in which the steps leading to Libyan independence have been taken; (b) repel charges from any quarter that the process of implementing General Assembly resolutions of November 21, 1949 and November 17, 1950 has been attended by a number of illegal steps; (c) elicit recognition by the Assembly of the outstanding achievement by the United Nations, the Administering Powers (United Kingdom and France) and the people and political leaders of Libya, jointly, in making possible the completion of the constitution and the establishment of a "duly constituted government" to which all powers have been transferred within the schedule prescribed by the General Assembly; (d) stimulate action to carry out the pledge that Libya will be admitted to United Nations membership after achievement of independence.

RECOMMENDATIONS

- 1. The United States should maintain that remarkable success has been achieved by the UN Commissioner and the UN Council, by the Administering Powers (United Kingdom and France), and most important of all, by the Libyans in carrying out the terms of the General Assembly resolutions of November 21, 1949, and November 17, 1950.
- 2. The United States should mobilize maximum support for the broad content of the UN Commissioner's Report, and for the way in which he has sought and utilized the advice of the UN Council on particular questions. The United States should strongly advocate General Assembly approval of the fact of Libyan independence, assuming that it will have been proclaimed before Assembly discussion of the Libyan item. Where the Commissioner, in his report advances views divergent from those expressed by the United States Representative in the Council for Libya, the United States should support the positions taken by that United States Representative.

3. The United States should take the following specific positions on particular aspects of the question which will arise:

(a) The Libyan National Assembly, which prepared the constitution, is "duly representative" of the inhabitants of Libya; the method of choosing representatives to that National Assembly (equal representation for the three parts of Libya) and its membership (selected rather than elected) was accepted by the United Nations Commissioner with the concurrence of the Council for Libya, after full consultation with responsible Libyan political figures and the local British and French administrations; the basis on which the National Assembly was formed was also accepted implicitly by the General Assembly when that body rejected (November 17, 1950) an Egyptian amendment calling for an elected National Assembly.

(b) The idea of federation was not imposed upon the Libyans but was freely chosen by the Libyan National Assembly as the only feasible basis on which unity and independence could be established.

(c) The powers of government have been transferred to the Provisional Government by the Administering Powers in orderly fashion, according to a schedule which the United Nations Commissioner helped to prepare. This assured that the "duly constituted Libyan Government" would be established on an independent basis on or before the time limit of January 1, 1952 set by the General Assembly.

(d) In accordance with paragraph 3 of the General Assembly resolution on Libya of November 21, 1949, the Libyan constitution has been determined by the representatives of the inhabitants of the three parts of Libya in their National Assembly, and it is not desirable for the General Assembly to debate the intent of specific elements or decisions embodied in that constitution since it is a matter for the Libyans.

(e) The Government of Libya which will have assumed all sovereign powers in accordance with the provisions of the Libyan constitution (whether this takes place before or after elections) is the "duly constituted Libyan Government" forcesen by the General Assembly in paragraph 3(c) of its resolution of November 17, 1950.

- (f) The suggestion made by Mr. Pelt in the General Assembly on November 16, 1950, that the Libyan constitution be considered as a draft to be enacted in provisional form and be made subject to final approval and possibly amendment by the elected Libyan parliament, was not concurred in by the Council and was in effect rejected by the Libyans through their decision to make the constitution a final document, subject to amendment by normal constitutional process.
- 4. When Libya's independence has been proclaimed and a membership application submitted, the United States should press vigorously for Libya's admission; this position should be made clear in discussions of the present item.

- 5. The United States should vigorously resist any efforts to have the Assembly call into question the presence of foreign military personnel in Libya or question the existence of military bases in that country. (A separate paper on this subject will be provided).
- 6. The United States should show sympathetic interest in the proposals, worked out by the UN Commissioner and interested states, recommending to Libya a plan for currency arrangements, for a possible Libyan Development and Stabilization Authority, and for a Libyan Finance Corporation.

[Problems of technical assistance to Libya and monetary and development problems are dealt with in detail in a Committee 2 position paper.] <sup>2</sup>

COMMENT

- 1. The Delegation should stress the fact that, in the face of numerous difficulties and the shortness of time allowed, the method laid down by the General Assembly for the achievement of Libyan independence has been faithfully and successfully pursued by the Commissioner and the Council, the Administering Powers, and by the Libyans. This achievement is a striking example of the effectiveness of the United Nations in action on a problem for which it assumed responsibility at the end of 1948 and which it has brought to successful solution in just two years since the original General Assembly resolution of November 21, 1949. By emphasizing the very competent performance of the United Nations Commissioner, Mr. Pelt, the Delegation should find it easier to dissuade him from pressing his own ideas on two or three aspects of the problem in which the United States is unable to agree with him. (See Section 2 below).
- 2. The primary objective of the United States in dealing with the Libvan problem is to have the General Assembly accept and enthusiastically endorse the Commissioner's report and acknowledge with satisfaction the achievement of Libyan independence on schedule. It follows that, when the reports to the Assembly of the Administering Powers (United Kingdom and France) are available, they should also be accepted by the Assembly with some expression of appreciation and commendation to the Administering Powers for the way in which they have discharged their responsibilities in Libya under the General Assembly decisions. The important steps which the Administering Powers have taken (particularly under Paragraph 10 of the 1949 resolution and under paragraphs 3(c) and 3(d) of the 1950 resolution) have been taken in consultation and agreement with the Commissioner. It is also of importance to give wholehearted support to the way in which the Commissioner has sought and utilized the advice of the Council on particular questions at appropriate stages of his work.

While strong general support should be given to the Commissioner, the Delegation should retain sufficient flexibility of position on details to permit the expression of the United States view on two matters on which the Commissioner has a somewhat different approach. The first point involves the view expressed by Pelt on November 16, 1950 in the General Assembly that he would wish to advise the Libyan National Assembly that the constitution, when completed, should be regarded as a provisional one subject to approval and possible amendment by the elected parliament. The United States view on this point is covered in Section 3(f) below. The second point of difference rises out of Pelt's idea (paragraphs 126 and 127 of the Commissioner's report) "that the Libyan Government should request the appointment of a [United Nations] resident technical assistance expert who would have advisory powers in the expenditure of foreign aid" extended to Libya. The United States attitude on the role and scope of authority of a United Nations technical assistance resident expert for Libva is given in the position paper on technical assistance for use in Committee II. For the purposes of this paper it is sufficient to say that the U.S. does not wish to see any form of international supervision or control over Libyan affairs after independence.

3. (a) The Libyan National Assembly first met on November 25, 1949, to begin its work on the constitution. The basis on which the National Assembly was to be formed had been decided by the Libyans in the Preparatory Committee (Committee of Twenty-one) which had been established, at the initiative of the Commissioner and the Council, to prepare a plan for the organization of the National Assembly. On October 23, 1949, the Committee of Twenty-one made two fundamental decisions: first, that the National Assembly should be composed of twenty representatives each from the territories of Cyrenaica, Tripolitania, and the Fezzan; and second, that the members of the National Assembly from each territory should be selected rather than elected. These decisions of the Committee of Twenty-One were brought to the attention of the General Assembly during its discussion of the Libyan question on October 30, 1950.

It is to be noted that Paragraph 3(a) of the General Assembly resolution of November 17, 1950, (adopted after the General Assembly was informed of the decision of the Committee of 21), does not specify that the National Assembly must be an elected body. In fact, Egypt attempted to amend Paragraph 3(a) of the resolution in the plenary meeting of the General Assembly on November 17, 1950. Egypt proposed that the text should read "that a National Assembly duly elected and representative of the inhabitants of Libya . . ., etc." The amendment failed, with twenty-four votes in favor, twenty against, and fifteen abstentions. The United States Delegation should point out that the U.S. has consistently maintained, both in the Council for Libya and in the General Assembly, that the basis on which the National Assembly would be established should be determined by the Libyans. Furthermore, it should be pointed out that had the General Assembly wished to insist that the Libyan National Assembly must be elected, it would certainly have adopted the Egyptian amendment. However, that would have amounted to imposing a particular procedure on the Libyans, thus limiting their freedom of action.

3(b) As pointed out in Chapter 1 of the Commissioner's report, the Libyan National Assembly made two decisions, on December 2. 1950: that the form of the Libvan State should be federal, and that the Emir of Cyrenaica, Mohammed Idris el Senussi, should become the King of Libva. It was therefore a Libyan decision, whereby the National Assembly itself recognized that a federal system was the only feasible basis on which unity and independence could be established. Any idea of a tighter, unitary form of government (which incidentally would have given Tripolitania the dominant position in the Libyan state because of its greater population) was entirely unacceptable to Cyrenaica and the Fezzan, without whose agreement no unity whatever could be achieved in Libya. Charges by Arab states or the Soviet bloc that federation was forced on the Libyans by the Commissioner and the Administering Powers in order to cover up imperialistic designs or to prevent true unity should be vigorously rejected. The Delegation can conveniently recall the section of the Ad Hoc Political Committee's report to the General Assembly on Libya last fall, in which the Committee stated that:

"The form of state to be created and whether it would be a unitary or a federal state, must be left entirely to the representatives of the Libyan people, meeting and consulting in a national assembly."

In speaking on this issue, the United States Delegation should assert that the Federal plan was freely chosen by the Representatives of Libya and that any attempt by the General Assembly to impose or demand a tighter, unitary form of government would have destroyed the only basis on which Libyan unity can possibly be achieved. In private discussions with other friendly delegations, the United States should remind them that all members of the free world have a vital interest in the sound and stable development of an independent and unified Libya. We are convinced that anything which would disrupt the federal plan now established could plunge Libya into political chaos, open the way to political agitation and violence, have a harmful effect on the stability of the entire area, and give the Soviets further avenues for penetration of the Near East.

3(c). In accordance with Paragraph 3(c) of the 1950 General Assembly resolution, powers are being progressively transferred to the Provisional Government of Libya by the Administering Powers in such fashion as to ensure that all powers exercised by them will, by January 1, 1952, have been transferred to the duly constituted Libyan Government. As required by the 1950 resolution, the Commissioner—in cooperation with the Administering Powers—drew up last summer a detailed plan according to which governmental powers would be transferred in three stages beginning in September 1950, so that the process would end just prior to the establishment of the duly constituted government. The Commissioner held preliminary consultation with the Council on this transfer of powers plan late in July, 1951; in September he presented the more fully developed plan together with pertinent decisions by the Libyan National Assembly determining the powers of the Federal Government and of the provincial administrations.

The Council studied the Commissioner's plan and advised him that, in its view, the program for the transfer of powers conformed to the provisions of General Assembly Resolution 387 (V), Paragraph 3. The United States Representative in the Council actively advocated the expression of such advice to the Commissioner. Thus the requirement of having a detailed program worked out between the Commissioner and the Administering Powers, and on which the Council has given its advice, has been fully met. In accordance with that plan the United Kingdom and France have been transferring governmental powers according to the stages prescribed.

If Egypt, other Arab States, or the Soviet bloc charge that the method and timing of the transfer of powers (like other steps in Libyan constitutional development) were improper or illegal, the United States should firmly resist such charges and point out that only those who have some reason to wish to undermine Libyan unity and independence could object to the speedy and orderly transfer of powers which is a central point in the General Assembly resolutions of 1949 and 1950.

3(d) Efforts will doubtless be made, by Egypt and others, to insist that the General Assembly should scrutinize the Libyan constitution minutely seeking elements in it to which a number of Member states might take exception. Since it is expected that the Libyan constitution will already be in effect when the Libyan item is considered in the General Assembly, the Delegation can, of course, point out that any attempt by the General Assembly to review or pass upon the Libyan constitution is both out of order and unnecessary. In addition, however, the Delegation should maintain that the Libyan constitution is based squarely on democratic principles, with guarantees for the observance of human rights and the protection of minorities, and with an appropriate distribution of powers as between the federal government and the provincial governments, and between the legislative, executive and judicial branches of the federal government itself.

The constitution provides for a parliament consisting of two houses, the senate and the house of representatives. The senate will be composed of 12 members appointed by the King, and of 12 members elected by the legislative councils of the three provinces. Members of the house of representatives will be elected on the basis of one member for twenty thousand inhabitants. (Thus Tripolitania will have 35 representatives, as compared with 15 for Cyrenaica and 5 for the Fezzan). Laws adopted by both houses are to be sanctioned and promulgated by the King. The ministers are responsible as a cabinet and individually to the house of representatives, and provision is made for interpellation of cabinet ministers by members of parliament.

3(e) Both the 1949 and 1950 General Assembly resolutions specify that powers should be transferred to the "duly constituted" independent government of Libya. The Commissioner and the Council carefully considered the question whether a "duly constituted", sovereign government would have to be one which included an elected parliament. In other words, the question arose whether the General Assembly resolutions would be properly carried out if Libyan independence were proclaimed and exercised by a Libyan government before parliamentary elections had been held. It is the United States view that this was an issue for the Libyans themselves to decide. In addition the United States has maintained in the Libyan Council that that government of Libya which is established in accordance with the provisions of the constitution is the "duly constituted" government which meets the requirements of the General Assembly resolutions. A United States-sponsored resolution embodying this position was adopted by the Council for Libya at the end of September. The Commissioner has acted generally in accordance with the advice to that effect from the Council.

Furthermore the Libyan constitution, which was completed by the Libyan National Assembly on October 7, 1951, includes specific, transitional provisions for the period between promulgation of the constitution and the time when other chapters of the constitution will come into effect when independence is proclaimed: (Article 202, ff.) During the transitional period the provisional government will exercise the powers transferred to it by the administering states. When independence is proclaimed the King will appoint a "duly constituted" government. The provisional government will prepare the electoral law for the first parliamentary elections and that law is subject to approval by the national assembly. This law must be in force twenty days after promulgation of the constitution which will be in force when Libya becomes independent. Elsewhere it is provided that the elections will take place not later than three and a half months after announcement of the electoral law, and parliament is to convene within twenty days after elections. In the light of the above facts the Delegation should urge unhesitating acceptance by the General Assembly of that Libyan government established at the time of independence as the

"duly constituted" government of Libva.

3(f) On November 16, 1950, the day before adoption by the General Assembly of Resolution 387(V), Mr. Pelt made an extended statement in plenary meeting of the General Assembly. He indicated that, while he had felt it necessary to go along with an appointed rather than an elected national assembly, he had had grave doubts as to whether it would have "the necessary moral and political authority to elaborate a final and definite constitution for Libva". He then declared that, on his return to Libya, he intended to ask the Council for its advice on the following proposals which he might make to the Libyan National Assembly:

(1) That the constitution as prepared by the National Assembly should be considered as a draft, to be enacted in a provisional form and subject to final approval and if necessary to amendment by the elected Libyan parliament;

(2) That the legislative branch should consist of two chambers a small upper house whose members would be elected from the three territories on a basis of equality, and a popular chamber to be elected by the people as a whole;

(3) That the Libyan Government (Cabinet) should be responsible to the popular chamber.

In March, 1950, the Commissioner took up this matter with the Council. The dominant view in the Council, actively shared by the United States Representative, was that the Commissioner should not attempt to give such specific advice on details to the national assembly, unless, at least, that body specifically requested the advice. The United States Representative introduced a resolution in the Council which would advise the Commissioner that "he might appropriately offer suggestions to the National Assembly with the idea that these suggestions, modified as the National Assembly may deem necessary to care for the particular needs of Libya, may prove to be acceptable to the majority of the Libyan people". The United States draft resolution eliminated the thought of having the constitution considered as a provisional one. With respect to the method of naming the members of the upper house, the United States draft suggested that, while the three territories should be represented therein on a basis of equality, the representatives could either be elected or designated by the government of each territory and appointed by the King. Alternatively the National Assembly might choose to have a portion of such representatives in the upper house named by the King on his own initiative, the others being designated by the government of each territory and appointed by the King. Finally, the United States draft pointed out that the constitution itself might contain provisions for its eventual amendment by the Libyan parliament, and that the constitution as a whole might be reviewed by the parliament in the light of experience after perhaps five years. In other respects the United States draft resolution essentially covered points which the Commissioner had had in mind.

On March 13, 1951 the Council adopted the United States resolution, Cyrenaica, the Fezzan, France, the United Kingdom and the United States voted in favor; Egypt, Pakistan and Tripolitania voted against; Italy and the representative of the Minorities in Libva abstained. The Commissioner transmitted the Council's advice to the Libyan National Assembly along with his own comments. (United Nations Press Release LIB/47, March 14, 1951.) In effect, the National Assembly pursued the line advocated by the Council in dealing with such matters in the constitution. Thus the constitution now adopted is a final document which can, of course, be amended by due constitutional process in the future. The United States Delegation should confirm the position taken by Ambassador Clark in the Libyan Council since that time, namely that the United States did not agree at the last General Assembly to support the ideas which Mr. Pelt expressed in the plenary meeting of the General Assembly on November 16, 1950. While the United States, like other free nations, is devoted to democratic principles and practices, the United States has not felt that it could support any moves which would appear to violate the freedom of decision on such matters guaranteed to the Libyans in Paragraph 3 of the General Assembly Resolution on Libya of 1949. As Mr. Pelt himself stated the issue on November 17, 1950:

"The General Assembly has granted the Libyan people the right to determine their own fate. We want them to behave democratically but charity begins at home. If we want them to behave democratically, let the General Assembly behave democratically toward the Libyans."

4. If, as expected, Libyan independence has been proclaimed prior to General Assembly consideration of the Libyan item, it can also be expected that Libya would immediately make an application for membership in the United Nations. It would be politically advantageous for the United States at an early stage of the General Assembly discussion of the Libyan question to draw attention to the fact of Libyan independence and the pending Libyan application for membership, recalling the pledge of the General Assembly that Libya should be admitted to membership after independence. Depending upon the circumstances at the time, it may be useful for the United States to urge the Assembly to take note that a Libyan application for membership has been made and to urge early consideration of the matter by the Security Council. Such a move could be without prejudice to the full and necessary discussion of the Commissioner's report; it would have the advantage of confronting those who intend to challenge the whole course of Libyan constitutional development with the necessity of taking a public stand on the question of whether they would favor Libya's admission. It will, of course, be necessary to consult the Department on any preliminary move of this nature. The utility of any such move would depend on the timing of General Assembly discussion of the Pelt report and on the submission of Libya's application for membership.

- 5. At the Fourth and Fifth General Assemblies, the Soviets advanced draft resolutions calling for the withdrawal of foreign military personnel in Libya and the dismantling of military bases in that territory. Both times the Soviet resolutions were decisively voted down. However, at the Fifth Assembly, the clause in the Soviet draft calling for withdrawal of foreign military personnel received disturbingly significant support in the paragraph by paragraph vote in the Ad Hoc Committee, from Arab States and some Asiatic and even Latin American states. It is of importance vigorously to counteract any tendency among non-Soviet states to dwell on this issue at the Sixth Assembly. This theme may well be pressed not only by the Soviets but by Egypt whose policy in that respect is in sharp conflict with that of both the United Kingdom and the United States. A supplementary position paper 3 containing guidance on the handling of this issue, and on a possible challenge to the exercise by the United States of base rights in Libya, should be used in conjunction with Recommendation Five of this position paper.
- 6. On September 29, 1951 the meeting of financial experts under the auspices of Mr. Pelt (including the United States, United Kingdom, France, Italy and Egypt) completed proposals to be made to the Libvan Government for the creation of the following bodies under Libvan law: A Libvan Development and Stabilization Authority, and a Libyan Finance Corporation. Egypt has not agreed to the proposals, since it favored another arrangement involving a certain amount of international control over Libvan finances and development. Membership on these bodies would be open to representatives of states contributing to the short-term and long-term development and stabilization programs for which those bodies would be responsible. Detailed plans for the operation and activities of the two bodies are given in Chapter IV of the Commissioner's report. While the United States has reserved its position on the matter of contributing directly to the funds to be used by these bodies, the United States has participated in the discussions leading to the proposals made, which are subject to acceptance by the Libvan Government. Furthermore, the United States has repeatedly indicated its intention of making a suitable contribution to the development of the Libyan economy through technical assistance programs. For further details on the United States position on Libyan monetary, development and technical assistance questions, the Delegation should consult the position paper prepared on these matters for use in Committee II.

Pelt is reacting favorably to congratulatory remarks regarding miracle he has accomplished and inclined believe he cld be brought on side early independence provided he is convinced practicality effective transfer powers. His objection is to transfer that would be in name only. There is evidence that Saadawi realizes elections impracticable prior independence and will devote all his energy assure free elections which he convinced he can win. In light this possibility, discussions in Geneva have indicated desirability seeking means bring Saadawi and Muntasir into some form détente until elections. From both UK and Libyan sources here, gather that not deemed impossible and if achieved, would result in only one Libyan voice sixth UNGA. Memorandum by the Secretary of State to the President 1

[Washington,] October 18, 1951.

Subject: Elevation to Legation Status of United States Consulate General at Tripoli, Libya.

I believe that it would be in the interest of the United States to change the rank of our representation in Libya from a Consulate General at Tripoli to a Legation as soon as Libya becomes independent.

An American Consulate was established at Tripoli in 1948. The Consulate was raised to a Consulate General in 1949. Another Consulate was opened at Benghazi in 1950.

The United Nations General Assembly decided on November 21, 1949 that Libya should become independent as soon as possible and in any case not later than January 1, 1952. The Libyan National Assembly has almost completed the formulation of the constitution of the new state. A program for the transfer of governmental powers from the British and French Administering Authorities to the Provisional Government of Libya is now being put into effect. This conveyance of authority may be completed by the end of November.

The United States exercised leadership in the disposition of Libya as one of the former Italian colonies and played an important role in the adoption of the General Assembly decisions that Libya should be independent and should be admitted to membership in the United Nations. In addition to our general interests in Libya, this Government has important strategic interests in our air base (Wheelus Field) near Tripoli as well as in other extensive military requirements. The right to continue to use these facilities after Libya becomes independent is being negotiated secretly with the Provisional Government of Libya. That Government is friendly toward the United States and the United Kingdom.

The Foreign Minister of the Provisional Government of Libya who visited Washington last November and with whom our representatives have established excellent working relations, has expressed hope of receiving diplomatic representatives of other countries in Tripoli. The United Kingdom plans to establish a Legation in Libya. I believe that an American Legation would prove of considerable assistance in developing firm, friendly relations between the United States and Libya and would facilitate the continued use of those military facilities which are important to our national security.

If you approve, the Department of State will undertake arrangements to elevate the Consulate General at Tripoli to the rank of Legation as soon as Libya becomes independent. If you agree, I also recommend that Mr. Henry S. Villard, a Foreign Service Officer of Class I, who has been associated for many years with Near Eastern and African affairs, be appointed as the first American Minister to Libya. Enclosed for your convenience is a summary of biographic information on Mr. Villard.<sup>2</sup>

Draft Agreement Prepared in the Department of State 1

[Washington,] October 19, 1951.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENT OF LIBYA AND THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

PREAMBLE

The Government of Libya and the Government of the United States of America, desiring to contribute to the maintenance of international peace and security in accordance with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations and being of the opinion that the development of certain areas and facilities in the territory of Libya would promote that objective, do hereby, in a spirit of friendly collaboration, enter into the present Agreement.

GENERAL PROVISIONS

Article I

The Government of Libya grants permission to the Government of the United States of America to occupy and use for military and related purposes such areas and facilities as shall be agreed upon from time to time by the two Governments, for the duration of the present Agreement and in accordance with its terms and conditions.

Article II

The Government of the United States may make arrangements for and carry out directly or through its contractors the installation, construction and removal of facilities within the agreed areas to improve and adapt such areas for military and related purposes and to provide for the internal security of such areas.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Accompanying technical schedules not printed. This draft agreement replaced an earlier draft of July 6, not printed.

Article III

- (1) The Government of the United States of America may exercise full control over aircraft, ships and water-borne craft, and vehicles entering, leaving and while within the agreed areas.
- (2) The Government of the United States of America may exercise, with or without a representative of the Government of Libya as the Government of Libya may determine, such controls over non-United States aircraft, ships and water-borne craft, and vehicles entering, leaving and while within areas near the agreed areas as shall be agreed upon by the two Governments are necessary to carry out the purposes of the present Agreement and to insure the security of the United States forces in Libya.

Article IV

The Government of the United States of America may construct and maintain such wire communication and pipeline facilities outside of the agreed areas as the two Governments agree are necessary to carry out the purposes of the present Agreement.

Article V

The Government of the United States of America may employ and use such public utilities, services and transportation and communication facilities in Libya as the two Governments agree are necessary to carry out the purposes of the present Agreement. The Government of the United States of America shall pay for any employment or usage of the public facilities referred to in the preceding sentence at the same rates charged others who employ and use such public facilities.

Article VI

- (1) The agreed areas shall be used and occupied exclusively by the Government of the United States of America unless otherwise agreed by the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Libya. Agreed areas used exclusively by the Government of the United States of America will be maintained at its expense.
- (2) The two Governments, as an element in collective military measures to maintain or restore international security, may agree to a joint use and occupancy of an agreed area by the two Governments, or by the United States of America and other nations or persons. The cost of maintenance of an agreed area which is used jointly by the two Governments, or by the United States of America and other nations or persons, shall be apportioned on the basis of usage, at rates and charges which are mutually satisfactory to the users.

Article VII 2

The Government of Libya will make all acquisitions of land and other arrangements required to permit occupation and use of the agreed areas in accordance with the provisions of the present Agreement, and the Government of the United States of America shall not be obliged to compensate the Government of Libya or any Libyan national or other person for such occupation or use.

Article VIII

The Government of Libya will grant to the United States public vessels, aircraft, forces and vehicles, including armor, the right of free access to and movement through Libya, including territorial waters, by land, air and sea. This right shall include freedom from compulsory pilotage and all toll charges. United States aircraft may fly over, land, and take off in any of the territory of Libya, including the territorial waters thereof, without restriction, except as agreed between the two Governments.

$Article\,IX$

The Government of the United States of America may, in agreement with the Government of Libya, construct and maintain necessary roads and bridges, and improve and deepen harbors, channels, entrances, and anchorages, affording access to the agreed areas.

Article X

When the Government of the United States of America permanently vacates an agreed area, permanent constructions thereon shall not be removed and the Government of the United States of America shall not be entitled to any compensation for such constructions. Except as provided in the preceding sentence, all property constructed, installed, brought into or procured in Libya under or prior to the present Agreement by the Government of the United States of America shall remain its property and may be removed from Libya, free of any restrictions, &lt;sup>2</sup> This article was rewritten in the Department of Defense to make it acceptable to the Government of Libya, and the text of the changed article was sent to the Department of State as enclosure 6 to a letter from the Acting Secretary of Defense to the Secretary of State, dated December 4, p. 1364. The final version read:

&quot;The Government of Libya will make all acquisitions of land and other arrangements required to permit occupation and use of agreed areas in accordance with the provisions of the present agreement. The Government of the United States of America shall not be obliged to compensate any Libyan national or other person for such occupation or use, but it agrees to pay to the Government of Libya annually an equitable rental for such occupation or use. The two Governments agree that once the equitable annual rental for an agreed area has been determined, the amount of the rental for such agreed area shall not be changed for the duration of this agreement without the consent of both Governments. Furthermore, the two Governments agree that the annual rental being paid by the United States on the date of this agreement for agreed areas in occupation or use by the United States of America on the date of this agreement shall be the equitable annual rental for such agreed areas." (711.56373/12-451) or disposed of in Libya by the Government of the United States as agreed with the Government of Libya, at any time before the termination of the present Agreement or within a reasonable time thereafter. Any such property not so removed or so disposed of before the termination of the present Agreement or within a reasonable time thereafter shall become the property of the Government of Libya and the Government of Libya shall not be obligated to compensate the Government of the United States of America for such property.

Article XI

The Government of the United States of America is not obliged to turn over the agreed areas to the Government of Libya at the expiration of the present Agreement in the condition in which they were at the time of their occupation by the Government of the United States of America.

Article XII

Nothing in the present Agreement shall be construed to conflict with the obligations assumed by the Government of the United States of America under the Charter of the United Nations. The Government of Libya hereby recognizes that it also shall be governed by such obligations pending its admission to membership in the United Nations.

ADMINISTRATION

Article XIII

The Government of Libya authorizes the Government of the United States of America to employ and supervise military and civilian personnel as required in connection with operations under the present Agreement.

Article XIV

The Government of the United States of America may make topographic, hydrographic, and coast and geodetic surveys and aerial photographs in any part of Libya and waters adjacent thereto. Copies with title and triangulation data of any such surveys or photomaps shall be furnished to the Government of Libya.

Article XV

The Government of the United States of America may establish, maintain and operate United States post offices in the agreed areas for the exclusive use of members of the United States forces and United States authorities, including their staffs and dependents, for domestic use between United States post offices in the agreed areas and between such post offices and other United States post offices.

Article XVI

(1) The Government of the United States of America may bring into Libya members of the United States forces in connection with carrying out the purposes of the present Agreement. The Government of the United States of America shall furnish to the Government of Libya a list of the names and nationalities of members of the United States forces who are brought into Libya and who are not nationals of the United States and any individual on such list whose presence in Libya is considered to be undesirable by the Government of Libya shall be removed from Libya within a reasonable time.

- (2) The laws of the Government of Libya shall not operate or apply so as to prevent admission or departure into or from Libya of members of the United States forces. Passport and visa requirements shall not be applicable to military members of United States forces, but they shall be furnished with appropriate identification cards or tags and samples of said identification cards or tags shall be filed with the Government of Libya. Passport and visa requirements shall be applicable to non-military members of the United States forces.
- (3) If the status of any member of the United States forces brought into Libya by the Government of the United States of America is altered so that he would no longer be entitled to such admission, the Government of the United States of America shall notify the Government of Libya and shall, if such person be required to leave Libya by the Government of Libya, be responsible for providing him with a passage from Libya within a reasonable time, and shall in the meantime prevent his becoming a public responsibility of Libya.

Article XVII

The Government of the United States of America may establish agencies in the agreed areas, including concessions such as sales commissaries, military service exchanges, messes and social clubs for the exclusive use of the United States military forces and authorized civilian personnel and their families; and such agencies shall be free of all licenses, fees, excise, sales or other taxes or imposts. The merchandise or services sold or dispensed by such Government agencies shall be free of all taxes, duties, imposts and inspection by the Government of Libya. Administrative measures shall be taken by United States military authorities to prevent the resale of goods which are sold under the provisions of this article to persons not entitled to buy goods at such agencies and, generally to prevent abuse of the privileges granted under this article. There shall be cooperation between such authorities and the appropriate authorities of the Government of Libya to this end.

Article XVIII

The appropriate authorities of the two Governments will cooperate in making arrangements in the interest of sanitation and health.

Article XIX

The Government of the United States of America may make engineering and other technical surveys in any part of Libya and waters adjacent thereto. The Government of the United States of America shall notify the Government of Libya when any such survey is to be made and the Government of Libya may, if it so desires, designate an official representative to accompany the survey team.

STATUS OF UNITED STATES PERSONNEL AND PROPERTY

Article XX

- (1) Members of the United States forces shall respect the sovereign rights and the laws of Libya and abstain from any activities inconsistent with the spirit of the present Agreement, and in particular from any political activities in Libya. The Government of the United States of America will take appropriate measures to this end.
- (2) United States military personnel and their dependents and United States nationals and their dependents, who are members of the United States forces and who are subject to United States military law, shall be immune from the criminal jurisdiction of Libyan courts and in matters arising from the performance of their official duties from the civil jurisdiction of the courts of Libya, provided that in particular cases the United States authorities may waive such immunity. In all other matters they shall be subject to the jurisdiction of Libyan courts.
- (3) The United States military authorities shall have the right to exercise within Libya all jurisdiction and control conferred on them by the laws of the United States of America over all members of the United States forces except civilian members thereof who are nationals of Libva.
- (4) Whenever United States military authorities may exercise jurisdiction over an alleged offender pursuant to Section (3) of this article, the appropriate authorities of the Government of Libya will assist in the collection of evidence and the carrying out of all necessary investigations, including the seizure and in proper cases the handing over of exhibits and all objects connected with the offense.
- (5) (a) Where an offense involves the person or property of a member of the United States forces, the appropriate authorities of the Government of Libya and the United States military authorities will render mutual assistance in the necessary investigation into the offense and trial of the offender.
- (b) If the case is one within the jurisdiction of the United States military authorities, the appropriate authorities of the Government of Libya will themselves carry out the necessary arrangements to secure the presence of and obtain evidence from Libyan nationals and other persons in Libya (except members of the United States forces) outside the agreed areas. Interrogations of Libyan nationals which may, under the laws of the United States of America, be necessary in connection with the investigation of an offense will, when outside the agreed areas, be conducted by the appropriate United States authorities only at such places as may be designated by the appropriate authorities of the Government of Libya who shall be present at all times during such interrogation.

- (c) The United States military authorities will, in a similar manner, carry out the collection of evidence from members of the United States forces in the case of an offense to be tried in the Libyan courts.
- (d) The appropriate authorities of the Government of Libya shall render assistance to protect the dignity and integrity of United States military courts. Witnesses not subject to United States military law who commit perjury or contempt of court will be turned over to the appropriate authorities of the Government of Libya for appropriate punishment.
- (6) (a) The Government of the United States of America shall have the right to police the agreed areas and to take all appropriate measures to insure the maintenance of discipline, order and security in such areas.
- (b) Outside the agreed areas, members of the United States forces may be employed for police duties by arrangement with the appropriate authorities of the Government of Libya insofar as such employment is necessary to maintain discipline and order among the members of the United States forces. In such cases, Libyan police with whom members of the United States forces may be serving on police duty shall have paramount authority with respect to the person or property of Libyan nationals.

Article XXI

The Government of Libya either shall honor, without driving test or fee, driving permits issued by the Government of the United States of America or a subdivision thereof to members of the United States forces; or issue its own driving permits without test or fee to such persons who hold such United States permits. Members of the United States forces who do not hold driving permits issued by the Government of the United States of America or a subdivision thereof shall be required to comply with whatever regulations Libya may establish with regard to driving permits.

Article XXII

Military members of the United States forces in Libya may possess and carry arms as required in the performance of official duties.

Article XXIII

(1) Members of the United States forces may purchase locally goods necessary for their own consumption and such services as they need under the same conditions as Libyan nationals.

- (2) The Government of the United States of America may purchase locally goods required for the subsistence of the United States forces and it shall be the policy of the Government of the United States of America to purchase such goods locally if they are available and of the standard required by United States authorities. In order to avoid any such purchases having an adverse effect on the Libyan economy, the appropriate authorities of the Government of Libya will indicate, when necessary, any articles the purchase of which should be restricted or forbidden. Such Libyan authorities, at the request of the appropriate United States authorities, will aid and assist in the placement of orders.
- (3) The Government of Libya consents to the employment of Libyan civilians by the Government of the United States of America, or its contractors, and it shall be the policy of the Government of the United States of America and its contractors to prefer the employment of Libyan civilians when they are available and qualified to do the work involved. Upon request of the appropriate United States authorities, the Government of Libya will aid and assist in the employment of Libyan civilians. The conditions of employment for Libyan nationals and persons normally resident in Libya, particularly in respect to wages, supplementary payments, insurance and conditions for the protection of workers, shall be exclusively those laid down by Libyan law.
- (4) Upon request of the appropriate authorities of the Government of Libya, the United States military authorities will withhold and pay over to the Government of Libya all income tax or other deductions from the wages of Libyan nationals and persons normally resident in Libya employed by the Government of the United States, as required by Libyan law in the same manner and to the same extent as any other employer.

Article XXIV

- (1) The temporary presence in Libya of a member of the United States forces shall constitute neither residence nor domicile therein and shall not of itself subject him to taxation in Libya, either on his income or on his property the presence of which in Libya is due to his temporary presence there, nor, in the event of his death, shall it subject his estate to a levy of death duties. Land and permanent structures thereon located in Libya which are purchased by a member of the United States forces shall be subject to the laws of Libya as to taxation based on the ownership of such property.
- (2) No national of the United States of America or corporation organized under the laws of the United States of America, resident in the United States of America, shall be liable to pay the Government of Libya any tax in respect of any income derived under a contract with the Government of the United States of America in connection with operations under the present Agreement.

(3) No tax, duty or other charge of any nature shall be levied or assessed on material, equipment, supplies, or goods, including personal effects, household goods, privately owned automobiles and clothing, brought into Libya in connection with operations under the present Agreement. No such tax, duty or charge shall be levied or assessed on property procured in Libya by United States authorities for the use of the Government of the United States of America or its agents or for the use of personnel present in Libya only in connection with operations under the present Agreement.

Article XXV

- (1) The laws and regulations administered by the customs authorities of Libya, including the right to inspect and seize, shall have no application to:
- (a) Service and construction material, equipment, supplies, provisions and other goods, imported into Libya by the Government of the United States of America or its contractors in connection with operations under the present Agreement for the exclusive use of the United States forces.
- (b) Personal effects, household goods, including privately owned automobiles and furniture, and other goods imported into Libya by the authorities of the Government of the United States of America or through the customary civil channels of Libya for the personal use of members of the United States forces at the time of or during the service of such persons in Libya, provided that, where such property is imported through civil channels, the United States military authorities shall execute a certificate to be presented to the customs officials of Libya certifying that such imports are necessary for the personal use of such member of the United States forces. The United States military authorities will provide the Libyan customs authorities with a list of the officials authorized to execute the certificates as well as specimens of their signatures and the stamps, if any are used.
  - (c) Official documents under seal.
- (2) Property falling within the provisions of Section (1) of this article may be exported from Libya, without regard to the customs laws and regulations of Libya.
- (3) Property imported into Libya under the provisions of Section (1) of this article may not be disposed of in Libya to Libyan nationals or to persons normally resident in Libya by way of sale, gift, or barter unless disposal thereof to such persons is authorized on conditions imposed by the appropriate authorities of the Government of Libya. Such property, however, may be disposed of to members of the United States forces or to other persons or governments who are entitled to make use of agreed areas. The United States military authorities will prescribe and enforce to the extent possible regulations designed to prevent the sale or supply to individual members of the United States forces of quantities of goods imported into Libya free of charge which would be in excess of personal requirements of such personnel and which, in consultation with the appropriate authorities of the Government of Libya, are determined to be most likely to become items of gift, barter or sale in the free market in Libya.

(4) Goods purchased in Libya can only be exported therefrom in accordance with Libyan regulations, or as otherwise provided in the present Agreement.

Article XXVI

- (1) The Government of the United States of America agrees to pay just and reasonable compensation for valid claims of the Government of Libya for damage, loss or destruction of its property caused by a public vessel of the Government of the United States or by members of the United States forces who are in Libya in connection with operations under the present Agreement. All such claims will be processed and paid in accordance with the applicable provisions of United States law.
- (2) The Government of the United States of America agrees to pay just and reasonable compensation for all valid claims of persons who are nationals of Libya, or inhabitants of that country, for damage, loss, or destruction of property, or for injury or death, caused by members of United States forces in connection with operations under the present Agreement. All such claims will be processed and paid in accordance with the applicable provisions of United States law.

OPERATION OF THE PRESENT AGREEMENT

Article XXVII

The present Agreement shall come into force on signature and shall continue in force for the period of twenty (20) years and thereafter the Agreement shall continue in force until either of the two Governments gives to the other notice of termination, in which event, the Agreement shall cease to be effective one year after the date of the receipt of such notice.

INTERPRETATION

Article XXVIII

Ť

In the present Agreement the following expressions have the meanings hereby respectively assigned to them:

"The two Governments" means the Government of Libya and the Government of the United States of America.

"The Government of Libya" means the federal Government of the United Kingdom of Libya, including all administering bodies and authorities within the Territories which form the United Kingdom of Libva.

"United States forces" includes personnel belonging to the armed services of the United States of America and accompanying civilian personnel who are employed by or serving with such services directly or through their contractors (including the dependents of such military and civilian personnel), who are not nationals of, nor ordinarily resident in Libya; and who are in the territory of Libya in connection with operations under the present Agreement.

"Agreed areas" means those areas which the two Governments shall agree may be occupied and used by the Government of the United States under the terms and conditions of the present Agreement.

In Witness Whereof, the undersigned duly authorized representatives of the Government of Libya and the Government of the United States of America have signed the present Agreement.

1940. In course conversation with Allen today, we took opportunity stress Dept's and Clark's views re desirability early Libyan independence with flexible date. Allen said Blackley's views not yet recd this point, but he felt in any event previously suggested dates Nov 1 and Nov 8 were out of question. Perhaps later on in Nov might be possible.

Allen confirmed FonOff very hesitant re desirability proceeding with early independence if Pelt cannot be brought into the line. He felt we wld find ourselves in most difficult position in GA if we presented it with fait accompli in opposition to UN commissioner. If Pelt cld be brought into line (and Allen was not sure how this cld be done) he felt that it wld be different matter and that we cld then proceed with less likelihood heavy censure which he otherwise fears. We took occasion thruout conversation stress views set forth Deptel 2063 <sup>2</sup> and Lidel 192,<sup>3</sup> but it is clear that FonOff feels decision must ultimately depend on Pelt's attitude.

Allen agreed it wld be desirable if Saadawi cld be brought into line so that Libya cld speak with one voice at sixth UNGA, but was extremely doubtful this cld be done on other terms than offering Saadawi Prime Ministership, which UK wld strenuously oppose.

TOP SECRET PRIORITY TRIPOLI, October 30, 1951—7 p. m.

170. Commanding Officer Wheelus Field has informed me that some 2000 USAF troops are expected to arrive in Tripoli over one month period beginning early December, by sea rather than by air and spread over considerably longer period than ConGen had been led to expect.

Their arrival will coincide almost exactly with achievement of Libyan independence and will undoubtedly cause serious local polit repercussions. US now undergoing serious propaganda attacks in local antigovt Arabic press. We are being accused of being new imperialists who plan to take over all of Libya. This move will also be used attack present govt which is very friendly to us and which will be exposed to elections soon after independence. Opposition to govt is strong and antiforeign line popular one. Also UNGA will be in session and will be considering Libyan question probably Dec or early Jan. This troop movement, which will be quite impossible conceal (all roads from port lead through crowded sections Tripoli), seems to be singularly unfortunate from political point of view, particularly at this time. It seems play into hands Soviet bloc and Arab League in GA and might be polit disastrous our friends here. It might also adversely affect chances ratification Libyan American defense agreement now under negotiation which will come before Parliament early 1952.

Plan shld I believe be given urgent further thought in light of above polit considerations.<sup>1</sup>

LYNCH

&lt;sup>1</sup>Telegram 2287, from London, November 10, advised the Department of State that the British Foreign Office had expressed grave concern that morning over the fact that 2,000 American troops were expected to begin arriving at Wheelus Field in early December. The Foreign Office indicated that the United Kingdom, as the power still responsible for Libya's defense, would be unable to sanction such a move at that time, and considered it absolutely necessary to wait at least until Libya was independent. The Embassy agreed it seemed unwise to enlarge U.S. forces in Libya to such an extent at that particular time. (711.56373/11–1051)

Telegram 2476, from Washington to London, repeated to Tripoli, November 13, reported that the bulk of the 2,700 troops of the 580th ARC Wing would not be in Libya until late December or early January; and the view of the Departments of State and Defense was that the arrivals should be staggered so that they would not have an adverse effect on the political situation in Libya if the Consul General in Tripoli was able to obtain the concurrence of the appropriate authorities. (711.56373/11–1351)

A letter from the Acting Secretary of Defense advised the Secretary of State on December 13, however, that "in view of the present tense political situation in Libya, the scheduled deployment of the 580th Air Resupply and Communications Wing of the United States Air Force to that area has been postponed," and personnel of its advance echelon were being returned to the Zone of Interior. Defense asked to be informed when the political situation in Libya would permit the movement of the wing, as its early deployment remained a military requirement of high priority. 174. Pelt in discussing with me, since his return, question of advancing Libyan independence has made one particularly valid point in favor of delaying such action until early mid-Dec. He states program of coordination comite for transfer powers in four stages, two of which are completed, was a formal recommendation to Libyans and admin powers, junking of which wld raise storm of questions in UNGA.

However, he states that Libya question will probably not be discussed until early or mid-Dec citing as one reason that his annual report will not be delivered from printer and put into Assembly's hands before then. He further assures me that he perceives no objection to 15 Dec date or even as early as 10th. Date of 15th was in fact proposed in original transfer powers plan. This move will satisfy both Blackley and Muntasser. Furthermore, it will provide time for Ital Govt to conclude property agreement with Libyans.

If GA can through parliamentary delays such as reference to successive comites and through US lobbying particularly among NATO and Latins (assuming Ital support for latter group) to convince substantial bloc nations to delay action until early or mid-Dec on Libyan question our position will be much sounder.

Essential point in all this maneuvering on advancement independence is to avoid situation whereby resolution wld be passed by GA which might imperil continued use and development US-UK strategic facilities Libya.

Believe US shld begin lobbying for this point of view immed.

United States Position on Probable Soviet and Arab Challenges Regarding US and UK Military Bases in Libya

THE PROBLEM

The problem is to determine the manner in which the United States can most effectively combat Soviet and perhaps Arab accusations in the General Assembly that the Americans and British are establishing military bases in Libya which threaten the independence of that country and which are intended to be used for "imperialistic aggression". At the 1950 Session of the GA the Soviet Union introduced a resolution which provided that all foreign troops and military personnel be withdrawn from Libya within three months and that military bases be dismantled. This resolution received the support of several Arab States but was rejected by a vote of 38–13 with 8 abstentions. The problem in the Sixth GA will be to reject any such Soviet proposal and explain to the satisfaction of most Members the reasons for the presence of American military bases in Libya and the defensive purposes for which they might be used.

RECOMMENDATIONS

- 1. The US delegation should vigorously reject any charges (from Soviet, Arab or other sources) against or attempt to eliminate the existence of our military facilities in Libya.
- 2. The delegation should emphasize that during the period of British Administration of Libya, our arrangements with the British governing our use of Wheelus Field were legal and fully within the authority of the British to make.
- 3. The delegation should state, if necessary, that the US Government has arranged for the use of certain military facilities in Libya through an exchange of notes on December 24, 1951, with the new government of Independent Libya and that eventually an agreement will be concluded on this matter. The delegation should maintain that any such agreement between the US and Libya concerns only the two sovereign states involved and is, therefore, not a matter in which the GA should intervene. However, the agreement will be in conformity with the UN Charter and the text of the agreement will be registered with the UN as required by the Charter.
- 4. The delegation may indicate that, in line with the purposes of such military arrangements, namely to contribute to the maintenance of international peace and security, the facilities in question could if Libya and the US agree, be used as an element in support of collective measures taken or adopted by the United Nations in the event of aggression.

COMMENT

The delegation could state that the American Airbase, Wheelus Field, was built and used by American Forces during the last war and has been in operation since then as a transportation and communications base to other areas in the Near East (e.g. Greece, Turkey, Dhahran). It also serves our forces in Germany and other parts of Western Europe.

If the debate in the GA should require an affirmative American statement regarding the use to which such a base might be put in the future, the delegation should pursue the following course:

a. Emphasize that the US has contributed heavily to the maintenance of collective security in many parts of the world.

b. Emphasize that the US intends to contribute to the implementation of the "uniting for peace" resolution adopted by the GA last year. In order to do this the US will, of course, use whatever facilities are available to it and are considered necessary in the future. In this connection statements in line with Recommendation 4 could be made.

FUTURE DEVELOPMENTS

The situation in respect to US military requirements in Libya is so fluid at the present time that it may be necessary to submit a supplement to this position paper at a later date containing any further guidance or information that may be available at that time.

193. Concurrently with mytel 191 <sup>2</sup> reporting reaction of Council of Mins to US offer $750,000 per year for 20 years Libya to be responsible for rentals without reimbursement, I desire earnestly and urgently to emphasize to Dept certain polit aspects present problem which have played part in leading me to conclusion that Libyan offer shld be accepted by US.

With possible exception of Saudi Arabia, Libya was only govt in Arab world sincerely friendly to United States. In the course of time it will become member of Arab League. Libya can be our bridge to rest of Arab world and, if we handle present situation wisely, gaining its friendship might well be step in retrieving our position in Middle East. To lose this opportunity by refusing pay equitable rentals desired by Libyans wld I believe be serious polit error.

I wild not push this viewpoint if I thought we were getting a bad bargain otherwise. However, it is my belief that we have achieved as good if not considerably better agreement than in other parts of the world.

We must recognize some of the very serious problems confronting this govt and why they deem it essential that they receive a substantial round sum which they can use free of deductions and that they can not be charged with selling their country down the river. There is a spreading belief, fed by Egypt propaganda, that without presence in area of Americans and Brit they cld somehow escape holocaust of war and that presence of Americans and Brit will bring war to them. It is the same sort of unrealistic unsound reasoning that was so fatal to small European countries such as Holland and Belgium during last war. Nevertheless, no matter how wrong idea may be it has popular appeal and is difficult to combat. In order help them combat it we must give them ammunition in the shape of concrete evidence that their future welfare is bound up with ours.

Neither in conversation Nov 5 nor this morning did I make mention of possible suspension of negots because I feel such action wld inject an entirely new and discordant note into discussions which up to now have been on most friendly basis. When negots opened PriMin and FonMin stated that they trusted us completely. They have comported themselves in that manner throughout and have not even carried through their not unreasonable suggestion that they obtain a Moslem legal adviser. It is obvious, however, that if they wished to do so they cld produce an Egypt or Iraqi adviser who wld not view certain provisions of agreement with sympathetic eye, particularly those having to do with personal status of US forces in Libya.

3. Seems to me to be every reason why negots shid not be discontinued. Libyan Govt feels we are its friend. It is about to launch forth as an independent sovereign state. Our mutual relations for years to come will be affected by the result of these negots and the manner in which they are conducted. I fear that if we ourselves introduce note of haggling whole atmosphere will undergo undesirable alteration.

Day of independence is approaching and it may be expected within next 6 weeks, actual date depending upon whether or not Libyan question is high or low on UNGA agenda. Libyans will not sign any agreement prior to convening and approval of elected Parliament. They are prepared exchange notes. If those notes can use present draft agreement for governing interim period we shall be in much sounder position than by exchange making reference to "status quo". The "status quo" is extremely nebulous and in fact has been a matter of day to day decisions made by Brit after consultation with us. We can do that sort of thing with Brit but with Libyans who will be constantly subject to polit pressures it will be far more difficult.

In our note of Feb 3, 1948, to USSR we stated "that the continuation of the arrangement with regard to the use of Mellaha Airfield For Communication Purposes extends only for the period during which the present administration remains responsible for the territory." (Mellaha Airfield is Wheelus AFB). In the exchange of notes between Brit FonOff and London Emb we refer repeatedly to mil air transit and landing rights in Tripolitania. Sound and sight jet fighters engaged training operations is too continuous to be concealed. It appears, therefore, that if we find ourselves without an agreement on independence day, or without prepared notes which Libyans and ourselves are ready to sign we may be placed in embarrassing position internationally.

Finally, $1 million per year plus equitable rentals for 20 years does not seem unreasonable in view of the fact that we are thinking in terms of 7 additional airfields, Navy communications facility near Derna, ARC Akins project outside Tripoli, and 500 square miles for an amphibious and divisional training area for Army and Marine Corps. Certainly not when it is compared with what we have paid for much small areas in other countries. Here we have not been able obtain comparable privileges for American forces. It is not, however, the actual areas which may be involved which disturbs me most but the fact that in order for the agreement to be any good to us it must also be good for the Libyans and one which they can sell to their people. I trust that this is apparent to the Dept as it is to us on the spot.

Negotiating team concurs with views set forth in this tel.

Target date for indepen is Dec 15, but there is still some apprehension here regarding possibility discussion Libyan question by ad hoc polit comite before that time and consequent reluctance to fix definite date as yet. Brit finan and mil agreements in fairly good shape, but not yet finalized with Libyans. Discussions over French finan and mil agreements now under way. In my view delay in opening these discussions by French a serious mistake. Ital states property agreement not yet concluded as property losses not yet agreed upon. It is envisaged that indepen will come about upon proclamations by administering powers UK and France handing over final powers to Libya whereupon King will declare independence. At this point FonMin will send msgs to members UN and certain other countries, such as Italy and Spain. At this moment and on date independence, we agreed that it wld be appropriate to deliver msgs recognized heads of state to King and from FonMins to Libyan FonMin. DEAR MR. However, I am advised by the Secretary of the Air Force that to have this Agreement acceptable to the Provisional Libyan Government, provision must be made therein for the payment of an equitable rental for whatever base areas may become available to the United States. Agreement has been avoided in recent years as a matter of policy, the Department of Defense, in view of the special importance of our military requirements in this area, is prepared in this instance to make an exception. Therefore, it is proposed that Article VII of the subject draft be revised to read as indicated in Inclosure 6.3

With regard to the economic aid to be provided for Libya, which Mr. Matthews mentioned in his letter of 31 August 1951 <sup>4</sup> to Secretary Marshall, this Department is prepared to include in its budget the sum of $1,000,000 on a yearly basis for the twenty-year term of the agreement, in addition to any technical and economic assistance which may be provided by the Department of State under the Mutual Security Act. In this respect, the proposed exchange of notes concerning economic aid, attached hereto as Inclosures 4 and 5 <sup>4</sup> which I understand were drafted in your Department, are satisfactory to the Department of Defense.

I understand that a time lapse of several months may ensue before the new Libyan Parliament is constituted and able to act upon the proposed Agreement. It is, therefore, necessary to make provision for the interim period between the signing of the Agreement by the authorized representatives of the new United Kingdom of Libya and its ratification by the Parliament. The Secretary of the Air Force informs me that your representatives feel that this contingency can best be covered by the exchange of notes, attached hereto as Inclosures 2 and 3, with which I agree.

The information contained in Technical Schedule 1,<sup>4</sup> attached to the proposed Agreement, is of a highly classified nature and should not, of course, be made public without the prior approval of this Department. Whatever steps you take to insure that the information contained in this Technical Schedule is not made public by the Government of Libya will be acceptable to this Department.

In view of the foregoing, and if you agree herewith, it is requested that you institute the necessary action to consummate the proposed Agreement with the Government of Libya. I would appreciate being informed of the outcome of these negotiations.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM C. FOSTER

286. I intend to sign base rights agreement and exchange of notes on financial aid with Muntasser, Prime Minister, on Independence Day rather than with new Foreign Minister because (1) this practice will conform with British and French intentions and (2) will avoid any hitches that might result from new Foreign Minister's unfamiliarity with agreement.

Regarding publicity for agreement and financial aid, Prime Minister is expected to make first campaign speech two days after independence at which time he will undoubtedly desire refer US-Libya financial agreement as example of his accomplishments.

We shid, it is believed, be prepared for simultaneous release of financial aid notes at this time when its use will be of most value to Libyan Govt.

On release of exchange of notes and agreement concerning military facilities, this might be delayed until agreement is presented for ratification. However, it is likely that opposition parties in Libya and also Arab bloc in GA may make it desirable to release the exchange of notes shortly after independence. It is obviously more advantageous for govt to make first move in release without being forced by opposition.

While it is desired to consult with Prime Minister before making final decision on release, I am of opinion that exchange of notes might be publicized at Foreign Minister's speech evening of second day after independence. Agreement itself might be held as restricted pending presentation for ratification after elections in order prevent 55 opposition candidates for Parliament renegotiating it from soapboxes.

The Consul General was advised to "remind Libyans that for publicity purposes we consider it most important that one million dollar annual econ aid commitment of US be kept separate matter from Mil Agreement and that we expect they will likewise in this publicity keep them as separate and unrelated arrangements. 266. French Consul General Tangier confidentially confirmed Resident General 3 demanded Sultan 4 denounce Nationalists and dismiss certain court personnel inimical French interests. He denied story of ultimatum having been given and expressed belief Sultan would accede Juin's terms. As Consul General came to Legation tell me this, I naturally wonder how much left untold. Fact remains situation French Morocco becoming increasingly tense. Faiz [French?] protectorate authorities' intransigence towards Americans on import controls question leaves little doubt extent their intransigence towards Sultan.

Allegations that Juin has full support US his "crack-down" on Sultan not conducive calming excited Nationalists and likely leave mark on our relations with Morocco. Nationalist leaders maintain US accord with residency's policy being systematically spread throughout French Morocco by French agents. 4553. As result of persistent questioning Foreign Office informed us that Juin before leaving for Washington had been rough with Sultan and had indeed threatened him with forced abdication or even deposition if Sultan not prepared to make declaration denouncing terrorist "Fascist" methods of Istiqlal, remove certain anti-French members of entourage and stop stalling on reforms which French wish to initiate with view to democratizing regime.

In defending Juin's use of threat to Sultan, La Tour du Pin referred to Resident General's original instructions on assuming office whereby he was given authority to consider eventual removal of Sultan if latter became too obstreperous. Former Resident Generals Puaux and Labonne had been forced out according to La Tour du Pin at instigation of Sultan and evidently Juin was unwilling to accept post without first being assured he would not suffer same fate. We were told that removal of Moulay Abdel Hafid by Lyautey in 1912 was precedent for any similar action which French might care to take. In case of present Sultan we were reminded that he had been Lyautey's choice and therefore French creation.

After this explanation La Tour du Pin assured us that Juin's menacing attitude to Sultan was only intended to bring latter to reason and get him to fulfill those measures referred to in first paragraph which are deemed necessary by French. The Sultan is reported to have requested Juin's demands in writing from De Blesson day after General's departure and to have intimated that once received he would accede to them. This "astute move to permit Sultan to seek confirmation of Juin's requests from government in Paris" was refused. In this connection Embassy was informed by Lagxhaoui, expelled member of Moroccan Government Council, who is now in Paris that Sultan is nonetheless writing President Auriol for clarification. La Tour du Pin discounted possibility of Sultan's removal because:

(1) Sultan would probably accede to French requests;

(2) Removal would create even worse situation than deposing of Moncef Bey in Tunisia for Sultan still young man and could create turmoil many more years than aged Moncef did;

(3) French Government would have to decide question and Socialists, MRP's and other political parties would doubtless oppose (Embassy knows that certain Socialists have been critical of Juin's actions and government's handling of situation).

In any case no action will be taken according to Foreign Office until return of Juin who will consult with government in Paris before going to Rabat.

At his request Lagxhaoui gave Embassy account of situation closely paralleling accounts given Tangier and Rabat by nationalists and proposed following three points which he thought would restore calm in Morocco:

1. Official denial by Foreign Office that removal Sultan envisaged.

2. Naming new Resident General who would not as Juin have other functions. Juin's future connections with SHAPE he insisted implied to average Moroccan that his acts had full approval US.

3. New Resident General preferably civilian should be authorized institute immediate freedom of press and Moroccan trade unions.

Once crisis over Lagxhaoui believed French and Moroccans could proceed work out acceptable modus vivendi.

At Lagxhaoui's suggestion his views were reported to La Tour du Pin who found them to be reasonable. However, Foreign Office could not make communiqué he stated which would cause Juin lose face and would do nothing until General's return. He added that second point would be taken care of when Juin resigns post Morocco probably in June. Point three La Tour du Pin said was already favorably considered by Foreign Office.

We informed La Tour du Pin that we were following situation closely and with concern lest worsening of relations between Sultan and French administration lead to disorder and violence in Morocco. MOROCCO 1371

While realizing that problem was one between French and Moroccans we expressed hope that conciliatory attitude would prevail and that good relations would be quickly re-established between French administration and Maghzen. La Tour du Pin was confident that difficulties would be ironed out within few weeks.

program. This coupled with Sultan's open support Nationalist agitation led Juin on January 26 inform him French would no longer tolerate unjust denunciations French activity Morocco by Istiqlal and Nationalists must desist from troubling public order. Sultan further told unless he approved French sponsored reforms immediately, Juin would make public legislative log jam now existing and reasons therefor. Finally slight revamping Imperial Cabinet weed out outspoken anti-French elements required.

Soulie concluded French hoped for conciliatory attitude Sultan but not optimistic because evidences outside support from Socialists and Left Wing or [of?] MPR in France and Arab League as well as possible from US and UK Governments would stiffen him. Furthermore if he believed Juin bluffing he would certainly fail cooperate. Soulie stressed Juin most definitely not bluffing though French hoped deposition unnecessary as French interests throughout Moslem world would suffer thereby. He concluded deposition however more than strong possibility and if carried out would be for sake ultimate stability Morocco. He said Juin preferred eliminate possible rear guard opposition now rather than during war and utterly refused follow any line which might antagonize seriously Berber elements which supplied 3 to 4 divisions for Atlantic Pact Army while entire Arab League incapable furnishing 1 effective division. Last mentioned key point French argument which is that 75% Moroccans oppose Sultan and French will not risk alienating this important military element because of political fulminations Arabs Morocco or elsewhere.

NEA-Mr. Berry

AF-Mr. Bourgerie

AF—Mr. Cyr

AF—Mr. Richey

WE—Mr. Godlev

After the usual amenities, Mr. Daridan stated that "we" are most unhappy about the New York Times article of February 22, 1951 reporting the substance of a letter addressed to President Truman by El Abd Bouhafa, Secretary of the Abd El Krim Committee for Freedom of North Africa. The article reports that "in Cairo, Washington and Rabat 'spokesmen for the United States informed us that your Government has made clear its disapproval of General Juin's threats', and that the United States did not support French colonial policy in Morocco. These assurances, Mr. Bouhafa added, have not been publicly stated."

Mr. Daridan was particularly unhappy over the allegation in the article that a State Department official had privately corroborated the foregoing statements. He referred to previous assurances from the Department that no public statement would be made concerning the Moroccan rift without first informing the French, and wondered, under the circumstances, whether the Department might not wish to put out some sort of denial.

Mr. Bourgerie replied that nobody in the Office of African Affairs had seen or talked with Mr. Bouhafa in this vein. As a matter of fact, Mr. Bouhafa has been consistently avoided during the past several weeks.

Mr. Berry expressed the view that any sort of denial put out by the Department would serve to dignify the Bouhafa story and would serve to keep alive a public discussion of a subject which both we and the French wished to see closed. He went on to say that he was concerned over the reports of recent developments in Morocco and recalled in this connection that Mr. Schuman had recently informed Ambassador Bruce that the French Government is as concerned as the United States Government over the direction of the trend of events in Morocco. As the direction is contrary to that which we here, and the French in Paris, anticipated, we wondered if there was anything to the newspaper stories that there was a difference of opinion within the French Government itself on Morocco.

Mr. Daridan indicated that there may be some difference of opinion on this subject within the French Government. He agreed that generally it is all right not to dignify such press reports with a reply but he wondered whether that would be the right approach in this case. He inferred that he thought the United States Government should deny the foregoing press report.

Mr. Berry thereupon reviewed the United States Government's traditional approach to dependent areas. He said that as a nation we liked to see the peoples in such areas progress. He wondered, "within the family", whether General Juin was not acting more as a soldier than a diplomat in dealing with the Moroccans. In this country, he said, we would dislike very much to see an outbreak in the Arab world against France; we do not like the prospect of airing the Moroccan problem in the UN; and we are sorry to see selfish groups, whoever they may be, try to use the United States to promote their selfish motives. Mr. Berry declared that it should be possible to find a solution to the Moroccan problem in Morocco.

Mr. Daridan agreed that General Juin may well be more of a soldier than a diplomat, but the Nationalists are the ones, he declared, who make reforms impossible. Mr. Daridan agreed with Mr. Berry that it should be possible to find a solution on the spot and he too hated to see the Istiqlal Party use the United States to promote its own ends.

Mr. Godley agreed with the views Mr. Berry had expressed. Mr. Bourgerie referred to the fact that the Moroccan imports problem had been aired in Congress; he hoped that the political problem could be settled without such an airing.

Mr. Benard expressed the view that we are all working for a solution of the Moroccan problem. The Istiqlal, however, are everywhere and at all times pretending that they have United States support of their position. He referred to the fact that a few years ago Azzam Pasha asserted in a press conference at the Shoreham Hotel that the late President Roosevelt had promised to help the Sultan of Morocco obtain independence. At that time, Mr. Loy Henderson had publicly denied Azzam Pasha's statement and by such public announcement had taken the wind out of it. Now, he declared, a United States spokesman is alleged to have made a statement in the above mentioned press report. Mr. Benard felt that again a public denial is needed.

Mr. Bourgerie stated that no United States spokesman had made such a statement, but that the statement does in fact happen to be the United States' view.

Mr. Benard replied that since the United States does not support France in this matter, does it support the Istiqlal. He indicated that unless we declare our neutrality publicly the Istiqlal will continue to claim that they have United States support.

Mr. Berry said that while it is true that the Istiqlal will likely repeat their claims, in his opinion we would be adding fuel to the fire by denying the claim.

Mr. Bourgerie added that if we say we do not support the Nationalists the State Department might thereby offend and get into an argument with the more liberal elements in the United States.

Mr. Benard felt that this was not the point; he insisted that there need only be a denial of the particular statement made in the foregoing press story. Mr. Berry compared this situation to the many charges which are leveled month after month at high officials of this Government who do not dignify all of these charges with answers. Mr. Berry said he would like to see the French make adjustments in Morocco in a way which would solve the problem.

Mr. Benard said that the French are worried by press stories such as the above when they appear in France or Morocco. In this case, however, Bouhafa is trying to draw the United States into an internal Moroccan problem. The French, he said, are familiar with these tactics on the part of the Arabs and feel that there is need of a United States denial to counteract the press story in question.

Mr. Berry said he felt that the Department's position would be not to dignify the press story with an answer but that if the French consider it important to make a denial we will think the matter over. Mr. Godley suggested that possibly something might be issued after a couple of weeks if the Nationalists continue to claim United States support.

Mr. Bourgerie indicated that our press guidance had been along the lines we previously mentioned to the French. He recalled that last Saturday it appeared that progress was being made in Morocco—then suddenly General Juin's demand on the Maghzen was made. He referred to the fact that the Moroccan Section of the Council of Government is the only forum which the Moroccans have since they have no legislature. He referred to the fact that El Glaoui is not too scrupulous and in fact is quite repressive in his measures toward his people in Marrakech.

Mr. Daridan expressed the view that a solution in Morocco would be more probable if it were made clear to the Istiqlal that they do not have American backing.

The Consul at Rabat (McBride) to the Department of State 1

SECRET

Rabat, February 28, 1951.

No. 325

Subject: Denouement of Moroccan Crisis

On Saturday night, February 24, the Moroccan crisis, which was then just two days less than a month old, appeared badly deadlocked. Negotiations between the French and the Palace had been broken off, and the tone of the press was threatening. According to the French-language newspapers, demonstrations against the Sultan and the Istiqlal were increasing with even Arab elements becoming restive and adding their complaints to those of the Berbers. It will be examined more in detail in a later despatch when complete evidence is available as to what percentage of the manifestations against the Sultan reported in the Residency-controlled press ever occurred. At that point the Sultan was still apparently standing firm though it was apparent that General Juin would eventually substantially get his way, if his own Government supported him, because of the Sultan's lack of military means to back his position.

On Sunday morning it was announced under banner headlines that the Imperial Cabinet had been dissolved and its functionaries as well as the Rector of the Karaouyine University in Fez, an ardent nationalist, had been "reintegrated" into other less controversial duties. Residency sources have pointed out to us that, since talks were still suspended, the French learned of this action by the Sultan, which he had promised earlier incidentally, by the press though it was communed by a note to the Residency on Sunday. The immediate reaction of the Residency was that this represented a first step by the Moroccan ruler toward a compromise but was insufficient in itself to meet Juin's demands even in the personnel field; since the original request regarding the dissolution of the cabinet had later been amplified by the French into insistence of elimination of all anti-French elements in the Maghzen.

The same day information began coming in from Moroccan sources that the French civil controllers in the Berber areas of the Middle Atlas had instructed the tribes under their jurisdiction each to despatch a quota of sixty or seventy armed horsemen to Rabat or Fez, depending on proximity, to demonstrate against the Sultan and the Arab population, and show their loyalty to France. Although we were most skeptical that such a movement would occur, a check by the British Consul General and myself around Rabat and by the British Consul in the environs of Fez indicated that the information we had received was correct. It later developed that perhaps as many as 8,000 men were set in motion, with about 3,000 destined for Rabat. Although the British and ourselves were told later, when this movement was discussed, that this represented merely the most serious of the spontaneous evidences of Berber disaffection with the Sultan and the Istiglal, a British journalist, Mr. Wallis of the Daily Telegraph, told the Director of Press and Information, M. Mazoyer, that this tale was obvious nonsense since the Protectorate could have prevented the movement simply by not permitting the tribesmen to start out. This Residency official thereupon admitted first that the French had not opposed the descent on Rabat and Fez, and later that the Protectorate had actually encouraged it. Various British and American journalists at present in Morocco have mentioned their conclusion of this maneuver which my British colleague and I had already reached: that the French were playing an unusually dangerous game which might result even in European bloodshed should the demonstrations depart from plan in any respect.

On Monday morning press headlines reflected a totally different atmosphere, and indicated that agreement on outstanding differences had virtually been reached the previous afternoon. I was called in by the Diplomatic Counselor who reported that a compromise had been effected the day before. The details of this arrangement were reported in Rabat telegram 120 of February 26.3 As an indication of why this sudden volte face had occurred, primarily on the part of the Sultan, who was made to appear to cede on most of the outstanding points, the Diplomatic Counselor stated that Deputy Resident deBlesson, who returned on Sunday morning from Paris, brought with him a message from President Auriol replying to the Sultan's direct appeal of February 21. Since this was thought to be a last effort on the Sultan's part to get out of his impasse with Juin, we were left to conclude that, when Auriol called for a return to the spirit of the October talks between the Sultan and himself in Paris, the Moroccan sovereign concluded that the game was up and he had best come to such terms as possible with the Residency quickly before new demands were made.

A further factor in the abrupt termination of the crisis, and perhaps the principal one, was the movement of the Berber tribesmen towards Rabat and Fez. In the French view, it is stated that this ominous and spontaneous development finally convinced the Sultan, when the forces planning to demonstrate against him were at the doors of the capital, that he had either lost or never had the support of the mass of his people in his political policy. Therefore, he concluded he could no longer hold out against the Moroccan population, and must succumb to their wishes by denouncing the Istiqlal and meeting the other French demands (which are now presented as Moroccan demands in the French press). Since no Moroccan now dares to be in contact with us, we don't have their side, but presumably when the Sultan realized the lengths to which the French were willing to go to coerce him, including even risking losing control of the situation in Rabat, he decided to surrender to the French terms, though he was able to gain some satisfaction on two points, and lost entirely only on the question of eliminating anti-French personnel from the Moroccan Government. Thus, the speedy arrangement of February 25 was concluded. It was not really so hasty because all of the points had been mulled over for so long that all possible combinations had been attempted, and the final accord was merely the putting together of the appropriate ones.

The compromise which was worked out on the question of denunciation of the Istiqlal was that the Sultan issued a long proclamation of the principles of Islam and calling for tranquillity in the country while the Grand Vizier was left the task of condemning the methods and activities of "a certain party". These declarations appeared on February 24 to the sustained hoopla of the French press which, having called the Sultan every name in the book, now referred to "the renewed proof of the wisdom of His Majesty". Point one was thus taken care of, while, on the discharging or transferring of further personnel, announcements are expected momentarily, with the appointment of a new Pasha of Rabat in the person of a member of the pro-French Tazi family already mentioned in the February 28 Echo du Maroc. On the question of reforms, the Sultan has also of course promised speedy action, with the expectation that many pieces of French-sponsored and drafted legislation will be approved quickly, while others will be the subject of study by the Franco-Moroccan Mixed Commission discussed in Paris with the Sultan last year, and to the appointment of which he has heretofore been opposed.

This would seem, on the surface at least, to wash out the matter completely, and this office certainly hopes the crisis is finished because the Residency has been in a perfectly poisonous frame of mind during its duration. However, one slight ominous note is the continued harping of the press on demonstrations of loyalty to France, since the need for this propaganda would seem to be over. Le Petit Marocain of the Mas family, a strongly anti-Moroccan sheet, this morning headlined a report to the effect that the religious brotherhoods, who are leading French supporters, felt that the condemnation of "a certain party" was insufficient and were still worrying the old bone of denouncing the Istiqlal by name. It is fervently hoped that the French will drop the matter and let Morocco get on about its business, but the possibility of using artificial respiration on the "crisis" exists. It is hoped when all of the data available can be assembled to present a report which will show that the so-called crisis was largely invented for motives which are not entirely clear as yet. In any event this unproductive political squabble completely dominated Moroccan life during the period from its birth on January 26 to what we cordially hope was its demise on February 27.

Mr. Cyr

Mr. Bonnet opened the conversation by stating that Iran and the rest of the area which Mr. McGhee has just visited,<sup>2</sup> like the rest of the world, have many problems. He said that in most instances of political unrest, nationalism is found in the vanguard, closely followed by Communism.

Mr. McGhee stated that the NEA area does, indeed, have its share of troubles these days. He referred specifically to the British difficulties in Egypt,<sup>3</sup> to the nationalization of oil in Iran,<sup>4</sup> and to the Syrian-Israeli dispute.<sup>5</sup> He suggested that part of the problem in Iran is to convince the people that the oil companies are for the people; the main issue everywhere is to decide who can capture nationalism and whether nationalism can be channeled in the right direction.

The Ambassador agreed that nationalism is a good force but that it must be properly channeled. Mr. McGhee said that France has an excellent opportunity in Morocco to do just that, but that our information indicates that French policies have not gained the confidence of the Moroccan people.

Ambassador Bonnet stated that obviously there was a misunderstanding between us as to the facts in Morocco. He said that the recent trouble in Morocco is the result of a two-year delay on the part of the Sultan in signing dahirs for reforms which the people want. He described the Istiqlal Party as a representative of nothing but a few members of the privileged classes consisting of such people as Azzam Pasha. The French authorities in Morocco have made every effort to collaborate with the Sultan but the fact remains that he is advised by people like the Istiqlal, which makes successful cooperation impossible. He said it simply is not true that the French had incited the Berbers of Marrakech in the recent incidents in Morocco. The Istiqlal Party, he declared, represents an element that the West should not support. Its link with the Arab League is dangerous. The Istiqlal Party must be stopped so that there will be no repetition of the situations such as have developed in Asia.

The French Ambassador went on to say that the French are attempting to prepare the Moroccans for eventual self-government. They are not trying to do this in the way that the Istiqlal Party would like but they are trying to do it the right way. The Istiqlal are interested in nothing but an assumption of power and they are people who, once in power, would have no following and no interest in the common good. Under the French plan preparations for self-government would be gradual; dahirs must be signed for representative government to evolve in three stages: (1) tribal assemblies restricted to small areas must first be set up in a network throughout the country; (2) the authority and powers of these traditional assemblies would be gradually enlarged in geographic and substantive scope; and (3) finally elections would be held, thereby substituting elected assemblies for traditional assemblies once the people are prepared for such a step. The French plan is one of self-government from the grass roots and not one which springs from the minds of a few Istiqlal leaders for their own good. The French purpose is to forestall Communism by the introduction of democracy with a popular basis. The Istiglal are not Communists but their activities lend themselves unwittingly to opening the door to Communism. The French Government needs the cooperation and understanding of the United States in its efforts to bring self-government to Morocco and such cooperation cannot exist so long as there is misunderstanding based on misinformation.

Mr. McGhee said that he was glad the Ambassador had come in to discuss this subject because as a result of his recent trip to Morocco he was greatly concerned over indications that the French do not have the confidence of the Moroccan people. He pointed out that while the United States is not a party to this problem, it is necessarily interested in seeing the situation there develop in a manner which will be conducive to stability. He said that the United States wishes to see France succeed in Morocco because Morocco means a great deal

MOROCCO

Mr. Bonnet indicated that the introduction of the Moroccan dispute into the UN would be embarrassing to the United States but that France was prepared to counter-attack if and when that happened. He said that Morocco was not comparable to French Indo-China. Mr. McGhee agreed that while they may not be identical there are certain broad elements which are similar in both cases.

Mr. McGhee said that we wish to support France in Morocco but that we were extremely concerned when General Juin indicated that the Sultan might be deposed. Our information indicates that the Moroccan people support the Sultan. The Ambassador expressed considerable amazement at this statement. Mr. McGhee indicated that the Moroccan incident has produced sympathetic reactions in Tunisia. Ambassador Bonnet stated that the trouble in Tunisia is being caused by the Arab League and he suggested that we should verify our reports to the effect that the Moroccan people support the Sultan. As a matter of fact, he said, the leaders other than the Istiqlal are against the Sultan. Mr. McGhee asked what other leaders there were in Morocco since political parties are not allowed. The Ambassador indicated that he had reference to the traditional leaders such as the caids and pashas. Mr. Bourgerie indicated that it has been reported that all anti-French caids and pashas are replaced by pro-French leaders as necessary.

In answer to the Ambassador's statement that only a few educated Istiqlal support the Sultan, Mr. McGhee observed that it seems to happen consistently as people are educated that they feel the nationalist urge. The Ambassador distinguished between legitimate nationalist aspirations and the tenets of the Istiqlal Party. The Istiqlal are not, he declared, in favor of French reforms; they are opposed. The Ambassador indicated that the situation in Morocco at the present time is calm. Mr. McGhee observed that calm based on repressive measures is not really calm. All we wish to see in Morocco is effective measures permitting such rights as freedom of the press, of thought, of political parties, and a comprehensive educational system. He said that the progress being made in Morocco is negligible compared to that in India and Pakistan. The Ambassador concluded his remarks on Morocco by stating that his observations should be studied carefully and that yielding to the Istiqlal opened the road not to democracy but to Communism.

Paper Prepared in the Department of State 1

Мовоссо

PROBLEM

To harmonize French and US views on Morocco.

US OBJECTIVES

a) To maintain stability in Morocco so that Morocco can make the maximum contribution to Western security and our air bases may be utilized and protected.

b) To assist the French in making necessary economic and social reforms and in guiding Moroccan political evolution toward self-government at a sufficiently rapid rate to forestall nationalist uprisings.

c) To cooperate with France in the promotion of friendly relations with the Moroccan people.

FRENCH POSITION

- a) Morocco should eventually become an associated state in the French Union and France alone is the power to guide Morocco to this status.
- b) The present Moroccan nationalist movement is not representative of the mass of the people which have not yet achieved sufficient state of development to assume the responsibilities of self-government.

&lt;sup>7</sup>On May 9 the Department of State cabled Rabat, summarizing the substance of this memorandum and instructing the Consulate to tell de Blesson that the United States was disturbed over the divergence between the French and U.S. estimates of the situation in Morocco, which the Department of State believed arose principally from French failure to inform the United States fully on what they were contemplating in the way of reforms. (Telegram 72 to Rabat, May 9: 771.00/5-951)

Attached to the source text was a cover sheet, not printed, which indicated that this paper had been approved by NEA and EUR following a briefing session with Secretary Acheson on August 28. The cover sheet also indicated that it was circulated as WFM F-4a in the records of the Department of State. A previous draft, WFM F-4, dated August 27, which is the same in substance as the paper printed here, is in the Conference Files: Lot 59 D 95: CF 88. Papers designated WFM F were prepared for bilateral talks with the French during the meetings of the Foreign Ministers of the United States, United Kingdom, and France held in Washington during September. For a record of the discussion on Morocco, see U.S.-Fr. Min-1, infra.

- c) France is doing and will do everything within its power to hasten such evolution.
- d) France desires to cooperate with the US militarily and economically in Morocco so that Morocco can make its maximum contribution to Western security.

SULTAN'S POSITION

- a) Requests revision of the Protectorate Treaty of 1912.
- b) Withholds approval of the French-sponsored decrees on the ground that they would institute reforms that are in derogation of his sovereignty.
- c) Wishes to remain friendly with France, but would relinquish his sovereignty only to a purely Moroccan assembly.
- d) Avoided French demand in January that he denounce the Istiqlal Party but, in the face of Berber demonstrations and a French threat of possible deposition, he compromised to the extent of denouncing all extremists.
- e) Derived great satisfaction and encouragement from President Roosevelt's visit of 1943 but is somewhat disappointed over our present neutral policy in Morocco.
- f) With Oriental patience he is capable of awaiting the preoccupation of France elsewhere in a world struggle.

ISTIQLAL POSITION

- a) Supports the Sultan.
- b) Seeks to gain Moroccan independence.
- c) Solicits Arab League and other Moslem support, particularly in presenting the Moroccan problem to the United Nations.
- d) Seeks the support or at least the neutrality of the United States in the dispute.
- e) Believes the French Residency is bent on strengthening the legal foothold of France and Frenchmen in Morocco, rather than guiding the evolutionary development of the Moroccan people.

POSITION OF THE MOSLEM WORLD AND ARAB LEAGUE

- a) The Arab League and Moslem world generally, support the Moroccan nationalists and in March five Arab countries asked France to grant independence to Morocco.
- b) The possibility exists that the Arab countries might raise the Moroccan problem in the United Nations which would place the US and France in an embarrassing position.

US POSITION TO BE PRESENTED TO MR. SCHUMAN

a) Our objectives in Morocco are: (1) To maintain stability in Morocco so that Morocco can make the maximum contribution to Western security; (2) To assist the French in guiding Moroccan social, economic and political evolution. We desire to work with the French in achieving these objectives and want them to realize that we are not working against them in Morocco. By the same token, the French will appreciate that we have an interest in maintaining our traditional friendship with the Moroccan people as we have throughout the Arab world.

- b) We are most appreciative of the assistance we have received from the French Government in obtaining certain military privileges in the Sheriffian Empire and fully recognize the importance of military collaboration in that area.
- c) We do not believe Morocco is ready for independence. We are of the opinion that only by following an evolutionary policy in that country can France bring that area of the world to make its maximum contribution to the security of the West. We recognize that reforms have already been instituted in Morocco and hope that this policy will continue to develop under the new Resident General. While we recognize the different situations existing in Morocco and Tunisia, due largely to French influence in the latter area since 1883, we are looking forward to evolution in Morocco along lines similar to those followed in Tunisia.
- d) In our view this policy must be accompanied by restraint and moderation on the part of not only the Moroccan nationalists and Arab League but also of the responsible French officials in Morocco. We are prepared to use our influence to this end.
- e) As Mr. Schuman will recall, when the question of deposition of the Sultan was under consideration early in this year we expressed our concern over such action. Our view remains the same due to the unfortunate effect that such action would have on French relations with the Moslem world and that it might lead to Arab League action before the United Nations which would be embarrassing.
- f) In refuting charges raised particularly by Moslem countries that French policy in Morocco is repressive rather than evolutionary we are in a difficult position in that at present we are not familiar with French policy nor even with the scope of the decrees (dahirs) proposed to the Sultan. We hope that it might be possible for the French Government to inform us of its plans in that area and would be glad to discuss them at the convenience of the French Government. We are certain that such discussions would permit us to support French policy more effectively.

- 11. Noting that the Resident-General in Morocco was directly under the Minister of Foreign Affairs, M. Schuman emphasized his direct interest and responsibility for Morocco. He had been concerned in early 1951 when he received a note from the U.S. to the effect that it would be difficult, or even impossible, to support France if the Moroccan question were raised before the U.N.2 He thought that it would be best to have a frank, friendly discussion before the Moroccan question became an issue of open debate. He would not, however, discuss the legal status of U.S. citizens in Morocco, since that question was presently before the Hague Tribunal and France would of course loyally adhere to any decision which was reached.3
- 12. He was pleased to recognize and emphasize the important role that Marshall Plan aid had played in Morocco and to note that the relations between the Moroccans, the French and the Americans with respect to the military bases were very good.
- 13. He did not need to discuss in detail the content of the two memoranda of September 6 in which the French Government had set forth

The note under reference here has not been identified further; however in circular telegram 532, dated March 7, the Department of State informed Embassy Paris, inter alia, that subsequent to General Juin's visit to Washington (see telegram 260, February 2, p. 1371) it had been made clear to the French in Washington, Paris, and Rabat, that the United States would not be able to support France if the Arab League brought the Moroccan issue before the United Nations. (771.00/3-751) its attitude with respect to communism and nationalism in Morocco and the political evolution of Morocco (WFM F-4/1, September 8, 19514). Instead he wished to describe present French policy which was opposite to the old colonial concept of the pre-1914 period. France would make a modern democratic state of Morocco. This was the purpose of the reforms of General Juin and of the new Resident-General, General Guillaume. The latter had received specific instructions to undertake additional reforms. France, however, could not impose these reforms but had to persuade the Sultan to accept them. Unfortunately the Sultan did not favor democracy, and since he was an absolute sovereign, he did not renounce his prerogatives easily. Moreover, the Berbers were also feudal and medieval in their point of view and were opposed to democracy. In addition, the European and Jewish colonies needed to be brought into a cohesive whole of Moroccan life. The Istiglal, the anti-French opposition, was not interested in democracy and sought a representative assembly only in the hope of eliminating the French from Morocco. In undertaking necessary reorganization of the social structure, the reforms were directed to municipal improvement. They had evoked resistance but he hoped soon to get results.

14. In this policy France should not be isolated from the U.S. Neither the Sultan nor the Istiqlal should find a difference between the two countries. There was of course freedom for journalists to come to Morocco and freedom for Moroccans to travel abroad. Events of relative unimportance, such as a broadcast by Bourghiba from London, could be greatly exaggerated in Morocco. As to the communists in Morocco, they should not be confused with the nationalists. The two elements were entirely separate, but they could form a temporary alliance for their own purposes. Thus, the nationalists might try to use communist labor unions to create disorder.

15. As to the possibility that the Moroccan question might be placed before the U.N. by a member of the Arab League, M. Schuman asked the U.S. to discourage such action. Such a public discussion would not aid the situation in Morocco. Passions would be inflamed and it would be more difficult to make progress with the proposed reforms. At present there was no great difficulty in Morocco. General Guillaume was close to the Sultan and it was hoped that he would be able to influence him. If a debate did develop in the U.N., France and the U.S. should discuss their common attitude. At this point he had no specific ideas concerning exactly what should be done. France recognized its responsibility to lead Morocco forward toward independence in the French Union. This would be done in the same spirit as it had been done in Indochina. He appreciated the opportunity to explore this problem which was of common strategic interest and in which the two countries had a common stake in an ordered, democratic regime.

16. Mr. Acheson said that the interests of France and the U.S. in Morocco were identical and that the two countries should work in close relationship. He appreciated the French assistance in making military facilities available. He would not want to hurt the position of France. He agreed that Morocco was not ready for independence and that it was the role of France to guide these people toward independence. In this effort he wished to be helpful. He also agreed that no useful purpose would be served by bringing the question before the U.N. and he would use such limited influence as he had to discourage such a step. He would study what had been said and would try to work out a common attitude if the question of Morocco came before the U.N. He observed that nationalist agitation merited careful consideration, as indeed the French were giving it, since such agitation was often used to direct attention away from local problems. He welcomed the offer of M. Schuman for further discussion of this question and thought perhaps this should be worked out.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Secretary of State 1

CONFIDENTIAL

[Washington,] October 9, 1951.

Subject: Moroccan Situation

Participants: The Secretary of State

M. Bonnet

Also present: Mr. Bonbright, EUR

Mr. Van Laethem, French Embassy

M. Bonnet began by stating that he had received several messages from M. Schuman and was under instructions to discuss with us the North African situation with particular reference to the action of the Egyptian Government on October 6 in placing the subject on the agenda of the forthcoming General Assembly. He left with me the attached note setting forth the French position.<sup>2</sup>

The Ambassador began with a brief reference to the very strong feeling which existed in France on the Moroccan question and said that M. Schuman himself was surprised by the depth of this feeling which had been brought to a head by the Egyptian action. He referred to the Bourghiba episode <sup>3</sup> and to the question of the exchange of communications between the French and American Governments suggested by M. Schuman in September.<sup>4</sup>

With regard to the UN matter, M. Bonnet said that the French Government had decided to fight the placing of this item on the agenda on the grounds that this was an internal matter under the UN Charter. He was instructed to emphasize the very great importance which the French Government attached to obtaining our full support.

In reply I stated that we were in accord with the view that the United Nations was not competent to deal with this question in the sense of passing any condemnatory resolution or setting up a commission of investigation, etc. We would want to work with the French and talk over with them the best means of reaching the desired end. With respect to tactics however, I wished to throw out some suggestions which I hoped the French Government would take under consideration. I pointed to the difficulty of keeping any question off the agenda and inquired whether, unless we were sure of a favorable vote, it would be wise to put up a fight on this issue. If we lost, the result would be two debates instead of one, first on the question of procedure and then on the substance. In this connection I referred to the manner in which we had handled the Formosan issue when the Communists introduced a resolution branding us as aggressors there. Instead of fighting it we had welcomed the opportunity to present our side. We had then gone quietly to work and succeeded in getting the resolution placed at the bottom of the agenda and in the end, due to the pressure of other business, the item was never reached. I thought that it might be useful for the French Government to consider this precedent and see whether from their own point of view it would not be best for them to take the attitude that they were proud of their record in Morocco and glad of the opportunity to tell the world about it. If the French would give us some material, we could occasionally "chime in". I said that our minds had not been fully made up on this but I thought the idea was worth their consideration.

I then threw out the suggestion that if the negotiations with the Egyptians on defense matters <sup>5</sup> went well, it might be possible to persuade them to withdraw their request for a debate on Morocco.

M. Bonnet replied that if the Egyptians were to withdraw, this would, of course, be very satisfactory. He doubted if they would do so, however, and he also understood that although the Egyptians took the lead on Saturday some of the other Arab states intended to take identical action. With regard to my suggestion on tactics he was sure that his government had already considered the possibility of proceeding along those lines. He agreed that two debates were undesirable. On the other hand, the French Government doubted that their public opinion would stand for failure to meet the issue squarely. Moreover, in the light of the Iranian situation and the Egyptian abrogation of the British Treaty of 1936, the French felt that the line had to be drawn somewhere in order to halt the deterioration of the Western position. He felt sure his government would wish to draw the line on the Moroccan question and adopt a very stiff attitude toward it. He also referred to the serious effect in the Middle East if the US were to show hesitancy in backing up the French position. Finally, if the UN agreed to have the Moroccan question on the agenda the French foresaw the possibility of Egyptian-inspired disorders in Morocco to back up the Arab case.

*According to a memorandum from Bourgerie to McGhee, dated September 21, Schuman had asked Acheson during the NATO Council meeting at Ottawa, September 15–20, to exchange letters in which the United States would point out that it supported the French position in Morocco and had no interest in the internal political affairs there. (771.00/9-2151)

As for the present situation in Morocco itself, the Ambassador characterized it as "good" and he thought that General Guillaume, the new Resident General, had got off to an excellent start with the Sultan. He then read me what the Sultan had recently said to the General which was along the following lines: "You will always find me at your side in defense of the common interests of our two countries. The erection of the edifice has been too rapid. Only the roof is missing. If difficulties remain, we will find means together to meet them. There shall be no division between France and Morocco and we will work together hand in hand."

The Ambassador seemed personally to share my views concerning the unfortunate effects of fighting a losing battle on the procedural question and agreed that we should go over together the prospects for the individual country votes. It would be particularly important to find what position the Latin Americans will take.

Turning to M. Schuman's proposal for an exchange of notes, I indicated that I had just returned to the office and had not yet had an opportunity to go deeply into the question. I asked him outright however what M. Schuman wanted to do with the notes. Did he wish to make them public? Just what purpose would they serve?

M. Bonnet stated that he had no specific information on the question of publication although he assumed that his government probably would wish to publish the notes. Certainly M. Schuman would wish to show them to the Cabinet. As for their purpose he thought that M. Schuman wanted them to show that the US approves the policy which France is following in Morocco.

As he was leaving, the Ambassador stated that he would report our conversation and wanted to make certain that he understood the extent of our support on the UN matter. I repeated to him that we were in accord with the French with respect to substance, namely, that we would oppose any commission of investigation or resolution denouncing the French. On the matter of tactics I had not made up my mind but had merely offered some suggestions for the consideration of his government.<sup>6</sup>

DEAN ACHESON

<sup>6</sup>The question of Morocco was considered by the Steering Committee of the General Assembly following the application by Egypt for inclusion on the agenda. On November 9 the Steering Committee decided to postpone indefinitely the application and on December 13 the General Assembly concurred with that decision. Policy Paper Prepared in the Department of State 1

SECRET

[Washington,] November 21, 1951.

UNITED STATES POLICY IN MOROCCO

Recent developments in the Near East and North Africa, have served to aggravate the dilemma which this Government faces in determining what United States policy should be in Morocco. With the development of United States air and naval bases in Morocco, the strategic importance of this area to this Government has been greatly enhanced. Thus political stability in Morocco is of even greater importance to the United States than it has been in the past. At the same time, recent developments in Iran and Egypt, coupled with the growing strength of Nationalists movements throughout North Africa serve to point up the fact that the threat of political instability in Morocco has increased almost in direct ratio to the increase in our strategic interest in the area. From these two factors,—the increase of U.S. strategic interest in the area and the threat to political stability which is posed by the rising tide of nationalism—the present dilemma regarding United States policy is created.

Unless the present Nationalist effervesence can be kept in check and guided toward its legitimate objectives by the Western powers, our strategic interest in Morocco (coupled as they are with NATO objectives) and the resultant necessity for political stability would appear to dictate that this Government support French policy in Morocco regardless of the damage which such a course of action would have on our interests in the Arab world and particularly on our relations with the Moroccans. Alternatively, we could pursue a policy in Morocco which would conform to our basic belief in the right of dependent peoples to evolve toward self-government under the United Nations Charter and protect our interests and objectives in the Moslem World. In effect, this would mean that we support the Moroccans vis-à-vis the French. This could be calculated to maintain friendship and prestige for the United States in the Middle East and Africa, but only at the probable cost of jeopardizing our strategic interests in the area and our friendship with France. Neither of these policies (or courses of action) is desirable or in the best interests of the United States.

If one takes into account the immediate objectives of NATO and the objectives of this Government in Western Europe on the one hand, and our long term objectives and interests in the Moslem World on the other, the present situation in Morocco would appear to require that we continue to pursue a middle-of-the-road policy toward that area. Such a policy is calculated to protect the strategic interests of the United States in Morocco while at the same time protecting our interests and prestige in the Moslem World.

The Country Policy Statement for Morocco (1950)<sup>2</sup> contains the following statement regarding United States policy in Morocco:

"Our policy has been to encourage the French on all appropriate occasions to put forward a program of political, economic and social reforms which would lessen the resentment of the natives toward France and would assure their gradual evolution toward self-government. We believe, however, that the strength of France depends in no small measure on the peaceful and voluntary integration of Morocco into the French Union, and that France is the country best suited to have international responsibility for Morocco. We have therefore avoided putting pressure on France by giving aid and comfort to the natives directly, although we maintain open contact with them and consider their friendship and good will very important."

The substance of this policy has been brought to the attention of French officials on several occasions, but no positive steps have been taken by the French which would enable this Government to give greater support to French policies in Morocco. AF believes that our present policy towards Morocco should be continued and that these views should be made clear to the French Government. Based on past experience, we are not sanguine as to the degree of success which can be expected from such efforts. The only other practical alternative, under present day circumstances, is abandonment of our traditional policy towards dependent peoples, and full support of the French position in North Africa—a course of action which the French are striving hard to attain.

As AF sees the situation, the present threat to political stability in Morocco will continue to exist as long as present differences between the French and the Moroccans remain unreconciled. If these differences are not reconciled and should open revolt ensue, the United States would have to support France for the same reasons that we are supporting the United Kingdom in the Suez Canal dispute. Such a course of action would probably result in far-reaching and damaging repercussions to United States interest in Morocco and the Moslem World. Therefore, the immediate objective of United States policy in Morocco should be to effect a rapprochement between the French and the Moroccans which will ease present political tensions and create an atmosphere which will permit us to safely pursue a middle-of-the-road policy.

To this end we must redouble our efforts to get the French to adopt a program of political reforms in Morocco which will meet the legitimate demands of the Moroccans and which will permit this Government to conscientiously support French policy. This would require some frank discussions between United States and French officials at a high level. In our approach to the French we would state that we do not believe that political stability in Morocco is possible as long as the French continue to attempt to suppress the Nationalist movement. We believe that such stability can be achieved only if a rapprochement is effected between the French and the Moroccans which will meet the reasonable demands of the Nationalists and thus permit France to guide the Nationalist movement along constructive lines toward legitimate ends. We should emphasize our belief that the Moroccans are not prepared to assume the responsibilities which would result from immediate independence and our belief that France is the nation best suited to guide Morocco toward self-government and to exercise international responsibility for the area. We should state that if a program for Morocco, which is acceptable to the United States is adopted by the French, we will give appropriate support to the French program and will use all of our influence with the Moroccans to insure Moroccan cooperation in the implementation of such a program. To this end, we would be prepared to state the position of this Government clearly and forcefully to the Sultan and to nationalist leaders, making it clear to them that we believe such a program is in their best interests and in the best interests of the Western powers and that unless they cooperate with the French in such a program, the United States will have no alternative, because of our strategic interests and the importance of Western solidarity in the present fight against Communism, but to support France in the present situation in Morocco.

Following the Acheson-Schuman talks on Morocco on September 11, 1951,<sup>3</sup> the French endeavored to secure our agreement to an exchange of notes on North Africa, the acceptance of which would have involved several dangers in so far as the United States is concerned. After thorough consideration of this matter in the Department, including a meeting with the Secretary, it was decided that any exchange of notes with the French should take into consideration the following three "pitfalls":

1. The United States cannot be bound completely to support French policy in North Africa in regard to future unforeseen developments.

2. With reference to United States treaty rights in Morocco and the case pending before the International Court of Justice, the United States cannot undermine its position in any degree with respect thereto.

3. The United States cannot bind its hands in the United Nations and renounce its responsibilities and obligations as contained in various articles of the United Nations Charter, including Article 73.

The United States then submitted to the French a proposed note which avoided these "pitfalls". This, however, was not acceptable to M. Schuman and he stated that the matter would be taken up directly with Mr. Acheson.

If it is ultimately decided that, in the interests of our strategic requirements in North Africa, we will accede to the French demands for underwriting their policies in North Africa, then we must make every effort to salvage what we can of United States prestige in Morocco. To do this we should take advantage of all appropriate occasions to make clear to the Sultan and nationalist leaders why we are pursuing such a course of action and candidly explain the dilemma created for us in Morocco by the conflict between our strategic interests and our basic and traditional policy toward dependent peoples. We should exploit all contacts between the Sultan and United States officials to get this point across. The visits of high-ranking United States military officials to Morocco (such as visits by Eisenhower, General Norstadt as well as high-ranking civilian officials) should be utilized in presenting the United States position to the Sultan. At the same time our own officials in Morocco would explain our position to appropriate nationalist contacts. In such an approach we would emphasize to the Moroccans that the very objectives they wish to achieve are dependent entirely upon the successful conclusion of the present conflict between the West and the Soviet East.

Concurrently with these approaches we should implement lines of action calculated to convince the Moroccans of our interest in their welfare and our genuine friendship for them. The attached outline of a program for the American School at Tangier <sup>4</sup> illustrates one line of action which might be undertaken to achieve this objective.

Perillier is submitting final draft Tunisian reforms today for approval Council of Ministers. Concessions made by French in negotiations with Beys ministers said to include abandonment visa Secretary General on decrees, assuring chairmanship Council of Ministers to Prime Minister and adopting immediate measures to increase Tunisians in administration. Secretary General Vimont is reported to have opposed certain changes and has tendered resignation. We were told that he will go to Rio de Janerio as counselor of Embassy. If present reforms accepted both by French and Tunisians, La Tour du Pin particularly apprehensive that situation country will worsen in view of virtual abandonment budgetary control by French.

Moroccan question being discussed by Juin and FonOff. We were told that Juin consulting President Auriol and problem would undoubtedly be thrashed out in Council of Ministers. We reiterated hope that solution would be found to reconcile differences between France and Sultan. La Tour du Pin intimated that events in Morocco itself might decide issues. He stated that reports received by FonOff indicate large majority Moroccans backing Glaoui and quoted figures that among 300 Pashas, Caids and notables wielding power, some 200 sided with Glaoui. This he added might lead to schism and eventual replacement of Sultan by Moroccans themselves.<sup>3</sup>

In conclusion, La Tour du Pin rather gloomily predicted that North Africa would be chronic headache for many months to come and stated that he would not be its doctor for he had asked for transfer and was being given another post in FonOff.

772.00/2-1351: Despatch

The Consul General at Tunis (Jernegan) to the Department of State <sup>1</sup>

CONFIDENTIAL

Tunis, February 13, 1951.

No. 286

Subject: At Last, the Reforms

On February 8, the Bey of Tunis affixed his seal to the new reforms agreed upon by the Resident General and the Tunisian Cabinet of Ministers, thus ending a six month period of rumors concerning the resignation of the entire cabinet of ministers, threats by the Neo Destour Party to withdraw from the Government, a "political pause" by the Resident General, a "counter pause" by the Ministers, protests by the Rassemblement Français, and accusations of inactivity by both French and Tunisian authorities. A translation of the official communiqué announcing the approval by the Bey of the reforms is forwarded as enclosure 1 to this despatch.<sup>2</sup>

Reforms

The official texts of the reforms appeared as decrees in the Journal Official Tunisian for February 9.3 The complete French texts of these decrees as well as their English translations will be forwarded in a separate despatch.

The reforms may be summarized as follows:

(1) Cabinet of the Sovereign: A Cabinet of the Sovereign is instituted to examine everything relating to the Palace and to maintain close liaison with the Prime Minister in matters concerning protocol and the ceremony of the court. The Cabinet is composed of a Director and his assistants, as well as an interpreter, a clerk, and a stenographer.

(2) Council of Ministers: The Council of Ministers "defines the orientation and directs the general action of the Government" and is the meeting ground for ministers, directors, and the commissioner (of Reconstruction and Housing). The Council of Ministers is presided over by the Prime Minister and has as its members the Secretary General, the Assistant Secretary General, the Minister of Justice, the Minister of State, the Minister of Social Affairs, the Minister of Commerce and Industry, the Minister of Public Health, the Minister of Agriculture, the Director of Finance, the Director of Public Works, the Director of Education, the Director of the Post Office, and the Commissioner of Reconstruction. The decree establishing the Council of Cabinet is abrogated.

(3) Creation of High Committee for Critical Situations: Under exceptional circumstances the Resident General and the Tunisian Government shall convene in a High Committee to determine measures justified by the critical situation. The High Committee shall be convoked by the Resident General, who will preside at meetings.

(4) Budgetary Matters: Disagreements relating to the budget are submitted to a Superior Budgetary Committee presided over by the Resident General and having as its other members the Prime Minister, the President of each of the two Sections of the Grand Council, and the President and Recorder of the Commission of Finance of each of the two Sections. A simple majority carries a motion, with the Resident General having the deciding vote in the event of a deadlock.

(5) General Administration of Tunisia: The general administration is controlled, under the authority of the Prime Minister, by: (a) a central Administration (having substantially the same membership as the Council of Ministers but without the Secretary General and the Assistant Secretary General), and (b) a corps of caids to whom the powers of the sovereign have been delegated.

(6) Functions of Prime Minister: The Prime Minister prepares acts and decrees for the seal of the Bey, presides over the Council of Ministers, and coordinates the actions of the ministers, the directors, and the commissioner. The Prime Minister also has responsibility for matters concerning: Court protocol and the interests of the Beylical family, submission of decrees for the Bey's seal, the direction and control of the activities of the Bey's agents (caids, kahias, khalifats, and sheikhs), preservation of the state archives.

(7) Functions of Secretary General: The Secretary General is named by the Bey on the presentation of the Resident General. He assures, with the Prime Minister, the centralization of civil and administrative matters including the decrees and arretes to be sealed, general inspection of administrative services, control of personnel and public expenses of the civil administrations, the administration of the Tunisian Statistical Service, and the elaboration and execution of the economic plan after it has received the approval of the Council of Ministers.

(8) Ministries, Directorates, and the Commission: The ministers, directors, and the commissioner who are members of the Council of Ministers are named by decree. Each minister, director, or commissioner names, by arrete, the personnel recruited by his administration and controls the expenses of his services according to provisions laid down in regulations concerning public accounting.

(9) General Conditions: Unless special legislative provisions are made, every member of the Council of Ministers has the authority to issue arretes within the scope of his functions. These arretes are submitted through the Secretary General to the Resident General who approves them or, if necessary, returns them, with his observations, for further drafting. The arretes are then published in the Journal Officiel Tunisien and thus become law.

(10) Participation in Government ("Fonction Publique"): Government positions are divided into four categories based on the following salary indices:

Category A:	index	225-800
Category B:	index	185-360
Category C:	index	130 - 250
Category D:	index	100 - 195

When new employees are recruited, 50% of the positions in Categories A and B will be filled by Tunisians and 50% by Frenchmen; two-thirds of the positions in Category C will be filled by Tunisians and one-third by Frenchmen; three quarters of the positions in Category D will be filled by Tunisians and one quarter by Frenchmen. Everyone filling positions in Categories C and D must pass an examination in the Arabic language or must be able to hold a conversation in Arabic.

Speech of Resident General

On his return to Tunis from Paris, the Resident General spoke over the radio on the night of February 9.

The signing of the new agreements, the Resident General stated, gave a new impetus to Franco-Tunisian cooperation. The reforms represent the fulfillment of a promise. If they satisfy the demands of the Tunisians, he continued, they at the same time guarantee French interests. Who, the Resident General asked, can doubt that Tunisia has need of the presence of France? The spirit of mutual comprehension which marked the negotiations must continue if the reforms are to be successfully applied. The Tunisians, he said, must demonstrate increasingly greater aptitude commensurate with their greater responsibilities in governing themselves. He called for continued peace and order. "To work!" he concluded, "To work in mutual understanding!"

A translation of the complete text of the Resident General's speech is forwarded as enclosure 2 to this despatch.<sup>4</sup>

Nationalist Press Reaction

The reaction of the nationalist press, with the exception of Irada and Independance of the Old Destour, has been favorable although guardedly optimistic.

An Nahda for February 9 receives the news of the reforms enthusiastically, thanking God that the obstructionists of the Rassemblement were over-ruled. Now let the French members of the Grand Council resign, An Nahda suggests, thus making the application of future reforms more easy. The paper congratulates the Bey, the Resident General, and the Prime Minister for their part in the negotiations which led to the reforms.

Az Zohra draws a comparison between the British and French attitudes toward their colonies. England gave India its complete independence without fanfare, while France accords Tunisia minor reforms amid much shouting and protests from the Rassemblement opposition.

The newly-founded As-Sabah, said to be the mouthpiece of Salah Ben Youssef, commented that it was a long period of labor, the reforms, though imperfect, were finally born, and the mother (Tunisian Cabinet) miraculously survived the ordeal.

The Neo Destour organ Mission admits that although the reforms are insufficient, they are a step in the right direction. Mission reserves its judgment until the reforms are applied and until the Government indicates its willingness to proceed with further reforms which will lead to internal autonomy. Mission deplores the fact that in spite of the reforms the Government has not yet recognized the Neo Destour Party nor has it lifted the state of siege in Tunisia.

Other Nationalist Reaction

Habib Bourguiba, now attending the Moslem Congress in Karachi, is reported by the press to have stated that the reforms constitute a very timid but significant step. The Neo Destour, he explained, accepts these reforms as a promise of other reforms to come. The second stage must consist in replacing the French directors by Tunisian ministers. A Tunisian Ministry of the Interior must be established, Bourguiba continued, to control the services of the police and security. Finally, he stated, a strictly Tunisian National Assembly must be constituted whose members are to be elected by universal suffrage, the French interest to be represented by the Resident General. In conclusion he hoped that the second stage of reforms would be reached before the Bey's trip to Paris next spring so the visit could take place in a spirit of mutual comprehension and understanding.

Nouri Boudali, Assistant Secretary General of the UGTT, expressed guarded optimism on the reforms (reference Tunis confidential despatch No. 285 of February 13, 1951 5). The reforms were inadequate, he stated, but they did represent progress and therefore were accepted by the Neo Destour. Had the Neo Destour refused the reforms, Boudali stated, the Cabinet would have resigned and the political situation would have deteriorated rapidly. Such an eventuality seemed a probability ten days ago, he said, but fortunately the crisis has now passed.

Mourad Cherif, close to nationalist circles, stated that the reaction of the nationalists to the reforms was one of general disappointment. He asserted that the reforms changed little: although the Prime Minister would preside over the Council of Ministers, matters relating to the budget had been removed from the Council's jurisdiction (this is not strictly true); the participation of Tunisians in the Government according to the specifications laid down under Fonction Publique would not be implemented for twenty years unless steps were taken to oust French officials now in the Government.

Old Destour Reaction

The weekly French-language Old Destour organ Independance, commenting on the reforms, stated that Colonna could cry "Fire!" till he was blue in the face, Karila could go to the Wailing Wall, and the bells could ring out in Paris, Cairo, and Tunis—but actually the reforms changed nothing. The results of the difficult and laborious negotiations, Independance concludes, are nothing but air: the mountain (which the Neo Destour had previously referred to as bringing forth a mouse) was not even pregnant!

French Rassemblement Reaction

The delegation of the French Section of the Grand Council, headed by Marcel Casabianca, returned from Paris on February 11, disillusioned and irritated that it had not been informed of the exact status of the reforms at the time they were being approved by the Council of Ministers in Paris. Before leaving Paris Casabianca stated: "The French colony of the Regency is wounded but not defeated. It remains on the alert and in the battle."

Jean Casanova of the Rassemblement Français said that the reforms marked the passing of French control in Tunisia, that they were humiliating for the French, and that they were contrary to the letter and spirit of the treaties. "For the French of this Country", he remarked, "the reforms constitute an unhappy ending of a policy of abandonment and renunciation."

The reaction of Secretary General Jacques Vimont to the reforms was submission of his resignation. Unsubstantiated reports indicate that he will shortly be transferred to the French Embassy at Rio de Janeiro, to be replaced by a "high functionary" from Paris.

Communist Reaction

Communist reaction to the reforms, which are referred to as a "patching up" of the Protectorate regime, has been reported in Tunis restricted despatch 282 of February 12.6

Conclusions

There has been a general feeling of relief and an easing in the political atmosphere following the acceptance of the reforms. French and Tunisian Government officials, who were a few days ago regarding each other suspiciously, are temporarily enjoying a period of mutual admiration. Mr. Schuman himself paid tribute to the "comprehension" of the Tunisian ministers. Three days after the seal had been affixed to the reforms the Bey bestowed his highest decoration, the Ahed el Amane, on the Resident General. Rumblings of discontent at the inadequacy of the reforms are in the background but for the moment are drowned out by the sighs of relief that a crisis has been safely averted.

The position of the Tunisian Cabinet is strengthened and rumors concerning its resignation should now subside.

Perhaps the one man who deserves more credit than any other person in putting over the reforms is the Resident General himself. Apparently deserted by the Secretary General when he most needed his support, attacked continously by the Rassemblement Français, and not being able to rely on his own cabinet for wise counsel, Mr. Perillier carried through on his own initiative. But after the difficult preliminary bickerings in Tunis, Perillier received help where he most needed it, the support of the French Foreign Minister in Paris.

Subject: A New Political Crisis Builds Up

The past week has produced in Tunisia the essential elements of a major political crisis similar to that which hit Morocco recently. Both sides have hardened their attitude and a test of strength between the Bey (with the Neo-Destour pushing him on) and the Resident General has already begun. This situation has developed out of:

1. The insistence of the Tunisian cabinet, controlled by the Neo-Destour, upon ever greater reforms and its utilization of whatever tactical weapons come to hand;

2. The success of the Neo-Destour in persuading the Bey to support its program;

3. The firm determination of the Resident General not to go beyond the very limited reforms he has repeatedly proclaimed as his program.

The state of affairs at this moment is that the Resident General has served notice on the Bey that he must dismiss his present Prime Minister and two other Ministers if he expects to make any more progress toward internal autonomy, and the Bey has protested to the President of France against the delivery of this ultimatum.

The Resident General's objective is to get rid of Salah Ben Youssef, Minister of Justice and Secretary General of the Neo-Destour, whom he charges with sabotaging the French program of orderly evolution and who undoubtedly dominates the Prime Minister and other members of the Cabinet.

The Bey's objective, presumably, is to maintain his support in Nationalist circles and, perhaps, provoke a change of Resident General.

Mr. Perillier told me on May 19 that he wants very much to continue the reform program, as he has laid it down, but that he cannot accept the premature demands of the Cabinet for still greater powers and the institution of a national representative legislative assembly. He has now become convinced that Ben Youssef will not, or cannot, negotiate in good faith on the only basis acceptable to France. Furthermore, he charges the cabinet with neglecting its ordinary administrative duties. Consequently, he wants a change in cabinet leadership. He is sure he can find good men who will work with him. However, he does not propose to force a change. If the Bey remains obdurate, he will merely mark time and wait for the Bey or the Neo-Destour to give up. Whether the Nationalists will allow him to mark time is another question; I think it likely that they will stir up so much fuss that he will be driven to some action to get rid of the Cabinet.

It appears that the Bey's message of May 15 (mytel 117¹) was the last straw which decided Perillier to take his stand. (An English translation of the message from French is enclosed, together with a single copy of the original Arabic.²) As reported by telegram, this message was drawn up without consultation with the Resident General, who did not even know the Bey intended to issue a statement. However, this was only the latest of a series of grievances, all of which were mentioned in Perillier's bill of complaints delivered to the Bey on May 19.³ They included the general strike of March 10, the boycott by the Tunisian Ministers of the Grand Council sessions and the generally uncooperative attitude of the Cabinet's leading triumvirate: Prime Minister Chenik, Ben Youssef and Minister of Social Affairs Badra.

On the other side of the picture, the Neo-Destour, and all other nationalist groups as well, continue to accuse the French of dragging their feet. While some of the Ministers, even Ben Youssef himself, might be willing to go slowly, they seem to be driven ahead by the pressure of their followers. Accordingly, they have adopted "democratic representation" as the new keynote and are hammering it for all it is worth. (See my despatches No. 430 of May 15 and No. 441 of May 22.4) This is a line having great popular appeal and one which would also give them an excellent propaganda basis for appeals to other countries and the United Nations if matters come to that.

In addition to the question of a cabinet change, a showdown may arise out of the new budget. After being approved in general by the two sections of the Grand Council (though with reservations by the Telegram 119, May 19, from Tunis, reported that French Resident General Perillier intended to inform the Bey that he was free to retain the present Cabinet but that the French would conduct no further negotiations with it. Perillier presumably asked that Chenik, Ben Youssef, and Badra be eliminated from the Cabinet. (772.00/5–1951)

Tunisian Section) it was supposed to be considered by the "Mixed Delegation" to reconcile various minor differences between the versions approved by the two sections. This is a standard procedure corresponding to the system of conference committees in our own Congress. However, the Tunisian members took the position that they would not participate in the work of the Delegation unless they were assured of satisfaction regarding the two conditions their section had attached to the budget. (See my despatch No. 429 of May 15.5) Communications to and from the Residency failed to produce such assurances. The French members of the Delegation therefore met alone and gave their blessing to the document, whereupon it was referred to the Higher Budget Committee established by the reform decrees of February 8. This Committee met May 19 (without its Tunisian members) and is understood to have approved a budget based on that presented but with minor changes.

The next step is to get the approval of the French Ministry of Finance in Paris, after which the budget is supposed to be presented to the Bey, by the Prime Minister, for his seal.

What will happen when it comes back from Paris is the big question. The Nationalists say publicly that the Prime Minister will refuse to present it for the Bey's seal and that His Highness will refuse his approval in any case. If this occurs, drastic French action of some sort seems possible. The Resident General has told me that he cannot and will not permit the country to be without a budget; the administration must be carried on. One of his chief subordinates, Director General of Political and Administrative Service Jacquet, admitted to me that, theoretically, there is no way to promulgate a budget without the Bey's approval, but he added: "In practice, there is the French Army."6

This whole budgetary dispute is public knowledge, and the Resident General's demand for a new cabinet is rapidly becoming so. At least two newspapers have already reported it as more than a rumor. Furthermore, Perillier publicly reiterated his opposition to new reforms at present in a speech before a conference of Reserve Officers at Tunis on May 20, when he said:

"Progress can be made only with order and balance; those who want to skip the (intermediate) stages and who always try to go beyond the agreements reached render very poor service to the country."

&lt;sup>6</sup> The Bey approved the Tunisian budget on June 1. Despatch 463, June 12, from Tunis, observed that with the advent of the religious holiday of Ramadan and the approval of the budget "a relative calm seems to have descended on the Tunisian scene." The despatch also observed that the approval of the budget removed one of the most serious immediate difficulties in Franco-Tunisian relationships the serious relatio tions and apparently greatly relieved French officials who "will not now be faced with the ungrateful task of using force to impose a budget." (772.00/6-1251)

He added that French policy was to build democracy from the bottom up, beginning with municipal governments and using them as training schools for eventual democratic representation on the national scale.

This has, of course, been taken as a reply to the Bey's message of May 15.

It is obvious that the Bey and the Neo-Destour cannot back down at this stage without great loss of prestige and popular following. It is also obvious that the Resident General cannot back down if he is to stay in Tunisia.

I think it probable that matters will drag along, with mutual recriminations but without a real showdown, until after the French elections of June 17 and the formation of a new French Government. What happens then will depend on the amount of support the new government is willing to give Perillier. (He may even find himself out of a job.) If the French stand firm, my guess is that the Bey will find a way to save face, after a suitable lapse of time, and that a new cabinet will be formed and the budget approved, perhaps with some slight French concessions with respect to form. There is, however, the other possibility that the Nationalists will get the Arab and South Asian states to make a world issue of the whole dispute. I need not point out to the Department the difficulties this would cause the United States.

Memorandum of Conversation, by Earle J. Richey of the Office of African Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL

[Washington,] September 14, 1951.

Subject: Political Situation in Tunisia

Participants: Mr. Habib Bourguiba, President of Tunisian Neo

Destour Party

AF-Mr. Elmer H. Bourgerie

WE-Mr. J. M. Godley

AF-Mr. E. J. Richey

Mr. Bourguiba opened the conversation by referring to his recent travels throughout the Arab world and mentioned that he had talked to Ambassador Henderson in India and to Ambassador Cochran in Indonesia.¹ He stated that he had talked to Ambassador Henderson regarding the Tunisian situation and that the Ambassador had suggested that when he came to the United States he present the position of the Tunisian Nationalists to the Department. In this connection Mr. Bourguiba mentioned a letter which he had written to Mr. McGhee requesting a meeting with him while he was in the Near East in the Spring of this year.<sup>2</sup>

Mr. Bourguiba stated that there had always been a conflict between the Tunisian Nationalists and the French in Tunisia but that this conflict had been largely resolved in August of 1950 when M. Schuman had stated publicly that Tunisia must be developed toward selfgovernment and that direct French control in Tunisia must be tapered off. On the basis of the program proposed by Schuman through Resident General Perillier the Neo Destour had elected to collaborate with the French and was participating in the present Tunisian Government which, operating as M. Schuman had envisaged it, marked the end of direct French rule in Tunisia. However, he said, the Tunisian Resident General was being prevented from carrying out the program of reforms which had been agreed to by the Neo Destour, and which formed the basis for French-Neo Destour collaboration. Opposition to this reform program, Mr. Bourguiba said, came from French Colons in Tunisia and from irresponsible elements in France, as well as from selfish French office holders in the Protectorate. He of the reform program in Tunisia which was not essentially dissimilar to the presentation recorded in his memorandum of conversation. Henderson spoke to Bourguiba as follows:

"I told Mr. Bourghiba that I had received him only in a personal capacity; that as a representative of the American Government I could not receive him or his associates; that I was not qualified to discuss matters pertaining to relations between the United States and countries other than India; but that I would, nevertheless, pass along what he had to say to me to my friends in Washington.

"I added that although I had no authorization to discuss American policies with him, I could, nevertheless, tell him personally what I understood to be the general attitude of the United States towards colonialism. I described our general attitude and then told him that in my opinion resort to violence by Tunisian Nationalists at this stage would not be likely to serve any good purpose but might well bring great harm to the people of Tunisia and might impede the development of Tunisia into a prosperous, healthy, self-respecting state. Only the Communists and those forces which thrive in chaos would benefit by civil war in Tunisia."

Henderson ended his memorandum of conversation as follows:

"I asked Mr. Bourghiba if he was acquainted with Mr. Jernegan, our Consul General in Tunis, whom I knew personally as an exceptionally able diplomat. Mr. Bourghiba said that it had been his policy to hold somewhat aloof from the American Consulate General in Tunis since he was afraid that visits or gestures of friendship on his part might prove embarrassing to the consular representatives of the United States in Tunisia." (772.00/3-1551) gestures of friendship on his part might prove embarrassing to the consular representatives of the United States in Tunisia." (772.00/3–1551) <sup>2</sup> In an undated letter addressed to McGhee from Karachi, received in the Department of State in early April 1951, Bourguiba requested a meeting with McGhee in Colombo or Washington in order to discuss the situation in Tunisia. McGhee, who had been in Ceylon in late February and early March 1951 in connection with a meeting of South Asian Chiefs of Mission, never met with Bourguiba, and in a letter of reply of April 13 McGhee did not make any effort to invite Bourguiba to Washington for a meeting. (772.00/4–551) said that these elements were sabotaging Schuman's plan for Tunisia, and he pointed out that Resident General Perillier had admitted to a correspondent of the London Times that the reason for the present stalemate in the Tunisian reform program was opposition from the Colons and French office holders in Tunisia. He stated that the present impasse would lead to real trouble in Tunisia unless corrected. He mentioned the massacres of 1938 and stated that with conditions growing steadily worse at the present time, violence might again be the result if the situation were not remedied. He referred to the criticism which had been directed at the Neo Destour party by the Old Destour and the Communists as a result of the party's present policy of collaboration with the French and the resulting difficult position the Neo Destour was placed in when the French failed to live up to the agreement which formed the basis for such collaboration. He stressed the fact that Schuman's plan was being blocked, that conditions in Tunisia were growing steadily worse and that trouble was brewing. He stated that during his recent tours he had been explaining this situation trying to bring pressure on the French to continue Schuman's program in order to avoid trouble and massacres and that if trouble did come the responsibility would rest with the French.

Mr. Bourguiba stated that the Neo Destour was truly democratic. He stressed the democratic nature of the Nationalist movement in Tunisia and pointed to the withdrawal of the UGTT from the WFTU and its recent affiliation with the ICFTU. He mentioned that the Secretary General of the UGTT was an officer in the ICFTU thus substantiating that the labor movement in Tunisia was democratic in the same way that the ICFTU is democratic. He mentioned that Tunisia had no Jewish problem and stressed that Nationalism in Tunisia was basically a national movement supported by all the Tunisians. He referred to the presence of United States troops in Tunisia during World War II at which time they were fighting for libertythe same thing for which Tunisians were fighting today. The United States, he said, owed the Tunisians their liberty. He then stressed that Tunisians were not against France, but only against those elements within France which were blocking Schuman's program for Tunisia. He stated that under the present French yoke, Tunisians could not make their contribution to the Western world during the present fight against the Soviet East. He recognized the interests which the U.S. and France had in common in the present world struggle and stressed that he did not ask the United States to support Tunisia as against France; that the only thing he asked was that we support Schuman's policy for Tunisia. He emphasized that we must find the means to support this policy in order to avoid trouble in Tunisia.

Mr. Bourgerie replied by stating that the Department was grateful to have this opportunity of hearing Mr. Bourguiba's views. He referred to Mr. McGhee's visit to Tunisia in the fall of 1950 3 and stated that at that time both he and Mr. McGhee had talked at length with Resident General Perillier about the reform program and about political conditions in Tunisia. He also referred to the meeting which Mr. McGhee had with Bey of Tunis. He said that the United States was interested in North African problems and was fairly familiar with recent developments in Tunisia. This Government, he said, hoped that the French and the Tunisians could work their problems out in a spirit of cooperation and moderation; that such a spirit was necessary and most essential at the present time.

Mr. Bourguiba replied by stating that no policy could be more moderate than the one presently being pursued by the Neo Destour. He repeated that this policy was so moderate that the Neo Destour was being severely criticised by the Old Destour for collaborating with the French and that to date such moderation had only proved that it did not bring results. It had only resulted in both the Neo Destour and M. Schuman being attacked by their own people for pursuing such a policy. He repeated that no policy could be more moderate than the one now being pursued, and that since August 1950, no progress had been made in the reform program, which was a long time.

Mr. Godley stated that he knew that Mr. Bourguiba appreciated the number of problems facing Mr. Schuman both nationally and internationally and the number of other axes Mr. Schuman had to grind in addition to the problems in Tunisia. He stated that while the period from August 1950 to date seemed like a long time, it was infinitely short in relation to the history of the development of a nation. He stated that the very fact that Mr. Schuman was able to present and have approved by his Cabinet the program which he proposed for Tunisia illustrated the evolution in French political thinking. The fact that Mr. Schuman was still in office was further evidence of evolution in French political thought. Mr. Godley emphasized that the present situation required patience on both sides and an understanding of the problems and difficulties facing Mr. Schuman.

Mr. Bourguiba replied by stating that there was a distinction between what France said and what France practiced. He referred again to the selfish actions of the Colons in Tunisia in blocking the reform program and reiterated that the present problem in Tunisia could only be solved by implementation of the reform program. He pointed out that Libya and the Gold Coast were approaching self-government while Tunisia was still under direct administration by the French. He observed that Tunisians could not understand such a situation. The Tunisians, Mr. Bourguiba said, were moderate and anxious to cooperate but also determined to progress from their present status.

Mr. Bourgerie closed the conversation by informing Mr. Bourguiba that he would study the documents left with him by Mr. Bourguiba.<sup>4</sup> He thanked Mr. Bourguiba again for giving the Department the opportunity to hear his views and expressed the hope that his visit in the United States would be a most pleasant one.<sup>5</sup> He urged Mr. Bourguiba to use moderation in his statements to the public while in the United States, since such a course would facilitate the entry into the U.S. of other North Africans who might wish to visit this country.

Before departing Mr. Bourguiba asked if it would be possible for him to see Mr. McGhee after he (Bourguiba) returned from San Francisco.<sup>6</sup> Mr. Bourgerie explained how busy Mr. McGhee is and that it was not possible to say whether Mr. McGhee would be in Washington at that time.

unfriendly act. I remonstrated pointing out that Mr. Bourghiba is a prominent member of the Neo-Destour party which is presently participating in the Tunisian Government and that he traveled to the US on a passport issued by the French authorities. I also called their attention to the fact that the labor organization in Tunisia affiliated with the Neo-Destour had broken with the WFTU, that a prominent member of the Neo-Destour occupies a position of importance in the anti-Communist ICFTU, and that Bourghiba himself had attended the Milan conference of this organization.

Mr. Daridan replied that notwithstanding these facts the Neo-Destour is known in Tunisia and North Africa to be a Nationalist party and as such is opposed to the continuation of the French position in Tunisia. He added that even were Bourghiba's conversations in the Department politically innocuous, Bourghiba or his Nationalist colleagues in Tunisia and North Africa generally would interpret his reception by an important officer as U.S. support for a movement opposed to the French in an area that France considers vital to its own security.

Mr. Daridan also said that the timing of the events was so unfortunate that it need not be commented upon.

He then inquired whether the Department was taking any action to forestall a repetition of such occurences. I said that as far as I knew no instructions as yet had been given to the Voice of America to clear with us future appearances of North African Nationalists. Mr. Daridan then said that Mr. Schuman had spoken to the Secretary on the matter and the Secretary had said that such instructions would be given to New York.<sup>2</sup> I remarked that I was not aware of the conversation between Mr. Schuman and the Secretary.

&quot;New York Times art of Sept 14 by intermingling part of statement made by Bourghiba over VOA [on September 12] with statements made to NY Times reporter gives mistaken impression Bourghiba's remarks on VOA constituted plea for Freedom Moslem nations. (511.724/9-1951) Telegram Actel 4, September 19, from Ottawa, reported that Secretary Acheson had discussed the Bourguiba VOA broadcast with Foreign Minister Schuman, and he had "apologized for what he understood happened, expressed hope it would not happen again, but did not make any reference or commitment re clearance procedure of any kind." (611.72/9-1951) Telegram 1853, September 25, from Paris, transmitted the text of a personal letter to Secretary Acheson in which Foreign Minister Schuman drew attention to the serious danger he saw in any further contacts of Department of State officials with Bourguiba. Telegram 12, September 28, to Tunis, transmitted the following information about the VOA incident and its aftermath:

&quot;Secy informed Schuman Bourghiba will not be recd by competent officers Dept upon his return from San Francisco and that Bourghiba will not be afforded facilities VOA. Bourghiba has previously been reed in Dept only by Bourgerie and by Kopper Deputy Director NE. Bourghiba did not address AFL Convention San Francisco." (511.723/9–2851)

Seventh Session of the North Atlantic Council, September 15-20.

With regard to Mr. Bourghiba's discussions in the Department, I told Mr. Daridan that in his conversations Mr. Bourghiba had strongly supported Mr. Schuman's plans for the evolution of Tunisia and that the Neo-Destour only feared that the plans might be modified. Mr. Daridan replied that political evolution in North Africa cannot be achieved overnight and certainly the recent manifestations of Near and Middle Eastern nationalism have not facilitated the task of those in Paris who are advocating a continuation of evolutionary developments in Tunisia.

611.72/9-1851: Despatch

The Consul General at Tunis (Jernegan) to the Department of State

SECRET

Tunis, September 18, 1951.

No. 107

Subject: Comments on Policy Statement on Tunisia

I regret that, through an oversight, this office has not previously commented on the revised policy statement on Tunisia dated October 5, 1950. The following observations may be of some use to the Department in its consideration of the next revision.

In general, I concur fully in the statement as it stands. It is succinct yet covers all the essential elements. The one serious weakness, which probably cannot be corrected at the present time, is that it does not set forth any means of persuading the French Government to take the action we consider necessary if the Tunisian situation is to be stabilized. My specific comments are:

Page 1, Paragraph 2: I think it has become unrealistic to set as an objective the incorporation of Tunisia into the French Union as an associated state. Those terms have very definite meanings to the French and Tunisians, and the Tunisian nationalists seem bitterly opposed to the specific relationship which they imply. However, the dominant nationalist group, the Neo-Destour, does appear willing to accept a special (as yet only vaguely defined) relationship with France provided it is not accompanied by the labels "French Union" or "associated state". Perhaps the statement could read as follows: "We believe that our objectives can be most satisfactorily achieved by agreement between the French and the Tunisian nationalists on a long-term modus vivendi which will assure the evolution of Tunisia toward self-government as an autonomous state managing its internal affairs but retaining a special relationship with France in the fields of foreign relations and defense and continuing to receive French assistance in economic and technical fields."

Page 2, Paragraph 4: It seems highly improbable to me that the French would consider negotiating a treaty of friendship, commerce and navigation with the United States on behalf of Tunisia unless and until a similar treaty had been concluded between the United States and France. To do so would, in the French mind, be conceding to Tunisia too independent a personality. I agree, however, that efforts should be made to include Tunisia in the treaty with France or, failing that, to persuade the French to make a separate treaty after their own has been signed.

Page 3, Paragraph 2: Since the current policy statement was drafted, the French authorities have invoked the state of seige on a number of occasions to restrain what they considered improper nationalist activities. While it is true that French policy is more lenient than it was during and immediately after World War II, the change has not been sufficient to allay nationalist resentment.

Page 3, Paragraph 3: Except for municipal reforms, which are still under study, all the specific changes mentioned in this paragraph have been put into effect. In addition, the veto power of the Secretary General has been abolished, although in practice it has simply been transferred to the Resident General. Other minor changes, of which the Department is aware, have also been made. These reforms, however, have had little effect in satisfying the nationalists, who claim with much reason that they are mostly window-dressing and do not even go so far as the French originally proposed.

Page 3, Paragraph 4: The current Tunisian communist line calls for a united front not only for the "triumph of liberty and peace" but also for the achievement of "true national independence". The local communist party is hammering hard at the latter theme, with the double objective of causing trouble for the French Government and embarrassing the moderate nationalists who are willing to negotiate for something less than complete independence.

Page 4, Paragraph 1: I do not think it can be said that during the past year the French have "indicated increasing concern" over communist activities in Tunisia. Rather to the contrary, the Resident General and his subordinates have repeatedly asserted to me that the communist threat is negligible. This is not to say that the French ignore the communists; I am sure they maintain surveillance, but they do not appear worried and they are obviously much more interested in nationalist activities.

Page 4, Pargraph 5: The possibility of a United Nations debate on the Tunisian question remains ever with us, though it seems no more imminent today than in past years. Just why the nationalists have not made a more determined drive to bring their case before this international forum is a mystery to me. It is true that Habib Bourguiba has been touring the world for months to arouse sympathy for Tunisia, with an eventual UN debate in mind, but there are no indications of plans for concrete action. Nationalist policy seems always to be one of waiting for something to turn up, hoping that French concessions will be forthcoming or that some deus ex machina will intervene. On the other hand, it may be that the Tunisians have simply been unable to persuade any UN member to take the plunge of raising the question formally.

Page 4, Paragraph 6: The French have not yet granted any substantial degree of greater responsibility to the Tunisians. The reforms so far enacted, since August, 1950, do not really change the power of the French authorities to control every aspect of the Tunisian administration; at the same time, they do provide a possibility of considerably more operating leeway for the Tunisian ministers, provided the French follow a hands-off policy. The French claim they have prodded the Tunisians to assume greater operating responsibilities and that the latter have been uninterested, unwilling or incapable, in most instances. As exceptions, they cite two or three ministers who have shown energy and initiative but who are not nationalist leaders. On the opposite side, the nationalists assert that they are controlled and blocked at every turn by the French, given no freedom of action, and that nothing can be accomplished under such circumstances.

My present feeling is that the French have been too cautious and have not gone nearly far enough in their concessions to accomplish their avowed purpose of establishing a firm basis for friendly Franco-Tunisian cooperation. Even if we admit, as I suspect we must, that the Tunisians would not run the country as efficiently as the French, there remains the overriding political consideration that nationalism is a powerful force in the world and paternalism is largely outmoded. It is not good enough to repeat the eternal French argument that Egypt was better-off under British control, that Syria has gone to pieces since France was forced out, that the Philippines are a mess since American rule ceased, that independent India has become a liability rather than an asset to the free world. Those countries did not become independent simply because the colonial power in each case decided they had reached a state of perfection and could manage their own affairs better than anyone could do it for them. They were emancipated because it was politically and economically unfeasible to continue their dependent status. The same situation is eventually going to confront France in Tunisia unless she can first achieve a new relationship based on free Tunisian consent. Her present rate of progress is too slow, her tactics too dilatory and too exasperating to the nationalists, to accomplish this.

Page 5, Paragraphs 1 and 2: It is certainly true that if the question of French rule in North Africa is raised in the UN, the United States will be faced with a serious question of policy determination. If we support France, we shall incur the bitter resentment and distrust of the Moslem world and, probably, of all formerly dependent nations. It would be, it seems to me, practically impossible to argue convincingly that France is really pursuing the policy best suited to the interests of the Tunisian people and that Tunisia should remain indefinitely in dependent status. Whatever the hard merits of that argument, it would sound very weak in opposition to the cries of "selfdetermination", "freedom for all peoples", "down with imperialism", which would undoubtedly be raised on every side, especially since there are a number of independent peoples no better fitted to run themselves than are the Tunisians. Furthermore, France's record in Tunisia is weak with regard to civil and political liberties, democratic processes, etc. It is difficult to defend, before an emotional public assembly, a regime which has on occasion arbitrarily suspended opposition newspapers, prosecutes political agitators before military courts applying martial law in time of peace, and refuses to permit the establishment of elective legislative bodies.

On the other hand, the difficulties of opposing France in the UN are obvious, and the results of a French defeat before the assembled representatives of the world could not but be harmful to over-all American interests. If, to take the extreme case, Tunisia should become independent overnight, we might find that a highly vulnerable and highly strategic piece of territory had slipped outside the orbit of western defense and become a potential bridgehead for the Soviet bloc. Or, as a lesser evil, the United States might be forced to assume yet another burden in supporting the Tunisian economy and endeavoring to replace French political guidance. Even if the outcome of the debate merely amounted to a moral condemnation of France, it would weaken the position of the whole western group of nations.

A French policy of really progressive political reform in Tunisia seems to me to be the only means of avoiding the dilemma. If it did not prevent the case from being raised in the UN, it would at least give France and her friends, including the United States, a plausible basis for arguing that things were going very well and there was no need to interfere. Our policy, of course, has been and is to encourage the French in this direction. Unfortunately, our representations seem to have had little effect. So far as I can judge from this restricted viewpoint, they are likely to continue without effect unless something occurs which gives the United States a clear, direct reason for intervening in what the French continue to regard as strictly an internal affair. That something might be the immediate threat of a UN debate. If we were about to be called upon by France to back her up in the General Assembly, we would have good grounds for insisting that she must do something concrete to provide us with ammunition.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Director of the Office of African Affairs (Bourgerie)

SECRET

[Washington,] September 25, 1951.

Subject: French Protest regarding Bourghiba

Participants: Mr. Jean Daridan, Minister Counselor of the French Embassy.

Mr. Gabriel Van Laethem, Second Secretary of the French Embassy.

Mr. McGhee, NEA. Mr. Bourgerie, AF.

Mr. McGhee opened the conversation by stating that he had heard the French Government was quite exercised over rumors to the effect that he was going to receive Mr. Bourghiba on his return to Washington from San Francisco.

Mr. Daridan stated that the Embassy had received instructions from the Foreign Office in Paris to call on Mr. McGhee and ascertain whether there was any truth to the rumors that he was going to see Mr. Bourghiba and to urge him not to see him on his return to Washington. He pointed out that it was not so much what was said by

Mr. Bourghiba or what was said by Department officials that mattered but the mere fact that officials of the United States Government did grant him a hearing provided the Nationalists with a basis for anti-French propaganda since they would imply that their claims were receiving U.S. support. Mr. Daridan also went on to point out that he understood that Mr. Bourghiba had delivered a speech at San Francisco before the American Federation of Labor Convention which was not only abusive toward the United States but had also stirred up deep feeling in France and Tunisia.<sup>1</sup>

Mr. McGhee said that before commenting specifically on the points raised by Mr. Daridan he would like to make certain observations regarding Mr. Bourghiba's reception by officials of the Department of State. He then pointed out to Mr. Daridan that Mr. Bourghiba had travelled to the United States on a passport issued by French authorities; that when it became known that he planned to visit the United States no objection to giving him a visitor's visa was raised by the French; and that about six hours before Mr. Bourghiba was received in the Department the French Embassy was notified and no objections were raised. Mr. Daridan said that he was aware of these facts but nevertheless his Government was extremely concerned over this incident and hoped that Mr. Bourghiba would not be given a further reception by Departmental officers.

Mr. McGhee responded by stating that he hoped Mr. Daridan was not asking him not to receive Mr. Bourghiba, but he added "You may inform Mr. Schuman that I have no intention of seeing Mr. Bourghiba."

Mr. Daridan thanked Mr. McGhee and said he would convey this information to his Government.

Mr. Daridan and Mr. Van Laethem then described at some length the difficulties they have in dealing with the Nationalists in North Africa. Mr. McGhee suggested that possibly greater effort should be made to find a common ground for understanding as between the interests of the French and the Nationalists in North Africa. He referred to the fact that only recently he had had the pleasure of giving a luncheon for Mr. Kwami Nkrumah, the Leader of Government Business of the Gold Coast.<sup>2</sup> Mr. McGhee said that British authorities had expressed their pleasure over this gesture of friendship toward Mr. Nkrumah. He then went on to point out that only a few months ago Mr. Nkrumah, a rabid Nationalist in the Gold Coast, had been in jail there for seditious activities and after his election by the people of the Gold Coast, the British had released him from jail and had permitted him to take office. Relations between the British and Mr. Nkrumah had improved markedly as a result of this gesture. Mr. Daridan hastened to add that of course, the British approached their colonial problems from a somewhat different view from the French.

Mr. Daridan observed that public opinion in France was quite worked up over the activities of the Nationalists and that we should try to understand the difficulties that the French Government was facing on this score. He added that there were many people in France who felt that the French should not have granted us bases in Morocco without some political consideration being granted on the part of the United States.

In closing Mr. McGhee suggested that if the French Government was so worried over the consequences of visits to the United States of prominent North African political figures, it should take the initiative to prevent them from coming to the United States by denying them passports rather than placing the onus on this Government to deny them visas or placing this Government in a position of acting unfriendly to important visitors by refusing to receive them once they are here. Mr. Daridan did not comment on this suggestion.

Memorandum of Conversations, by the Deputy Director of the Office of Near Eastern Affairs (Kopper)

CONFIDENTIAL

[Washington,] October 9-10, 1951.

Subject: Aspirations of Tunisia

Participants: Habib Bourguiba, President, Neo-Destour Party of Tunisia

> Farhat Hached, Secretary General of the UGTT, Tunisia

Samuel K. C. Kopper, Deputy Director of NE

As had been anticipated, I encountered Habib Bourguiba at the Saudi Arabian Embassy last night. Farhat Hached was with him. I said that I was sorry that I had not been able to attend the luncheon given in Bourguiba's honor by the Egyptian Ambassador last week, but I had been out of town.

Without my mentioning the question, Bourguiba brought up the matter of the speech which it was reported he would give at San Francisco on September 21. He emphatically said that the speech, advance copies of which Abed Bouhafa had given me, did not represent his views. He disclaimed responsibility for the extreme pronouncements contained in the statement. He said that he had not seen the English translation and was surprised when informed of the substance. He said he was sorry that the speech had gained any circulation for he was afraid it had an effect on whether he would be able to see Assistant Secretary McGhee or not. He wished very much to see Mr. McGhee before he returned to Tunisia.

I told Mr. Bourguiba I was glad to hear that he had not given the speech at San Francisco for we in the Department did not think that it would have helped the Franco-Tunisian situation any. As long as he had mentioned it we told him quite frankly that the speech had caused considerable concern. The French had been particularly perturbed by it. I explained that Mr. McGhee had been out of town and was exceedingly busy at the present time with the Iranian question. I then asked Bourguiba and Farhat Hached to lunch with me the next day. (It had been previously arranged with EUR that if it seemed satisfactory I might invite Bourguiba to lunch privately. I had informed Jean-Pierre Benard Saturday afternoon, October 6, that this might take place. The latter conversation is the subject of a separate memorandum.<sup>1</sup>)

At lunch today Habib Bourguiba commenced by referring to his speech again. He described Bouhafa as silly and irresponsible. He said that he and Farhat Hached had heavy responsibilities, whereas Bouhafa, although an idealist, did not understand the difficult task of those in responsible positions. He then showed me a press clipping from Le Monde of October 6,<sup>2</sup> in which he denied having given the speech attributed to him.

Bourguiba then gave me a number of press clippings which he felt demonstrated that he and Farhat Hached were moderate in their approach. He said their position was exceedingly difficult because the Communists were continually attacking them for being collaborationists with the Imperialists. He cited an article from L'Avenir de la Tunisie (organ of the Tunisian Communists) dated July 27, the headline of which was "Le Peuple Tunisian ne Veut ni Collaboration ni Marchandages Avec les Imperialistes". This article was in response to a statement Mr. Bourguiba had made favoring cooperation between the Tunisian Nationalists and the non-Communist powers, including France, to defend the free world against the totalitarian danger.

Another clipping from L'Avenir dated September 15 accused Farhat Hached and the UGTT of being associated with the Imperialists.

Mr. Bourguiba said that the Neo Destour Party was in an increasingly difficult position. If it were not able to show that it was making progress toward bringing self-government to Tunisia, it would lose support. The people might then turn to the Communist Party. The of State files.

This and other clippings mentioned in this memorandum are attached to the source text.

Neo Destour Party had to have some encouragement. He hoped that he could see Mr. McGhee. If he returned to Tunisia without seeing him it would constitute a loss of face; the Communists would say that he was not a very strong figure. They would ask whether his advocacy of moderation and cooperation with the Western nations was paying off. I repeated Mr. McGhee was very busy and Bourguiba had already seen a number of American officials.<sup>3</sup>

Bourguiba also repeated that he wished to work things out in a peaceful and moderate way with France, but he must be able to show progress. He referred to the coming independence of Libya and the Gold Coast.

Referring to the Anglo-Egyptian question, he felt that the Egyptians had taken unwise and precipitate action in abrogating their treaty with Britain.

I did not make any extensive comments on what Bourguiba and his colleague said. I simply expressed the hope that they would continue to exercise moderation. I said I thought that some progress had been made over the past couple of years. He was well aware of the relation between France and the United States.

Both Bourguiba and Farhat Hached seemed pleased with the luncheon. They took the occasion to show me a number of pictures (for the second time) of their activities in Tunisia.

Mr. Bourguiba gave me a copy of the attached statement he was planning to give the press at the end of the week.<sup>4</sup> The statement is certainly quite moderate compared with the speech which he did not give at San Francisco.

&quot;Brown said that he was concerned with the American Government's policy toward North Africa and the reluctance to do anything other than what he described as going along with the French policy. He said that if Mr. Bourghiba did not succeed in seeing Mr. McGhee this would have undesirable repercussions. He said that Mr. McGhee had given the impression in the Middle East that the U.S. was interested in developing positive policy toward the Arab world and that failing to see Bourghiba in Washington would negate that impression. In addition, Bourghiba himself would make much of the slight and Brown said that unless there was some appearance of change in U.S. policy he himself would be impelled to criticize publicly the unwillingness of the U.S. to do other than accept the French position." In ms despatch 109, November 21, from Tunis, Jernegan reported in some detail on the current status of these Franco-Tunisian political negotiations. Jernegan observed that the negotiations were seemingly approaching the critical point when the French Government would have to make some reply to the Tunisian proposals for reforms. Jernegan reported that Neo-Destour leader Nouri Boudall had approached him with the proposal that the United States undertake some sort of informal démarche to induce France to grant satisfactory concessions to the Tunisians. Jernegan concluded his despatch with the following recommendation:

&quot;I recommend that the Department consider carefully whether the present situation does not justify an informal approach to the French government with a definite expression of hope that it will go as far as possible in granting Tunisian desires. We could base our remarks on the undeniable interest of the United States in preserving tranquility not only in North Africa but in the whole Moslem world. We do not want to be confronted with another Moroccan case in the UN, to embarrass our relations with the Near East and South Asia. We need not, and probably should not, make specific suggestions, but we can let it be known that we are most anxious to avoid the building up of any more trouble spots." (651.72/11-2151)

45. As Emb Paris was informed Dec 1,2 I do not think approach suggested Deptel 27 Nov 30 3 desirable. My reasons are:

(1) Proffer of direct official Amer advice to Tunisians mins wld put US squarely in middle of dispute from here on out. Tunisians wld consider we had shown ourselves interested party and wld expect US continue intervene in debate on every future occasion. They wld attempt make my position here that of Amb to Neo-Destour.4

(2) I do not concur that Tunisians using improper pressure tactics on Fr. In first place, if world situation were not tense and if Tunisians did not agitate, they wld have no chance of getting any concessions whatsoever. In second place, such pressure tactics as pub Chenik note and calling strike adopted only after Fr colonists in Tunisia had exerted every possible pressure prevent reforms.<sup>5</sup> In third place, it is my understanding pub conf document is recognized right of govt which sends it and is frequently done by great powers. In fourth place, strikes and demonstrations are only means open to Tunisians to prove popular support of Natlist leaders.6

(3) In any case, it wld be absolutely futile attempt to convince Tunisian leaders they are wrong in using this kind of pressure. They consider they have shown great patience and moderation.7

(4) If we say we are satisfied Fr will grant maximum concessions possible, Tunisians will believe we have put real pressure on Fr and have concrete assurances of substantial concessions. When disillusionment comes, they will insist we do something to justify their having relied on our optimism.

(5) If we tell Fr we disapprove Tunisians pressure tactics, they may be encouraged resist demands and may throw our words back at us in future as evidence we recognize Tunisians do not negotiate in good faith.

Line of reasoning of Schuman note is that while Chenik letter of Oct 30 might form basis for conversations, account must be taken of 70 years of French work in Tunisia including continuing contribution of substantial portion of budget and carrying out of large public works prog. French residents in Tunisia, note continues, have played important role in development of country and govt cannot consider setting them aside insofar as participation in public life is concerned (i.e. French will continue to be represented in whatever Consultative Council may be evolved). Future relations between France and Tunisia can only be founded on recognition of "the definitive nature of the bond which unites them". Note adds that Bey shid now put into effect engagements which he has freely accepted regarding municipal reforms as prerequisite to any other reforms (i.e. creation of Tunisian Assembly). Finally Schuman states French Govt is ordering its rep Tunis to institute next month mixed Franco-Tunisian commission to study what type of rep institution might replace grand council whose mandate has expired.

In the source text this sentence is underlined in pencil and an accompanying handwritten marginal notation reads: "Maybe by talking to both sides we can avoid this very situation."

Concurrently with publication French note press reports appointment of Voizard now French Min to Monaco to replace Perillier. Text of reply is designed maintain intact French position Tunisia and not offer much hope any widespread reform; dismissal Perillier is considered further indication determination French Govt follow firm line inasmuch as he was considered apostle of concessions to Tunisians and as such anathema to French colony. Combination of Schuman reply and appointment Voizard who is rumored to be advocate firm line Tunisia shld satisfy restlessness French colony in protectorate.

Tunisian reaction to note (text of which is being airmailed) has been as expected unfavorable. Chenik announced to press he considered French document equivalent to refusing to acknowledge Tunisian note at all and was disturbed at ref to cosovereignty of France and Tunisia in ltr country. Tels of protest from Tunisian nationalists and labor groups have already been received in Paris, while Socialist Populaire and Independent Combat and Franc-Tireur are sharply critical of govt and predict difficulties in future. Figaro while approving French reply is rather pessimistic as to future tranquillity but expresses hope mixed commission (to which it is rumored Ramadier may be appointed) may find some way out of impasse. FonOff has little to add to above but officer in charge of protectorates seemed somewhat disappointed govt reply had offered Tunisians so little and omitted certain reforms Quai d'Orsay had suggested such as lifting state of siege.

Early reaction seems generally that French reply does not represent much progress and leaves Franco-Tunisian relations approximately where they were when Perillier went to Tunis.

 ${\bf CONFIDENTIAL}$

Tunis, December 19, 1951.

No. 213

Subject: The French Reply of December 15<sup>1</sup> to Tunisian Demands for Political Reforms.

Foreign Minister Schuman's note of December 15 to Tunisian Prime Minister Mohamed Chenik seems to have brought to an abrupt close one stage of the Franco-Tunisian argument over political reforms. No matter how it is read, the note must be taken as a definite set-back for the moderate Tunisian nationalists. They have obtained virtually nothing from a démarche to which they had attached great importance. It is true that there is a slight apparent gain, since the French Government has agreed to discuss the creation of a new legislative body, but this decision had been taken even before the Tunisian ministers went to Paris. In any case, it is a concession so negligible by comparison with what the Tunisians asked that it hardly counts in the political picture, and it is more than offset by other portions of the note.

Coupled with the replacement of Resident General Louis Perillier by M. Pierre Voizard, the French note seems to make clear that French policy toward Tunisia will be even more cautious in future than it has been during the past year and a half. France has not renounced the policy of negotiation nor the principle of reform, but it has indicated that changes must come very slowly and that there is a definite limit to their extent.

The big question which the note raises in its wake is: what policy will the nationalists now adopt?

[Here follow a detailed analysis of the French note of December 15 and the reaction in Tunisia thereto.]

Comment: It is hard to see how the French Government could have handled the situation in worse fashion. It would have been much better never to have let the Tunisian ministers go to Paris at all, and, once they had gotten there and presented their requests, it would have been better to give an immediate answer even if it said no more than that the Government was not prepared to discuss such questions at that moment.

Instead, the Tunisians were led to expect something, only to get worse than nothing. The Neo-Destour leaders, the only really influential people with whom the French can deal on a reasonable basis, have been exasperated and their prestige hurt. Any negotiations in future will certainly be more difficult.

It is easy to give explanations for the French. The Residency General says it was never expected that the Tunisians would present specific demands and attempt substantive negotiations. (I think any child would have known that Chenik and Co. could not and would not go to Paris merely to exchange polite words.) It is also obvious that the French cabinet had too many urgent things on its hands during the past two months to give proper attention to a relatively secondary problem like Tunisia. (All the more reason for not letting the Tunisians come at all.) It seems, furthermore, clear that the French cabinet was divided among itself regarding the policy to adopt and that the majority might have been split if Schuman had forced the issue. But all this merely adds up to a story of indecision and ineptitude which may be explicable and excusable but does not alter the fact that the Tunisian situation has become worse.

Editorial Note

During conversations in Washington on October 5, 1950, between South African Defense Minister Erasmus and Secretary of State Acheson and Secretary of Defense Marshall and in a note of October 9, 1950, to Secretary Acheson, the Government of the Union of South Africa stated that it had adopted a policy to regard any attack on the African continent as an attack upon South Africa. In implementation of the policy decision, the Government of South Africa expressed a willingness to send an expeditionary force of an armored division and air fighter group to North Africa on the outbreak of hostilities provided that South Africa was able to obtain the equipment required for the expeditionary force at the time the force went into action and on "the least onerous financial terms".

On December 15 the Secretary of State addressed letters to the appropriate chairmen of the committees of Congress as required under the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended, stating that the Government of the Union of South Africa had been determined eligible to receive military assistance in accordance with the terms of Section 408(e)(1)(e) of the act. Acheson explained that the decision had been reached because the Government of the Union of South Africa had stated that it would regard any Communist attack on the African continent as an attack upon South Africa, and that the port facilities and continued United States access to the manganese and other mineral deposits in South Africa contributed to the security of the United States.

SECRET

CAPE Town, January 30, 1951.

DEAR HARRY: When first coming to South Africa we were very much interested in reading the very useful Policy Statement <sup>2</sup> as published in the Department's policy series. We have the impression that you have been pretty responsible for that publication. It seemed to contain all the necessary information in practical, concise form. It has always been a feeling of mine that no one in a Mission from the Chief down to the most junior officer can function efficiently unless he has a frankwork [framework?] upon which to build subsequent reports, and the Policy Statement on South Africa gives just that precise information.

Another practice which we endeavor to follow at successive posts is to put in outline form the objectives of American policy. With Joe Sweeney we have provisionally prepared such an outline and submit it to you for criticism. Here it is:

OBJECTIVES OF AMERICAN POLICY IN SOUTH AFRICA

- 1. To maintain and strengthen South Africa's support of the Western cause.
- 2. To expedite the utilization of South Africa's strategic raw materials in such a way as to strengthen the West and aid the Union's economy.
  - 3. To maintain South African participation in the United Nations.
- 4. To encourage South African membership in the British Commonwealth of Nations without opposing the Afrikaner ideal of a Republic.
- 5. To exert American influence cautiously and without giving offense to achieve a broader outlook for Afrikaner nationalism that:

a. Parochial nationalism is lessened.

<sup>1</sup>Ambassador Erhardt, who arrived in South Africa and assumed charge of the Embassy in September 1950, died suddenly of coronary thrombosis on February 18, 1951. In response to the letter printed here, Shullaw wrote to Chargé Bernard C. Connelly in Capetown on March 1 as follows:

"In the Ambassador's letter dated January 30 he listed certain objectives of American policy in South Africa and asked for my comments. I have shown the letter to Hayden Raynor who you probably know has succeeded Harry Labouisse as Director of BNA. His reaction was that the objectives were very good. I agree and think that it is useful to have such a detailed list of points of interest in the implementation of our more general policy objectives. Many of the points listed, as I know all of you recognize, are matters of extreme delicacy in hypersensitive South Africa. They are not easy objectives to advance but I still agree that as occasion and opportunity permit we should do what we can along these lines." (611.45A/1-3051)

b. Better feeling is brought about between the English and Afrikaans-speaking segments of the population.

c. Native policy is brought closer to the general standards of Western democracies.

- d. South African leadership of the African Continent becomes a positive force.
- 6. To observe and, if possible, to influence African (Native) nationalism so that:
  - a. Communist penetration is forestalled.

b. Anti-white hatred is lessened.

c. This dynamic force becomes pro-Western.

d. A harmonious formula is evoked for the co-existence of the white and black peoples in the Union.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN G. ERHARDT

SECRET

The Secretary of State presents his compliments to His Excellency the Ambassador of the Union of South Africa and has the honor to refer to the Ambassador's note dated October 9, 1950,² confirming in broad outline the policy of the Union Government with regard to the defense of Africa, and furnishing certain information concerning the Union Government's military equipment requirements. These requirements were classified into two groups: equipment required immediately for the training of normal, peacetime forces, and that required for an expeditionary force. It was stated that the equipment for the expeditionary force would not be needed until the force arrived in the theatre of operations, and the hope was expressed that the United States would find it possible to extend the least onerous financial terms for this equipment.

In the conversations which the South African Minister of Defense, the Hon. F. C. Erasmus, had with the Secretary of State and with the Secretary of Defense during his visit to the United States in October, 1950, he was informed that there was no existing legislative authority which would permit the United States to extend military assistance to South Africa on a grant basis. However, the provisions of Section 408(e) of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended, which would, under certain conditions, permit the United States to extend to the Union of South Africa military assistance on a reimbursable basis, were explained to Mr. Erasmus.<sup>3</sup>

It has now been determined, in accordance with the terms of Section 408(e) of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act, as amended, that the Union of South Africa is eligible to receive reimbursable military assistance from the United States. Consequently the Government of the United States, upon receipt of the assurances from the South African Government required in the administration of the Act, will be able to extend reimbursable military assistance to South Africa. The assurances required in order to give effect to this determination will be the subject of a separate communication to the Ambassador.<sup>5</sup>

With respect to the observations contained in the Ambassador's note concerning the hope of the South African Government that the Government of the United States would find it possible to extend the least onerous financial terms possible, the method by which the fair value of equipment or material transferred is determined, is set forth in Sections 403(c) and 408(e)(2) of the Act, as amended. In extending reimbursable military assistance to a nation determined to be eligible for such assistance, the Government of the United States has only such discretion in the fixing of the terms of reimbursement as is afforded by the terms of the Act, and specifically the provisions of the sections cited.

In the Ambassador's note it was further stated that informal discussions were taking place between the Service Attachés of the Embassy and representatives of the Department of Defense concerning the availability and costs of equipment required by the South African Armed Forces. It was the understanding of the Department of State that on the basis of these conversations, the Union Government would determine the specific items it would seek to obtain in the United States, and would forward to the Department of State its requests for the assistance of the Government of the United States in obtaining this equipment. It should be noted, however, that eligibility for reimbursable military assistance does not in itself assure in any way that equipment desired can be made available. Competing and urgent demands for limited quantities of equipment and materials necessitate an examination and determination in the case of each item of equipment. In view of this situation it is apparent that this Government is unable to give any general commitment or assurances regarding the equipping of the proposed South African expeditionary force even though, as pointed out in the Ambassador's note, such equipment would not be required until the force arrived in the theatre of operations. The Government of the United States recognizes and appreciates the initiative of the South African Government in deciding, as a part of its defense policy, that it will regard any military attack by a communistic power or powers on the continent of Africa as a direct attack on South Africa to be resisted with all the force at the Union's disposal. This Government has also noted with appreciation the references in Prime Minister Malan's statement in Parliament on January 25 to the importance of armed strength in the free world as a deterrent to Communist aggression. It is the sincere hope of this Government that the eligibility of the Union Government for reimbursable aid under the Mutual Defense Assistance Act will assist South Africa in carrying out its training programs and in implementing its defense policy. Within the limits imposed by the Act and the availability of the equipment needed, and having regard to world conditions at the moment, the Government of the United States will give the most sympathetic consideration to requests from the South African Government.

Department of State Policy Statement 1

[Washington,] March 28, 1951.

Union of South Africa

A. OBJECTIVES

The fundamental objectives of US policy toward the Union of South Africa are: 1) To maintain our present friendly relations, recognizing South Africa's position as a member of the British Commonwealth, its importance as a source of various minerals in which we are interested and its strategic position in time of war; 2) to influence South Africa to adopt a more reasonable attitude toward the difficulties it has experienced in the UN; and 3) to encourage South Africa, as improvement in its foreign exchange position permits, to relax the import and exchange controls which have restricted our access to South African markets in recent years.

B. POLICIES

Relations between the United States and the Union of South Africa have always been friendly, but under the Smuts regime they were subjected to the over-riding considerations of Commonwealth and, more particularly, British interests. The Nationalist Government which came to power as a result of the general election in May 1948 has no sentimental attachment to the Commonwealth. Nevertheless it has participated in Commonwealth conferences when it has considered that South African interests would be served thereby.

South Africa, because of its natural resources, temperate climate and present and potential capacity for economic development, occupies a pre-eminent position on the African continent. Its reactionary racial policies, and the difficulties which those policies have engendered in the UN, impede the full realization of South African potentialities in African and in world affairs. Strained relations with India and Pakistan resulting from the discriminatory treatment of the Indian minority in the Union embarrass the United Kingdom and the Commonwealth. This particular conflict, and the effect which it has in the UN of aligning colored nations of the world against white South Africa provides a useful subject for Soviet propaganda against

Department of State Policy Statements were concise summaries of current U.S. policy toward a country or region prepared by ad hoc working groups in the responsible geographic offices of the Department. The policy statements, which were intended to provide information and guidance for officers in missions abroad, were referred to appropriate diplomatic missions for comment and criticism. The statements were periodically revised. For the previous statement on South Africa, November 1, 1948, see Foreign Relations, 1948, vol. v, pt. 1, p. 524. In this connection, see also Ambassador Erhardt's letter of January 30, to Shullaw, p. 1428.

the West. Our interest in strategic South African minerals, in the strength of the Commonwealth and in the unity of the free world are sufficient to justify an effort on our part to influence the Union Government to adopt a more conciliatory attitude in the UN, both with respect to its international responsibilities for the territory of Southwest Africa and the Indian minority question.

Through our USIE activities in South Africa, using information and educational exchanges, friendly relations can be strengthened and South African knowledge and understanding of US policies and attitudes affecting South Africa can be furthered. Since South African good will is conditioned by misinformation on US intentions in political-economic fields and by distortions of American social conditions, such USIE activities can make a useful contribution to the realization of our policy objectives.

1. Political

The general election in 1948 brought to power a Nationalist Government representing primarily the nationalist Afrikaner element of the population. This Government has gained in strength since taking office while its opponents have lost ground. A number of the leaders of the Nationalist Government and the majority of its supporters are narrowly racialist both in their attitude toward the colored problem in South Africa, and in their identification of Afrikaner culture with the South African nation. While these racialist ideas, particularly with respect to the relations between the English speaking and Afrikaans speaking sections of South Africa, may no longer claim the full allegiance of more enlightened Nationalist leaders, the basic strength of the Nationalist Party is in the rural areas which for the foreseeable future will continue to regard the English element in South Africa with hostility and distrust. The weak Afrikaner Party, which is generally considered to be more moderate than the Nationalist Party, is having difficulty in maintaining its integrity in the face of Nationalist efforts to effect a fusion of the two parties which now form a coalition government. With the recently concluded agreement between the leaders of the two parties on the question of the colored voters, the principal point of difference or obstacle to amalgamation has been removed. The leader of the Afrikaner Party, Mr. N. C. Havenga, is likely to succeed Prime Minister Malan in the event of the latter's retirement from office because of ill health. Presumably this would mean a fusion of the Afrikaner and Nationalist parties.

Legislative restrictions in racial matters in South Africa, such as regulations regarding native residence, pass laws, and the color bar in industry, have always been more rigid on the books than in administrative application, and, in fact, in many localities have not been strictly enforced. The Nationalist Government has encouraged a harsher administration of existing laws and has enacted the Group Areas Bill providing for territorial segregation in implementation of its apartheid program.<sup>2</sup>

Although the natives (Africans) comprise 80 per cent of the population, they are represented only indirectly in Parliament through three European members in the House of Assembly and four in the Senate. The Nationalist Government opposes the continuance of these representatives in the House of Assembly, but their removal has not yet been politically feasible.

The problem of the treatment of Indians in South Africa was first brought to the attention of the UN General Assembly in December 1946. A resolution passed by that session expressed the opinion that the treatment of Indians in South Africa should be in conformity with international obligations under agreements between India and South Africa and relevant provisions of the UN Charter. Discussions in the second and third sessions of the General Assembly did not further a solution of the problem. As a result of discussions between Dr. Malan and Mr. Nehru at the 1949 Conference of Commonwealth Prime Ministers, negotiations were initiated between the parties to the dispute for the holding of a round-table conference. These negotiations were broken off by the Indian Government when South Africa refused to delay enactment of the Group Areas legislation until after the Conference. At the Fifth Session of the General Assembly a resolution was adopted calling on the three governments to hold a roundtable conference. In the event of failure to hold this conference before April 1, 1951 or to reach an agreement in the conference within a reasonable time, the resolution recommended that there be established a commission to assist the parties in the carrying out of appropriate negotiations. The resolution also called upon the governments concerned to refrain from taking any steps which would prejudice the success of their negotiations and in particular the implementation or enforcement of the provisions of the Group Areas Act. The question was also placed on the agenda of the next regular session of the Assembly by virtue of this resolution.

The Assembly's resolution is the strongest passed on this question and is most distasteful to the Union Government. The specific request

&quot;The Proclamation of the Group Areas Act brings the Union of South Africa another step nearer to the present Government's goal of apartheid. In the future persons must live and own businesses in areas according to their race. This, the protagonists of the measure claim, will preserve 'racial purity'. . . . Implementation of the Group Areas Act will increase racial tension, lower non-European living standards, and condone such present standards of living as do not conform to the human rights enjoyed in Western democracies, and will stimulate non-European unity." (845A.411/4-1651) that South Africa refrain from implementation or enforcement of the Group Areas Act is perhaps the most obnoxious aspect of the resolution from the South African point of view since they have consistently maintained that the question of the treatment of the Indian minority is a matter of their internal concern and barred by Article 2, paragraph 7 (domestic jurisdiction clause) of the Charter from the scope of the Assembly. Since the Union Government maintains that it entered into negotiations looking toward a round-table conference as a result of talks held between Dr. Malan and Prime Minister Nehru and not in response to any previous action by the United Nations it will undoubtedly renew with increased vigor its argument that this question is an internal matter and will probably not proceed to negotiations under this resolution. In view of the fact that it is unlikely that the parties will have agreed to the holding of a round-table conference by the first of April of this year, the question of the appointment of the commission called for by this resolution will arise. The US vote for this resolution caused such resentment in South Africa that it is doubtful whether at the present time efforts on our part to persuade South Africa to comply with its provisions would be helpful. but whenever circumstances permit we should endeavor to exercise a moderating influence.

South Africa's refusal to submit a trusteeship agreement for Southwest Africa also resulted in a dispute in the UN. With the exception of Southwest Africa, all territories held under mandate from the former League of Nations either have become independent or have been placed under the trusteeship system. By letter of July 23, 1947 the South African Government informed the UN that it had abandoned for the time being its plan to incorporate Southwest Africa into the Union but would administer the territory in the spirit of the mandate and submit reports to the UN on the administration. However, on July 11, 1949 the Union Government informed the Secretary General that it would not submit any further reports to the UN. The Nationalist Government resented the manner in which its administration of the territory had been criticized on the basis of the initial report to UN. Legally, South Africa argued, the obligations, under the mandate, including the obligations to submit reports and transmit petitions, lapsed with the demise of the League of Nations and had not been transferred to the UN.

Since the status of Southwest Africa was not entirely clear, and since conflicting opinions were held regarding the legal aspects of the Union's obligations under the Covenant of the League and Chapter XII of the Charter, the US supported a resolution in the fourth session of the General Assembly requesting an advisory opinion from the International Court of Justice. The Court's opinion, while stating that South Africa was under no obligation to submit a trusteeship agreement, held that South Africa could not unilaterally alter the international status of Southwest Africa and was obliged to submit reports to UN on its administration of the territory and to transmit petitions.

In the fifth session of the General Assembly the US supported a resolution accepting the Court's opinion, urging South Africa to do likewise and setting up a committee of five nations to negotiate with South Africa on the procedural arrangements necessary to give effect to the opinion. South Africa adopted a moderate attitude in this session and indicated its willingness to give careful consideration to any resolution passed by the Assembly. At the same time it considers that the Court opinion was issued without the benefit of information which has subsequently come to light concerning the transfer of responsibilities from the League of Nations to UN and that the opinion should be revised, particularly in its finding with regard to the submission of reports and transmission of petitions. South Africa is not happy about the terms of the resolution or the fact that the United States does not agree with its legal arguments respecting the Court opinion. There remains in this case, however, the possibility of the views of the United States having some influence with South Africa.3

Pan-African aspirations which were voiced by General Smuts during the war have been played down during the past several years, and the emphasis has been placed on closer economic and trade relations with neighboring territories, particularly the Rhodesias. The present Government has evidenced a sensitivity to developments in neighboring African territories and, particularly, has voiced a demand for the British High Commission territories. In recent months this subject has been quiescent and South Africa has made no formal request to the British Government for the incorporation of these territories. Dr. Malan and other Nationalist leaders have also advocated an African defense arrangement which would serve to coordinate plans for the defense of the African continent. The urge to expand the Union's influence northward is evident not only in this proposal, but also in such policies as the closer political association of Southwest Africa with the Union, the transitional customs union with Southern Rhodesia, and, more indirectly, the readiness to participate in and sponsor scientific cooperation in Africa.

2. Economic

South Africa is the world's largest producer of gold. Normally, its merchandise imports tend to absorb its gold output but, owing to the reduced volume of imports available from abroad during the war, and to a heavy capital inflow from the UK, the Union's wartime gold output found its way principally into monetary reserves which until 1945 rose by a substantial amount. With the termination of the war and the release of pent-up import demands, a large import surplus developed that was financed out of reserves, sharply reversing the previous favorable reserve movement. This post-war depletion of South Africa's gold holdings prompted the imposition, in November 1948, of controls on imports from all non-sterling countries. A drastic diversion of purchases to the sterling area ensued, however, with a consequent drain on the Union's sterling resources, and in July 1949 the South African Government brought sterling area imports also under control, although in a favorably discriminatory manner. This discriminatory application of import controls was shifted on January 1, 1950 from a sterling area/non-sterling area basis to a soft currency/hard currency area basis, made operative through a system of differential import permits.

After the devaluations of September 1949, South Africa's external position began to improve. The reduction in imports resulting from the import control policy reduced the Union's gold and dollar payments. On the other hand, the rapid rise in wool prices increased dollar earnings, and there was a revival of the inflow of capital that was interrupted in mid-1948. In consequence, during 1950 South Africa's hard currency deficit fell to such an extent that some of the Union's gold production became available once more for augmenting monetary reserves.

This improvement in reserve position led the South African Government, on January 1, 1951, to relax the degree of its discrimination against hard currency imports. Although such a step was most welcome some doubt remains whether continued discrimination in any degree against hard currency imports can be justified. The discrimination was represented as necessary to insure South Africa an adequate flow of capital, but the propriety of imposing discriminatory import restrictions to secure capital is open to question.

In addition to the application of exchange and import controls, the South African Government had attempted to improve its balance of payments position by realizing a greater foreign exchange income from its gold output. It instituted the sale of gold for non-monetary (i.e., industrial, professional, and artistic) purposes at premium prices, and in 1949 sought the concurrence of the International Monetary Fund in a proposal that would allow a Fund member to sell one-half of its gold production at market prices for either monetary or non-monetary purposes. The Fund, supported by the US, reaffirmed its objection to premium gold transactions and accordingly rejected the South African scheme. Although this rejection did not prevent the sale of gold at a premium for legitimate non-monetary purposes, such sales being technically outside the scope of the Fund's sphere of interest, the volume of South African sales for what are ostensibly non-monetary purposes has become so large that there is growing concern that South Africa is, in fact, contravening the Fund's gold policy.

In 1949 South Africa unsuccessfully sought to obtain an Export-Import Bank loan of $100 million. In the loan negotiations, the South African Government objected to the gold deposit requirements for that portion of the loan taken by private banks and appeared to be of the opinion that because South Africa had an excellent credit record the Bank should act favorably on the application without going too closely into the purposes for which the loan was to be used. The failure to obtain a loan on terms satisfactory to South Africa created some resentment against the US which lessened with the passage of time. South Africa has recently received a loan of $60 million for transport improvements and expansion of electric power facilities.

Initially the South African exchange regulations required that nonsterling shipping charges be deducted from the importer's exchange quota which placed American shipping lines in a most disadvantageous position vis-à-vis sterling shipping lines. The US informed the Union of its view that artificial changes in shipping patterns brought about by exchange regulations are undesirable in principle and harmful to world trade and that convertibility of exchange in the case of transport should be kept outside exchange regulations. In response to our representations, the South African Government altered the administration of its exchange controls in such a manner as to place all shipping on an equal footing in the carriage of commercial cargoes. US shipping is allotted approximately 45 per cent of Government cargoes. This is an improvement over the situation some months ago when the system of priorities gave an even greater preference in the carriage of Government cargoes to South African and British ships and charters.

C. RELATIONS WITH OTHER STATES

South African ties with the UK have loosened since the Nationalist victory in the 1948 General Election, primarily in the sense of greater independence of action and alignment with the UK on the basis of <sup>4</sup> On January 23 the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development announced two loans to the Union of South Africa totalling $50 million. One loan of $30 million for 20 years at 4 percent interest, guaranteed by the Union of South Africa, was made to the Electric Supply Commission, an autonomous state agency, to assist in the expansion of its 6-year power development program. A second loan of $20 million, for 15 years at 3¾ percent interest, was made to the Union of South Africa for the expansion and improvement of the state-owned transportation system. Simultaneously with the two IBRD loans, a group of eight commercial banks in the United States extended a loan of $10 million to the Union for purposes complementary to the IBRD loan for transportation improvement and development. For a summary description of the loans to South Africa, see International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, Sixth Annual Report 1950–1951, pp. 19–20. Reconstruction and Bulletin, January 23 was carried in the Department of State Wireless Bulletin, January 23, 1951, No. 22, p. 4. For previous documentation on the negotiations of the loans from the IBRD, see Foreign Relations, 1950, vol. v, pp. 1809 ff.

self-interest rather than sentiment. The Malan Government, for the time being at least, wants South Africa to remain in the Commonwealth. Dependence on the UK for capital, fear of Communism, and concern for the future of white supremacy in Africa have counterbalanced extreme isolationist and nationalist sentiments. Although the Nationalist party platform favors a republican form of government, Nationalist leaders have reaffirmed the commitment not to introduce a republican constitution until a definite mandate has been obtained from the electorate. Furthermore Nationalist leaders have taken the line that South Africa can follow a similar course of constitutional development to that of India. Thus Nationalist aspirations could be satisfied and at the same time it would be possible for the English section of the population to accept such a solution of the republican issue since the Commonwealth connection would be maintained.

Although cabinet ministers, including the Prime Minister, have attended Commonwealth conferences at London, the present government prefers bilateral arrangements to multilateral negotiations centering in London. The Malan Government attempts to limit its Commonwealth relations as much as possible to matters specifically affecting South African interests. In the case of African defense arrangements, however, the Malan Government favors a multilateral approach in which South Africa, because of its dominant position in Southern Africa, would be the leader. The UK has discouraged this approach and apparently prefers bilateral arrangements radiating from London.

South Africa which until recently was outside the main currents of international politics except for its membership in the Commonwealth, now feels the need of a more assertive foreign policy. The purpose is multiple: to counteract adverse overseas publicity regarding its racial policies, to ward off charges of isolationism within the Union Opposition, and to influence the colonial policies of other African powers. In an effort to garner support in the UN General Assembly and also to improve its position in Africa, the Union is giving increasing attention to its relations with various countries, particularly Mediterranean, Atlantic, and Commonwealth powers. Its information service in the US, Canada, and countries having African colonies is being expanded.

The South African whites are strongly anti-communist because they are acutely aware of the vulnerability of South Africa's colored population to Communist propaganda. Prime Minister Malan has said more than once that the Union would not remain neutral if war came and the South African Government has taken a decision to regard any attack on the continent of Africa by a Communist power as an attack on South Africa to be resisted by all the force at the Union's disposal. In support of this decision South Africa plans to make available for the defense of Africa an expeditionary force consisting of an armored division. South Africa has also sent an air squadron to fight in Korea.

D. POLICY EVALUATION

The role of the native in South Africa is the omnipresent issue involving the major parties and affecting almost every aspect of South African life. The question of race relations was a paramount issue in the 1948 general election, and the effectiveness of the Nationalist appeal to the fears of the electorate demonstrated that a substantial section of the white population relies on repression as the answer to this problem. South Africa, by reason of the human and material resources which it possesses, should have considerable potentialities for further development. Unless its racial policies can be developed on something other than a substratum of fear and discrimination, however, its progress will be hampered and the development which it has already achieved will be endangered.

The jealous concern of the present Nationalist Government to preserve the culture of the Afrikaner Volk led to a reversal of the policy of encouraging immigration adopted by the previous government. The check on immigration was explained on the ground that the ethnical proportions of the white South African population must be preserved—that is the numerical superiority of the Afrikaners must not be destroyed by unlimited immigration. More recently there have been indications that the South African Government will make an effort to obtain immigrants from Germany who in the opinion of the present Government, would be more readily assimilable in the South African community. Immigration continues to be a political question in South Africa, since both groups, English speaking and Afrikaners, view immigrants as potential voters and oppose or support immigration on the basis of whether particular immigrants are likely to weaken or strengthen their respective positions in South Africa.

Our relations with South Africa have always been friendly but the UN disputes in which South Africa has been involved since 1946 have periodically produced a strain which unfortunately is likely to continue. It is in our interest to maintain friendly relations with South Africa because of strategic considerations and also because South Africa represents a good market for our products. In December 1950, South Africa's ability to defend itself and to contribute to the defense of the area of which it forms a part was determined to be important to the security of the US, and it was therefore found eligible to use the procurement facilities of this Government under the Mutual Defense Assistance Act. The US and the UK have signed a contract with South Africa covering the procurement of uranium.<sup>5</sup> South African exports of manganese, diamonds and other strategic materials are also important to the US.

While we are not in a position to influence one way or another the maintenance of South Africa's constitutional relationship with Great Britain, our interests would not be served by the withdrawal of South Africa from association in the British Commonwealth, particularly if such withdrawal were accompanied by a policy of narrow nationalism and isolation. Our policy should take note of the lack of experience in international affairs of many of the leaders of the present Government and their extreme sensitivity to criticism. We should endeavor by the exercise of patience to encourage South Africa to continue her cooperation with other countries, and particularly her participation in the UN.

The Consul General at Johannesburg (Redecker) to the Department of State

SECRET

Johannesburg, April 19, 1951.

No. 239

Subject: Conclusion of Financial Agreement for Uranium Production in South Africa

Wilson L. Townsend, General Counsel of Export-Import Bank; A. A. Wells, Special Assistant to the General Counsel of the Atomic Energy Commission, and R. L. Faulkner, Assistant to the Director of the Division of Raw Materials, arrived as scheduled in Johannesburg on the evening of April 12, 1951. They were met at the airport by Consul General Redecker and Vice Consul Davis and escorted to the Carlton Hotel, where accommodations had been reserved for them. The following evening they attended a large dinner party, which had been previously arranged at the home of Consul General and Mrs. Redecker, in honor of Mrs. Elisabeth Schumann, famous Austrian-American concert singer who has been on a concert tour in South Africa.

The three officials had come to South Africa primarily to finalize financial arrangements for the uranium agreement with South Africa, the technical and commercial aspects of which had been agreed upon in September, 1950.<sup>1</sup>

Presumably the reference here is to the agreement of November 23, 1950, between representatives of the Combined Development Trust and the South African Atomic Energy Board on the procurement of uranium. For documentation on the agreement, see Foreign Relations, 1950, vol. 1, pp. 493 ff.

Negotiations have now taken place between the American officials, United Kingdom officials, and representatives of the South African mining companies concerned, for completing arrangements for the financing of the uranium project. Although some slight initial difficulties were encountered in the negotiations and representatives of the mining companies again showed a certain aversion to the uranium project and, especially, its financing by the United States, the anticipated agreement nevertheless has been reached and it is expected that this will find expression in a formal agreement to be concluded within the next week or ten days.

The essential details of this agreement are as follows:

The Export-Import Bank, jointly with the U.K. Ministry of Supply, undertake to grant loans for financing the entire uranium extraction project. The Export-Import Bank will be responsible for two-thirds of the loans and the U.K. Ministry of Supply will be responsible for the remaining one-third.

The loans will run for ten years, equal to the duration of the basic uranium production agreement, and will draw interest at the rate of 4 per cent, compounded quarterly. The South African Reserve Bank will serve as intermediary, will convert dollar loans into South African currency for transfer on behalf of the mining companies, and will be responsible for the transfer of payments of interest and principal to the lenders. The loans will be directly to the several mining companies assuming responsibility for the recovery of the uranium and on whose properties and in conjunction with whose mines the uranium extraction plants will be established.

The agreement initially contemplates that a combined loan (U.S. and U.K.) of £ 10 to £ 12 million pounds will be granted, based upon the premise of the installation of four uranium extraction plants at four separate mines on the Rand. However, as it is now contemplated that six uranium plants at six mines will be established, the total amount of the combined loan may possibly be increased a further £ 5 million pounds to a total of £ 15 to £ 17 million pounds. Thus, the total American share of the loan, in dollars, may reach as high as $30

It is understood that the South African mining companies, and notably the Anglo-American group (in which, despite its name, there is little or no American financial participation) showed displeasure not only at the uranium project, but, more particularly, its financing by American capital. This attitude is in keeping with the basic policy of the entire Rand gold mining industry to discourage American or any other non-British affiliation with it and to look to Great Britain exclusively for necessary financial assistance, support and guidance.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Export Import Bank of Washington: Twelfth Semiannual Report to Congress for the Period January–June 1951, p. 50, indicates that on June 28, 1951, the Bank authorized credits of $35 million to various mining companies in the Union of South Africa for mining equipment, materials, and services. Further documentation has not been found in Department of State files regarding these credits.

The development of the uranium project, closely affiliated with the United States, therefore, marks a completely new era and a new departure in financial affiliations of the major Rand mining companies.

It is clear that the mining companies were opposed to accepting an American loan for the uranium project and much preferred to finance the enterprise themselves entirely independently from their own abundant sterling resources. However, the South African Government intervened and required that the project be financed by a foreign loan, repayable over a long period, rather than by the mining companies privately, since the Government was opposed to the mining companies asking for large amounts of still scarce dollar exchange required for the importation of the necessary uranium plant equipment. It apparently was also feared that, under a blanket foreign exchange authorization, the mining companies might seek to import equipment for purposes other than the production of uranium. By the Anglo-American loan agreement, the mining companies will also lose the possibility of themselves earning large amounts of interest on the heavy capital investment and which they might otherwise charge against the cost of producing the uranium. The foreign loan agreement thus greatly facilitates the heavy payment in dollars for urgent imports of necessary uranium-extraction equipment by enabling payment in foreign exchange to be made over a period of years, rather than immediately, as would be necessary were the plant to be financed by the mining companies in local currency.

The pressure of the Government was thus also evident as regards the financing of the uranium project just as it was in the beginning in causing the mining companies reluctantly to agree to become actively interested in uranium extraction for American and British account. For years the mining companies had shied away from the project, so that pressure from the Government, together with the prospect of reasonable remunerative returns, assured by the agreement with the U.S.-U.K., concluded under the Government's auspices, were necessary to effect the companies positive interest and cooperation. It is generally felt that the uranium agreement, as finalized last year, is reasonable for all parties, and that while the financial returns to the mining companies will not be especially high, still they will be sufficient to sustain the mining companies' interest in and to make the enterprise well worth while for them.

It is understood that at the beginning, at least, only current gold ore production will be processed for uranium extraction as this will amply suffice for the full capacity of the uranium plants. There will, therefore, be no occasion, for the present, to process the vast mine dumps of already processed ore, some of which also contain uranium. It would appear that the uranium-extraction plants will be operated in synchronization with and as extensions of the mines' regular ore processing plants. However, the processed ore dumps will be available for uranium extraction whenever a larger uranium supply, than is possible by current ore production, may be desired.

Equipment for the uranium plants has already arrived on the Rand, and it is hoped that the first plant may be in regular operation within one year. The others will be brought into operation as rapidly as possible thereafter. All of the production of uranium will be delivered to the South African Atomic Energy Board, which has a national monopoly on uranium in all its aspects, including mineral rights, prospecting, production, trade, etc. The Board will then make deliveries to the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission and U.K. Ministry of Supply at prices established by the basic uranium agreement concluded last year.

All of the now projected six uranium extraction plants will be situated on the Rand. However, it would be possible to extend production to the new large gold mines now in course of development in the Orange Free State, about 225 miles to the south of Johannesburg. The first of these new mines will come into production in 1952 and additional mines progressively in succeeding years. When fully developed, the Orange Free State mines may approximate the current production of gold of the Rand mines, accounting for up to 50 per cent of the present world gold supply. The gold ore in the Orange Free State, like that of the Rand, contains a small percentage of uranium. However, owing to the immense tonnages of ore processed for gold, the total amount of uranium which may be extracted is important. Indeed, it is reported that, when all the projected uranium extraction plants are in full operation, the Rand will rank as one of the leading, if not the leading, at least potentially, source of uranium in the world.

The U.S.-South African uranium agreement accords with a number of other major economic and financial developments, involving American capital and interests, occurring in South Africa during the last year. Others include an £18 million pound contract awarded to an American company for the construction of a large synthetic motor fuel plant at Coalbrook, Transvaal; a $15 million dollar petroleum refinery to be built and operated by an American company at Durban; an $80 million dollar loan by the IBRD and several private American banks to South Africa for financing basic economic developments, such as railways, electric power, etc.; new capital investments by various American companies in branch industrial plants, etc.<sup>3</sup> These developments have greatly strengthened the economic ties between South Africa and the United States and, by causing South Africa to look increasingly to the United States for financial assistance and industrial guidance and support, are harbingers of ever-closer economic relations between the two countries in the future.

Action Requested:

That this report be distributed to all agencies of the Government interested in the specific subject discussed and in general industrial developments in South Africa affecting the United States.

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Secretary of State

SECRET

[Washington,] April 20, 1951.

Subject: South African Commitment re Defense of North Africa and the Equipping of the Proposed South African Expeditionary Force

Participants: The Secretary

The South African Ambassador, Mr. G. P. Jooste

Mr. Shullaw-BNA

The South African Ambassador, Mr. G. P. Jooste, called on me today at my request. I told him that having learned of his impending departure for South Africa I had asked him to call in order that I might discuss with him South African plans to send an expeditionary force to North Africa in the event of hostilities and the problem of equipping this expeditionary force. Before going into this matter in detail, I told the Ambassador of our great satisfaction with the decision of South Africa to send an air squadron to Korea. I expressed the hope that the Ambassador would convey our appreciation to his Government upon his return to South Africa.

So far as the defense of the African continent is concerned, I said that the South African decision with respect to an expeditionary force was most helpful. We are unable, however, because of lack of legislative authority to give any assurances concerning the equipping of the South African force. In the first place we cannot anticipate where the attack, if it comes, will fall, or where the need for equipment will be greatest. I said that I understood the South African Government had doubts about the desirability of training an expeditionary force in the absence of any assurances that the equipment for it would be forthcoming when needed. I said that I felt certain that if South Africa had in existence at the time of the outbreak of hostilities a force trained with American equipment and ready to go into action there would be every effort made to see that it was equipped. Furthermore it is very obvious that in the event of war our present legislation would be inadequate and would require amendment. I said that I had no desire to be cagey or evasive but was attempting to give the Ambassador a frank statement of why we are unable to give assurances concerning the equipping of the expeditionary force. I added that I understood training equipment could be handled as reimbursable assistance and did not present any particular difficulties.2

The Ambassador said that this explanation of the situation would be most helpful to him in explaining our position to his Government. He remarked that one question which might be raised with him was the matter of eventual payment for equipment received for the expeditionary force, assuming that on the outbreak of hostilities some way were found by which it could be supplied to South Africa. He said that his Government is proud of its financial reputation and would be concerned about the possibility of assuming an obligation in excess of its capacity to repay. He referred in this connection to South Africa's Lend-Lease negotiations after the last war. I told the Ambassador that Lend-Lease had been conceived by President Roosevelt as a method of avoiding the creation of war debts. It was only a step, however, in the development of this concept. I said that in any case there would be an opportunity for the question of cost of equipment to be considered by South Africa at the time the equipment was needed, and in the light of the circumstances and conditions then prevailing.

Following this discussion the Ambassador referred to the subject of Southwest Africa and the appointment of a successor to the late Ambassador Erhardt. These remarks are covered in a separate memorandum.3

recommended in a briefing paper submitted by Assistant Secretary Perkins under cover of a memorandum of April 18. (601.45A11/4-1851)

3 In a separate, briefer memorandum of conversation, Secretary Acheson recorded that Ambassador Jooste expressed his hope that some solution could be found to the problem of South West Africa and stated that he would discuss the matter with his Government during his improving visit to South Africa the matter with his Government during his impending visit to South Africa. Joste also asked if anything could be said about a successor to the late Ambassador Erhardt who died suddenly in Pretoria on February 18. Secretary Acheson promised to look into that matter. Regarding the designation, appointment, and confirmation of Ambassador Gallman as the new Ambassador in South Africa, see the editorial note, p. 1452.

845A.411/8-2151: Despatch

The Third Secretary of the Embassy in the Union of South Africa
(Dembo) to the Department of State

CONFIDENTIAL

PRETORIA, August 2, 1951.

No. 108

Subject: Race Conflict and the Native Outlook

Native resentment of white baaskap (supremacy) and Native disappointment with America's "failure" to oppose apartheid were the main impressions made on an Embassy officer after a two-hour talk with a group of Natives in Pretoria. The group was informally brought together to meet the officer by a Native minister. It included a school teacher, a clerk in the Department of Native Affairs, a shop-keeper, a printer, an employee of a non-European affairs department of the Municipality, three others and the minister. Points made by them during this discussion are put under three heads:

I. Inevitability of race conflict;

II. Shortcomings of Native organizations; and

III. Disappointment with United States foreign policy.

I. Inevitability of Race Conflict

The group agreed that a compromise solution of South Africa's racial difficulties was impossible. Revolution, they felt, was unavoidable. The whites of all parties were one in their support of white baaskap, while the Natives claimed equality of opportunity as their right. They unhesitatingly blamed the Nationalists for inflaming racial feelings to the point where today every Native regarded every white man as his enemy.

II. Shortcomings of Native Organizations

The group acknowledged that the bulk of the Native people were unorganized. One said the ANC was like a head without a body. He guessed that the Congress only had about 1,000 active members. Another claimed that the drawback to effective Native organization was the "Native intellectuals", that is, themselves. The educated Natives were only interested in making a good thing out of their education. They did not care to work among the people in rural areas who were ready for leadership. Another observed that dynamic leadership could never be expected from men who were civil servants and who could be sacked if they became too outspoken. Communist prestige, on the other hand, was rising because they were the only ones who appeared ready to stake their all in the struggle against oppression.

The certain feeling of the group was that whenever effective leader-ship did appear the Native people would follow as one man the attack on baaskap. Their struggle against oppression, they felt, was a developing one. The present unformed state of Native organizations was not, therefore, a bad sign. This showed the Native pot was bubbling. Fusion would come later. The Native minister here interjected that African religious separation was a case in point. The 1,000-odd separate Bantu churches showed that the Native was rejecting white overlordship. They were essentially a movement away from the oppressor. If it were not for ministers like himself who tried to stem this separatism, the Native religious rebellion by now would have been complete.

III. United States Foreign Policy and South Africa

The reporting officer was impressed by the group's disappointment with America's "support" of South Africa at UN. His counterargument to put this issue into perspective was not taken and they predicted that the Native people would sympathize with the Soviets in a war with the West. The Native people were not Communists, they stressed, but the Soviet Union did appear to side with them in their struggle against oppression. America did not and they could not see why. They understood British truckling to Nationalist prejudice. Britain, they said, was a broken power; but America was now the great western exponent of freedom and they expected her to use her influence in their favor.

The group also showed concern with recent press stories of arrests of American Communists. They are afraid that their own advocacy of racial equality might lead to their arrest as Communists under the Suppression of Communism Act. And without fully understanding the American scene, they feared there was a "white supremacy" motive behind these arrests.

Comment:

The Embassy believes the observations reported here are typical of informed Native opinion in South Africa. Native anger and frustration are apparent everywhere in those urban areas which are best known to Embassy officers. Apartheid has only served to intensify their bitterness. The informed urban Native, moreover, assesses world developments in terms of the black and white struggle in South Africa. He may be sophisticated enough to know that there is more to Communist propaganda than appears on the surface but he finds it hard to resist its magnetism because in South Africa communism alone ranges itself on the side of racial equality. Our information task with them is important because the value of South Africa as a secure ally in a war against Russia is weakened to the extent of their susceptibility to Communist propaganda. The system of white supremacy is powerful and effective but, as the thinking here reported reveals, Native anger is growing. An outstanding leader willing to make personal sacrifices or harsh Government action which provoked a large segment of the native people, such as a pass system for Native women, could cause trouble.

The Chargé in the Union of South Africa (Connelly) to the Dominion Affairs Officer, Office of British Commonwealth and Northern European Affairs (Shullaw)

TOP SECRET

PRETORIA, September 5, 1951.

Dear Harry: John Davis, our Army Attaché, has just showed me a copy of his top secret report of August 17, 1951 to the Department of the Army, No. R-149-51, which gives the latest dope on the Union's commitments regarding defense of the Middle East. You will probably be getting your complete copy in the usual way but as there are certain sections dealing with the purchase of defense equipment I am paraphrasing them for your information.

Most of the equipment for South Africa will be purchased from England. Total orders for this equipment will be placed in the near future and will come to thirty million pounds. This sum will be expended over a six year period. The first yearly budget of five million pounds would be voted during the next session of parliament. All fighting vehicles, medium tanks, light tanks, armoured personnel carriers, will be purchased from the UK. Arrangements are being made with Canada to purchase Ford four and six wheel vehicles without bodies. The bodies will be manufactured in the Union on British specifications. Signal equipment will be purchased from Canada and possibly some from the UK.<sup>2</sup>

John Davis' report also points out the terrific impression which Field Marshal Sir William Slim made on Minister of Defense Erasmus and other members of the Union delegation. Both Mr. Forsyth and General du Toit told me immediately on their return from London what an outstanding job Slim had done in his review of the world military situation.<sup>3</sup>

If South Africa carries through with its plan, as stated in John's report, to purchase from the UK and Canada, it looks very much as though any Union purchases from the United States, other than very minor items such as a few bazookas, will be postponed indefinitely.

With the best of wishes,

Sincerely yours,

BERNARD C. CONNELLY

&lt;sup>2</sup>A similar appraisal was reported by Attaché Davis in a message of May 11 to the Department of the Army, a copy of which Chargé Connelly sent to Shullaw under cover of a letter of June 1. Davis commented that the British hoped that the new South African procurement policy would end the attempt by South Africa to obtain equipment from the United States. (745A.56/6–151)

Memorandum of Conversation, by the Under Secretary of State (Webb) <sup>1</sup>

CONFIDENTIAL

[Washington,] October 23, 1951.

Subject: Equipping of South African Air Squadron in Korea Participants: The South African Ambassador, Mr. G. P. Jooste

U—Mr. Webb

BNA-Mr. Shullaw

The South African Ambassador, Mr. G. P. Jooste, called on me today at his request to discuss the problem of equipping the South African air squadron in Korea with jet aircraft. The Ambassador recalled that when the South African squadron was sent to Korea a year ago, it was decided that the squadron would be equipped with P-51 aircraft. Subsequently personnel of the squadron, who are all volunteers, were assured by the South African Minister of Defense, Mr. Erasmus, that he would make every effort to obtain jet aircraft to replace this equipment. The Minister's efforts to carry out his pledge by obtaining aircraft from the United Kingdom were unsuccessful and South Africa then sought to buy jets in the United States. Mr. Jooste said that the Department of Defense has now informed the Service Attachés of the Embassy that jet aircraft for the South African squadron will not be available until 1953.

The Ambassador said that the problem of equipping the South African squadron was regarded with extreme seriousness by his Government. South Africa has a commitment to supply certain forces for the defense of the Middle East in the event of hostilities. The Korean operation has provided valuable training for South African pilots who could be used, if the need arises, in the Middle East. Use of jet aircraft by the squadron would increase the usefulness of this training. The question of equipping the squadron, therefore, is related to the Middle East commitment. Because of the limitations in the South African defense law, it is necessary to rely on volunteers for service outside South Africa and therefore the ability of South Africa to carry out its commitments is affected by the willingness of South African personnel to volunteer for service outside the country. The Ambassador stated that his Government was concerned by the effect on enlistments of failure to carry out the pledge respecting equipment made by the Defense Minister to the squadron in Korea. Mr. Jooste stressed the adverse effect on morale of the South African squadron resulting from its being forced to operate alongside Americans and Australians who are using jet aircraft. He acknowledged, however, that some American squadrons were also still using P-51 aircraft.

The Ambassador said that unless jet aircraft for the South African squadron could be obtained during the first quarter of 1952, his Government might be forced to ground the squadron.2

In replying to the Ambassador, I reiterated our appreciation of South African participation in the United Nations action in Korea. I told him it was my understanding that the South African squadron would be equipped with jet aircraft at the same time as the American squadrons now using P-51's. I said that I did not see how it could be possible to do more than this, and I questioned why his Government would consider itself forced to ground the South African squadron if jet aircraft were not forthcoming during the first quarter of 1952. The Ambassador again referred to the commitment of Mr. Erasmus to the squadron and to the morale factor involved. He remarked that he was unhappy at being forced to refer to the possible grounding of the squadron, but that his instructions were explicit on this point. He said that he understood only replacement jet aircraft were being sent to Korea and that none of the P-51-equipped American squadrons had been changed over to jet aircraft. He added that the South African Service Attachés had been informed by the Pentagon that NATO requirements had priority over Korean requirements.

I assured the Ambassador that his representations on this subject would be brought to the attention of the Department of Defense.

Editorial Note

On June 11 in the course of his meeting with President Truman to discuss important foreign policy matters, Secretary of State Acheson went over the list of proposed Ambassadorial appointments for the immediate future. The Secretary's brief memorandum of the discussion of Ambassadorial appointments reads in part as follows:

"We talked particularly about South Africa. The President is well aware of the delicacy of that situation and the importance of having a proven man there. I think he is most favorable to the suggestion made. I imagine that he will give me his final decision on it either Wednesday or Thursday." (Secretary's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 65 D 238)

&quot;Cols. Davis and Bland called on Min Defense Erasmus at his request September 10. Erasmus said he was worried over his present failure to purchase either in the US or UK jet aircraft for the Union's Korean squadron. He has money in hand and fears recent mounting casualties in South African squadron will lead to polit attacks by opposition in 1952 session Parliament if he cannot supplement his remarks during last parliamentary session that negots for purchasing jets were underway with assurances that they have been obtained. He hinted that if jets could not be purchased South African squadron might be grounded. Col. Bland is reporting this to Dept of Air Force. FonOff has not approached Emb on matter." (745A.5622/9–2051)

At their meeting on June 21 the President and the Secretary again discussed Ambassadorial appointments. The Secretary's memorandum read as follows:

"I raised with the President the list of suggested Ambassadorial changes which I had left with him on a previous meeting. He said that he still had not had time to get to this matter but that he would do so at once. He had been beneath such a vast accumulation of work.

"I particularly stressed the desirability of going ahead, if he should approve, with Mr. Gallman's appointment." (Secretary's Memoranda of Conversation: Lot 65 D 238)

Waldemar J. Gallman, a career Foreign Service Officer who had been Ambassador in Poland from 1948 to 1950 and was currently serving as the Department of State Representative at the War College, was formally nominated by President Truman on July 30 to become Ambassador in the Union of South Africa. The South African Government's agreement to Gallman's nomination had been received on July 26. Gallman's appointment was confirmed by the Senate on August 22. The Ambassador-Designate arrived in South Africa on September 25, but he was received for the first time by Prime Minister Malan only on October 9, and he presented his credentials to Governor General E. G. Jansen on October 18. Documentation on the nomination and accreditation of Ambassador Gallman appears in file 123 Gallman. Between October 27 and November 29, Ambassador Gallman called upon all the principal officers of the South African Government. For records of his conversations with External Affairs Secretary Forsyth on October 27, Defense Minister Erasmus on November 5, and Interior Minister Dönges on November 6, see despatches 269, October 30, infra; 296, November 5, page 1455; and 302, November 6, page 1457, all from Pretoria. Records of all the remaining conversations with government officials are in file 745A.13.

745A.13/10-3051: Despatch

The Ambassador in the Union of South Africa (Gallman) to the Department of State 1

CONFIDENTIAL

Pretoria, October 30, 1951.

No. 269

Subject: Memorandum of conversation between the Ambassador and Mr. D. D. Forsyth, Secretary for External Affairs

On October 27 I called on Mr. D. D. Forsyth, Secretary for External Affairs. It was the first opportunity I had had of having a somewhat extensive conversation with him, and I especially wanted to have this talk with him as he was leaving on the 29th for a month's holiday.

Regarding Ambassador Gallman's nomination, confirmation, arrival in South Africa, and presentation of credentials, see the editorial note, supra.

I told him that I was sorry there had been such delay in formally taking over my duties in South Africa. I said I had only now been able to start my calls on the Cabinet Ministers. I interjected here that I was looking forward particularly to my call on Minister Sauer as I was anxious to take up with him the serious problem of the lag in manganese and chrome shipments to the ports.2 While Forsyth made no observation on this point, he did say it was unfortunate that the Prime Minister's rather long absence from Pretoria had delayed matters for me.

I told Forsyth that I appreciated the warm relations that existed between the Embassy and External Affairs and that I was particularly appreciative of his helpful and cooperative attitude. To this he said that that was the way he wanted it and, after all, there was this same sort of relationship between the State Department and their Embassy in Washington.

When I remarked that it was my understanding that the MDAP agreement was finally to be signed, he said that that should take place any day now. There was one legal question which was still receiving the attention of their legal advisers, he stated. This question arose from legislation affecting the MDAP program which was just recently passed. I told him I knew nothing of this and he admitted he did not have the details but said that he did not think this new development would cause any serious delay. I said that I hoped not, as I had thought that, after agreement in principle had been reached on the phraseology of the agreement, the signing would soon follow.3

After stressing that South Africa was anxious to get along with its rearmament program in general, and particularly to get arms for training purposes, he differentiated between purchases in the U.K. and the U.S. In the U.K., he said, the price was more favorable but in the U.S. deliveries, in spite of all the demands, were quicker.

I told Forsyth then that one of these days soon I wanted to go, in detail, into the question of the pending draft Consular Convention with officials of his Department. He immediately said that he did not think the timing was good as the present Government was not very keen about further international agreements. I told him I was surprised by his remark. This seemed to me a somewhat extreme attitude on mutual defense assistance between the United States and South Africa, see the editorial note, p. 1459.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ambassador Gallman made his first call upon Transport Minister Sauer on November 8. Gallman stressed the possible disruptive effects upon the U.S. rearmament program of any delay in the transportation of essential ores, particularly manganese. Gallman advanced a few suggestions for speeding the transport of ore. Sauer appeared to indicate that all that could be done was being done. In his report on the conversation, transmitted in despatch 310, November 8, from Pretoria, Gallman suggested that Prime Minister Malan would sooner or later have to be approached on the problem, but he indicated he would see Sauer once more before any approach to Malan. toward a rather common type of agreement designed, on a reciprocal basis, to regulate some practical day-to-day relations. He followed this up by saying that he did not mean to imply that External Affairs was not prepared to explore the situation with me.

He voluntarily then brought up the question of South West Africa. "What is going to happen now?" he asked. I said that I thought the proposal worked out by the United Nations ad hoc Committee seemed very reasonable. To this he said that the present Government, in his view, would never agree to this proposal. It would not go beyond its counterproposal. The reception, he continued, which the first and only report on South West Africa submitted to the United Nations had received, would never be forgotten by the present Government. He said he was merely telling me in a personal capacity what he knew about the temper and attitude of the present Government.

At this point I told Forsyth that as I knew he was extremely busy clearing up matters before his holiday, I would not take more of his time now, but that I looked forward very much to seeing him after his return and to working with him.

I was very favorably impressed with Forsyth's cordiality and frankness.

Subject: Conversation between the Ambassador and Minister of Defense, the Honorable F. C. Erasmus

I made my first call on Minister of Defense Erasmus this morning. He received me in a very friendly way. At the very outset he said he remembered vividly the friendly, sympathetic understanding shown him by Mr. Acheson and General Marshall when he visited the States last year and discussed with them South Africa's armament needs.<sup>1</sup>

Erasmus then turned to the MDAP agreement and said he was very happy that appreciation of South Africa's position had been shown in Washington and that the way was now clear for signing the agreement.<sup>2</sup> This would be done any day now, he added. South Africa,

For information on Erasmus' meetings with Acheson and Marshall on October 5, see the editorial note, p. 1427.

he said, particularly because of its present limited manganese supply, could not give a blanket commitment covering assistance on its side. While there were undoubtedly as yet a number of unknown sources of manganese in the country which would in time be developed, the supply from present known sources was limited to about fifteen years.<sup>3</sup> I interjected that the agreement as originally drawn up was, as I understood it, a form agreement of the type generally submitted to countries who had qualified for aid on a reimbursable basis. I was happy, nevertheless, that an understanding had been reached by our two Governments which now made the signing possible.

Erasmus then said that he hoped an early start could be made in supplying South Africa with the equipment needed. I asked Erasmus whether the requirements, as given in the original list submitted by him during his visit in Washington, had been materially altered, and he said the list stood substantially as originally drawn up. He hoped progress could also be made with the list which was recently submitted to the British Government. He was very gratified, he said, to have been told that the U.S. and U.K. would coordinate their efforts in supplying the Union.

Korea was then touched upon. Erasmus said that because of the severe losses of machines and men in Korea, he had felt compelled during the last session of Parliament to state in Parliament that the Union Government would undertake to have its squadron in Korea equipped with jets. He said that it was a big disappointment when he was told by both the British and by us that jets were not now available. He said South Africa, in view of public opinion, was in the position where unless jets were made available the squadron would have to be grounded. From Britain word has come that jets would not be available before 1953. From Ambassador Jooste, however, he had just received word that we would give the problem prompt consideration and that hope was held out, according to Jooste, that perhaps by January some jets could be made available. I asked Erasmus from whom Jooste had received this information. That he said he did not know. The situation, he then said, might, of course, be eased if the cease-fire were soon negotiated. In any event, he said even a few jets by January would ease the Government's position materially.

Before we left this subject I reminded Erasmus that we had two squadrons fighting alongside the South African squadron in Korea, and that these squadrons, because of the shortage of jets, were equipped no different from the South African squadron.<sup>5</sup>

I then asked Erasmus what steps, if any, were contemplated during the coming session of Parliament to extend the time for compulsory military service. He said that the draft legislation he had in mind would extend compulsory military service (in active citizen force) from three months over a three-year period to twelve months. Manpower shortage, however, he pointed out, would at any time make it somewhat difficult to get such amending legislation through Parliament. He could not say at present whether the question would be opened in the coming session of Parliament. He wished to see first what developments, in the field of disarmament, took place at the forthcoming General Assembly meeting at Paris.

As I was taking my leave, Erasmus said that he must apologize for having, in our first meeting, touched on the two problems, the need of armaments for South Africa and the need for jets in Korea. He would appreciate, he said, any help I could give him. I told him that I would, of course, report our conversation and request that both problems continue to be given sympathetic consideration.

I was very favorably impressed with the friendly, frank way Erasmus received me and talked with me.

Comments of the Army Attaché, Colonel Davis, and of the Minerals Attaché, Mr. Frisbie, on some of the statements made by Minister Erasmus are enclosed.

Subject: Conversation between the Ambassador and Minister of the Interior, Dr. the Honorable T. E. Dönges, K. C.

I made my first call today on Dr. Dönges, Minister of the Interior. While Dönges was quite occupied getting ready for his departure for Paris the end of the week to attend the General Assembly session, he gave me about an hour of his time. A case before the Cape Supreme Court involving the Separate Representation Voters Bill prevented his departure earlier for Paris (see Embassy's despatch, Cape Town Series No. 43, March 29, 1951 1).

Dönges received me in a breezy, friendly way. He said he hoped to be back from Paris at least by the latter part of December. While he would not have as heavy a legislative program to look after at the coming session of Parliament as he did last year, he would, however, have to be back sometime before the session opened and, of course, be in Cape Town at its opening. During the session last year he said he was kept very much occupied getting action on the Separate Representation Voters Bill and the Group Areas Act. He anticipated a great deal of his time this year in Cape Town would be occupied with details of the Van Riebeeck Centenary.

Dönges then spent some time telling me about his stay in the States last year.2 He said he had enjoyed his talks with the Secretary and his association with our delegation at Lake Success. He regretted that he had to spend so much time at Lake Success and had only been able to get to know New York and Washington. He would have liked to have traveled more widely in the States. He said he would have particularly liked to have visited the Middle West and the west coast. We then discussed points of interest which he thought it would be well for me to see in South Africa. He mentioned particularly some of the irrigation projects and I told him that I had already made plans with our Agricultural Attaché Dougherty to visit some of these projects.

Dönges then launched into a discussion of the present General Assembly meeting. The solution for the South West Africa question, he said, to his mind would be an agreement limited to the Union, the United States, Britain and France. South Africa, he said, was not willing any longer to be a "whipping boy". One report on South West Africa had been submitted to UNO and that promptly led to some forty questions. The Union was not going to expose itself to this again. To limit matters to the four nations, as the Union wished, would have one very vital advantage. There are indications, he said, that South West Africa may become an important source for uranium. For that reason alone it certainly was best to keep a large number of foreign powers, including the Soviet Union, from injecting themselves into South West Africa affairs. I told Dönges that a good deal of what he had said about South West Africa I had heard before. I hoped very much that a mutually satisfactory agreement could be reached on this issue soon. At this point Dönges promptly moved on to the question of the Indian minority.

1 Not printed.

South Africa, he said, was a western nation in thought and orientation. South Africa already had enough on its hands with the Native problem without having also to contend with an Indian minority problem. The Indian minority in South Africa constituted a "bridgehead for the east". This bridgehead should be eliminated. In the hope of bringing Dönges to see the practical implications of his statement, quite apart from the moral issues involved, I asked him just how large the Indian minority was. He promptly replied "only 300,000", and then callously stated that the 300,000, added to the millions already in India, could hardly create a problem for India.

Dönges then turned the discussion to U.S.-South African relations. He acknowledged that there was a large measure of understanding and friendship between the two countries. He said he wished though the United States would not, as she so often does, deal with South Africa "on a broad, international, world basis" but would do so more on a "direct basis". This he followed up with the breath-taking remark that he had always been impressed with the firm backing Moscow gave her satellites at international conferences. I reminded Dönges that I had had some personal experience with Moscow's treatment of Satellites, having lived in one of the satellite countries, but Dönges gave no visible signs of appreciation of what I was trying to tell him.

What stood out in my talk with Dönges was his disarmingly frank and friendly behavior, his bland method of talking, and his ability to cloak his obviously narrow nationalistic outlook, for the most part, with smooth language.

Editorial Note

On November 9, 1951 in Washington, Acting Secretary of State James E. Webb and South African Chargé Basil Jarvie exchanged notes constituting an agreement regarding the sale of military equipment to the Union under the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, as amended. The notes set forth those undertakings and assurances required in the administration of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act. For the texts of the notes, see 3 UST (pt. 2) 2565; TIAS 2424; 160 UNTS 41. A brief announcement of the agreement was issued to the press by the Department of State on November 10; see Department of State Bulletin, November 19, 1951, page 825. Department of State Press Officer Lincoln White explained to newsmen on November 9 that the agreement involved no outlay of money by the United States but simply permitted the Union of South Africa to buy military equipment in the United States provided it agreed to certain undertakings including that South Africa would not reexport the equipment without the permission of the United States, that the shipments would only be used for the defense of South Africa, and that they would be used in accordance with the objectives of the United Nations. Telegram 133, November 10, from Pretoria reported the following statement issued by the South African Foreign Ministry on November 10:

"The Department of External Affairs announces that the Union Government has made an agreement with the United States Government in regard to the supply of military equipment. It will be recalled that it was previously announced that the policy of the Union Government is to range itself in the event of a war against Communism alongside the anti-Communistic powers in the defence of Africa and with a view to ensuring that its military forces are properly equipped with modern arms, the Union approached the United States and other countries for the procurement of its requirements which cannot be manufactured in this country. It was announced earlier this year that South Africa has been declared eligible to receive from the United States reimbursable military assistance under the Mutual Defence Assistance Act 1949 as amended and since then negotiations have been in progress in regard to the terms on which the equipment needed by the Union should be supplied. These negotiations have now culminated in the agreement mentioned. South African Press Association summation above release adds: A State Department press officer said the equipment would be used only for the defense of South Africa and in accordance with United Nations objectives." The basic documentation on the negotiation of the agreement of November 9, 1951 is included in Department file 740.5 MAP.

The Ambassador in the Union of South Africa (Gallman) to the Department of State

SECRET No. 312 PRETORIA, November 9, 1951.

Subject: Native Unrest.

A few years ago people in the Union of South Africa speculated on whether or not there would be Native unrest in the future; today the only speculation that is justifiable is when and how the disturbance will come. As the Embassy has previously pointed out, under the various measures for implementing White supremacy and apartheid (racial segregation) put forward by the present Nationalist Government, relations between the Natives and Whites have deteriorated to the lowest level in the Union's history. All persons working independently with the Natives, that is to say, persons not connected with the Government, whom the reporting officer has talked with in recent weeks are extremely worried about the possibility of Native disturbances.

No one except the Non-European leaders appears convinced that the Natives have sufficient organization at this time to effect an overthrow of the present system of Government. What is currently under discussion by informed observers is this: Under the Suppression of Communism Act a great many Non-European leaders have been "named" and they anticipate that many of them may be jailed. Those that are not placed in jail will, as a matter of course, be prevented from carrying on their activities in Non-European organizations. Since these Non-European leaders will be prevented, in any case, from going on with their political activities, the danger is that they will attempt some sort of demonstration while they are still able to do so. In recent talks with Non-European leaders, they have dropped a great many hints of trouble in the relatively near future. Embassy officers have been told that Natives in the various locations around Johannesburg have arms; that Non-European leaders have made a list of the "hot heads" in the Youth Congress; and that the "Tsotsis" (Native zoot suit gangsters) will be utilized. A variety of schemes for provoking disorders have been mentioned, the most imaginative of which is one which envisages that on a given signal all the Native petrol attendants on the Witwatersrand would set fire to their petrol tanks. In the confusion that would result, Natives could create considerable damage and intimidate the present Government. Other schemes speak of carefully organized plans for domestic servants to kill their masters and others talk of the mine workers going out and creating havoc by dynamite. The reporting officer has been told by numerous Non-European leaders that the quantities of dynamite stolen each week are considerable. However, many persons close to the Natives are convinced they will take no step until the declaration of World War III.

In the past two weeks a growing number of hints have been dropped that a conference of Non-European leaders meeting on December 15, 1951 in Bloemfontein will map out a campaign for a mass protest. Recent rumors among the more extremist Johannesburg Natives suggest that the day chosen for a protest will be Dingaan's Day, December 16. (This is the day celebrated throughout the Union by Afrikaners as a sort of spiritual protest against the assassination of the Voortrekker leader, Piet Retif, by Dingaan, the Zulu chieftain.)

Embassy Comment:

It is extremely difficult to evaluate the timing of a general Native uprising. About all that the Embassy can do is to notify the Department at times when Native tension is on the increase. This is such a time. The Government authorities are convinced that they can deal with any uprising and are further convinced that there is insufficient organization to arrange a genuine uprising. We believe that the Union has sufficient forces to put down any uprising that does not get out of hand. However, if a Union-wide Native disturbance were to last for 24 hours the Government would have serious difficulty in coping with it, however improbable such an event may appear. If it is true that the Natives are not capable of organizing a serious uprising, then there is something wrong with the Government's statement which claims that in time of war it would be necessary to retain a sizeable force of troops in the Union to maintain internal security.

In short, opinion on a Native uprising is divided into three groups. One group holds that the Natives will never rise and that eventually through the years the Government will be able to control them through apartheid or their lot will be bettered by industrial advancement (this point of view includes the majority of White South Africans, and is particularly strong among industrialists). The second group believes that there will be scattered riots which will be put down ruthlessly, but no genuine rebellion, for the foreseeable future, although they acknowledge that it may come eventually. (This point of view is held by "progressive" Afrikaners, and many missionaries and social workers.) The third group believes that a large Native uprising is inevitable and that eventually South Africa will become a black man's country. (This point of view is held by a small minority which includes most of the independent authorities on Native affairs, liberals, and the few white people who are close to Non-European leaders.) No one could prove any one of these three points of view, or give any sort of "proof" that one opinion is more likely to prevail than another. What can be said, however, is that there are less than a half-dozen white people who have any sort of idea of what the Non-Europeans as a whole are "thinking". There is no Non-Communist white person who is on the "inside" of thinking and planning among the Non-European leaders. The gulf between the Whites and Blacks in South Africa is a serious one. And even the Prime Minister recently admitted that the situation was dangerous in that a "spark" could cause trouble. One thing appears certain and that is that the present tension cannot continue indefinitely—it must be released somehow.

of chrome and manganese exports with increasing concern. It was hoped that materially increased shipments would result in the latter months of 1951 after alleviation of winter conditions and labor difficulties, and in view of the repeated assurances from the South African government (Note from the Department of External Affairs dated July 11, 1951 and letter from the Minister of Transport dated October 8, 1951<sup>3</sup>) that an amount equalling or exceeding the 1950 volume would be shipped. Despite these assurances, shipments of manganese ores for 1951 will not only be far below the contracted amount but below the 1950 volume. The total shipments of manganese to the United States in 1951 may not exceed 370,000 s.t. compared to a total of 479,426 in 1950, and the backlog of unshipped manganese ore as of October 31 equalled 315,700 s.t. Chrome ore shipments are closer to the 1950 level but will fall far below the 1951 commitments.

The Department, therefore, concurs that the Ambassador should renew the discussion with the Minister of Transport at an early date, and should make a vigorous and comprehensive statement of the case. The importance of South African chrome and manganese shipments for the U.S. defense effort and for the security of the free world should be clearly and firmly emphasized. It should be pointed out that stocks of manganese ore are declining in the U.S. and that steel production will be jeopardized by continued delay.

The Department has been informed that one factor which perhaps is responsible for the tie-up of a large volume of rolling stock is the right of port consignees of coal to store it in railroad cars for a period of thirty days. If in the opinion of the Embassy this is a genuine factor, it would be a good point to discuss with the Minister. In addition any other evidence of improper utilization of rolling stock of which the Embassy is aware might be discussed. In the event the Minister brings up the shortage of rolling stock or other railway equipment as a reason for decreased shipments, an effort should be made to obtain details of such orders, i.e. names of manufacturers, and status of deliveries. For the Embassy's information, if rolling stock and other railway equipment comprise the major bottleneck the Department might explore the possibilities of expediting shipments.

If the Minister should refer to technical or administrative transport difficulties as a deterrent to ore shipments, the Ambassador may wish to suggest that a really cooperative approach to such problems might yield beneficial results, and that the United States would be very interested in learning in what way it might be able to assist South Africa in solving such problems.

The Defense Materials Procurement Administration has suggested that an American railroad expert as a consultant in South Africa might be helpful. The Department requests the opinion of the Embassy as to whether the Embassy feels the need of a transportation expert to assist in observing the situation and in carrying on discussions with the Government of South Africa. If such a consultant is desirable, his territory should presumably include Southwest Africa, the Rhodesias, Kenya, Uganda, Tanganyika, Mozambique and possibly Madagascar.

The conversation with the Minister of Transport should be followed by a formal note to the Minister of External Affairs, unless the Ambassador perceives objection. This note should review fully the matter of manganese and chrome ore shipments, with emphasis on United States efforts to expedite such shipments, and should illustrate graphically the disappointing results. The note should point out that this matter is regarded by the United States Government as of the highest importance in the relations between the two Governments, and as an instance in which the South African Government is in a position to contribute significantly to the mutual security efforts of the free world. The note should omit any reference to an offer of technical assistance, but should inquire as to the Government's plans for increasing ore shipments.
